79 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
80 National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010.
83 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
Legal aid is extremely limited, and the potential cost of court proceedings can be very high, especially in complex cases such as those involving family violence. This is exacerbated by legal aid merit assessments. Some clients have had difficulties meeting the merit criteria where they have raised concerns about domestic violence and seek to limit the time the other parent spends with children due to a perception that their case does not have good prospects of success.

17.85 Some stakeholders suggested other ways to prevent federal family courts making parenting orders by consent that are inconsistent with current protection orders, including a requirement that applications be accompanied by a statement of agreed facts or an affidavit explaining why the inconsistency should be allowed, or a requirement that parties appear before the court in cases where inconsistent orders are proposed.

Commissions’ views

17.86 The Commissions support the amendments that have been made to r 10.15A of the Family Court Rules to require that parties, or their legal representatives, must advise the court if any allegations of family violence, or risk of family violence, have been raised in the proceedings, and, if so, explain to the court how the order deals with those allegations. The Commissions also support the pending application of this rule to matters heard in the FMC. Such amendments will ensure that parties and courts turn their minds to the effect of inconsistent orders and, in particular, the fact that conditions in the protection order that are inconsistent with the parenting order are invalid.

17.87 The Commissions do not consider that an amendment to the Family Law Rules to require parties to institute parenting proceedings where they propose consent orders that are inconsistent with current protection is necessary. The Commissions note the advice in the submission from the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate about current court procedures for identifying inconsistencies—where parties seek parenting orders that are inconsistent with a protection order, the registrar will consider the matter closely, and may refer the matter to a judicial officer for consideration. In the Commissions’ view, this process means the court retains flexibility to deal with the circumstances of each case and will not necessarily require parties formally to commence litigation.

Parenting orders made in interim proceedings

17.88 The Chisholm Review considered that ‘one of the greatest practical problems in cases involving family violence is what to do in interim cases’. Where allegations of family violence are raised in interim proceedings, there is often little corroborative evidence and limited opportunity to cross-examine witnesses, meaning that the judicial officer will often be unable to make a finding about the likely truth of the allegations, and thus unable to reach a confident view about what arrangements are likely to be best for the children in the period—which may well be many months—before the final hearing.88

17.89 The Family Court’s Best Practice Principles set out some matters that federal family courts should consider when making interim parenting orders in cases where there are disputed allegations of family violence. These considerations include the likely risk of harm to the child if the child spends time with a parent against whom allegations of family violence have been made; and the kinds of conditions that may be included in an interim parenting order.89

17.90 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether any additional measures are necessary to ensure that allegations of family violence are given adequate consideration in interim parenting proceedings in federal family courts.90 Stakeholders suggested a range of measures, with many submitting that risk assessment processes in the federal family courts would enable courts to be made aware of, and better understand and address, family violence issues in interim proceedings.91

17.91 The Chisholm Review also considered that some improvement to the consideration of family violence in interim proceedings may result from a systematic screening for family violence and also ‘from improved educational opportunities for court staff, lawyers and other professionals, and additional guidance such as is contained in the Best Practice Principles’.92 The review suggested, however, that the problems posed in interim proceedings, especially those involving allegations of violence, were ‘not primarily related to the performance of judicial officers’,93 but was a wider issue:

Additional judicial and other resources will be required if we wish to improve the family courts’ ability to protect children, especially from the consequences of important decisions based on inadequate and untested evidence, that might expose the children to risk of harm, whether by being exposed to the risk of violence or by being separated unnecessarily from a parent. Children would undoubtedly be much safer if through legal aid or otherwise the parties and the children were properly represented, and the number of judicial officers was such that each case could be given the

88 Ibid, 80.
89 Family Court of Australia, Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (2009), 7.
90 Consultation Paper, Question 8–3.
92 R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), 84.
93 Ibid, 84 (emphasis added).
17. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction & Practice of Federal Family Courts

779

attention it deserved, without causing unacceptable delays in the hearing of other cases.94

17.92 As a consequence, the Chisholm Review recommended that the Australian Government consider providing federal family courts with the additional resources necessary to ensure that adequate attention can be given to children’s cases in interim proceedings, especially cases involving allegations of family violence.95

17.93 While the Commissions acknowledge concerns that in interim proceedings courts do not necessarily have the information to assess issues of family violence comprehensively, the Commissions consider that the interaction issues that arise in interim proceedings are the same as those that arise across all parenting proceedings involving issues of family violence, which are discussed elsewhere in this chapter. As such, the Commissions refer to the recommendations of the Chisholm Review in relation to interim proceedings and do not make any additional specific recommendations for reform of interim parenting proceedings.

Relocation and recovery orders

Relocation orders

17.94 As noted in Chapter 15, relocation disputes are a type of parenting dispute that may arise when one parent, with whom a child lives, wants to move to another location, which may limit the other parent’s opportunity to spend time with the child. The Family Law Act does not expressly address relocation issues. Relocation disputes are determined in accordance with the general parenting order provisions in the Family Law Act. The best interests of the child is the paramount consideration in relocation matters, consistent with all parenting proceedings. As discussed above, family violence is a relevant consideration in determining the best interests of the child in accordance with ss 60CC and 60CG of the Family Law Act.

17.95 Stakeholders have raised significant concerns that, in practice, relocation orders are being refused where a parent and his or her children are at risk of exposure to family violence, illustrated by the following case study commentary:

One woman who had two young daughters lived with her partner (their father) in a remote community in NT. She had primary responsibility for the care of the girls. She had experienced economic abuse combined with physical abuse throughout her relationship with her partner but finally had the courage to leave him. At that point he started to make threats to kill her. She moved, with their two daughters, into local domestic violence crisis accommodation. The crisis accommodation staff were so concerned for her safety that they organised a rare emergency evacuation to Darwin for her and the girls through a domestic violence legal service. The father then told the court that she had relocated the girls without his consent. In spite of the surrounding circumstances, the judge ordered the woman to return to the remote community she had been evacuated from.

The clear disregard of the woman’s safety to one side, there did not seem to be any concern about the appropriateness of the father’s style of parenting whereby children were witnessing acts of domestic violence and whether, in the balance of things, it was appropriate to disrupt the rest of the family for the sake of access by him to the children. Women who have experienced violence are all the more in need of extended family support, which may only be available outside of the Territory. Many times they have moved to the Territory to be with the man, leaving behind all family and friend networks. The support they get from these networks feeds directly into their ability to be good parents and it may well be in the best interests of the child for relocation in circumstances of [family violence] to be viewed more sympathetically. Refusal to consent to relocation is a prime opportunity for violent partners to retain a pattern of abuse and control of their partner after the relationship has ended. Domestic violence needs to be taken into account in a more significant and central way where relocation is being contested.96

94 Ibid, 84.
95 Ibid, Rec 2.6.

17.96 Some literature suggests that some victims choose not to raise allegations of family violence in relocation proceedings. A review of 50 relocation matters heard in the federal family courts from 2003–08 considered the implications of the 2006 shared parenting reforms. It reported that, in the pre-2006 cohort, in all but one case in which allegations of violence by the father towards the mother were accepted as true and relevant to the best interests of the child, the mother was given permission to relocate immediately. In three cases post-2006, where the woman wanted to relocate, a prior history of violence was acknowledged. Two of these mothers were successful in their request to relocate.97

17.97 The authors of the review extrapolated from these findings that, when the court acknowledges family violence, it will outweigh the requirement for a ‘meaningful relationship with both parents’. However, they went on to discuss the small number of cases in the post-amendment sample in which allegations were raised about a past history of violence, commenting that:

This is one of the more interesting and unexpected findings of our study. Perhaps the ‘gatekeepers’ are advising clients that relocations are more likely to be allowed where there is family violence, leading to these matters not getting to court, or perhaps movers who have experienced family violence are more reluctant to make such allegations in the post-2006 legislative climate.98

17.98 In 2006, the Family Law Council recommended to the Attorney-General that additional provisions should be inserted into the Family Law Act to deal specifically with relocation. The recommended provisions included that a court should consider what parenting arrangements could be made if a party were to relocate to ensure that the child maintains a meaningful relationship with both parents, to the extent consistent with the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm. In justifying its recommended provisions, the Council commented that:

Proposed arrangements must be consistent with the object … of protecting the child from physical or psychological harm. Council believes that it is useful to specifically 17.99 In its submission to that inquiry, Women’s Legal Services Australia argued that family violence should be accorded a much greater weight in relocation orders:

In our view, the guidelines should emphasise that, in cases where there has been family violence, it is likely to be in the best interests of the child for the resident parent to be able to relocate a safe distance from the perpetrator. The United States National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges’ Family Violence Model State Code provides a model that could be adapted for this purpose. The Code provides for a rebuttable presumption that it is in the best interests of the child to reside with the parent who is not the perpetrator of violence in a location of that person’s choice, within or outside the state.\(^9\)

17.100 The 2010 judgment of the High Court in MRR v GR may influence the determination of future relocation disputes. In that case, a mother appealed a parenting order made by the FMC for the parents to have equal shared responsibility for the child and for the child to spend equal time with each of them. The orders were made on the basis that—contrary to the mother’s expressed wish to return to Sydney—both parents would live in Mount Isa. The High Court held that, in the circumstances, equal time parenting was not ‘reasonably practicable’ under s 65DAA of the Family Law Act. The Court’s decision was influenced by the mother’s lack of appropriate accommodation, limited opportunities for employment and isolation from her family. The matter was remitted to the FMC for a new hearing.\(^1\)

Recovery orders

17.101 Recovery proceedings may arise when one parent relocates with a child or children. As discussed in Chapter 15, courts exercising jurisdiction under Part VII of the Family Law Act may make recovery orders requiring the return of a child, typically to a parent.\(^2\) The Australian Federal Police are generally authorised by the order to recover the child. Section 67V of the Family Law Act makes clear that a court must regard the best interests of the child as the paramount consideration when making a recovery order. The note to the section points out that ss 60CB to 60CG deal with how a court determines ‘best interests’, which leads to s 60CC and the primary and secondary considerations relevant to the best interests of the child. Sections 60CC and 60CG are discussed in detail above.

Consultation Paper

17.102 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder feedback on whether issues arise in practice from the interaction between protection orders and relocation orders or allegations of family violence. The Commissions also sought stakeholder views as to whether any additional legal or practical reforms are needed to address issues related to the practical interaction of protection order proceedings and

---

100 Ibid, [6.42].
102 Persons who may seek a recovery order are set out in Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67T.
relocation disputes. In particular, the Commissions asked whether there should be a presumption that, in cases where a federal family court determines there has been family violence, it is likely to be in the best interests of a child to be able to relocate to a safe distance from the person who has used violence. If such a presumption were to be introduced, the Commissions asked whether it should be included in legislation or in policy—for example, in the Best Practice Principles.103

17.103 The Commissions also asked whether the Family Law Act should be amended to include provisions dealing with family violence in relocation matters, over and above the provisions of the Act that apply to family violence in parenting proceedings generally;104 and whether any legal or practical reforms in the context of relocation disputes should apply in all or only some cases of family violence—and, if so, how this should be determined.105

17.104 In relation to recovery orders, the Commissions asked whether the Family Law Act should be amended to include provisions dealing with family violence in recovery matters, in addition to the provisions of the Act that apply to family violence in parenting proceedings.106

Submissions and consultations

Family violence and relocation

17.105 Stakeholders identified that family violence was a common reason that women wish to relocate with their children. The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria reported that magistrates who sit regularly in the jurisdiction ‘report applicants seeking to relocate away from family violence perpetrators’.107

17.106 Similarly, several other stakeholders also noted that victims of family violence may relocate in order to be a safe distance from the person who uses family violence.108 The Queensland Law Society submitted that the shortage of refuge accommodation may prompt relocation, as victims who need to live in refuges have to move to a different part of the state.109 A number of stakeholders commented that some victims relocate following family violence and relationship breakdown to be closer to their family and support networks.110

---

103 Consultation Paper, Question 9–8, [9.144].
104 Ibid, Question 9–9.
106 Ibid, Question 9–11.
107 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. noted that ‘many women are isolated from their families as part of the cycle of domestic violence’.

17.107 Some groups may be particularly affected by relocation issues. One regional legal service drew attention to the particular problems leading to relocation from rural and remote communities, which may be ‘too small for [women] to remain living in close proximity to the offender safely’. The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria reported that relocation was a significant issue for their client group, and that ‘family violence is regularly involved along with cultural issues—connection with family and country’.

17.108 A concern expressed by two stakeholders was that the safety of the victim of family violence was being put second to the interest of the other parent, who had used family violence, in maintaining a relationship with the children. Stakeholders also submitted that allegations of family violence were not given enough weight in relocation proceedings. For example, Professor Patricia Easteal, drawing on her research in this area, argued that judicial officers often do not accept that violence has occurred, or that it is relevant in making a determination.

17.109 Several women’s legal services attributed the emphasis on shared parenting in the 2006 reforms to the Family Law Act to greater restrictions on relocation. The Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, for example, commented that:

Because of the ‘friendly parent’ provisions it has been a risky strategy to run the argument that puts forward the primary reason for relocation as being the wish to get away from the violent parent.

17.110 The Women’s Legal Service Victoria compared the approach in child protection cases under state and territory child protection legislation, where a parent was expected to be ‘protective’ of his or her children, with their experience with respect to the family courts’ consideration of relocation matters.

The Child Protection system usually interprets a parent preventing a violent parent from having contact, minimising contact by relocation as being protective. They are 111 Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.

112 Confidential, Submission FV 89, 3 June 2010.
114 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children
Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.
115 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.
116 P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010. See, for example: P Easteal and K Harkins, ‘Are We There
117 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 118 Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010. Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
approaching it strictly from a child centred point of view so there is no conflict with the idea of parental involvement.\textsuperscript{119}

17.111 Stakeholders described the impact on victims of family violence where their applications to relocate were unsuccessful. Victims may be deprived of the support of family and friends,\textsuperscript{120} may be exposed to further family violence,\textsuperscript{121} and may feel trapped by the family court orders or their situation.\textsuperscript{122} Such circumstances may also enable persons who use family violence to ‘maintain a pattern of domination and control’ over the victim of family violence.\textsuperscript{123}

\textbf{Presumption in favour of relocation}

17.112 Stakeholders were divided in their response to the question of whether there should be a presumption—in cases where a family court determines there has been family violence—that it is likely to be in the best interests of a child to be able to relocate to a safe distance from the person who has used violence.

17.113 A number of stakeholders supported the introduction of such a presumption, for the range of reasons discussed above.\textsuperscript{124} Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW—while considering that the application of a presumption would be beneficial—expressed a number of concerns, including that a presumption may send the message that it is enough simply to relocate away from a perpetrator. Victims will almost always experience ongoing fear and it can be hard to establish a ‘safe distance’, particularly when there is emotional or psychological abuse.\textsuperscript{125}

17.114 They pointed out that some victims do not wish to relocate, and these victims should not be made to feel that fleeing is their only option. They stated:

\begin{quote}
if a presumption is introduced it must be clear that the presumption will not apply if the victim does not wish to relocate. The effect of the legislation must not replicate the power imbalance that has been present in the violent relationship or cause victims to feel that they are still not in control of their own lives.\textsuperscript{126}
\end{quote}

\begin{thebibliography}{99}
\bibitem{} Women’s Legal Services Australia, \textit{Submission FV 225}, 6 July 2010.
\end{thebibliography}
17.115 Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW also argued that judicial officers should be prepared to make orders that do not provide for the person who has used family violence to spend time with or communicate with the children.

17.116 Other stakeholders opposed the introduction of this presumption. Other stakeholders who held this position generally disagreed with a limitation on the discretion of judicial officers to weigh up ‘the individual facts and merits of each case’.128

17.117 The Department of Premier and Cabinet, Tasmania, argued that the principal issue in relation to relocation and family violence is ‘the quality and cogency of the allegations of family violence’.129 It expressed concern that introducing a presumption may devalue other considerations in relation to the best interests of the child, and that due to the ‘complexity and variety of situations, a presumption is difficult’.130

Amending the Family Law Act to include provisions on relocation and family violence

17.118 There was support from a range of stakeholders, expressed in general terms, for amending the Family Law Act to make express reference to family violence with respect to relocation.131 Other stakeholders provided more detail. For example, the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria urged the inclusion of ‘cultural issues’ as well as family violence.132

17.119 Professor Patricia Easteal agreed with an amendment to the Family Law Act, while indicating that such reform would not be sufficient to address the issue: ‘that isn’t going to solve the problem of judges not accepting either that the violence took place or was serious enough to be relevant’.133

17.120 Some stakeholders opposed an amendment to the Family Law Act to include additional provisions dealing with family violence in relocation cases. Several stakeholders argued that the issue of family violence is adequately addressed by the 129 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

130 Ibid.

133 P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.
general parenting provisions, and in particular the considerations relating to the best interests of the child pursuant to s 60CC. In a joint submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and Chief Federal Magistrate submitted that it is well accepted that although relocation disputes may have particular features or complexities when compared with parenting cases generally, they are nevertheless still parenting cases and should be governed by the principles, objects and best factor considerations that apply to all parenting disputes.

17.121 Their Honours stated that the Family Law Act is sufficiently flexible to deal appropriately with family violence allegations in relocation cases, referring in particular to the ‘references to family violence in the objects, primary and secondary considerations’.136

17.122 Several stakeholders expressed concern that such an amendment may result in increased complexity. For example, the Department of Premier and Cabinet, Tasmania, suggested that this may be an unintended consequence of an additional provision relating to relocation and family violence. Further, the Chief Justice and Chief Federal Magistrate stated that:

Part VII of the Family Law Act is already a complex and cumbersome piece of legislation to navigate. In this respect the recommendation of Professor Chisholm (recommendation 3.8) that the government undertake a revision of Part VII with a view to clarifying and simplifying the law, is supported. Further fragmentation of Part VII through the insertion of ‘relocation case specific considerations’ would be undesirable for that reason.

17.123 Their Honours referred to the submission of the Family Court of Australia to the Family Law Council in its report on relocation:

amendments to the Act which effectively quarantine relocation cases from other children’s cases may create a more fragmented and complex legislative regime, as well as encouraging threshold litigation around whether a particular proposal is a ‘relocation’ (thereby attracting the application of specific criteria) or a ‘reaccommodation’.139

17.124 While National Legal Aid was not opposed to the introduction of specific provisions in relation to family violence and relocation, it submitted that this ‘should be approached with caution’.140 It argued that family violence may not be the only

---

136 Ibid.
139 Ibid.
relevant consideration in proceedings, and given the complexity of relocation cases, each should be ‘dealt with on their particular facts’.

Cases in which relocation-specific provisions should apply

17.125 There were varied responses as to which types of cases a presumption, or relocation-specific provisions of the Family Law Act, should apply. Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc considered that the presumption should apply in cases where there has been physical violence, but was unsure of whether the presumption should apply in other matters. The Women’s Legal Service Victoria submitted that this issue should be determined by further reviews.

17.126 The National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc argued that relocation-specific provisions should apply in all cases of family violence:

> it is our experience that whilst sometimes acknowledging family violence, the severity of violence is often minimized and its impact on women and children often underestimated by the family law system and therefore any accommodation for the varying severity and nature of the violence is likely to underrate the levels and impact of violence.

17.127 The Department of Premier and Cabinet, Tasmania, and the Law Council of Australia submitted that there are problems identifying the types of cases in which a presumption that should apply.

> there is a broad spectrum of behaviours that constitute family violence and attempting to define circumstances in which the presumption should or should not apply would be very difficult.

17.128 Another threshold issue was identified by the Law Council of Australia, in relation to the suggested presumption that it is likely to be in the best interests of the child to be able to relocate to a safe distance from the person who used violence. The Council queried how a ‘safe distance’ would be legislatively defined.

Amending the Family Law Act to include provisions on recovery and family violence

17.129 A number of stakeholders supported an amendment of the Family Law Act to include provisions dealing with family violence in recovery matters, in addition to the provisions of the Act that apply to family violence in parenting proceedings. As with

---

141 Ibid.
147 Ibid.
parenting proceedings, stakeholders identified family violence as a factor which may prompt recovery proceedings.\textsuperscript{149} Women’s Legal Services Australia submitted in support of such a provision that recovery orders may in some cases ‘largely be about controlling the victim of family violence rather than about seeking to spend time with the child/ren of the relationship’\textsuperscript{150}

17.130 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria described the factors that may lead to recovery proceedings amongst their client group:

\begin{quote}
Mobility is high for a range of regions—stolen generation issues—maintaining connections to country/family. Often perpetrators take women away from family supports into isolated areas resulting in them needing to leave. In doing so they are acting protectively for children particularly where they seek to connect with other carers etc.\textsuperscript{151}
\end{quote}

17.131 Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW pointed out that as relocation is a priority issue for victims of family violence, this may give rise to recovery proceedings:

\begin{quote}
Many victims tell us that they want to escape the violence first and once they are safe deal with other issues such as seeking a protection order and any family law matters. However in doing this they are worried that as soon as they leave the other party may be successful in obtaining an ex parte recovery order because the court will not have been advised of the family violence.\textsuperscript{152}
\end{quote}

17.132 To deal with such situations, Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW submitted that there is a need for a procedure where victims can notify the courts that they have left and taken the children because of family violence. To be effective this would need to include a shared database accessible by all courts having jurisdiction under the \textit{Family Law Act}, which flags a family violence notification. Then if the other party makes an application for a recovery order the court will see that there has been a family violence notification. \textit{... In making such a notification victims would then have to bring family law and/or protection matter before the courts within a specified timeframe.\textsuperscript{153}}

17.133 They noted that where the victim has a protection order, a national protection order database may address such problems with ex parte recovery proceedings.

150 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.

152 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.

153 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
17.134 While Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW expressed support for an amendment to the Family Law Act to include provisions dealing with family violence and recovery matters, both acknowledged that such a reform may make Family Law Act ‘legislation and procedures more complex’.154

17.135 National Legal Aid considered that such an amendment may not be necessary, arguing that the important issue is that courts ‘give appropriate consideration to evidence of family violence’ when determining recovery matters.155

Commissions’ views

17.136 Refusing to make relocation orders in situations involving family violence may have serious repercussions for the safety of victims and their children. As noted by stakeholders in this Inquiry, victims in rural or remote areas of Australia may not be or feel safe from violence while remaining in close enough proximity to the person who has used violence to keep child contact arrangements unchanged. For victims who have been distanced geographically from their extended family or primary support network, regaining this support could be crucial to moving forward in their lives.

17.137 The focus in this Inquiry is on interactions of law, in this particular context between the Family Law Act and state and territory family violence laws. While the Commissions heard during the Inquiry that stakeholders have a number of concerns with respect to the extent to which family violence is considered in the context of relocation and recovery situations, few stakeholders addressed the particular issue of the interaction of state and territory family violence laws specifically.

17.138 The Commissions note some stakeholders’ concerns that amending the Family Law Act to include a presumption or specific criteria for relocation and recovery matters in cases of family violence may lead to increased complexity in proceedings, and fragmentation of the Family Law Act. A consequence of such fragmentation may be threshold litigation, for example, around terms such as ‘relocation’ or ‘safe distance’, as parties litigate on issues of definition to attract or prevent the application of specific considerations in determining the case. Increasing the complexity of the Family Law Act in these ways may hinder the accessibility of federal family court proceedings in relocation and recovery cases—thus undermining one of the key aspirations of this Inquiry.

17.139 Identifying the types of case in which a presumption or specific criteria would apply is also problematic. Given that a wide range of behaviours of varying severity constitutes family violence, it may not be appropriate for a presumption or specific criteria to apply in all cases where there is a finding of family violence. However, limiting the application of the presumption or specific criteria may lead to threshold litigation of the kind discussed above. Further, specifying types of family violence that attract the application of specific provisions may operate to disadvantage victims of family violence who may appear to have suffered ‘less severe’ or, for example, non-physical forms of family violence, but who have been significantly affected by their experiences.

---

155 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

17.140 The Commissions note that a key recommendation of the Chisholm Review is that the Australian Government undertake a revision of Part VII of the Family Law Act with a view to clarifying and simplifying the law. This recommendation has the express support of the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate, as indicated in their submission to this Inquiry. The Commissions agree that relocation cases should not be considered as somehow ‘quarantined’ from other children’s cases, nor that the legislation or procedures should be made more complex, as these would work against key reform principles in this Inquiry—accessibility and effectiveness. The Commissions are persuaded, therefore, by the submission of the Chief Justice and Chief Federal Magistrate that “further fragmentation of Part VII through the insertion of “relocation case specific” considerations would be undesirable”. The Commissions’ concerns about increased complexity and fragmentation of the Family Law Act also apply to the introduction of criteria specific to recovery matters.

17.141 The Commissions further consider that reforms recommended elsewhere in this Report are sufficient to address the interaction of allegations of family violence with both relocation and recovery matters. In this chapter, the Commissions make a recommendation for reform to s 60CC of the Family Law Act directed to improving the visibility and weight accorded to protection order proceedings in parenting proceedings generally. If this recommendation is implemented, federal family courts will need to consider more fully any evidence given or findings made in family violence protection order proceedings under state and territory family violence legislation in parenting proceedings. Recommendations to facilitate allegations of family violence being raised in the federal family courts are also set out in two 2009 reviews—the Chisholm Review and the Family Law Council advice Improving Responses to Family Violence in the Family Law System.

17.142 Also relevant to relocation and recovery matters is the Commissions’ recommendation with respect to s 60CG of the Family Law Act. This section specifically addresses family violence and requires the court to ensure that the order is consistent with any family violence protection order and does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence; and to impose any safeguards considered necessary for the safety of those affected by the order. In Chapter 16 the Commissions recommended that s 60CG be amended to provide that, when including such

157 Ibid.
158 Recommendation 17–1.
safeguards, the court should give primary consideration to the protection of that person over the other factors that are relevant to determining the best interests of the child.160

17.143 With respect to the overall objective of this Inquiry—improving safety—and the reform principle that the legal framework needs to be as seamless as possible from the point of view of those who engage with it, the inclusion of the recommended reforms as part of the revision of Part VII would address many of the concerns with respect to the interaction issues identified by stakeholders arising from relocation and recovery proceedings, and allegations of family violence.

17.144 In other chapters in this Report, the Commissions focus on improving the understanding of the dynamics of family violence across the legal systems that victims and their families encounter by enhancing practice through specialisation and information sharing. Federal family courts already operate as specialised courts, however as stakeholders have demonstrated throughout this Inquiry, there is room for improvement with respect to the understanding of family violence and the articulation of information between state and federal systems.

17.145 The Commissions consider that information sharing procedures such as the national protection order register will assist courts in improving the safety of victims of family violence generally, and also relocation and recovery matters specifically. For example, in ex parte recovery proceedings, courts exercising jurisdiction under Part VII may access the register to check if any relevant protection orders have been made against the applicant.161

17.146 If the recommendations regarding ss 60CC and 60CG are implemented, as well as other recommendations in this Report, the Commissions consider that there is no additional need to amend the Family Law Act with respect to including provisions specific to relocation and recovery matters.

Property proceedings

17.147 Section 79 of the Family Law Act permits federal family courts to make orders about the distribution of the property of parties to a marriage upon the breakdown of that marriage. Section 90SM of the Family Law Act governs how property is distributed between parties to a de facto relationship, and mirrors s 79 to a large extent.

17.148 In determining how property should be distributed, courts:

* identify the property, liabilities and financial resources of the parties;
* identify and assess the contributions that the parties have made to the property of the parties to the marriage or de facto relationship, including financial and non-financial contributions and contributions to the welfare of the family.162

---

161 The national protection order register is discussed in Ch 30. See Rec 30–18.
162 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 79(4)(a)–(c); 90SM(4)(a)–(c).
• identify and assess the needs of each party, such as needs based on a party’s age and state of health, mental and physical capacity for gainful employment and any childcare responsibilities,\textsuperscript{163} and

• make an order that is just and equitable in all the circumstances.\textsuperscript{164}

17.149 The case of \textit{In the Marriage of Kennon} (Kennon) established the principle that, when assessing a party’s contributions, the court can take into account a course of violent conduct by one party towards the other that has had a significant adverse impact on that party’s contribution or has made his or her contributions significantly more arduous than they ought to have been.\textsuperscript{165}

17.150 While family violence, in itself, is not relevant to an assessment of future needs of a party, the consequences of family violence—for example its effect on the state of the victim’s health or physical and mental capacity to gain appropriate employment—can be considered when assessing future needs.

\textbf{Options for Reform}

17.151 The ALRC—in its report \textit{Equality Before the Law}—and the Family Law Council both previously recommended that the \textit{Family Law Act} should be amended to require courts to consider the effects of family violence when determining both the contributions and needs of parties to a marriage.\textsuperscript{166} In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions outlined a number of benefits of an amendment of this kind, such as:

• highlighting to parties and their legal representatives that family violence is relevant to the determination of property disputes;

• clarifying the scope and application test in Kennon, in particular the requirement that there be a ‘course of violent conduct’; and

• ensuring that family violence is relevant to an assessment of a party’s future needs, as well as his or her contribution to property.

17.152 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions noted that the broad issue of how issues of family violence should be considered in property disputes is beyond the Terms of Reference for this Inquiry. As such, the Commissions endorsed the recommendation, made by the ALRC in \textit{Equality Before the Law}, that the \textit{Family Law Act} should refer expressly to the impact of family violence on past contributions and future needs.\textsuperscript{167} The Commissions also proposed that the Australian Government should undertake a separate inquiry into the manner in which family violence is considered in property proceedings under the \textit{Family Law Act}. The Commissions suggested that this inquiry might consider ways in which family violence can be taken

\begin{footnotes}
\item[163] Ibid ss 79(4)(e); 90SM(4)(e).
\item[164] Ibid ss 79(2); 90SM(3).
\item[165] \textit{In the Marriage of Kennon} (1997) 139 FLR 118, 140.
\end{footnotes}
into account when determining a party’s contribution to property and future needs, how family violence should be defined for the purposes of property proceedings and how the distribution of property may interact with other schemes such as victims’ compensation. Finally, the Commissions sought stakeholder views on the interaction issue of whether, in practice, evidence of family violence, including evidence given in protection order proceedings, is considered in the context of property proceedings under the Family Law Act.

Submissions and consultations

17.153 Stakeholders expressed differing views about whether family violence was considered by federal family courts when making orders for the distribution of the parties’ property.

17.154 Some stakeholders commented that, in practice, family violence is considered in property proceedings when it comes to determining both contributions and future needs. In such cases, evidence of family violence—including, but not limited to, evidence given in protection order proceedings and the existence of a protection order—is relevant and should be considered by the court.

17.155 In relation to giving evidence of family violence in property proceedings, the submission from the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate noted that, where the impact of family violence is relevant to proceedings relating to both children and property, and the children’s proceedings have been finalised, issue estoppel can be relied upon to prevent any findings as to family violence being re-litigated in the property proceedings.

17.156 Conversely, some stakeholders submitted that, in practice, family violence is not considered sufficiently relevant to property proceedings. For example, Women’s Legal Centre ACT submitted that, in its experience, > evidence of violence is not being considered in the context of property proceedings. Property proceedings tend to be viewed in a clinical way, focusing on the numbers. The threshold in Kennon is too high and it is almost impossible to present evidence that can link family violence directly to contributions or future factors unless, for example, there is a clear physical injury which has impeded or will impede a capacity for employment.

---

169 Ibid, Question 9–5.

173 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.

174 Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
17.157 Other stakeholders noted that in many cases involving family violence there is no property settlement, or victims ‘agree’ to a minimal portion of the property in situations where they are not able to obtain legal aid funding.\(^{175}\)

17.158 Most stakeholders who responded to this issue supported the proposal that the provisions of the Family Law Act dealing with the distribution of property should refer expressly to the impact of violence on past contributions and on future needs.\(^{176}\) For example, the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria submitted that:

> The current tests are difficult to succeed on. The impact of family violence permeates all aspects of a victim’s life. It is sometimes the case that women separating from violent relationships actually do not pursue entitlements or full entitlements as they consider it will place them at greater risk of harm and prolong their psychological trauma. Specific legislative provisions stipulating family violence is to be considered as a factor in property proceedings are likely to go some way to address this.\(^{177}\)

17.159 However, another stakeholder submitted that, because the family courts already make adjustments to parties’ entitlements to property on the basis of family violence, the Family Law Act does not need to be directly amended.\(^{178}\) While the Law Council of Australia supported an amendment of s 79 of the Family Law Act to recognise the impact of family violence on contributions, it did not consider it necessary to amend the provisions relating to future needs as the current provisions already enable a court to take account of family violence in appropriate circumstances.\(^{179}\)

17.160 Many stakeholders also supported a further inquiry into the consideration of family violence in property proceedings under the Family Law Act.\(^{180}\) For example, the

---

\(^{175}\) National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.

\(^{178}\) A Brunacci, Submission FV 97, 4 June 2010.

\(^{180}\) Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Brisbane, Submission FV 223, 2 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria,
Queensland Law Society supported an inquiry, noting some of the limitations of the Kennon test, including the costs involved in making a Kennon claim as compared to the perceived benefits for making such claim; the requirement that the family violence occur before separation as part of a pattern, meaning that serious isolated incidents, including at separation, are not taken into account; and the effect of family violence on future needs.181

17.161 Two stakeholders commented on the Commissions’ proposal that a further inquiry consider how the distribution of property may interact with victims’ compensation schemes. The Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate submitted that the philosophy underlying s 79 is not one of compensation for loss, and stated that they would be opposed to the creation of a matrimonial tort or procedures whereby people are able to bring an action in the federal family courts for damages arising from violence experienced during a marriage or de facto relationship.182 The Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre also expressed opposition to any proposal that considered an award of victims’ compensation as part of the assets of the relationship.183

Commissions’ views

17.162 The Terms of Reference for this Inquiry provide a limited lens through which the Commissions can propose reforms—that is, to resolve issues arising from the practical interaction between state and territory family violence laws and the Family Law Act. In the context of property proceedings under the Family Law Act, the principal issue of interaction is the provision and consideration of evidence of family violence, including evidence relating to a protection order sought or made under state and territory family violence legislation. The response of some stakeholders seems to indicate that evidence of family violence is considered in property matters where relevant.

17.163 The Commissions note concerns that the test set out in Kennon is difficult to meet, and may not be an adequate response to the effect of family violence on parties’ contribution to the property of the marriage or de facto relationship and future needs. While stakeholders expressed support for the proposal that the provisions of the Family Law Act should provide a more comprehensive and consistent application of family violence evidence in property matters.
Law Act dealing with the distribution of property should refer expressly to the impact of violence on past contributions and on future needs, the Commissions consider that developing recommendations to address the concerns expressed about the operation of the Kennon test would involve complex considerations outside the Terms of Reference to this Inquiry.

17.164 The Commissions therefore recommend that the Australian Government should initiate a separate inquiry into the manner in which federal family courts consider family violence in property proceedings. An inquiry could consider, for example, whether the Family Law Act should refer expressly to the impact of violence on past contributions and on future needs; the form that any such legislative provisions should take; and the definition of family violence that should apply for the purposes of property proceedings under the Family Law Act. The Family Law Council may be well placed to conduct such an inquiry, given its previous letter of advice to the Attorney–General on this issue.

Recommendation 17–2 The Australian Government should initiate an inquiry into how family violence should be dealt with in property proceedings under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

Injunctions for personal protection

Protection orders and injunctive relief

17.165 This section examines the interaction between protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation and injunctions granted under the Family Law Act. The section considers three particular issues:

- the general preference of victims of family violence to seek protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation rather than Family Law Act injunctions, and ways in which Family Law Act injunctions may be reformed to increase their effectiveness in protecting victims of family violence;
- the potential for inconsistencies between protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation and Family Law Act injunctions; and
- the appropriateness of the injunction to relieve a party to a marriage from ‘any obligation to perform marital services or render conjugal rights’ currently available under the Family Law Act.

Injunctions available under the Family Law Act

17.166 An injunction is a kind of order made by a court that requires a person to do, or refrain from doing, a particular act.\(^{184}\) Courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act—that is, the Family Court, FMC and local state and territory

---

\(^{184}\) The granting of injunctions is historically associated with equitable jurisdiction.
magistrates courts\(^ {185}\) can grant injunctions for a variety of purposes. The power to grant injunctions is contained in two separate sections of the Family Law Act—one in relation to the courts’ child welfare jurisdiction, and the other in the courts’ jurisdiction in relation to matrimonial causes, reflecting the constitutional limits of power in relation to family law matters.

Injunctions to protect the welfare of a child

17.167 Section 68B of the Family Law Act permits a court to grant an injunction to protect the welfare of a child. The injunction may be:

- for the personal protection of the child, the child’s parent, a person with a parenting order in respect of the child, or a person who has parental responsibility for the child;\(^ {186}\) or
- to restrain a person from entering or remaining in the place of residence, employment or education or other specified area of the child, the child’s parent, a person with a parenting order in respect of the child, or a person who has parental responsibility for the child.\(^ {187}\)

17.168 If, during an application under pt VII of the Family Law Act, there is an allegation of child abuse or family violence, or the risk of such conduct, the court must consider whether a s 68B injunction should be granted.\(^ {188}\)

Injunctions to protect a party to a marriage

17.169 Section 114 of the Family Law Act permits a court to grant an injunction in circumstances arising out of the marital relationship, where the court considers it proper. An injunction may be granted:

- for the personal protection of a party to the marriage;
- to restrain a party to the marriage from entering or remaining in the matrimonial home or the other party’s residence or place of work;
- for the protection of the marital relationship;
- in relation to the property of a party to the marriage; or
- in relation to the use or occupancy of the matrimonial home.\(^ {189}\)

17.170 A victim of family violence is most likely to seek an injunction for personal protection. The Family Law Act does not define ‘personal protection’, but courts have interpreted the term to include protection from physical harm as well as protection of a \(^{185}\) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 39–41.

\(^{186}\) Ibid s 68B(1)(a)–(b).
\(^{187}\) Ibid s 68B(1)(c)–(d).
\(^{188}\) Ibid s 60K(4).
\(^{189}\) Ibid s 114(1). Courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act have a more limited power to issue an injunction in de facto financial proceedings, in that the injunction is confined to the use or occupancy of the parties’ property or residence.
person’s wellbeing and freedom from interference and harassment. A victim of family violence may also seek an order to exclude a person from particular places.

Persons protected by Family Law Act injunctions

17.171 Family Law Act injunctions protect a limited range of people. Section 114 injunctions are only available to protect people who are, or have been, married. On the other hand, s 68B injunctions can protect a child, the child’s parent, a person with parental responsibility for the child or a person with a parenting order in respect of the child. Because the constitutional foundation of the Family Law Act lies in the Commonwealth’s power with respect to marriage, divorce and matrimonial causes, Family Law Act injunctions are not available to protect unmarried couples without children, same-sex couples without children, siblings or other family members.

Enforcement

17.172 If a Family Law Act injunction is breached, it is up to the person protected by the injunction to file an application to seek an order from the court regarding the contravention. The application must be accompanied by an affidavit setting out the facts, and a filing fee paid. A similar process is required regarding allegations of contempt.

17.173 Sections 68C and 114AA of the Family Law Act provide an automatic power of arrest where a person breaches an injunction for personal protection. A police officer may arrest a person if the officer believes on reasonable grounds that the person has breached the injunction by causing, or threatening to cause, bodily harm to the person protected by the injunction, or has harassed, molested or stalked that person. Both members of the Australian Federal Police and state and territory police forces are empowered to conduct arrests. There is no power of arrest in relation to injunctions for matters other than personal protection.

17.174 Once arrested, the person must be brought before the court that granted the injunction, or another court having jurisdiction under the Act, by close of business of the day following the arrest, as long as it is not a weekend or public holiday. The police officer making the arrest must take all reasonable steps to ensure that the person who obtained the injunction is aware of both the arrest and the court hearing in relation to the breach of the injunction.

17.175 If a person makes an application to seek an order from the court regarding the contravention, the court will hear the application within the strict time period. However, if an application is not made in time, the person arrested must be released.

---

190 In the Marriage of Kemsley (1984) 10 Fam LR 125, 130.
193 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 68C(1); 114AA(1).
194 Ibid ss 4(1); 68C(1); 114AA(1).
195 Ibid s 114AA(3). Section 68C(3) applies this section to breaches of injunctions granted under s 68B.
196 Ibid s 114AA(4).
Consequences of contravention

Federal family courts may impose a range of sanctions on a person who contravenes an injunction without reasonable excuse. The Family Law Act attaches different consequences to a failure to comply with an injunction that affects a child—a s 68B injunction, or a s 114 injunction in so far as it is for the protection of the child—and one that does not. Sanctions available include fines, bonds and community service orders. A term of imprisonment for a maximum of 12 months may be imposed for serious contraventions.

In some circumstances, penalties may also be imposed for contempt of court. Where a contempt of court does not constitute a contravention of an order, or does constitute contravention and ‘involves a flagrant challenge to the authority of the court’, the court may punish the contempt by imposing a sentence of imprisonment, a fine, or both.

Aid and abet provisions

The Family Law Act provides that a person is taken to have contravened an order where that person aids or abets contravention of an injunction by a person who is bound by it. The range of sanctions described above may be imposed as a consequence. Like other contraventions provided for in the Family Law Act, there are different consequences attached to aiding and abetting the contravention of s 68B injunctions and s 114 injunctions insofar as they are for the protection of the child, and s 114 injunctions which do not affect children.

Use of Family Law Act injunctions in practice

Many more victims of family violence seek protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation than seek Family Law Act injunctions. Dr Renata Alexander has noted that since the introduction of state and territory legislation aimed specifically at family violence—and particularly the ready availability of family violence protection orders—the number of family violence injunctions sought in the Family Court has fallen dramatically.

Associate Professor Lisa Young and Federal Magistrate Geoff Monahan have identified two reasons victims of family violence generally seek protection orders

---

197 A person may have a reasonable excuse for contravening an order that affects a child if he or she did not understand the obligations imposed or if he or she believed on reasonable grounds that actions were necessary to protect the health or safety of a person: Ibid s 70NAE(2), (4), (5), (6), (7). In relation to s 114 injunctions that do not affect a child, a person may have a reasonable excuse for contravention if he or she did not understand the obligations imposed and the court is satisfied that the person ‘ought to be excused’: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 112AC.
198 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 70NFB, 112AD, 112AG.
199 Ibid ss 70NFB(2), 70NFG, 112AD(2), 112AE. A term of imprisonment may only be imposed for contravention of an injunction which is not for the protection of a child if that contravention was intentional or fraudulent: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 112AD(2A).
200 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 112AP.
201 Ibid ss 70NAOb(b), 112AB(1)(b).
202 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [16.8].
203 R Alexander, Domestic Violence in Australia: The Legal Response (3rd ed, 2002), 64.
rather than Family Law Act injunctions—first, the cost and complexity of the application proceedings for an injunction and, secondly, the inadequacy of enforcement mechanisms under the Family Law Act. These two key points of difference are discussed further below.

17.181 Other advantages of state and territory protection orders over Family Law Act injunctions include:

- protection orders can protect a wider range of family members—such as siblings, extended family and other members of a household;
- a wider range of people can initiate proceedings for a protection order, including the police;
- state and territory family violence Acts specify a wide range of conditions or prohibitions that can be included in a protection order; and
- police are more familiar with procedures under state and territory family violence legislation.

Cost and complexity of proceedings

17.182 The processes for seeking a protection order under state and territory family violence legislation are generally quicker and cheaper than an application for an injunction under the Family Law Act.

17.183 For example, in Victoria, a person seeking a protection order under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) will usually complete an Information Form for Application for Intervention Order, setting out the background and the orders sought. The form is then given to a registrar who prepares an application and warrant (for urgent matters where there is immediate concern for the person’s safety, or a criminal offence is involved) or application and summons (if the matter is not urgent) and lists the hearing before a magistrate. There is no filing fee for the application.

17.184 It is also possible for the Victorian police to apply for a protection order for a victim of family violence. The Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence, issued by Victoria Police, requires police to make an application for a protection order wherever the safety, welfare or property of a family member appears to be endangered by another.

---

204 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [16.8].
205 Conditions that may be imposed by a protection order under state and territory family violence legislation are discussed in Ch 11.
206 These, and a number of other advantages of using protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation, are listed in R Alexander, ‘Family Violence’ in Springvale Legal Centre (ed) Lawyers Practice Manual Victoria (2009) 208–1, [2.8.317].
207 Ibid, [2.8.602], app C.
208 Ibid, [2.8.602]. Where a person is arrested under warrant, the person may be bailed to appear in court within five days or may be held in custody until the hearing of the application. R Alexander, ‘Family Violence’ in Springvale Legal Centre (ed) Lawyers Practice Manual Victoria (2009) 208–1, [2.8.601].
209 Victoria Police, Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence (2005), [5.3.2]. Not all state and territory family violence legislation provides a role for police in making an application for a
In contrast, the process to obtain a Family Law Act injunction is more complex and time consuming. To apply for an injunction under the Family Law Act, an applicant must file an Initiating Application either in the Family Court, the FMC or a state or territory magistrates court. Where an application for an injunction is urgent, interim or interlocutory orders—rather than final orders—are usually sought. In such cases, the application must be accompanied by an affidavit setting out the details of the marriage or relationship, any children and the facts relied on for the injunction. The applicant must pay a filing fee, unless the fee is waived by the court in specific circumstances. The applicant may also need to file a Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence (Form 4) setting out the alleged family violence or risk of family violence.

The respondent must be given notice of the hearing by being served with a copy of the application and affidavit. Police do not assist in serving documents in relation to Family Law Act injunctions because they are classified as a civil matter. Accordingly, the applicant will generally need to use a commercial process server to effect service. In contrast, state and territory family violence legislation permits or requires police to serve applications for a protection order on a respondent in certain circumstances, or there are protocols are in place to ensure that police can serve applications.

Enforcement

Breach of a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation is a criminal offence, attracting a police response and invoking the criminal justice system. In contrast, breach of a Family Law Act injunction must be followed up by the person protected by the injunction as a private matter pursuant to the Family Law Act.
and territory police are reluctant to exercise their power of arrest under the Family Law Act, or do not always understand their role in this regard.\(^{216}\)

17.189 In the report, Equality Before the Law, the ALRC reiterated a recommendation it made in an earlier inquiry into contempt that a wilful breach of an order for personal protection should be a criminal offence.\(^{217}\) The ALRC considered that making breach a criminal offence had several advantages:

> It helps to reinforce the message that the violence is not merely a civil matter between the parties; it brings police into the matter; and it relieves the woman from having to instigate proceedings against the man, a matter which may be both financially and emotionally costly. It also brings the Family Court proceedings in line with State and Territory restraining order proceedings which police may initiate.\(^{218}\)

Increasing the effectiveness of injunctions for personal protection

17.190 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions discussed potential reforms to increase the effectiveness of injunctions for personal protection, thereby enabling victims of family violence to resolve their personal protection, parenting and property matters in one court, in this instance, a federal family court.\(^{219}\) Without such reforms, parties may need to be involved in proceedings in both federal and state courts to resolve all relevant issues, including safety concerns.

17.191 In its 2009 advice on improving responses to family violence in the family law system, the Family Law Council recommended that to address this issue, consideration should be given to granting federal family courts concurrent jurisdiction with the state and territory courts to make protection orders.\(^{220}\) It stated this could be achieved by a referral of powers from the states to federal family courts.\(^{221}\)

17.192 The Commissions agree with the aspiration of the Family Law Council, to minimise duplicate proceedings and enable parties to obtain as many legal solutions as possible—including those for personal safety—in the one forum. This is an essential measure in making the court process as seamless as possible for victims of family violence. However such solutions must sit within the constitutional limits of power framing any family law reforms.

17.193 In this regard the Commissions note that the Australian Government already has legislative competence to make laws relating to family violence with respect to the limited range of persons specified above. This legislative competence arises from the power of the Australian Government to make laws with respect to matrimonial causes \(^{219}\) Consultation Paper, Ch 9.

\(^{221}\) Ibid, [7.7].
17. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction & Practice of Federal Family Courts

under the Australian Constitution, and the referral of the power by the states to the Commonwealth to make laws with respect to children in certain circumstances.222

17.194 Although federal family courts already have powers directed towards the safety of victims of family violence who are eligible under the Family Law Act, the Commissions have heard that solutions available for victims of family violence in federal family courts are largely ineffective. Consequently, the Commissions have considered various reforms to make injunctions for personal protection more effective legal solutions for victims of family violence. This strategy is consistent with the aspirations of the Family Law Council, in enabling victims of family violence to resolve their legal issues in one court.

17.195 The Commissions’ approach in the Consultation Paper to address multiple proceedings was to propose reform to the operation of injunctions for personal protection—separate from other Family Law Act injunctions—to increase their utility and effectiveness.223 This enables parties to obtain enforceable injunctions for personal protection in federal family courts, by making breach of an injunction a criminal offence. The Commissions also sought feedback on other strategies to make injunctions for personal protection resemble more closely protection orders issued by state and territory courts.

17.196 The Commissions proposed that the Family Law Act should be amended to provide that a wilful breach of an injunction for personal protection under ss 68B and 114 is a criminal offence, as recommended by the ALRC in Equality Before the Law.224

17.197 The Commissions also asked whether the Family Law Act should provide separate procedures in relation to injunctions for personal protection available under s 114 of the Act, in order to improve their accessibility.225 The Commissions made two suggestions for a change of procedure: removing filing fees, and permitting an application for an injunction for personal protection to be made without an affidavit. The Commissions also queried what other procedures would be appropriate.

Submissions and consultations

Breach of injunction for personal protection a criminal offence

17.198 Stakeholders who commented overwhelmingly agreed with the proposal that the Family Law Act should be amended to provide that a wilful breach of an injunction for personal protection is a criminal offence.226 For example, the Queensland Law

---

222 See Ch 2.
223 Consultation Paper, Proposal 9–1, Question 9–1.
225 Consultation Paper, Question 9–1.
226 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

Society argued it should be recognised that, as with breaches of state and territory protection orders, ‘the offence of breaching an injunction for personal protection is a crime against the State and ought to be prosecuted by the State.’

17.199 In a joint submission with other stakeholders, Domestic Violence Victoria noted the potential benefits of family law injunctions for personal protection:

some victims will find themselves in a family law court instead of or before they are involved in family violence proceedings, and therefore in those circumstances it will be easier and more appropriate for victims to address the family violence issues as part of their family law proceedings.

17.200 They argued that these victims should justly receive the same protection available under a state and territory protection order, with a breach of the order constituting a criminal offence.

17.201 Women’s Legal Services NSW expressed concern about the wording of the Commissions’ proposal, which stated that a ‘wilful breach’ should be a criminal offence. It submitted that this imports a higher standard of proof than is currently required in the state legislation, for example, the requirement in the NSW [Act] is ‘knowingly contravenes’.

17.202 National Legal Aid and, in a joint submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate, stated they did not support the proposal to amend the Family Law Act to provide that a breach of an injunction for personal protection is a criminal offence. The Chief Justice and the Chief Federal Magistrate suggested there are adequate powers available under the [Family Law Act] to deal with wilful breaches of orders, which are complemented by an effective and accessible family violence protection system in the states and territories. Features of that system do not need to be replicated in the federal sphere.

---

17.203 Other stakeholders also expressed concern about replication, with some magistrates of the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria arguing that this provides opportunity for ‘inconsistency and confusion’.

17.204 In their joint submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate also stated that the indefinite nature of family law injunctions is problematic, as ‘parties may, over time, make different, informal arrangements without applying to vary the orders and discharge the injunction’. By contrast, state and territory protection orders which are in force for specified periods of time, for example 12 months or two years.

Separate procedures for family law injunctions for personal protection

17.205 Stakeholder responses to the question of whether separate procedures should be provided for family law injunctions available under s 114 of the Act were mixed. A number of stakeholders expressed their support for the introduction of separate procedures. The Magistrates’ and Children’s Court of Victoria were divided on the issue of Family Law Act injunctions, but some magistrates considered the operation of injunctions for personal protection ‘would work better if the personal protection provisions were separated from other injunction provisions’.

17.206 Other stakeholders expressed ‘in principle’ agreement, but questioned the practical operation of separate procedures for injunctions, or indicated that their support was contingent on other changes being made to the enforceability and recognition of injunctions.

17.207 In answer to the Commissions’ question regarding which separate procedures for injunctions for personal protection would be appropriate, stakeholders proposed a range of measures. Women’s Legal Services NSW made a number of suggestions, including issuing injunctions for personal protection as a separate court order to enhance recognition and enforcement by police. Other avenues for potential reform it identified were enabling parties to consent to injunctions on a ‘without admissions’ basis, and allowing for parties to make undertakings.

---

231 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010.
232 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
235 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
236 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
238 Ibid. See Ch 18 for discussion on practice in state and territory courts relating to consent to protection orders on a ‘without admissions’ basis and undertakings.
17.208 Women’s Legal Services NSW also proposed changes to federal family court forms. It suggested putting a check box for an injunction for personal protection on the Initiating Application and Response to the Initiating Application forms, and including a prompt to apply for an injunction for personal protection on the Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence form (Form 4).239

17.209 Some stakeholders expressed support for the Commissions’ suggestion to remove filing fees to apply for injunctions for personal protection.240 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria argued that charging a filing fee is ‘inconsistent with the high level of concern that ought to apply to personal safety issues’.241

17.210 The Commissions’ suggestion to dispense with the requirement for affidavit evidence to support applications for injunctions for personal protection did not receive widespread support. While benefits were identified, namely, ‘cost and time savings’,242 stakeholders pointed out that affidavit evidence is an efficient way of supporting an application,243 and may provide an alternative to the requirement for lengthy oral evidence.244

17.211 The benefits of separate procedures for injunctions for personal protection were identified by stakeholders. Women’s Legal Services Australia considered that separate procedures could introduce a more streamlined process to obtain injunctions for personal protection in federal family courts.245 Women’s Legal Services NSW argued that separate procedures for injunctions for personal protection would help to educate the community about the existence of these injunctions.246

17.212 Some stakeholders did not support separate procedures for injunctions for personal protection, due to a view that state and territory family violence legislation should remain the principal avenue to deal with family violence.247 Stakeholders referred to the advantages of state and territory protection orders: for example, National Legal Aid submitted that processes for obtaining a protection order in state and territory courts are ‘simple, quick and low cost’.248 Other stakeholders—including stakeholders who supported separate procedures and provisions for injunctions for personal protection—expressed concern about two issues: enforcement of injunctions for personal protection by police; and human rights implications.

239  Ibid.
241  Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
17. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction & Practice of Federal Family Courts

Enforcement of orders by police

17.213 Stakeholders expressed concern about enhancing Family Law Act injunctions for personal protection due to concerns that enforcement by police may be problematic, particularly in comparison with well established breach processes for state and territory protection orders. Stakeholders noted that state and territory police seldom exercise their current existing powers under the Family Law Act in relation to injunctions for personal protection, and many are not aware of their obligations and powers under the Act.

Human rights implications

17.214 Two stakeholders raised concerns about the human rights implications of reforms enhancing family law injunctions, as these injunctions are unavailable to same-sex couples without children and unmarried couples without children. They argued that family law injunctions should be accessible to all victims of family violence. In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others suggested the first step in ensuring consistency for all victims who wish to resolve their matters in one court would be an amendment to the Marriage Act 1961 (Cth) to recognise same-sex marriage.

Commissions’ views

Corresponding jurisdictions

17.215 In Chapter 3 the Commissions set out a framework for reform of the jurisdictions of courts that deal with issues of family violence. As discussed in that chapter, the Commissions do not consider it practicable to establish a single ‘stand alone’ court to deal with all legal matters relating to family violence. The Commissions are of the view that a more effective way to provide the benefits of an integrated system is to develop corresponding jurisdictions, in which the jurisdictions of courts dealing with family violence overlap to an appropriate degree. Enhancing the ability of courts to deal with matters outside their core jurisdiction allows victims of family violence to resolve their legal issues relating to family violence in the same court, as far as practicable consistent with the constitutional division of powers.

17.216 State and territory courts are often the first point of contact with the legal system for separating families who have experienced family violence, and family violence legislation is a core business of these courts. The Commissions do not recommend the development of a protection order practice in federal family courts to replicate the jurisdiction of state and territory courts. The Commissions consider that state and territory courts should remain the primary jurisdiction for obtaining a protection order—particularly given the role of police in proceedings in those courts, the wider range of persons who may be protected by state and territory family violence legislation, and the considerable experience of state and territory magistrates and court staff with respect to family violence protection order proceedings.

---

249 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.

251 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.

17.217 However, the Commissions are of the view that victims of family violence—in particular, those for whom family law proceedings are on foot or anticipated—should be able to obtain effective orders for their protection in federal family courts. This allows victims to resolve their legal issues to a great extent in the one court process. The Commissions consider that fostering the seamlessness of the court process in this way has significant benefits for victims of family violence. This approach minimises victims’ exposure to multiple proceedings in different jurisdictions, thereby avoiding the personal and financial impacts of repeated proceedings and consequent reiteration of the same facts before different courts.

17.218 The Commissions acknowledge the potential resource implications in developing corresponding jurisdictions, notably in the provision of training to judicial officers and police, discussed below. Developing the ability of federal family courts to deal with matters of personal protection may also have an effect on legal aid funding. However, the Commissions consider these reforms will lead to long term savings, by reducing replication across different jurisdictions.

Separate provisions for injunctions for personal protection

17.219 The Commissions consider that the Family Law Act should be amended to provide provisions for injunctions for personal protection separate from other types of injunctions available in federal family courts. This is an important measure in enhancing the ability of federal family courts to deal with family violence, thus developing corresponding jurisdictions.

17.220 Separate provisions are important as the Commissions consider injunctions for personal protection should operate differently from other Family Law Act injunctions, as follows:

- federal family courts should be empowered to make injunctions for personal protection for discrete periods of time;
- in making injunctions for personal protection, federal family courts should be able to impose a range of conditions on a person who has used family violence, similar to those conditions available in state and territory courts (discussed below); and
- a breach of an injunction for personal protection should be a criminal offence (discussed below).
17.221 The Commissions also consider that separate provisions in the Family Law Act for injunctions for personal protection will enhance their operation in a number of ways. Separate provisions will increase awareness and recognition of such injunctions by parties, police, legal representatives and the community, and improve the accessibility and effectiveness of injunctions for personal protection.

17.222 Separate provisions for injunctions for personal protection may also be necessary to address the application of aid and abet provisions in the Family Law Act to these injunctions. In Chapter 12, the Commissions discuss aid and abet provisions in relation to state and territory legislation. Currently, aid and abet provisions in some state and territory legislation result in victims of family violence being charged, where police consider that they have consented to the breach of a protection order made for their protection. The Commissions recommend that state and territory legislation should be amended where necessary to provide that a person protected by a protection order under family violence legislation cannot be charged with an offence of aiding or abetting the breach of protection order.

17.223 The Commissions are also of the view that, similarly, the Family Law Act should be amended to provide that a person protected by an injunction for personal protection should not face sanctions for aiding or abetting a contravention by the person bound by the injunction. The Commissions consider such an amendment is appropriate for the reasons expounded in detail in Chapter 12. In particular, imposing sanctions on victims in these circumstances may subject them to further trauma, and may deter them from reporting future incidences of family violence. Further, the Commissions consider that such a response is inappropriate, given the nature and dynamics of family violence.

Breach of injunction for personal protection a criminal offence

17.224 The Commissions consider that to enable federal family courts to provide effective protection for victims of family violence, a breach of an injunction for personal protection should constitute a criminal offence. The Commissions recommend that the Family Law Act should be amended in this regard.

17.225 Making a breach of an injunction for personal protection a criminal offence is the key reform in enhancing the effectiveness of these injunctions. Such an amendment provides clear benefits to victims of family violence. The creation of this criminal offence would remove the onus from the victim of family violence to bring the application for contravention of the injunction. It would relieve the victim of having to undertake possibly costly family law proceedings to enforce the injunction and reinforce the message that family violence is not a private matter, but a criminal offence of public concern.

17.226 The Commissions note the concern of Women’s Legal Services NSW regarding the Commissions’ use of the term ‘wilful breach’ in relation to the proposed criminal offence. It is not the Commissions’ intention to introduce a more onerous test for breach of injunctions for personal protection than for breach of protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation. The Commissions therefore omit reference to the term ‘wilful’ in the recommendation that breach of an injunction for personal protection should be a criminal offence. The Commissions consider that the precise formulation of this provision is a matter for the Australian Government.

Procedures

17.227 A complementary measure in fostering the use of injunctions for personal protection is to provide separate procedures for their operation in federal family courts. The Commissions consider that separate procedures for injunctions for personal protection will increase their accessibility and utility.

17.228 The Commissions consider separate procedures should be considered to improve the operation of injunctions for personal protection, including the following:

- removal of filing fees;
- a check box for an injunction for personal protection included on Initiating Application and Response to the Initiating Application forms;
- a prompt to apply for an injunction for personal protection included on the Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence form (Form 4); and
- the issue of injunctions for personal protection as a separate court order.

17.229 The Commissions consider that—in addition to enhancing accessibility—these procedural changes will improve awareness and recognition of injunctions for personal protection and, therefore, lead to improved safety, the principal objective in this Inquiry.

17.230 A further procedure which should apply once an injunction for personal protection is made is the inclusion of this injunction on the national protection order register. Currently, the Australian Government’s commitment to a national protection order registration system is limited to information about protection orders obtained under state and territory family violence legislation. In Chapter 30, the Commissions recommend that the national protection order register should be extended to include other information, including injunctions for personal protection.255

17.231 Including injunctions for personal protection on the national register is an important information-sharing procedure. The Commissions have recommended that the register be available to police officers, federal family courts and state and territory courts.256 This would alleviate potential problems of duplication across jurisdictions and facilitate enforcement of orders by state and territory police, as discussed below. The Commissions also consider that registering injunctions for personal protection will increase recognition and awareness of these injunctions, and serve an important educative function about their importance as an additional measure to improve safety.

---

255 Rec 30–18(a).
256 Rec 30–18(b).
17. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction & Practice of Federal Family Courts

Enforcement of orders

17.232 While both the Australian Federal Police and state and territory police may be empowered to enforce breaches of injunctions for personal protection, the Commissions consider that these duties are more effectively situated with the state and territory police. State and territory police have established practices and procedures for enforcing protection orders, and these may be extended to the enforcement to Family Law Act injunctions. However, the Commissions acknowledge the concerns of stakeholders regarding the role of state and territory police in this regard, given that the existing powers of arrest under the Family Law Act—extending to state and territory police—in relation to injunctions are seldom exercised.

17.233 The Commissions are of the view that a number of measures would assist state and territory police in establishing processes for the enforcement of injunctions for personal protection. Most importantly, providing that breach of an injunction for personal protection is a criminal offence provides clear direction to state and territory police to enforce such injunctions. Other measures, discussed above, that may assist state and territory police in recognition and enforcement of injunctions for personal protection include: separating injunctions for personal protection from other family law injunctions in the Family Law Act; and issuing injunctions for personal protection as a separate court order.

17.234 The Commissions consider that providing training to state and territory police in relation to their powers and duties with regard Family Law Act injunctions is an important and necessary measure in ensuring these injunctions are properly enforced. Training of persons involved in family violence matters in federal family courts is discussed below.

17.235 Including injunctions for personal protection in the scheme for the national registration of protection orders is an essential step in ensuring the enforcement of injunctions for personal protection by state and territory police. Registration of state and territory protection orders on the national register enables them to be enforced in external jurisdictions. This is not necessary to give effect to the enforceability of injunctions for personal protection, as these are already enforceable in all states and territories. However, registration of injunctions for personal protection is an important step with regard to recognition of injunctions for personal protection, and information sharing.

17.236 Registration of the injunctions for personal protection ensures that state and territory police are aware of existing injunctions. Registration also provides clear direction to police in relation to their duties to enforce these injunctions. Further, once the national database is implemented, it will become the practice of state and territory police to enforce protection orders made outside their jurisdiction. While injunctions for personal protection are not external orders, the Commissions consider that this practice will extend to Family Law Act injunctions for personal protection.
Training
17.237 Training and education is an essential strategy in developing corresponding jurisdictions. In particular, training of judicial officers in federal family courts will guide and support them in making injunctions for personal protection which are analogous to protection orders available in state and territory courts.

17.238 The Commissions consider that training for federal judicial officers should cover the following factors in particular:

- circumstances where injunctions for personal protection may be appropriate;
- considerations relevant when making injunctions for personal protection; and
- conditions appropriate to impose on persons who use family violence.

17.239 Information and guidance for judicial officers in relation to injunctions for personal protection should also be included in the Best Practice Principles. In particular, a list of standard conditions—similar to those available in state and territory courts—should be listed in this publication.

17.240 Training legal practitioners and registry staff in relation to new provisions relating to injunctions for personal protection is also essential to raise awareness of this option, and to promote the use of these provisions.

Human rights implications
17.241 The Commissions note the concerns raised by some stakeholders regarding the limited range of persons who may apply for injunctions for personal protection.

17.242 Most state and territory courts have jurisdiction to make protection orders in relation to a wide range of relationships, for example siblings, relatives and persons in dating relationships. The Commissions do not consider it appropriate for this broad jurisdiction to be duplicated by federal family courts. Rather, the Commissions consider that the core jurisdiction of the family court should be extended only to the extent that those persons who have family law proceedings on foot or anticipated, may resolve all—or most of—their legal matters in this forum.

17.243 The Commissions acknowledge that some persons who may be involved in or anticipate federal family court proceedings will not be eligible for an injunction for personal protection, in particular, unmarried partners without children, and same-sex partners without children. These persons may be involved in federal family court proceedings in relation to property. It is also worth noting that unmarried partners with children may only obtain an injunction for personal protection where it is appropriate for the welfare of the child.257

17.244 The Commonwealth has limited legislative competence in this arena, as noted above. Due to these limitations, the Australian Government cannot currently

---

257 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68B(1).
amend the Family Law Act to provide for the protection of all persons who may be involved in federal family court proceedings.\(^\text{258}\)

17.245 As noted above, some stakeholders argued that one strategy to address the issue of limited coverage is to amend the Marriage Act to recognise same-sex marriage. This would enable federal family courts to make injunctions in relation to married same-sex partners, whether or not there are children of the relationship. However, a recommendation regarding the Marriage Act is beyond the Terms of Reference of this Inquiry.

17.246 Despite the limited coverage of injunctions for personal protection, the Commissions are of the view that these injunctions should continue to be available in a more effective form for improving the safety of persons currently eligible pursuant to ss 68B and 114 of the Family Law Act. The Commissions consider that state and territory courts—as the primary jurisdictions to resolve issues of personal protection—are the appropriate jurisdictions for the broad range of persons who fall outside the jurisdiction of the Family Law Act.

Recommendation 17–3  The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to provide separate provisions for injunctions for personal protection.

Recommendation 17–4  The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to provide that a breach of an injunction for personal protection is a criminal offence.

Interaction between Family Law Act injunctions and protection orders

17.247 Injunctions granted under ss 68B and 114 of the Family Law Act may operate alongside protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation. Currently, victims of family violence tend to seek protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation in preference to Family Law Act injunctions for personal protection. Improving the effectiveness of injunctions for personal protection will foster the use of the injunction provisions, increasing the interaction between state and territory protection orders and Family Law Act injunctions for personal protection.

17.248 Section 114AB of the Family Law Act provides that if a person has sought, or is seeking, a protection order under prescribed state or territory family violence legislation,\(^\text{259}\) he or she is not entitled to seek, in addition, an injunction under the Family Law Act, unless the protection order proceedings have lapsed, been discontinued or dismissed, or the orders are no longer in force.

258 For a discussion of persons protected in state and territory legislation, see Ch 7.
259 Family Law Regulations 1984 (Cth) reg 19 prescribes the following laws for the purpose of s 114AB: Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld); Peace and Good Behaviour Act 1982 (Qld); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) pts 1–6; Domestic Violence Act 1994 (SA); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas); Justices Act 1959 (Tas) pt XA; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT); Domestic Violence Act 1995 (NI).
A person who has sought or obtained a protection order under state or territory legislation is not prohibited from seeking a Family Law Act injunction in relation to family law matters not able to be dealt with by a protection order. This is because s 114AB of the Family Law Act only prohibits applications for an injunction ‘in respect of a matter’ for which a protection order has been sought or obtained.260

There is no bar to a person who is seeking, or has obtained, a Family Law Act injunction to apply for a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation. Neither is there a formal prohibition on one party seeking a Family Law Act injunction even though a related party has already obtained a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation. The effect is that ‘the prohibition under s 114AB only extends to the same party using both procedures and then only when the State or Territory procedure has been used first’.261

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how often a person who has obtained an injunction under the Family Law Act subsequently needs to seek additional protection under state or territory family violence legislation.262 Most stakeholders who commented responded that this rarely arises, as victims overwhelmingly obtain protection orders in state and territory courts at first instance.263 Stakeholders explained this preference by referring to the various advantages that state and territory protection orders have over Family Law Act injunctions for personal protection.264

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions also asked if a person who has sought or obtained an injunction for personal protection under the Family Law Act should be able to seek a protection under state or territory violence legislation.265 Most stakeholders who commented submitted that persons who have obtained, or who have sought, injunctions for personal protection should remain able to seek a protection order under state and territory family violence legislation.266 However several 260 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 114AB(2).

262 Consultation Paper, Question 9–2.
263 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; A Harland, Submission FV 80, 2 June 2010.
264 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidentail, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
265 Consultation Paper, Question 9–3.
stakeholders indicated that their comments assumed that the current provisions for injunctions for personal protection apply unchanged.267

17.253 Stakeholders cited numerous reasons in support of the position that persons who have sought or obtained injunctions for personal protection should have access to protection orders. These reasons were consistent with those discussed above in relation to the greater protection offered by state and territory family violence legislation, namely:

- the more effective remedies offered by state and territory family violence legislation, in particular, that breach of a protection order is a criminal offence;268
- difficulties in enforcing injunctions for personal protection,269 including lack of recognition of injunctions for personal protection by state and territory police;270 and
- procedural advantages, with protection orders under family violence legislation described as 'simple, quick and low cost'.271

17.254 Women’s Legal Service NSW argued that forcing victims to stay within the family law system may put victims at risk:

if victims are forced to stay within the family law system they may elect not to pursue personal protection injunctions because it is too daunting and difficult without police assistance or established enforcement mechanisms.272

17.255 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria, while arguing that a person with an injunction for personal protection should not be prevented from obtaining a protection order, considered that ‘perhaps there should be a limitation that only allows a further order if additional circumstances giving rise to the order have occurred since the family law order was made’.273

---

273 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Women’s Legal Service Victoria pointed out that enabling a victim to deal with their protection issues in both jurisdictions may lead to inconsistencies between injunctions for personal protection and protection orders.

Commissions’ views

A person who has a Family Law Act injunction for personal protection may require further protective orders in certain circumstances. For example, a person may be subject to further threats or acts of violence after an injunction has been issued by a federal family court.

Restricting persons who have obtained injunctions for personal protection from applying for a protection order under state and territory family violence legislation may operate to the disadvantage of victims of family violence. Such a restriction would require persons to apply to a federal family court to revive or vary an existing injunction for personal protection. The Commissions consider this may be onerous for victims, given state and territory courts—as the primary jurisdiction in which to obtain protection orders—are likely to remain a more accessible jurisdiction in addressing personal protection issues, particularly where family law proceedings have concluded.

The advantages of state and territory courts dealing with issues of personal protection should, as far as possible, correspond in federal family courts, as discussed above. However, there are several features of state and territory protection orders that may be difficult or unsuitable in the corresponding jurisdiction of federal family courts. Of particular note is the role of state and territory police in applying for protection orders on a victim’s behalf. Further, both police and state and territory courts have procedures in place to deal promptly with urgent applications. The Commissions therefore consider that a person who has an injunction for personal protection should retain their ability to obtain a protection order from state and territory courts.

The Commissions acknowledge that continuing to permit persons with injunctions for personal protection to apply for and obtain protection orders in state and territory courts may lead to inconsistency between orders. However, precluding a person from bringing proceedings for a protection order, if he or she has already sought a Family Law Act injunction, does not address the potential for inconsistency between orders. This is because a respondent, or other person affected by the injunction for personal protection, would still be able to seek protection order in state and territory courts. Inconsistencies between orders—and measures to deal with such inconsistencies—are considered below.

Inconsistencies between Family Law Act injunctions and protection orders

The Family Law Act provides that injunctions available under ss 68B and 114 are ‘not intended to exclude or limit the operation’ of prescribed state or territory family violence legislation.\textsuperscript{275} If an injunction made under ss 68B or 114 is capable of operating concurrently with the protection order, both orders can operate together. However, where orders cannot operate concurrently, principles of constitutional law require that an order made pursuant to the \textit{Family Law Act}, as Commonwealth legislation, prevails over an order made under a state or territory law, to the extent that the orders are inconsistent.\textsuperscript{276}

17.262 The \textit{Family Law Act} contains specific provisions to deal with such inconsistencies, discussed below, which differ depending on whether the injunction expressly or impliedly requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child, or does not involve a child.

\textbf{Injunctions that relate to a child}

\textbf{Making a protection order that is inconsistent with a current Family Law Act injunction}

17.263 A person who is seeking, or who has obtained, a \textit{Family Law Act} injunction may also seek a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation. The \textit{Family Law Act} provides that a protection order made under state or territory family violence legislation that is inconsistent with a \textit{Family Law Act} injunction that expressly or impliedly requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child, is invalid to the extent of the inconsistency.\textsuperscript{277} The language in this section is somewhat unclear, as injunctions work by constraining conduct, and would not in themselves provide for a person to spend time with a child—although an injunction may complement a parenting order which provides for this.

17.264 Pursuant to s 68R of the \textit{Family Law Act}, a court with jurisdiction under pt VII of the \textit{Family Law Act} may revive, vary, discharge or suspend an injunction made under ss 68B or 114 to the extent it expressly or impliedly requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child.\textsuperscript{278} A court may only do so if it also makes or varies a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation and there is material before the court that was not before the court that made that original \textit{Family Law Act} injunction.\textsuperscript{279} Where a state or territory court is making or varying an interim order, it may not discharge the original family law injunction.\textsuperscript{280}

17.265 If, when the original ss 68B or 114 injunction was granted, it was inconsistent with an existing protection order, the court must be satisfied that it is appropriate to revive, vary, discharge or suspend the injunction because the person has

\begin{footnotes}
\item[275] \textit{Family Law Act} 1975 (Cth) s 114AB(1).
\item[276] See Australian Government Solicitor, \textit{Domestic Violence Laws in Australia} (2009), [6.2.14], and discussion in Chs 2 and 23.
\item[277] \textit{Family Law Act} 1975 (Cth) s 68Q(1).
\item[278] Ibid s 68R(1)(c). Courts with jurisdiction under pt VII of the \textit{Family Law Act} include: the Family Court of Australia, each Family Court of a state, the Supreme Court of the Northern Territory, the Federal Magistrates Court, and, subject to some conditions, courts of summary jurisdiction of each state and territory: \textit{Family Law Act} 1975 (Cth) ss 69H and 69J.
\item[279] \textit{Family Law Act} 1975 (Cth) s 68R(3).
\item[280] Ibid s 68R(4).
\end{footnotes}
been exposed, or is likely to be exposed, to family violence as a result of the operation of that injunction.\textsuperscript{281}

17.266 As noted in Chapter 16, state and territory courts are currently reluctant to use their powers under s 68R of the \textit{Family Law Act} to revive, vary, discharge or suspend parenting orders made by a family court. State and territory courts may be similarly reluctant to use s 68R to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a \textit{Family Law Act} injunction. However, due to the current infrequent use of injunctions for personal protection, it is not evident whether this is the case.

17.267 In order to bring the matter to the attention of magistrates, some state and territory family violence legislation directs a court, when making a protection order, to consider the terms of any \textit{Family Law Act} injunctions in relation to the proceedings.\textsuperscript{282}

\textbf{Making a Family Law Act injunction that is inconsistent with a current protection order}

17.268 The \textit{Family Law Act} does not prohibit a party to a marriage from seeking an injunction under the \textit{Family Law Act} even though the other party to the marriage has already obtained a protection order under state or territory legislation.

17.269 Where a court grants a \textit{Family Law Act} injunction that expressly or impliedly requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child, which is inconsistent with a protection order made under state or territory family violence legislation, it must specify that the injunction is inconsistent with the protection order and explain why that is the case. The court must also explain the terms of the injunction, and consequences of breaching it, to the applicant, the persons protected by the injunction and the persons to whom the injunction is directed.\textsuperscript{283} Within 14 days of granting the injunction, the court must distribute copies to relevant bodies, including the state or territory court that issued the protection order, and the head of the police force and a child welfare officer in the relevant state or territory.\textsuperscript{284}

\textbf{Injunctions that do not relate to a child}

17.270 The \textit{Family Law Act} does not expressly deal with inconsistency between a s 114 injunction, that does not relate to a child, and a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation. While the \textit{Family Law Act} is silent on this issue, in accordance with the general principle of constitutional law discussed above, an injunction made pursuant to s 114 of the \textit{Family Law Act} will prevail over an inconsistent order made under a state or territory law.\textsuperscript{285}

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{281} Ibid s 68R(5)(c). The operation of s 68R in relation to parenting orders made under the \textit{Family Law Act} is discussed in Ch 16.
\item \textsuperscript{282} See, eg, \textit{Family Violence Act 2004} (Tas) s 18(1)(c); \textit{Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008} (ACT) ss 31, 47(1)(f); 71; \textit{Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007} (NT) s 19(2)(a).
\item \textsuperscript{283} \textit{Family Law Act 1975} (Cth) s 68P(2).
\item \textsuperscript{284} Ibid s 68P(3).
\item \textsuperscript{285} \textit{Australian Constitution} s 109. The constitutional framework is discussed in Ch 2.
\end{itemize}
Option for reform

17.271 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether problems arise in practice from the provisions dealing with inconsistencies between injunctions granted under ss 68B and 114 of the Family Law Act, and protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation. 286 Most stakeholders responded that they were unaware of problems arising in practice, 287 as Family Law Act injunctions are rarely used to deal with issues of personal protection. 288

17.272 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions noted that the mechanism in s 68R of the Family Law Act may be a useful way for courts, when making a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation, to address inconsistencies with Family Law Act injunctions. Currently, s 68R only applies to injunctions pursuant to ss 68B, and 114 to the extent that an injunction expressly or impliedly requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child. The Commissions proposed enacting a provision similar to s 68R to allow state and territory courts making or varying a protection order, to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a s 114 injunction which does not relate to a child. 289 The Commissions stated that such power should only be exercised when there is material before the court that was not before the court that made that original Family Law Act injunction, consistent with the current s 68R. 290

17.273 Most stakeholders who commented on this proposal expressed their support. 291 Two stakeholders expressed conditional support. Women’s Legal Services NSW supported the proposal contingent on other amendments being made to make injunctions for personal protection more ‘effective and protective’. 292 National Legal Aid supported the proposal on the basis that appropriate education/training in relation to family law and family violence has been provided to state and territory judicial officers, and that consideration of the issues is supported by the provision of relevant documentation from the Family Court proceedings. 293

286 Consultation Paper, Question 9–4.
290 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68R(3).
One stakeholder, who did not support the proposal, pointed to the different purposes of the legislative schemes, arguing that they do not have the same core principles and as such it is not feasible that the state legislation should be able to override, vary or otherwise suspend a Family Law Act 1975 injunction.

This stakeholder argued that if state and territory legislation could override injunctions for personal protection, parties may apply to state and territory courts to vary a Family Law Act injunction for personal protection, thus ‘circumvent[ing] the protections in place by utilising the different principles of the legislation’.

Commissions’ views

Procedural strategies to prevent inconsistencies between orders

In Chapter 30 the Commissions discuss a number of procedural strategies to address problems arising from the interaction between federal family court orders and protection orders made in state and territory courts. These include recommendations to increase each jurisdiction’s awareness of relevant orders made in the other. Many of these measures will help to address potential inconsistencies arising from the interaction between Family Law Act injunctions and state and territory protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation.

For example, inadvertent inconsistencies between protection orders and injunctions for personal protection should not arise if—as recommended by the Commissions—these injunctions and orders are included on the national protection order register, and both federal family courts and state and territory courts have access to the register. Another measure which may avoid inconsistency is seeking information about protection orders on federal family court application forms, and about Family Law Act injunctions on application forms for protection orders in state and territory courts. These information strategies also assist in ensuring state and territory courts are furnished with relevant documents from federal family courts, and vice versa.

Legislative strategies to prevent inconsistencies between orders

The procedural strategies outlined above address inadvertent inconsistencies between orders. A legislative strategy that state and territory governments may wish to consider to avoid such inconsistencies is including provisions in family violence legislation to direct a court making a protection order to consider the terms of any Family Law Act injunctions. Such provisions are currently in force in several jurisdictions.

However, there are some circumstances where it will be appropriate for state and territory courts to deliberately make protection orders which are inconsistent with a prior Family Law Act injunction. In these circumstances, s 68R empowers a court to revive, vary, discharge or suspend an injunction pursuant to s 68B, or a s 114 injunction to the extent that it expressly or impliedly requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child. State and territory courts do not have this power in relation to s 114 injunctions which do not relate to a child.

17.280 The Commissions are of the view that a provision similar to s 68R should be enacted to address inconsistencies arising from the interaction of protection orders, and injunctions made under s 114 of the Family Law Act which do not relate to a child. This is necessary to address a gap in protection which is otherwise likely to emerge from the interaction of these orders. In particular, such a provision is necessary to protect victims of family violence where threats or acts of violence continue or escalate after an injunction for personal protection has been made. Another scenario where an inconsistent protection order may be appropriate is where a change in circumstances exposes a victim of family violence to new or escalated risk.

17.281 Enabling a state or territory court to amend a s 114 injunction which does not relate to a child would remove the requirement for a person seeking additional protection to return to a federal family court, which may be unduly onerous on a victim of family violence, as discussed above.

17.282 Such a provision also establishes a consistent approach in relation to the powers of state and territory courts to vary Family Law Act injunctions for personal protection. The current situation, in which state and territory courts may revive, vary, discharge or suspend a s 68B injunction and a s 114 injunction to the extent that it expressly or impliedly requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child, but not other s 114 injunctions, is complex and may lead to confusion.

17.283 The Commissions note the concerns raised by a stakeholder regarding the different principles of the Family Law Act and state and territory family violence legislation. The Commissions acknowledge that different principles underlie the Family Law Act and state and territory family violence legislation and that different purposes are served by the different laws, as discussed in Chapter 4. However, an overarching principle of this Inquiry is to transcend the ‘silos’ between different jurisdictions in dealing with family violence. The Commissions have made a number of recommendations to establish a common interpretative framework around family violence in both the Family Law Act and state and territory family violence legislation.298 In this context, the Commissions consider it appropriate for state and territory courts to revive, vary, discharge or suspend an injunction made by the federal family court consistently with existing jurisdiction.

17.284 The same stakeholder also expressed the concern that parties may apply to state and territory courts to vary injunctions for personal protection in order to circumvent those injunctions. The Commissions consider that s 68R contains sufficient safeguards to deal with applications made to circumvent existing injunctions. The Family Law Act restricts the power of a court to exercise s 68R to circumstances where

298 See Chs 4–7.
the court is making or varying a protection order, where the court has material that was not before the court that made the original injunction.\footnote{Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68R(3).}

17.285 These safeguards should be replicated in any similar provision made applicable to injunctions that do not relate to children pursuant to s 114 of the \textit{Family Law Act}. The Commissions also consider that state and territory family violence legislation contains appropriate safeguards to deal with unmeritorious applications, which, in conjunction with the limitations on the exercise of s 68R, is sufficient to address the possibility of potential misuse of s 68R.

17.286 The Commissions agree with National Legal Aid that training of state and territory judicial officers is an important measure in fostering the appropriate use of s 68R and the recommended analogous provision that would apply to s 114 injunctions which do not relate to a child. In Chapter 16, the Commissions recommend that judicial officers and practitioners involved in protection order proceedings should receive education and training regarding the jurisdiction of state and territory courts under the \textit{Family Law Act}.\footnote{Recommendations 30–8 and 30–9.} The Commissions express the view that such training should cover s 68R, and any new provisions of the \textit{Family Law Act}.

\begin{center}
\textbf{Recommendation 17–5} The \textit{Family Law Act 1975} (Cth) should be amended to provide that, in proceedings to make or vary a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation, a state or territory court may revive, vary, discharge or suspend a \textit{Family Law Act} injunction for personal protection of a party to a marriage.
\end{center}

\section*{Injunctions to relieve a party to a marriage from rendering conjugal rights}

17.287 Section 114(2) of the \textit{Family Law Act} provides a further power to grant an injunction in the context of a marriage. It permits the court to ‘make an order relieving a party to a marriage from any obligation to perform marital services or render conjugal rights’. Orders under s 114(2) are rare—the only reported case of such an order made by the Family Court was in 1978.\footnote{In the Marriage of Gillie (1978) 30 FLR 565. The Family Court considered, but did not make, an order under s 114(2) in \textit{In the Marriage of Hayne} (1994) FLC ¶92–512: A Dickey, ‘Relief from the Performance of Marital Obligations’ (1995) 69 \textit{Australian Law Journal} 402, 402.}

17.288 While the \textit{Family Law Act} does not define ‘marital services’ and ‘conjugal rights’, they are generally taken to include the right of married persons to cohabit and have sexual intercourse with their spouse. Under the \textit{Matrimonial Causes Act 1959} (Cth), the court had the power to make a ‘decree of restitution of conjugal rights’ to enforce the marital duty of a husband and wife to live together. This remedy has been abolished.\footnote{Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 8(2).}
In addition, there has historically been a view that, at common law, it was not possible for a husband to rape his wife because a wife impliedly and irrevocably consented to all acts of sexual intercourse with her husband by entering into the marriage.\(^{303}\) In 1991, the High Court held that there is no rule in Australia that a husband cannot be guilty of raping his wife. The majority decision of Mason CJ, Deane and Toohey JJ stated that such a notion is ‘out of keeping with the view society now takes of the relationship between the parties to a marriage’.\(^{304}\) Their Honours held that ‘if it was ever the common law that by marriage a wife gave irrevocable consent to sexual intercourse by her husband, it is no longer the common law.’\(^{305}\)

At the time that s 114(2) was enacted, three Australian states—Queensland, Western Australia and Tasmania—defined rape in a way that excluded non-consensual sexual intercourse between a man and his wife.\(^{306}\) Changes to the criminal law by statute now make it clear that the fact that a person is married to the person whom they sexually assault is no defence.\(^{307}\)

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that s 114(2) of the Family Law Act should be repealed.\(^{308}\) This proposal received overwhelming support from stakeholders.\(^{309}\) Stakeholders argued that the provision was obsolete,\(^{310}\) and its language inappropriate,\(^{311}\) giving ‘a false impression that there is such a thing as ‘conjugal rights’.\(^{312}\)

Commissions’ views

Section 114(2) of the Family Law Act implies that there is a continuing obligation to render conjugal rights and provide marital services—obligations that no longer exist in law and which should not be assumed to form part of a marriage as a

---

304 Ibid, 390.
305 Ibid.
306 Ibid, 387.
307 Ibid.
308 See Ch 24.
311 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
social or legal institution. This section implies a view of marriage, and particularly the role of women in marriage, that is out of keeping with modern standards of equality and autonomy in the marriage relationship.

17.293 Section 114(2) gives the court power to relieve a person from performing certain perceived obligations within a marriage. In the Commissions’ view, this purpose is adequately served by s 114(1) alone. The need to protect a party to the marriage from unwanted sexual intercourse, or to require that a married couple not live together, can be achieved using injunctions under s 114(1) for the personal protection of a party to the marriage, or to restrain a party to the marriage from entering or remaining in the matrimonial home. More generally, the court’s broad discretion to grant an injunction where it is just or convenient to do so, and upon such terms and conditions as the court considers appropriate, allows the court to tailor an injunction to the specific needs of the parties.

17.294 There is no need for federal family courts to have a particular power to relieve a person from performing ‘duties’ where those duties do not exist. The Commissions consider that the power to make an order relieving a party to a marriage from any obligation to perform marital services or render conjugal rights is unnecessary and inconsistent with current principles of family and criminal law, and, as such, should be repealed.

Recommendation 17–6  Section 114(2) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), which permits a court to make an order relieving a party to a marriage from any obligations to perform marital services or render conjugal rights, should be repealed.

Hague Convention

Principle of prompt return

17.295 As noted in Chapter 2, the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention) is one of the international conventions to which Australia is a signatory. The Hague Convention is a multilateral treaty, which seeks to protect children from the harmful effects of abduction and retention across international boundaries by providing a procedure to bring about their prompt return. The Convention seeks to ensure that any child abducted from one Convention country to another Convention country is promptly returned to the child’s country of residence unless exceptional circumstances apply.

17.296 The basis of the Convention is the best interests of all children for issues of their welfare to be determined by the courts of the country in which they habitually reside, rather than the best interests of an individual child.

---

Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department in a submission to this Inquiry, the Convention ‘is designed to ensure that decisions about the welfare of the child should be made in the jurisdiction in which the child habitually resides’. 314

17.297 The Hague Convention sets up a Central Authority in countries party to the Convention. The Central Authority has a number of functions to facilitate the return of children to and from other countries. In Australia, the Central Authority is the Australian Government Attorney–General’s Department. There are also Central Authorities in each state and territory.

Exceptions

17.298 There are several exceptions to the requirement for the immediate return of a child under the Hague Convention. One exception is where there is a grave risk that return ‘would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation’. 315 Another exception is where the return of the child would violate ‘fundamental principles of Australia in relation to human rights and fundamental freedoms’. 316

Conditions on orders

17.299 One approach that courts have used to attempt to alleviate concerns about the risk of physical or psychological harm to a child is to request ‘non-molestation’ and other undertakings from the ‘left-behind’ parent, or place conditions on the return of the child. 317 However, under the Convention there is no power to make such conditions nor for them to be enforced in Australia. 318 The Guide to Good Practice under the Hague Convention, produced by the Hague Conference on Private and International Law states that the obligation of the Central Authority as follows:

If conditions were imposed or undertakings given with the return order, take whatever steps are appropriate within the limits of the Central Authority’s powers, to ensure that the conditions are met or the undertakings are fulfilled. 319

17.300 However, the practical use and effect of conditions and undertakings has been questioned, as there is no provision in the Convention for automatic enforcement of conditions and undertakings made in the returning state. A 2003 report by the United Kingdom Reunite Research Unit reported that, of the six non-molestation orders given in abduction cases which the Unit considered, all six were broken.\textsuperscript{320} Where a parent sought to enforce the undertakings through police complaints, the outcome generally was unsuccessful.\textsuperscript{321}

316 Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations 1987 (Cth) reg 16(3)(c) and (d).

In one case the mother called the police in relation to the constant pestering and harassment by the father in the home State in contravention of an undertaking given to an English Court. These undertakings had been registered in the local Court in the home State. Nevertheless, the mother states that the police advised her that she would have to obtain a protection Order as the undertaking had ‘no real effect’. The mother states that she has heard this story time and again from women who have been sent home subject to undertakings. She states her view that undertakings are ‘completely ineffective’.\textsuperscript{322}

17.301 The difficulty of enforcement of undertakings in Hague Convention cases was noted by the ALRC in \textit{Equality Before the Law}, and that there is ‘potential for it to be misused by mean as a means of exercising continuing powers over their partners’:

A man may commence custody proceedings in Australia to bring the woman and children back from overseas and then may discontinue proceedings. The woman is then in an invidious position, usually in a refuge, without income, and unable to leave. It was suggested that in such cases the Contracting Authority Representatives should accept responsibility to continue proceedings.\textsuperscript{323}

17.302 The ALRC recommended that reg 16 of the \textit{Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations} be amended to provide that in deciding whether there is a grave risk that the child’s return would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or an intolerable situation, regard may be had to the harmful effects on the child of past violence, or of violence likely to occur in the future, towards the abductor by the other parent if the child is returned. It was also recommended that the regulations should provide that the child should not be returned if there is a reasonable risk that to do so will endanger the safety of the parent who has the care of the child.\textsuperscript{324} This recommendation has not been implemented.

\textit{Submissions and consultations}

17.303 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder feedback on whether there should be a formal legal or practical connection between undertakings sought as a condition of returning a child pursuant to the Hague Convention and protection orders under family violence legislation. This could involve, for example, a formalised process through which entry into non-molestation undertakings in a Convention country outside Australia, pursuant to a Hague Convention recovery order, trigger proceedings for a protection order in favour of the child under state and territory

\textsuperscript{320} Reunite International, \textit{The Outcome for Children Returned Following an Abduction} (2003), 28.
\textsuperscript{321} Ibid, 31.
\textsuperscript{322} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{324} Ibid, Rec 9.5.
family violence legislation, bringing all this information to the attention of magistrates.325

17.304 Further, in Chapter 30, the Commissions consider the development of a national protection order register. One of the issues raised by such an initiative is which orders should be included and whether, for example, undertakings or conditions entered into as a condition of returning a child pursuant to the Hague Convention should be included.326

17.305 A particular concern of most stakeholders who responded to these issues was insufficient consideration given to matters of family violence in considering the return of a child pursuant to the Hague Convention.327 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department emphasised, however, that the role of the Convention was not primarily to resolve disputes between parents, which is the case in relocation and recovery matters within Australia. The Department noted that ‘under the Hague Convention the child is returned to the jurisdiction, not necessarily the left behind parent’.328

17.306 Because of this focus, however, the Queensland Law Society submitted that ‘there is concern that the presumption for return is so strong that the issue of domestic violence may be inadequately dealt with’.329

17.307 In considering how to provide a better focus on safety in Hague Convention returns, the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department suggested that:

while one option courts have to alleviate concerns about the risk of harm is to request undertakings from the left behind parent to not approach the other parent, there is also the option of keeping the return location secret from the left behind parent.330

17.308 With respect to the making of undertakings, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate noted the problem of enforceability:

Historically, there have been considerable difficulties in relying on protective undertakings in Hague Child Abduction Convention proceedings because of their lack of enforceability. In fact, undertakings can give a misleading impression of safety and protection.331

325 Consultation Paper, Questions 9–10 and 9–11.
326 Ibid, Question 10–21.
327 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010. A number of stakeholders responded to both recovery within Australia and recovery pursuant to the Hague Convention, without clearly distinguishing between them. The comments in those submissions are more pertinent to the former.
328 Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010.
17.309 In view of such difficulties, the Chief Justice and Chief Federal Magistrate considered that it would be beneficial for the Family Court to monitor any proceedings commenced after a child is returned to Australia pursuant to the Hague Convention:

This would not be in the form of judicial management per se but could, for example, be undertaken by the Chief Justice’s chambers or Principal Registrar’s chambers if sufficient resources were made available to enable monitoring to occur.

With very few exceptions, a returning child will already have come to the attention of the Commonwealth Central Authority (‘CCA’). The CCA should be able to send a copy of whatever orders or agreements were obtained in the returning jurisdiction. Whoever is notified within the court could refer the matter to a case manager or the listing judge in that state for the re-listing of any associated proceedings pending in the Family Court and for the appointment of an independent children’s lawyer. An amendment to Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations should provide appropriate authority to notify the court of returning cases. Section 111B enables regulations to be made for ‘such provision as is necessary or convenient to enable the performance of the obligations of Australia, or to obtain for Australia any advantage or benefit, under the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction’.

17.310 The Chief Justice and Chief Federal Magistrate also pointed out that it is not necessarily the case that conditions and undertakings can be obtained in the returning country:

For instance, the Family Court of Australia understands that, in New Zealand, it is not possible for someone to get an apprehended family violence order against themselves (as left behind parents may be called upon to do), because of the difficulties in proving immediate apprehension of harm if you are in another country. Likewise, a child usually has to be within a jurisdiction before an order can be made about that child.332

17.311 Their Honours opposed any implication that family violence protection orders should be made automatically following non-molestation undertakings or conditions:

Any suggestion that family violence orders be automatically made is not supported. Family violence orders should only be imposed where warranted and after due process. To facilitate arrangements where a family violence order is consented to, consideration may be given to amending the relevant legislation to make such a consent order possible. It is important to ensure that mutual family violence orders being made in relation to the requesting parent and the returning parent are scrutinised, to ensure that they are able to operate effectively.333

17.312 Other stakeholders expressed supported for the suggestion that non-molestation undertakings should trigger protection order proceedings.334

---

332 Ibid.
333 Ibid.
Commissions’ views

17.313 While the issue of escaping family violence may well have been a precipitating factor in a parent taking a child out of Australia, the Hague Convention provides limited opportunity for the previous occurrence of violence and a fear of future violence to be considered, given the emphasis on securing the child’s return to the jurisdiction. The concern in this Inquiry is on the relationship between the return of a child pursuant to the Hague Convention and, in particular, state and territory family violence legislation. The focus is therefore on cases of children who are returned to Australia, not the reverse situation of children being returned to another Convention country pursuant to the Hague Convention. Concerns of a different nature may arise where a victim flees with his or her children to Australia to escape family violence in another country. However, the issues arising from these circumstances do not relate to interaction of state and territory laws and the Family Law Act, and so are beyond the scope of this Inquiry.

17.314 The Commissions note the observations of the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate concerning any automatic triggering of protection orders by conditions or undertakings made in another Convention country.

17.315 The Commissions also acknowledge the suggestion for reform proposed in their submission that the Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations should be amended to provide appropriate authority to notify the Family Court of returning cases. The Commissions agree that this would be a sensible amendment and consistent with the principles of reform in this Inquiry—namely to ensure that the legal framework is as seamless as possible from the point of view of those who engage with it, and to facilitate effective interventions and support in circumstances of family violence. The Commissions also affirm the recommendation in relation to reg 16 made in the ALRC’s report Equality Before the Law, to give greater prominence to considerations of family violence. Although neither amendment pertains to issues of interaction—and therefore the Commissions make no recommendations with respect to them in this Inquiry—they highlight the importance of family violence in the assessment of risk, as well as improving the interconnectedness of the Family Court and the Central Authority when children are returned to Australia.

17.316 The issue of including conditions or undertakings made to another Convention country on a national protection order register in Australia is relevant to this Inquiry. Registration would not affect the enforceability of Hague Convention conditions and undertakings, but may be a useful information-sharing measure, in particular to ensure federal family courts, state and territory courts and police are aware of conditions and undertakings relevant to the safety and protection of parties. This is discussed further in Chapter 30.
18. Evidence of Family Violence

Contents

Introduction 831
Difficulties in giving evidence 832
   Family law proceedings 833
   Protection order proceedings 835
   Perceptions about false allegations of family violence 835
Common risk assessment framework 838
Improving evidence in protection order proceedings 843
   A flexible approach 844
   Written evidence 845
   Oral evidence 856
Outcomes of protection order proceedings 864
   Undertakings 864
   Protection orders made by consent 869
   Cross applications and mutual protection orders 877
   Vexatious proceedings 880

Introduction

18.1 A central theme of this Inquiry is ‘seamlessness’—the idea that, from the perspective of people affected by family violence—legal frameworks relating to family violence should work together to ensure that people are safe. One aspect of a seamless legal framework is the degree to which evidence of family violence given in one court can be considered in another court.

18.2 This chapter considers two interrelated issues: the factors that may inhibit victims from disclosing family violence; and difficulties associated with giving evidence about family violence, particularly when that evidence needs to be considered or repeated in different courts. The Commissions consider how a common definition of family violence and a common risk assessment framework can assist courts to identify and respond to issues of family violence that arise in cases before them. The Commissions also make recommendations to facilitate the use of evidence given in protection order proceedings in concurrent or pending family law proceedings.

18.3 Finally, this chapter considers a number of outcomes of protection order proceedings which have been identified as particularly problematic when parties are also engaged, or likely to be engaged, in parenting proceedings in federal family courts. These problems occur where protection orders are made by consent; and where a victim of family violence agrees to withdraw an application for a protection order and instead relies on undertakings given by the respondent to the court. This section also considers safeguards against vexatious litigation in protection order proceedings.

Difficulties in giving evidence

18.4 A number of submissions to this Inquiry highlighted the difficulties that victims of family violence face when disclosing family violence to courts or other service providers and when providing evidence of family violence to courts.¹ Stakeholders set out a range of reasons why people who have experienced family violence may not readily disclose it. A victim of family violence may hide the abuse due to feelings of shame, low self esteem or a sense that he or she, as the victim, is responsible for the violence. A victim may feel that he or she will not be believed. A victim may hope that the violence will stop, or might believe that violence is a normal part of relationships. Because of the family violence, a victim may feel powerless and unable to trust others, or fear further violence if caught disclosing it.²

18.5 Further, there may be a lack of understanding by courts, service providers and the community of what constitutes family violence. This may mean that, even if family violence is disclosed, it may not be recognised, or acted on, as family violence. In her submission, Professor Patricia Easteal commented that ‘the dynamics of violence in the home are complex and often difficult for those on the “outside” to understand’. She noted that family violence cannot be understood as separate incidents:

> Any one ‘incident’ is in actuality just a small part of a complex pattern of control and cannot be adequately understood nor its gravity measured in isolation from that background. At the centre is disempowerment and degradation.³

18.6 Easteal submitted that the many manifestations of family violence may not be effectively understood or weighted and, therefore, not screened for or adequately considered in judicial decision making.⁴

18.7 Once family violence is disclosed, the victim may then need to provide evidence of the violence to a court. As noted by the Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC), giving evidence ‘can be one of the most intimidating and distressing aspects of the legal system for people who have been subject to family violence’.⁵ It can involve giving evidence of traumatic and personal events in public and in the presence of the person who has used violence.

18.8 This trauma is heightened if a victim is involved in multiple proceedings, which take place in different courts. Different courts may impose different evidentiary and procedural requirements—for example, some may require evidence by affidavit while

---

¹ C Stoney, Submission FV 134, 22 June 2010; K Hall, Submission FV 113, 8 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 91, 3 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.
² Confidential, Submission FV 91, 3 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.
³ P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.
18. Evidence of Family Violence

other allow only oral testimony—and the victim may have different, or no legal representation. These difficulties may be compounded for Indigenous women and women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.

18.9 In addition, family violence, by its nature, is often difficult to corroborate and prove. As noted by the Australian Institute of Family Studies, in its research into allegations of family violence made in relation to parenting matters under the Family Law Act (the Moloney study):

Obtaining corroborative evidence is likely to be very difficult when the violence has occurred over an extended period of time, potential sources of proof may be lost, witnesses (where there were any) may no longer be available, injuries may have faded and the non-physical symptoms of trauma may not be obvious.6

18.10 Sometimes there will be evidence of family violence incidents—such as a police report or medical records. In other cases however, there may be no evidence available because the victim has not previously disclosed the violence or has, for example, sought to explain it away as ‘accidental’. These difficulties are compounded where family violence is manifested by controlling or coercive emotional or economic abuse, rather than physical abuse.

Family law proceedings

18.11 A number of reports have identified that victims of family violence fear the impact that disclosure of family violence may have on family law matters.7 In her study of women’s experience of the family law system in the context of family violence, Dr Lesley Laing found that many women reported that they ‘received the strong message not to raise allegations of abuse or violence in the Family Courts’ and felt unable to put their full stories of violence to the court.8

18.12 There is also a concern that family violence may not be raised in cases where there is not strong evidence, because if family violence is revealed but cannot be proved, it may compromise the credibility of the party. In the family courts violence review conducted by Professor Richard Chisholm (Chisholm Review), this was described as the ‘victim’s dilemma’:

The dilemma is that the seeking of such orders, and spelling out the reasons for the fear of risk, may be seen as vindictive or punitive, dwelling on the past and old grievances, or as a way of alienating the children from the perpetrator. The victim might therefore be rightly concerned that if the court does not accept her or her evidence, or if it considers that the protective orders are not warranted, it might take an adverse view of the victim, and not only fail to make the orders sought by the victim, but make orders placing the children with the perpetrator for longer periods, to protect them from what it might see as a style of parenting by the victim that would harm the children by alienating them from the other parent. Such an outcome, the victim would believe, would place the children at additional risk of harm.9

---

18.13 The Chisholm Review noted that a number of circumstances contribute to the victim’s dilemma, including that:

- the victim may not have complained of the family violence at the time—perhaps because of feelings of shame, or a belief that the violence may stop, or for fear of further violence—and it may then be argued that the victim’s lack of action demonstrates that there has been no family violence, or that it was of a trivial nature;
- because family violence generally occurs in the home and may not be documented, it may be difficult for the victim to provide persuasive evidence of the violence;
- the trauma of family violence may lead the victim to be ‘somewhat unorganised, anxious or depressed, and, for such reasons, an unimpressive witness’.10

18.14 The Moloney study considered, among other matters, the prevalence and nature of allegations of family violence in family law proceedings involving children before the 2006 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). The research indicated that most allegations of family violence in federal family courts were accompanied by little or no supporting evidence.11 The study concluded that this ‘scarcity of supporting evidentiary material suggests that legal advice and legal decision-making may often be taking place in the context of widespread factual uncertainty’.12

18.15 This Inquiry concerns the interaction of laws, and a major focus of this chapter is on evidence of family violence in protection order proceedings and how this evidence affects proceedings in federal family courts. The recommendations in this chapter will assist in information capture about family violence at the level of state and territory magistrates courts. A number of recommendations throughout this Report provide complementary measures in ensuring that evidence of family violence is presented in federal family courts. Recommendations in Chapter 31 support education for all those involved in the legal system about the nature and dynamics of family violence, along with a bench book to assist judicial officers dealing with family violence matters. Extensive recommendations relating to information sharing are made in Chapter 30.

12  Ibid, viii.
Protection order proceedings

18.16 The procedures for seeking a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation differ across jurisdictions. Family violence legislation, and the courts exercising family violence jurisdiction, differ in relation to the nature of evidence required before the court will make a protection order. Specific procedural differences in relation to requirements for written and oral evidence are discussed below.

18.17 Local and magistrates courts deal with a high volume of applications for protection orders. Given this, list hearings for protection orders are often brief. Dr Jane Wangmann, in her study of protection order proceedings in NSW Local Courts, estimated that most protection order mentions in NSW Local Courts were dealt with in less than three minutes, meaning that opportunities to give oral evidence are limited. In addition, many applications are finalised without a contested hearing.

18.18 Further, Wangmann’s study found that the ‘complaints’—the section of the application form in which the applicant sets out why he or she is seeking a protection order—were often inadequate, in that they were brief, lacking in detail, focused on a single incident and/or contained a considerable amount of irrelevant detail. Wangmann noted that ‘such an approach adds nothing to the complaint and its role as a statement about the experience of family violence to support the making of a protection order’.

18.19 The often perfunctory and repetitive nature of the allegations in complaints can be attributed to: lack of representation; limited assistance by hard-pressed court staff; and busy and sometimes inexperienced police (where applications are initiated by police). This combination of factors can lead to the repetition of formulas rather than a carefully considered narrative which relates to the individual circumstances of the applicant.

18.20 While this assessment is not applicable to all applications or narratives of family violence in protection order proceedings, either in NSW or across all other states and territories, similar concerns about protection order proceedings were noted in the course of this Inquiry.

Perceptions about false allegations of family violence

18.21 There are concerns that courts, service providers and others in the community may disbelieve disclosures of family violence made when the victim is engaged in

---

13 J Wangmann, “‘She Said …’ “He said …” : Cross Applications in NSW Apprehended Domestic Violence Order Proceedings’, Thesis, University of Sydney, 2009, 104. See also R Hunter, Domestic Violence Law Reform and Women’s Experience in Court: The Implementation of Feminist Reforms in Civil Proceedings (2008). In the ACT, as observed during this Inquiry, the proceedings were longer, but the list was significantly shorter than, for example, in Local Courts in NSW.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

litigation, particularly in family law matters. For example, the NSW Women’s Migrant Movement commented that:

The current, extremely limited interpretation of admissible evidence does not reflect the reality of violence and abuse within families and the limited disclosure to State/Territory systems—after years of violence and abuse, women often have very limited or no documented evidence ... The word of a woman making an allegation of violence and abuse without documented evidence is treated with disbelief, without providing opportunities for corroboration by other means. This indicates that, despite all the research to date and experience of legal practitioners showing that false allegations of violence and abuse are not widespread, and therefore aligning with research that shows domestic violence is an under-reported crime, the Court and legal representatives still respond to such allegations with a presumption that they are false.16

18.22 Views differ about how common it is for people to give false evidence to a court about family violence. Some stakeholders have expressed concerns that allegations of family violence or child abuse are sometimes fabricated in order to gain an advantage in family law proceedings, or to remove a person’s partner from the home and deny him or her contact with children.17

18.23 However, there is no clear evidence to support the claim that false allegations of family violence are routinely made to gain an advantage in family law matters. The Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (as it then was) urged ‘caution against accepting this contention uncritically’:

There is no doubt that Family Court proceedings often are accompanied by allegations of domestic violence and the use of protection orders. However, this may reflect the fact that domestic violence often escalates when couples separate. Australian data demonstrate that women are as likely to experience violence by previous partners as by current partners and that it is the time around and after separation which is most dangerous for women.18

18.24 Research has found that most allegations of family violence, including child abuse, made in the context of family law proceedings are made in good faith and with support for the claims.19 For example, a study in 2000 found that allegations of child abuse made in family law proceedings were found to be false no more frequently than allegations of child abuse made in other circumstances.20

False allegations and statements in family law proceedings

18.25 Section 117AB of the Family Law Act requires a court to make a costs order against a person who ‘knowingly made a false allegation or statement in the proceedings’. This section was included to address ‘concerns expressed, in particular that allegations of family violence and abuse can be easily made and may be taken into account in family law proceedings’.21 Conversely, there is no specific provision in the Family Law Act to deal with false denials of family violence.

18.26 The Chisholm Review raised concerns that this provision could impede the disclosure of family violence in cases where a vulnerable parent’s allegations of family violence cannot be corroborated by reliable evidence.22 The Chisholm Review recommended that the costs order provision in s 117AB of the Family Law Act should be repealed and suggested that consideration should instead be given to amending the general costs provision in s 117 of the Act to direct a court to have regard to whether any person knowingly gave false evidence in the proceedings.23 This provision would cover both false allegations and false denials of family violence.

18.27 In addition, the Family Law Council found that there is no evidence that s 117AB ‘has achieved its purpose’ in relation to false allegations of family violence and recommended that the Attorney-General give consideration to clarifying the intention of s 117AB, either through legislative amendment or public education.24

False evidence given in protection order proceedings

18.28 State and territory family violence legislation generally deals with persons who give false evidence or make false allegations or denials by using provisions relating to vexatious applications or other legislation protecting court processes. A person who gives false evidence may also be charged with a number of offences, including perjury, false swearing and false testimony.25

18.29 In some circumstances, a court’s ability to award costs against a person who brings an application for, or to revoke, a protection order that is ‘deliberately false’ or made in ‘bad faith’ is linked to vexatious application provisions. For example, s 61 of

---

22 R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), 118.
23 Ibid, 108–120, Rec 3.2.
25 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) ss 327–330; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 314; Criminal Code (Qld) s 123; Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 124; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) ss 242–243; Criminal Code (Tas) ss 94–95; Criminal Code (ACT) ss 703, 705; Criminal Code (NT) ss 96, 99.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) provides that a court may not award costs on an application for a protection order, or a revocation or variation of the order, unless the court dismisses the application as ‘malicious, deliberately false, frivolous or vexatious’. In other jurisdictions, costs may be awarded against a person if the court is satisfied that an application for a protection order was made ‘in bad faith’ or ‘has not been made honestly’.26

18.30 In 2004, the Parliament of Tasmania considered whether the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) should include a provision to impose a penalty for false or contrived claims of family violence. The government did not support such amendments on the basis that there were adequate sanctions in the Police Offences Act 1935 (Tas) and other legislation for making false allegations:

If you make a false report to the police you can be charged; if you make a false statutory declaration you can be charged. If you falsely swear you can be charged and it is perjury. All of these things are available for people who fabricate claims, under the Criminal Code as well as the Police Offences Act. Anyone who does that will be charged and people have been charged. We would not put it in here because it is in other legislation and it is covered.28

Commissions’ views

18.31 The Commissions consider that existing measures to sanction persons who give false evidence of family violence are sufficient. Such measures include the courts’ power to dismiss vexatious applications and award costs against a person who brings a vexatious application. The Commissions consider that these measures are sufficient safeguards against giving false evidence before courts generally, and that there is no need for specific provisions relating to false allegations of family violence, in protection order or family law proceedings.

18.32 There are concerns that s 117AB of the Family Law Act may inhibit the disclosure of family violence in family law proceedings where a party cannot provide strong evidence of family violence to the court. The Commissions endorse the recommendations relating to s 117AB made in the Chisholm Review and by the Family Law Council. The Commissions agree that false denials of family violence, as well as false allegations, should trigger the court’s discretion to make a costs order.

Common risk assessment framework

18.33 Family violence cannot be considered by a court unless it is aware of the fact of the violence, and the circumstances. Risk assessment is a key way in which courts, police, and others who provide services to victims of family violence can identify and respond to family violence.

---

26 See, eg, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 154(3)(b); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 61.
27 See, eg, Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 117.
18.34 Risk assessment involves identifying and evaluating any risks to the safety of a person or child which arise as a result of family violence. All service providers involved in protection order proceedings under family violence legislation and family law proceedings must, to some extent, identify and manage the risk of family violence for their clients. However, the degree to which risk assessment is a formalised process, and the types of risk assessment practices used by different participants in the legal system, varies across courts and jurisdictions.

18.35 Risk assessment can occur at a number of points in the family violence system, including when a person: accesses a family violence service; applies to a state or territory court for a protection order; discloses family violence during family law proceedings; seeks legal advice; or when police are involved in a family violence incident. Risk assessment is also an ongoing process—first, because it should not be assumed that risk assessment has already occurred elsewhere in the system; and secondly, because risk may change over time, particularly as a victim’s circumstances change through the taking of steps such as separation or legal action. Further, over time a person may be willing to disclose more, as trust is built, if they continue to deal with the same service provider; or if they are feeling supported more generally by the system. The difficulties experienced by victims in disclosing sexual assault provide a key example of why this repeated approach is necessary.29

Risk assessment in state and territory courts

18.36 Many organisations, such as family violence service providers, police services and legal aid commissions have developed risk assessment policies and procedures to screen and assess family violence.

18.37 The Victorian Government has developed a state-wide risk assessment and management framework that applies to all service providers.30 By incorporating common language, definitions of family violence and risk assessment and management procedures, the Victorian framework is intended to ‘significantly increase the ability of the service system to respond in an integrated and coordinated way’ to family violence.31

18.38 The framework includes three practice guides directed towards different levels of risk assessment for different categories of service providers. The first practice guide deals with identifying family violence and assists mainstream service providers who may encounter people who are victims of family violence, such as medical practitioners or teachers. The second practice guide, regarding preliminary assessment, assists professionals who work with victims of family violence but for whom it is not their only core business, such as police, court staff and community legal centres. The third practice guide involves a comprehensive assessment for specialist family violence professionals working with victims of family violence.32

---

29 See Ch 26.
31 Ibid, 19.
32 Ibid, 8.
18.39 The risk assessments in these practice guides combine three elements to determine the level of risk of family violence:

- the victim’s view of their level of risk;
- the presence of evidence-based risk indicators; and
- professional judgment that takes into account all other circumstances for the victim, child and person who has used violence.

18.40 The framework also provides for appropriate referral pathways and information sharing between service providers; risk management strategies including ongoing case management; data collection; and quality assurance strategies. The provision of training aimed at building capacity and consistency in risk assessment and management across service providers, is an integral part of the framework.

18.41 The practice guides are flexible, and particular service providers, such as Victoria Police, have developed their own risk assessment processes, based on the common framework.

Risk assessment in family courts

18.42 Some participants in the family law system already undertake formal risk assessment. In particular, a key element of family dispute resolution (FDR) practice is screening and risk assessment for family violence, which is designed to ensure that FDR is not used in inappropriate circumstances, and to identify and mitigate any risk factors in cases where FDR is considered appropriate.

18.43 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department and the Australian Catholic University have published a Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line, which includes a screening and assessment framework, referral guidelines and indicators of family violence and child abuse and risk of self-harm. It discusses issues of supervision and support, and provides a range of resources for practitioners, including sample questions to identify family violence.

18.44 The Chisholm Review and the Family Law Council’s report on improving responses to family violence in the family law system both made recommendations about risk assessment by federal family courts.

---

33 Ibid, 7.
37 Ibid.
18.45 The Family Law Council makes a number of recommendations about family violence ‘if and when it becomes visible in the family law system in Australia’. In particular, it considered that it is essential that all people involved in the family law system screen for matters likely to impact on children and parenting, including, amongst other things, family violence. The Family Law Council also recommended that a consistent framework for screening and risk assessment be developed in accordance with principles adopted in the common knowledge base.

18.46 The Chisholm Review recommended that the Family Law Act should require federal family courts to conduct a risk identification and assessment. It considered that the current approach, in which parties file a notice that allegations of family violence or child abuse have been made (Form 4 notice) was ‘not working’. The Review stated that:

it would be better to have a system of risk identification and assessment that applies to all parenting cases. This approach would reflect the best available thinking about these issues, and would reinforce a lot of measures that are already being taken by the courts to identify and deal with issues of violence as early as possible.

18.47 The Chisholm Review recommended that the Australian Government consider the most appropriate ways of conducting this kind of risk assessment, having regard to the resources available to the courts, and to the possibility of arranging for an external agency to conduct some or all of the risk assessment.

18.48 In a submission to this Inquiry the Attorney-General’s Department noted the development of several measures to improve the way in which the family law system responds to family violence and child abuse, including a national framework to support screening and assessment for family violence across the family law system. It submitted that:

The main purpose of screening is to identify clients who are at risk of harm, including the currency and extent of the risk. In the first instance, it is envisaged that all clients entering the family law system will be screened consistently, and at a general level to identify risk of harm at the earliest stage. Further and more comprehensive risk assessment may follow depending on the path taken in the resolution of the client’s dispute. Assessing client needs will follow on from screening and focus on the needs of the client and the type of service that may be required. The common screening and risk identification framework will ensure that regardless of their entry point, clients receive access to the range of information and referral options that are available to meet their needs. It is anticipated that all practitioners will be trained in the consistent use of the framework.

40 Ibid, 42–3.
41 Ibid, 43. The Family Law Council also recommended that the federal Attorney-General facilitate the establishment of an expert panel and reference group to develop, maintain and promote a family violence common knowledge base for those involved in the family law system: Rec 6.1.
42 R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), Rec 2.3.
43 Ibid, 6.
44 Ibid, Rec 2.4.
45 Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010.
Submissions and consultations

18.49 Some stakeholders commented on the importance of risk assessment procedures, particularly in federal family courts. Women’s Legal Service Queensland, for example, considered that:

A risk assessment and risk management framework, similar to the one introduced in Victoria, should be developed and applied across Government agencies and funded services dealing with matters involving domestic and family violence, including police and courts and related services. This would help ensure there is a clear, transparent and standardised approach to the risk management and the assessment of safety and risk in each family coming into contact with services.

18.50 Domestic Violence Victoria and others in a joint submission expressed the view that a common approach to risk assessment would improve the evidence given to support claims of family violence in court:

We would argue that a shared understanding of risk factors and shared approaches to assessing risk helps in gathering evidence that can be used in applications for protection orders through state courts, and parenting orders through federal courts. Good evidence is contained in the woman’s story about the violence—it helps her to identify and think about possible witnesses, others she’s told, others who have seen and documented her injuries etc. We know from research that women usually tell someone at a point of crisis.

Shared frameworks for supporting a woman to tell her story, and clear practice directions about asking questions about violence can assist her to tell her story more clearly, regardless of where she first presents for support. The flow on is that greater clarity and more detail about the violence that is available to the court will usually lead to good evidence to support the allegations.

Commissions’ views

18.51 In Chapters 5 and 6, the Commissions recommend a common definition of family violence across state and territory family violence legislation, the Family Law Act and other legislation. The Commissions recommend that family violence be defined as violent or threatening behaviour or any other form of behaviour that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful; and the

---

47 Women’s Legal Service Brisbane, Submission FV 223, 2 July 2010.

18. Evidence of Family Violence

The definition sets out non-exhaustive examples of the types of physical and non-physical behaviour that may constitute family violence.\(^49\)

18.52 The Commissions consider that a common definition of family violence, together with a shared understanding of particular conduct that may comprise family violence, would provide the groundwork for a common approach to risk assessment for family violence. Across all jurisdictions a common approach to risk assessment would mean that the needs of victims of family violence are consistently understood and addressed by all service providers, including specialist family violence services, courts, police, lawyers and mainstream service providers such as education and health care providers.

18.53 How to ensure proper screening to identify family violence and child abuse was a significant theme in the Family Law Council’s report on improving responses to family violence in the family law system.\(^50\) The issue was also considered in the Chisholm Review, which emphasised ‘that family violence must be disclosed, understood, and acted upon’.\(^51\) Given the attention to risk assessment in both reviews, any consideration in this Report to such initiatives complements, rather than duplicates them.

18.54 While this work has not been duplicated, taking into account the recommendations in these reviews and the submissions and consultations in this Inquiry, the Commissions consider the Victorian framework for common risk assessment to be an instructive model. The Commissions suggest that other state and territory governments consider the development of similar frameworks to assess and manage the risk of family violence in their jurisdictions.

18.55 Work is currently underway to develop a national framework to support screening and assessment for family violence across the federal family law system. In order to promote consistency in understanding and identifying family violence across jurisdictions, it would also be desirable if the federal framework currently being developed was consistent with the overarching risk assessment and management frameworks that apply in states and territories.

Improving evidence in protection order proceedings

18.56 Improving the availability and quality of evidence about family violence is an important aspect of promoting better outcomes for victims of family violence involved in multiple legal proceedings. As noted in Laing’s study of the experiences of victims of family violence in family court proceedings:

> The Family Court relies on evidence from interventions in other parts of the domestic violence and child protection systems. If the response of other agencies was inadequate, as was frequently the case, the women did not have evidence of the violence and the Family Courts have to make difficult decisions with incomplete information.\textsuperscript{52}

---

\(^{49}\) Rec 5–1.

18.57 Currently, the \textit{Family Law Act} requires courts, when determining what is in the best interests of a child, to consider, among other factors, any protection order that applies to the child or a member of the child’s family, provided that the protection order is a final order, or was made after a contested hearing.\textsuperscript{53} In Chapter 17, the Commissions recommend an amendment to this provision to require courts, when determining the best interests of the child, to consider evidence of family violence given, or findings made, in relevant family violence protection order proceedings.\textsuperscript{54}

The existence of a protection order made under state or territory family violence legislation will operate as a ‘red flag’ to federal family courts that there are issues of family violence that need to be considered. The court must then look at the facts of family violence, including evidence given and findings made in protection order proceedings, along with any other evidence of family violence.

18.58 The \textit{Family Law Act} and \textit{Family Law Rules} require parenting proceedings to be conducted as a ‘less adversarial’ trial, in which the court is to actively direct, control and manage the conduct of proceedings. Section 69ZX of the \textit{Family Law Act} permits the court to give directions or make orders about the matters on which the parties are to give evidence and how evidence is to be given. The court is also permitted to ask questions of parties, witnesses and experts and seek evidence or documents.\textsuperscript{55} In particular, a court deciding parenting proceedings may receive into evidence the transcript of evidence in any other proceedings before a federal family court or other court or tribunal, and draw any conclusions of fact or adopt any recommendation, finding, decision or judgment of those courts or tribunals that it thinks proper.\textsuperscript{56}

18.59 Generally, sworn written evidence, as opposed to oral evidence, is more readily available for use in subsequent proceedings or separate family law proceedings.\textsuperscript{57} Affidavit evidence submitted in protection order proceedings can, for example, be tendered and utilised in other family violence or family court proceedings where appropriate.\textsuperscript{58}

18.60 This section considers ways in which evidence in protection order proceedings may be given in such a way that it can be more readily used where it is relevant to family law proceedings.

\textbf{A flexible approach}

18.61 Stakeholders in this Inquiry highlighted a number of areas in which flexibility is required in: responding to the needs of individuals affected by family violence;

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item \textit{Family Law Act 1975} (Ch) s 60CC(3)(k).
\item \textit{Rec} 17–1.
\item \textit{Family Law Act 1975} (Ch) s 69ZX(1). See also \textit{Family Law Rules 2004} (Ch) ch 16.
\item \textit{Family Law Act 1975} (Ch) s 69ZX(3).
\item \textit{Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46}, 24 May 2010.
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
recognising the advantages and disadvantages of written and oral evidence; and accommodating the needs and practices of courts making protection orders.

18.62 As discussed, the dynamics of family violence are complex. The manifestations of family violence and the victim’s response to that violence will be different for each family affected by it. Court proceedings need, therefore, to be able to respond flexibly to the different circumstances of victims in order to obtain and interpret evidence of family violence.

18.63 In addition to recognising that family violence can take many forms and the ability to provide strong or corroborated evidence of family violence may be limited, rules about giving evidence need to recognise that victims of family violence may have different needs in giving evidence. For example, allowing a victim of family violence to provide written, rather than oral, evidence has a number of benefits—but may disadvantage some people, such as unrepresented parties and parties who have low literacy, have an intellectual disability or are from a CALD background.

18.64 Finally, the Commissions note that not all people seeking protection orders will be involved in later family law proceedings. The focus of protection order proceedings is the immediate protection of a person from family violence—and parties to proceedings and courts making protection orders must make that their primary concern. There is a danger in making the process too onerous and/or time consuming when the crucial focus is immediate and/or urgent protection. The right balance between expediency and increased evidentiary value will have to be struck.

18.65 Protection order proceedings should not become a preliminary hearing or fact-finding exercise for the purposes of later family law proceedings. Rather, where evidence is given in protection order proceedings, the Commissions consider that victims of family violence should be able to present that evidence in concurrent or pending family law proceedings.

Written evidence

18.66 As noted above, the quality and degree of written evidence given in protection order proceedings varies across different courts in different states and territories. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views about the advantages and disadvantages of providing written rather than oral evidence to a court in protection order proceedings.

18.67 Stakeholders identified a number of benefits of written evidence. A number of stakeholders noted that a key advantage for victims of family violence is that providing 60 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FY 182, 25 June 2010.

61 The purpose of family violence legislation is discussed in detail in Ch 4.
written, rather than oral, evidence is less intimidating, particularly where oral evidence is to be given in the presence of the person alleged to have used family violence.\(^{64}\) By giving written evidence, the applicant avoids the need to discuss personal details or relive traumatic events in a crowded courtroom.\(^{65}\)

18.68 Another benefit is that written evidence allows applicants to present information comprehensively and in a coherent manner:

The advantage of a written report is that a victim can go through the abuse chronologically and document the details clearly to aid the Judge in his/her decision. It gives them time to sit and think and sort out their history clearly in a non threatening environment. The documenting of the history of abuse is a big eye opener for the victim when they can see the details written down and realise how much has happened. A social worker or suitably trained support person can assist them to formulate their paperwork at a pace they can handle, with minimum stress.\(^{66}\)

18.69 The Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service also noted that giving written evidence may be more practical, in that many of its clients live in remote communities, making it very difficult logistically for women to attend to give evidence in the courts in the bigger towns.\(^{67}\)

18.70 However, some stakeholders noted that a requirement that parties provide written evidence can disadvantage some people, such as unrepresented parties\(^ {68}\) and parties who are of low literacy, have an intellectual disability or are from a CALD background.\(^ {69}\)

18.71 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions considered several options to improve the quality of written evidence in protection order proceedings, including:

- ensuring that application forms for family violence protection orders include information about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence;
- requiring that applications for family violence protection orders are sworn or affirmed;
- giving applicants for protection orders the opportunity of providing affidavit evidence in support of their application; and
- providing a standard form of affidavit in family violence matters.

\(^{64}\) See, eg, Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, Submission FV 117, 15 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.

\(^{65}\) Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.

\(^{66}\) Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010. See also Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010.

\(^{69}\) Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
Information provided in application forms

18.72 A person seeking a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation applies for the order by completing an application form. There is some variation in this process across jurisdictions—for example, in Victoria, a person seeking a protection order fills out an information form, and the Court Registry uses this information to lodge a formal application for an order on the person’s behalf. In some cases, the police may also apply for a protection order on behalf of a victim of family violence.

18.73 The information and degree of detail sought in the application forms vary across jurisdictions. Some application forms simply ask the applicant to set out the grounds on which he or she relies. 70 This approach assumes that the person seeking a protection order understands the legislative definition of family violence and can frame his or her application accordingly—knowledge that a person is unlikely to have without assistance from the police or a lawyer. Other forms ask the applicant to describe the respondent’s behaviour, but give no guidance as to the kinds of behaviour that may constitute family violence and lead the court to make a protection order.71

18.74 In contrast, some application forms guide the applicant step by step through the application. Some include a list of conduct that reflects the statutory definition of family violence and asks for details of recent conduct.72 Other application forms include the statutory definition of family violence as part of the form.73

18.75 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that court forms for applications for a protection order under state and territory family violence legislation should include information about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence.74

---

74 Consultation Paper, Proposal 10–3.
Submissions and consultations

18.76 Many stakeholders supported the proposal. For example, Women’s Legal Services NSW commented that including more information about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence:

would be helpful in assisting applicants understand the types of conduct that constitute family violence, would facilitate ease of applying for a protection order and would ensure full particulars of relevant behaviour are included on applications.

18.77 Similarly, National Legal Aid considered that including information about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence in application forms would ‘be helpful for victims who often think that it is not possible to obtain a protection order unless the abuse is physical or there is damage to property’.

18.78 Stakeholders cautioned that application forms should make it clear that the information about what constitutes family violence is only illustrative—and not an exhaustive list—as, otherwise, applicants may not include all relevant information.

18.79 Some stakeholders emphasised the need to give victims of family violence support when applying for a protection order. Domestic Violence Victoria and others commented that, while including information about types of family violence on court forms can be helpful, it is important for an applicant to be able to access support from legal and non-legal support workers when making an application for an intervention order. An already traumatised victim of violence is often overwhelmed by the requirements of a court setting and is likely to prepare a better and clearer application with good informed support.

18.80 Similarly, Wangmann agreed with the need for measures to assist applicants to provide information, including detail about the history of family violence and not just a single incident. However, she submitted that:

At the same time it must be noted that this is a careful balance that must also acknowledge the experience of family violence is one that means that it may be difficult to provide specific detail for every incident, or provide other supportive or

75 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; A Harland, Submission FV 80, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.

76 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.

77 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

18.81 In addition, Wangmann noted the importance of providing applicants for protection orders with support when completing application forms. 81

18.82 Legal Aid NSW and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service submitted that including information about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence in application forms was unnecessary and could cause confusion. 82 Another stakeholder noted that there is a benefit to keeping the forms ‘simple so that individuals, particularly from non-English speaking backgrounds, are not overwhelmed by pages of words’. The stakeholder considered that an accompanying information booklet could be provided rather than including further detail in application forms. 83

Commissions’ views

18.83 One way in which the quality of evidence supporting allegations of family violence can be improved is to improve the information provided in application forms. To this end, the Commissions consider that application forms should include an illustrative list of the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence.

18.84 This will help make victims aware of the full range of conduct that may constitute family violence and prompt them to provide evidence of the types of family violence they have suffered. It would also assist applicants to identify certain types of behaviour as family violence, such as sexual assault or psychological or emotional abuse. Information of this kind is particularly important for victims who are making an application for a protection order without the assistance of lawyers or the police.

18.85 Application forms in different jurisdictions take varying approaches. For example, some forms set out a list of conduct that the applicant can tick if relevant; others set out the definition of violence before asking the applicant to provide details of incidents of family violence. The Commissions do not suggest that it is necessary for all forms to be identical, but recommend that all application forms provide some guidance to applicants about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence.

Recommendation 18–1 State and territory courts should ensure that application forms for protection orders include information about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence.

81  Ibid.
82  Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
Affidavit evidence in protection order proceedings

18.86 Protection order proceedings heard in state and territory courts differ in how evidence of family violence is given, with differing emphases on written and oral evidence. Courts may seek sworn evidence from the victim—such as oral testimony when making an interim protection order ex parte, or both oral and written evidence when making a final protection order—and other evidence of family violence, for example, through police reports or medical records.

18.87 In some jurisdictions, the application form completed by a person seeking a protection order must be sworn or affirmed. For example, s 43 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) requires that an application for a protection order made by a police officer must be made on oath or certified by the police officer, while an application made by a person other than a police officer must be ‘made on oath or by affidavit’. To this end, the final paragraph of the information form to be completed by a person seeking a protection order is headed ‘Affidavit’ and, by signing, the applicant swears or affirms that ‘the contents of my application are true and correct to the best of my knowledge’. Application forms in Queensland and Tasmania take a similar approach.

18.88 The Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) takes a different approach and gives the applicant the option of providing evidence by affidavit in support of the application where orders are sought ex parte. There is a pro-forma affidavit, which asks the applicant to describe the incident, injuries suffered, and how the behaviour of the respondent made the applicant feel. The affidavit also seeks information about orders and proceedings in other courts, and sets out the orders sought.

18.89 Similarly, in the Northern Territory, the application form includes a note, recommending that the applicant file a statutory declaration setting out the facts and circumstances which establish a domestic relationship, the basis for the application and future expectations.

18.90 In other jurisdictions, there is no requirement that an application be supported by an affidavit. For example, in NSW, South Australia and the ACT, the court has discretion to accept affidavit evidence in certain circumstances, generally where the applicant is not able to give oral evidence to the court during a hearing.
18. Evidence of Family Violence

18.91 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether it would be beneficial for state and territory family violence legislation to:

- require that applications for protection orders be sworn or affirmed; or
- give applicants for protection orders the opportunity of providing affidavit evidence in support of their application.

18.92 The Commissions also asked whether a standard form of affidavit would be of assistance to victims of family violence.

Submissions and consultations

Applications to be sworn or affirmed

18.93 A number of stakeholders were in support of applications being sworn or affirmed. The Peninsula Community Legal Centre observed that ‘this is not an onerous burden for an applicant and ensures that the importance of the application and the resulting order, if made, is respected’.

18.94 The Local Court NSW also supported the requirement that applications be sworn or affirmed and stated that:

> The removal of this requirement from the current application procedure has created uncertainty as to how ex parte orders should be made and the evidentiary value that can be attached to unsworn or non-affirmed statements in ex parte proceedings.

18.95 Women’s Legal Services NSW noted that applications in NSW are currently unsworn and many magistrates will not make ex parte or interim orders without sworn oral evidence from the victim. It submitted that sworn applications may reduce the need for victims to retell their story in the witness box in preliminary proceedings.

18.96 The Law Council considered that applications that are sworn or affirmed mean that the information in the application is of greater evidentiary value:

> In the event that information contained in applications for family violence orders from state proceedings is to be used in family law proceedings then it can only be of value if sworn or affirmed. The requirement that information must be on oath or sworn, allows such information to be used as evidence of the truth of the allegations in family law proceedings. If such information is only in unsworn form then it has less evidentiary value, more as evidence of any prior inconsistent statement by the applicant, rather than potential positive evidence of the matters alleged.

---

89 Consultation Paper, Question 10–4.
90 Ibid, Question 10–5.
91 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010.
93 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
18.97 The Women’s Legal Service Victoria, while supporting the principle of improving the evidentiary value of application form information, cautioned against ‘making the process too onerous and/or time consuming when the crucial focus is immediate and/or urgent protection’ and stated that the ‘right balance between expediency and increased evidentiary value will have to be struck’.96

18.98 A number of stakeholders did not support a requirement that applications for protection orders be sworn or affirmed.97 Legal Aid NSW and the Law Society NSW submitted that:

People should be able to apply for a protection order as inexpensively as possible. If the application needs to be sworn, self-represented applicants who have an application cobbled together by a registrar, or police applicants where the application is rushed, may be significantly disadvantaged.98

Opportunity to provide affidavit evidence

18.99 A number of stakeholders preferred that applicants be given an opportunity to provide affidavit evidence if they wished, rather than be required to swear or affirm applications.99 The Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network submitted that affidavits ‘provide applicants with a means to outline the issues in dispute, provide a historical outline of the violence they have experienced, and assist in providing clarity where applications have been poorly drafted’. The Network stated that, given women are often required to ‘give a statement when in a highly emotive state at the scene of the incident, the provision of further affidavit evidence at a later date provides the victim with the opportunity to provide further and more accurate information’.100

18.100 A confidential submission noted that applications in the Northern Territory are accompanied by an affidavit or statutory declaration and that this approach seems to be working well, with registry staff support.101

18.101 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria stated that views are divided as to whether or not the applicant should be given the opportunity to provide additional affidavit evidence in support of the application:

Some say that there should be an opportunity for an affidavit at the preliminary stage partly because this could be used to support family law proceedings. Others suggest 96 Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010.

97 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
98 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. Also Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
100 Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010. Also Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. that use of affidavits early in proceedings without prior legal advice can create difficulties for both parties and perhaps polarize parties. However, this is more relevant in family law rather than family violence related issues. Those with this view consider their use should be limited to later stages of the proceeding with specific directions from a magistrate as to the issues which should be addressed in the affidavit.\footnote{Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.}

18.102 The Queensland Law Society expressed a similar view, noting that, in Queensland, there is nothing to prevent applicants executing affidavits in support of their applications and that if the application is contested and the parties are legally represented, judicial officers will often direct affidavits to be filed prior to a final hearing.\footnote{Ibid.} However, concern was expressed that requiring affidavit evidence at the commencement of proceedings could deny access to justice and increase the administrative burden on police.\footnote{Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010.}

18.103 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria expressed concerns about the implications of providing written evidence in protection order proceedings where family law proceedings are pending:

There may ... be difficulties where an affidavit is prepared for family violence proceedings in urgent circumstances and in accordance with a pro forma—and where a subsequent and more time considered family law affidavit contains different information. This may lead to adverse conclusions about a victim’s credibility. It may not be wise to use an affidavit in protection order proceedings if subsequent family law proceedings are likely. It may also be preferable not to put details on an affidavit in the Family Court prior to the [protection] order hearing so as not to expose the applicant to cross examination about that material.\footnote{Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic
2010; Confidential, Submission FV 68, 2 June 2010.}

18.104 A number of stakeholders supported providing applicants the opportunity to present affidavit evidence in support of their application, but emphasised the need for legal and non-legal support.\footnote{National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.} For example, the National Abuse Free Contact Campaign submitted that:

This is a time when women are at their most vulnerable and often traumatized by their experiences of violence and abuse. Providing support will only aid in them being able to provide clear evidence to the court, thus allowing a just response to their experiences of violence.\footnote{Ibid.}
Women’s Legal Service Victoria submitted that providing affidavit evidence may be too time consuming, especially where there are language barriers and other issues such as mental health or substance abuse. Women’s Legal Services NSW highlighted the legal costs involved in providing affidavit evidence, and noted that providing such evidence does not remove the need to give oral evidence and be cross-examined at hearing.

Standard form of affidavit

Some stakeholders considered that a standard form of affidavit could be of assistance to victims of family violence. The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria noted that ‘using the same or consistently worded forms in all state and federal spheres would assist in harmonising the legislative frameworks and most importantly the understanding of the parties’.

Other stakeholders submitted that a standard form of affidavit for family violence applicants would not be appropriate. Family violence comes in many ways, shapes and forms, and to provide victims with a ‘tick-a-box’ affidavit may send them a message that if their situation does not fall neatly into the options provided, then they have not experienced family violence as defined by the legislation and the form they are required to fill out. Victims need to be able to tell their own story how they see fit.

Similarly, the Law Council noted that the ‘danger of a standard form affidavit although potentially user-friendly, is that it by definition standardizes cases’. In this context, ‘no two family violence cases are the same and the evidence required in support of any application ought not be treated in that way’.

The Law Council suggested that affidavit forms could instead include a brief explanation of what constitutes the conduct which may be complained of under the legislation, which may assist applicants in completing the affidavit to support their application.

Commissions’ views

An aspiration of this Inquiry is to improve the quality of evidence relating to family violence in protection order proceedings. Improving evidence of family violence not only benefits victims in obtaining a protection order, but also maximises... the potential for the use of such evidence in federal family courts, in the event of family law proceedings.

18.111 Requiring applicants to swear or affirm their written evidence is likely to cause them to reflect more fully on the accuracy and veracity of their statements, particularly because there are offences for making false statements. The act of swearing or affirming a written statement is analogous to giving oral testimony in court—which is required to be sworn or affirmed. Swearing or affirming written evidence is a key way to improve the quality of evidence before state and territory courts, and its consequent usefulness in any related federal family court proceedings.
For example, if a protection order is made by consent, the value of supporting evidence is reduced when it is unsworn or unaffirmed—particularly in pending or concurrent family law proceedings.116

18.112 Sworn or affirmed written evidence also provides state and territory courts with an account of the facts on which an application for a protection order is based, and may facilitate the making of ex parte and interim orders. Written evidence generally has a number of advantages over oral evidence, as it allows applicants to present information about family violence clearly; and may be less intimidating for victims than giving oral evidence. Further, respondents may be more likely to consent to protection orders where the basis of the application is set out in writing, as discussed below.

18.113 However, application forms for protection orders generally seek a range of information—not all of which is directed to establishing the basis for the application.
For example, application forms, to varying degrees, seek information about the existence of orders in other jurisdictions—including parenting orders and children’s court orders—and relevant pending or current proceedings. They may also require an applicant to indicate which conditions are sought in the protection order. Therefore, it is unnecessary and undesirable to require applicants to swear or affirm the entire application form.

18.114 It is unnecessary because, to the extent that the information sought in application forms is irrelevant to the factual basis for the application, it does little to improve the evidence of family violence. In addition, to the extent that the application forms seek information that is not solely within the knowledge of the applicant—for example, the existence of orders or proceedings—there may be other mechanisms available to the court to obtain this information.117 It is undesirable because it may cause applicants—for example, due to a lack of understanding of the legal system—to give incorrect or incomplete information about the existence of orders or proceedings in other jurisdictions, exposing them to penalties for making false statements.

---

116 If a protection order is ultimately made by consent, the only evidence before the court may be that given to obtain an interim order and that may be oral evidence, which a respondent has not heard.
117 See Ch 30 which discusses information sharing and the establishment of a national register. See also
Rec 16–11.
However, the Commissions consider that it is important that applicants swear or affirm the facts and circumstances that form the basis of their application for a protection order for the reasons set out above—principally improving the quality of evidence in protection order proceedings. Applicants are uniquely situated to give evidence about their personal experiences and the fear that has led them to seek a protection order. The Commissions, therefore, recommend that application forms should require that persons seeking protection swear or affirm a statement incorporated in, or attached to, the application form. However, the Commissions do not consider that it is necessary for this procedural requirement to be placed in state and territory family violence legislation. The Commissions consider that there should be some flexibility for courts to accept applications which do not comply with procedural requirements—especially when the person seeking protection is vulnerable.

The Commissions acknowledge that requiring applicants to swear or affirm their statements supporting their application for protection orders may increase legal costs and disadvantage unrepresented and vulnerable parties. However, the Commissions consider that these concerns are addressed, in part, by other recommendations made in this Report, including: the provision of culturally appropriate victim support services, and enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups; and the establishment of specialist family violence courts, which include victim support—both legal and non-legal.

Where a police officer makes an application on behalf of a victim of family violence, the Commissions consider that the application form should require the police officer to certify the form—although the victim should retain the option of providing a sworn or affirmed statement. Police certification may have particular relevance where the victim is a child, young person, vulnerable or otherwise unable to comply with the requirement.

Recommendation 18–2 Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should require that applicants swear or affirm a statement incorporated in, or attached to, the application form, setting out the basis of the application. Where the applicant is a police officer, the application form should require the police officer to certify the form.

Oral evidence

Giving oral evidence of personal details and traumatic events of family violence can be intimidating for victims, particularly in the presence of the person alleged to have used family violence or in a public courtroom. There are concerns that such fears about giving evidence mean that victims of family violence may not seek protection orders.

118 Rec 29–3.
119 Rec 20–1.
120 Rec 20–3. See also Rec 20–4.
18. Evidence of Family Violence

18.119 For example, the Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit submitted that the Northern Territory requirements for protection order applicants to give oral evidence are ‘the most significant factor preventing applicants from proceeding to hearing in contested applications, despite the need for safety to be prioritised’. 121

18.120 Written evidence may obviate the need for a hearing as, once the respondent has been provided with details of the complaint and supporting statements or affidavits, this can result in consent orders, saving precious court time. Further, the same material may be relied on in other proceedings, if necessary.

18.121 However, there are also some advantages in giving oral evidence, including that it may be quicker and easier for applicants than making a written statement or affidavit. 122 State and territory courts have also adopted a number of strategies to improve the experience of victims of family violence in protection order proceedings in view of the potential for intimidation in the face-to-face context noted above. These include the use of closed courts; closed circuit television (CCTV) and other technologies; and prohibitions on cross-examination by the respondent. This section briefly considers the desirability of adopting any of these strategies more broadly. 123

Closed or open court proceedings

18.122 Principles of open justice generally require that court proceedings should be open to the public. Accordingly, most family violence legislation contains an express or implied presumption that protection order proceedings will be held in open court. However, legislation in most jurisdictions permits or requires the court to be closed in certain circumstances, which differ across Australian jurisdictions. 124 For example, in protection order proceedings:

- in NSW, where a child is a person seeking protection or is a witness, the court must be closed unless the court directs otherwise; 125

- in Victoria, the court may be closed, or certain people excluded, if the court considers it necessary to prevent an affected family member, protected person or witness from being caused undue distress or embarrassment; 126

- in Western Australia, the court must be closed if the applicant wants the first hearing of the application to be held in the absence of the respondent; 127

---

121 The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010.
123 Aspects of some of these issues are also discussed in relation to sexual assault proceedings in Part G.
124 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 58; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 68; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) ss 26–27; Family Violence Protection Act 2004 (Tas) s 31(1); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Regulation 2009 (ACT) reg 13; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 106. The Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) does not address this issue.
125 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 41.
126 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 68.
127 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 27.
in the ACT, the court can order that proceedings be closed if it is in the public interest or the interests of justice to do so; and in the Northern Territory, the court must be closed if the only person seeking protection is a child, or when a vulnerable witness gives evidence, unless the court directs otherwise.

18.123 In Queensland, in contrast, legislation provides that a court hearing an application for a protection order ‘is not to be open to the public’; but ‘may open the proceedings or part of the proceedings to the public or specified persons’.

18.124 In its review of family violence laws, the VLRC observed that protection order proceedings in closed court may ‘significantly reduce the stress of having unidentified people hearing intimate details about the parties’ family circumstances’. On the other hand, it is important to ensure that ‘courts do not reinforce the view that family violence is a private matter’ and that ‘the system is open to public scrutiny’. The VLRC recommended that a magistrate should have discretion to order that the court be closed for protection order proceedings, and for criminal prosecutions involving acts of family violence.

Using CCTV in giving evidence

18.125 Some jurisdictions provide ‘alternative’ or ‘special’ arrangements for the giving of evidence by defined categories of witness. These regimes provide a range of measures dealing with the giving of contemporaneous evidence by closed circuit television (CCTV) or video-links or the use of screening to restrict contact between parties.

18.126 As discussed in Chapter 19, such measures are most commonly used in relation to the evidence of child witnesses or complainants in sexual assault proceedings. However, in some jurisdictions, such vulnerable witness protections extend to applicants in protection order proceedings.

18.127 For example, in Victoria, a court may direct that ‘alternative arrangements be made for a proceeding in respect of a family violence intervention order’ by, for example, permitting the use of CCTV; using screens to remove the respondent from a party’s or witness’ direct line of vision; and permitting the presence of a person providing emotional support while a party or witness gives evidence.

18.128 In New South Wales, alternative arrangements for complainants giving evidence in sexual offence proceedings apply (with any necessary modifications) to the

---

128 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Regulation 2009 (ACT) regs 14, 15.
129 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 106.
130 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 81.
132 Ibid.
133 Ibid, Rec 142.
134 For example, Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294B; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 13.
135 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 69.
giving of evidence in apprehended violence order proceedings, but only if the ‘defendant in the proceedings is a person who is charged with a prescribed sexual offence’ and ‘the protected person is the alleged victim of the offence’.137

Cross-examination by a person who has allegedly used violence

18.129 Many parties to protection order proceedings represent themselves, including persons seeking protection and persons alleged to have used violence. Unless legislation provides otherwise, a person who is not represented by legal counsel may have a right to cross-examine witnesses. This can be problematic where the respondent is unrepresented and cross-examines the person seeking protection. As noted in a submission to the VLRC in its review of family violence laws in Victoria in 2006:

> I have experienced [personal cross-examination by the respondent] firsthand, and can say that to be cross-examined by the respondent and to have to cross-examine the respondent myself, is not a position I would wish on anyone. I was unprepared, overwhelmed and scared of the prospect of having to look at this man, little less have to talk to him and ask/answer questions.138

18.130 The VLRC recommended that a person against whom allegations of violence have been made should not be able to cross-examine the person seeking protection, any family members of the parties, or any other person the court declares to be a ‘protected witness’ in protection order proceedings.139 This recommendation was implemented in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).140

18.131 There are also restrictions, in family violence legislation in Western Australia, South Australia and the Northern Territory, on personal cross-examination by those alleged to have used violence.141 In these jurisdictions, the unrepresented party may submit his or her questions to the court, which the court or an authorised person will then ask the witness. Under the Victorian legislation, a court must adjourn proceedings to provide the party with a reasonable opportunity to obtain legal representation for the purpose of cross-examination.142 If he or she does not obtain legal representation after being given a reasonable opportunity to do so, the court must order Victoria Legal Aid to offer legal representation for that purpose. Victoria Legal Aid is required to comply with this order.143

Submissions and consultations

18.132 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether the provisions in state and territory family violence legislation that allow the court to hear protection... order proceedings in closed court are effective in protecting vulnerable applicants and witnesses.\textsuperscript{144}

18.133 The Commissions also proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should prohibit a person who has allegedly used family violence from personally cross-examining, in protection order proceedings, a person against whom he or she has allegedly used family violence. The proposal stated that any person conducting such cross-examination should be a legal practitioner representing the interests of the person who has allegedly used family violence.\textsuperscript{145}

Open or closed court?

18.134 A number of stakeholders considered that current provisions that allow courts to hear protection order proceedings in closed courts were effective.\textsuperscript{146} The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria considered that the decision about whether a court should be closed should be at the discretion of the judicial officer. Open courts were said to be important in protection order proceedings:

> Open courts enable other parties to see and understand the nature of the proceedings and how the procedure works before they have to give evidence or participate in the proceedings in other ways. Open courts also facilitate community education about family violence and court processes.\textsuperscript{147}

18.135 Some stakeholders expressed the view that provisions allowing closed courts were not always effective in protecting vulnerable applicants and witnesses. For example, victims may still be subject to aggressive cross-examination or verbal abuse in the court room by legal counsel and the respondent.\textsuperscript{148} The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) stated that, while Tasmanian legislation allows for closed courts in family violence matters, the judiciary are reluctant to use the provisions in many cases.\textsuperscript{149}

18.136 National Legal Aid commented that the Queensland requirement that protection order proceedings generally be held in closed court is appropriate and works well.\textsuperscript{150} The Queensland Law Society agreed that this provision has proved effective, but noted that the administration of it varies from court to court. The Queensland Law Society stated that it would not be appropriate to exclude support workers from the court.\textsuperscript{151} However, Women’s Legal Service Queensland observed that current practice does allow for a court assistance or other support person to be present.\textsuperscript{152}

\textsuperscript{144} Consultation Paper, Questions 10–7, 10–8.
\textsuperscript{145} Ibid, Proposal 10–4.
\textsuperscript{146} Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{147} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{148} C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{149} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{150} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{151} Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{152} Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
18. Evidence of Family Violence

18.137 Women’s Legal Services Australia noted as a general observation, that variations between state and territories, and within particular jurisdictions, make it difficult to gauge the effectiveness of the strategies that have been put in place for vulnerable applicants and witnesses:

In particular in rural and remote areas it is highly questionable as to whether victims of family violence are able to obtain the protections provided to vulnerable applicants and witnesses. For example, in the APY lands applications for protection orders are often heard in open court and sometimes the victim is only sitting two or three spaces away from the defendant.153

18.138 In relation to the use of CCTV and other alternative arrangements for the giving of evidence, a number of stakeholders suggested that provisions applying to sexual offence proceedings should be extended to cover protection order proceedings.154 For example, Women’s Legal Service Victoria stated that:

The operation of a closed or open court and victims being able to remain in a remote room for the duration of their time in court is of great assistance to clients who are very relieved such a service exists, especially where they are in grave fear of the offender.155

Restrictions on cross-examination

18.139 A number of stakeholders supported the Commissions’ proposal to prohibit personal cross-examination in protection order proceedings by a person who has allegedly used family violence.156 Stakeholders expressed concern about the possible use of court processes to harass victims of family violence,157 and submitted that some victims would rather not go through with getting a protection order, than be cross-

---

153 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
examined in this way, in what may amount to ‘another form of psychological abuse inflicted on the victim by the perpetrator’.158

18.140 It was observed that, while ‘the questioning of vulnerable witnesses by unrepresented accused in sexual offence trials is widely recognised as unacceptable’, applications for protection orders are ‘no different in the relevant dynamics, and, may in fact involve sexual offences, making such court processes a direct comparison’.159

18.141 A number of stakeholders were concerned about the implications for the provision of legal aid of the Commissions’ proposal that only a legal representative be permitted to cross-examine the applicant;160 or suggested that legal representation should not be mandatory.161 Others supported the Victorian model, under which legal aid must be provided.162

Commissions’ views

18.142 In considering judicial discretion to close courts during protection order proceedings the overarching principle of open justice needs to be balanced against the purposes of the protection order regime—providing safety and protection for victims of family violence.

18.143 Where open court proceedings inhibit a victim of family violence or another witness from giving evidence, inadequate or incomplete evidence may be adduced, with repercussions for the victim, the particular proceedings and flow-on effects for related family law proceedings.

18.144 On the other hand, conducting proceedings in open court ensures that the system is open to public scrutiny, may reinforce the obligation on all witnesses to tell the truth and ensures family violence does not remain relegated to the private realm.

18.145 There is some variation in the provisions in state and territory family violence legislation regarding the power to close the court. While the grounds vary, judicial officers hearing protection order proceedings in most states and territories have a discretion to close courts. In Queensland, the starting point is that the court will be closed, unless the court orders otherwise.

---

161 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
18.146  The Commissions consider the Queensland approach, on its face, as more protective of the interests of applicants in protection order proceedings and likely to lead to more hearings in closed court. However, there is currently insufficient information to compare how state and territory procedures operate in practice. In any case, there are good reasons why some protection order proceedings should be conducted in open court. Given that stakeholders have stated that existing provisions appear to be operating satisfactorily, the Commissions make no recommendation for reform.

18.147  There are good arguments, however, for extending ‘alternative’ or ‘special’ arrangements for the giving of evidence by vulnerable witnesses to witnesses who are victims of family violence, including in protection order proceedings. For example, stakeholders suggested that the relevant provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) should be amended so that victims of family violence are afforded the same protection as victims of sexual assault when giving evidence in court.164

18.148  The Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) is examining vulnerable witness protections through the SCAG National Working Group on Evidence. The Working Group is expected to consider aspects of ‘alternative’ or ‘special’ arrangements for the giving of evidence.165 The Terms of Reference instruct the ALRC, in undertaking this inquiry, to be ‘careful not to duplicate … the work being undertaken through SCAG on the harmonisation of uniform evidence laws, in particular the development of model … vulnerable witness protections’. The Commissions suggest that this aspect of vulnerable witness protection should be considered by the Working Group.

18.149  The Commissions recognise concerns about allowing a person who has allegedly used family violence to personally cross-examine a victim of that violence. This provides an opportunity for a person to misuse legal proceedings and exert power and control over the victim of his or her family violence. Considering the nature and dynamics of family violence, this may significantly inhibit the ability of a victim, or another witness, to provide truthful and complete evidence in protection order proceedings.

18.150  State and territory family violence legislation should prohibit a person, who has allegedly used family violence, from personally cross-examining a person against whom he or she is alleged to have used family violence. Rather, if cross-examination is allowed, an unrepresented respondent should be permitted to examine the applicant through a person appointed by the court to ask questions on behalf of the respondent. This is consistent with the Commissions’ recommendations about cross-examination by unrepresented defendants in sexual assault proceedings.166

---

163  Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294B.
164  Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Apprehended Violence Legal Issues Coordinating Committee, Submission FV 228, 12 July 2010.
166  See Rec 28–5.
Outcomes of protection order proceedings

18.151 The final section of this chapter considers three outcomes of protection order proceedings that may be particularly problematic where parties are also engaged, or likely to be engaged, in family law proceedings. These are where:

- a person seeking a protection order agrees to withdraw the application on the basis of undertakings given by the respondent to the court;
- a protection order is made by consent; and
- the respondent to an existing protection order makes a ‘cross application’ for a protection order against the person who sought the original order, resulting in mutual orders.

18.152 This section also considers provisions in state and territory family violence legislation which address the misuse of protection order proceedings—in particular, provisions to prevent vexatious litigation.

Undertakings

18.153 A person seeking a protection order may agree to withdraw his or her application on the basis that the person against whom the protection order is sought (the respondent) provides an undertaking. An undertaking is a promise to the court that a person will do, or refrain from doing, certain things. Usually, the undertaking will include the same types of conditions and prohibitions which could have been included in the protection order had it been issued. Undertakings may either be given orally by the respondent or the respondent’s lawyer, or given in writing and signed. It is also possible for both the applicant and respondent to give undertakings to the court.

18.154 Some stakeholders expressed the view that undertakings perform an important role in protection order proceedings. For example, the Gosnells Community Legal Centre submitted that undertakings:

> provide an opportunity for the parties to negotiate and resolve the matter without the need for a trial, which generally speaking is something which the victims are anxious of and keen to avoid. It also is of a benefit to the perpetrator, as it is not an order of the court; however they are still held accountable for their actions.167

18.155 However, stakeholders also expressed a number of concerns about the use of undertakings in protection order proceedings.

---

18. Evidence of Family Violence

First, unlike breach of a protection order, breach of an undertaking is not a criminal offence and cannot be enforced. Agreeing to an undertaking instead of pursuing an application for a protection order may, therefore, compromise the protection and safety of a victim of family violence. For this reason, some stakeholders disagreed in principle with the idea that undertakings should be used. Stakeholders noted that victims of family violence who have accepted an undertaking often return to court to seek a protection order because the undertaking has been breached. In such cases, both the undertaking and the breach may be used as evidence in support of an application for a protection order.

Secondly, there is a concern that victims of family violence may be pressured into withdrawing an application for a protection order and accepting an undertaking, particularly where that party is unrepresented.

Finally, the Initiating Application (Family Law) form, which must be completed by a person wishing to commence proceedings in a federal family court, asks if there are any existing undertakings to a court about family violence issues concerning any of the parties or children in the application. There is, however, no obligation on parties to inform a court exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act about undertakings in relation to family violence, nor is the existence of an undertaking a specified factor to be considered when determining the best interests of a child. A number of stakeholders expressed the view that while information about undertakings is sometimes included in affidavits, federal family courts give them little weight because undertakings are not orders of a court.

Submissions and consultations

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions suggested measures to ensure that the applicant and respondent are both advised of the nature and effect of undertakings. The Commissions proposed that, before accepting an undertaking, a state or territory court should be satisfied that:

- the applicant understands the implications of withdrawing the application and relying instead on undertakings to the court by the respondent; and
- the respondent understands that, in accepting an undertaking rather than pursuing an application for a protection order, the applicant is not precluded from making a further application if the respondent does not honour the undertaking, or the applicant continues to be at risk of family violence.177

18.160 The Commissions also proposed that an undertaking should be given in writing, rather than orally to the court.178 This would allow both parties to keep a copy of the undertaking, reducing the potential for ambiguity or confusion about the scope or content of the undertaking.

18.161 Stakeholders recognised that, in many cases, undertakings perform an important role in protection order proceedings. Most stakeholders agreed with the Commissions’ proposals to ensure both parties are advised of the nature and effect of undertakings.179

18.162 A number of stakeholders emphasised the importance of ensuring that parties, particularly unrepresented parties, understand the implications of giving and accepting an undertaking.180 For example, Legal Aid NSW and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network commented:

If undertakings are proposed all parties should be properly and appropriately informed of the limitations of undertakings compared to protection orders and the lack of consequences of any breach. Specifically, the court should reinforce to the applicant

---

177 Consultation Paper, Proposal 10–2.
that they have a right to seek a protection order rather than accepting an undertaking.\textsuperscript{181}

18.163 Some stakeholders submitted that family violence legislation should be amended to require judicial officers to explain the effect of undertakings and to require undertakings to be in writing.\textsuperscript{182} The Queensland Law Society supported this proposal, provided judicial discretion to refuse to accept an undertaking was maintained. It suggested information about how to deal appropriately with undertakings could be included in judicial bench books, rather than formalising the process for undertakings in legislation.\textsuperscript{183}

18.164 Other stakeholders suggested that the provision of legal and non-legal support services at court would help parties understand undertakings.\textsuperscript{184} Domestic Violence Victoria and others submitted that:

Providing information to an applicant about the implications of a decision to accept an undertaking is critical and is best provided by appropriate support at court. However, clear written material can also assist applicants (and non-legal support workers) to understand the impact of accepting an undertaking.\textsuperscript{185}

18.165 Two stakeholders suggested that there should be a standard form for written undertakings, which sets out information about undertakings and includes a space for parties to sign to acknowledge that they understand the effect of the undertaking.\textsuperscript{186} The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria explained that:

The Courts have developed a form of written undertaking which identifies that an undertaking is not the same as an intervention order and cannot be enforced by police. This has been operating for many years and has improved the community’s understanding of the limited value of undertakings.\textsuperscript{187}

18.166 A number of stakeholders emphasised the need to ensure that undertakings are only offered and accepted in appropriate cases—that is, where there is a low possibility of a later breach of the undertaking. They emphasised that, where there is a pattern of family violence, an undertaking may not be appropriate and the victim should receive support to seek a protection order.\textsuperscript{188}

\textsuperscript{181} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

\textsuperscript{182} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

\textsuperscript{183} Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{184} Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{185} Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{186} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{187} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

Finally, stakeholders in the Northern Territory emphasised the usefulness of undertakings in protecting victims of family violence. In particular, respondents often fear that a protection order will result in the loss of their gun licence, making them more likely to oppose a protection order, and more willing to agree to undertakings.¹⁸⁹

Commissions’ views

Undertakings given in protection order proceedings may form part of the factual circumstances and evidence of family violence that should be considered by the family court. In Chapter 17, the Commissions recommend that the Family Law Act should be amended to require a court to consider any family violence—including evidence given, or findings made, in relevant protection order proceedings—when determining what is in the best interests of the child.¹⁹⁰ This requirement would include evidence that undertakings about family violence were given to a court in protection order proceedings. The weight to be given to an undertaking in such cases would be determined by the federal family court in all the circumstances of the case.

The Commissions recognise that a victim of family violence may wish to avoid a contest in court and may therefore agree to withdraw his or her application for a protection order on the basis that the respondent gives an undertaking not to engage in family violence or other proscribed conduct. In such cases, the Commissions consider that it is essential that both parties understand the effect of the undertaking. In particular, it is important that the parties understand that breach of an undertaking is not a criminal offence and cannot be enforced by police. Further, the respondent should also understand that, in accepting an undertaking rather than pursuing an application for a protection order, the applicant is not precluded from making a further application if the respondent does not honour the undertaking, or the applicant continues to be at risk of family violence.

In the Commissions’ view, the most effective way to ensure that parties are advised of these matters is to require that undertakings be given in writing on a standard form. The form should clearly set out the effect of an undertaking and require both the applicant and the respondent to state that they agree to the specific undertaking and acknowledge the nature and effect of an undertaking to the court.

Requiring that the undertaking be given in writing, rather than orally to the court, also means that both parties can have a copy of the undertaking which reduces the potential for ambiguity or confusion about the scope or content of the undertaking. A requirement that undertakings be given in writing also facilitates consideration of the undertaking by federal family courts, in that it can easily be attached to an application or affidavit given in family law proceedings.

The Commissions do not consider it strictly necessary for this requirement to be set out in family violence legislation in each state and territory. The objectives could also be achieved by amendments to court rules, practice notes or bench books, or by ¹⁹⁰  Rec 17–1.

Evidence of Family Violence

18. Stakeholders have expressed concerns that undertakings are only accepted by courts in appropriate circumstances—such as where there is an isolated incidence of family violence, or a low possibility that the undertaking will be breached— and where there is no undue pressure or intimidation by the respondent. In addition to ensuring that parties have access to appropriate legal advice and support, education and training for judicial officers about the nature of family violence and the appropriate use of undertakings to the court in family violence matters would help address this concern.

Recommendation 18–4

State and territory courts should require that undertakings by a person against whom a protection order is sought should be in writing on a standard form. The form should require each party to sign an acknowledgment that he or she understands that:

(a) breach of an undertaking is not a criminal offence nor can it be otherwise enforced;
(b) the court’s acceptance of an undertaking does not preclude further action by the applicant to address family violence; and
(c) evidence of breach of an undertaking may be used in later proceedings.

Protection orders made by consent

18. All state and territory family violence legislation includes provisions that allow a court to make a final protection order where the applicant and the respondent consent to the order. These provisions generally provide that:

- if the order is made by consent, the court is not required to make any findings as to whether the grounds for making the order are satisfied—for example, that there has been a particular act of family violence; and
- a court can make an order on the basis that the respondent disputes some or all of the allegations made in the application—that is, ‘without admissions’.

It is important to note, however, that a court is not obliged to make a protection order simply because the parties have consented to that order—for example, a court may refuse to make an order if it believes that the order may pose a risk to the safety of one of the parties or a child.\footnote{194}

18.176 Stakeholders expressed particular concerns about the interaction between protection orders made by consent and federal family law proceedings. As discussed above, s 60CC(3)(k) of the \textit{Family Law Act} requires a federal family court, when determining what is in the best interests of a child, to consider any protection order that applies to the child or a member of the child’s family, but only if the protection order is a final order or its making was contested.

18.177 Where a final protection order is made by consent, it will fall within the kinds of protection orders that may be considered by a federal family court under s 60CC of the \textit{Family Law Act}. While the Explanatory Memorandum to the 2006 amendments, which introduced the provision, stated that the intention of the provision was ‘to ensure that the court does not take account of uncontested’ protection orders,\footnote{195} the words of s 60CC(3)(k)—which direct a court to consider a protection order if ‘the order is a final order; or the making of the order was contested by a person’—arguably suggest otherwise as a consent order is a final order. However, it has been suggested that protection orders made by consent, particularly consent without admissions, may be understandably seen to have less weight when it comes to proving allegations of family violence in family law proceedings.\footnote{196}

18.178 A number of factors contribute to the fact that a large percentage of protection orders are made by consent, and commonly by consent without admission of liability.

18.179 By consenting to a protection order, both parties may avoid having to attend a contested hearing before a magistrate, often on another day, and ensure that an order is in place to protect the person from family violence within a short period of time.\footnote{197} This benefits the parties as well as the court, as matters are resolved quickly and without the need for further hearings.

18.180 Further, by making a protection order by consent without admissions, the respondent can consent to the protection order being in place without admitting to any of the allegations made against him or her. This protects the respondent’s legal rights with respect to other legal proceedings, both criminal and civil, in which he or she may be involved. Sometimes the respondent may consent without admissions to a protection order without rejecting the claim of family violence.
order in circumstances where there are no potential legal proceedings. One stakeholder noted that:

Situations arise where defendants do not agree with the facts as portrayed by the applicant, but are happy to stay away. In this case, accepting the terms of the restraining order, while making a public statement that they are not guilty of any of the behaviours justifying it, is a happy compromise for both parties.198

18.181 Similar considerations may inform a decision to consent to a protection order in a situation where protection orders are made against both parties as the result of a cross-application.

18.182 In addition to the limited evidentiary value such orders have in family law proceedings, there are some drawbacks to the practice of making consent orders without admissions. In particular, the Commissions have heard throughout this Inquiry that an applicant for a protection order may rarely be given an opportunity to oppose the order being made without admissions. This means that the applicant loses the opportunity to put detailed evidence before the court and for the court to make findings of family violence. Professor Rosemary Hunter has noted that this means there are few findings by the courts that allegations of family violence are true. In her view, this ‘lack of institutional affirmation of women’s stories of abuse’ reinforces notions that women invent or exaggerate allegations of family violence and use the legal system for collateral purposes.199

18.183 Hunter also expressed concerns about courts relying on consent in the context of family violence which is characterised by the exercise of power and control by one partner over the other.200 The consent of the applicant is particularly relevant where the person against whom the order is to be made seeks to vary the terms of the order. In such circumstances, courts should not assume that the parties have equal negotiating power, or that intimidation or threats will not influence the consent given by a victim of family violence.

Submissions and consultations

18.184 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed several options to improve the scrutiny and quality of the processes by which protection orders are made by consent. The Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should place an obligation on judicial officers, when making orders by consent, to ensure that:

- the notation on protection orders and court files specifically states that the order is made by consent ‘without admission as to criminal liability of the allegations in the application for the protection order’;

200 Ibid, 95.
the applicant has an opportunity to oppose an order being made by consent without admissions;

- the order gives attention to the safety of victims and, if appropriate, requires that a written safety plan accompanies the order; and

- the parties are aware of the practical consequences of consenting to a protection order without admission of liability.

18.185 While some submissions expressed support for the proposal in general, a number of stakeholders commented separately on specific aspects of the proposal.

‘By consent and without admission’ notation

18.186 A number of stakeholders supported the proposal that the notation on protection orders specifically state that the order is made by consent ‘without admission as to criminal liability of the allegations in the application for the protection order’. For example, Women’s Legal Service Victoria submitted that:

Even [in] instances where a person has been apprehended by police due to very serious injury to the victim, the offender usually resolves the matter by consent without admissions. In almost all instances, orders are made by consent without admissions and the Magistrate will not probe further. It is our view that such orders should instead be made by consent without admissions as to criminal liability. That way, it is clear to future judicial officers in other jurisdictions that that the offender is not denying the fact of family violence but is seeking to protect himself from criminal liability.

18.187 However, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria noted that respondents may also be liable for civil compensation and, as such, the ‘without admissions’ notation cannot be limited to criminal proceedings. Similarly, protection orders made by consent without admissions are made in a range of circumstances other than where there are potential criminal charges.

201 Consultation Paper, Proposal 10–1.

204 Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010.

205 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

Opportunity to oppose the order being made by consent

18.188 Some stakeholders emphasised the importance of victims having an opportunity to oppose a protection order being made by consent without admissions, and submitted that an applicant may have strong evidence of family violence and should be given the opportunity to present it to the court. These stakeholders supported the view that a federal family court, when considering parenting orders, should look behind the protection order to the factual circumstances of family violence, rather than be limited by concerns about whether the order was made by consent or consent without admissions.207

18.189 The Local Court of NSW submitted that parties may still bring some matters before the court, even where the order is made by consent. It noted that NSW family violence legislation allows a court to make orders by consent, while still enabling the court to conduct a hearing as to the particulars of the application if required in the interests of justice. A situation that often arises is where a defendant consents to the making of an order, but there is some disagreement as to the appropriate conditions.208

18.190 A number of stakeholders expressed concerns about providing applicants with an opportunity to oppose the protection order being made by consent. In particular, some stakeholders identified practical and resource implications of greater judicial scrutiny in magistrate’s courts. For example, the Law Society of NSW submitted:

An order made by consent without admissions is one means of getting a quick and acceptable result for the parties and the courts. To be able to set such matters down for hearing will test the resources of the courts, increase delays for litigants and hence potentially increase tensions in family situations. The object of reducing family violence would not be served by this proposal.209

18.191 While the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria also recognised the considerable resource implications associated with the proposal, the Courts accepted that applicants should be allowed this option.210 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria noted that, in practice, it would be difficult to get legal aid funding to contest a protection order on this basis.211

18.192 In addition, the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) considered that the proposal was ‘problematic’ because ‘the benefit of requiring the State courts to have the hearing when the factual determination is really something wanted in another

208 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.

209 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.

210 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

Family Violence — A National Legal Response

proceeding may be seen as a cost-shifting exercise’. Stakeholders also queried whether it would be warranted to spend additional court time hearing opposition to orders where immediate safety concerns are being met by the orders.

Ensuring the order gives attention to the safety of the victim

While supporting the need to ensure that the protection order adequately protects the applicant from the risk of family violence, some stakeholders queried the role of a safety plan in consent orders. A number of stakeholders submitted that, because the conditions in the protection order are designed to protect the applicant’s safety, a separate safety plan is unnecessary. Others considered that while there may be value in a safety plan, its preparation may delay the process of issuing a protection order.

The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria noted that ‘many safety plans will not be effective if their contents are known to the respondent’ and considered that it may be more appropriate to enable the court to direct the preparation of a safety plan without a requirement for the plan to accompany an order.

The Shoalcoast Community Legal Centre questioned whether a judicial officer should be involved in the preparation of a safety plan and submitted it may be a task better performed by a support service with properly trained staff on the basis that it would require extensive case management and training to work with a victim to determine the complexities of a safety plan.

Explanation of the consequences of consent without admissions

A number of stakeholders stated that there is value in requiring judicial officers to explain to the parties the practical consequences of consent without admission of liability. The Queensland Law Society submitted that it is particularly important for judicial officers to explain the practical consequences of consenting to a protection order without admission of liability to an unrepresented party. It noted that judicial officers and magistrates as well as police prosecutors regularly explain the consequences of consenting to protection orders to respondents.

The Local Court NSW noted that s 76 of the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) requires judicial officers to explain the effect and

212 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
215 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
216 Shoalcoast Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 141, 24 June 2010.
217 Shoalcoast Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 141, 24 June 2010.
218 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
219 Shoalcoast Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 141, 24 June 2010.
18. Evidence of Family Violence consequences of the protection order and the rights of the parties to the defendant and the protected person when making the order.\textsuperscript{220} It added that:

In determining how a matter is to proceed, it is also commonplace for magistrates to explain the option of consenting without admission to the parties. However, the main shortcoming with these measures is that a defendant or protected person may not be in attendance when an order is made, with the consequences that magistrates are not able to ensure that the parties are informed of the matters set out in s 76.\textsuperscript{221}

18.198 Conversely, Anita Brunacci submitted that advice in relation to the practical consequences of ‘without admissions’ orders is not the place of the court and could be seen as a matter for the provision of legal advice.\textsuperscript{222}

Other implications of the proposal

18.199 Some stakeholders noted that consent orders are an important option for victims of family violence and that care should be taken not to compromise the accessibility and effectiveness of consent orders. For example, the Local Court NSW noted the possible consequences of making protection orders by consent without admission, including the potential impact upon family law proceedings, but considered, on balance, that:

the making of orders by consent without admission can be beneficial to both parties. Having regard to the often volatile nature of protection order proceedings, being able to make an order by consent without admission results in a reduction of contested applications and whilst enabling conditions to be imposed for the protection of the protected person.\textsuperscript{223}

18.200 Brunacci submitted that the most important aspect of state and territory family violence legislation is obtaining protection for victims of family violence:

The prevailing principles of state family violence legislation are the protection of victims of family violence or those with fear of future violence stemming from a change in a significant relationship The option of orders made ‘without admissions’ allows for the principle of the legislation to be exercised without undue strain on the court system.\textsuperscript{224}

18.201 Another stakeholder noted that it may be more difficult to get parties to agree to consent orders if those orders can be used to imply the presence of violent behaviour for the purposes of family law matters.\textsuperscript{225} An approach that focuses on family court processes, such as screening for family violence, as recommended by the Chisholm Review, was preferred—rather than burdening the protection order regime:

\textsuperscript{220} This is the case in most jurisdictions. See, eg, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 57, 96; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) ss 14A, 50; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 17; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 8; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) ss 84, 85; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 89.

\textsuperscript{221} Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{222} A Brunacci, Submission FV 97, 4 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{223} Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{224} A Brunacci, Submission FV 97, 4 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{225} Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.
The process for obtaining [protection orders] occurs in a chaotic and crowded courtroom, often with a huge list and limited time. [Protection orders] are a simple and expedient process to ensure individuals receive the protection they need quickly, simply and inexpensively. It would be a mistake to burden this process with too much complexity, or to give its outcomes far reaching ramifications beyond the issue at hand.226

Commissions’ views

18.202 In the Commissions’ view, the ability to make protection orders by consent is important to the effective operation of state and territory family violence regimes and to facilitate access to legal responses to family violence. In many instances, a consent order can be obtained to protect applicants from the risk of family violence without the need for a formal contested hearing. This avoids the stress and costs associated with court hearings, while achieving the key purpose of family violence legislation—the protection of persons from family violence.

18.203 It is not necessary or appropriate to add procedural steps to the protection order process solely in order to improve the evidentiary value of protection orders in subsequent family law proceedings and other recommendations have been made in this regard. A protection order made by consent remains a court order. Many people who seek a protection order will never need to consider family law proceedings—either because they are not in a married or in a de facto relationship with the person who has used violence or because issues that require resolution by family courts do not arise.

18.204 The Commissions consider that it is preferable to amend the Family Law Act to address concerns that protection orders made by consent, and consent without admissions, are not appropriately considered by federal family courts when making parenting orders. In Chapter 17, the Commissions recommend amendments to the Family Law Act so that, when determining what is in the best interests of a child, federal family courts in considering any protection order that applies to the child or member of the child’s family should focus on the factual circumstances of family violence behind that order—the evidence of family violence given, or findings made, in relevant family violence protection order proceedings.227 Clarifying the Family Law Act in this way will address the perception that consent orders are irrelevant to determining the best interests of the child, and focus attention instead on the evidence of family violence behind the protection order.

18.205 Further, while some of the options proposed in the Consultation Paper were supported, none were without problems. In particular, the Commissions do not consider that it is appropriate or feasible to limit the ‘without admissions’ to criminal liability notation, because respondents should also be able to contest allegations in civil proceedings.

18.206 Providing an opportunity for applicants to oppose the making of the order by consent also risks protection order proceedings being used for purposes other than to secure the safety of victims of family violence. If the parties cannot agree that an order should be made, or upon what conditions, or there is a concern that the parties cannot give free and informed consent to the order, the court will need to determine the matter. For example, if there is a concern that the conditions in the order are not adequate to protect the applicant from the risk of family violence, the matter may need to proceed to a hearing. Requiring courts to determine whether there has been family violence or if there is a risk of family violence in circumstances where such findings are not required would have significant resource implications and place a heavy burden on state and territory courts, and the parties to protection order proceedings themselves.

---

226 Ibid.
227 Rec 17–1.

18.207 Finally, while there are benefits in requiring courts to advise parties of the effect and consequences of a consent order, family violence legislation in most states and territories already requires courts to explain the nature and effect of the protection order to the parties. In light of the amendments to the Family Law Act recommended in Chapter 17, the Commissions do not consider that it is necessary for judicial officers in state and territory courts to comment on the possible effect of making a protection order by consent on concurrent or pending family law proceedings.

Cross applications and mutual protection orders

18.208 A cross application is an application for a protection order made by the respondent to a current application against the person seeking the original protection order. While cross applications may be brought in legitimate circumstances—for example where both parties have engaged in violent conduct and there is a risk that the same or other family violence will be repeated—there is a concern that cross applications are often brought as a tactic or bargaining tool in existing protection order proceedings or anticipated family law matters, rather than because a person feels at risk of family violence.228

18.209 Cross applications brought in such circumstances raise a number of issues with respect to the safety of a victim of family violence and the inappropriate use of legal proceedings. In some cases, a cross application can be used to coerce or pressure a victim of family violence into withdrawing his or her original application.229

18.210 In other cases, a cross application may pressure the victim of family violence into consenting to mutual protection orders—that is, where the court makes protection orders that restrict the behaviour of both parties. Mutual orders have been criticised on the basis that they do not promote responsibility and accountability for those who use family violence and are difficult for police to enforce.230

18.211 In order to address some of these concerns, the VLRC, in its review of family violence laws, stated that legislation should limit the ability to make mutual protection orders by consent. It also recommended that mutual protection orders should not be made unless the court is satisfied that there are sufficient grounds for making orders against each party on the basis that each party has committed family violence. Similarly, in the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should provide that mutual protection orders may only be made by a court where it is satisfied of the grounds for making a protection order against each party.

---

Submissions and consultations

18.212 In response to the Consultation Paper proposal, many stakeholders agreed that state and territory family violence legislation should provide that mutual protection orders should only be made where the court is satisfied that there are grounds for making a protection order against each party.

18.213 In supporting the proposal, Legal Aid NSW noted that:

Too often mutual protection orders are offered as a resolution to the matter at court to appease the defendant without considering the merit of their application. Our experience is that defendants often rely on cross-applications to further harass and threaten the victim and pressure them into withdrawing the initial application.

18.214 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria also supported the proposal, on the basis that:

To resolve applications victims may consent to mutual orders which then tends to minimise the family violence which was the subject of the initial application and which allows ongoing controlling behaviour by the perpetrator.

18.215 Professor Julie Stubbs submitted that it is especially important to ensure that parties are aware of the practical consequences of consenting to protection orders where such orders are made against both parties as a result of cross applications:

---

231 Ibid, Rec 88.
234 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. Also Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
It is a concern that in some circumstances the person who appears most in need of protection consents to having an order made against them in order to also achieve an order against the other party, without full understanding of the ramifications of this (eg criminal charges on breach and how the existence of an order might be construed in family law proceedings).236

18.216 Stubbs considered, however, that the proposal may simply restate the existing legal position. She suggested that other measures, such as education and training for judicial officers, police, lawyers and court staff may also be required.237

18.217 Women’s Legal Services NSW did not support the proposal, submitting that:

Each application should be considered on its merits and any variety of outcomes are possible upon evidence being heard. Courts are already required to be satisfied that there are grounds for making a protection order against a party, in the context of mutual and individual protection orders. The criteria for mutual or cross protection orders should be, and are, the same as for an individual protection order.238

18.218 Wangmann noted that the most concerning problem with cross applications was not so much the making of mutual orders, but rather that cross applications pressured victims of family violence to withdraw their applications entirely. She noted that her study of cross applications in NSW courts found that when cross applications were heard separately (usually because of a time gap between the applications) it generally resulted in only one person obtaining a protection order while the other person was unsuccessful. In contrast, when applications were heard together there appeared to be an approach that dealt with them as a ‘pair’ resulting in the same outcome (mutual withdrawal or mutual protection orders).239 Wangmann submitted that:

there needs to be some direction to examining each claim separately and considering separate outcomes. This does not necessarily mean separate listing (which can be very resource intensive for cases that may be contesting the same incident), but a direction to consider the separate and individual nature of each claim.240

18.219 This idea was reflected in submissions that noted that it would assist if courts were better able to identify the ‘primary aggressor’.241

Commissions’ views

18.220 While cross applications can be made for legitimate reasons, the concerns expressed by stakeholders about the misuse of cross applications suggest that some reforms are required. The Commissions consider that safeguards are necessary to prevent the misuse of cross applications for protection orders where cross applications are made for tactical reasons—for example, to pressure the original applicant into withdrawing that application, to agree to mutual protection orders, or to affect family law proceedings.

237  Ibid.

18.221 The Commissions agree with the approach recommended by the VLRC to place restrictions on making mutual protection orders by consent, requiring cross applications to be considered by a court, and that mutual protection orders be made only where the court is satisfied that there are sufficient grounds for making a protection order against each party. This approach would mean that the court considers the claims made in each application separately and on its merits, identifying and responding to the individual requests for protection.

18.222 While this recommendation does not directly address the situation where a cross application made without grounds pressures a victim of family violence to withdraw his or her application altogether, consideration of abuse of the legal system is discussed below in relation to vexatious proceedings.

Recommendation 18–5 State and territory family violence legislation should provide that:

(a) mutual protection orders should not be made by consent; and

(b) a court may only make mutual protection orders where it is satisfied that there are grounds for making a protection order against each party.

Vexatious proceedings

18.223 Vexatious proceedings are legal proceedings brought or continued without reasonable grounds or for wrongful purposes—such as to harass or annoy the other party, or to cause delay or detriment.

18.224 Vexatious litigation may arise in a number of ways in protection order proceedings. For example, repeated applications for a protection order may be made against the same person based on the same or similar allegations and by the respondent to vary or revoke a protection order. Cross applications for protection orders may also be made without legal grounds.

18.225 While such applications may not, in themselves, be vexatious, where they are repeated or made without legal grounds, concerns arise that people who have committed family violence may use the legal system to further harass, control and abuse the victim.242

Vexatious applications for protection orders

18.226 Courts can deal with vexatious litigation using a range of provisions in family violence legislation, other legislation or rules of court that deal with vexatious court proceedings. While legislation differs across jurisdictions, it generally allows courts to dismiss vexatious applications and award costs against a person who has brought a vexatious application.

---

18.227 Family violence legislation in New South Wales and South Australia allows a court to dismiss an application on the grounds that it is frivolous, vexatious, without substance or has no reasonable prospect of success. In other jurisdictions, court rules generally allow courts to stay or dismiss vexatious applications.

18.228 While dismissing the application and awarding costs may deal with a particular vexatious application, these measures do not prevent a person making further vexatious applications that harass the other party and abuse court processes. As a result, legislation in some jurisdictions allows a court to declare a particular person to be a vexatious litigant, with the effect that that person may not commence new proceedings without leave of the court.

18.229 The Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) is the only state or territory family violence legislation that permits the court to make orders with respect to vexatious litigants. The Act allows the Attorney-General, a person against whom the applications have been made, or a person with leave of the court, to apply for an order declaring a person to be a vexatious litigant. The Chief Magistrate, Deputy Chief Magistrate or the President of the Children’s Court may make such an order, if satisfied that the person has 'habitually, persistently and without reasonable ground instituted proceedings under this Act against the same person'. A person declared to be a vexatious litigant cannot make an application for an order, cross application, variation, revocation or extension of an order, without leave of the court. The Act also includes provisions to allow a person who has been declared a vexatious litigant to appeal that decision.

18.230 In Queensland and Western Australia, the relevant magistrates’ courts have a general power to prohibit a person from commencing certain proceedings without leave.

---

243 Family violence legislation in NSW and SA allows a court to dismiss an application on the grounds that it is frivolous, vexatious, without substance or has no reasonable prospect of success: Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 53; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 21(3)(b). In other jurisdictions, rules of court generally allow courts to stay or dismiss vexatious applications: see, eg, Magistrates Court Civil Procedure Rules 2009 (Vic) rr 9A.01, 9A.02; Uniform Civil Procedure Rules 2005 (Qld) r 389A; Court Procedure Rules 2006 (ACT) r 1147.

244 Family violence legislation in all jurisdictions except SA allows a court to make a costs order against a person who has made a vexatious application: Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 99(3); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 154; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 61; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 69; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 34; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 117; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 91. In SA, the relevant provisions are contained in the Summary Procedure Act 1921 (SA) s 189.

245 See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 53; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 21(3)(b).

246 See, eg, Magistrates Court Civil Procedure Rules 2009 (Vic) rr 9A.01, 9A.02; Uniform Civil Procedure Rules 2005 (Qld) r 389A; Court Procedure Rules 2006 (ACT) r 1147.

247 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 189.

248 Ibid s 193(1).

249 Ibid s 195.
of the court.\textsuperscript{250} In other states and territories, rules of court or legislation governing vexatious proceedings permit only supreme courts to declare a person to be a vexatious litigant, or to require that a person seek leave before commencing further legal proceedings.\textsuperscript{251}

\textit{Applications to vary or revoke protection orders}

18.231 In addition to concerns about vexatious applications, there are also concerns that some respondents make repeated applications to vary or revoke a protection order as a way to harass or intimidate a person who has obtained a protection order against him or her. State and territory family violence legislation contains differing procedures to vary or revoke a protection order, depending on whether the order was issued by a court or by police. This section is concerned only with protection orders made by a court.

18.232 State and territory family violence legislation generally provides that a court may vary or revoke a protection order. The most common ground for doing so is where the court is satisfied that there has been a change in circumstances since the original order was made.\textsuperscript{252}

18.233 In South Australia, legislation specifically provides that the court has the power to dismiss an application to revoke or vary a protection order, without receiving evidence or submissions from the protected person, if the application is frivolous or vexatious.\textsuperscript{253}

18.234 Family violence legislation in Victoria, Western Australia and the Northern Territory requires a respondent to seek leave of the court before making an application to vary or revoke a protection order.\textsuperscript{254} The Victorian legislation implemented a recommendation made in the VLRC’s review of family violence laws, which considered that the requirement to seek leave was

\begin{quote}
  a necessary safeguard against court processes being used as a form of further abuse. It will ensure that a protected person only needs to attend court to defend the application where the respondent has demonstrated to a magistrate that there may be grounds for granting the application.\textsuperscript{255}
\end{quote}

18.235 When seeking to vary or revoke a protection order under the \textit{Family Violence Act 2004} (Tas), both the original applicant and the respondent are required to seek leave in relation to protection orders made by a court, as opposed to police-issued

\begin{footnotes}
251 Vexatious Proceedings Act 2008 (NSW) s 8 (this Act also confers power on the Land and Environment Court and Industrial Court); Supreme Court Civil Procedure Act 1932 (Tas) s 194G; Supreme Court Act 1933 (ACT) s 67A; Vexatious Proceedings Act 2006 (NT) s 7.
252 See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 73(3); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 26(4)(b); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 59(2)(a)(i) (interim orders only).
254 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 109; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 46; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 48(3).
\end{footnotes}
protection orders.\textsuperscript{256} There are no similar requirements in other family violence legislation.

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

18.236 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions considered several measures to address the problem of vexatious litigation in protection order proceedings. The Commissions asked whether state and territory family violence legislation should allow a court to:

\begin{itemize}
  \item make an order that a person who has made two or more vexatious applications for a protection order against the same person may not make a further application without the leave of the court; or \item dismiss a vexatious application for a protection order at a preliminary hearing before a respondent is served with that application.\textsuperscript{257}
\end{itemize}

18.237 The Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should require a respondent to a protection order to seek leave from the court before making an application to vary or revoke the protection order.\textsuperscript{258}

\textbf{Vexatious applications for protection orders}

18.238 Some stakeholders submitted that vexatious litigation in protection order proceedings was rare, and, when it arose, that courts have adequate powers to appropriately manage vexatious litigation.\textsuperscript{259} For example, South Australian Magistrate Andrew Cannon submitted that:

\begin{quote}
I am not aware that vexatious applications for protection orders are a systemic problem in this State. The police are the complainant in these matters in this State and that seems to act [as] a protection against general abuse. Where abuse occurs the present system can manage that appropriately.\textsuperscript{260}
\end{quote}

18.239 Wangmann and Stubbs cautioned that care was required when considering vexatious litigation in the context of protection order proceedings. Wangmann identified two key concerns in dealing with vexatious litigants. First, she noted the difficulty involved in identifying what might be a vexatious application:

\begin{quote}
While a number of applications are clearly vexatious (this is evident from the type of, or absence of, grounds to seek a protection order) many are not so clearly identifiable. Many applications do, on their face, raise allegations about acts or behaviours that would be captured by the various legislative schemes—the question is whether these acts or behaviours on their own should warrant a family violence response in the form of a protection order\textsuperscript{261}
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{256} Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 20(2). Provisions relating to police-issued protection orders are contained in s 14(9)–(10).
\textsuperscript{257} Consultation Paper, Question 10–9.
\textsuperscript{258} Ibid, Proposal 10–6.
\textsuperscript{259} A Cannon, Submission FV 137, 23 June 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{260} A Cannon, Submission FV 137, 23 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{261} J Wangmann, Submission FV 170, 25 June 2010.
Secondly, Wangmann submitted that multiple applications alone do not mean that the litigation is vexatious. For example, some applicants withdraw multiple applications for protection orders before they proceed with an application to finalisation.\(^{262}\) Similarly, Stubbs noted that some complainants may need to make repeated applications over time, due to breach or a change of circumstances. She cautioned that:

There is a risk that if this is not handled well it could have little effect on people bringing non-meritorious applications, but may deter complainants from seeking necessary variations, or new orders on the expiry of previous orders, which might then be characterised by the other party as vexatious.\(^{263}\)

Some stakeholders supported the idea that courts should be empowered to make an order that a person who has made two or more vexatious applications for a protection order against the same person should require leave for any further application.\(^{264}\) The Peninsula Community Legal Centre, for example, submitted that:

This enables some protection for people who may be forced to defend repeated and unreasonable applications for protection orders and prevents abuse of the system pertaining to protection orders.\(^{265}\)

In addition to allowing courts to make a declaration that a person is a vexatious litigant, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria submitted that:

a provision requiring a court to grant leave for applications that are made subsequent to the refusal of an application against the same person is appropriate without the need to refer to those applications as ‘vexatious’. If leave is not granted, the application should be struck out.\(^{266}\)

Some stakeholders also supported permitting a court to dismiss a vexatious application for a protection order at a preliminary hearing before a respondent is served with that application.\(^{267}\) The Queensland Law Society noted that it is ‘not unusual for a Queensland magistrate to dismiss a vexatious application at a mention, rather than at a hearing where the application, on its face, is clearly an abuse of process’.\(^{268}\)

---

\(^{262}\) Ibid. Wangmann noted that there are many reasons why a victim of family violence might withdraw an application—including accepting an undertaking to the court, a desire to continue the relationship, or because of threats made by the respondent. See also Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.

\(^{265}\) Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010.

\(^{266}\) Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

\(^{267}\) Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.

Finally, a number of stakeholders also expressed the view that some applicants make vexatious applications for protection orders in order to gain a strategic advantage in family law matters.\footnote{P Maloney, Submission FV 230, 31 May 2010; Shared Parenting Council of Australia, Submission FV 206, 28 June 2010; Non-Custodial Parents Party (Equal Parenting), Submission FV 55, 1 June 2010; E McGuire, Submission FV 53, 28 May 2010. See also P Parkinson, J Cashmore and J Single, Post-Separation Conflict and The Use of Family Violence Orders (2009).}

Applications to revoke or vary a protection order

A number of stakeholders agreed that state and territory family violence legislation should require a respondent to a protection order to seek leave from the court before making an application to vary or revoke the protection order.\footnote{Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.}

Some stakeholders raised concerns about the proposal. Women’s Legal Service Queensland expressed concern, for example, about the implications of the proposal where the applicant for a protection order is a serial abuser of litigation and a victim of family violence is the respondent.\footnote{Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.} Others opposed the proposal on the basis that a respondent should have access to a judicial determination.\footnote{Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.}

There are many occasions in which applications for revocation or variation brought by the respondents ought to be legitimately heard in court and that there ought not be barriers to the bringing of those applications.\footnote{Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010. The Queensland Law Society considered that making a costs order against a person who makes an improper application may be a more appropriate measure to deter vexatious litigation.}

There were also concerns that the proposal may give rise to difficulties in varying protection orders which may in turn result in parties breaching the order rather than seeking variation.\footnote{J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.}

The Commissions recognise the issues and difficulties raised by vexatious litigation in the context of family violence. In addition to traditional concerns about the impact on public resources, vexatious applications in protection order proceedings may operate as a means to harass or intimidate victims of family violence.

18.249 In light of the dynamics of family violence, it may also be difficult to identify what is a vexatious application or who is a vexatious litigant—for example, where multiple applications are made by a person who may be a victim of long term family violence.

18.250 Some stakeholders indicated that vexatious litigation in protection order proceedings is uncommon; but others disagreed. There has been scant research into the nature and incidence of vexatious litigation in protection order proceedings. Clearly, however, where vexatious litigation occurs, courts should be empowered to adequately manage the problem.

Vexatious applications for protection orders

18.251 There is a need to ensure that courts are able to protect people from having to defend unreasonable and repeated protection order applications. However, care needs to be taken when considering proposals which may restrict or deter people who have experienced family violence from seeking a protection order. This is particularly so when, for example, a victim may need to make multiple applications for a protection order; or where applications do not engage the legal definition of family violence or provide sufficient evidence, but are not vexatious.

18.252 The Inquiry received little information to suggest that the current range of provisions across jurisdictions is inadequate to deal with vexatious litigation. Accordingly, the Commissions do not make recommendations with respect to vexatious applications for protection orders. However, this is an area which warrants ongoing monitoring. The Victorian family violence legislation, which contains comprehensive provisions to deal with vexatious applications and litigants, may serve as a useful model if problems are shown to exist.

Applications to revoke or vary a protection order

18.253 There is clearly merit in ensuring that a variation or revocation of a protection order is only sought by the respondent where there are reasonable grounds to do so—such as a change in the circumstances since the original order was made—which would help protect victims of family violence against vexatious applications.

18.254 However, introducing additional procedural hurdles, such as requiring that a respondent seek leave from the court, may make the process of varying or revoking protection orders less accessible. If it is too difficult to vary or revoke a protection order, this may result in breach and has the potential to undermine the effectiveness of the protection order regime.

18.255 In the Commissions’ view, provisions which require a respondent to seek the leave of the court may inappropriately limit a respondent’s access to the court system without it being established he or she has, for example, ‘demonstrably abused court processes in the past’.

18.256 The Commissions note that a range of recommendations made in this Report—including in relation to definitions of family violence and to facilitate additional education, training and specialisation—may assist in ensuring that judicial officers better understand the nature and dynamics of family violence; and are better equipped to identify and deal with vexatious litigation in protection order proceedings.

---

275 This is the stated rationale for vexatious litigant provisions in Victorian family violence legislation: Explanatory Memorandum, Family Violence Protection Bill 2008 (Vic).
Part E

Child Protection
19. The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws

Contents

Introduction 891
Interconnectedness of family violence and child abuse 892
What is child abuse and neglect? 892
Family violence and child abuse and neglect 894
Legal intervention in child protection 896
Development of state intervention 896
Child protection interventions and procedures 897
The impact of multiple jurisdictions and services 898
Exacerbating factors 900
Previous and current reviews 902
The relationship between family law and child protection law 903
Family courts and their relationship with child protection agencies 905
The legal relationship 906
The challenges of working together 908
Gaps in the system and proposals for closing them 911
The power of children’s courts to make parenting orders 917
Overlapping concerns 917
Children’s court or family court? 918
Proposals for closing the gap 921
Families in both courts—duplication of proceedings 928

Introduction

19.1 Cases that involve child protection issues commonly have contact with more than one court. There may be proceedings in criminal courts, children’s courts and family courts. The child and family may also have contact with numerous agencies, such as child protection agencies, police, health workers and others. It is the legal intersections that are the main focus of this chapter, but agencies such as child protection departments play a key role in legal interventions.

19.2 This part of the Report, Part E, focuses on child protection; in particular on issues that arise where child protection law intersects with family law and criminal law. This chapter examines the intersection of child protection and family laws. The following chapter, Chapter 20, examines the intersections of child protection legislation with criminal law.
19.3 The Terms of Reference engage issues of child protection and safety on a number of levels. The first term of reference focuses on the interaction in practice of a range of laws including child protection laws and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), and child protection laws and relevant federal, state and territory criminal laws. The second term of reference focuses on sexual assault in the family violence context and the impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence. As noted in Chapter 1, in the case of children, the issue of sexual assault potentially brings together all the areas of law under consideration in this Inquiry. Sexual assault is considered in Part G of this Report.

19.4 In this chapter the issue of child protection is first defined and the relationship between child abuse and neglect and family violence is explored. The chapter outlines the development of child protection law and sets out the processes that occur when concerns about the safety of a child are raised.

Interconnectedness of family violence and child abuse

What is child abuse and neglect?

19.5 There is no consistent definition of child abuse within Australia that is used in all jurisdictions and by all professions work with children and families. Holzer and Bromfield give a useful definition of the broad concept of child abuse or maltreatment:

Maltreatment refers to non-accidental behaviour towards another person, which is outside the norms of conduct and entails a substantial risk of causing physical or emotional harm. Behaviours may be intentional or unintentional and include acts of omission and commission. Specifically abuse refers to acts of commission and neglect to acts of omission.¹

19.6 These authors note that, in practice, the terms ‘child abuse’ and ‘child neglect’ are used more frequently than the term ‘child maltreatment’.

19.7 A range of behaviours are generally included in child maltreatment. These include physical abuse, sexual abuse, emotional maltreatment (including psychological abuse) and neglect. Exposure of children to family violence is also a form of abuse and is now recognised as such in some legislation. More often, it is included in the category of emotional maltreatment,² but in some jurisdictions, exposure to family violence is a

² For example, in NSW, a child or young person is at risk of significant harm if they are living in a household where there have been incidents of domestic violence and, as a consequence, the child or young person is at risk of serious physical or psychological harm: Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 23(1)(d). See also Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 342. For a discussion of the different definitions in state and territory child protection laws of when a child is considered to be in need of care and protection, see P Holzer and L Bromfield, National Child Protection Clearinghouse Resource Sheet No 12: Australian Legal Definitions—When is a Child in Need of Protection? (2010), prepared for the Australian Institute of Family Studies.
The legal definition of child abuse, and the threshold that triggers a reporting duty or allows intervention to protect children, is different across jurisdictions. All jurisdictions substantiate situations where children have experienced significant harm from abuse and neglect through the actions of parents. Some jurisdictions also substantiate on the basis of the occurrence of an incident of abuse or neglect, independent of whether the child was harmed, and others substantiate on the basis of the child being at risk of harm occurring. As Dr Leah Bromfield and Prue Holzer note, whilst there are some areas of consistency, the thresholds vary depending on the extent of harm, or risk of harm, that is required (such as whether harm must be of a 'serious' or 'significant' nature) and whether the definition focuses on the actions of the abuser, or the consequences of the actions. For example, in South Australia a person should make a report to the relevant child protection authority when they ‘suspect on reasonable grounds that a child has been or is being abused or neglected’, whereas in NSW a person ‘who has reasonable grounds to suspect that a child or young person is ... at risk of significant harm’ may make a report to the child protection agency.

Each year the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare (AIHW) undertakes a comprehensive review of state and territory child protection and support services. In the 2008–09 reporting period, the AIHW found that the number of children subject to a notification of child abuse or neglect, the number under care and protection orders and the number in out-of-home care all increased, and that Indigenous children were over-represented in all areas. In particular, the AIHW reported that there were 339,454 child protection notifications recorded nationally in 2008–09, which was an increase of almost 7% from the number of notifications recorded in 2007–08 (317,526 notifications), and a 34% increase on the number of notifications recorded in 2004–05 (252,831 notifications). The number of children in out-of-home care across Australia has doubled over the last decade—from 15,674 children in 1998–99 to 31,166 children in 2008–09.
19.11 A report published in 2010 by the NSW Department of Human Services, shows that 26.7% of all children in NSW under 18 years were ‘known to DOCS’ in June 2009—an increase of almost 7% since 2005.12 The most frequently reported group were children aged under 12 months, including unborn children. High rates were also recorded for preschool aged children. The lowest reporting rates were for children aged over 14 years.13

19.12 Few reports made to child protection authorities are substantiated following an initial investigation. Of the 339,454 reports made across Australia in 2008–09, the AIHW found that 54,621 reports—or about 16%—were substantiated, which was a small decrease of 1% from the previous year.14 However, the rates of substantiation vary between the states and territories, and this partly reflects the different policies and approaches of individual jurisdictions to child protection matters.15

Family violence and child abuse and neglect

19.13 Studies suggest that between 12% and 23% of Australian children are exposed to family violence,16 but some research suggests the figure may be higher. For example, research conducted by the Victorian Department of Human Services found that over half of all child protection notifications that were investigated and subsequently substantiated in 2001–02 involved family violence.17 This reflects international research, which has put the figure for co-occurrence at between 30% and 50%.18

19.14 Children who live in families where there is intimate partner violence experience a number of negative outcomes, including post-traumatic stress disorder, depression, poor school performance, and higher rates of aggressive behaviour.19 Dr Lesley Laing notes that research is emerging that shows children’s safety is especially compromised in situations where there is both family violence and child abuse.20 Children in such situations are at increased risk of developing health and

---

15 Ibid, 16.
behavioural problems. These effects are likely to be more severe than for those exposed to only one of these forms of abuse, and can be played out in a number of ways:

the same perpetrator may be abusing both mother and children, probably the most common scenario; the children may be injured when ‘caught in the crossfire’ during incidents of adult domestic violence; children may experience neglect because of the impact of the violence, controlling behaviours and abuse on women’s physical and mental health; or children may be abused by a mother who is herself being abused.21

19.15 Family violence has also been shown to be a common factor among children who are victims of fatal assaults. The NSW Child Death Review Team notes that for children who died as a result of fatal assault in 2008, domestic violence was among the list of most common factors experienced on an ongoing basis prior to their death.22

19.16 Child abuse is an element of family violence and family violence may be an important factor in child neglect. For the victims, it is therefore difficult to separate these experiences. In this chapter the term ‘child abuse’ is used to refer to acts of commission. However, the focus of this Inquiry is on family violence. The interlocking nature of family violence, child abuse and child neglect and the emotional harm to children of violence against a person who is caring for them, means that definitional precision in the use of these terms is not always possible.

19.17 Statistics of prevalence are also hard to disentangle because of variances in state and territory practices for recording notifications of child abuse.23 In particular, some states and territories record exposure to family violence as a separate and distinct form of child abuse, whereas others include these cases within the category of emotional abuse and, consequently, notifications of exposure to family violence are not necessarily separately captured.

19.18 Further, family violence towards a parent may affect the ability of the victim to parent effectively. As a solicitor with the Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit commented in a submission to this Inquiry:

How can you separate violence towards a spouse from parenting issues without acknowledging the impact of violence on parenting?24

19.19 Children and families are entering the child protection system with increasingly complex family circumstances.25 In its submission to the Inquiry, the Children’s Court of NSW noted that, in its experience, where family violence is evident in care and protection matters that come before it, it is rarely a ‘stand-alone’ issue. In most care and protection cases involving domestic violence, the Court stated, mental health problems and parental substance abuse are frequently related issues.26

24 The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010.

Legal intervention in child protection

19.20 This section of the chapter considers the development of state intervention in relation to children in need of care and protection, from the parens patriae jurisdiction to legislative schemes involving the establishment of specialist children’s courts and, among other things, defining thresholds for state intervention. The chapter also considers the procedure for triggering state intervention, the impact of multiple jurisdictions and services, and factors that can exacerbate the tensions present in the legal system due to the differing objectives and purposes of child protection and family law.

Development of state intervention

19.21 The earliest legal interventions in relation to children in need of care and protection used the parens patriae jurisdiction. This jurisdiction to make orders and give directions in relation to the welfare of children was inherited from the Court of Chancery in England by the Supreme Courts of each state and territory.27 However, beginning in the mid–19th century, state and territory governments legislated to secure the welfare of children by defining the circumstances in which children needed to be protected from neglect or abuse, and the ways in which young people might be treated as criminals.28

19.22 Developments in child protection legislation were often motivated by revelations of cases of severe abuse or neglect, which spurred child welfare activists in the late 1800s and early 1900s to form rights and advocacy bodies, including societies for the prevention of cruelty to children.29

19.23 Starting with South Australia in 1890 and including all states by 1918, dedicated children’s courts were established throughout Australia.30 Children’s courts had two principal functions: child care and protection; and exclusive jurisdiction with respect to child offenders. They were required to sit separately, either in specially designated premises, or by arranging for segregated court time, when other business was not being transacted.31 By the 1970s all states and territories had introduced legislation to protect

---

26 Children’s Court of New South Wales, Submission FV 237, 22 July 2010. See also the discussion of compounding factors in Ch 1.
28 G Monahan and L Young (eds), Children and the Law in Australia (2008), at [1.11] trace the ten principal Acts passed in Victoria over 90 years, from 1864 to 1933.
29 B Mathews, ‘Protecting Children from Abuse and Neglect’ in G Monahan and L Young (eds), Children and the Law in Australia (2008) 204, [10.5].
31 Ibid, 83.
children. The evolution of the child protection system has included numerous reviews of child protection services.

19.24 A recurring theme concerns when it is appropriate for the state to intervene and the appropriate role of child protection services:

According to a public health model of disease prevention, tertiary services are one platform in a well functioning service system. The public health model is comprised of three service platforms: primary services, secondary services, and tertiary services. This model can also be used in a child protection context. Primary services provide services for all children (eg, education and health). Secondary services are targeted at families at higher risk or in need of additional support. Tertiary child protection services are a last resort, and the least desirable option for families or the state. Families that require a tertiary response to ensure the safety of their children form the ‘tip of the iceberg’. Consequently, the primary and secondary service domains are larger than the tertiary domain representing the need for more services in these areas.

19.25 The legal system will become involved through child protection legislation and criminal law in relation to the ‘tertiary domain’. However family courts make decisions in relation to children from all domains.

Child protection interventions and procedures

19.26 As noted above, each state and territory has its own system of child protection laws and supporting agencies. These laws are invoked by the state when parents are determined to be insufficiently protective of a child. In each jurisdiction there are thresholds for intervention by child protection authorities to protect children and to assist parents and families. The 2008–09 report on child protection in Australia by the AIHW reported that while ‘the processes used to protect children are broadly similar’, there are ‘significant differences’ in how jurisdictions deal with and report child protection issues. Keeping in mind such differences, a broad description of the way in which child protection agencies engage with families is set out below.

32 The current legislation is: Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld); Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA); Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT); Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT).

33 See J Wood, Report of the Special Commission of Inquiry into Child Protection Services in NSW (2008); Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse, Little Children are Sacred: Report of the Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse (2007); Ombudsman Victoria, Own Motion Investigation into the Department of Human Services Child Protection Program (2009). The Victorian Law Reform Commission has also recently submitted to the Attorney-General a review of Victoria’s child protection legislative arrangements.

37 Ibid, 1. Appendix 4 of the report provides extracts from the relevant legislation of the ‘in need of care and protection’ threshold.
19.27 Child protection intervention is triggered first by a report of concern to a child protection or support service. Reports could come from community members, professionals, organisations, the child, parents or relatives, and may relate to abuse and neglect or ‘broader family concerns such as economic problems or social isolation’. Reports are then assessed against the relevant criteria and classified either as a family support issue or warranting a child protection intervention.

19.28 An investigation involves an assessment of the degree of harm or risk of harm for the child and will either be ‘substantiated’ or ‘not substantiated’ and the assessment questions may differ according to the relevant jurisdiction.

19.29 The relevant child protection agency may apply to the court in each jurisdiction for a care and protection order, but such action is usually taken ‘only as a last resort in situations where the child protection agency believes that continued involvement with the child is warranted’. Although the law may affect all of the steps in the process, an application to a children’s court is only contemplated at the end of a series of interventions and decisions and in relation to only a small percentage of cases.

19.30 Some notifications may also give rise to prosecutions, as considered in Chapter 20. The police and director of public prosecutions in the relevant jurisdiction may be involved in making an assessment of whether a matter should proceed further down the criminal justice pathway. If not, the matter falls back within the overall umbrella of child protection concerns.

19.31 At the same time as care proceedings are being contemplated or dealt with in state and territory children’s courts, there may also be applications in federal family courts for parenting orders. Criminal proceedings in relation to the same experiences of violence or abuse may also be pursued in state criminal courts. Related applications for protection orders may also be made, generally in state magistrates’ courts. Child protection cases may therefore potentially present themselves in three different jurisdictions.

The impact of multiple jurisdictions and services

19.32 That families may be involved in proceedings in more than one jurisdiction is a recurring theme of the interactions under review in this Inquiry. The need to go to multiple courts increases the possibility of inconsistent orders, and the possibility that people will drop out of the system without the protections they need, thus putting them at risk of further violence and abuse. It also increases costs and stress on families at a very difficult time. Children in particular may find the uncertainty and delay difficult to handle. One nine year-old child said:

---

38 Ibid, 2.
39 Ibid.
I felt worried that mum was going to go back and forth and back and forth and it wasn’t going to stop … I felt freaked out, I couldn’t get to sleep, I had nightmares, I was crying a lot … [It was just all] horrible and frightening.

19.33 Repeated contact with different parts of the legal and service systems may also require women and children who are the targets of violence to have to tell their story repeatedly. A 13 year-old described this problem as follows:

[The assessment session] was frustrating. Because every time it was banging your head against a brick wall. You always go back to the way it was. Like we were stuck there. Like another person wants to see it again … we had already done that … We had to go through it all again, which is crap.

19.34 As explained in Chapter 2, there is a division of jurisdiction in Australia between states and territories as administrators of the public domains of criminal and child protection laws, and the federal family courts as adjudicators of private law disputes. Inadequate communication, coordination or information sharing between courts and child protection agencies has been identified as a critical problem.

19.35 The tensions between different parts of the system have been attributed to the different cultures and histories of the different parts of the system. In the United Kingdom, Professor Marianne Hester refers to the three ‘planets’ of domestic violence, child protection and parenting orders:

Domestic violence work in the UK (and many other countries) has been influenced by feminist understanding of domestic violence as gender based, and tends to see the problem as (mainly) male perpetrators impacting on (mainly) female victims or survivors. The work of child protection services in the UK has a very different history to that of domestic violence, with the family, and in particular ‘dysfunctional’ families, as central to the problem. Within this approach the focus is on the child and her or his main carer, usually the mother. These structural factors, with domestic violence and child protection work on different ‘planets’, have made it especially difficult to integrate practice, and have resulted in child protection work where there is a tendency to see mothers as failing to protect their children rather than as the victims of domestic violence, and where violent male perpetrators are often ignored. These difficulties are made even more complex where both child protection and arrangements for child visitation post separation of the parents intersect. Within the context of divorce proceedings, mothers must be perceived as proactively encouraging child contact and must not be attempting to ‘aggressively protect’ their children from the direct or indirect abuse of a violent father. The child protection and child visitation/contact planets thus create further contradictions for mothers and children: there may be an expectation that mothers should protect their children, but at the same time, formally constituted arrangements for visitation may be implemented that do not

---

41 Ibid, 10.
adequately take into account that in some instances mothers and/or children may experience further abuse.\textsuperscript{43}

19.36 An Australian study, conducted by Drs Heather Douglas and Tamara Walsh of the University of Queensland, argues that the competing discourses of child protection and family violence create difficult dilemmas for women.\textsuperscript{44} They argue that there is:

- the ‘interpersonal conflict’ misunderstanding—failing to recognise the particular dynamics associated with family violence, with ‘ramifications for the way in which child protection workers respond to abused mothers and their children’;\textsuperscript{45}
- the ‘protective parent’ dilemma—if a mother is not perceived as acting protectively, she may be seen as ‘part of the reason for the dangerous environment’ and the removal of children from her care becomes more likely;\textsuperscript{46}
- ‘the mother is to blame’ phenomenon—the focus of child protection authorities is on the woman and her capacity to protect the children, and not on the father’s ‘capacity to cease using violent or abusive behaviour’;\textsuperscript{47} and
- the ‘leave’ ultimatum—move to ‘accommodation away from the domestic violence perpetrator and continue to care for the children, or stay with their abuser and lose the children’.\textsuperscript{48}

19.37 It is apparent from the discussion above that the fragmented nature of the system for dealing with child protection and family violence can create difficult problems for the families who must use the system. The system may make sense to those who work within it, but those who use it can find it confusing and intimidating.

Exacerbating factors

19.38 The tensions present in the legal system may be mediated or exacerbated for some women by their identities, histories or experiences. For example, the Commissions have heard of the particular difficulties that arise for women with intellectual disabilities in accessing services and asserting their capacity to parent.\textsuperscript{49}

19.39 Indigenous women are likely to approach the legal system with particular concerns arising from the history of the ‘stolen generation’ and the fear of their children being taken from them:

For many Aboriginal people, the intervention of child protection services is a common experience that often goes back several generations. Recently it was reported that \textsuperscript{45} Ibid, 492.

\textsuperscript{46} Ibid, 492–3.

\textsuperscript{47} Ibid, 493–5.

\textsuperscript{48} Ibid, 496–7. This is described by the authors as a ‘binary ultimatum to stay or leave’, which, without significant support, ‘misunderstands the complexity of many mothers’ situations’: 499.

child protection workers in Australia have begun removing the fifth generation of Aboriginal children from their parents, meaning that some Aboriginal families have an eighty year history of child protection intervention. Many scholars have observed that as a result of the intersecting factors of poverty, race and gender, Aboriginal women, and women who are recent immigrants, are particularly disadvantaged and discriminated against in their engagements with institutional processes.50

19.40 Migrant women report that they find using courts difficult. Their lack of knowledge of the Australian legal and cultural system, in addition to any language barriers, adds to the difficulties:

In my country I was studying. My family are educated … all of them. But here, I knew nothing … how to catch a bus, how to pay a bill … and I knew no-one else. And he used my ignorance as my chains.51

19.41 They are likely to find going to court an intimidating experience:

Finally, with the help of different agencies, I went to the court, and I got a restraining order. It was probably as frightening as it was being in my marriage.52

19.42 They may also find the child protection system in Australia mystifying:

I did not understand why this happened. My husband, he beats me, and now my children are gone. Why did this happen. No one told me.53

19.43 Such experiences were also strongly echoed in submissions made to this Inquiry.54

---

52  Ibid.
Previous and current reviews

19.44 The need for review of the intersections of child protection laws, family laws and criminal laws is apparent from the discussion above. This Report is by no means the only review of these problems. The interactions between the family law and child protection systems have been addressed by the Family Law Council in 2002\(^5\) and in 2009;\(^6\) by the ALRC and the then Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC) in the report, Seen and Heard: Priority for Children in the Legal Process (ALRC Report 84);\(^7\) and by Professor Richard Chisholm’s Family Courts Violence Review (Chisholm Review).\(^8\)

19.45 Reviews of specific state and territory child protection systems have also raised practical interaction issues in the context of evaluating the functions of child protection agencies.\(^9\) The problems have also been identified and discussed by government committees,\(^10\) in academic articles and studies\(^11\) and in judicial decisions.\(^12\) Both the Council of Australian Governments and the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) are also considering issues relating to child protection, and improvements that can be made at a national level to the way government agencies and courts deal with these issues.\(^13\)

---

19. The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws

The relationship between family law and child protection law

19.46 The Family Law Act and state and territory child protection legislation both enable courts to make orders regulating and displacing parental responsibility for children. The Family Law Act is generally invoked when there is a dispute between parents. However, any person who is concerned with the wellbeing of a child can apply for a parenting order under the Family Law Act. A parenting order made by a court under pt VII of the Family Law Act can stipulate the content of the parties’ parental responsibilities to a very broad extent and typically determines where the child will live and how much time he or she will spend with each parent.

19.47 It is common for child protection concerns to be raised in an application under the Family Law Act. In 2007, a study of 300 court files involving parenting disputes from three registries of the Family Court and the Federal Magistrates Court revealed that allegations of child abuse were raised in between 19% to 50% of all cases: and more than half of the cases in the sample involved allegations of family violence, many at the severe end of the spectrum.

19.48 While child protection concerns may arise in parenting matters in federal family courts, child protection proceedings are usually brought under state and territory laws and determine whether a child is in need of care or protection. They are almost always initiated by a child protection agency. A range of care and protection orders may be made, allocating parental responsibility for a child, including determining where a child will live and who can have contact with that child. Orders that can be made include:

- orders giving parental responsibility and care to the relevant minister or child protection department;
- orders giving parental responsibility and care to relatives or other appropriate people;
- orders giving shared parental responsibility to the parents and the minister or child protection agency;

---

64 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 65C. See also KAM & MJR [1998] FamCA, in which Justice Burr found that any person may file an application for a parenting order, but to be granted such an order the person must demonstrate a ‘concern with’ the care, welfare and development of the child. The required degree of that nexus depends on the facts of the case.

66 L Moloney and others, Allegations of Family Violence and Child Abuse in Family Law Children’s Proceedings: A Pre-reform Exploratory Study (2007), prepared for the Australian Institute of Family Studies. The variance between the figures for allegations of abuse arises because the study examined two samples, general litigants and judicial determinations in both the Federal Magistrates Court and the Family Court of Australia. The largest figure, 50%, relates to judicially determined matters in the Family Court of Australia.

67 In the ACT, someone other than the chief executive may apply for a protection order with the leave of the Court: Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 425. Protection applications in Victoria may be made by the Secretary, or by a member of the police force: Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 181, 240(1), 240(3), 243.
orders for supervision by the department, with or without undertakings; undertakings or recognisances by parents or children, with no further supervision; and orders in relation to contact arrangements.\textsuperscript{68}

19.49 The same families could be involved in both child protection and family law proceedings and there could be conflicting orders. Section 109 of the Australian Constitution provides that when a law of a state is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth, the latter shall prevail, and the state law shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid. However, as noted in Chapter 2, in the case of child protection legislation, the federal Family Law Act defers to orders under state legislation because the Commonwealth parliament does not have legislative competence in relation to such matters. Section 69ZK(1) of the Family Law Act provides that a court having jurisdiction under the Act must not make any order under the Act (other than a child maintenance order) in relation to a child who is under the care of a person pursuant to a state or territory child welfare law,\textsuperscript{69} unless:

(a) the order is expressed to come into effect when the child ceases to be under care;
or
(b) the order is made in proceedings relating to the child in respect of whom the written consent of a child welfare officer of the relevant state or territory has been obtained.

19.50 A ‘child welfare law’ is any law of a state or territory that relates to the incarceration of a child for a criminal offence,\textsuperscript{70} as well as any law listed in sch 5 of the Family Law Regulations 1984 (Cth). Schedule 5 sets out 38 state and territory laws, including those dealing with child protection.\textsuperscript{71} Because the circumstances of children and families are highly likely to change over time, the usual course is for the family courts not to make an order of the kind referred to in s 67ZK(1)(a) but to terminate or adjourn any proceedings of federal family courts for the period of the child’s care under child protection laws.\textsuperscript{72} Section 69ZK(2) confirms that state and territory courts may make child protection orders, including where a parenting order is in place under \textsuperscript{68} These orders may not be available in all jurisdictions, and some may be differently named: Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child Protection Australia 2008–09, 88–91.

\textsuperscript{69} The child must be under care, not simply the subject of ‘concern’ or ‘known’ to the relevant child protection agency: \textit{R v Lambert} (1980) 146 CLR 447.

\textsuperscript{70} \textit{Family Law Act} 1975 (Cth) s 4; \textit{Family Law Regulations 1984} (Cth) reg 12B(1).

\textsuperscript{71} It appears that some relevant legislation from a number of jurisdictions has not been prescribed as required by \textit{Family Law Act 1975} (Cth) s 4; \textit{Family Law Regulations 1984} (Cth) reg 12B(2), sch 5. See also \textit{Acts Interpretation Act 1901} (Cth) s 10. The Commissions note that as at 30 July 2010, the list of prescribed laws incorrectly prescribes: (item 6) \textit{Children and Young Persons Act 1989} (Vic), rather than the \textit{Children, Youth and Families Act 2005} (Vic); (item 28) \textit{Community Welfare Act 1983} (NT), rather than the \textit{Care and Protection of Children Act 2007} (NT); (item 32) \textit{Children and Young People Act 1999} (ACT), rather than the \textit{Children and Young People Act 2008} (ACT).

\textsuperscript{72} R Chisholm, \textit{The Child Protection–Family Law Interface} (2009), 25.
19. The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws

19.51 However these provisions only define the relationship between orders of children’s courts and family courts. Other difficulties arise in practice. When proceedings are commenced, it is not always possible for child protection workers, family members or lawyers to predict which is the most appropriate court to make the decision about whom a child should live with and spend time with. Proceedings in children’s courts are almost always instigated by child protection agencies, whereas proceedings in family courts are instigated by a parent, or another person concerned with the wellbeing of a child. Some cases involving child abuse may therefore commence in a family court—a court that does not have the capacity to investigate child abuse and may not have the power to make the order that is needed. Some cases may commence in a children’s court, but after investigation and intervention by a child protection agency and a decision that the state does not need to intervene, there remains a need to determine which parent a child should live with, and whether he or she should spend time with the other parent. Some children may be the subject of proceedings in both courts.

19.52 There are three main issues that arise from this jurisdictional tangle:

- family courts and their relationship with child protection agencies;
- the power of children’s courts to make parenting orders; and
- the problem of duplication of proceedings, with families in both courts.

Family courts and their relationship with child protection agencies

19.53 Proceedings may commence in the family courts, and allegations of family violence, including abuse of a child, or neglect of a child, may be made in those proceedings. While most family law disputes are resolved by negotiation or family dispute resolution (FDR), a significant number of those cases that go on to be tried in the family courts raise child protection concerns.74 However, whilst children’s courts rely on state child protection agencies to investigate allegations of child abuse and neglect, family courts do not have a mechanism to investigate allegations of child abuse. They rely upon the parties, independent children’s lawyers, family consultants and state child protection agencies to provide them with information to make a decision about children who are at risk. The relationship between family courts and state agencies in this regard has not always been mutually satisfying. Further, it has sometimes appeared to a judicial officer in a family court that the only available option

---

73 In Western Australia and South Australia, the provision in s 69ZK(1) enabling a child welfare officer to give consent to proceedings is inoperative until a relevant proclamation is made under s 69ZF: see A Dickey, Family Law (5th ed, 2007), 276.

for a child is to give parental rights to a state child protection agency, although there is no clear statutory power to do so.\textsuperscript{75}

19.54 In this section, the legal relationship between family courts and child protection agencies will be considered, followed by a summary of the challenges of working together and an identification of some of the gaps in the system and proposals for closing them.

The legal relationship

19.55 Family courts have obligations—discussed below—to inform child protection agencies about allegations of child abuse made in the context of family law proceedings. For evidence about that abuse and its impact on the children, they rely on a number of sources. One source is obviously the parties, but they are often engaged in allegations and counter-allegations or denials about violence. Information from independent sources, such as child protection agencies, independent children’s lawyers, and family consultants is of particular importance.

19.56 A child protection agency may already have relevant information on its own file, such as reports, risk assessments or expert reports. In other cases the agency may only have a record of notification of suspected abuse, but no other information. For example, it may have taken no action in relation to that notification because the notification does not reveal abuse at a level to justify the allocation of resources for a response. In other cases the issue of abuse may be raised for the first time in a family court so that the child protection agency has no record of the child.

19.57 The legal relationship between child protection agencies and family courts is provided for in the Family Law Act, which contains two provisions obliging family courts to notify child protection agencies of child abuse in certain circumstances. First, s 67Z provides that if a ‘Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence’ (Form 4) is filed, the Registry Manager of the court must ‘as soon as practicable, notify a prescribed child welfare authority’.\textsuperscript{76} Secondly, under s 67ZA(2) where an officer or professional in a family court has reasonable grounds for suspecting that a child has been abused, or is at risk of being abused, the person must, as soon as practicable, notify a prescribed child welfare authority of his or her suspicion and the basis for the suspicion.\textsuperscript{77} Section 67ZA(3) provides that a person may—rather than must—notify the relevant child protection agency where the person has reasonable grounds for suspecting that a child has been ill treated, or is at risk of being ill treated; or has been exposed, or subjected, or is at risk of being exposed or subjected, to behaviour which \textsuperscript{75} The case of Ray v Males [2009] FamCA holds that the court does have such a power. That case has been appealed and the judgment is reserved at the time of writing. The case is discussed further below.

\textsuperscript{76} Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67Z(3). ‘Registry Manager’ is defined in s 67Z(4) to mean: (a) in relation to the Family Court—the Registry Manager of the Registry of the Court; and (b) in relation to the Family Court of Western Australia—the Principal Registrar, a Registrar or a Deputy Registrar, of the court; and (c) in relation to any other court—the principal officer of that court’. Chisholm notes that this requires notification ‘whether or not there is plausible supporting evidence’: R Chisholm, The Child Protection–Family Law Interface (2009), 23.

\textsuperscript{77} Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67ZA(2). Section 67ZA(1) sets out the list of relevant court staff and professionals affected by the obligation.
psychologically harms the child. The Chisholm Review suggested that, while notifications by the court are mandatory under s 67Z, the effect of a notice under that section appears to have less weight than notifications by professionals under s 67ZA of the Family Law Act when it comes to a child protection agency deciding whether to investigate an allegation.79

19.58 There are provisions in the Family Law Act that allow family courts to obtain information from child protection agencies. A family court can make an order under s 69ZW in child-related proceedings requiring a prescribed state or territory agency to provide the court with documents or information, including notifications of suspected abuse, assessments and reports. Family courts can also acquire documents by issuing subpoenas under pt 15.3 of the Family Law Rules. For further discussion about these information-sharing provisions, see Chapter 30.

19.59 The Family Law Act also contains provisions concerning parties who intervene in proceedings. Section 92 sets out the general rule that, apart from proceedings for divorce or validity of marriage, ‘any person may apply for leave to intervene’.80 Sections 91B and 92A specifically address intervention where child maltreatment concerns arise. By virtue of s 92A, a prescribed welfare authority is entitled to intervene in proceedings where it is alleged that a child has been abused or is at risk of being abused. Section 91B enables a family court to request intervention by a child protection officer in a matter involving a child’s welfare. An officer who agrees to intervene is deemed to be a party to the proceedings. An officer may also decline to intervene.81 The combined effect of these provisions is that a child protection agency is entitled to intervene where child abuse, or a risk of it, is alleged; may request to intervene; or be requested to intervene. In all cases, once a child protection agency intervenes, it is, ‘unless the court otherwise orders, to be taken to be a party to the proceedings with all the rights, duties and liabilities of a party’.82 This includes potential liability for costs orders.

19.60 There is no express power in the Family Law Act for the courts to compel a child protection agency to intervene. However, in Ray v Males,83 Benjamin J concluded that the court can allocate parental responsibility to a child protection agency even if that agency does not consent, and where it proposes to do so, it has the power to join the agency as a party to the proceedings.

19.61 In that case allegations of abuse were made in relation to two children. Benjamin J was concerned that no parent or other person would be found to be a viable parent for one or both of the children. The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, Tasmania, had been invited—under s 91B— to join the proceedings, but had declined to intervene. Further, the Department did not consent to accept

---

78 Ibid s 67ZA(3). If the relevant person is aware that the authority has previously been notified about the abuse or risk in either case, the person need not notify, but may still do so: s 67ZA(4).
80 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 92(1).
81 Ibid s 91B(2).
82 Ibid s 92A(3).
83 Ray v Males [2009] FamCA.
parental responsibility in relation to the children. Benjamin J considered whether or not he had the power to join the Secretary and whether or not he had the power to make parenting or other orders that would bind the Secretary. He found that it was within the scope of his powers to join a party and that he had the power to make an order imposing parental responsibility on the Secretary when, in his view, there were no other alternatives.

19.62 This decision has been appealed to the Full Court of the Family Court and, at the time of writing, judgment is reserved. If the first instance decision in this case is upheld on appeal, it may be that family courts will, in future, join child protection agencies in cases where they are concerned that there will be no viable parent and they wish to allocate parental rights to the child protection agency.

The challenges of working together

19.63 There are a number of concerns about the operation in practice of the provisions outlined above. Family courts may not be satisfied with the response of child protection agencies to notifications of child abuse by the courts or invitations to participate as witnesses or parties in family law proceedings. For example, in 2009 in Denny & Purdy, Burr J commented that requests for information or for the relevant department to intervene were frequently met with refusal. 84 In Ray v Males, 85 noted above, a request was made by a family court under s 91B for the child protection agency to intervene, but the agency decided that it did not wish to do so, despite the concern of the judge that there may be no viable parent.

19.64 To ameliorate these problems, family courts, child protection agencies and other agencies have developed agreed, coordinated responses to child protection cases that seek to ensure the court has the evidence it needs to make decisions. For example, the ‘Magellan’ case management program applies to serious cases of child abuse in the Family Court of Australia. It relies on non-statutory regulation, such as case management rules and memorandums of understanding (MOU), which create agreed ways of collaborating in serious child abuse cases. Formal and informal agreements about information sharing may also result in arrangements between courts and child protection agencies, designed to ensure that courts have evidence they need from child protection agencies. These information sharing issues are discussed further in Chapter 30.

19.65 Despite such initiatives, it appears that some problems remain. Important to an understanding of these problems are the different cultural and legislative frameworks within which family courts and child protection agencies work, and which drive different responses to child abuse.

19.66 These differences were the subject of comment in the Wood Inquiry into child protection services in NSW. 86 Whilst a family court might notify the relevant child

---

84 Denny & Purdy [2009] FamCA, [34].
85 Ray v Males [2009] FamCA (discussed further below).
19. The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws

19.67 First, the report may not be judged sufficiently serious to justify intervention. Under the Family Law Act, the threshold for making a notification is a suspicion, based on reasonable grounds, that the child to whom the proceedings relate has been abused or is at risk of being abused. \(^{87}\) Under child protection legislation, the standard is generally higher—for example, in NSW it is risk of significant harm. \(^{88}\) There may therefore be different legal and cultural practices and understandings about the appropriate threshold for intervention between family courts and child protection agencies.

19.68 In consultations during this Inquiry, judicial officers and staff in family courts demonstrated a very strong commitment to protecting children in child abuse cases—cases they described as the worst and most difficult cases they deal with. Consultations with child protection agencies, children’s courts and practitioners experienced in both jurisdictions provided a different perspective in which family court cases are not the most difficult cases. There is often some capacity to protect the child if appropriate orders are made: there may be a viable carer and/or some resources of money, stability or emotional capacity to parent. The most difficult and most deserving of cases are those in the children’s courts which are brought because the child protection agency believes that the capacity to keep the child safe is not present in the family.

19.69 Cases such as Ray v Males, where there is a concern that there is no viable or protective parent, would appear to be better dealt with, from start to finish, in a children’s court, because it is that court which has the power to allocate parental responsibility to a child protection agency. The responsibility for taking action in a children’s court lies with a child protection agency. The first possible reason why the agency does not intervene and apply to the children’s court is likely to be that there is a difference of perspective between the family court and the child protection agency about the risk to the child and the viability and safety of other options for the child’s care.

---

87 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67ZA(2). Section 67ZA(3) permits (but does not mandate) notification where a person suspects, on reasonable grounds, ill treatment or exposure to behaviour which would cause psychological harm. Section 67Z requires notification where a party raises an allegation of abuse.

88 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 30(b): a child will only be at risk of significant harm if current concerns exist for the safety, welfare or wellbeing of the child (s 23). In the ACT, emotional abuse will only constitute ‘abuse’ under the Act if it has caused or will cause significant harm to a child’s wellbeing or development: Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 342. In Victoria, a child is in need of protection if the child has suffered or is likely to suffer significant harm from physical or sexual abuse, or suffer significant damage to their emotional or intellectual development as a result of emotional or psychological harm: Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 162. In the Northern Territory, a child is in need of care and protection if the child has suffered or is likely to suffer harm. Harm is an act, omission or circumstance causing a significant detrimental effect on a child’s wellbeing: Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) ss 15, 20. In Western Australia, a child is in need of protection if the child has suffered or is likely to suffer harm as a result of abuse. Harm means a detrimental effect of a significant nature on a child’s wellbeing: Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 28.
19.70 Secondly, a child protection agency may choose not to act because the information provided by the person who notifies the abuse may not disclose sufficient reason to believe the child is at risk of the alleged abuse. For example, while the notifier (often the other parent) may have a belief to that effect, the evidence to support that belief may be insufficient, or a notification may be made without foundation for vexatious purposes.

19.71 Thirdly, the reported concern may relate to events some time in the past, or the child may currently be in a situation where he or she is no longer exposed to the risk disclosed in the report. Child protection legislation generally focuses on current concerns that might justify the involvement of child protection agencies. Thus historic matters, which might be relevant to family law proceedings, may not be sufficient to attract the intervention of the child protection system.

19.72 Fourthly, the child protection agency may decide that the family court is the most appropriate venue. If there is a viable carer and the child is in his or her care, the child is safe from the perspective of the child protection agency. In these circumstances it may be that a child protection agency will prioritise deployment of resources to children who are not safe.

19.73 In consultations the Commissions were also told that child protection authorities may sometimes resist involvement in family courts because, if they were to respond to all requests from the court for information, investigations and participation in family court cases, they would have a flow of work over which they have no control and for which they are not funded. This could divert them from priorities and undermine other work.

19.74 The Commissions were also told that child protection agencies may decline to provide information or to intervene because their involvement with the family has been limited and they have nothing of use on file. Given that NSW Community Services has recently reported that 27% of all children under 18 years were known to the agency, it is hardly surprising that all cases are not exhaustively investigated and that the file in some cases contains very little.

19.75 However, the net effect of these dynamics is that, in some locations at least, family courts expect a response that they do not get from child protection agencies. Family courts need information to assist them in making decisions about children’s safety in cases where there have been allegations of child abuse. They have no investigatory arm through which they can acquire independent evidence. They want the information from child protection agencies, but the agency does not always respond in the way that the court wishes.

19.76 In consultations during this Inquiry it became apparent that the investigatory gap was worse in some locations than in others. Some courts and child protection agencies reported that they had negotiated a relationship that worked well, and meant that family courts had access to child protection information in the possession of state agencies. In other places continuing difficulties were reported. Regional differences were also reported in research by Fiona Kelly and Dr Belinda Fehlberg which showed that difficulties in communication between courts and the child protection agency apparent in Victoria were not present in the ACT. In the ACT, the level of communication between child protection authorities and the court was relatively high, with the child protection agency volunteering information to the court; responding to requests from the court for information; monitoring and supervising cases in response to orders of the Family Court.

---

Gaps in the system and proposals for closing them

19.77 The first gap between the family courts and the child protection system is what might be called the ‘investigatory gap’—caused by the fact that the family courts have no investigatory arm to provide them with independent investigations in cases where child abuse is raised as an issue. The children who are vulnerable in this gap are those who:

- are the subject of family law proceedings involving allegations of child abuse;
- state child protection authorities decide not to assist; or
- are not included in a program such as the Magellan case management program for cases involving serious child abuse.

19.78 For these children, there are allegations of abuse but there may be no agency to conduct an independent investigation of the allegations and to present evidence to the family courts.

19.79 The second gap in the system, which might be called the ‘jurisdictional gap’, arises where a case involving allegations of child abuse is in the family courts and the court wishes to make an order giving parental responsibility to the child protection agency because the judge considers that there is no other viable option for that child.

19.80 One method of dealing with the investigatory gap has been to use agreements, MOUs and other regulatory practices that regulate how cases involving child protection issues in the family court will be managed. In 1997 the ALRC and HREOC approached concerns about the intersection of child protection and family law in the context of optimism that the problem could largely be solved by a cross-vesting scheme. As noted in Chapter 2, the cross-vesting of state jurisdiction in federal courts failed. However the Commissions also recommended that protocols for inter-agency cooperation between the family courts, child protection agencies and children’s courts should be developed and that referrals to state child protection agencies from the courts should be recorded and tracked.

93  Re Wakim; Ex parte McNally (1999) 198 CLR 511.

19.81 The most prominent case management system that relies on agreed methods of working is the Magellan program, concerning serious cases of child abuse in the Family Court of Australia. Magellan has narrowed the gap by providing for agreed ways in which child protection agencies will work with the family courts in child abuse cases. But it has not closed the gap: it does not operate in all regions of Australia or in the Federal Magistrates Court. The expansion of Magellan and other options for collaborative practice are discussed further in Chapter 29.

19.82 A different approach to the investigatory gap was taken in 2002 by the Family Law Council, which recommended that the federal government should establish a federal ‘Child Protection Service’ that would, amongst other things, investigate child protection concerns and provide information arising from such investigations to courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act. The recommendation would have provided a dedicated risk assessment and investigatory resource for federal family courts, as an alternative to, and in the absence of, information from state and territory child protection agencies. However, this recommendation has not been adopted.

19.83 The jurisdictional gap—that the federal family courts cannot make orders under child protection legislation—has also attracted attention. It has been proposed that the states refer their powers in relation to child protection, so that federal family courts may be given the power to make child protection orders. In 2009 the Family Law Council recommended that:

The Attorney General as a member of SCAG address the referral of powers to federal family courts so that in determining a parenting application federal family courts have concurrent jurisdiction with that of State Courts to deal with all matters in relation to children including where relevant family violence, child protection and parenting orders.

19.84 In Chapter 17 the Commissions discuss the limits on the ‘concurrent jurisdiction’ that can be achieved, within the constraints of the Australian Constitution, namely, that the result of any such referral is to confer on the Australian Parliament power to make federal laws in the areas covered by the referral. It cannot give federal family courts direct jurisdiction under state child protection, or other, legislation—this was the flaw in the cross-vesting scheme, as discussed in Chapter 2.

19.85 A referral of power could cover all child protection matters, enabling the Australian Government to expand the power of federal family courts in respect of child welfare matters so that it mirrors the jurisdiction of children’s court. It could be of a more limited nature, dealing specifically with the problem arising in Ray v Males and referring only the power to make an order in relation to child protection in situations where there is no viable and protective parent or other carer and the judicial officer wishes to make an order in favour of the child protection agency.

19.86 In discussing the jurisdictional gap, the Consultation Paper canvassed the Family Law Council proposal, asking if there is any role for a referral of legislative power to the Commonwealth in relation to child protection matters. If that question was answered in the affirmative, the Commissions asked what should such a referral cover.\(^98\)

Submissions and consultations

Investigatory gap

19.87 Stakeholders expressed strong concern in relation to the first gap, that is, the absence of investigatory resources in family court cases involving allegations of child abuse. Stakeholders argued for the need for an investigatory capacity to be provided to family courts, by greater involvement of child protection agencies in family courts or by other means.

19.88 There was also support for family courts having the power to compel the involvement of child protection agencies in cases where there are child protection concerns, and for family courts having the power to join the child protection agency as a party. The two submissions that referred to the forthcoming decision in the appeal in Ray v Males, supported change to the provisions of the Family Law Act for the family courts to be able to compel the involvement of child protection agencies.\(^99\)

19.89 There was also strong support for child protection agencies to play a much greater role in family court proceedings. This support came from many different perspectives—from individuals, from non-government organisations working with victims of violence, from lawyers and from other professional groups and agencies.\(^100\)

The submission of the Australian Association of Social Workers provides an example of a typical response:

> The AASW recommends that child protection agencies have a greater role within family law proceedings. The existing provisions of s 91B and s 92A of the Family Law Act need to be reviewed.

---

\(^{98}\) Consultation Paper, Question 14–5.

Family Violence — A National Legal Response

Law Act need to be re-examined to ensure that they provide the appropriate mechanisms for the involvement of child protection agencies. Reports from child protection agencies where there have been reports of abuse or neglect need to inform decisions made within the family law proceedings to provide the best possible outcome for children.101

19.90 A number of submissions drew attention to the resource difficulties faced by child protection agencies. The Department of Human Services (NSW), for example, suggested that it could provide investigatory services to the family courts, but this would need to be on a fee for service basis.102 The National Abuse Free Contact Campaign and the National Council of Single Mothers and their Children submitted that a specialist section within child protection agencies should be developed to do family court based work and that these sections could be funded federally.103

19.91 Stakeholders reported that in locations with a smaller population, informal working relationships develop and communication, collaboration and sharing of resources are more likely. In regions where liaison between the court and the child protection agency was reportedly good, court staff and others in the system attributed this to the existence or building of good relationships between agencies, facilitated by structures and individuals who knew both cultures and systems, could translate between them, and who were trusted by people in both. Having good people in key positions was seen as crucial to making cooperative relationships work well.104

Jurisdictional gap

19.92 In relation to the jurisdictional gap, two submissions supported the idea of giving family courts the full range of state and territory child welfare powers.105 Two other submissions thought that this issue was complex and would need further careful consideration.106 There was, however, some support for a partial reference of powers to give family courts the ability to exercise child welfare in those limited number of cases, such as Ray and Males, where there is no viable and protective carer available.107

Commissions’ views

19.93 The Commissions are disinclined to repeat the recommendation of the Family Law Council that a federal child protection service be established. It received very limited support in consultations and submissions.108 Moreover, state child protection

---

101 The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010.
102 Department of Human Services (NSW), Submission FV 181, 25 June 2010.
104 For example, Family Court Brisbane, Consultation FVC 97, Brisbane, 20 April 2010.
105 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
107 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Department of Human Services (NSW), Submission FV 181, 25 June 2010; D Bryant, Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and J Pascoe, Chief Federal Magistrate of the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Submission FV 168, 25 June 2010.
agencies have existing expertise and infrastructure in child protection matters. They are also the agencies likely to be working with the child and the family if there are continuing concerns about the safety of children after any hearing in a family court. Establishing a federal agency could create another gap in the system, between a federal agency that provides child protection investigatory services for family courts, and the state agency responsible for working with the family in the longer term.

19.94 The Commissions also note that in some locations there does not appear to be an ongoing problem of collaboration between courts and child protection agencies and the relationship appears to be working to the satisfaction of both. Further, the Magellan program was negotiated between the Court and relevant agencies and appears to have worked very successfully and to have saved resources. In the view of the Commissions, it is highly desirable that the provision of child protection investigatory services in matters before the family courts is dealt with by negotiation, collaboration and agreement (see Chapter 29).

19.95 However, the Commissions are also concerned that the problems outlined above have been identified for many years, that recommendations to deal with them have been made in numerous ways and that, in some locations at least, no solution has been found. The Commissions note the strength of support from stakeholders that this issue be dealt with effectively. In the interests of the children concerned, these problems should not be allowed to persist.

19.96 The Commissions are of the view that investigatory services in family court cases should be provided by state child protection agencies. Further, there is strength in the proposal of the National Abuse Free Contact Campaign and the National Council of Single Mothers and their Children that there should be a specialist section in state child protection agencies to undertake this work. This arrangement would have several advantages including:

- drawing on existing child protection expertise;
- providing a dedicated service responsive to the particular needs of family courts;
- developing expertise within child protection agencies in the needs of family courts;
- providing a resource of people familiar with both systems who can ‘translate’ between the systems and educate participants in both systems; and
- providing a service that is not in competition with resources that need to be devoted to state child protection matters.

19.97 The funding of this service should be negotiated by federal, state and territory governments. Its scope and costs will doubtless vary according to local conditions and existing agreements and practices in relation to these cases. It will be difficult to determine how funding should be divided between state and federal work, but the difficulty of the task does not remove the pressing need to do it. This Inquiry has provided further evidence, if it were needed, of the persistent problems and confirms the need for action to be taken to rectify the situation.

---

19.98 In relation to the jurisdictional gap, given the responses from stakeholders, the Commissions are disinclined to recommend a general reference of child welfare powers to family courts. However, a limited reference of powers to enable the courts to make orders giving parental rights and duties to a child protection agency where there is no other viable and protective carer for a child is supported. A power to join a state child protection agency in this very limited class of cases is also recommended.

19.99 Despite support from submissions, the Commissions are presently disinclined to recommend that federal family courts should have a general power to join a state child protection agency as a party. Many of the supportive submissions responded to the general question of whether federal family courts should have additional powers to ensure that intervention by the child protection system occurs when necessary in the interest of the safety of children. Thus the responses to this question seemed to reflect a more general concern that child protection agencies should play a greater role in family court cases, without necessarily exploring the consequences of compelling state agencies to be a party in family court cases.

19.100 It would be an exceptional step for a court to join an agency as a party against its will. There would be significant cost implications for child protection agencies, in staff time, representation in hearings and possible adverse costs orders. It is also arguable that joining the agency as a party would not achieve a great deal in many cases. Any documents in the possession of the agency can already be accessed through subpoena. The reason for joining the agency as a party in Ray v Males was because the court contemplated making an order that the agency have parental rights and duties. In most cases it would appear that what family courts need from child protection agencies is not that they be a party in the case, but information and investigation of child abuse allegations. The more important question is how that information and those investigations are to be provided.

Recommendation 19–1 Federal, state and territory governments should, as a matter of priority, make arrangements for child protection agencies to provide investigatory and reporting services to family courts in cases involving children’s safety. Where such services are not already provided by agreement, urgent consideration should be given to establishing specialist sections within child protection agencies to provide those services.

Recommendation 19–2 State governments should refer powers to enable the Australian Government to make laws allowing family courts to confer parental rights and duties on a child protection agency in cases where there is no other viable and protective carer. Family courts should have the power to join a child protection agency as a party in this limited class of cases.
The power of children’s courts to make parenting orders

19.101 Some cases start in the child protection context, but are later referred to family courts. A child protection agency may investigate reported abuse or neglect and, during the course of that investigation, identify a viable and protective carer for the child. This may happen before or after proceedings are commenced in a children’s court. If proceedings in the children’s court have commenced, in some jurisdictions they will be withdrawn and the carer will be advised to go to a family court for a parenting order. In some cases, orders will be made in the children’s court that do not include the continued involvement of the child protection agency in the life of the child. In these cases, children’s court orders may be registered in the family courts.

19.102 This section of the chapter begins by identifying the overlapping concerns of the courts in relation to parenting issues and then considers the expansion of the power of the children’s court, in limited cases, to make parenting orders.

Overlapping concerns

19.103 The fact that there is federal family law jurisdiction and state child protection legislation and that both deal with issues of who a child shall live with, who the child shall spend time with, and protection of that child, also creates difficulties where the issue of child abuse is raised first in the state context. For example, rather than raising an allegation of child abuse in family court proceedings, a parent or another person may first notify a child protection agency that they have concerns about the child’s safety. That agency will investigate, and if it concludes that the child is in need of care and protection, it will commence proceedings in a children’s court. Although there are some exceptions, generally it is a child protection agency that must commence such proceedings.110

19.104 The question of whether the case should be in the children’s court or a family court may arise at three different stages. First, during the agency’s investigation, but before it has commenced proceedings in a children’s court, the agency may identify a viable and protective carer for the child and refer the carer to a family court. Secondly, the child protection agency may already have commenced proceedings in a children’s court and it may identify a viable and protective carer. It may then withdraw its application in the children’s court and advise that carer to make an application for a parenting order in a family court.

19.105 Thirdly, after a hearing in a children’s court, it may become apparent that, although the child protection matters are resolved, there is still a dispute, for example between parents who cannot agree who the child shall live with and who it shall spend time with. Orders of a children’s court may not include the continued involvement of a child protection agency, but may instead regulate the parents’ involvement with a...

---

110 In the ACT, someone other than the chief executive may apply for a protection order with the leave of the Court: Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 425. Protection applications in Victoria may be made by the Secretary, or by a member of the police force: Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 181, 240(1), 240(3), 243.
child. For example, courts in some states can make orders under the child protection legislation in relation to who may have contact with a child, and the conditions of that contact. In other states, courts are only able to make orders prohibiting contact by certain parties—they are unable to establish a contact regime. When the children’s court makes orders regulating parental contact these orders can be registered in the family courts.

Children’s court or family court?

In a family violence context, an illustration of the issues is provided by the example of children regarded as being at serious risk from family violence. A report is made to a child protection agency and that agency concludes that the mother may be a viable carer if the violent father is excluded from the home and from contact with the mother and children. The mother may be advised by the child protection agency to go to a family court for a parenting order. A parenting order in a family court may be desirable for the agency because, if the children are with a viable and protective carer, the conditions for a care order (that the child is in need of care and protection) no longer apply. Further, if these children are now considered safe, the agency’s resources need to be used to protect other children who are at risk.

The mother may also prefer an order from the family court rather than the continuing involvement of the child protection agency in her life and that of her children. However, there may be problems involved in referring these cases to the family courts, especially if the applicant does not receive support from the child protection agency in making the application.

First, the viable carer may not take action in the family courts, so that there may be no enforceable order securing the safety of the children, either under the Family Law Act or under state and territory family violence legislation. In the example above, if the mother does not secure the arrangements in relation to the children with an order and the father takes them or fails to return them after spending time with them, she will have no order on which to rely and the children may be at risk.

Secondly, in the family court, the applicant may have difficulty in securing the order that was envisaged by the agency as being safe and protective for the children. The applicant may have difficulty marshalling evidence of violence and abuse. Providing evidence of violence to a standard sufficient to satisfy family courts

---

111 In NSW, Victoria, Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania and the ACT, the court can make orders in relation to contact when it makes other orders relating to the care of the child: Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s79(2)(b); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 283(1)(e); Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 63(1); Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) s 38(1)(f); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 42(4)(e); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 464(2)(a). In Queensland and the Northern Territory, the court may only prohibit contact: Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 61(b); Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 124(2).

112 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 70C, 70D and 70E provide for this registration. The effect of registering an order is that it has the same force and effect as a family court order under pt VII of the Act.
may be difficult and is rarely attempted, except in the most severe of cases. Further, where cases involving child protection concerns are transferred to the family courts, it may be that the applicant wishes to, or has been advised to, seek an order excluding or strictly limiting contact with a violent parent. As noted in the Chisholm Review, certain provisions of the Family Law Act may impede the extent to which the court is informed about any history or risk of family violence. In particular, concerns have been raised about s 60CC(3)(c)—the ‘friendly parent’ provision—and s 117AB, that provides for costs orders if the court is satisfied that a party to proceedings knowingly made a false allegation or statement in the proceedings. Thus the outcome may not be the one envisaged by the child protection agency that sent the applicant to the family courts and it may be one that puts the children at risk.

Evidence of these problems is provided from several sources. In 2002, the Family Law Council argued that there will be some cases where it is appropriate to leave it to a viable carer to seek orders in a family court, for example where all that is needed is to formalise an agreed arrangement. However, in other cases it will be ‘an abrogation of the public responsibility to ensure that children are protected’, because a parent may find it very difficult to take responsibility for presenting a case to court. There may be language problems, problems understanding the legal system, or problems receiving or maintaining legal aid. Victims of domestic violence or other abuse may find it very difficult to take responsibility for a legal battle with the perpetrator when they remain fearful of the former partner’s propensity for violence.

For these reasons, if the child can be adequately protected through orders made under the Family Law Act, then in some cases it may be very important for child protection authorities to take the lead in presenting the case for orders which will protect a child.

Empirical research and scholarly commentary also provides evidence of the problem. An evaluation of the Magellan program in 2001 noted that cases were being shifted from children’s courts to family courts at the instigation of child protection agencies. It was noted there that cases that had been in the children’s court were disproportionately represented in the cases that went the full length of proceedings in the Family Court in the Magellan program and were the most expensive in terms of the costs of representation of the children.

In Kelly and Fehlberg’s 2002 study of child protection cases in the Victorian Children’s Court, it was revealed that the Department of Human Services sought to withdraw its Children’s Court application in 80 out of 113 cases because a viable carer had been identified and that carer had obtained, applied for, or was willing to apply for family court orders. In some cases, family court orders were not obtained. However, 62 of these cases were tracked in the family court. Family court orders in favour of the identified viable carer were obtained in 56 of the tracked cases but, in 6 cases, the orders were not in favour of the identified viable carer. In one case, the agency identified the father as the viable carer and referred the family to the family court, but had no further involvement. The children were placed in the care of their mother, from whom the child protection agency had twice removed them and whose situation had not changed significantly.

117 Ibid, 38.

19.113 In this study, the Department of Human Services very rarely played any role in the family court proceedings to which they referred carers, appearing in only six of the 62 tracked cases. The researchers identified some cases involving serious violence and high levels of concern about children’s safety where children were left without orders.

19.114 In Kelly and Fehlberg’s study, the Victorian Department of Human Services recommended that carers apply for family court orders because such orders would provide stability for the children. While orders of children’s courts, including orders about whom a child is to live with, may be of limited duration, parenting orders under the Family Law Act may remain in force until the child is 18. Unfortunately, stability was not necessarily an outcome for the children in the family courts. Kelly and Fehlberg identified a number of cases where there were repeated applications and orders. In their sample, the actions of child protection agencies in referring viable carers to the family courts did not always achieve the aims of an enforceable order, an order in favour of a parent identified by the agency as a viable parent and a stable situation for the child.

19.115 Professor Thea Brown and Dr Renata Alexander have also commented that referring viable carers in child protection cases to a family court is not always effective and that there are conflicts and gaps in the systems.

19.116 Evidence of this problem also came from consultations and submissions. One participant in the ALRC’s Family Violence Online Forum provided an illustration of this dilemma:

120 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 65H. The Children’s Court of Victoria, when making a protection order, may only grant custody to a third party for a period of less than 12 months: Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 283(1)(d).

For instance, the [child protection department] get contacted in relation to the safety of a child due to family violence allegations etc. They advise the mother to take out an intervention order excluding the father from the home or they will have no choice but to remove the child from her care. The mother then takes out an intervention order excluding the father. The department then make an assessment that their involvement is not warranted in the case as they deem the mother to be acting protectively.

The problem … arises when an application is made in the family court jurisdiction by the father to spend time with the children.

At the Family or Federal Magistrates Court, the mother explains why she is seeking that the father have no contact or supervised contact with the children. She says she was advised by [the child protection department] to restrict contact. [The child protection department] however have not provided any written evidence of this advice, except to advise the court that they have no reason to be involved where the mother is acting protectively.

The mother is then left in court by herself, without [the child protection department] providing support to the mother’s position. The mother then has to explain why she is acting as an ‘unfriendly parent’ (as per the Family Law Act) by not facilitating contact.123

Proposals for closing the gap

A number of proposals have already been made in relation to the problems identified above. These proposals are reviewed before the responses from stakeholders are considered. The first proposal is for child protection agencies to stay engaged with more parents when they advise them to apply to the family court. The second is that the jurisdiction of the children’s courts be extended to allow them to make orders under the Family Law Act, so that where cases are commenced in the children’s courts and it becomes evident that a parenting order under the Family Law Act is more appropriate, that court can make such an order.

Change of practice of child protection agencies

Greater support for parents with family violence and child protection concerns who litigate in family courts may be achieved by a change of practice by child protection agencies, in favour of staying engaged with more families at an appropriate level. In some cases, no further intervention will be required because the desired orders are achieved by consent. In other cases the intervention required will be limited to providing a letter detailing the nature of the advice given to the applicant by the child protection department. In others it may involve voluntary provision of documentation (rather than reliance on subpoena or s 69ZW of the Family Law Act), the provision of practical support during FDR and/or litigation, or involvement in the case through intervention under s 92A of the Family Law Act. Kelly and Fehlberg describe this type of intervention in their study of cases in the ACT—albeit in relation to a small sample.124

123 Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.
19.119 The consequences of providing this support would place a greater responsibility on child protection agencies. However the consequences of not providing it would appear to be that some children are placed at risk. If the recommendation above, of specialist units within child protection services dealing with family law work, is accepted, these units could be a resource for litigants referred to the family courts by the agency, as well as for the court in requesting investigation of child abuse. This may ameliorate the burden on state child protection departments.

19.120 Further, it may be that the required support for some clients does not need to be provided by a child protection agency, but could be provided, for example, by a domestic violence court support worker, parenting support, counselling support or other services.

Expanding jurisdiction of children’s courts

19.121 The second proposal to close this gap in the system involves giving children’s courts powers to make orders under the Family Law Act so that those courts could make a parenting order in an appropriate case rather than referring the parent to a family court. In ALRC Report 84, the ALRC and HREOC considered that, in principle, there is no procedural reason for this limitation on the jurisdiction of state and territory children’s courts and recommended the vesting of federal jurisdiction under s 69J of the Family Law Act in children’s courts. 125 In its report on Family Law and Child Protection, the Family Law Council recommended that ‘the Family Law Act should be amended to allow Children’s and Youth Courts to make consent orders regarding residence and contact in certain circumstances’. 126

19.122 While children’s courts in some states can make orders under the relevant child protection legislation in relation to who may have contact with a child, and the conditions of that contact, in other states, courts are only able to make orders prohibiting contact by certain parties—they are unable to establish a contact regime. 127

---

125 Australian Law Reform Commission and Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission, Seen and Heard: Priority for Children in the Legal Process, Report 84 (1997), Rec 122. This proposal was repeated by the VLRC—Victorian Law Reform Commission, Review of Family Violence Laws: Report (2006), Rec 77 stated that the Child, Youth and Families Bill 2005 should be amended to declare the Children’s Court a court of summary jurisdiction, so the court can exercise powers under the Family Law Act to make, vary, discharge or alter a family law child contact order. See also Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 48(2); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ss 17(1)(f), 456(4)(c).

127 In NSW, Victoria, Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania and the ACT, the court can make orders in relation to contact when it makes other orders relating to the care of the child: Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 79(2)(b); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 283(1)(e); Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 63(1); Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) s 38(1)(f); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 42(4)(c); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 464(2)(a). In Queensland and the Northern Territory, the court may only prohibit contact: Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 61(b); Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 123(2).
19. The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws

19.123 Each state and territory court of summary jurisdiction is vested with jurisdiction under pt VII of the Family Law Act.128 Magistrates are able to exercise federal family law jurisdiction under s 69J of the Family Law Act, but children’s court magistrates are not able to do so—because s 69J confers powers on ‘each court of summary jurisdiction’, and it appears to be generally accepted that children’s courts are not courts of summary jurisdiction.129 However, where magistrates sit in both children’s courts and the general jurisdiction of the magistrates court, it would appear that while the judicial officer has no jurisdiction to make orders under the Family Law Act when sitting in the children’s court, the same judicial officer does have the power to do so when sitting in the magistrates court.

19.124 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether children’s courts should be given more powers to ensure orders are made in the best interests of children that deal with parental contact issues and, if so, what those powers should be.130 The Commissions also asked whether the Family Law Act should be amended to extend the jurisdiction that state and territory courts already have under pt VII to make orders for a parent to spend time with a child.131

Submissions and consultations

Involvement of child protection agencies

19.125 There was overwhelming support from stakeholders for child protection agencies to be more involved in family court proceedings.132 For example, the Law Society of NSW stated that ‘child protection agencies should intervene in Family Courts more often as they have a useful and relevant role to play’.133 The Office of the 128 Other than proceedings for granting leave for adoption proceedings: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 69J(1). But note that much of what is given under s 69J is taken away by s 69N which requires the transfer to family courts of contested proceedings, except with the consent of the parties.

---

129 Family Law Council, Family Law and Child Protection: Final Report (2002), 82; Australian Law Reform Commission and Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission, Seen and Heard: Priority for Children in the Legal Process, Report 84 (1997), [15.50]. There may be room for debate about this issue, which will depend on interpretation of particular state legislation. However, leaving such issues aside, it appears to be the accepted practice that children’s courts refer cases to a family court rather than exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act.

130 Consultation Paper, Question 14–1.

131 Consultation Paper, Question 14–2.

Child Safety Commissioner in Victoria also submitted that child protection agencies should be required to play a much more active role in family law proceedings and ‘it is critical that kinship carers are not abandoned by child protection when cases go across the state or territory and federal systems’.

19.126 Stakeholders also raised concerns that child protection agencies were passing on matters to family courts, sometimes with adverse consequences. For example, the National Peak Body for Safety and Protection of Parents and Children argued that child protection agencies avoided involvement in family court cases ‘handballing this to family courts … so the children and vulnerable mums are falling through the cracks in the system’.

Expanding power of children’s courts

19.127 With respect to the question whether children’s courts should be given power to make parenting decisions under the Family Law Act, many submissions responding to this question did so in a general way by supporting the idea that one court should deal with all child protection cases. For example, the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service submitted that:

> the current two court system for dealing with children’s matters is clumsy, confusing for families and can lead to inconsistent outcomes when two jurisdictions take different approaches.

19.128 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria observed that:

> When dealing with a family and determining issues affecting that family, the capacity to exercise all jurisdictions is sensible and avoids inconsistent responses from different courts on the same facts. The child’s best interests should be the focus not the appropriateness of a particular jurisdiction.

19.129 Submissions also mentioned the problems of the lack of coordination between the two systems and the need for improved integration to provide a holistic approach, consistent with the ‘one court’ principle. One submission also argued specifically for ‘a more seamless approach’.

19.130 However, a number of concerns were raised in relation to increasing the jurisdiction of children’s courts to deal with Family Law Act matters. The first was the complexity of the task that would be faced by magistrates called upon to make orders under both child protection and family law. Cases involving child protection issues, including family violence, are complex cases. The Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate submitted that courts exercising jurisdiction under both state or territory child protection legislation and under the Family Law Act would

---

137 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
138 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
be dealing with legislation which contains ‘many significant and fundamental differences’.139 Children’s court judicial officers may be full time specialists but, more frequently, they also sit in the very broad general jurisdiction of magistrates courts. Adding Family Law Act proceedings to the list of matters to which they must attend would add significantly to their tasks.140

19.131 The concern noted above, that magistrates courts presently have jurisdiction under the Family Law Act but rarely exercise it, was also mentioned in submissions, although specialist family violence courts were named as an exception.141 It was suggested that the reluctance of magistrates to use their powers may be based on a feeling that they do not have the requisite expertise.142 Concerns of this nature led the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate to suggest that:

In child protection proceedings where contact between parents arises as an incidental matter it is difficult to see an objection in principle to this being determined in a state child protection court. Once a child protection issue has been determined however, the state court’s jurisdiction in what is otherwise a federal family law issue should cease.143

19.132 The importance of specialised courts, both for children’s cases144 and for family law matters,145 and the need for training for judicial officers who do this work was argued by a number of submissions.146 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria agreed that there will be a need for training, but emphasised that Victoria has learned from the benefits of specialised courts dealing with family violence cases.147

19.133 A further concern was that children’s courts are presently operating over capacity. Adding another jurisdiction to their workload would require additional resources.148

141 D Bryant, Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and J Pascoe, Chief Federal Magistrate of the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Submission FV 168, 25 June 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
144 Ibid; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010.
147 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Along with strong support for one court to deal with children’s matters and the need for a more seamless system, there was also much support for further consideration and investigation of this proposal before action is taken. The Queensland Government, for example, argued that this option would require some fundamental changes to accommodate significant differences between the two systems. One example of a practical issue is that children’s courts are closed courts, whereas family courts are not. National Legal Aid suggested that the pilot scheme proposed in Western Australia to integrate family law and child protection cases in the state family court could be used as a pilot for the extension of the jurisdiction of the children’s courts in other states.

Commissions’ views

Involvement of child protection agencies

The Commissions acknowledge the powerful case for child protection services having more involvement in family court proceedings where they investigate allegations of child abuse and refer carers to family courts for orders. There will be cases where a simple referral is all that is required and the applicant has the capacity to secure the orders needed. However, this is clearly not sufficient to provide effective protection for all families and some children appear to be endangered by this gap in the system. Therefore, where a child protection agency investigates child abuse, locates a viable and protective carer, and refers that carer to a family court for parenting orders, the agency should, in appropriate cases, provide written information to a family court about its advice and the reasons for it, provide reports and other evidence as appropriate and/or intervene in the proceedings.

If the recommendation of the Commissions for a specialist service within child protection agencies for family court cases is accepted, it may be appropriate that this service could also provide support for such litigants. Alternatively it may be that what is required in some cases is not support from a child protection agency but from a court support service that would facilitate the referral and access to other supports.

Expanding power of children’s courts

ALRC Report 84 criticised legal processes which required a child’s persistent and multiple engagement with the legal system as being contrary to the child’s best interests.\textsuperscript{153} It is also at odds with the goal of seamlessness that the Commissions have identified as a principal aim of this Inquiry.\textsuperscript{154} The Commissions’ view is that, wherever possible, matters involving children should be dealt with in one court—or as seamlessly as the legal and support frameworks can achieve in any given case.
19. The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws

19.138 This was also the outcome recommended by the Family Law Council in 2002 as part of its ‘one court principle’—that is, that state and territory courts should have a broad power to make residence and contact orders under the Family Law Act in child protection proceedings so that one court can deal with all substantive matters and ensure the child’s best interests and welfare are addressed.\textsuperscript{155}

19.139 The best interests of children and those who care for them is clearly served by being able to have all issues dealt with by one court. It is those children and their families who pay the price for the failure to imagine a better and undivided system, and to implement it. The Commissions therefore recommend that, when a matter is before a children’s court, such court should have the same powers to make decisions under the Family Law Act as do magistrates courts. This should include the expanded powers recommended in Chapter 16.

19.140 Expanding the jurisdiction of children’s courts in this way would have the advantage that, where a case commences in a children’s court but raises parenting issues, a court apprised of the child protection concerns and having evidence from a child protection authority would be able to decide if it were more appropriate for a decision to be made under child protection legislation, or under the Family Law Act. It would have jurisdiction to make both types of orders.

19.141 The Commissions acknowledge, however, that there are arguments against giving children’s courts powers under the Family Law Act. For example, while magistrates courts presently have the power to make orders under pt VII of the Family Law Act, they appear to be disinclined to use those powers. As noted in Chapter 16, this may be because:

- magistrates may not be familiar with their powers under the Family Law Act;
- legal representatives may also not be familiar with those powers and may not request that they be used or argue effectively for their use;
- decisions under pt VII of the Family Law Act are complex decisions and there may be concerns about falling into appealable error; and
- magistrates courts have limited time available in busy court lists—making these decisions would be an added burden.

\textsuperscript{154} See Ch 3.
19.142 Similar considerations may well be relevant to children’s courts making decisions under the Family Law Act and it is therefore important that, accompanying any expansion of jurisdiction, the necessary resources are committed for children’s courts to be confident in exercising these powers.

19.143 Further, FDR is often used to resolve family disputes and its availability may be limited in children’s courts. However, there is a developing use of FDR in child protection cases (see Chapter 23). Further, FDR services are community based, rather than court based, and can be accessed by litigants with parenting issues who commence in children’s courts. Hence the Commissions consider that this is not a powerful argument against expanding children’s court jurisdiction.

19.144 However, the Commissions are also cognisant of the complexity of making the proposed changes, involving, as they do, a shift in decision making about parenting in some cases of child abuse to children’s courts. Issues of resources, training and concerning the fundamental differences in the perspectives of children’s and family courts and in the legislation under which they act, were some of the reservations expressed by stakeholders.

19.145 The Commissions therefore suggest that the work proposed in Western Australia, involving integration of family law and child protection issues, be used as an instructive pilot, to identify the benefits and challenges of this change in more detail and to inform future developments in other states and territories.

Recommendation 19–3 Where a child protection agency investigates child abuse, locates a viable and protective carer and refers that carer to a family court to apply for a parenting order, the agency should, in appropriate cases:

(a) provide written information to a family court about the reasons for the referral;

(b) provide reports and other evidence; or

(c) intervene in the proceedings.

Recommendation 19–4 The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to give children’s courts the same powers as magistrates courts.

Families in both courts—duplication of proceedings

19.146 The possibility that proceedings will be duplicated also arises in child protection cases. For example, proceedings may be commenced in a children’s court by a child protection agency but, whilst those proceedings are in train, a parent who wishes to spend time with her or his children, will make an application to a family court for an order. While orders of family courts defer to those of children’s courts, both the parties and the court may nevertheless expend considerable time and effort dealing with the same family and the same facts. Children who are mired in these parallel proceedings may be subjected to stress, uncertainty and perhaps repeated contact with courts and other agencies in two jurisdictions.
19.147 In most states and territories, the relevant child protection authorities and family courts have entered into protocols that assist in coordinating cases that may be in family courts or children’s courts.

19.148 This problem has received repeated judicial and academic attention and criticism. In 1995, the Hon Alistair Nicholson CJ (as he then was) said in Re Karen:

It is all too common for departments in the states and territories and this court to be proceeding along parallel, but divergent tracks in relation to issues of children’s welfare.

19.149 The ALRC and HREOC noted the same problem in their joint report in 1997.

19.150 The Family Law Council observed in 2002 that there is a ‘need for state and territory government to reach agreement with the Commonwealth at the highest levels to … avoid unnecessary duplication of effort and confusion of orders’. Again, in 2009, the Council noted that many families are involved in proceedings in more than one jurisdiction, with increased likelihood that inconsistent orders may be made, people will be put at risk, and will suffer added strain.

19.151 The research by Kelly and Fehlberg in 2002, noted above, provides empirical evidence of cases where proceedings were on foot in both courts at the same time with very little communication between the two courts. In one case, despite the provisions of s 69ZK(1) discussed above, conflicting orders were made in the children’s court and the family court on the same day. Communication did take place in some cases, but Kelly and Fehlberg concluded that whether or not this happened seemed to be a function of which social worker was allocated to the case. They also noted in their sample some very complex cases involving long term litigation in both courts, where the availability of two jurisdictions to the parties appeared to have offered them two opportunities to argue their cases to the full, ‘accentuating the emotional harm to the children’.

---

163 Ibid, 55.

164 Ibid, 56.

165 Ibid, 56.
19.152 Professor Thea Brown and her co-researchers evaluating the Magellan program also found cases involving duplication of proceedings in both courts.\textsuperscript{166} She asked why there were cases that involved a final hearing in two different courts, why there was duplication of time, effort and funding, and what impact the duplication has on the children involved.\textsuperscript{167} In half of the cases reviewed, families were involved in other legal proceedings. Although some of this duplication may be unavoidable, it caused delays and stress to the children who were involved in multiple legal proceedings.\textsuperscript{168} It is likely that some duplication of proceedings relates to cases that are particularly complex and difficult to manage. Nevertheless, one of the lessons of the Magellan program appears to be that if multiple and complex problems are dealt with in one court, there will be discernible benefits to the parties, the children and in reducing costs.\textsuperscript{169}

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

19.153 Although few stakeholders referred specifically to duplication of proceedings as an issue, the focus of many submissions was the more general point that there should be only one court dealing with these issues. For example, the Victorian Office of the Child Safety Commissioner referred to the importance of reducing duplication, and removing the need for attendance at multiple courts and repeated court appearances.\textsuperscript{170} UnitingCare Children, Young People and Families submitted that there should be consistency in the MOUs and protocols between family courts and child protection agencies, with cross-jurisdictional training in interpretation of these protocols.\textsuperscript{171}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

19.154 The Commissions have a continuing concern that the existing protocols and MOUs that govern the relationship between family courts, children’s courts and child protection agencies may not be operating effectively and that the impact on children will be detrimental. The recommendations made above for increased involvement of child protection agencies in family courts and for children’s courts to exercise jurisdiction under the \textit{Family Law Act} may resolve some of the problems of duplication. In addition to these measures, family courts and children’s courts should review their protocols and practices for communicating about cases in both courts and improve that communication so that duplication does not occur.

\begin{footnotes}
\footnotetext[167]{Ibid, 38.}
\footnotetext[168]{Ibid, 47.}
\footnotetext[169]{Ibid.}
\footnotetext[171]{UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, \textit{Submission FV 151}, 24 June 2010.}
\end{footnotes}
Recommendation 19–5  Federal, state and territory governments should ensure the immediate and regular review of protocols between family courts, children’s courts and child protection agencies for the exchange of information to avoid duplication in the hearing of cases, and that a decision is made as early as possible about the appropriate court.
20. Family Violence, Child Protection and the Criminal Law

Contents

Introduction 933
Criminal offences relating to child protection 935
   Specific offences 936
   The location of offence provisions 938
   The form of the offence provisions 941
   Penalties for offences under child protection laws 941
Information sharing between child protection agencies and the police 944
   Confidentiality of reporters 944
   Deciding whether to prosecute 950
   Mandatory reporting of children’s exposure to family violence 955
Protection orders and children—the current legal framework 960
   Magistrates courts 960
   Children’s courts 962
   Commissions’ views 968
Child protection and juvenile justice 973
   Commissions’ views 978

Introduction

20.1 The interaction of state and territory child protection laws with a range of other state and territory laws is one of the areas under consideration in this Inquiry.1 This chapter focuses on the intersections between child protection law, the criminal law and the law relating to family violence protection orders, and considers ways to address gaps between child protection and criminal laws to improve the protections for children whose safety is threatened in situations involving family violence.

20.2 As noted in Chapter 4, the various laws under consideration reflect different purposes. Child protection laws operate within a child welfare paradigm, the main purpose of which is to provide measures to assist and support children and young people who are in need of care and protection.2 A consistent theme across all child protection laws—and one which is shared with the family law jurisdiction, considered in Chapter 19—is that the welfare and best interests of the child are the paramount

---

1 See Ch 1.
2 See Ch 19.
consideration.\(^3\) In a child welfare context, central to determining the best interests of a child is the importance of preserving the integrity of the family unit and promoting a child’s positive relationships with his or her family by offering support and assistance to the family. Consistent with this philosophy is the obligation on the state to limit its intervention in the relationship between a child and parent to that which is necessary to secure the safety and wellbeing of the child.\(^4\)

20.3 The purposes of family violence legislation in the states and territories are expressed in various ways, a common theme of which is ensuring, facilitating or maximising the safety and protection of persons, including children, who fear or experience family violence or are exposed to it. The protection of children is central to both child protection laws and family violence protection orders.

20.4 Criminal laws, however, have different purposes, focusing upon the maintenance of social order and defining the fundamental requirements for a person’s treatment of others. Central to the concept of criminality are the notion of individual culpability and the criminal intention for one’s actions.\(^5\) Where family law disputes are regarded as ‘private’ disputes, concerning litigation between individual litigants, criminal law is ‘public’ because it is the state which is responsible for the investigation and prosecution of offences. Common to both the criminal law and child protection law is the central role played by the state.

20.5 The recommendations made in this chapter reflect the context of the different purposes that each legislative regime serves. The chapter begins with an examination of specific offences of child abuse and neglect contained in child protection legislation and the criminal law, which in large part reflect the grounds upon which a legislative child protection intervention is triggered. This is followed by a discussion of specific issues relating to information sharing between the two central agencies responsible for executing the state’s child protection and prosecution functions—the child protection agency and the police. The Commissions make recommendations aimed at facilitating greater information sharing and cooperation between these two agencies to ensure a more coordinated and effective response to child abuse and neglect. The specific issues considered include: permitting otherwise confidential information to be shared with law enforcement agencies in limited circumstances; fostering the involvement of the child protection agency in decisions to prosecute; and promoting more constructive and effective reporting practices by police. The chapter also discusses—and makes recommendations in relation to—the powers of children’s courts to make family violence protection orders, and their capacity to refer concerns for the safety of

\(^3\) Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 9(a); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 10(1); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 5(1); Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 7; Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) s 4(1); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 8(2)(a); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 11; Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 9.

\(^4\) See, eg, Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 9(2)(c); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 10(3)(a). See also Chs 4, 19.

\(^5\) Australian Law Reform Commission, Preceded Regulation: Federal Civil and Administrative Penalties in Australia, Report 95 (2002), [2.9]. See also Ch 4.
20. Family Violence, Child Protection and the Criminal Law

children and young people, that arise in the course of proceedings, to child protection agencies for investigation and report.

Criminal offences relating to child protection

20.6 Parents, caregivers and those with parental responsibility have a duty, at law, to provide children in their care with the ‘necessities of life’, which includes providing financial support, food, clothing, accommodation, healthcare and access to education.6 The duty normally extends to children up to the age of 16 years, but may apply to older children in some circumstances, for example, where the child has a disability. Parents and caregivers also have a duty to protect children in their care from harm, including harm that is caused as a result of abuse or neglect.

20.7 The failure of those with parental responsibility to provide for the basic needs of children in their care, or to protect them from harm as a result of abuse or neglect, may constitute an offence under general criminal law or under child protection laws, thus exposing the parent or caregiver to criminal proceedings and the consequences of a criminal conviction.

20.8 As noted in Chapter 19, child abuse and neglect are often closely linked to family violence. An offender may be abusing both a parent and children; exposure to incidents of family violence between adults may be a risk to the child’s health and safety; or violence may interfere with a person’s capacity to be an effective parent.

20.9 Serious cases of child abuse and neglect, causing permanent or fatal injury to a child, are usually dealt with under the general criminal law as an offence of violence—for example, assault or manslaughter. Sexual abuse is also dealt with under the criminal laws of each state and territory which create a number of sexual offences against children.7 Sexual offences are dealt with in Part G of this Report, which also considers the difficulties of collecting forensic evidence and the provision of better support to victims in order to reduce rates of attrition. This section will not deal in detail with the application of these general offences.

20.10 The criminal law also creates a number of specific offences relating to child neglect and abuse. The creation of specific offences recognises that the criminal law has an important role to play in child abuse and neglect, on the basis that a function of the criminal justice system is to define acceptable standards of behaviour. Prosecution of an offender when those standards are breached sends a clear message to the community, denounces abusive or neglectful conduct, punishes the offender and acts as both a specific and general deterrent, to prevent the offender and others from committing or recommitting the same offence. The importance of the criminal law in

---

6 See, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 43A(2); Criminal Code (Qld) s 364; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 30; Criminal Code (Tas) ss 144, 145; Criminal Code (NT) s 183. Parents also have a primary duty to house, educate and provide for their children under the Child Support (Assessment) Act 1989 (Cth) s 3.

7 See, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) ss 66A–66D; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) ss 45–49A; Criminal Code (Qld) ss 210, 215; Criminal Code (WA) s 320–322; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) ss 49, 58; Criminal Code (Tas) ss 124–125A; Criminal Code (NT) s 127.
labelling child abuse and neglect as unacceptable and a violation of children’s rights was emphasised in a number of submissions to this Inquiry.\(^8\)

20.11 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions identified three issues in relation to provisions dealing with offences against children: whether the offence provisions are more appropriately placed in child protection statutes or in the general criminal laws of the states and territories;\(^9\) whether the way in which the offence provisions are currently drafted—which varies across all the jurisdictions—creates practical difficulties for law enforcement agencies, such that it affects decisions to bring prosecutions;\(^10\) and whether the penalties prescribed for these offences are appropriate.\(^11\)

20.12 The offences under each set of laws will be considered first, followed by a consideration of submissions and consultations with respect to these three issues.

Specific offences

Offences under child protection legislation

20.13 In four jurisdictions, there are child abuse and neglect offences in child protection legislation. In Western Australia, a person with the care and control of a child must not do an act, or fail to do an act, knowing (or recklessly disregarding) that the conduct may cause significant harm to a child from abuse (physical, sexual, emotional or psychological) or neglect.\(^12\) The relevant legislation defines ‘neglect’ to include the failure by the child’s parents to provide adequate care or effective medical, therapeutic or remedial treatment for the child.\(^13\) The penalty is imprisonment for up to 10 years.

20.14 In Victoria and Tasmania, it is an offence for a person who has a duty of care to a child to take, or fail to take, action that has either resulted in harm to the child, or has the potential to cause harm.\(^14\) The maximum penalty ranges, respectively, from 12 months imprisonment to two years.

20.15 NSW child protection law makes it an offence for any person—not just one who has care of a child—to do an act intentionally that causes or appears likely to cause injury or harm to a child or young person.\(^15\) It is also an offence for a person who has care of a child or young person to fail to provide the child or young person with

---

\(^10\) Ibid, Questions 13–1, 13–3.

\(^12\) Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 101. ‘Harm’ is defined as any detrimental effect of a significant nature on the child’s wellbeing: s 28(1).

\(^13\) Ibid s 28(1).

\(^14\) Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 493; Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 91(1).

\(^15\) Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 227.
adequate and proper food, nursing, clothing, medical aid or accommodation. Both these offences attract a maximum monetary penalty of 200 penalty units, the value of which is currently $22,000.17

20.16 A number of child protection laws also make it an offence for a person who has care and control of a child to leave a child unattended and unsupervised either in a motor vehicle, or more generally. In NSW, the offence is framed more broadly to apply to any person, not only one who has care and control of a child.20 Again, the penalties for these offences vary substantially across the jurisdictions—from a monetary penalty in NSW to a term of up to five years’ imprisonment in Western Australia.21

20.17 Other offences contained in child protection legislation include removing a child or young person from the care of a person who has protection and care responsibility under the relevant Act, and offences concerning tattooing, branding and body piercing.23

Offences under general criminal legislation

20.18 In four jurisdictions—Queensland, South Australia, the ACT and the Northern Territory—offences relating to child abuse and neglect are contained in general criminal laws. The criminal statutes of NSW and Tasmania also contain more serious offences relating to the abuse and neglect of children.

20.19 Under the criminal legislation of NSW, Queensland, Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania, the ACT and the Northern Territory, it is an offence for a person with parental responsibility to fail to provide a child—generally defined as a child under the age of 16 years—under his or her care with the ‘necessities of life’—generally defined as the provision of accommodation, food, clothing and access to healthcare, and education. In NSW, the maximum penalty is imprisonment for five years; in the ACT, it is two years. In Queensland, South Australia and Tasmania, maximum penalties of three years imprisonment apply where the neglect endangers the child’s health.

---

16 Ibid s 228.
17 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 17.
18 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 231; Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 102.
19 Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 494; Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 92.
20 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 231.
21 Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 102. The penalty for a summary conviction is three years imprisonment and a fine of $36,000.
22 See, eg, Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 229; Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 496.
23 See, eg, Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) ss 230–230A; Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 103.
24 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 43A; Criminal Code Act 1899 (Qld) ss 177, 286; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 39; Criminal Code (WA) s 263; Criminal Code (Tas) ss 144–152; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 39; Criminal Code (NT) ss 149, 183.
20.20 In Queensland, it is an offence for any person who has the care and control of a child to cause harm to a child aged below 16 years by reason of failing to provide for the child, deserting the child or leaving the child without means of support. In a number of jurisdictions it is also a crime to abandon or expose a child where that act endangers the life of the child or may cause serious injury, although the provisions vary in terms of the age of the child. In the Northern Territory, for instance, the offence relates to a child aged under two years, while in NSW and Queensland, the offence applies to a child aged under seven years. These offences attract maximum penalties ranging from five to seven years imprisonment, some depending on the age of the child.

20.21 There is some variation among the elements of the offence provisions in the criminal laws of the states and territories. Most require the prosecution to prove either an intentional or reckless act or omission and that the child has suffered, or was placed at risk of suffering, a high degree of harm such as serious injury or danger of death. Section 43A of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW), for instance, provides that a person with parental responsibility for a child who intentionally or recklessly fails to provide the child with the ‘necessities of life’ is guilty of an offence if the failure causes a danger of death or serious injury to the child. By contrast, under s 30 of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA)—which applies not only to children but to vulnerable adults—the prosecution must show failure to provide food, clothing or accommodation, but it does not require the prosecution to prove risk of harm.

The location of offence provisions

20.22 The question of whether offences against children for abuse and neglect should be contained in child protection legislation or in criminal laws attracted substantial, but quite diverse, comment. A number of stakeholders argued that the offences ought to be located in general criminal laws as this would clearly label the behaviour as a violation of children’s rights and a crime, thus sending a clear message to the community that such behaviour is unacceptable. Some submissions expressed the view that violence against any person should be an offence under general criminal law, and that the law

---

25 Criminal Code Act 1899 (Qld) s 364. In Tasmania, it is an offence to ill-treat a child aged below 14 years: Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 178.

26 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 43; Criminal Code (Qld) s 326; Criminal Code (NT) s 184. See also, Criminal Code (WA), which makes it an offence for a parent (who is able to maintain a child) to desert a child under the age of 16 years: s 344.

27 See, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 43A inserted by Crimes Amendment (Child Neglect) Act 2004 (NSW). This is distinct from the similar offence in s 228 of the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) which does not require the prosecution to prove that the failure by a person with parental responsibility to provide adequate care and support to the child has caused harm.

28 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 30.

30 Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010. should not treat acts of abuse and neglect against children any less seriously than it treats such acts committed against adults.

20.23 National Legal Aid and Professor Julie Stubbs supported locating the offence provisions in general criminal laws on the basis that the offences may be more useful there, given that similar offences in child protection legislation were rarely, if ever, prosecuted. The Queensland Government also took this position, arguing that the primary purpose of child protection legislation is to work with families in order to promote the safety of children in the least intrusive way to meet the child’s needs. It said that, while the two systems work in parallel with each other, a child protection response is not, nor should it be, contingent on securing a conviction. The Queensland Government submission noted that its criminal legislation provides for a wide range of specific and general offences against children.

20.24 In contrast, a number of other submissions, including the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria and the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that offences against children for abuse and neglect should be retained in child protection legislation because of its child-focused approach. As one stakeholder commented:

We need a dedicated legislation and legal system that focuses on children and young people as the priority, with personnel who are trained and understand the needs of children and young people, and concepts of harm and the detrimental effect this has on children. I would be very concerned if the focus was on criminal laws, as these do not have a particular focus on children, and this is needed, to ensure their rights and needs are prioritised. I believe that moving this to criminal law would be a significant step backwards in achieving children’s rights to safety and protection from harm.

20.25 Another group of stakeholders was of the view that offences of abuse and neglect of children should be contained in both criminal laws and in child protection laws, depending on the degree of abuse or neglect. One stakeholder submitted that offences against children for abuse and neglect have a place in both general criminal legislation and child protection legislation. It suggested that the legislation should draw a clear link between abuse and neglect of children and domestic and family violence.
The onus should be on holding the person who commits acts of violence accountable for the abuse and neglect of children in cases where there was evidence of domestic and family violence, rather than blaming the non-abusive parent—usually the mother—

34  Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.
35  F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010.
36  Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June
2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010;
Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010.
for failing to protect the child. This was a persistent criticism of the response of the child protection sector to family violence.

Commissions’ views

20.26 The major advantage of locating the offence provisions in child protection legislation, rather than in criminal laws, is that decisions as to whether to bring proceedings are subject to a consideration of the objects and principles of the legislation. These make the best interests of children the paramount consideration. It also facilitates the involvement of child welfare experts in harm assessments, and in decisions to investigate and prosecute alleged offences, therefore ensuring appropriate protective responses. On the other hand, locating offence provisions in a criminal statute clearly marks the behaviour as serious, outside the confines of acceptable behaviour and criminal in nature.

20.27 As discussed previously, there is a fundamental distinction between criminal law, on the one hand, and civil law—child protection and family violence legislation—on the other hand. The former looks to past behaviour, with a focus on punishment of the offender and retribution for the victim, while child protection and family violence legislation are forward-looking. Their common and principal objective is to protect and secure the future welfare of those who are at risk of harm caused by family violence—typically by imposing conditions that regulate the behaviour and movements of those who have committed family violence.

20.28 This complex interrelationship between criminal and care and protection issues lends support to the Commissions’ view that the strongest approach to decisions about how to deal with offences against children involves co-operative relationships between key agencies that bring different interests, skills and responsibilities to the process. For example, in NSW, Joint Investigation Response Teams—made up of community services caseworkers, the police and health professionals—undertake joint investigation of child protection matters. In the Northern Territory, the Child Abuse Taskforce also includes Indigenous representatives and other agencies as required in their joint investigations. These and other inter-agency cooperative arrangements are discussed in more detail in Chapter 29.

20.29 The Commissions note the various approaches taken by different states and territories, and acknowledge the diversity of views and responses on the location of these offence provisions and the force of arguments on both sides. The appropriate response to the fact that there are strong arguments in favour of locating the offence provisions in criminal law and in child protection legislation may be to place them in both, and to make a decision about which legislation to use depending on factors such as the nature and severity of the offence. However, the Commissions conclude, on the basis of the submissions received, that there is not sufficient weight of evidence to justify making a specific recommendation.

37 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.
The form of the offence provisions

20.30 Few submissions addressed the question in the Consultation Paper about the way the offence provisions are currently drafted. The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria commented that there may be cause for a review of the offence provisions if the requirement to prove intention was deterring prosecutors from bringing prosecutions. The Courts submitted that Victorian courts have not dealt with offences of child abuse or neglect under s 493 of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic), although five people were sentenced for leaving a child without supervision or care in 2007–08. However, it also noted that circumstances giving rise to the charge were more likely to be dealt with by way of referral to the child protection agency where the emphasis is on the need to ensure future safety of the child:

Usually the best interests of a child will be served by maintaining a relationship with the child’s parent. This suggests a need to prioritise protection over prosecution in all but the most serious cases.

20.31 The Commissioner for Children (Tas) also noted that prosecutions had rarely, if ever, been brought for child abuse or neglect under s 91 of the Tasmanian child protection legislation, attributing this largely to the difficulty faced by a prosecutor to secure a conviction. The Commissioner noted that the provision ‘may well be there for educational impact rather than as a prosecutorial tool’.

Commissions’ views

20.32 The low number of submissions raising this as an issue of concern suggests that the way the offence provisions are framed was not a pressing issue for the safety of children. Low levels of prosecution were indicated in two submissions, but may be the result of a number of factors. Any concerns about particular offence provisions may be best dealt with by individual jurisdictions. The Commissions do not, therefore, make any recommendation in relation to the form of the offence provisions.

Penalties for offences under child protection laws

20.33 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked what range of penalties ought to be available for offences under child protection legislation. The Commissions considered whether, where a prosecution is brought under child protection legislation, alternative penalties should be available to the court other than imprisonment or a court-imposed fine. Such penalties may include community service orders or conditional bonds that might, for example, impose conditions requiring offenders to participate in offender rehabilitation programs designed to address risk factors. associated with the offender’s conduct, such as alcohol and substance abuse. They may therefore be more likely to produce an effective outcome, in terms of rehabilitation, retribution and deterrence, than the imposition of a court fine.

20.34 A range of community-based, non-custodial sentencing options are widely available in all Australian jurisdictions, generally as an alternative to a sentence of imprisonment, although in some jurisdictions, such as Victoria, they are also available as an alternative to a fine. These include options such as community service orders, and orders that require participation in programs designed to address offending behaviour.

20.35 In all jurisdictions where imprisonment is a possible sanction for child abuse and neglect offences—that is, in all jurisdictions except NSW—the normal sentencing alternatives to prison would be available under the jurisdictions’ sentencing laws.

20.36 A particular issue arises in NSW, where the only sentencing option available to a court for a child abuse or neglect offence under the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) is to impose a fine or give a bond under s 10 of the Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW). Such a bond allows the court to discharge an offender without conviction on conditions that may include a requirement that the offender participates in a treatment or rehabilitation program. The Commissions note that imprisonment was a penalty under the previous NSW child welfare legislation, and this would have allowed access to a wider range of community-based sentences. The 2008 Report of the Special Commission of Inquiry into Child Protection Services (Wood Inquiry) declined to reinstate imprisonment as a penalty for abuse and neglect offences in the NSW legislation on the basis that it was not in the best interests of the child, particularly in the case of a parent offender, because to do so would be likely to exacerbate underlying risk factors.

43 See, eg, Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 8.
44 Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 36. See also Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Sentencing Manual (2009), [14.2].
45 The maximum penalty under the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) is 200 penalty units.
46 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 10(1) provides that, where a court finds a person guilty of an offence, the court may make an order: dismissing the charge, discharging the offender on condition that the person enter into a good behavior bond for up to 2 years, or discharging the offender on condition that the offender agrees to participate in an ‘intervention program’, where the court is satisfied under s 10(2A) that such an order would reduce the likelihood of the person committing further offences by promoting the treatment or rehabilitation of the person.
47 Child Protection Act 1987 (NSW), repealed.
Submissions and consultations

20.37 A number of stakeholders submitted that a full range of penalties should be available for offences against children contained in child protection laws, up to, and including, imprisonment.49

20.38 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria submitted that the focus should be on ensuring that the sentencing court has the flexibility to craft orders that reflect the circumstances of each particular case.50 It noted that, in Victoria, the court is able to apply a full range of penalties—including penalties to advance rehabilitation such as community-based orders—and can take into account the wide range of scenarios that might fall within the legislation, the ongoing role of an offender as a parent and the best interests of the child affected by the abuse or neglect.

20.39 The availability of community-based orders to divert offenders to relevant programs aimed at addressing associated issues, such as family violence or drug and alcohol abuse, was widely supported.51 However, a concern was expressed that these need to be linguistically and culturally appropriate and offenders need to be supported so that they understand clearly what the orders require; how to comply with them; and the consequences of breaching them.52 The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd cited the Wulgunggo Ngalu Learning Place as an example of a culturally-appropriate place for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander men who are undertaking community-based orders. The program aims to help these men successfully complete their orders while teaching life skills to reduce the likelihood of return to offending behaviour.53

20.40 Another significant concern was that community-based orders are not widely available outside metropolitan areas. The unavailability of programs in rural and remote areas hampers judicial officers in sentencing. It results in some people being sentenced to imprisonment, and fails to offer rehabilitation or other therapeutic interventions that might address underlying problems.54

Commissions’ views

20.41 It would appear that the only state in which there are limited sentencing options available in relation to abuse and neglect offences under child protection legislation is NSW, where imprisonment was removed as a sentencing option in 1998, when the new

49 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 160, 24 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.
50 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
53 Ibid.
child protection legislation was introduced. However, as discussed above, NSW courts do have some capacity under the Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 to impose a bond on an offender, where it considers a bond appropriate. Furthermore, where there is enough evidence, the police also have the option to bring proceedings under the criminal law, where a wider range of sentencing options are available to the court. For these reasons, and in view of the conclusions reached by the Wood Inquiry, as noted above, the Commissions make no recommendation.

Information sharing between child protection agencies and the police 20.42 The investigation, and prosecution, by law enforcement agencies of serious offences alleged to have been committed against a child or young person may be hampered by laws that do not clearly permit relevant information to be shared with the police. Consequently, the ability of the criminal justice system to protect the safety not only of the alleged victim but also of other children and young people may be compromised.

Confidentiality of reporters

20.43 Child protection laws across Australia make it an offence for a person to disclose the identity of a person who makes a report to a child protection agency, or to disclose information contained in a report from which the reporter’s identity could be revealed, except to the extent that disclosure is made in the course of performing official duties under the legislation, or where the reporter has consented. In some jurisdictions, the circumstances in which relevant information that is otherwise confidential may be shared has been broadened. These provisions are examined below.

20.44 Child protection legislation also generally precludes information which would reveal the identity of the reporter from being admissible in court proceedings, unless the court is satisfied that the information is of critical importance to the proceedings, and that failure to allow it to be tendered as evidence would prejudice the proper administration of justice.

20.45 In the context of a possible criminal prosecution, the concern is that these provisions may prevent the disclosure to police of information that might assist in a prosecution.

56 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 29(1); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 41, 129–130, 190; Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 186–188; Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) ss 23, 124F, 141, 240–1; Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) ss 13, 52L; Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) ss 16, 103; Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ss 846, 868–871; Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 27(2) 150, 195, 221.
57 See, eg, Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 29(2); Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 240(4); Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 27(2). See also Ch 30.
20.46 Where child protection workers and police officers are working together as part of an integrated joint response team, such as Queensland’s Suspected Child Abuse and Neglect Team (SCAN) or Western Australia’s ChildFirst Assessment and Interview Team, collaborative arrangements between police and child protection agencies are generally governed by agreement.\(^{58}\)

20.47 However, it seems that there may be some confusion in practice when the matter falls outside the brief of a joint inter-agency team. In a recent inquiry into child protection services in Victoria, the Victorian Ombudsman found that child protection workers were confused about what information they could, and could not, share. One misapprehension was that child protection workers could not disclose the identity of reporters to Victoria Police when investigating allegations of physical or sexual abuse against children.\(^{59}\) This is despite an express provision in the Victorian legislation that allows a protective intervener—defined as the Secretary of the child protection agency or a member of the police force—to share information, including the identity of a reporter, with another protective intervener or to a person in connection with a court proceeding, including proceedings in the Family Court.\(^{60}\)

20.48 Recent amendments to the Children and Young People (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW), implementing recommendations made by the Wood Inquiry,\(^{61}\) were designed to avoid this uncertainty. The NSW legislation now provides that information from which a reporter’s identity may be revealed can be shared with a law enforcement agency in clearly defined circumstances. Those circumstances are:

- where the information is disclosed in connection with the investigation of a serious offence alleged to have been committed against a child or young person; and
- where the disclosure is necessary to safeguard or promote the safety, welfare and wellbeing of any child or young person;\(^{62}\) and, as an added safeguard,
- where a senior law enforcement officer certifies that obtaining the reporter’s consent may prejudice the investigation, or where the person or body making the disclosure certifies in writing that it is impractical to obtain the consent of the reporter.\(^{63}\)

---

\(^{58}\) But note, the Queensland SCAN unit is established and governed under the Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) to investigate serious allegations of child abuse and neglect. The role and responsibilities of SCAN members and the relevant information sharing protocols are outlined in sections 159I–159L of the Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld). For information on inter-agency teams in other jurisdictions, see Ch 29.

\(^{59}\) Ombudsman Victoria, Own Motion Investigation into the Department of Human Services Child Protection Program (2009), [78]–[79].

\(^{60}\) Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 209.

\(^{62}\) Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 29(4A).

\(^{63}\) Ibid s 29(4B). The Act also requires the reporter to be advised of the fact that his or her identity has been disclosed, or that the contents of their report have been disclosed, except in certain circumstances: s 29(4C).
Child protection legislation in Western Australia was also amended in 2008 to broaden the circumstances in which identifying information about a reporter can be disclosed. Among the circumstances listed, the Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) provides that identifying information can be disclosed to, or by, a police officer for the purpose of, or in connection with, an investigation of a suspected offence, or for the conduct of a prosecution of an offence, relating to the child. The provision is narrower than the NSW provision as it is confined to the investigation and prosecution of an offence alleged to have been committed against the child who is the subject of the report.

Consultation Paper

In the Consultation Paper the Commissions proposed that state and territory child welfare laws be amended to permit the disclosure of the identity of the reporter, and of information contained in the report from which the reporter’s identity could be revealed, to a law enforcement agency of any Australian jurisdiction in particular circumstances. Using the NSW legislation as a model, the Commissions suggested that a person be permitted to disclose the identity of a reporter, or the contents of a report from which the identity of the reporter may be revealed where:

- the information is disclosed in connection with an investigation of a serious offence alleged to have been committed against a child or young person; and
- the disclosure is necessary to protect a child or young person.

Wherever possible or practical, the Commissions proposed three safeguards:

- that the reporter’s consent always be sought first as a matter of best practice;
- the legislation should require a senior law enforcement officer to certify in writing beforehand that obtaining consent would prejudice the investigation of the offence, or that obtaining consent is impractical; and
- the person who disclosed the identity of the reporter should notify the reporter of that fact unless to do so would prejudice the investigation concerned.

The purpose of the proposal was to remove any uncertainty that exists about what information may be provided to a law enforcement agency, and thus remove any impediment to an effective criminal justice response.
Submissions and consultations

20.53 The Commissions received numerous submissions on these proposals, the majority of which supported the proposals to the extent that individual jurisdictions did not already allow protected information to be shared with a law enforcement agency.67

20.54 The governments of Tasmania and Queensland both submitted that the current exceptions in their legislation adequately permit disclosure to the police of otherwise confidential information because disclosure is made in the performance of official functions under the legislation, and is therefore ‘authorised by law’. 68 If there is any doubt that this is the case, the Queensland Government noted that the confidentiality of information relating to the reporter may be overridden by a court order where a court considers it appropriate. It argued, therefore, that the current provisions adequately enable information sharing between the police and relevant agencies in the child protection sector. The Queensland Government also submitted that disclosing the reporter’s details to police for situations not connected with the investigation of an offence had the potential to compromise the effectiveness of the legislation by deterring people from reporting their suspicions.69

20.55 The principal concern of those stakeholders that were opposed to the proposals was that paring back the protections given to reporters would deter people from reporting suspected cases of child neglect and abuse. 70 While many acknowledged—and agreed with—the purpose of the proposal, there was a concern that the measure would discourage people from making reports to child protection agencies because of fear of repercussions or retribution from their family or their community if it became known that they had made the report. This may be of particular concern in small or regional communities.

20.56 A number of stakeholders also highlighted the need for child protection agencies to take into account the safety of the reporter before disclosing confidential information to a law enforcement agency, particularly where issues of family violence were evident or suspected.71

67 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 131, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.

68 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010. See also Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 186(2).

20.57 The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd submitted that, in the majority of cases, information that would be most relevant in a criminal investigation rests in the content of the report, and not necessarily its source, although there may be instances when the credibility of the source may also need to be tested. It advocated for some protections for reporters to be maintained.\(^{72}\)

Commissions’ views

20.58 As abuse and neglect of children often occurs in the privacy of the home, it is essential that people in our communities—particularly professionals who see children in the course of their everyday work—report their concerns to child protection agencies. To encourage people to make reports, child protection laws contain a suite of protections for reporters. These include provisions that protect reporters’ identities and that protect them from civil actions in defamation or breaches of professional standards when reports are made in good faith. Mandatory reporting provisions in state and territory laws also impose a duty on certain people to report safety concerns about children to relevant agencies.\(^{73}\)

20.59 For this reason, the Commissions consider that the confidentiality provisions applying to reporters should only be overridden in exceptional circumstances. Even when these exceptional circumstances exist, the reporter’s consent should always be sought first, wherever possible and practical.

20.60 In the Commissions’ view, those exceptional circumstances must include where the information is sought by a law enforcement agency in connection with the investigation of a serious offence alleged to have been committed against a child. This is to ensure that an effective criminal justice response is activated to protect not only the child who is the victim of the alleged offence, but of other children whose safety may also be at risk.

20.61 A number of child welfare laws contain limited provisions that allow information to be shared between people in the course of performing official functions under the legislation. However, the Commissions are not persuaded that these provisions are always sufficiently clear to permit disclosure of otherwise confidential information about a reporter to a law enforcement agency for the purpose of investigating an alleged criminal offence against a child. Uncertainty about the law causes people working in the sector to adopt a risk-averse approach,\(^{74}\) refusing to disclose potentially crucial information because of fear of breaching privacy or secrecy laws. This may, in turn, hinder a proper and timely investigation by the police of serious offences alleged to have been committed against a child, and may subsequently \(^{73}\) See Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) ss 23, 27; Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 162, 184; Education (General Provisions) Act 2006 (Qld) ss 365–366; Public Health Act 2005 (Qld) ss 158, 191; Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) ss 3, 124B; Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) ss 6, 10–11; Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) ss 3, 4, 14; Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ss 342, 356; Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) ss 13–16, 26.

\(^{74}\) Ombudsman Victoria, Own Motion Investigation into the Department of Human Services Child Protection Program (2009), [78]–[79].
affect the ability to prosecute the offences. In this regard, the Commissions note that some jurisdictions—including NSW and Western Australia—have amended their laws to make it clear that information about a reporter may be disclosed to the police for the purpose of an investigation of a serious offence in relation to a child.

20.62 To the extent that it is not already clearly provided for in individual jurisdictions, the Commissions recommend that state and territory child protection legislation be amended, based on the NSW legislation, to authorise a person to disclose the identity of a reporter, or information contained in a report from which the reporter’s identity may be revealed, to a law enforcement agency where:

- the information is disclosed in connection with the investigation of a serious offence alleged to have been committed against a child or young person; and
- the disclosure is necessary for the purpose of safeguarding or promoting the safety, welfare and wellbeing of any child or young person, whether or not the victim of the alleged offence.

20.63 The Commissions also recommend that disclosure only be authorised where the person or body that discloses to a law enforcement agency the identity of the reporter certifies beforehand that seeking the reporter’s consent is impractical, or a senior police officer certifies that this would prejudice the investigation. If such information is disclosed, the reporter should be advised of that fact as soon as practicable, unless to do so would prejudice the investigation.

20.64 The legislation should also define a law enforcement agency broadly to include federal, state and territory police in order to allow information to be shared across state and territory borders.

20.65 The Commissions’ recommendations are limited to the purpose of investigating the commission of an alleged serious offence against a child or young person, and where there is a concern for the safety of a child or young person. They are intended to ensure that legislative provisions do not prevent the sharing of information in circumstances where there is a risk to the safety of a child or young person. The recommendations are consistent with the broad recommendations, in Chapter 30, that family violence and child protection legislation should clearly set out which agencies and organisations may use and disclose information and in what circumstances. This will provide clarity for those being asked to disclose the information, and ensure that any disclosure is consistent with child protection legislation, and with relevant privacy and secrecy legislation, as the disclosure is ‘authorised by law’.75

20.66 As with a number of recommendations made in this Report, these recommended legislative amendments must be supported by providing appropriate training to people working in the child protection sector, in both government and non-government agencies, to enhance their understanding of the amendments and implement appropriate arrangements to ensure the laws operate as intended. Chapter 31 acknowledges the importance of ongoing education and training programs.

---

75 Privacy legislation and the exception for disclosure that is ‘required or authorised by law’ is discussed in Ch 30.

20.67 The Commissions’ recommendations accord with the overarching objective of this Inquiry—to address gaps in service provision that have arisen in practice where governing legislative frameworks intersect—in order to improve safety outcomes for women and children who are victims of family violence and abuse.

Recommendation 20–1

State and territory child protection legislation should authorise a person to disclose to a law enforcement agency—including federal, state and territory police—the identity of a reporter, or the contents of a report from which the reporter’s identity may be revealed, where:

(a) the disclosure is in connection with the investigation of a serious offence alleged to have been committed against a child or young person; and

(b) the disclosure is necessary to safeguard or promote the safety, welfare and wellbeing of any child or young person, whether or not the child or young person is the victim of the alleged offence.

The information should only be disclosed where:

(a) the information is requested by a senior law enforcement officer, who has certified in writing beforehand that obtaining the reporter’s consent would prejudice the investigation of the serious offence concerned; or

(b) the agency that discloses the identity of the reporter has certified in writing that it is impractical to obtain the consent.

Where information is disclosed, the person who discloses the identity of the reporter, or the contents of a report from which the identity of a reporter may be revealed, should notify the reporter as soon as practicable of this fact, unless to do so would prejudice the investigation.

Deciding whether to prosecute

20.68 The decision whether to commence a prosecution of offences committed against children is a significant aspect of the criminal justice process. In the majority of cases, the decision whether to prosecute rests with the police. However in the case of serious indictable offences, where a child has suffered significant physical or sexual assault, or has been killed, it is a matter for the state or territory director of public prosecutions.

20.69 Although prosecutorial policy varies across the jurisdictions, prosecutorial discretion is guided by two principal criteria: first, whether there is sufficient reliable

---

76 Supported by the National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
77 The police are generally responsible for prosecuting all summary matters in a local or magistrates court, except where the charge relates to child sexual assault or a matter involving a police officer.
evidence to support a conviction (the ‘prima facie test’); and secondly, whether it is in the public interest to bring a prosecution.

20.70 In relation to the first criterion, a number of factors are relevant in assessing whether there is enough evidence to support a conviction, including the availability, competence and reliability of witnesses, and the availability of any lines of defence to the defendant.

20.71 Once the prosecutor is satisfied that there is sufficient evidence to justify making a decision to prosecute, or to continue a prosecution, the second key consideration is whether or not it is in the public interest to pursue the prosecution. There is a long list of non-exhaustive factors that may be taken into account when determining this issue, including:

- the seriousness of the offence;
- any aggravating or mitigating factors;
- the age, intelligence and mental health of the offender, the victim and any witnesses;
- the degree of culpability of the alleged offender;
- whether or not the proceedings or the consequences of any resulting conviction would be unduly harsh or oppressive; and
- the prevalence of the offence and the need for general deterrence.

78 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Prosecution Policy for the Commonwealth: Guidelines for the Making of Decisions in the Prosecution Process, cls 2.4–2.5; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, cl 4(2); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 2.1.3; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Qld), Director’s Guidelines, cl 4(i); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (SA), Prosecution Policy, 3; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Statement of Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2005), cl 24; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Tas), Prosecution Guidelines; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT), Prosecution Policy, cl 2.5; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NT), Guidelines, cl 2.1. See also Ch 26.

79 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Prosecution Policy for the Commonwealth: Guidelines for the Making of Decisions in the Prosecution Process, cl 2.8; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, cl 4(3); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 2.1.6; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Qld), Director’s Guidelines, cl 4(ii); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Statement of Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2005), cl 23; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (SA), Prosecution Policy, 4; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Tas), Prosecution Guidelines; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT), Prosecution Policy, cl 2.5; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NT), Guidelines, cl 2.1. Note that the guidelines for Queensland, Western Australia and the Northern Territory somewhat conflate the two tests, in that the question of whether a prosecution is in the public interest is informed by inquiring into whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the order of the inquiry, the considerations which inform the exercise of the prosecutor’s discretion are substantially similar across the jurisdictions.

80 See, eg, Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, cl 4(3). See also Ch 26.
In matters concerning the abuse or neglect of children, a decision to bring a prosecution against a parent can have a devastating impact on the family. This issue was considered by the ALRC in its 1981 report, Child Welfare, where the ALRC recommended that:

Prosecutions should therefore be initiated only after careful deliberation. The police should be encouraged to consult representatives of welfare agencies before a decision to prosecute is taken. Further, when a prosecution has been initiated, procedures should be introduced which will facilitate the withdrawal of the proceedings when this is desirable.\(^81\)

When matters are referred to a joint or inter-agency team, the decision as to whether to initiate proceedings against a person may be made by the police in consultation with the child protection agency, or at least communicated to the child protection caseworker involved, as directed under policy and procedure manuals.

In Queensland, unless a matter is urgent, the police are statutorily required to consult with the child protection agency before investigating an offence against a child whom a police officer knows or suspects is a child in need of care and protection, or before initiating proceedings.\(^82\) The intention of the provision is to ensure that police and the child protection agency agree on the best strategy to proceed with an investigation and to determine whether initiating proceedings would be in the child’s best interests. In Victoria and Tasmania, a requirement exists for police to consult the child protection agency before bringing a prosecution but only in relation to offences contained in the child protection legislation.\(^83\) These provisions recognise that the child protection agency has an interest in decisions to initiate proceedings against a parent, where such action may conflict with the agency’s work with the family to address the underlying risk factors that have given rise to the abuse or neglect.

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought feedback about the need for, or appropriateness of, statutorily requiring the police to consult with the relevant child protection agency before commencing an investigation or bringing proceedings in respect of an alleged offence against a child whom the police considered to be in need of care and protection.\(^84\)

Submissions and consultations

All stakeholders who addressed this issue all agreed that cooperation between the police and the child protection agency was critical in responding appropriately and effectively to allegations that a child had been abused or neglected, and for improving outcomes for children and their families.\(^85\) The relationship between the police and the 82 Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 248B.

---

83 Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 493(2), 494(2); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) ss 91(2), 92(2)(b).
84 Consultation Paper, Question 13–9.
child protection agency was considered to be central to more consistent and better coordinated responses to child abuse and neglect. As one organisation, Berry Street Inc, commented:

Whilst legislative reform is part of the way forward any legislative reform is only as good as the practice reform that follows. The key here is not legal changes. The main issue is the culture of the relationship between child protection, the police and non-government services which are often the third ‘player’ with the most direct relationship with a family and insight into the circumstances confronting children.

It is important to understand how the professionals, service and agencies view each other. An example of this may be that if the police have an assumption that [the] child protection [agency] is not assisting them with their work but rather making their work more difficult they will be less [likely] to investigate an alleged offence against a child where the child is suspected of being in need of care and protection. Thus children at risk can receive a different level of intervention not based on the level of risk but the working relationship between police and child protection.86

20.77 In particular, it was considered appropriate and desirable for police to consult with child protection experts when assessing harm or risk of harm to children and young people.87 One stakeholder said that consultation between the police and child protection agencies concerning the investigation of alleged offences against children should be encouraged within child protection laws as a means of assisting police when exercising their prosecutorial discretion.88 Similarly, National Legal Aid submitted that child protection authorities should have collaborative working arrangements with the police to ensure that offenders are prosecuted in appropriate cases.89

20.78 A number of submissions noted that, in many states and territories, the relationship between the police and the child protection agency was governed by inter-agency protocols or guidelines, which emphasised consultation and cooperation between the agencies. The general consensus was that these non-legislative cooperative arrangements were working well in practice, and that legislative change was only desirable if administrative arrangements were not operating effectively.90

20.79 The Queensland Government submitted that the statutory requirement in s 248B of the Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) applies only where the child is not already known to the child protection agency. Where the child is known to the Department of Child Safety, the Queensland Government stated that there are processes already in place—namely, the inter-agency SCAN teams—to ensure that the Department is aware of any police involvement with the child, and to facilitate cooperation between the two agencies.91

87 F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010.
88 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.
89 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
90 Ibid; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010.
There was a concern expressed in some submissions that imposing a legislative requirement on the police to consult with the child protection agency may interfere with the duty of the police to investigate all suspicions of criminal activity, or may delay appropriate action being taken to protect the child who was the subject of the allegations.

The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) advocated against statutorily requiring the police to consult with the child protection agency on the grounds that, as mandatory reporters, the police were nevertheless required to report a child in respect of whom it had care concerns to the child protection agency. It stated that existing protocols between the child protection agency and the police provide mechanisms for determining what action should be taken which both protects the child and ensures police are able to investigate and prosecute alleged crimes effectively and efficiently.

Commissions’ views

A key recommendation of this Inquiry is the promotion and fostering of integrated responses in order to improve outcomes for children and their families, and to make the legal response as seamless as possible in the relevant circumstances. Inter-agency collaboration is an essential feature of integrated responses.

Collaboration between the police and the child protection agency—together with other relevant agencies—is central to ensuring an appropriate and effective criminal justice and child protection response to allegations of child abuse and neglect, particularly where they arise in the context of family violence. This inter-agency collaboration depends on a shared understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence both within and across each jurisdiction, which must be reflected in the protocols and guidelines that govern the cooperative arrangements.

The benefits of closer collaboration are many: police can draw on the expertise of child protection caseworkers to make harm, or risk of harm, assessments; and can acquire a better understanding of the impact on the child and the child’s family of a likely prosecution, and a likely sentence on conviction. This will ensure that all relevant factors are properly considered by the police when exercising their discretion to prosecute, so that prosecutions are initiated only in appropriate cases.

Where a matter is the subject of a joint inter-agency response, the Commissions note that consultation between the police and the child protection agency is generally covered by the terms of the inter-agency agreement that governs those arrangements. The two agencies are jointly involved in the investigation of child abuse or neglect allegations, therefore reducing trauma on the victim by having to repeat their story, and

---

92 Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010. See also Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
93 Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010.
94 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
95 Recommendation 29–2.
96 See Ch 29.
97 See Part B.
98 Recommendation 29–1.
are required to coordinate the services they provide to the child and non-offending family members. Responses received in submissions and consultations indicated that, where joint inter-agency response teams are involved, these administrative arrangements appear to be working effectively in practice to ensure consultation between the police and the child protection agency.

20.86 There may be a gap in service integration and cooperation if a matter being investigated by the police is not referred to joint investigation—for example, if it does not meet the relevant criteria for referral to the joint investigation unit. However, the Commissions note that where the police are investigating alleged offences of abuse or neglect of a child, as mandatory reporters they must make a report about the child to the relevant child protection authority. Even if a matter is not allocated to a joint inter-agency team, it is probable that the police will consult with the child protection agency in reporting their concerns for the child.

20.87 The issue is whether consultation should be statutorily required, or whether it should be facilitated through the use of administrative mechanisms. The Commissions consider that the key to fostering good working relationships between the police and the child protection agency is more likely to be achieved by building trust and by promoting cultural change both within and across the agencies, rather than by legislative compulsion. As the Commissions conclude in Chapter 29, the success of integrated responses relies to a large extent on strong and visionary leadership, shared principles and objectives, clear inter-agency arrangements, and an ongoing and responsive relationship between the parties. All of these elements can be put in place without a legislative basis. Accordingly, the Commissions recommend that state and territory law enforcement, child protection—and other relevant agencies—should develop a framework for consultation about law enforcement responses when allegations of abuse or neglect of a child, for whom there are care and protection concerns, are being investigated by the police.

Recommendation 20–2 State and territory law enforcement, child protection and other relevant agencies should, where necessary, develop protocols that provide for consultation about law enforcement responses when allegations of abuse or neglect of a child for whom the police have care and protection concerns are being investigated by the police.

Mandatory reporting of children’s exposure to family violence

20.88 As discussed in Chapter 19, there is a substantial body of research that demonstrates the co-occurrence of child abuse and family violence, and the impact that exposure to family violence has on the long-term health and welfare of children. Consequently, children’s exposure to family violence is now acknowledged in all state and territory child welfare legislation as either a distinct category of child abuse or as a ground in itself triggering a child protection intervention.

20.89 Together with the introduction and expansion of mandatory reporting laws, the recognition of harm caused to children by their exposure to family violence is believed to have contributed to the substantial increase in the number of reports received by child protection agencies over the last five years, from 137,938 in 2001–2002 to 339,454 in 2008–2009. Family violence is one of the most common reasons given for reports to child protection agencies, and a large number of reports—in which family violence was a primary concern—are made by police.

20.90 A number of researchers and commentators have questioned whether the formal recognition of the impact of family violence on children in the child protection context has improved services for women and children living with violence. This is said to be due, in part, to the flood of reports that have overloaded a sector that is already strained due to the constant pressure of inadequate resourcing. As Dr Dorothy Scott has argued, this combination of factors has resulted in resources being spent unproductively, reports being investigated too superficially and closed prematurely, caseworkers not being assigned, and critically, children and families missing out on support and education services that they require.

20.91 These problems appear to be magnified by laws and policies in some states and territories that require police officers to notify the child protection agency every time they respond to an incident of family violence where children are present or ordinarily resident in the home but not there at the time.

20.92 In the Wood Inquiry, for example, it was found that a similar NSW Police policy was inconsistent with the legislative reporting provisions which, at the time, required reports to be made where, as a result of being exposed to incidents of domestic violence, the child or young person was at risk of ‘serious physical or psychological harm’.

20.93 Although unintentional, the evidence suggests that legislative reporting requirements or policy directives that require police officers to make a report following every incident of family violence where a child is present or ordinarily resident in the home is counter-productive.

20.94 Two consequences may flow from mandatory notifications: the first is that it may discourage women from reporting family violence or breaches of family violence protection orders because of the fear that their children will be removed from them.
This fear is particularly acute for Indigenous women, as a recent study of Indigenous communities in Queensland by Professor Chris Cunneen illustrated:

The reason I haven’t reported is my kids, my babies. I’m worried about them being taken. I had four children. Because police are brought to a house where there is violence, the kids get taken straight away. The Stolen Generation I reckon is coming back. ...

I think the extra dimension for Indigenous women which is onerous is Child Safety. All of these veiled threats that if you do this you will lose the kids … That sort of dynamic was driving people underground and they weren’t reporting because they knew Child Safety would get involved.\textsuperscript{107}

20.95 Cunneen found that many people, including police officers themselves, questioned the usefulness of mandatory reporting by police where a child is present (or usually resident) at the scene of a domestic violence incident.\textsuperscript{108} The report concluded that ‘a more sensible policy would provide for better use of police discretion on this issue’.\textsuperscript{109} The Queensland Government is presently undertaking a review of its child protection law and practice, and this is one of the primary issues under examination.\textsuperscript{110}

20.96 The second consequence that may flow from mandatory notifications is that, because most reports of family violence from police incidents do not reach the threshold for an investigation by the child protection agency, the matter is closed and no support services are provided to the families and children.\textsuperscript{111}

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

20.97 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions asked about the circumstances in which it would be appropriate for police to make child protection notifications when responding to incidents of family violence.\textsuperscript{112}

20.98 A number of submissions, particularly from child protection advocates, argued that it was appropriate for police to make a report to the child protection agency in every case where children were exposed to family violence, or its aftermath.\textsuperscript{113} They noted that children are not mere witnesses to family violence, but can be seriously affected by it. Failure to report children who are exposed to family violence runs the risk that they will be exposed to greater harm if the conflict escalates, both in terms of \textsuperscript{107} C Cunneen, \textit{Alternative and Improved Responses to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland Indigenous Communities} (2009), [6.2.4]. See also Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, \textit{Submission FV 212}, 28 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{108} C Cunneen, \textit{Alternative and Improved Responses to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland Indigenous Communities} (2009), 104.

\textsuperscript{109} Ibid, 124.

\textsuperscript{111} C Humphreys, \textit{Submission FV 131}, 21 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{112} Consultation Paper, Question 13–6.

potentially being ‘caught in the crossfire’ or in terms of their long term health and wellbeing.

20.99 However, one person observed that, despite the requirement to make a report in all family violence matters in Queensland, the policy was not always consistently applied:

… some police will refer all cases, no matter where the child was, others will make a decision that a baby in the house was not affected by the violence and so not make a decision. A[nd] importantly, the referrals are overwhelming the system and often what happens is that a number of ‘occurrence reports’ [are] completed by Police, these can be up to two weeks old, are faxed to Child Safety, and these can often sit there for some time before Child Safety has the opportunity to read through them. My understanding is that any urgent case is called through, nevertheless, there have been situations where a case that Child Safety identified as being concerning, and had they known at the time, would have taken direct action, however, no action was taken because the report was not read for some time.114

20.100 While not disputing the importance of reporting concerns for the safety of children exposed to family violence, many other submissions felt that better results could be achieved in terms of improving the safety outcomes for children and their non-offending families by allowing police more discretion in their reporting practices, and providing alternative pathways for referral.115 As one submission commented:

… there needs to be a rethinking of how we respond to these cases. Police need a few referral pathways, one is to child protection authorities, the second, which could occur in tandem, is to a domestic and family violence service/family support service to work with the family to help address the issues. The difficulty is that currently, if Child Safety in Queensland decides not to investigate because the case does not meet the threshold for intervention, nothing is actually done to support this family.

Key to this is having a well developed risk assessment framework and training and education for police to enable them to more accurately assess harm to children as a result of domestic violence. Ideally, a specialist child protection worker role attached [to] Police could be involved in undertaking such assessments.116

20.101 Professor Cathy Humphreys submitted that a policy of reporting every single incident of family violence where a child is present is an ‘ineffective, and potentially unethical and damaging route which closes down help-seeking rather than protecting children’.117 She suggested that the statutory route should be reserved for children where there is ‘evidence of physical and sexual abuse or where there is evidence of cumulative harm through repeated incidents’ and children are at risk of significant harm, noting that:

114  F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010.
115 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 131, 21 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010.
116 F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010.
117 C Humphreys, Submission FV 131, 21 June 2010.
This is not to suggest that children do not need protection and support, but rather that the statutory route has proven to be ineffective in ensuring the protection of large numbers of children notified from police domestic violence incidents. A community services route is needed for children living with domestic violence.\textsuperscript{118}

20.102 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria observed that, under the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence, Victoria Police are advised that the threshold for child protection intervention is higher than the standard required to apply for a family violence protection order. Accordingly, the Code directs the police to consider whether to apply for a family violence intervention order on behalf of a child in order to secure their protection in cases where the child protection agency has deemed that its threshold for action is not met. The Courts further submitted that it is likely that work has and could be done to allow police to make a relatively sophisticated risk assessment of a child exposed to family violence and that the risk assessment could guide decision making about notification to the child protection agency and applications for family violence protection orders.\textsuperscript{119} In Victoria, the police, courts and family violence service providers now use a Common Risk Assessment Framework, which is reported to be improving consistency in risk assessment.\textsuperscript{120}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

20.103 The Commissions note that a number of Australian jurisdictions have responded to the large increase in numbers of notifications to child protection agencies by refining their assessment and decision-making tools to better identify those cases that require a statutory child protection response. A key feature of these new systems is the introduction of a dual track system whereby reports to the child protection agency are only made where a reporter believes on reasonable grounds that a child is at risk of ‘significant harm’. Concerns for children that fall below this threshold may be made to regional or community intake centres for assessment and referral to appropriate family support and therapeutic services. Child protection agencies are then able to focus on cases where the concerns warrant a full risk of harm assessment and are likely to lead to some form of intervention to protect the child from harm.

20.104 Where the risk is less severe, and statutory intervention is not justified, a range of new approaches have been created that allow more flexible responses to address concerns about a child’s welfare. These new approaches address the needs of those families who find themselves in what Dr Leah Bromfield and Prue Holzer describe as the ‘nexus between risk and need’—that is, those families who could benefit from some form of intervention, but who fall below the threshold for statutory child protection involvement. These new approaches have been augmented by improvements to risk assessment processes to ensure consistency in decision-making and better integration of child protection services and family support agencies. The

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{118} Ibid.
\item \textsuperscript{119} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{120} See Ch 18.
\item \textsuperscript{121} L Bromfield and P Holzer, \textit{A National Approach for Child Protection: Project Report} (2008), prepared for the National Child Protection Clearinghouse.
\end{itemize}
Commissions note, however, that the dual track system will only operate effectively if adequate resources are deployed in this ‘less urgent’ stream.

20.105 The Commissions note that the practice of requiring police to make automatic reports to the child protection agency in every case where children are exposed to family violence has been discontinued in most states and territories and is presently under review in Queensland, where the policy is still in place. In the Commissions’ view, when responding to incidents of family violence, it is vital that police use a common risk assessment framework, and retain their discretion to refer appropriate matters to the relevant child protection authority. 122

Protection orders and children—the current legal framework

20.106 In practice, family violence protection orders for the protection of children are usually obtained in a magistrates court. Most commonly, children are named as protected persons on applications for family violence orders made to protect a parent, although they may also be sought directly in the child’s own right. In some jurisdictions, family violence protection orders may also be obtained in children’s courts in particular circumstances. These powers are considered below.

Magistrates courts

20.107 Under state and territory family violence legislation, family violence protection orders made in favour of an adult can, and often do, name children or young people as a protected person where they are affected by the same or similar circumstances.123 In Victoria, for example, a court may, on application or on its own initiative, include the child as a protected person in a family violence intervention order —where the child’s need for protection is substantially the same as that of the affected family member—or make a separate final family violence intervention order for the child as a protected person.124 In NSW, the court must also name the protected person’s children where they are living with the person and exposed to the family violence.125

20.108 In most states and territories, applications for a family violence protection order can also be brought by, or on behalf of, a child or young person in their own right.126 An application may be brought by a police officer,127 a parent or any other

122 See Ch 18.
123 See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 38(2); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 47; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 11B; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 19. See Ch 5 on definitions of family violence.
124 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 77(2).
125 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 38(2).
126 See, eg, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 45(d); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 25; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 15(2)(c); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 19(3). In Victoria, a child aged over 14 years may make an application for a family violence intervention order himself or herself provided the court grants leave: Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 45(d)(iii). See also Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 48(6); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 20(2)(A); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 28. In Queensland, a domestic violence order may only be made for the protection of a child in his or her own right if a spousal relationship, intimate personal relationship or informal carer relationship exists between the child and the respondent: Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 12D(2). person with the consent of the parent.\textsuperscript{128} This may include a child protection caseworker.\textsuperscript{129} However, in NSW, only a police officer may make an application for an apprehended violence order where the person to be protected is a child aged under 16 years.\textsuperscript{130} In Tasmania, a copy of an application for a family violence protection order that is brought by, or on behalf of a child, must be given to the Secretary of the government agency responsible for administering the state’s child protection legislation.\textsuperscript{131}

20.109 In the Northern Territory, applications for a family violence protection order for the protection of a child must be brought by the police or a child welfare officer where the health and wellbeing of a child is at risk because of domestic violence.\textsuperscript{132}

20.110 In NSW, a police officer investigating a family violence matter must apply for a protection order if he or she suspects that a family violence offence or a child abuse-related offence has been or is likely to be committed against the person for whose protection the order would be made.\textsuperscript{133} Furthermore, where the person who needs protection is a child under 16 years, only a police officer may apply for a family violence protection order,\textsuperscript{134} or for a variation or revocation of an existing apprehended violence order.\textsuperscript{135} These measures are intended to ensure that the child’s best interests are prioritised above the interests of the child’s parent or carer, by removing the potential for a defendant to put pressure on the applicant to bring an application to vary the order, where that may reduce the protection afforded to the child. In contrast, other jurisdictions permit applications to vary or revoke an order to be brought by the protected person or the respondent, and notice must be given to all parties including police applicants.\textsuperscript{136}

20.111 Some jurisdictions require\textsuperscript{137} or permit\textsuperscript{138} a court exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation to make a family violence protection order against a \textsuperscript{127} In most jurisdictions, police are empowered to apply for a protection order or to assist a victim to make an application. See, eg, \textit{Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009} (SA) s 20(1)(a); \textit{Family Violence Act 2004} (Tas) s 15(2)(a); \textit{Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008} (ACT) s 18(2); \textit{Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007} (NT) s 28(1)(c). See also Ch 9.

\textsuperscript{128} See, eg, \textit{Family Violence Protection Act 2008} (Vic) s 45; \textit{Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009} (SA) s 20; \textit{Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007} (NT) s 28.

\textsuperscript{129} Note, in Western Australia, the legislation expressly permits a child welfare officer to bring an application for a restraining order on behalf of a child: \textit{Restraining Orders Act 1997} (WA) s 25(2)(a). See also \textit{Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009} (SA) s 20(1)(d).

\textsuperscript{130} \textit{Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007} (NSW) ss 48(3). Young people aged between 16 and 18 years can make their own applications: 48(6).

\textsuperscript{131} \textit{Family Violence Act 2004} (Tas) s 15(3).

\textsuperscript{132} \textit{Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007} (NT) s 29.

\textsuperscript{133} \textit{Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007} (NSW) s 49. A police officer must apply for a family violence protection order for a child if he or she suspects that an offence under s 227 of the \textit{Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998} (NSW) has recently been or is being committed, or is likely to be committed, against the child for whose protection the order would be made: 49(1)(b).

\textsuperscript{134} \textit{Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007} (NSW) s 48(3).

\textsuperscript{135} Ibid s 72(3). A child is defined in s 3 as a person under 16 years.

\textsuperscript{137} \textit{Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007} (NSW) s 39. See also Ch 11.

\textsuperscript{138} \textit{Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1986} (Qld) s 30; \textit{Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007} (NT) s 45(1).
defendant who pleads guilty to, or is convicted of, a domestic violence offence, even where no application has been made for one. In NSW, an interim family violence protection order must also be made before a plea of guilty or a finding of guilt, when a person is charged with a serious offence.\footnote{Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 40. A serious offence is defined to include the stalking/intimidation offence under s 13 of the Act, as well as attempted murder and ‘domestic violence offences’ (other than murder or manslaughter): s 40(5). See also Ch 11.}

20.112 Applications for family violence protection orders are generally heard in a magistrates court, except where the respondent is aged under 18 years, in which case, the application may—or, in some jurisdictions, must\footnote{Ibid; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 25(3)(a). Section 20 of the Children’s Court of Western Australia Act 1988 (WA) provides that the Court has exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine all applications under the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) with respect to a child.}—be made in the children’s court.

Children’s courts

20.113 As discussed in Chapter 19, the children’s courts of all states and territories have existing powers under child welfare laws to hear a range of applications and make a variety of orders in relation to the care and protection of a child or young person.\footnote{See, eg, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 146(2); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) ss 16, 30; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 31. In Queensland, a court cannot make a domestic violence protection order against, or in favour of, a person aged under 18 years unless the person is in a spousal or intimate relationship with the person seeking or needing protection: Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 12D(2). Children and young people under 18 cannot apply for a protection order against a parent as this is considered a child protection issue and should be dealt with under the Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld). Nor can parents apply for domestic violence orders against their children who are under 18 years.}

Some of these orders are very similar to family violence protection orders, such as orders excluding a person from a child’s residence, or limiting a person’s contact with a child.\footnote{See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 90A; Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 515; Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) s 38(1)(e).}

The Children’s Court of New South Wales, for example, may make an order under s 90A of the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW), prohibiting a person from doing anything that a parent could do in carrying out their parental responsibility. However, unlike a family violence protection order, this order may only be made against a person who has parental responsibility for the child; and it is unenforceable.

20.114 Children’s courts in some jurisdictions may also make family violence protection orders, although the situations in which these orders may be made varies across jurisdictions. For example, in Tasmania, proceedings for a family violence protection order may be transferred to the children’s court where this is considered appropriate.\footnote{In most states and the ACT, applications for care and protection orders are made to the Children’s Court by the relevant child protection agency. In South Australia, applications are made to the Youth Court, and in the Northern Territory, they are made to the Family Matters Court.}

In South Australia, the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act...
20. Family Violence, Child Protection and the Criminal Law

20.115 In Queensland and the Northern Territory, family violence law confers jurisdiction on every ‘Magistrates Court and magistrate’ or court of summary jurisdiction, and on every other court—including a children’s court—where a person before it pleads, or is found, guilty of an offence involving domestic violence orders.146

20.116 As noted above, the children’s courts of NSW and Western Australia have exclusive jurisdiction to make family violence protection orders against a child or young person.147 However, the Western Australian Children’s Court may also make a restraining order to protect a child, during care proceedings, either on its own initiative or on application by a party to proceedings, or by a parent or child welfare agency on behalf of a child.148

20.117 Similarly, the ACT Children’s Court has express jurisdiction under family violence law to make a family violence protection order for the protection of a child against a parent or other person but only where there are care proceedings before it and the court believes it is necessary to protect the child from psychological abuse arising from the child’s exposure to family violence.149 Provided these conditions are present, the court can make the order either on its own motion or on application by a party to the proceedings—which would include the child protection agency.150

20.118 By contrast, the Family Division of the Children’s Court of Victoria has broad jurisdiction to hear applications for family violence protection orders under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and the Stalking Intervention Orders Act 2008 (Vic) where either party is under the age of 18 years.151 No other proceedings need to be before the court for these applications to be made.

20.119 Moreover, the Victorian Children’s Court is empowered to make a family violence intervention order for or between adults where the order relates to the same or similar circumstances as those affecting the child or young person.152

20.120 This amendment followed a recommendation of the Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) in its 2006 report, Review of Family Violence Laws. The VLRC noted that it was undesirable for family violence protection applications involving a

---

146 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 38(1); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) ss 4, 45(1).
147 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 91(b); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 25(3).
148 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 63.
149 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 17; Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ss 458–460.
150 Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ss 459(3), 460(2).
151 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 42, 146.
152 Ibid s 147(3). For the purposes of s 147, a ‘related application’ is defined as an application for an order on the grounds of the same or similar circumstances, and includes an application to vary, revoke or extend an order. A ‘related order’ is defined as an order made on the grounds of the same or similar circumstances.
child and an adult—for example, the child’s mother—to be ‘split’ and consequently heard in separate courts. At the time of its review, the Children’s Court of Victoria could only hear an application for protection where the respondent or the person in need of protection was under 18 years. The Children’s Court could not make an order protecting an adult from an adult respondent, even if the Court had made an order against the same respondent for the protection of the child. In these cases, adult applicants were directed to take their matter to the Magistrates’ Court, potentially leaving them without a protection order in the short term. The VLRC recommended that the Children’s Court have jurisdiction over adult–adult applications that include a child on the application. In consequence, any affected family member may now apply for a family violence protection order at the Children’s Court or the Magistrates Court in Victoria.

Relationship between family violence protection orders and child protection orders

20.121 Where families are, or have been, engaged in proceedings under both family violence legislation and under child welfare laws, there is a risk that inconsistent orders may be made, which may potentially compromise the safety of victims of family violence. Alternatively, as the Children’s Court of New South Wales submitted, a court may be prevented from making a care and protection order it considers is in the best interests of the child because of an existing, yet inconsistent family violence protection order. For example, the Court said that it had been stymied, in the past, from making an order restoring a child to his or her family because there was an existing family violence protection order against an adult family member, and it had no power to vary or revoke the family violence protection order in the absence of a police application to do so.

20.122 Although family violence protection orders generally prevail over child protection orders in Victoria and South Australia, each of those states’ children’s courts has power to vary or revoke a family violence protection order to resolve any inconsistency between the order and an order that is proposed under the relevant child protection legislation. The difference between them is that the South Australian court can only do so on application, while the Victorian court has own motion powers to vary or revoke a family violence protection order, subject to serving notice on all the parties and providing each an opportunity to be heard.

---

154 Ibid, Rec 76.
156 Children’s Court of New South Wales, Submission FV 237, 22 July 2010.
157 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 173(1); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 16(2).
158 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 173. Furthermore, if a court makes a family violence protection order that is or may be inconsistent with an order under child welfare law, it must advise the child protection agency: s 173(3). See also Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 16(2).
Consultation Paper

20.123 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions sought comments on the desirability of expanding the jurisdiction of all Australian children’s courts to make family violence protection orders:

• in favour of a child who is the subject of care proceedings before it, where the court considers a protection order necessary to protect the child from harm arising from the child’s exposure to family violence;\(^{159}\)

• to protect other children or siblings of the child who is the subject of care proceedings before it, where the court is satisfied that the children are affected by the same facts as alleged;\(^{160}\) and

• both on its own initiative and on application to the court.\(^{161}\)

20.124 Two additional, and related, issues were raised in the course of the Commissions’ consultations, as noted above. First, whether children’s courts should also be able to make family violence protection orders for and between adults, where a related matter involving a child or young person was being heard in the children’s court, as is the case in Victoria.\(^{162}\) Secondly, whether children’s courts should have powers to vary or revoke a family violence protection order in situations where, for example, they are prevented from making a care and protection order because of an existing, but inconsistent, family violence protection order.\(^{163}\)

Submissions and consultations

20.125 A majority of stakeholders—including the Children’s Court of New South Wales and the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria—supported a conferral of powers on all Australian children’s courts to make family violence protection orders for the protection of a child who is the subject of care proceedings before it where the grounds for making a family violence protection order are established.\(^{164}\)

\(^{159}\) Consultation Paper, Question 13–11.

\(^{160}\) Ibid, Question 13–12.

\(^{161}\) Ibid, Question 13–12.

\(^{162}\) Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 147(3).

\(^{163}\) Children’s Court of New South Wales, Submission FV 237, 22 July 2010.

\(^{164}\) Ibid; Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 160, 24 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.
20.126 One stakeholder observed that the safety and protection of children from harm and exposure to family violence should be ‘a key priority within the children’s court’ and, on this basis, gave its support.\(^{165}\) Women’s Legal Service Queensland also supported expanded jurisdiction, but stated that issues of family violence should be considered well before the matter was in the children’s court and be an integral part of any coordinated service response to the child and the family.\(^{166}\)

20.127 The Legal Aid NSW agreed that children’s courts should be empowered to make family violence protection orders on the basis that:

Protection orders can be used to maintain the child in the home but remove the perpetrator of violence. The Court will arguably be more inclined to allow a child to remain in the home if there is a criminal sanction available in the event of the breach. It also means that the onus will not be on the victim to seek out a protection order to protect themselves and the children in circumstances where they may not have the capacity or resilience to do so. Further, it makes the victim less likely to suffer recriminations for initiating a protection order and means that parallel proceedings will not have to be conducted in the Local Court and Children’s Court, which only adds further pressure to the victim.\(^{167}\)

20.128 Other stakeholders, while supportive, warned that care needed to be exercised because of the potential to use family violence protection orders against both parties where there are cross-allegations, given the criminal consequences for a breach.\(^{168}\) Stubbs submitted that the phrase ‘exposure to family violence’ may render the non-offending parent subject to a protection order for failing to protect their child from such exposure. She suggested that the intent of the power should be made clear—namely, that it is the offending party who should be the subject of any protection order—and attention needs to be given to how best to avoid orders being made against both parties, other than in exceptional circumstances.\(^{169}\)

20.129 The Queensland Government dissented, but noted that the issue was under consideration in the present review of its child protection services.\(^{170}\) The Department of Human Services (NSW) also did not support a general power being given to the children’s court to make family violence protection orders. It argued that the present power under s 90A of the \textit{Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998} (NSW) was adequate to restrain those with parental responsibility from doing an act that may put the child or young person at risk of harm. However, it did agree that s 90A could be expanded to ‘broaden the range of matters which can be addressed.’\(^{171}\) While the Department did not elaborate further, the Children’s Court of New South Wales suggested that s 90A should be expanded to enable it to make a prohibition

---

\(^{167}\) Legal Aid NSW, \textit{Submission FV 219}, 1 July 2010. See also National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV 232}, 15 July 2010.
order against any person—regardless of whether or not they were exercising parental responsibility—and that the orders be made enforceable.\textsuperscript{172}

20.130 Submissions in this Inquiry generally agreed that, where the court found evidence to support making a family violence protection order in favour of the child before it in its care jurisdiction, the evidence may also support the making of an order to protect other children or siblings living in the home. It was agreed that where there was evidence to support the making of the order, a children’s court should be able to make a family violence protection order for the protection of a child even where the child was not a party to the care proceedings, either on application or on its own motion.\textsuperscript{173}

20.131 The Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre submitted that the definition of ‘sibling’ should be refined, in view of the fact that in Aboriginal families there are often children of similar ages residing in the same household, sometimes in the care of an aunt, grandparent or other family member. We agree that if the court considers such an order necessary for the protection of a child it should have the capacity to make such an order for siblings, but this should be a discretionary power used to protect children from real risks of family and family violence, not simply a blanket policy that will apply across the board.\textsuperscript{174}

20.132 While the issue of expansion of the power of children’s courts to make orders between adults was not directly canvassed in the Consultation Paper, it was brought to the Commissions’ attention by the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria during consultations. The Victorian magistrates welcomed the amendment in Victoria and suggested it could be adopted in other jurisdictions to improve outcomes for children and their families all around Australia.

20.133 Several stakeholders supported giving children’s courts own motion powers to make family violence protection orders, including the Women’s Legal Service Queensland,\textsuperscript{175} National Legal Aid\textsuperscript{176} and the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria.\textsuperscript{177} The reasons given in support included that it:

\textsuperscript{172} Children’s Court of New South Wales, Submission FV 237, 22 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{173} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; J Stubbbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Department of Human Services (NSW), Submission FV 181, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{174} Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{175} Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{176} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{177} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. See also Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 160, 24 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
removes the onus on the victim of family violence to seek a protection order to protect him or herself and the children in circumstances where he or she may not have the capacity or resilience to do so; and makes the victim less likely to suffer recriminations for initiating an application for a protection order.

However, a small number of submissions expressed the view that family violence protection orders should only be made on application to the court, either by or on behalf of the person seeking protection, or by an advocate of the child. The Department of Human Services (NSW) submitted that giving the children’s court powers to make protection orders on its own motion would, first, compromise the court’s judicial dispute resolution functions and, secondly, give the court an inappropriate oversight function for child protection. The Department’s view was that the court should only resolve disputes before it.

There was also support for giving children’s courts the power to make an order varying or revoking a family violence protection order—for example, where the court wishes to make an order restoring a child or young person to his or her family but is prevented from doing so because of an existing family violence protection order against another member of the family. In these circumstances, the Children’s Court of New South Wales submitted that it should have power to vary or revoke an existing family violence protection order, either on application by a party or on its own motion. This would enable it to finalise both the care proceedings and the family violence protection order proceedings at the same time:

The conferral of such a power on the Children’s Court will save the family members the confusion and anxiety associated with being required to go to another court (in NSW, the Local Court) to have the AVO proceedings finalised.

Where applications for family violence protection orders for the protection of children and young people are sought in the children’s court, the Children’s Court of New South Wales argued that domestic violence support services should be available, as they are available to adult applicants in the local courts. The Court submitted that this would improve access to courts and make court processes less intimidating for children and young people.

Commissions’ views

Jurisdiction of children’s courts

A number of state and territory family violence laws already confer jurisdiction on children’s courts to make family violence protection orders, although the powers conferred on some state and territory children’s courts are more limited than others.

178 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.
179 Department of Human Services (NSW), Submission FV 181, 25 June 2010.
180 Children’s Court of New South Wales, Submission FV 237, 22 July 2010.
181 Ibid.
20.138 In the Commissions’ view, all Australian children’s courts should have clear jurisdiction under family violence legislation to hear and determine applications for family violence protection orders where the person affected by the family violence, or to be protected, or against whom the order is sought, is under 18 years. However, the jurisdiction should only be enlivened where there are proceedings in the court involving the child or young person, or a member of the child’s or young person’s family. In this regard, the Commissions note that a recent review of family violence legislation in Western Australia has similarly recommended that family violence restraining orders for the protection of children should be able to be taken out in that state’s children’s court.182

20.139 Expanding the jurisdiction of children’s courts to make family violence protection orders is consistent with the ‘one court’ principle referred to in Chapter 3. That is, the Commissions’ overarching policy objective that, to the maximum extent possible, families who enter the legal system should be able to apply for, and be granted the orders they need by the court with which they first engage to address their safety concerns. Gaps in the system create the possibility that required protection will not be obtained, or obtained expeditiously. Such orders would be a significant adjunct to the orders presently available under child protection legislation to ensure the safety of the child and the child’s non-offending parent.

20.140 Jurisdiction to make family violence protection orders also fits squarely within the expertise of children’s court magistrates. Family violence issues are part of the core work of children’s courts. Many children’s courts magistrates are also likely to have experience in exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation in their capacity as local court magistrates. Across Australia, children’s court magistrates are generally drawn from the pool of magistrates, and are often assigned to the children’s court for long periods of time.183

20.141 In reality, the need to exercise this jurisdiction in the care division of a children’s court may be infrequent. Family violence protection orders are likely to be sought by police in the magistrates court as soon as the police suspect that a child or young person is being harmed, or is at risk of being harmed as a result of family violence. By the time proceedings are brought in the children’s court, a number of child protection interventions are likely to have already occurred, and a family violence protection order may have already been obtained. If the Commissions’ recommendations in Chapter 32 are accepted, applications for these orders may well have been considered and dealt with in a specialist family violence court context. However, there may be times when the need for family violence protection orders arises later, in children’s court proceedings, where the court considers that family violence protection orders appropriately form part of the outcome.

182 Department of the Attorney General (WA), A Review of Part 2 Division 3A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (2008), 48–50, Rec 13. But note the review recommends the jurisdiction should be enlivened regardless of whether or not there are care proceedings before the court.
183 See also Ch 31 for a discussion of judicial education in relation to family violence.
20.142 The Commissions have considered carefully the concerns expressed in submissions and those raised in the Wood Inquiry in NSW, where similar issues arose.\textsuperscript{184} However, after Australia-wide consultations, the Commissions take the view that, as long as family violence protection orders are linked to child protection proceedings, neither the courts’ role nor the role of child protection agencies is compromised. The availability of family violence protection orders simply gives the court another—and in some jurisdictions—a more effective mechanism to protect children from harm.

20.143 The benefits of the enhanced jurisdiction are significant. It creates a more seamless system for victims of family violence—including children—to allow them to access as many orders and services as possible in the court in which the family is first involved; removes the need for the child and the family to have to navigate multiple courts; reduces the need for victims of family violence to have to repeat their stories and, consequently, reduces the likelihood that people will drop out of the system without the protections they need.

Scope of the orders

20.144 As recommended above, the Commissions consider that all state and territory children’s courts should be able to make family violence protection orders where:

- the application involves a child or young person;
- proceedings relating to the child or young person are before the court; and
- the court is satisfied that the legislative grounds for making the order are met.

20.145 Furthermore, the Commissions recommend that children’s courts should be empowered to make family violence protection orders in favour of siblings of the child or young person who is the subject of proceedings, or other children or young people within the same household, who are affected by the same or similar circumstances. ‘Siblings’ should be defined broadly to take into consideration wider concepts of kin in Indigenous cultures.

20.146 Additionally, where they have jurisdiction as recommended above, children’s courts should also have power to make a family violence protection order for the protection of an adult where the order is based on the same or similar circumstances as those affecting the child or young person. For instance, a court may be directed to make an order for the protection of a child against an adult, and in the course of proceedings, forms the view that, based on the same circumstances, a related order is justified for the protection of the protective parent, or an adult sibling.

20.147 This recommendation is modelled on s 147 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), where the power has proved practical and useful. In the Commissions’ view, it is undesirable for a family to have to go to two courts to obtain protection from the same person who has committed family violence, especially when making a separate application may leave a gap in protection. Protection orders in a family violence context will often be made for the protection of a parent or other carer with whom the child is living. The impact on a child of violence against a parent or other carer—in terms of that person’s capacity to be an effective parent—has been noted consistently throughout this Inquiry. A family violence protection order in favour of a protective parent will, essentially, also safeguard the protection of the child.

Revocation and variation

20.148 The Commissions further recommend that children’s courts should be empowered to make orders for the variation or revocation of an existing family violence protection order, to the extent that it is necessary to do so in order to permit the court to make an order under child protection law. A children’s court should be able to exercise this power either on application, or on its own motion. Where it exercises its own motion powers, the court should be required to serve notice on all the parties to the order and give each an opportunity to be heard. These measures will provide appropriate safeguards to ensure that family violence protection orders are not varied or revoked where doing so would compromise the safety of persons protected by the order.

Applications for orders and own motion powers

20.149 The Commissions are aware, in making these recommendations, that there will be many important procedural issues that will need to be resolved, and that the issues raised are likely to vary depending on the legislative context of each state and territory. The procedures for seeking protective orders may need to be adapted to the situation in the children’s court and may not be the same as those applying in the general courts. They should be consistent with:

- the principles underlying family violence legislation;
- the need to ensure the safety of the child or young person; and
- any special characteristics and procedures of children’s courts.

20.150 In NSW, for example, the requirement that only police can bring family violence protection order applications for the protection of a child may need to be reviewed given some concerns about the appropriateness of police appearing in care proceedings in the children’s court. In other jurisdictions, applications may be made by a parent, or another person on behalf of the child, including a child welfare officer—or on the court’s own motion. Expanding the class of people who may bring an application for a family violence protection order on behalf of a person needing protection may help close gaps for children and parents.

20.151 The Commissions further recommend that children’s courts should be empowered to make family violence protection orders on their own motion. This has a number of advantages, including removing the onus on the victim who may be reluctant to bring an application because they may fear retribution. The capacity of the court to make an own motion power may also be expedient in situations where the victim has not had legal advice. It may also address concerns about the appropriateness of police or child welfare officers bringing the application in certain cases. In an adversarial system it is a significant step to give own motion powers to a court, allowing it to make an order in the absence of an application before it from any party to the proceedings. Child protection presents one of the strongest cases for such a power. Indeed, courts have long exercised parens patriae powers to protect vulnerable children and, while what is proposed here is a statutory power, it arises from the same motivation and obligation to protect. The Commissions note that several jurisdictions already confer own motion powers on courts under family violence legislation.

Relationship to other courts

20.152 In Chapter 32, the Commissions recommend the establishment (or further development) of specialist family violence divisions in all Australian magistrates courts. As discussed in that chapter, practical arrangements will need to be put in place to ensure that specialist family violence courts and children’s courts work well together. The Commissions agree with the suggestion of the Children’s Court of NSW in its submission to the Inquiry, that the courts should establish appropriate referral arrangements and support mechanisms to help victims navigate between the two courts. The role of a dedicated liaison officer appears to be desirable in this regard.

20.153 The Commissions consider below the need for regular opportunities for ongoing family violence education and training. The Commissions also emphasise the importance of information sharing arrangements between the courts. In Chapter 30, for example, the Commissions recommend that both family violence protection orders and child protection orders are included in the national database to ensure that all courts are aware of existing orders made in relation to a particular family.

Recommendation 20–3 State and territory family violence legislation should confer jurisdiction on children’s courts to hear and determine applications for family violence protection orders where:

(a) the person affected by family violence, sought to be protected, or against whom the order is sought, is a child or young person; and

(b) proceedings related to that child or young person are before the court; and

(c) the court is satisfied that the grounds for making the order are met.

185 See discussion in Ch 4.
186 Children’s Court of New South Wales, Submission FV 237, 22 July 2010
187 See Ch 31.
188 Rec 30–18.
Recommendation 20–4 Where a children’s court has jurisdiction to hear a family violence protection order application (see Rec 20–3), the court should also be able to make a family violence protection order in favour of siblings of the child or young person who is the subject of proceedings, or other children or young people within the same household, who are affected by the same or similar circumstances.

Recommendation 20–5 Where a children’s court has jurisdiction to hear a family violence protection order application (see Rec 20–3), the court should also have jurisdiction to make a family violence protection order for the protection of an adult, where the adult is affected by the same or similar circumstances.

Recommendation 20–6 Where a children’s court has jurisdiction to hear a family violence protection order application (see Rec 20–3), the court should also have power to vary or revoke a family violence protection order on the application of a party to the order, or on its own motion.

Child protection and juvenile justice

20.154 There is a strong correlation between juvenile participation in crime and rates of reported neglect or abuse, and, in particular, between juvenile involvement in criminal activity and neglectful parenting. Research indicates that an offending child or young person is likely to have a history of abuse or neglect, and to have been in out-of-home care. In Victoria, a study of young people sentenced to imprisonment by the children’s court over a period of eight months in 2001 found that 88% had been subject to an average of 4.6 notifications to the child protection agency. Almost one-third had been the subject of six or more notifications, and 86% had been in out-of-home care. Over half of these had had five or more care placements.

20.155 Young offenders aged between 10 and 17 years are usually dealt with by the juvenile or youth justice system, where detention is considered a last resort and the emphasis is on diversion and rehabilitation in order to break offending cycles. However, the special problems that many young people face when applying for bail tend to undermine these principles.

194 Compare Children (Criminal Proceedings) Act 1987 (NSW) ss 17–18, which excludes serious indictable offences from being determined in the Children’s Court of New South Wales.
20.156 A central issue in juvenile justice policy today is the large and increasing numbers of children and young people being held in detention on remand rather than released on bail. The Australian Institute of Criminology has found that, across all states and territories, about 50% of young people in detention (at any one point in time) were on remand awaiting trial or sentencing in 2002, and that this had increased to almost 60% in 2007.\textsuperscript{195}

20.157 One of the most significant factors associated with young people being remanded in custody is the lack of available and appropriate accommodation for young people.\textsuperscript{196} Despite its reluctance to do so, a court is often forced to remand a young person in detention rather than release him or her on bail if, because of family violence or other factors, the young person has no safe or stable home to go to, or if there is no appropriate adult guardian to provide supervision and support for the young person to meet their bail requirements. Where courts do release a young person on bail, this is often on condition that the young person ‘reside as directed by the [child protection agency]’. However, as the child protection agency is not obliged to find accommodation for the child or young person except where it has parental responsibility,\textsuperscript{197} many young people fail to meet this condition, and end up in detention.

20.158 The detention of children and young people on remand, where bail would otherwise have been granted, has a disproportionate impact on homeless young people. One of the main triggers of youth homelessness is family breakdown caused, among other things, by family violence, mental health issues and neglect.\textsuperscript{198}

20.159 Specialist children’s courts deal with both criminal and care matters in relation to juveniles, so that there might be thought to be few gaps in the system affecting these children. However, issues often arise where a young person appears as a defendant in the court’s criminal jurisdiction. While the personal circumstances of the young person may suggest that there are child protection concerns in relation to the young person, such as the fact that the young person is unable to go home, the court cannot compel the child protection agency to find suitable accommodation for a young person for whom it has no parental responsibility. The court has no other option but to remand the young person in detention, until trial—even where imprisonment is an unlikely outcome. The problem seems to lie in the bifurcation of administrative responsibility for child protection and juvenile justice. It was observed in the Wood Inquiry that:

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{195} N Taylor, \textit{Juveniles in Detention in Australia, 1981–2007} (2009), prepared for the Australian Institute of Criminology, 39.
  \item \textsuperscript{197} Minister for Community Services v Children’s Court of NSW (2005) 62 NSWLR 419 referred to in J Wood, \textit{Report of the Special Commission of Inquiry into Child Protection Services in NSW} (2008), [15.15].
  \item \textsuperscript{198} National Youth Commission, \textit{Australia’s Homeless Youth: A Report of the National Youth Commission Inquiry into Youth Homelessness} (2008), 85.
\end{itemize}
Coming within the juvenile justice or criminal justice system should not exclude a young offender from long-term services from [child protection agency] and other human service agencies. Nor should a shortage of refuges or other forms of accommodation result in young people who cannot live safely with their families, being remanded in custody unnecessarily, pending trial.199

Consultation Paper

20.160 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that one way to raise safety concerns about young people presenting in the youth justice system was to empower children’s courts to refer their care and protection concerns for the child or young person to the child protection agency for investigation, and to require the agency to report back to the court with the outcomes of its investigation.200

20.161 The proposal was based on provisions contained in the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) which give the Children’s Court of Victoria power to refer a matter to the child protection agency for investigation when it believes that grounds exist for the making of a protection order or a therapeutic order in relation to a child or young person appearing as a defendant before it.201 Under s 350, the child protection agency is obliged to investigate any such matter referred to it by the Children’s Court, and must provide a report of its investigation of the matter to the court within 21 days of the referral.202 The report must set out the outcomes of the investigation specifying, in particular, whether the child protection agency has made an application for a protection order or a therapeutic treatment order in relation to the child or if the investigation reveals that such action is not warranted.

20.162 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions also proposed that a similar power should be extended to children’s courts in their care jurisdiction. The suggestion was that the court should be able to refer its concerns for the safety of other children or siblings of the child who is the subject of the care proceedings to the child protection agency for investigation, and for the child protection agency to report back to the court within an agreed timeframe.203

Submissions and consultations

20.163 The majority of submissions that commented on these proposals were supportive.204 In relation to the first proposal, the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s 201 Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 349.

202 Ibid s 350(1).
204 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.
Court of Victoria stated that the Victorian provisions introduced in 2005 were particularly important for young offenders. A formal referral by the Criminal Division to the child protection agency provides an alternative pathway to direct children and young people to participate in treatment programs, where certain conditions are met, without the need to rely on a criminal prosecution. However, during consultations some concerns were expressed about their operation in practice. It was suggested that referrals are regularly met with a response from the child protection agency saying that further investigation is not warranted.

20.164 Some stakeholders, including Legal Aid NSW, noted that, mostly due to resource constraints and funding priorities, child protection agencies were frequently unresponsive to risk of harm notifications for adolescents who came to attention as a result of offending behaviour. This leaves the children’s court in a difficult situation where it cannot release a young person on bail or a bond because there is no appropriate adult in the family to take charge of the young person.

20.165 National Legal Aid submitted that a major systems failure is the ‘gap in proper remedial and support services for young people.’ It submitted that clear guidelines need to be developed between the agencies responsible for juvenile justice and child protection authorities in relation to accommodation placements and family reunification options for young people who are defendants and who require bail. It said that this was particularly important in cases where children have become homeless as a result of parents making applications for family violence protection orders against them.

20.166 The Children’s Court of New South Wales also strongly supported the proposals. It noted that its criminal division often deals with young people who have no stable accommodation or who lack adequate parental supervision, and who are consequently easily led into criminal offending. It submitted that because of the lack of any power to require the child protection agency to report back to the court when the court refers these young people to the agency for investigation, the Court will not be aware of whether or not any action has been taken and may only be informed that Community Services has not intervened or taken any action when the young person again appears before the Court.

205 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
206 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. See also N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010.
207 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
208 The Children’s Court of New South Wales has previously advocated for such a power, not only in relation to children and young people who appear before it in its criminal division, but also in respect of those who are the subject of care proceedings in its care division, or of other children or young people who are mentioned in these proceedings: see J Wood, Report of the Special Commission of Inquiry into Child Protection Services in NSW (2008), [15.76]; New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Young Offenders, Report 104 (2005), [8.140].
209 Children’s Court of New South Wales, Submission FV 237, 22 July 2010.
20.167 Consequently, magistrates become reluctant to make reports to the agency, even when special reporting arrangements have been established with the relevant child protection agency.\textsuperscript{210}

20.168 In contrast, the Queensland Government did not consider legislative reform necessary as Queensland courts have ‘unfettered capacity’ to refer matters to the child protection agency when they have concerns for the safety of children, whether these concerns arise in its care or criminal divisions. In criminal proceedings, it noted that the court can liaise with the youth justice case worker who, in turn, liaises directly with the Department of Child Safety.\textsuperscript{211}

20.169 Similarly, the Department of Human Services (NSW) also considered that legislative reform was not strictly necessary in NSW as court officers—including judges and magistrates—are mandatory reporters under child protection legislation and should therefore be making such reports routinely. However, the Department was open to support a conferral of powers on the Criminal Division of the Children’s Court to refer certain matters to the child protection agency for investigation, subject to further consideration of a number of factors, including how the provisions were operating in Victoria, and proper funding being made available. In relation to the imposition of therapeutic orders, the Department noted that further consultation with other relevant juvenile justice and health agencies would be required.\textsuperscript{212}

20.170 A number of stakeholders, including the Children’s Court of New South Wales, also supported the proposal to confer a similar power on the court in its care jurisdiction to refer safety concerns for a child, who was not the subject of proceedings before the court, to the child protection agency for investigation and report back.\textsuperscript{213}

20.171 Opposing the proposal, both the Queensland Government and the Department of Human Services (NSW) observed that it was unlikely that a court exercising care jurisdiction would be aware of a risk to a child which came to light during care proceedings for another child, without the child protection agency also being aware. Both organisations noted that as a matter of practice, when investigating a report about a child, the child protection agency would identify any risks posed to other children including siblings, and would seek appropriate orders in respect of each child individually.\textsuperscript{214} The Queensland Government commented that it was important for the \textsuperscript{210} J Wood, Report of the Special Commission of Inquiry into Child Protection Services in NSW (2008), [15.75].

\textsuperscript{211} Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{212} Department of Human Services (NSW), Submission FV 181, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{213} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; J Stubb, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.

\textsuperscript{214} Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010; Department of Human Services (NSW), Submission FV 181, 25 June 2010.
‘court and the child protection agency to maintain mutual respect and confidence’ and accordingly it should not be for the court to make a child protection order in respect of a sibling whom the agency does not consider is in need of care and protection.\textsuperscript{215}

20.172 In addition, the Department of Human Services (NSW) reiterated its view that a formal power of referral was, in any case, unnecessary, as court officers were mandatory reporters under NSW child protection legislation and were therefore obliged to make a report to the child protection agency where they suspected that a child was at risk of significant harm. However, the Department acknowledged that there may be value in providing a clear pathway for the court to report suspicions of abuse or neglect of children, not otherwise before it, to the child protection agency in the same way that Family Court judges and federal magistrates can. Noting the provisions of the \textit{Family Law Act 1975}, the Department observed:

The Family Court for example has a well established process for notifying children at risk of abuse under section 67ZA. The obligation is not limited to children who are the subject of proceedings. While it does not specifically refer to judges and magistrates, they would in NSW be covered by the provisions of section 27 of the Care Act and there may be value in specifically including judicial officers.

20.173 However, the Department did not support giving the court power to require the child protection agency to report back to it within a specified time period. It argued that this would give the children’s court an inappropriate general oversight role and would impose a costs burden on the agency with no ‘discernible benefit for the child or young person who is the subject of the report’.\textsuperscript{216}

20.174 According to the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), the key to addressing the issues raised lies in the establishment of effective relationships between the courts and the child protection agency:

Effective relationships between the Family Court, Children’s Court and Child Protection are essential in ensuring the safety and wellbeing of children. If in the course of hearing a matter a court forms a reasonable belief that a child has been or is at risk of harm or neglect it is appropriate for Child Protection services to be notified of that concern and to provide clear, prompt feedback on any investigation of that matter back to the court in a mutually agreeable manner. Specific timelines for the provision of such feedback should be determined regionally.\textsuperscript{217}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

20.175 The Commissions acknowledge the serious community concerns for many young people who traverse the child protection and juvenile justice divide. The lack of suitable accommodation and other support services, and the consequent remand in custody of increasing numbers of young people, undermines established juvenile justice principles of diversion and rehabilitation. Of particular concern are young people who are homeless as a result of family dysfunction and violence.

\textsuperscript{216} Department of Human Services (NSW), \textit{Submission FV 181}, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{217} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), \textit{Submission FV 236}, 20 July 2010.
20.176 This is not an issue that is easily addressed by legislative reform alone. For example, giving children’s courts formal powers to refer these matters to the child protection agency for investigation, and report, may not resolve the issue if there are no specialised bail services, refuges or other forms of suitable accommodation for young people who cannot live safely with their families. Ultimately, what is required is a commitment by state and territory governments to develop and fund adequate bail support services and bail accommodation services, in both metropolitan and regional areas, to meet identified needs. 218

20.177 Nonetheless, the Commissions consider that some legislative reform is desirable to provide a clear pathway for referral of concerns for the welfare or safety of children from the children’s court to the relevant child protection agency.

20.178 Rather than conferring a power of referral on children’s courts as proposed in the Consultation Paper, the Commissions consider that a similar outcome can be achieved by utilising existing mandatory reporting provisions in child protection legislation. However, the Commissions note that, unlike the mandatory reporting provisions applying to Family Court judges and magistrates of the Federal Magistrates Court under the Family Law Act 1975,219 current mandatory reporting provisions in state and territory child protection laws do not specifically refer to judicial officers and court staff. Rather, they apply generally to people who work in organisations that provide health, welfare, education, law enforcement, child care or residential services to children,220 thus leading to some ambiguity about whether judicial officers and court staff are mandatory reporters. To resolve any doubt, the Commissions recommend that child protection legislation be amended to provide expressly that judicial officers and court personnel are mandatory reporters and therefore have a duty to report concerns for the safety and welfare of a child or young person to the relevant child protection authority.

20.179 In addition, to address concerns by children’s courts that they are not advised about the outcome of any referrals they make to child protection agencies, the Commissions recommend that state and territory child protection legislation should be amended, to the extent that it is necessary, to require the child protection agency to provide feedback to mandatory reporters. 221 This should include an acknowledgement that the report was received, and providing information to the reporter about the outcome of the agency’s initial assessment of the report. The Commissions note that a similar recommendation, since implemented in NSW, was made by the Wood Inquiry.222

219 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67ZA.

220 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) ss 23, 27; Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 162, 184; Education (General Provisions) Act 2006 (Qld) ss 365–366; Public Health Act 2005 (Qld); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld); Public Health Act 2005 (Qld) ss 158, 191; Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) ss 3, 124B; Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) ss 6, 10–11; Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) ss 3–4, 14; Children and Young People Act 2000 (ACT) ss 342, 356; Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) ss 13–16, 26.

221 See, eg, Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 159M.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recommendation 20–7</th>
<th>State and territory child protection legislation should:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(a)</td>
<td>specify that judicial officers and court staff are mandatory reporters; and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(b)</td>
<td>require child protection agencies to provide timely feedback to mandatory reporters, including an acknowledgement that the report was received and information as to the outcome of the child protection agency’s initial investigation.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Part F

Alternative Dispute Resolution
21. Family Dispute Resolution

Contents

Introduction 983
Family Dispute Resolution 985
    Development of family dispute resolution 986
FDR in family law legislation 987
    FDR and parenting orders 987
    FDR and financial disputes 988
    FDR and the Family Law Act generally 988
    Definition of family violence 989
FDR in cases involving family violence 990
Screening and risk assessment practices 998
    FDR practitioners and screening 998
    Screening frameworks 999
    Lawyers as effective referral agents 1003
FDR practitioners and lawyers 1008
Culturally responsive FDR 1013

Introduction

21.1 Disputes of all types are increasingly dealt with by methods of dispute resolution that do not involve a decision by a court or tribunal and instead involve different ‘alternative dispute resolution’ (ADR) models. Part F of this Report examines the use of ADR processes1 in disputes involving family violence—processes that operate within or alongside family law, child protection law and family violence law, and which affect the operation of the legal frameworks that are the subject of this Inquiry.

21.2 ADR and restorative justice share common origins and philosophies as part of a move away from traditional legal processes and towards new forms of conflict resolution. However, ADR and restorative justice have developed as distinct areas of practice. ADR focuses on managing disputes in a collaborative way, whereas restorative justice is concerned with reparation and dialogue between offenders and victims.2

---

1 The term ADR is used here to include family dispute resolution (FDR)—the ADR model used to resolve disputes under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)—as well as ADR models used to resolve child protection matters and matters arising under family violence legislation.

21.3 The use of ADR and restorative justice is controversial in disputes involving violence and abuse. With respect to ADR, a major concern is that processes for dispute resolution are based on negotiations between parties and consensual agreements. In the context of family violence, the power relationships between the parties may make this dangerous or produce unfair or unsafe agreements.

21.4 As discussed in Chapter 23, the Commissions consider that negotiation or mediation about violence itself is never appropriate. Having considered research findings and stakeholder comments throughout this Inquiry, the Commissions have concluded that, where there is family violence, ADR to resolve issues other than violence may be appropriate, depending on effective and reliable family violence screening, risk assessment and risk management. In Part F of this Report, the Commissions consider the need for reforms in legislation, policy and practice to provide for the safety of parties during ADR, and to facilitate safe and effective outcomes through ADR in disputes involving family violence.

21.5 In this chapter, the Commissions consider the use of family dispute resolution (FDR) to resolve parenting disputes involving family violence. The Commissions examine the family law framework for FDR, with particular consideration of screening and risk assessment practices, cooperation and collaboration between FDR practitioners and lawyers, and the development of culturally responsive FDR.

21.6 In Chapter 22, the Commissions consider the disclosure of information and admissibility of evidence arising from FDR and family counselling communications. This involves balancing different considerations: agencies’ and courts’ need for information and evidence to protect victims or those at risk of family violence, and the need to maintain the integrity and ability of FDR and family counselling processes to secure safe outcomes for victims and those at risk in the context of family law disputes.

21.7 In Chapter 23, the Commissions consider the use of ADR processes in family violence, family law and child protection matters, and the inconsistencies in practice and outcomes arising from the gaps between these jurisdictions. In doing so, the Commissions note that legislative, policy and operational distinctions between family violence, family law and child protection issues do not always reflect the actual experience of families affected by family violence, for whom these issues often intersect. This leads the Commissions to consider the potential for ADR to overcome jurisdictional divides to offer seamless and effective resolution of intersecting issues in disputes involving family violence.

21.8 Australian governments and others have expressed strong support for greater use of ADR to resolve family law and child protection disputes. As discussed in Part F of this Report, much work has been done in recent years to develop ADR processes that have the flexibility to accommodate the personal and cultural needs, concerns, values and interests of particular children and their families, as well as providing appropriate safeguards to protect victims of family violence and those at risk of family violence. In this regard, the Commissions note the funding, development, implementation and other support of important strategies and initiatives by government, dispute resolution service providers, lawyers and other professionals in the fields of family law, child protection and family violence. As Part F of this Report indicates however, there is still important work to do to improve law and practice relating to the use of ADR in cases involving family violence.

Family Dispute Resolution

21.9 This chapter considers the role of FDR in resolving family law disputes—in particular parenting disputes—and the interaction between FDR processes under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and family violence.

21.10 The use of FDR in the context of family violence presents complex challenges. In addition to significant concern about the safety of participants engaging in FDR where family violence is present, there is concern that imbalances in power relationships between the parties may compromise the fairness of the negotiating process and result in unfair and unsafe agreements.

21.11 However, the capacity of FDR to provide flexible and accessible resolution processes to accommodate the particular needs, interests and concerns of diverse parties—especially where parties are victims or are at risk of family violence—contributes significantly to the possibility of achieving sustainable and effective outcomes.

21.12 As the Australian Institute of Family Studies (AIFS) found in its Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, there is evidence that some families with family violence issues are ‘on the roundabout’ between services which provide ADR in the family law system, lawyers, courts and state-based child protection and family violence systems.6 AIFS has also noted in relation to parenting arrangements, that the evidence of poorer well-being for children whose mothers have safety concerns ... highlights the importance of identifying families where safety concerns are pertinent and assisting them to make arrangements that promote the well-being of their children.7

21.13 The Commissions consider that the potential for FDR to expeditiously and effectively resolve parenting disputes in cases involving family violence—through practical and sustainable agreements, and with appropriate screening, risk assessment... and risk management—may help to circumvent the development or escalation of related child protection and family violence concerns.

21.14 In this chapter, the Commissions examine the way in which the legislative, policy and operational framework for FDR addresses family violence concerns. In particular, the Commissions consider screening and risk assessment practices, referral practices, cooperation and collaboration between FDR practitioners and lawyers, and the development of culturally responsive FDR, and make recommendations to improve FDR processes, standards and practice. Such improvements in processes, standards and practice will enhance FDR’s capacity to deliver sustainable and effective outcomes—and, in so doing, may assist in circumventing repeated engagement by family violence victims and those at risk with the legal system.

Development of family dispute resolution

21.15 FDR is defined broadly in the Family Law Act as any non-judicial process where an independent FDR practitioner helps people affected, or likely to be affected, by separation or divorce, to resolve some or all of their disputes with each other. Dispute resolution processes include mediation, conciliation and arbitration. In mediation, an impartial third party assists parties to negotiate an agreement. Conciliation is similar to mediation, except the conciliator may provide expert advice on possible legal outcomes and have an advisory role. In arbitration, an independent third party assesses the facts and determines the dispute according to law. In practice, mediation is the key process used for Australian family disputes. However, FDR services and agencies vary in their approaches and underlying philosophies. In addition to family dispute resolution, many agencies also provide counselling, parenting support and other services.

21.16 When the Family Court of Australia was established in 1976, it used counselling and conciliation. Since that time, FDR has expanded and developed extensively. FDR services are now provided by courts, legal aid commissions, community agencies and private providers. Most recently, the federal government has established a network of Family Relationships Centres (FRCs) throughout Australia that provide referral and FDR services. Practitioners have developed increasingly sophisticated approaches

---

8 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 10F.
11 Ibid, 164–165, discusses different models of mediation.
12 Legal Aid Commissions are required to consider whether a matter can be dealt with by dispute resolution before a grant of legal aid for family law matters can be made. If a matter is considered appropriate for dispute resolution, a grant of assistance will be made for a conference where the lawyer will represent the assisted party. The conferences are chaired by trained and qualified FDR practitioners. See KPMG, Family Dispute Resolution Services in Legal Aid Commissions: Evaluation Report (2008), prepared for the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, 11–12.
and strategies for assessing the appropriateness of FDR in differing situations, addressing power imbalances, and including children in their practices.14

21.17 FDR is presently governed by a detailed legislative framework under the Family Law Act and associated regulations, discussed in more detail below. Broadly speaking, the current legislative framework encourages or requires the use of FDR before court action and supports referral to FDR after an application to the court has been made. Exceptions are provided in cases of family violence and child abuse, reflecting concerns, discussed below, about the use of FDR in such contexts. Communications during the FDR process are, in general, confidential and inadmissible in subsequent court proceedings, although there are exceptions relevant to child abuse and family violence.15

FDR in family law legislation

21.18 This section sets out the legislative provisions regulating the use of FDR in the Family Law Act. Different regimes apply to FDR in relation to parenting orders and financial disputes. There are also some general provisions in the Family Law Act that govern FDR.

FDR and parenting orders

21.19 The 2006 reforms to the Family Law Act extended the use of FDR. With some exceptions, parties with a dispute about children must go to FDR before they can go to court,16 and must make a genuine effort to resolve their dispute through FDR.17 The exceptions to this requirement include where the parties agree and are applying to court only for a consent order.18 Importantly, they also include cases where violence is an issue, such as where the court is satisfied that there has been, or there is a risk of, child abuse or family violence,19 or where there are circumstances of urgency.20

21.20 If the parties do not reach agreement through FDR and do not satisfy one of the exceptions, the federal family courts can only hear parenting cases if the FDR practitioner provides a certificate relating to the parties’ attendance and effort in the FDR process.21 FDR practitioners may give several different types of certificates under s 60I of the Family Law Act, including a certificate to the effect that the person did not

---

15  See further below. The confidentiality and inadmissibility of FDR communications are discussed in Ch 22.
16  Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60I.
18  Ibid s 601(9)(a).
19  Ibid s 60I(9)(b).
20  Ibid s 60I(9)(d). Other circumstances include: where orders are applied for in response to other applications; where there has been serious disregard of previous family law orders; where parties are unable to participate effectively in FDR; and where other circumstances specified in the regulations are satisfied. No other circumstances are presently prescribed by the regulations.
21  Ibid s 60I(7).
attend FDR because, having regard to the Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (the FDR Regulations), the practitioner considers that ‘it would not be appropriate’ to conduct or continue FDR.²²

21.21 In determining whether a dispute is appropriate for FDR, the FDR practitioner must take into account whether the ability of any party to negotiate freely is affected by a number of factors, all of which are potentially relevant to cases of violence. These include: any history of family violence among the parties; the likely safety of the parties; the equality of bargaining power among the parties; the risk that a child may suffer abuse; the emotional, psychological and physical health of the parties; or any other relevant matter.²³ The FDR Regulations also require that an FDR practitioner must be satisfied of the appropriateness of FDR in each case before providing FDR.²⁴ An FDR practitioner is also obliged to terminate FDR if the practitioner is no longer satisfied it is appropriate, or is requested to do so by a party.²⁵

FDR and financial disputes

21.22 The s 60I framework applies only to parenting orders. In relation to applications for financial disputes, the requirements are set out in the Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth).²⁶ Consistently with s 60I, the Rules include mechanisms for removing obligations to participate in FDR in cases of family violence.

21.23 This is done in two ways. First, the Rules require compliance with pre-action procedures set out in sch 1, but there is an exception for cases of allegations of family violence or the risk of family violence or fraud.²⁷ Secondly, while the procedures in sch 1 generally require the use of FDR, the Rules set out circumstances—including allegations of family violence or cases of urgency—in which the court may accept that it was not possible or appropriate for a party to comply with the pre-action procedures.²⁸

FDR and the Family Law Act generally

21.24 Other provisions of the Family Law Act also deal with FDR, including provisions encouraging its use. Section 13C empowers the court to make orders referring parties to FDR or family counselling at any stage in proceedings, on its own

---

²² Ibid s 60I(8)(aa),(d). The other grounds upon which certificates may be issued are: a party did not attend FDR due to the refusal or failure of the other party (or parties) to attend: s 60I(8)(a); the parties attended FDR with the practitioner, and all parties made a genuine effort to resolve the issue or issues: s 60I(8)(b); the party attended FDR with the practitioner, but that party, or another party did not make a genuine effort to resolve the issue or issues: s 60I(8)(c).

²³ Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) reg 25(2).

²⁴ Ibid reg 25(4).

²⁵ Ibid reg 29(c).

²⁶ In May 2010, the Attorney-General of Australia announced an intention to extend the requirement to attend FDR prior to filing an application in court to property and spousal maintenance matters, as one of a range of measures consistent with the Federal Government’s Strategic Framework for Access to Justice: R McClelland (Attorney-General), ‘Improving Access to Justice’ (Press Release, 17 May 2010).

²⁷ Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 1.05.

²⁸ Ibid sch 1, cl 1(1),(4). initiative or on application by a party or an independent children’s lawyer. If a party does not comply with such an order, the court may make further orders as it considers appropriate following a report from an FDR practitioner or counsellor. Section 62B obliges a court to inform parties in a parenting proceeding about FDR and family counselling services. Section 69ZQ requires a court in child-related proceedings to courage the use of FDR, where it considers it appropriate. A requirement to attend FDR may also be imposed as a condition of a bond where parenting orders are contravened.

Definition of family violence

21.25 The definition of family violence in s 4 of the Family Law Act, and proposals to amend the definition, are discussed in detail in Chapter 6 of this Report. As discussed there, the definition is more restrictive than that used in some state or territory family violence legislation, and in practice-based material such as the Screening and Risk Assessment Framework, and in the Family Court of Australia’s Family Violence Strategy. Concern has been expressed that the definitional differences may create problems in practice. A KPMG evaluation of FDR practices in the legal aid sector found that screening questions tended to focus on physical forms of abuse, and recommended enhanced screening for non-physical forms of violence.

21.26 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions therefore asked whether the variations between the legislative definitions and practice-based definitions in FDR have had any practical impact in FDR practices.

21.27 The responses to this question focused on the definition of violence in the Family Law Act, identifying its narrowness and the requirement of reasonableness as problematic. Very few responses linked the definition with problems in FDR practice.

---

29 The court is required to consider seeking the advice of a family consultant before making such an order.
30 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 13D.
31 Ibid ss 70NEC, 70NFE.
32 Australian Catholic University and Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line (2008), 52, notes the definition in the Family Law Act and other definitions.
36 Ibid. Measures taken by the Legal Aid Commissions to address this and other concerns raised by KPMG are discussed below.
One submission asserted that the definition in the Family Law Act is narrow and does not include many of the dynamics of power and control. These dynamics may impact on capacity to negotiate, but not constitute violence under the Act, and the capacity of FDR to deal with such problems depends on the skill of the practitioner. The Queensland Law Society expressed concerns that FDR practitioners sometimes excluded parties from FDR because of concerns that did not meet the definition in the Act.

21.28 In Chapter 6, the Commissions express the view that the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act should expressly recognise that certain types of non-physical conduct—including economic abuse and psychological abuse—may fall within the wider definition of family violence. The Commissions recommend that family violence should be given a definition that describes the context in which acts take place, and that it should be defined as violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. The Commissions also express the view that the semi-objective test of reasonableness should be removed from the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act on the basis that it is inappropriate to apply a test of reasonableness to the experience of fear in determining whether conduct is violent. The Commissions do not, however, make a separate recommendation about the removal of the reasonableness test from the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act, as the Commissions’ recommended definition does not include the test of reasonableness.

21.29 In the Commissions’ view, this recommended definition will assist in educating those engaged in the family law system about the complexities and nuances of family violence. It will also deal with the concerns about the definition described above and the problems it may create in relation to FDR. Consequently, the Commissions make no further recommendation in this respect.

FDR in cases involving family violence

21.30 Both practitioners and scholars have expressed concerns about using facilitative methods of FDR in cases involving family violence. The New South Wales Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC) explored these concerns in its 2005 report, Community Justice Centres, where it expressed its concern ‘about mediation taking place where violence is a factor, particularly in situations involving domestic violence’.

---

39 Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
41 Rec 6–4. The Commissions recommend the same core definition of family violence for family violence legislation and the Family Law Act—see Rec 5–1.
43 Ibid, [4.41].
21.31 The reasons why FDR may be inappropriate in the context of family violence include:

- safety concerns—the FDR process may place women and children in danger because the offender may use FDR as an opportunity for violence or intimidation;
- power imbalances—the sometimes extreme imbalance of power in relationships characterised by family violence undermines the fairness of the negotiating process in facilitative methods of FDR;
- mediation requires honesty, desire to settle the dispute and some capacity for compromise—perpetrators of violence are not generally capable of such behaviours in relation to the target of their violence;
- mediation places too great a burden on the woman who has been the victim of violence, and who may, for example, be afraid to be in the same room with the perpetrator; and
- FDR is a private and confidential process, with the effect that violence against women is shielded from the public eye.\(^44\)

21.32 Other concerns include the difficulty of identifying violence. It has been suggested that it is very difficult for the victims of violence to reveal violence, and that those who commit violence are also unwilling to do so.\(^45\) FDR may therefore take place in the absence of crucial information and there may be ongoing impacts on parties and their children.\(^46\) Another issue is whether FDR is effective in situations of family violence. Some research indicates that mediation will not produce agreements or, if it does, the agreements will not be successful in many cases.\(^47\)

21.33 On the other hand, there are potential benefits of using FDR in cases involving family violence. The first is that FDR may be a more accessible method of resolving family disputes, as it is arguably both cheaper and faster than going to court.\(^48\) FRCs in Australia provide three hours of mediation without charge and many other services have affordable fee levels.

---

21.34 Secondly, if FDR is conducted by an experienced practitioner with appropriate safeguards, it may have positive outcomes for people who have experienced family violence.\(^{49}\) Some studies of FDR have identified high rates of participant satisfaction where there are well-trained, problem-solving FDR service providers with effective intake processes.\(^{50}\) FDR may offer the parties more involvement in resolving their dispute, and may give victims more opportunity to speak about matters which are important to them.\(^{51}\)

21.35 Governments and service providers have devoted resources to training and development of FDR practitioners in the area of family violence. FDR practitioners must be accredited and the relevant Vocational Graduate Diploma of Family Dispute Resolution includes compulsory units dealing with violence and providing for the safety of vulnerable parties.\(^{52}\) There has also been investment in research and policy development on FDR and violence.\(^{53}\) As discussed below, a screening and risk assessment framework for cases involving violence and abuse has been developed.\(^{54}\)

Models of FDR are being developed that include lawyers in the process, with particular relevance to disputes involving violence.\(^{55}\)

21.36 The risks associated with family violence in FDR processes may be managed in a number of ways. Some examples include:

- ensuring that victims are prepared for the process;\(^{56}\)
- taking practical measures to ensure safety, such as obtaining a silent phone number;\(^{57}\)
- taking care with client contact, for example by making written material only available at the centre and not leaving phone messages;\(^{58}\)

---

49  Ibid, 23.
50  Ibid.
51  Ibid.
52  Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) reg 5. In addition, the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department noted the availability of alternative pathways to accreditation, that do not involve the vocational graduate diploma: Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010. As reflected in Rec 21–2, the Commissions consider that high quality family violence screening and risk assessment tools should be included in all training and accreditation for family dispute resolution practitioners.
54  Australian Catholic University and Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line (2008).
57  Ibid, 42.
21. Family Dispute Resolution

- minimising contact between clients on the day, by using separate waiting rooms and exits for clients, and staggered arrival and departure times;\(^{59}\)
- allowing the presence of support persons;\(^{60}\)
- continuously assessing clients’ comfort levels and emotional state;\(^{61}\)
- using ‘shuttle’ mediation, where parties sit in different rooms and the mediator ‘shuttles’ between them;
- co-mediation with a male and a female mediator;\(^{62}\)
- using multiple short mediation sessions to reduce stress and the impact of contact with the perpetrator;\(^{63}\) and
- private follow-ups with each party between sessions.\(^{64}\)

Some of these measures may be included in a safety plan designed for the needs of an individual client.

21.37 While there is a range of views on the appropriateness of FDR in family violence contexts, a degree of consensus exists on certain matters. First, using FDR in cases involving family violence carries particular risks. Secondly, if family violence is to be dealt with in FDR processes, it must be handled by skilled and knowledgeable FDR practitioners using appropriate safeguards. Thirdly, in practice, some cases involving family violence do—and will continue to—proceed to mediation.\(^{65}\)

21.38 The AIFS Evaluation shows that FDR is attempted more frequently in cases involving violence than in those not involving violence.\(^{66}\) It also appears that, for some clients, the risk posed by family violence is not identified and managed effectively. The AIFS evaluation cited the following response as an example:

> For me, there were not enough sessions in the process. I was so scared and intimidated by my ex-husband that I had trouble thinking clearly. As a consequence of this, I felt bulldozed into making an agreement. … I also had to sit through a face-to-face session with my ex-husband before they’d believe that I was worried about him … I felt that my concerns were swept aside and the focus was on my ex-husband’s needs/wants.\(^{67}\)

\(^{59}\) Ibid.
\(^{60}\) Ibid.
\(^{63}\) Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
\(^{67}\) Cited in Ibid, 102.
21.39 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether the provisions of the Family Law Act relating to FDR needed amendment to ensure that the victims of family violence are not inappropriately attempting or participating in family dispute resolution, and whether any other reforms may be necessary to ensure that the legislation operates effectively. In particular the Commissions asked if s 60I was operating appropriately.68

Submissions and consultations

21.40 Several submissions responding to this question expressed concerns that violence was not always properly identified and/or dealt with appropriately. This included failure to identify non-physical forms of abuse, and failure to advise clients about exemptions from mandatory FDR for cases involving violence.69 For example, the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (AFVPLS Victoria) provided two case histories of matters where AFVPLS Victoria had concerns that violence was not properly identified or the response was not appropriate. In one of these cases there was family violence of sufficient severity for a child protection agency to have been involved. Nevertheless, prior to the intervention of AFVPLS Victoria, FDR had been deemed appropriate and the client reported that the FDR practitioner had indicated that shared parenting was appropriate. In another case of violence where there was a no-contact order in force, the FDR agency proposed child-inclusive FDR. The client was told they must proceed to FDR but not about the exemptions for cases involving violence. The AFVPLS Victoria put the FDR practitioner in touch with the child psychologist involved with the child and FDR was subsequently cancelled.70

21.41 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria reported concerns expressed by some magistrates that they often see victims of violence who have agreed in mediation to contact arrangements that are not safe.71 The Women’s Legal Service, Queensland also expressed concern that victims of violence are not being excluded from FDR:

- many FDR practitioners lack the knowledge and skills to appropriately identify domestic violence and therefore appropriate exclude it;
- some FDR practitioners believe they can ‘even out’ power imbalances;

68 Consultation Paper, Question 11–1. The operation of s 60I of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) is considered in Ch 22.
69 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 04, 23 August 2009. See also Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010, which commented that the accountability of practitioners in obtaining disclosure of family violence should also be considered.
71 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
• some FDR practitioners believe that attempting FDR may be of benefit and cannot be harmful;
• some FDR practitioners ‘know that the court will send the matter back for FDR’ even if a certificate is issued under s 60I that FDR is inappropriate;
• some victims of violence want to use FDR;
• some victims have no choice but to use FDR because they are ineligible for legal aid and do not want to represent themselves in court.\footnote{Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.}

These factors indicate the complexity of the assessments that must be made in these cases and also indicate that FDR practitioners may be under pressure from courts and clients to use FDR in cases of violence.

21.42 Another pressure referred to was the limited availability of free mediation—one stakeholder noted that the three hours of free mediation provided by Family Relationship Centres is not a realistic allocation for complex cases involving family violence.\footnote{Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.}

21.43 Notwithstanding these concerns, several submissions expressed positive views of the abilities of FDR practitioners in relation to violence. Dr Olivia Rundle, of the University of Tasmania, pointed to the difficulties faced by the victims of violence when using other methods of resolving disputes and compared them with the advantages of FDR:

FDR [practitioners] are trained specifically in working with people who have experienced family violence. They have an extensive tool–box for assessing the appropriateness of FDR in such cases and adapting their service to protect and support clients. Many service providers are government funded and subject to stringent requirements around effective risk management and audits by government departments. It is submitted that the existing structures are adequate to protect against FDR being conducted inappropriately, to the extent that is possible.\footnote{O Rundle, Submission FV 50, 27 May 2010.}

21.44 Similarly, the submission of the Family Relationship Services Association (FRSA), the peak body for FDR and other family relationship services, detailed the extensive expertise, policies and practices developed by the FDR sector to deal with cases involving violence.\footnote{Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.} These include training, supervision of practitioners, accreditation involving knowledge of family violence, establishment of complaints processes, and development of specialist practitioners in family violence.\footnote{Ibid.} A submission from a ‘consumer’ provided evidence of some of these measures in practice:

It was good that I could insist on not having to be in the same room with him and that care was taken to have me come and go from the meetings while the perpetrator was supervised in another room. It was still terrifying. I was so keen to negotiate that I was willing to risk a lot to do it. Now I know that he never, ever intended to negotiate and I went through hell trying to meet him half way.77

21.45 The Family Issues Committee of the NSW Law Society submitted that ‘in many respects the work done in FDR is very fine, appropriate, and producing excellent outcomes’, while also noting that there are risks and some problems remaining in this sector.78

21.46 The FRSA noted that there is considerable pressure on FDR practitioners dealing with violence, due to the rapid expansion of the network of 65 Family Relationship Centres, and the substantially expanded family and relationship services network.79 The FRSA submitted that the sector is committed to improving standards through training (including a Graduate Diploma in FDR), supervision, increasing competency requirements concerning violence, and the development of expert practitioners in advisory and supervisory roles.80

21.47 With respect to the question of what legislative amendments are necessary to ensure that victims of violence are not inappropriately attempting or participating in family dispute resolution,81 a small number of submissions suggested legal solutions.82

21.48 The changes suggested in submissions were overwhelmingly extra-legal.83 The need for referrals to legal advice84 and to specialist services for Indigenous clients in cases of family violence was raised.85 Further training for FDR practitioners, and training for ongoing accreditation for all relevant professionals in the family law system was recommended in some submissions, including training about family violence dynamics and indicators, and family violence policy.86 Training in how to conduct reliable and safe screening and risk assessment was also raised (screening and risk assessment is dealt with further below).87 The need for collaboration between FDR

77  Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010.
78  Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
79  Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
80  Ibid.
81  Consultation Paper, Question 11–1.
82  There was support for reform of the ‘friendly parent’ provisions of the Family Law Act: Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010. In addition, Women’s Legal Services, NSW supported reform of the ‘false allegations’ provisions.
84  National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
practitioners and specialised domestic violence services in developing training and improved practice standards was also supported. The National Abuse Free Contact Campaign argued:

There is a place for the Domestic Violence sector to be actively engaged in shared skills based on fifty years of feminist theory and practice, contributing to the development of tools for an appropriate and sensitive assessment. The training of family law professionals in screening and assessment tools should ideally be from those who are drawing on years of practice in identifying the more mundane and easier to miss forms of intimidation and manipulation.88

Commissions’ views

21.49 The Commissions note that there appears to be some inconsistency in standards in the FDR sector with respect to identifying family violence, assessing suitability for FDR and other aspects of screening and referral and FDR practice. While consultations and submissions detailed many experiences of good practice and supported the value of FDR, the persistence of problems in some parts of the sector was also revealed. Clearly some services and practitioners have high standards of practice in relation to family violence, but there also appears to be room for improvement in the sector. One factor that has contributed to the variability in standards is likely to be the recent rapid development of the FDR sector. The solutions to these problems appear to lie in extra-legal measures such as improved training and accreditation, and improved screening and assessment frameworks. These issues are considered in more detail below.

21.50 Collaboration between FDR practitioners and those in the family violence sector may also pay dividends. The Commissions note that collaboration is already taking place in some FDR services. In addition, as noted elsewhere in Chapter 21, the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department has worked to support the improvement of standards in FDR practice by encouraging the collaboration of professionals in the sector. This work confronts the challenges that come when organisations work together from different perspectives on violence.89 However, the Commissions also note that this Inquiry has demonstrated the many ways in which, despite the challenges, collaboration across different ‘cultures’ and approaches to violence is crucial to resolving many of the problems of family violence.

Recommendation 21–1 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should continue to collaborate with the family dispute resolution sector to improve standards in identification and appropriate management of family violence by family dispute resolution practitioners.

---

88 National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010.
Screening and risk assessment practices

21.51 A key element of FDR in practice is the process of screening and risk assessment, which is designed to ensure that victims of family violence are not using FDR in inappropriate circumstances, or to identify and mitigate any risk factors where FDR may be appropriate despite family violence or other risks.90 Two issues arise in relation to screening and risk assessment. The first is whether FDR practitioners are reliably and appropriately screening and assessing risks of family violence in practice. The second is whether FDR practitioners have taken on the role of ‘gatekeepers’ in the system and are performing a more general screening role in the family law system, especially by providing screening for family lawyers where litigation is contemplated.

The first issue is dealt with in this section; the second is dealt with in the following section.

FDR practitioners and screening

21.52 Screening and risk assessment varies across different FDR agencies. For example, the 2008 KPMG report found that a wide variety of FDR practices were evident within the legal aid sector.91 The report noted that most screening questions focused on the physical aspects of family violence,92 and recommended enhanced screening for non-physical forms of violence. It noted observations of FDR practitioners that screening did not always reveal violence and abuse, and that this could derail the conferencing process.93 The report also identified differences in how the various legal aid commissions approached issues of family violence. Nonetheless, the report found that the vast majority of legal aid clients surveyed felt safe or very safe both during and after the conference,94 and the majority of FDR practitioners agreed that there were appropriate protocols in place for family violence.95

21.53 The KPMG report made a number of recommendations to strengthen screening and intake processes, including: increasing the experience and knowledge of intake officers, lawyers, and FDR practitioners on particular matters;96 using or modifying particular practices, such as interviews and screening questions;97 and ensuring better preparation for the FDR process.98 The report also recommended establishing protocols for delivering services to marginalised groups;99 providing detailed practice guidance on the best interests of the child principle;100 examining strategies for providing referral

90 Australian Catholic University and Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line (2008), 13.
92 Ibid, 36.
93 Ibid, 32.
94 Ibid, 46.
95 Ibid, 47.
96 Ibid, 36, 41.
97 Ibid, 36.
98 Ibid, 36, 41.
99 Ibid, 54.
100 Ibid, 41.
21.54 Since the KPMG report was published, legal aid commissions have revised their practice standards and risk assessment and screening tools to ensure the safety of participants in FDR. In consultations, National Legal Aid advised the Commissions that there has been extensive sharing of screening tools and risk assessment protocols and best practice methodologies between the various legal aid commissions—largely through the National Legal Aid Dispute Resolution Working Group—to facilitate the ongoing development of a nationally consistent best practice approach. National Legal Aid also noted legal aid commissions’ engagement in ongoing interdisciplinary exchange of information and best practice in the handling of family violence across the wider family pathways network.103

21.55 With respect to screening for FDR, National Legal Aid advised that the dynamics of family violence, as defined broadly, are taken into account. Screening includes questions that focus on emotional or psychological abuse, intimidation, coercion and financial control. National Legal Aid noted that the legal aid sector aims to ensure that clients are able to participate in FDR safely and without disadvantage. To achieve this, legal aid commissions encourage parties to be legally represented at conferences as this assists the FDR practitioner manage the conference to protect vulnerable and disadvantaged parties.104

21.56 Further initiatives by the legal aid sector to deal with referral pathways and the development of protocols for delivery of services to CALD and Indigenous people are discussed below.105

Screening frameworks

21.57 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department has published a Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line (Screening and Assessment Framework),106 which addresses many of the issues raised in the KPMG evaluation of FDR in the legal aid sector in detail. The framework is an extensive resource available on the departmental website for FDR practitioners. It includes a screening and assessment framework, referral guidelines, and indicators of family violence, child abuse and

---

101 Ibid, 49.
102 Ibid.
103 National Legal Aid, Correspondence, 20 September 2010. Legal Aid WA has been chosen as the lead agency for the Coordinated Family Dispute Resolution Pilot in Perth (one of five pilots sites around Australia). The focus of the pilot is to enhance interdisciplinary clinical and legal support to both victims and perpetrators of family violence in appropriate matters through a coordinated FDR process.
104 Ibid.
105 Legal Aid NSW told the Commissions that, following the release of the KPMG report, it established a Best Interest Child Committee to explore issues relating to information access, services and support. In addition Legal Aid NSW is funding the training of staff to develop a more child inclusive model of FDR.
106 Australian Catholic University and Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line (2008).
abduction, and risk of self-harm. It discusses issues of supervision and practice support, and provides a range of resources for practitioners, including sample questions relevant to identification of violence.

21.58 The Victorian Government has similarly produced a comprehensive screening and risk assessment framework for all service providers in family violence.107 This sets out a common framework, including six components: a shared understanding of risk and family violence; standardised risk assessment; referral pathways and information sharing; risk management strategies; data collection and analysis; and quality assurance. It also includes three practice guides directed towards different levels of risk assessment processes for different categories of service providers. A common framework has advantages in terms of inter-agency trust and cooperation. The Commissions note that the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department is currently developing a national framework to support screening and assessment for family violence across the federal family law system.

21.59 In relation to the issue of screening and risk assessment, the Family Law Council considered that:

appropriate training in screening for family violence issues is essential for family dispute resolution practitioners, and those who refer matters to them. It is essential that practitioners have appropriate responses and options to offer once family violence is identified.108

21.60 The Council recommended that a consistent framework for screening and risk assessment be developed in accordance with principles adopted in the common knowledge base proposed by the Council,109 and that frameworks, tools and materials be endorsed by the expert panel and reference group.110

21.61 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the Australian Government should promote the use of screening and risk assessment frameworks and tools for family dispute resolution practitioners through, for example, training, accreditation processes and audit and evaluations.111

Submissions and consultations

21.62 There was significant support in submissions for this proposal.112 Domestic Violence Victoria, in a joint submission with other stakeholders, emphasised the

---

109 Ibid.
110 Ibid, 43.
111 Consultation Paper, Proposal 11–2.
importance of screening and assessment going beyond physical violence to explore the range of other behaviours that have the impact of intimidating, controlling and humiliating the victims of violence. The involvement of the family violence sector in the further development of screening and assessment processes was supported and acknowledged by some submissions. The screening and assessment tool employed by Victoria Legal Aid’s Round Table Dispute Management program received particular acknowledgement as an effective tool developed in collaboration with the domestic violence sector. The cross-sectoral collaboration between the Domestic Violence Resource Centre and Relationships Australia Victoria was also mentioned.

21.63 Training in the use of screening and assessment tools was described in submissions as very important, as was the understanding that screening is a process rather than an event—initial screening should not provide the only point of disclosure. The many disincentives to disclosing violence may mean that violence is only revealed, for example, after repeated inquiries or after trust in the service provider has been developed.

21.64 The development of screening and assessment tools was also described as not ‘a one-off event’: their continued refinement to reflect best practice is important. One submission specifically endorsed the recommendation of the Family Law Council (referred to above) that screening and risk assessment frameworks, tools and materials

---

114 Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; P Eastal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 04, 23 August 2009.

117 Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; P Eastal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 04, 23 August 2009.

118 Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; P Eastal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 04, 23 August 2009.
should be endorsed by an expert panel and reference group.\textsuperscript{119} Professor Julie Stubbs submitted that the tools used should be empirically tested and established for use in the Australian context.\textsuperscript{120} AIFS discussed the need for a reliable and validated tool to assist in the making of clinical judgments, and referred to work currently being done in Australia to produce more valid and reliable screening and risk assessment instruments for the family relationship sector. AIFS commented that commitment was required to coordinate these efforts so that a final product could be produced that would be user friendly and achieve a high level of confidence from lawyers and decision makers.\textsuperscript{121}

21.65 The issue of the cultural appropriateness of screening and assessment tools and training in their use was also mentioned in submissions.\textsuperscript{122} The particular barriers to disclosure of family violence for Indigenous women and women who have particular needs because of language, ethnicity, immigration status, disability are also important.\textsuperscript{123}

\textit{Commissions’ views}

21.66 In view of the strong support for this proposal and the content of the submissions, the Commissions recommend that the Australian Government continue to support and promote: high quality screening and risk assessment frameworks and tools for family dispute resolution practitioners; the inclusion of these tools and frameworks in training and accreditation of FDR practitioners; and their inclusion in the assessment and evaluation of FDR services and practitioners. In this regard, the Commissions note the need, as suggested by AIFS, for coordination of efforts to develop valid and reliable screening and risk assessment instruments.

21.67 The Commissions also commend the work of FDR services in collaborating with the family violence sector to develop screening and assessment frameworks and other tools to improve practice. In the course of this Inquiry, which is focused on the intersections of the complex systems handling family violence, the importance of, and the challenges inherent in, communication and collaboration across divergent perspectives on violence have become very clear. Collaborative practice, integrated services and the closure of the gaps in the system are predicated on this type of work,\textsuperscript{124} and reflect the principles for reform identified in this Inquiry.\textsuperscript{125}

\begin{flushleft}
\begin{footnotesize}
\textsuperscript{119} Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{120} J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{121} Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{122} Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 04, 23 August 2009.
\textsuperscript{123} Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 04, 23 August 2009.
\textsuperscript{124} See further Chs 29, 30.
\textsuperscript{125} See Ch 3.
\end{footnotesize}
\end{flushleft}
Recommendation 21–2 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should:

(a) promote and support high quality screening and risk assessment frameworks and tools for family dispute resolution practitioners;

(b) include these tools and frameworks in training and accreditation of family dispute resolution practitioners;

(c) include these tools and frameworks in the assessment and evaluation of family dispute resolution services and practitioners; and

(d) promote and support collaborative work across sectors to improve standards in the screening and assessment of family violence in family dispute resolution.

Lawyers as effective referral agents

21.68 Deciding on the appropriate path for clients in cases involving family violence can be a complex task. Section 60I of the Family Law Act, discussed above, requires that parties in dispute must attempt FDR before they can litigate about a parenting issue in a family court. FDR practitioners must provide a certificate under s 60I(8) that the parties did, or did not, attend FDR and made a genuine effort to resolve their parenting dispute. There are exceptions in s 60I(8) for cases that are not appropriate for FDR—these exceptions include cases involving violence. Where there is violence, or a risk of violence, the parties do not need to go to FDR but may go directly to court. A certificate under s 60I(8) is not required in certain circumstances. The circumstances are set out in s 60I(9). They include an exemption where the court is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that there has been, or there is a risk of, child abuse or family violence.

21.69 The AIFS Evaluation indicated that this legislative scheme may not be working well. One of the identified problems was the way FDR practitioners are being used to issue s 60I certificates. The evaluation conducted by AIFS showed that parents who reported experiencing physical or emotional violence, were ‘much more likely to have attempted FDR’ than parents who did not report experiencing violence.126 Of particular relevance is the finding that lawyers appeared to be sending victims of family violence to FDR services as a method of getting a s 60I certificate in order to allow them to proceed to the court. While FRCs did not provide certificates ‘as a matter of course’, some clients or legal advisers nonetheless saw providing certificates as the primary function of FRCs or believed a certificate should be issued as a default option.127 Importantly, the AIFS survey also revealed that clients, who clearly fell within the 126 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms (2009), 100. This was a finding based on a longitudinal survey of parents.

---

127 Ibid, 5–16.
exception to FDR in the legislation were ‘not infrequently referred to the FRCs by lawyers (and to a lesser extent by courts).’

21.70 The AIFS evaluation concluded that the rate of issuing of certificates had likely increased, and this was ‘in part connected with an absence of triage by lawyers and other professionals.’ There is a problem if clients who are clearly exempt from FDR are, nevertheless, being referred to FDR in order to get a s 60I certificate. In the Consultation Paper the Commissions expressed the view that FDR services should not be the triage point for family violence and that all personnel in the family law system should be capable of identifying violence and dealing with it appropriately. The extent of violence in the separating and divorcing population is such that violence is likely to be core business for most professionals in the family law system. Further, any agency or professional could be the first point of call for a party who has been the target of violence, and that agency or professional needs to be able to identify, manage or refer cases appropriately.

21.71 In order to be effective practitioners, family lawyers need training on how to identify and make appropriate referrals in cases of family violence. They need to be able to identify when FDR is clearly not appropriate and an application under s 60I(9) is required. All FDR agencies are not the same, and understanding the range of available services may assist in selecting the best match for the client. There may be cases where a lawyer is not sure whether FDR is appropriate or not, in which case referral may be the best decision so that an FDR practitioner can make a decision in the light of their knowledge of the capacity of FDR and of that service to handle cases involving violence. Appropriate screening and referral for lawyers therefore involves an understanding of family violence and also an understanding of the nature of FDR services and their practices in cases of family violence. The required knowledge and understanding is complex and is almost certainly best acquired through training and education.

21.72 The need for training of lawyers about family violence raises the question of how such training should be provided. Tertiary institutions address family violence issues in courses such as criminal law and especially in family law. However, coverage of family violence may not be sufficiently extensive or specialised to prepare lawyers for effective screening and referral in practice. Students who study family law as part of a law degree may not later practice in that area; lawyers who do practice family law may not have studied it at university. Professional bodies also provide education in family law and family violence. Some lawyers who practice in this area are specialists and have specialist accreditation, but many do not. Family lawyers may be required to

---

128 Ibid.
129 Ibid, 5–17. The evaluation noted that this may be linked to the ‘anxiety on the part of lawyers about clients making or being seen to be making deliberately false allegations’. The deterrent effect of the provisions in s 117AB, which provide for costs sanctions in cases where deliberately false allegations are made, is discussed in Ch 18.
131 The issue of education and training in relation to family violence in tertiary institutions and by professional bodies is considered in Ch 31.
attend professional development seminars, but unless they are Independent Children’s Lawyers, they are not required to have training in child development or family violence in order to practice family law. Providing education and training in family violence appears likely to involve collaborative relationships between many organisations.

Submissions and consultations

21.73 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that Australian governments, lawyers’ organisations and bodies responsible for legal education should develop ways to ensure that lawyers who practise family law are given adequate training and support in screening and assessing risks in relation to family violence.

21.74 There was strong support for this proposal in submissions. Some submissions were supportive of further training and support for lawyers because of negative experiences where lawyers did not respond appropriately to violence. Examples were given of cases where lawyers handled cases involving violence in ways that did not provide adequate protection for clients, including some cases involving violence of extreme seriousness.

21.75 Suggestions about the nature of training for lawyers and its significance were also made. One submission pointed to the broader relevance of family violence training beyond family law:

> Education about domestic violence needs to be included as a specific unit within the subject of Criminal law and Family Law at all universities. Further, even if a practitioner does not practise in family law, domestic violence still can have a large

---

132 Ibid, 7.
133 Consultation Paper, Proposal 11–1.
impact on other areas — such as credit and debt matter, criminal matters, wills and estates.\footnote{136}

21.76 The Law Society of NSW pointed to the benefits of cross-sectoral training, arguing that:

Solicitors have much to learn from the social sciences. Family Counsellors and FDRPs have much to learn about the legal dynamic.\footnote{137}

21.77 National Legal Aid similarly advocated for training and support beyond the legal sector, and referred to the recent tender by the Attorney-General’s Department for the development of a multi-disciplinary training package in relation to family violence.\footnote{138}

21.78 There were divergent views about the present availability of training on screening and risk assessment. The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria argued that there is very little education available to the private profession that would assist them to screen for family violence and assess risk.\footnote{139} However, the Law Society of NSW submitted that ‘a considerable amount of legal education on this topic is currently available.’\footnote{140} The Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia pointed to its record in the provision of training, including about family violence, and indicated its willingness to continue working with government and other agencies in this regard. The Council emphasised the importance of training in this area: ‘family law is such a dynamic and constantly changing area of law that continuing professional development is an essential part of family law practice’.\footnote{141}

21.79 Submissions and consultations also provided further information on the dynamics of lawyer referral to FDR in cases involving family violence. Two issues were raised: first, whether lawyers refer cases to FDR in order to pass on the job of screening and assessment to FDR services; and second, whether and why lawyers send cases involving family violence to FDR in order to get a certificate under s 60I(8) rather than making an application for an exemption under s 60I(9).

21.80 In relation to the first issue, consultations provided some confirmation of the findings of the AIFS evaluation. The Commissions were told that there are other barriers to lawyers screening for violence. The first barrier is resources—a client may not have the funds to pay for an application to court for an exemption under s 60I(9), so lawyers reportedly send their clients to FDR in order that the exemption will come under s 60I(8) and be free of cost.\footnote{142} The second barrier mentioned was knowledge. Lawyers reportedly do not feel competent to decide if a case is exempt under s 60I(9), so they send clients to FDR because of the expertise of FDR practitioners in this area.

\footnotesize{\begin{itemize}
\item[136] Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010.
\item[137] Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
\item[138] National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\item[139] Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\item[140] Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
\item[141] Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010.
\item[142] Confidential, Consultation, Darwin, 28 May 2010.
\end{itemize}}
Screening for violence was described as too big an onus to place on family lawyers and beyond lawyers’ knowledge base.¹⁴³

21.81 A further problem identified in consultations arising from the practice of sending cases to FDR for screening and assessment, is the problem of delay. While, in some areas, a rapid response from FDR is possible, in others there is a shortage of services and the resulting delay for clients may be several months. Clients may not realise that there is an option of going straight to court.¹⁴⁴

21.82 However, the Women’s Legal Service NSW argued for the desirability of having both options—of exemption from FDR under s 60I(9) and referral to FDR for screening and a certificate under s 60I(8). The Service argued that referring a client to FDR is often a legitimate and cost effective strategy:

Both these processes need to be accessible for clients and, in many cases, seeing a family dispute resolution practitioner for the purposes of obtaining a section 60I certificate is the preferable course: it is usually less expensive; having a certificate rather than not, may have more credence with the court; and the client may have an opportunity to participate in safe family dispute resolution if appropriate to do so.¹⁴⁵

21.83 There was also a suggestion in two submissions that the approach of courts to family violence is informing the unwillingness of lawyers to use the exemption provisions in s 60I(9). The Women’s Legal Centre (ACT and Region) submitted:

The attitude of the courts in granting exemptions based upon family violence allegations needs to be clearer for practitioners. We have heard anecdotally of Registries which simply do not allow exemptions and thus lawyers need to send their client to an FDR practitioner to obtain a certificate when it was obvious from initial instructions that FDR was not suitable.¹⁴⁶

21.84 The Women’s Legal Service, Queensland asserted that some FDR practitioners accept cases involving violence because they know that the court will send the case back for FDR even if a certificate that the case is not appropriate for FDR is issued.¹⁴⁷ Further submissions mentioned the impact of the 2006 amendments to the \textit{Family Law Act}, in particular the disinclination of lawyers to raise family violence in family courts because of the fear of costs orders or that the client alleging violence will be perceived to be an ‘unfriendly parent.’¹⁴⁸ If lawyers are concerned about the response to violence from family courts they may be inclined instead to refer cases to FDR, thus putting inappropriate pressure on that sector.

¹⁴⁴ Ibid.
21.85 The Commissions note that in commenting on the 2008 KPMG report, and on legal aid commissions’ strategies for referral pathways to other services, National Legal Aid pointed to its development of overarching referral and information sharing protocols. National Legal Aid noted that each Legal Aid Commission has criteria for referrals with their local Family Relationship Centres, including consideration of single referral points.149

Commissions’ views

21.86 The Commissions recognise that family violence is core business for all professionals in the family law system and that all of them should have the knowledge and expertise to identify violence and manage it appropriately. This includes lawyers, who should not assign their role in screening and assessment to FDR practitioners, requiring their clients to tell and re-tell their experiences of violence and possibly involving them in increased costs and delays. Lawyers should have the requisite understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence and of FDR to act as effective screening and referral agents.

21.87 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that Australian governments, lawyers’ organisations and bodies responsible for legal education should develop ways to ensure that lawyers who practice family law are given adequate training and support in screening and assessing risks in relation to family violence.150 In view of the responses of stakeholders in consultations and submissions, discussed above, the Commissions would also include FDR practitioners in this list of organisations, given the provisions of s 60I and the significant intersections in practice of lawyers and FDR practitioners in screening and risk assessment.

21.88 The Commissions note National Legal Aid’s development of referral and information sharing protocols. In the Commissions view, organisational strategies, such as the development of protocols for appropriate referral pathways to other services, may be valuable in complementing and supporting training for lawyers on effective screening and referral.

Recommendation 21–3

The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, family dispute resolution service providers, and legal education bodies should ensure that lawyers who practice family law are given training and support in screening and assessing risks in relation to family violence and making appropriate referrals to other services.

FDR practitioners and lawyers

21.89 The level of cooperation and collaboration between FDR practitioners and lawyers was raised as an issue in both the AIFS evaluation and the 2009 report of the Family Dispute Resolution

21. Family Dispute Resolution

Family Law Council.¹⁵¹ The AIFS evaluation noted the potential for the aims of legal and service professionals to conflict, and supported initiatives to promote ‘responsible FDR’ between lawyers, FDR practitioners and others in the sector.¹⁵²

21.90 Research by Professor Helen Rhoades and others in 2008, on inter-professional relationships between FDR practitioners and lawyers, demonstrated that although some practitioners enjoy positive professional contact, many have little collaborative contact with the other profession and there are some significant misunderstandings and tensions between the two groups.¹⁵³ This study found that successful collaborative relationships were marked by a number of features:

• practitioners described their relationship as a complementary services approach in which each group saw themselves and the other profession as contributing different but equally valuable complementary skills and expertise to the dispute resolution process;

• practitioners from both groups understood and respected the nature of each profession’s roles, responsibilities and ways of working with family law clients;

• practitioners had a shared expectation of the dispute resolution process and a shared understanding of the FDR program’s aims and approach to working with family law clients;

• family lawyers engaged in ‘positive’ advocacy practices;

• practitioners trusted the intake screening and referral practices of the other profession in cases involving family violence; and

• practitioners engaged respectfully with members of the other profession and extended professional courtesies, such as the provision of timely feedback about clients.¹⁵⁴

21.91 The focus of the first element of this study was on groups with good inter-professional relationships. In these groups practitioners trusted each other to handle violence appropriately in most cases, although some reservations were still expressed by both groups about the identification and handling of violence.¹⁵⁵ However, a survey of a larger group of lawyers and FDR practitioners conducted for the same study found that there was much greater distrust of the practices of the other profession in identifying and handling cases involving violence.¹⁵⁶

¹⁵⁴ Ibid.

¹⁵⁶ Ibid, 44–46.
21.92 In its 2009 report, the Family Law Council suggested a number of strategies ‘to develop and enrich inter-disciplinary cooperation and collaboration, particularly between FDR practitioners and family lawyers’.\(^\text{157}\) These recommendations were based on the work by Rhoades and others described above, and included:

- building opportunities for positive personal contact;
- building understanding of roles and responsibilities;
- providing lawyers and judicial officers with information about funded community based programs;
- considering ways to improve communication and feedback about clients; and
- family violence training for both professions.\(^\text{158}\)

21.93 Professor Helen Rhoades and her co-researchers suggested that the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, family dispute resolution providers, the Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia, and state family law associations should consider how to facilitate joint meetings of FDR practitioners and family lawyers to share information.\(^\text{159}\)

21.94 The Family Law Council also recommended the expansion of Australia-wide family pathways networks to support cooperation and referrals across the family relationship and family law system.\(^\text{160}\)

21.95 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that measures should be taken to improve collaboration and cooperation between family dispute resolution practitioners and lawyers, as recommended by the Family Law Council.\(^\text{161}\)

Submissions and consultations

21.96 A great majority of those that responded to this issue supported the proposal.\(^\text{162}\) In a confidential submission, one legal service provider noted that there is overlap between the two groups—that some FDR practitioners are lawyers and vice versa.\textsuperscript{163} Further, legal aid FDR models, and some others, employ lawyer-mediators. In these models the parties are generally legally represented, which may be especially important for disputes where there is violence.\textsuperscript{164} As noted by the Law Society of NSW:

---

\(^{158}\) Ibid, 45.

\(^{161}\) Consultation Paper, Proposal 11–3.

The Legal Aid Commission of NSW has a very successful and safe model of FDR. Most of the parties attend FDR with a solicitor. The solicitors are alert to any disclosure of risk to the safety of person or property and they advise their clients accordingly. The solicitor acting for the perpetrator is also alerted to the situation and can play a very positive role by advising their client of the consequences of their behaviour. The solicitor being present also allows the FDRP to remain neutral and impartial.\textsuperscript{165}

21.97 Some submissions also supported the involvement of the family violence community in developing collaborative and cooperative practices between lawyers and FDR practitioners, because of the breadth of experience of working with violence in that community.\textsuperscript{166}

21.98 Most submissions, however, simply expressed strong support for the proposal that measures should be taken to improve collaboration and cooperation between FDR practitioners and lawyers, as recommended by the Family Law Council.\textsuperscript{167}

\begin{thebibliography}{99}
\bibitem{163} Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.
\bibitem{164} Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010.
\bibitem{166} National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.
\end{thebibliography}
21.99 The Commissions note that in National Legal Aid’s comments on the 2008 KPMG report—and in particular with respect to legal aid commissions’ strategies for referral pathways to other services—National Legal Aid advised that all legal aid commissions are significant partners in developing and implementing referral pathways across the family law system. National Legal Aid commented that recent pilots and programs funded by the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department for the provision of legal assistance before, during and after FDR within Family Relationship Centres have built on these strong links.\(^{168}\)

Commissions’ views

21.100 The Commissions note that there was strong support for the proposal that measures should be taken to improve collaboration and cooperation between FDR practitioners and lawyers, as recommended by the Family Law Council. As indicated above, the Family Law Council envisaged that improvements in cooperation and collaboration might be achieved through the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department family pathways networks.\(^ {169}\) The Commissions also note the suggestion by Rhoades and others that the Attorney-General’s Department, family dispute resolution providers, the Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia, and state family law associations should consider facilitating joint meetings of FDR practitioners and family lawyers to share information.

21.101 The Commissions acknowledge the extensive record of the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department in funding and supporting the development of standards in FDR, and the work done by the Department in bringing together organisations of lawyers and FDR practitioners to work collaboratively and cooperatively.

21.102 As the Commissions indicated in the Consultation Paper, while it appears that some lawyers and FDR practitioners have good relationships, there also seems to be room to improve relationships between the two sectors. Given that FDR practitioners and lawyers are likely to be required to work together more extensively as FDR develops, the Commissions recommend that the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should continue to take leadership in bringing together organisations of lawyers and FDR practitioners to work collaboratively and cooperatively. In the Commissions’ view, such cooperation and collaboration will contribute to further improvements in FDR practice and standards.

Recommendation 21–4 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should continue to provide leadership, support and coordination to improve collaboration and cooperation between family dispute resolution practitioners and lawyers.

---

\(^{168}\) National Legal Aid, Correspondence, 20 September 2010.

Culturally responsive FDR

21.103 In the course of this Inquiry, stakeholders have commented on the particular needs and concerns of Indigenous and CALD children and families in the resolution of family law and child protection disputes involving family violence. As the Commissions discuss further in Chapter 23, non-judicial dispute resolution processes offer significant flexibility to tailor procedures and outcomes to the needs and interests of children, families and their cultures. Consequently, agreements may be more effective and sustainable.

21.104 In some respects, however, concerns about using non-judicial dispute resolution processes in cases involving family violence may be amplified in the context of Indigenous and CALD families because of the particular difficulties relating to identifying family violence in these cases. Researchers have highlighted some of the difficulties experienced and the reluctance felt by Indigenous and CALD women in disclosing their concerns about family violence and the safety of their children. Significantly, the AIFS evaluation of the 2006 family law reforms indicated that professionals in the family relationship sector lacked confidence in engaging with CALD and Indigenous families. Such a lack of confidence on the part of practitioners may also contribute to the complexity of identifying and assessing violence in Indigenous and CALD families for the purposes of FDR.

21.105 The significance of timely and reliable identification and assessment of family violence concerns is discussed above, and in Chapters 22 and 23.

21.106 It has been suggested that FDR practitioners’ awareness of not just the personal, but cultural, religious, language and structural factors that may affect the disclosure of violence, and their ability to adapt screening tools and questioning in accordingly are critical. It has also been suggested that, in addition to reviewing screening and assessment processes, review of referral practices to ensure that these 171 General concerns about using non-judicial dispute resolution processes in cases involving family violence are discussed in this chapter, above, and in Ch 22 and Ch 23.

---

174 See also Ch 18.
effectively identify and assess cultural contexts, preferences and needs is particularly important where violence may be present.176

21.107 More culturally responsive models of non–judicial dispute resolution are being developed to accommodate the cultural contexts, values and needs of parties involved in or affected by disputes.177 As these models develop, consideration will need to be given to how the accommodation of culture is balanced with the requirements of the law, particularly in cases involving family violence:

The challenge for culturally responsive practitioners is to effectively explore with clients whether and how elements of an individual’s culture may be accommodated in the FDR process. They avoid the traps of cultural relativism by being clear about the legal limits of accommodating culture, particularly where violence is present, but also understand that this assessment is a complex one. They will know when law, and procedural justice, trump culture and have the capacity to make this clear to the parties. Culturally responsive FDR [practitioners] respond effectively to the cultural dynamics of violence and of gender.178

21.108 While accommodating culture in cases involving family violence presents particular challenges, the potential for culturally responsive FDR to secure sustainable and effective outcomes in this context may also be significant. Further, culturally responsive FDR can assist FDR service providers to meet their important obligation to facilitate outcomes which observe children’s right to enjoy their culture.179

21.109 In consultations following the release of the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought comments from stakeholders about the capacity of FDR to offer processes and lead to outcomes that accommodate the needs of Indigenous and CALD families.

Submissions and consultations

21.110 Stakeholders commented on the interaction of family violence and culture, the factors affecting disclosure of family violence and the need for culturally responsive solutions. Stakeholders also reported on initiatives to provide culturally appropriate dispute resolution processes and outcomes for Indigenous and CALD children and families.

177 As described by Dr Susan Armstrong, “‘[c]ultural responsiveness’ in the context of service provision is the active process of seeking to accommodate the service to the client’s cultural context, values and needs’: S Armstrong, ‘Culturally Responsive Family Dispute Resolution in Family Relationship Centres’ (2009) 13 Family Relationships Quarterly 3. The development of culturally responsive models of non–judicial dispute resolution is described by stakeholders below, and in Chapter 23.

21.111 As noted in Chapter 22, the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (AFVPLS) commented that, for various reasons, including reluctance of Indigenous women to disclose violence, there are problems with Family Relationship Centres identifying family violence experienced by Indigenous people. 180 The particular need for holistic, community–based and culturally appropriate dispute resolution for Indigenous children was raised by another stakeholder. 181

21.112 Legal academic and researcher, Ghena Krayem, commented on the reluctance of Muslim women to disclose family violence because they feel they will be blamed for their situation and fear that if they go to the police, the response will be ‘it’s typical of your community’. In her opinion, ascribing violence to culture was overly simplistic. She related the causes of violence not to culture or religion, but to other factors that transcend culture or religion—such as isolation, dislocation, disempowerment, and alcohol abuse. Ms Krayem commented that the causes of violence might be the same, but the responses may have to be different and that holistic solutions are needed. She noted the importance of engaging communities in developing solutions, rather than simply responding on a case by case basis. 182

21.113 Legal Aid NSW noted that the KPMG report identified that legal aid commissions’ responses to people from diverse backgrounds were largely ad hoc, and that there was a need for formal protocols for delivering culturally and religiously appropriate FDR services. In response, Legal Aid NSW noted that it has developed more culturally appropriate dispute resolution processes for Indigenous clients, offering cadetships to Indigenous people to be trained as FDR practitioners, and offering all Indigenous clients an Indigenous FDR practitioner. FDR traineeships have also been offered to suitably qualified candidates from diverse cultural backgrounds with extensive understanding of the cultural practices, beliefs and experiences of their community. Legal Aid NSW told the Commissions about initiatives to develop a training and professional development framework for FDR practitioners, conference organisers and family lawyers, and other measures to ensure that FDR processes are culturally appropriate. Legal Aid NSW also told the Commissions about pilots in culturally responsive ADR in child protection. 183

21.114 Commenting on the work of legal aid commissions to engage CALD communities in the improvement of dispute resolution practice, National Legal Aid noted that all legal aid commissions maintain productive working relationships with CALD representative community based organisations to inform ongoing development of culturally appropriate policies and procedures. National Legal Aid described particular initiatives in this area, including the Victoria Legal Aid Roundtable Dispute

---

180 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010. This comment was made in relation to the value of including information about family violence on s 60I certificates; see Ch 22.

181 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010. The comments of this stakeholder are discussed in Chapter 23 in relation to ADR in child protection matters.

182 G Krayem, Consultation, Sydney, 22 June 2010.

183 The Nowra Care Circle pilot and the Bidura Children’s Court external court-referred mediation pilot are discussed in Ch 23. Legal Aid New South Wales, Correspondence, 14 July 2010; Legal Aid New South Wales, Correspondence, 14 July 2010.
Management program, which has included extensive consultations with CALD (particularly Arabic and African) communities in Melbourne and professional development for case managers in relation to working with interpreters and other issues relevant to these communities. National Legal Aid also referred to Legal Aid Queensland’s Indigenous mediation model, which was established in partnership with the Yarrabah community, and utilises Indigenous mediators from that community. National Legal Aid also told the Commissions about the participation of Legal Aid Western Australia’s Clinical Services Coordinator in a training program involving cross cultural leadership, peacemaking and mediation in the context of Indigenous culture.184

21.115 The FRSA referred to barriers to access to FDR services for CALD families, such as low awareness of services, practical difficulties with the use of interpreters and the additional resources needed to respond appropriately to the needs of families with complex needs. According to the FRSA, services working with Indigenous communities reported that such work ‘requires quite a different approach to service delivery than used for mainstream client groups’. The FRSA also noted that while the Secretariat of National Aboriginal and Islander Child Care had recently received government funding to develop a comprehensive resource manual to support services to improve their cultural responsiveness to Indigenous families, funding was not provided for associated training and dissemination. The FRSA also referred to a model of dispute resolution for Indigenous families, developed by the Alice Springs Family Relationship Centre, which it believes warrants further dissemination and support. In FRSA’s view, ‘improving practice in this area requires more than ad hoc activities driven by highly motivated individuals’. In the FRSA’s view, a more comprehensive and strategic approach to enhance culturally responsive practice in FDR and other family support programs is needed.185

21.116 The various factors which affect the identification of family violence experienced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and CALD women, including reluctance to disclose, are addressed through culturally sensitive family violence screening and risk assessment.

Commissions’ views

21.117 In the Commissions’ view, FDR offers significant promise for processes that can accommodate—in so far as is appropriate, practicable and within the limits of the law—the cultural, religious and social values and practices of CALD and Indigenous communities. The Commissions note the particular value of culturally responsive FDR in promoting outcomes that observe children’s right to enjoy their culture. The Commissions commend stakeholders and the Australian Government Attorney–General’s Department for the work they have already done to develop culturally responsive FDR practice and service delivery for Indigenous and CALD communities.

184 National Legal Aid, Correspondence, 20 September 2010.
185 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
21.118 The Commissions appreciate that the development of culturally responsive FDR practice requires considerable planning and resources, particularly for its application in cases involving family violence. In this regard, the Commissions note stakeholder concerns that culturally responsive approaches should be developed and implemented in a comprehensive, strategic and holistic way, rather than on an ad hoc basis.

21.119 The Commissions also acknowledge the complexity of identifying and assessing family violence in different cultural contexts. Existing and future initiatives to improve FDR practice and service delivery for Indigenous and CALD communities require comprehensive and strategic support to ensure that screening and risk assessment processes can reliably identify and assess family violence in different cultural contexts; to develop protocols for referrals to culturally appropriate support services;\(^\text{186}\) to engage Indigenous and CALD communities in developing holistic, effective and appropriate processes and outcomes in cases involving family violence; and to build FDR practitioners’ skills and confidence in working in this area. The Commissions consider, therefore, that the Australian Government should take a comprehensive and strategic approach to support culturally responsive family dispute resolution. The Commissions consider that the development of culturally responsive FDR screening and risk assessment processes is particularly important to ensure that family violence concerns are appropriately and effectively identified, assessed and managed.

\begin{boxedRecommendation}

Recommendation 21–5

The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should take a comprehensive and strategic approach to support culturally responsive family dispute resolution, including screening and risk assessment processes.

\end{boxedRecommendation}

\(^{186}\) In this Report, the Commissions have recommended that Australian, state and territory governments prioritise the provision of, and access to culturally appropriate victim support services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups: Rec 29–3.
22. Confidentiality and Admissibility

Contents

Introduction 1019
FDR and family counselling confidentiality 1022
    Serious threats to life, health or safety 1023
    Threats to a child’s welfare 1028
    Conduct which may constitute grounds for a protection order 1032
Admissibility of FDR and family counselling communications 1034
    Disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence 1035
    Other disclosures of family violence 1040
    Application of sections 10E and 10J to state and territory courts 1042
Section 60I Certificates: information about family violence 1045

Introduction

22.1 Under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), information obtained during family dispute resolution (FDR) and family counselling1 is confidential and inadmissible in court proceedings, although there are exceptions.2

22.2 The exceptions to the confidentiality of such communications include where the FDR practitioner or family counsellor3 reasonably believes disclosure is necessary for a range of purposes relevant to family violence, including:

- protecting a child from the risk of harm;
- preventing or lessening a serious and imminent threat to the life or health of a person;
- reporting the commission, or preventing the likely commission, of an offence involving violence or a threat of violence to a person;
- preventing or lessening a serious and imminent threat to the property of a person;

1 ‘Family counselling’ is defined in s 10B of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).
2 Ibid ss 10D, 10E, 10H, 10J. Sections 10E and 10J also apply to proceedings before a person authorised to hear evidence (whether the person is authorised by a law of the Commonwealth, a state or a territory, or by the consent of the parties).
3 Family counsellors are described in Ibid s 10C.
reporting the commission, or preventing the likely commission, of an offence involving intentional damage to property of a person or a threat of damage to property; or

- assisting an independent children’s lawyer to represent a child’s interests.\(^4\)

22.3 The exceptions to the inadmissibility of such communications include admissions or disclosures that indicate child abuse or a risk of child abuse,\(^5\) and information that it is necessary for an FDR practitioner to give on a s 60I certificate.\(^6\) There are also obligations on FDR practitioners and family counsellors to notify child protection authorities in cases of actual or suspected child abuse.\(^7\) The confidentiality and inadmissibility provisions in ss 10D, 10E, 10H and 10J of the Family Law Act are discussed further below.

22.4 In addition to the exceptions to the confidentiality and admissibility provisions, the Family Law Act allows FDR practitioners to communicate limited information to the courts, through s 60I certificates, to verify that FDR was considered to be inappropriate or was unsuccessful. The potential—and limitations—of s 60I certificates as a means of communicating information about family violence to the courts is discussed further below.

22.5 The confidentiality and inadmissibility of FDR communications are important for a number of reasons. If disputes are to be resolved effectively, there is a need for candour by the parties. Importantly, parties may opt for FDR processes precisely because they know that their communications will be protected. Parties need to be able to trust the FDR practitioner to respect their confidences, including when one party meets privately with a practitioner. If parties know that their communications will not be protected from disclosure or from use in potential subsequent litigation, they may be discouraged from speaking openly and honestly and from divulging relevant information.

22.6 On the other hand, knowing that FDR communications are confidential and inadmissible may deter parties from entering FDR as a ‘fishing expedition’ for information that can be used in subsequent litigation, rather than with the intention of making a genuine effort to resolve their dispute.\(^8\) The absence of legal safeguards in

---

\(^4\) Ibid ss 10D(4), 10H(4).

\(^5\) Ibid ss 10(E)(2), 10(J)(2).

\(^6\) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 10J(3).

\(^7\) Ibid s 67ZA(2). See also ss 67ZB and 111CV. Section 67ZA(3) of the Family Law Act permits (but does not require) disclosure of information by FDR practitioners and family counsellors on the grounds of reasonable suspicion of past or future risk of ill-treatment of a child and past or future risk of exposure or subjection of a child to psychologically harmful behaviour. State and territory legislation also impose obligations on FDR practitioners and family counsellors to notify child protection authorities where certain child protection concerns are raised. Mandatory reporting provisions are discussed further in Ch 20, and below.

\(^8\) H Astor and C Chinkin, Dispute Resolution in Australia (2002), 178.
non court processes such as FDR is also relevant. Parties disclosing information without legal advice and representation, for example, may prejudice their position.

22.7 The confidentiality and inadmissibility of family counselling communications are also important. Clients who attend counselling trust that their sensitive information will not be passed on without their consent. Disclosure of sensitive information by counsellors could detrimentally affect the counselling relationship and undermine the benefits of counselling.

22.8 The confidentiality and inadmissibility of FDR and family counselling communications do, however, limit the availability of information to the courts and other agencies dealing with matters involving family violence. Confidentiality may also inhibit the development of important collaborative relationships between different participants within the family law system. A 2009 report of the Australian Institute of Family Studies suggested that communication of disclosures made in FDR processes may allow greater coordination where matters move between different parts of the system:

> Currently, much relevant information may be collected by relationship service professionals in screening and assessment processes, but this information is not transmissible between professionals in this sector and professionals in the legal sector, or between other agencies and services responsible for providing assistance. Effectively, families who move from one part of the system to the other often have to start all over again. For families already under stress as a result of family violence, safety concerns and other complex issues, this may delay resolution and compound disadvantages.

22.9 In addition to being relevant to different participants in the family law system, communications to family counsellors and FDR practitioners may also be relevant to family violence and child protection matters being dealt with by state and territory agencies and courts exercising child protection and family violence jurisdiction. The extent to which legislative provisions facilitate the sharing of FDR and family counselling communications with state and territory courts and agencies may have important implications for the development of collaborative relationships across legal systems and jurisdictions and the ability of the responsible participants in these different areas to respond appropriately to family violence.

22.10 Previous reviews have recognised that limitations on the courts’ access to information about family violence may have an impact on safety and have suggested that the Australian Government consider amending the provisions in the Family Law Act dealing with confidentiality, inadmissibility and s 60I certificates to ensure that information from family counselling and FDR, which is relevant to assessing risks of family violence and the making of appropriate parenting orders, is made available to the family courts. The federal Attorney-General, the Hon Robert McClelland MP, has also asked the National Alternative Dispute Resolution Advisory Council (NADRAC) to report on legislative changes required to protect the integrity of different ADR processes. As part of its inquiry, NADRAC is considering confidentiality, and non-admissibility of FDR communications.

---

22.11 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked questions and made proposals for changes to the confidentiality and admissibility provisions in ss 10D, 10E, 10H, and 10J of the Family Law Act and to s 60I certificates to facilitate greater disclosure and information sharing by FDR practitioners and family counsellors.

22.12 This chapter examines the balancing of different considerations: the need to make information and evidence available to relevant agencies and courts so that they can better protect victims or persons at risk of family violence, and the need to protect the confidentiality and limit the admissibility of FDR and family counselling communications so that FDR and family counselling processes are not compromised in their ability to secure better and safer outcomes for family violence victims and those at risk.

22.13 The following three sections of this chapter consider whether there should be additional exceptions in ss 10D, 10E, 10H and 10J to the confidentiality and inadmissibility of family counselling and FDR communications, and whether s 60I certificates should include additional information about family violence.

FDR and family counselling confidentiality

22.14 Sections 10D and 10H of the Family Law Act impose confidentiality obligations on family counsellors and FDR practitioners respectively. These persons must maintain the confidentiality of all communications made to them except in limited situations. First, communications may be disclosed with the consent of the person who made the communication or, if the person is under the age of 18, with the consent of each of the child’s parents or a court. Secondly, family counsellors and FDR practitioners may also disclose communications where the counsellor or practitioner reasonably believes that disclosure is necessary to:

- protect a child from the risk of physical or psychological harm;
- prevent or lessen a serious and imminent threat to the life or health of any person; or

---

12 NADRAC is due to report to the Attorney-General by 30 November 2010. Given the timetable for the Commissions’ Inquiry, the Commissions were not able to consider NADRAC’s recommendations with respect to these matters. See R McClelland (Attorney-General), Integrity of ADR Processes: Terms of Reference to the National Dispute Resolution Advisory Council (2009).
• report the commission, or prevent the likely commission, of an offence involving violence or a threat of violence to a person.\(^\text{14}\)

22.15 In addition, family counsellors and FDR practitioners must disclose a communication if they reasonably believe that the disclosure is necessary to comply with a law of the Commonwealth or a state or territory. This includes, for example, mandatory reporting of children at risk of harm under state and territory laws.\(^\text{15}\)

22.16 The confidentiality provisions in ss 10D and 10H apply to communications made to FDR practitioners and family counsellors while they are conducting FDR or family counselling.\(^\text{16}\) The Commissions note that there may be a question as to whether screening and risk assessment undertaken for the purposes of FDR are actually a part of FDR and, therefore, whether s 10H protects the confidentiality of communications made during such screening and risk assessment.\(^\text{17}\) Section 10F of the Family Law Act defines FDR as a process in which an FDR practitioner ‘helps people affected, or likely to be affected, by separation or divorce to resolve some or all of their disputes with each other’.

22.17 As discussed in Chapter 21, screening and risk assessment are key elements of FDR in practice. Their purpose is to ensure that victims of family violence are not using FDR in inappropriate circumstances, and to identify and mitigate any risk factors where FDR may be appropriate despite such risks. If screening and risk assessment are conducted by an FDR practitioner as part of FDR, then the confidentiality of communications made during such screening and risk assessment will be protected by s 10H. If, however, screening and risk assessment are conducted as a separate process preceding FDR, then the confidentiality of the communications will not be protected by s 10H. However, other obligations of confidentiality may arise in relation to screening and risk assessment communications in these circumstances—for example, equitable or contractual duties of confidence.

Serious threats to life, health or safety

22.18 While ss 10D and 10H permit disclosure with respect to threats to life and health, such perceived threats must be both serious and imminent. Further, ss 10D and 10H do not expressly permit disclosures by family counsellors and FDR practitioners in situations where disclosure is intended to avert a threat to a person’s safety.

\(^{14}\) In these circumstances, disclosure is permitted rather than required.

\(^{15}\) For more on mandatory reporting obligations in the context of child protection, see Ch 20 and D Higgins, L Bromfield, Nick Richardson, Prue Holzer and Claire Berlyn, National Child Protection Clearinghouse Resource Sheet: Mandatory Reporting of Child Abuse and Neglect (2010), prepared for the Australian Institute of Family Studies.

\(^{16}\) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 10D(1), 10H(1).

\(^{17}\) Screening and risk assessment for the purposes of FDR are discussed in Ch 21.
22.19 By way of comparison, the Commissions note that safety is already included as a ground for disclosure in some laws dealing with confidentiality in other contexts.18

22.20 The Privacy Act 1988 (Cth) sets out principles for use and disclosure of personal information in the Information Privacy Principles (IPPs), which apply to federal public sector organisations, and in the National Privacy Principles (NPPs), which apply to private sector organisations. The IPPs and the NPPs each allow personal information to be used and disclosed if it is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious and imminent threat to an individual’s life or health.19 The NPPs also allow use and disclosure if it is necessary to lessen or prevent:

- a serious and imminent threat to an individual’s safety; or
- a serious threat to public health or public safety.

22.21 In Recommendation 25–3 of its report, For Your Information: Australian Privacy Law and Practice (ALRC Report 108), the ALRC recommended that a reasonable belief that use or disclosure is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to a person’s safety should be included as a ground for disclosure in principles governing use and disclosure of personal information in federal, state and territory privacy laws.20 The ALRC also recommended that the requirement for a threat to be imminent should be removed from principles governing use and disclosure of personal information. The ALRC noted that:

> [t]he current requirement that the requisite threats to an individual be imminent as well as serious sets a disproportionately high bar to the use and disclosure of personal information. This is problematic in circumstances in which there may be compelling policy reasons for the information to be used or disclosed but it is impracticable to seek consent. Agencies and organisations should be able to take preventative action to stop a threat from escalating to the point of materialisation. In order to do so, they may need to use or disclose personal information.21

22.22 In June 2010, the Government released an exposure draft of proposed new Australian Privacy Principles (APPs) as the first step in the implementation of reforms to the Privacy Act following the recommendations in ALRC Report 108. The proposed APPs are intended to replace the IPPs and NPPs, and to apply to both federal public sector agencies and private sector organisations.22 Proposed APP 6 prohibits personal information collected for a particular purpose being disclosed for a different purpose, except in some limited circumstances. These exceptions include disclosure where it is reasonably believed that the information is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious

---

18 See, eg, Aged Care Act 1997 (Cth) s 86–2; Customs Administration Act 1985 (Cth) s 16.
19 Privacy Act 1988 (Cth) s 14, IPPs 10(1)(e), 11(1)(c); sch 3, NPP 2.1(e)(i). threat to life, health or safety, and it is unreasonable or impracticable to obtain the affected individual’s consent to the disclosure.23

22.23 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that ss 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b) of the Family Law Act be amended to remove the requirement for a threat to be ‘imminent’ and to add ‘safety’ to ‘life or health’ as a ground for disclosure. This would permit family counsellors and FDR practitioners to disclose communications where they reasonably believe that disclosure is necessary to prevent or lessen a serious threat to a person’s life, health or safety.24 Such amendments would also make ss 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b) more consistent with the proposed APPs.

Submissions and consultations

22.24 Most of the submissions responding to the Commissions’ proposal supported the suggested amendments to ss 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b).25 The Law Society of New South Wales Dispute Resolution Committee, however, expressed a strong objection to this and the Commissions’ other proposals for amendments to ss 10D and 10H. The Committee was of the view that the existing provisions for disclosure operate appropriately. The Committee noted that FDR practitioners and family counsellors are mandatory reporters with respect to risks to children, and that ss 10D and 10H clearly provide for disclosure of risks relating to family violence. According to the Committee,

---

23 Exposure Draft: Australian Privacy Principles 2010 (Cth). In its first stage response to Rec 25–3 of ALRC Report 108, the Australian Government suggested that disclosure of personal information necessary to prevent or lessen a serious threat should be permitted only after consent has first been sought, where seeking consent is reasonable and practicable: Australian Government, Enhancing National Privacy Protection—Australian Government First Stage Response to the Australian Law Reform Commission Report 108 For Your Information: Australian Privacy Law and Practice (2009). This consent element was subsequently incorporated into the draft Australian Privacy Principles.

there is no need to amend the legislation if family counsellors and FDR practitioners are properly trained to ensure they recognise when they should report communications indicating risk to a child or other person or property. The Committee also pointed out that the Family Court now has the benefit of family consultants to report what occurs during sessions with the family.\(^\text{26}\)

22.25 With respect to the inclusion of ‘safety’ as a ground for permissible disclosure, the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department suggested that ss 10D and 10H already permit a disclosure intended to avert a threat to a person’s safety. In this regard, the Department referred the Commissions to ss 10D(4)(a), (b) and (c) and 10H(4)(a),(b) and (c).\(^\text{27}\) The Commissions note that the provisions referred to by the Attorney-General’s Department refer to ‘risk of harm’ (in relation to a child), ‘threat to the life or health of a person’, and ‘violence or a threat of violence to a person’.

22.26 As noted above, most of the submissions supported the suggested amendments to ss 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b). Submissions also suggested that the impact of such disclosures on the immediate safety of women should be taken into account,\(^\text{28}\) and that family counsellors and FDR practitioners should make appropriate or immediate referrals to services such as police, crisis support services and legal assistance,\(^\text{29}\) and develop safety plans in conjunction with the person or persons at risk.\(^\text{30}\)

22.27 Women’s Legal Services NSW, in general comments about disclosure and information sharing, also referred to the potential risk of harm to the person disclosing violence, and the importance of consent to disclosure of information.\(^\text{31}\) The Office of the Privacy Commissioner (OPC) referred to the Australian Government’s position that those disclosing personal information to prevent or lessen serious threats should consider seeking consent first.\(^\text{32}\) In the OPC’s view, this approach helps to ensure that

---

\(^{26}\) The Committee also noted provisions with respect to independent legal representatives for children (ss 10D(4)(e), 10H(4)(f) and 68L of the Family Law Act) and commented that if a parent’s solicitor is concerned about a child, the solicitor should seek the appointment of an independent children’s lawyer under s 68L: Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010, referring to the views of the Dispute Resolution Committee.

\(^{27}\) Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010.

\(^{28}\) National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.

\(^{29}\) National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

\(^{30}\) Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010. The FRSA supported this proposal but also noted that unless disclosure was reasonably likely to result in protective action, the disclosure could inflame the situation and serve to increase rather than decrease the risk. The FRSA suggested the development of a safety plan so that any action taken does not inadvertently make the situation worse.

\(^{31}\) Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010. It should be noted that Women’s Legal Services NSW’s comment about consent to disclosure was made in the context of comments about the discloser’s control of use of the information in family law proceedings.

\(^{32}\) In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions noted that in response to this recommendation, the Australian Government had agreed that requiring a serious threat to be imminent can be too restrictive. However, the Government noted some stakeholder views that the ‘imminence’ requirement operated as an important safeguard against the mishandling of personal information. The Government suggested a compromise position, which would permit the disclosure of personal information where necessary to prevent or lessen a serious—but not necessarily imminent—threat only after consent has first been sought, where seeking consent is reasonable and practicable. See Australian Government, Enhancing National Privacy the affected individual maintains an appropriate degree of control over the disclosure of his or her personal information. Nevertheless, noting that it was consistent with the ALRC’s recommendation in ALRC Report 108, OPC expressed support for the Commissions’ proposal, and suggested that the development of guidance material may be beneficial in assisting family counsellors and FDR practitioners to determine the seriousness of a threat and to understand when disclosures may be made without consent.33

Commissions’ views

22.28 In the Commissions’ view, there are compelling policy reasons to remove the imminence requirement in ss 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b). Family violence sometimes manifests as controlling behaviour over a number of years.34 The resulting threat may, therefore, be very difficult to characterise as ‘imminent’ even where it is ‘serious’.

22.29 Safety has been described as ‘the central concern of domestic violence intervention’.35 The Commissions’ proposal to refer expressly to ‘safety’ in ss 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b) would make it clear that a family counsellor or FDR practitioner is permitted to disclose communications where he or she reasonably believes that disclosure is necessary to prevent or lessen a serious threat to a person’s safety. The Commissions note that, in the view of the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, ss 10D and 10H do cover safety. While it may be arguable that the particular provisions referred to already include, by implication, threats to a person’s safety, the Commissions are of the view that in order to clarify and put this matter beyond doubt, ‘safety’ should be expressly recognised as a permissible basis for the disclosure of information.

22.30 The Commissions note that the proposed removal of the imminence requirement and the addition of threats to safety as an express ground for disclosure, is consistent with the reasoning in Recommendation 25–3 of ALRC Report 108 and with proposed developments in federal privacy law.

22.31 The Commissions are of the view that it is unnecessary to impose a statutory requirement to consider seeking consent before making a disclosure. The Commissions agree that, where reasonable and practicable, FDR practitioners and family counsellors should seek consent before making a disclosure. However, the Commissions note the OPC’s comment, that ‘where there is a serious threat to a person’s life, health or safety, disclosure without consent will generally be warranted’.36 FDR practitioners and family counsellors will need to have reasonable grounds for believing that the disclosure is necessary to lessen or prevent the threat, and not merely helpful.
desirable, or convenient. Where it is possible to obtain consent, then disclosure without consent will not be necessary.

22.32 The Commissions agree with the OPC that guidance material may be beneficial in assisting family counsellors and FDR practitioners to determine the seriousness of a threat and to identify when a disclosure may be made without consent. The Commissions are mindful of concerns raised about the additional risk to victims and potential victims of family violence that may sometimes result from such disclosures. Guidance material should, in the Commissions’ view, encourage family counsellors and FDR practitioners making disclosures with respect to threats to life, health, or safety to also refer family violence victims and those at risk to appropriate support services, and to work with them to develop appropriate safety plans.

Recommendation 22–1 Sections 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to permit family counsellors and family dispute resolution practitioners to disclose communications made during family counselling or family dispute resolution, where they reasonably believe that disclosure is necessary to prevent or lessen a serious threat to a person’s life, health or safety.

Recommendation 22–2 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, in consultation with family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors, should develop material to guide family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors in determining the seriousness of a threat to an individual’s life, health or safety, and identifying when a disclosure may be made without consent. Such guidance should also encourage family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors to address the potential impact of disclosure on the immediate safety of those to whom the information relates, and for that purpose:

(a) refer those at risk to appropriate support services; and

(b) develop a safety plan, where appropriate, in conjunction with them.

Threats to a child’s welfare

22.33 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions considered whether ss 10D and 10H should be amended to permit release of FDR and family counselling information to prevent or lessen a serious threat to a child’s welfare. The Commissions noted that the Community and Disability Services Ministers’ Advisory Council submitted to the ALRC Inquiry into secrecy laws that, in the context of child protection, the threshold for release of information on public interest grounds should be whether the release is ‘necessary to prevent or lessen a threat to health, safety or welfare of a person’. The

---

37 Consultation Paper, Question 10–14.
1029

Confidentiality and Admissibility

Council emphasised that the inclusion of ‘welfare’ was particularly relevant in child protection. The ALRC noted that the desirability and operation of these types of exceptions ‘depend on the context in which they operate’ and that there ‘may be circumstances in which it is appropriate for exceptions of this kind to cover a person’s welfare, as well as life, health or safety’.

22.34 In addition to ss 10D and 10 H, there are other provisions in the Family Law Act that allow disclosure of information relating to harm or potential harm to children. Section 67ZA(2) of the Family Law Act requires FDR practitioners and family counsellors to report child abuse—or the risk of child abuse—as defined by the Family Law Act. While mandatory reporting obligations under state and territory child protection legislation are broader in scope, their application differs across jurisdictions. There are differences between jurisdictions with respect to who is obliged to report, the type and extent of the harm which gives rise to the reporting obligation, and whether the obligation applies to future risk as well as past or present instances of harm.

Section 67ZA(3) of the Family Law Act, which permits—but does not require—disclosure of information on the grounds of reasonable suspicion of past or future risk of ill-treatment of a child and past or future risk of exposure to or subjection of a child to psychologically harmful behaviour, applies consistently to FDR practitioners and family counsellors throughout Australia.

22.35 Section 67ZA(3) does, however, limit to whom information may be directly disclosed. Unlike ss 10D and 10H, s 67ZA(3) allows for disclosure to a ‘prescribed child welfare authority’ only. Section 67ZA(3) does not provide a direct route for passing information from an FDR practitioner or family counsellor to police or to the courts.

Submissions and consultations

22.36 A number of stakeholders expressed support for an additional ground for disclosure relating to threats to a child’s welfare. Other stakeholders, however, raised

39 Ibid, [10.107].
40 Section 67ZA(2) of the Family Law Act requires disclosure of reasonable suspicion of child abuse or the risk of child abuse to a ‘prescribed welfare authority’. The definition of ‘child abuse’ in s 4(1) refers to assault, including sexual assault, and involving a child in sexual activity.
41 See Ch 20.
42 Section 4(1) of the Family Law Act defines ‘prescribed child welfare authority specifically’ in relation to ‘abuse of a child’, but not in relation to ill-treatment or psychological harm. The Family Law Regulations 1984 (Cth) provide no further definition of ‘prescribed child welfare authority’.
43 Information is not admissible as evidence simply because it may be disclosed to a court in accordance with ss 10D and 10H. On this point see ss 10D(6) and 10H(7).
some concerns and queried the need for an additional ground.\textsuperscript{45} Stakeholders argued that ss 10D and 10H, and particularly ss 10D(4)(a) and 10H(4)(a) (which allow for disclosure with respect to risk of physical or psychological harm to a child), adequately provide for disclosure with respect to child welfare concerns.\textsuperscript{46} The OPC noted the difficulty of defining ‘welfare’ and queried what additional information would be disclosed under such an exception that could not be disclosed under the current framework for disclosure and the amended life, health and safety exception proposed by the Commissions.\textsuperscript{47}

22.37 National Legal Aid expressed its reservations by referring to general concerns about extending disclosure grounds, including the complexity of issues associated with disclosure of information from family counselling and FDR, the possibility that greater disclosure would bring a wide range of risks both to the confidentiality of the FDR process and more specifically to victims of violence, and that it would not remove the need for ongoing screening. In addition, National Legal Aid generally noted the need for joint consultations with relevant stakeholders to ensure existing provisions for disclosure are understood and appropriate solutions are identified to ensure that the court can make appropriate decisions at an early stage.\textsuperscript{48} The Dispute Resolution Committee of the Law Society of New South Wales commented that the legislation would not require amendment if family counsellors and FDR practitioners were properly trained to ensure that they ‘competently recognise’ when they should report disclosures of risk, especially in relation to children, and that they act on such disclosures.

\textit{Commissions’ views}

22.38 The Commissions have considered the relevance of ‘welfare’ with respect to child protection and note the existing legislative grounds for disclosure in relation to child protection concerns. In addition to ss 10D(4)(a) and 10H(4)(a), which allow for disclosure to protect a child from risk of physical or psychological harm, other provisions in the \textit{Family Law Act} and in state and territory child protection legislation require or permit certain professionals to report concerns about harm or risk of harm to children to the relevant state and territory authorities.

\textsuperscript{46} Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010, referring to the views of the Dispute Resolution Committee; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010. Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria also indicated it is reluctant to support enhanced disclosure because it has concerns about the standards of FDR with respect to family violence.

\textsuperscript{47} Office of the Privacy Commissioner, Submission FV 147, 24 June 2010. See Rec 22–1.

\textsuperscript{48} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. The Dispute Resolution Committee of the Law Society of New South Wales also noted the need for training of family counsellors and FDR practitioners to ensure they recognise when they should disclose information relating to risks to children: Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{49} Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
22.39 The Commissions have considered whether the scope for disclosure provided by the combination of relevant legislative provisions obviates the need for a specific additional ground for disclosure relating to child welfare concerns. The range covered by the relevant provisions under the Family Law Act includes: information relating to risk of physical harm; past or future risk of psychological harm; past or future risk of ill-treatment; child abuse or risk of child abuse; offences or potential offences involving violence; and serious and imminent threats to life or health. State and territory child protection legislation provisions relating to reporting of harm and risk of harm add to this range of provisions for disclosure.

22.40 In particular, the Commissions note that the reference in s 67ZA(3) of the Family Law Act to past or future risk of psychological harm or ill-treatment seems to allow for relatively broad grounds for disclosure of FDR and family counselling communications in appropriate circumstances. Further, while s 67ZA(3) does not provide a direct route for passing information from an FDR practitioner or family counsellor to police or to the courts, disclosure by an FDR practitioner or family counsellor to a child welfare authority may result in that agency referring the matter to police for investigation or bringing the matter before a court.

22.41 In the Commissions’ view, the range of information covered by the combination of relevant legislative provisions referred to above would, to a very significant degree, encompass information relating to serious threats to a child’s welfare. The arguments in favour of extending the circumstances in which FDR practitioners and family counsellors disclose information relating to a child’s welfare do not, on balance, outweigh the public interest in protecting the integrity and efficacy of FDR and family counselling, which are important in securing children’s welfare.

22.42 The Commissions acknowledge that the multiplicity of provisions relevant to disclosure of information about actual or potential abuse, harm or ill-treatment of children spread across the Family Law Act and state and territory legislation may cause some confusion amongst FDR practitioners and family counsellors. The Commissions consider, therefore, that there may be value in education and training for FDR practitioners and family counsellors to ensure that these provisions are understood and appropriately acted upon.

Recommendation 22–3

Bodies responsible for the education and training of family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors should develop programs to ensure that provisions in the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and in state and territory child protection legislation regulating disclosure of information relating to actual or potential abuse, harm or ill-treatment of children are understood and appropriately acted on.

---

50 Psychological harm and ill-treatment are not defined in the Family Law Act.
Conduct which may constitute grounds for a protection order

22.43 Another exception to the confidentiality obligations of FDR practitioners and family counsellors, provided in ss 10D(4)(c) and 10H(4)(c) of the Family Law Act, allows disclosure of FDR and family counselling communications to prevent the likely commission of an offence involving violence or a threat of violence to a person. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed amending ss 10D(4)(c) and 10H(4)(c) to allow family counsellors and FDR practitioners to disclose communications where they reasonably believe that disclosure is necessary to report conduct that they reasonably believe constitutes grounds for a protection order under state and territory family violence legislation.51

22.44 The clearest application of such a reform would be where police officers apply directly for, or—in those jurisdictions where they are empowered to do so—issue, protection orders. A family counsellor or FDR practitioner would have the option of reporting this information to the police. Police could then determine whether to apply for or—where empowered—issue, a protection order.52

Submissions and consultations

22.45 Many stakeholders expressed support for this proposal.53 The Family Issues Committee of the Law Society of New South Wales referred to its general comments about the effect of the Family Law Act’s family counselling and FDR confidentiality and admissibility provisions in shielding family violence. In the Committee’s view, court orders would be less responsive to family violence if courts did not have access to information about family violence.54 Others argued that this should be a mandatory, rather than permissible, ground for disclosure.55 National Legal Aid was of the view 52 The role of police in applying for or issuing protection orders is considered in Ch 9.

54 Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
that, in relation to FDR, this proposal should only apply where the conduct arises during the FDR, and not to communications about past conduct.

22.46 The OPC indicated support for this proposal, but noted that where conduct may constitute grounds for a protection order, it was likely that it would fall within the proposed exception to confidentiality for threats to life, health or safety.

The Queensland Law Society questioned the necessity for the proposed amendments and expressed the view that the existing exception for disclosure to report or prevent the commission of offences involving violence or threats of violence was adequate.

22.47 Other submissions argued that such an exception to confidentiality allowed too much discretion; that it could undermine the purpose of FDR and the impartial, facilitative role of the FDR practitioner; that parties might become reluctant to come forward with all relevant information in FDR; and may cease to attend FDR or family counselling.

22.48 The FRSA was of the view that this proposal was at odds with the FDR practitioner’s and family counsellor’s role of working with the family and building trust with parents and children at risk. The FRSA noted that FDR practitioners and family counsellors will:

inform parties at risk what action can be taken and offer to provide support but may also respect the right of the victim or potential victim to determine when and how to take protective action, rather than impose a course of action—if only to keep the victim engaged in support and working through the many emotions they may be experiencing.

Commissions’ views

22.49 The existing provisions in the Family Law Act and in state and territory child protection legislation, discussed above, provide a number of grounds for disclosure by FDR practitioners and family counsellors of information relating to those at risk. The Commissions’ recommended amendments to ss 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b)—to add serious threats to safety, and remove the requirement for threats to be imminent—will add to these grounds.

The Commissions are of the view that, to a significant degree at

56 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
57 The OPC was of the view that, where reasonable and practicable, family counsellors and FDR practitioners should seek consent before disclosing information under this proposed exception to confidentiality: Office of the Privacy Commissioner, Submission FV 147, 24 June 2010.
60 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010.
61 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010, referring to the views of the Dispute Resolution Committee.
62 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010. Another legal service provider indicated general reservations about any amendments ‘which compromise mediation processes as a safe and confidential space where everything can be frankly discussed and all relevant information put on the table without fear of repercussions’: Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.
64 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
65 Rec 22–1.
least, disclosures about conduct that may constitute grounds for a protection order are already authorised under these provisions.

22.50 The Commissions have considered whether there is a need to permit disclosures for the purpose of reporting conduct which may constitute grounds for a protection order, but which would not fall within the provisions discussed above. In this respect, the Commissions are mindful of the concerns raised about the potential for disclosures to increase, rather than decrease, risks. Where conduct might constitute grounds for a protection order, but would not fall within the provisions for disclosure discussed above, the Commissions are of the view that the risk of inflaming the situation and potentially placing victims of family violence in greater danger by disclosing communications about such conduct, is not warranted. In such cases, the arguments in favour of amending ss 10D(4)(c) and 10H(4)(c) in order to permit FDR practitioners and family counsellors to report conduct reasonably believed to constitute grounds for a protection order do not outweigh the importance of protecting the integrity and the efficacy of FDR and family counselling, which are also important in securing outcomes that protect family violence victims and those at risk of family violence.

22.51 The Commissions consider, therefore, that there is no need for amendments to ss 10D(4)(c) and 10H(4)(c) in order to permit FDR practitioners and family counsellors to disclose communications for the purpose of reporting conduct reasonably believed to constitute grounds for a protection order. The Commissions consider, however, that FDR practitioners and family counsellors have an important role to play in advising family violence victims and those at risk of family violence about appropriate support services. They should also develop a risk management strategy, to ensure safety in FDR and counselling processes. In this respect, the Commissions note the comment of the FRSA, that FDR practitioners and family counsellors do inform parties they consider to be ‘at risk’ of options available to them, and offer to provide support.

Admissibility of FDR and family counselling communications

22.52 Even where a family counsellor or FDR practitioner is permitted to disclose a communication, it may not be admissible as evidence in court proceedings. Pursuant to ss 10E and 10J of the Family Law Act, evidence of anything said, or any admission made, by or in the company of a family counsellor or FDR practitioner is inadmissible ‘in any court (whether or not exercising federal jurisdiction)’ or ‘in any proceedings before a person authorised to hear evidence (whether the person is authorised by a law of the Commonwealth, a state or a territory, or by the consent of the parties)’. There are exceptions where:

- an admission by an adult indicates that a child under 18 has been abused or is at risk of abuse; or
- a disclosure by a child under 18 that indicates that the child has been abused or is at risk of abuse.

---

66 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 10E(2), 10J(2). In addition, s 10J(3) provides that the limited information provided on s 60I certificates is admissible.
Disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence

22.53 Disclosures made to FDR practitioners and to family counsellors about a child’s exposure to family violence are, in accordance with ss 10E and 10J, inadmissible. In its 2009 report, the Family Law Council briefly considered the prohibition on the admissibility of such communications in the general context of disclosure of family violence in family law proceedings. The Council noted that it is ’possible that a party to proceedings involving a child does not disclose that he or she and/or the subject children are being, or have been exposed to serious family violence’, 67 and recommended an amendment to s 10E of the Act to allow disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence to be admitted into evidence. 68 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that ss 10E and 10J be amended to enable such disclosures made to family counsellors and FDR practitioners to be admitted into evidence. 69

Submissions and consultations

22.54 A number of submissions expressed support for the Commissions’ proposal to make disclosures regarding children’s exposure to family violence admissible. 70 The Queensland Law Society and Dr Olivia Rundle were of the view that the amendment should be made subject to the current restriction on admissibility in ss10E and 10J—that is, admissions or disclosures of children’s exposure to family violence should be admissible, unless, in the opinion of the court, there is sufficient evidence of the admission or disclosure available to the court from other sources. 71 The National Peak

---

68 Family Law Council, Improving Responses to Family Violence in the Family Law System: An Advice on the Intersection of Family Violence and Family Law Issues (2009), Rec 9, [8.2.1]. In discussion on this point the Family Law Council referred to disclosures that had been made to FDR practitioners, however the Council’s recommendation was for amendment to s 10E, which relates to communications to family counsellors. Admissibility of communications to FDR practitioners is dealt with in s 10J. The Council’s reasoning, however, appears capable of applying to both ss 10E and 10J.

70 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010, referring to the views of the Family Issues Committee; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010 (this stakeholder was of the view that the proposed amendment should be extended to all victims, not just children); Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Hunter Women’s Centre, Submission FV 79, 1 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.

Body for Safety and Protection of Parents and Children supported admissibility of such disclosures ‘with discretion’, and noted the danger of false allegations.\(^{72}\)

22.55 Submissions noted that exposure to family violence is detrimental to children, in the same way as direct experience of family violence or child abuse.\(^{73}\) The Family Issues Committee of the Law Society of New South Wales also argued that if the relevant evidence is not available, a court’s ability to put in place appropriate parenting arrangements will be constrained; the limitations on admissibility in ss 10E and 10J will, in some cases, shield family violence, and so may contribute to exposing children to risk.\(^{74}\)

22.56 Stakeholders also commented on the effect of requiring disclosures related to family violence to be repeated in subsequent litigation.\(^{75}\) The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria stated that it is not appropriate to duplicate the taking of evidence about family violence and to require multiple disclosures before action is taken.\(^{76}\) In their submission to this Inquiry, the Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrate referred to the Family Court’s Child Responsive Program (CRP),\(^{77}\) which they described as a non-privileged court-based FDR model, and commented that, in the Family Court’s experience, participants in the CRP had not been reluctant to raise issues or make disclosures because these could be communicated to a judicial officer. They stated that the Family Court’s family consultants had advised that parties appreciate the opportunity to ‘tell their story’ in the knowledge that the process won’t have to be repeated should their dispute proceed to trial.\(^{78}\)

22.57 Other stakeholders suggested that the proposal should be more limited. The FRSA was of the view that the proposal should be limited ‘to avoid rendering inadmissibility ineffective in the context of a very broad definition of family violence’. It was noted that while it is not uncommon for children to witness conflict between separating parents, there can be considerable variation in the context, severity and

\(^{73}\) Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010, referring to the views of the Family Issues Committee; O Rundle, Submission FV 50, 27 May 2010.

\(^{74}\) Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010, referring to the views of the Family Issues Committee.

\(^{75}\) Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; D Bryant, Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and J Pascoe, Chief Federal Magistrate of the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Submission FV 168, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.

\(^{76}\) Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

\(^{77}\) Under the CRP, cases involving children’s matters are allocated family consultants, who meet the parents (or carers) and children. Family consultants help parents focus on the children’s needs, and assist the Court and parents to achieve the best outcomes for children. As part of the CRP, family consultants undertake a comprehensive screening process: each party is asked specific questions about family violence, including questions about the frequency, pattern and type of violence and about children’s exposure to violence. Any communications and any admissions made at CRP meetings are admissible in any court proceedings under the Family Law Act: Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Towards a National Blueprint for the Family Law System (2009).

22. Confidentiality and Admissibility potential impact of such conflict. Family Relationship Services Australia (FRSA) considered that one-off occurrences, such as verbal abuse, related to separation conflict between two otherwise non-violent parents, would not warrant an extension of admissibility.79

22.58 Professor Julie Stubbs commented that if this proposal is adopted, it should be limited to matters in which family violence is having, or is likely to have, a detrimental effect on a child. Professor Stubbs noted that child protection authorities sometimes use exposure to family violence in ways that may undermine parents who are, themselves, the victims of family violence. In such cases, victims of family violence may be held responsible for being unable to protect their children from their partner’s violence.80

22.59 National Legal Aid expressed reservations about the proposed amendments to make disclosures of children’s exposure to family violence admissible, and suggested further consultations with relevant stakeholders on this issue. In addition, National Legal Aid suggested that, given the increasing number of organisations running child-inclusive mediations, consideration should be given to whether disclosures made by children should be treated differently from disclosures made by adults.81

22.60 Women’s Legal Services NSW acknowledged that women have difficulties bringing evidence of family violence to court and that lack of available evidence is one of the biggest hurdles in family law proceedings. However, while Women’s Legal Services NSW noted its support for efforts to improve the system’s responsiveness to disclosures of family violence, it also emphasised that:

> there are real concerns about a range of issues that arise in moving towards a system where there is more disclosure and sharing of information. These include potential risk of harm to the person disclosing violence; the integrity of counselling relationships and family dispute resolution processes; and the possibility that failure to indicate family violence could inappropriately lead to an assumption that there is no family violence. These and other concerns must be fully considered.82

22.61 The Dispute Resolution Committee of the Law Society of New South Wales expressed strong objections to the proposed amendments to ss 10E and 10J, arguing that if FDR practitioners were to commence giving evidence of disclosures made during FDR, parties will be guarded about what they say during FDR, and FDR

79 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010. See also, Ch 6, which considers the potential role of typologies of family violence in the law, including separation-instigated violence.
80 J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010. Another stakeholder suggested that admissibility of such disclosures should be limited to cases where adult victims of violence wished the evidence to be before the court and that adults should be able to state the effects on their children of exposure to violence, if recommended by a clinical psychologist: Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010.
81 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
82 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010. Women’s Legal Services NSW also commented that any increased disclosure and information sharing would require prior informed consent: ‘[t]he makers of disclosures must be fully informed of the consequences of disclosure and have control over how the information is used in family law proceedings.’
practitioners will avoid being required to give evidence and being subjected to cross-

22.62 In another submission objecting to the proposed amendments, Geoff Charlton, an FDR practitioner, expressed serious concerns about drawing FDR practitioners into adversarial litigation processes and using largely untested claims of violence made in FDR in subsequent litigation. Charlton noted that FDR is not concerned with evidentiary proof, and warned that superimposing the culture and requirements of litigation on FDR would reduce its effectiveness. In Charlton’s view, admissions of violence would not be made in FDR if they were to be subsequently used in court.84

22.63 As noted above, Domestic Violence Victoria and others, in a joint submission, expressed support for the Commissions’ proposal to make disclosures regarding children’s exposure to family violence admissible. The Commissions also note other comments made by these stakeholders with respect to improving evidence and information sharing generally. In their joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others expressed the view that a shared understanding of risk factors and a common approach to risk assessment would improve the availability and quality of evidence to support claims of family violence in applications for protection orders through state and territory courts and parenting orders through federal courts. These stakeholders noted that:

Shared frameworks for supporting a woman to tell her story, and clear practice directions about asking questions about violence can assist her to tell her story more clearly, regardless of where she first presents for support. The flow on is that greater clarity and more detail about the violence that is available to the court will usually lead to good evidence to support the allegations.85

Commissions’ views

22.64 Submissions highlighted the potentially significant implications of amending ss 10E and 10J to make disclosures of children’s exposure to family violence admissible, and reflect significant differences in views on this matter.

22.65 The Commissions understand that exposure to family violence can have direct negative and serious effects on children.86 The Commissions also accept that there can be considerable variation in the context and severity of the conflict between separating parents, and that this may affect the actual or likely detriment to children.

22.66 The Commissions note National Legal Aid’s comment with respect to whether disclosures made by children about their exposure to family violence should be treated differently from disclosures made by adults. Disclosures made by a child about exposure to family violence may be significant in indicating detriment, or risk of

83 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010, referring to the views of the Dispute Resolution Committee.
84 G Charlton, Submission FV 240, 9 August 2010.
86 See Ch 5 for a discussion of the effects of exposure of children to family violence.
22. Confidentiality and Admissibility

22.67 The Commissions have also considered the comments made by Chief Justice Bryant and Chief Federal Magistrate Pascoe with respect to the Family Court’s CRP, and the willingness of participants in the CRP to raise issues or make disclosures, even though these communications may be admissible. The Commissions note, however, that CRP meetings between parents or carers, children and family consultants are different from FDR. The CRP is designed to complement and assist court processes and judicial decision making, rather than as a stand-alone alternative dispute resolution process. As an adjunct to court proceedings, it is logical that communications and disclosures made within the CRP may be treated as evidence to assist in the determination of the dispute before the court. In the Commissions’ view, therefore, communications in the court-related environment of CRP meetings are not readily comparable with communications in the non-court environment of FDR.

22.68 The Commissions acknowledge the difficulties associated with gathering evidence of family violence. The Commissions have, therefore, given careful consideration to balancing the courts’ need for evidence of children’s exposure to family violence with the need to protect the integrity of FDR processes and family counselling relationships.

22.69 The Commissions note that the Family Court’s CRP involves a comprehensive family violence screening and risk assessment process, including specific questions about children’s exposure to family violence. As noted above, communications and disclosures made in CRP meetings are admissible in family law proceedings. In the Commissions’ view, this is a more appropriate mechanism than FDR or family counselling for gathering evidence about children’s exposure to family violence for the purposes of family law proceedings.

22.70 Below, the Commissions recommend that ss 10E and 10J be amended to clarify that they apply to state and territory courts when they are not exercising family law jurisdiction. The Commissions have considered the need for evidence of children’s exposure to family violence for the purposes of non-family law proceedings. In particular, the Commissions have considered whether the value of evidence from FDR or family counselling for gathering evidence about children’s exposure to family violence would outweigh the significant implications of making such evidence admissible.

22.71 Disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence, made in the context of a non-forensic FDR process or non-forensic family counselling, are not tested and reviewed with appropriate legal safeguards. In the Commissions’ view, such disclosures will, as a consequence, have limited evidentiary value. This limited value does not outweigh the significant implications of amending ss 10E and 10J to make such disclosures admissible.

22.72 The Commissions note stakeholder concerns about the implications of amending ss 10E and 10J, discussed above. In addition, the Commissions note that some of the concerns raised by stakeholders with respect to the Commissions’ proposal to include information about family violence on s 60I certificates, discussed below, may also be relevant in the context of admissibility of disclosures relating to family violence generally. In particular, the Commissions note the concern that if such disclosures can be used as evidence in legal proceedings, parties may be less open or may conceal information about family violence in FDR and family counselling. This would compromise the potential for safe arrangements and agreements to be made, and for appropriate outcomes to be secured through FDR and family counselling. As a consequence, victims of family violence could be exposed to greater risk.

22.73 As noted above, the Commissions acknowledge the difficulties associated with gathering evidence for family violence. The Commissions consider the difficulties of giving evidence of family violence to different courts in Chapter 18 of this Report. The Commissions note, in Chapter 18, that risk assessment is a key way in which courts can identify and respond to family violence. The Commissions further note that a common approach to risk assessment, across all jurisdictions, would mean that the needs of victims of family violence are consistently understood and addressed by all service providers, including courts and lawyers. In their comments about common risk assessment, referred to above, Domestic Violence Victoria and others expressed the view that a common approach to risk assessment would improve the evidence given to support claims of family violence before courts.

22.74 In this Report, the Commissions have made a number of recommendations in relation to definitions of family violence, additional education, training and specialisation of judicial and court officers and legal practitioners, and in relation to improving the quality of evidence supporting family violence allegations. The Commissions are of the view that the implementation of these recommendations, together with a common approach to risk assessment, will assist courts and legal practitioners in addressing family violence concerns in legal proceedings.

22.75 Having considered stakeholders’ comments and the issues discussed above, the Commissions conclude that the arguments in favour of making disclosures of children’s exposure to family violence admissible do not outweigh the public interest in protecting the integrity and ability of FDR and family counselling to secure safe outcomes for victims of family violence.

Other disclosures of family violence

22.76 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views as to whether ss 10E and 10J of the Family Law Act should be amended to enable the admission of communications made to family counsellors and FDR practitioners which disclose family violence, and if so, what limits should be placed on the admissibility of such evidence.87

---

87 Consultation Paper, Question 10–15.
Submissions and consultations

22.77 A number of stakeholders indicated support for amendments to make disclosures of family violence admissible. The Queensland Law Society and the Law Council of Australia were of the view that the amendment should be made subject to the current restriction on admissibility in ss 10E and 10J—that is, admissions or disclosures of children’s exposure to family violence should be admissible, unless, in the opinion of the court, there is sufficient evidence of the admission or disclosure available to the court from other sources. The Dispute Resolution Committee of the Law Society of New South Wales, however, expressed strong objections to admissibility of disclosures of family violence, and referred to the same arguments it made against admissibility of disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence. Professor Stubbs also noted the risk of deterring frank discussions with FDR practitioners and family counsellors, which could be counterproductive. National Legal Aid also indicated it had reservations and referred to its comments with respect to admissibility of disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence.

Commissions’ views

22.78 The Commissions consider that many of the concerns arising in the context of disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence, also arise in relation to making disclosures of family violence admissible. As with disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence, the potential implications of amending ss 10E and 10J to make disclosures relating to family violence admissible are significant. As well as concerns raised in the submissions discussed above, some of the concerns raised with respect to the Commissions’ proposal to include information about family violence on s 60I certificates may also be relevant in the context of admissibility of disclosures relating to family violence generally. The possibility that parties will be less open, or will conceal information about family violence in FDR and family counselling because

---

88 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, Submission FV 117, 15 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010. The Women’s Legal Service Queensland indicated that such amendments should ‘probably’ be made: Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010. One stakeholder was of the view that written communications and possibly case notes, taken by the counsellor at the time the admissions were made, should be admissible: Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010. Another stakeholder commented that family counsellors and FDR practitioners should be required to disclose such information: C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.

90 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010, referring to the views of the Dispute Resolution Committee.

92 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

93 Section 60I certificates are discussed further, below.
disclosures may be used as evidence, is of particular concern. This would compromise the potential for safe and appropriate outcomes to be secured through FDR and family counselling; consequently victims and potential victims of family violence may be exposed to greater risk.

22.79 As noted above, the Family Court’s CRP involves a comprehensive family violence screening and risk assessment process, including specific questions about the frequency, pattern and type of any violence. In the Commissions’ view, this is a more appropriate mechanism than FDR or family counselling for gathering evidence about family violence for the purposes of family law proceedings.

22.80 The Commissions have also considered the need for evidence of family violence for the purposes of non-family law proceedings. As with disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence, the Commissions are of the view that disclosures about family violence made in FDR or family counselling have limited evidentiary value. This limited value does not, in the Commissions’ view, outweigh the significant implications of amending ss 10E and 10J to make such disclosures admissible. The Commissions reiterate their comments above with respect to other measures for improving evidence of family violence in legal proceedings. As noted above, implementation of the Commissions’ recommendations in relation to: definitions of family violence; additional education, training and specialisation of judicial and court officers and legal practitioners; improving the quality of evidence supporting family violence allegations; and a common approach to risk assessment, will better assist courts and legal practitioners in addressing family violence concerns in legal proceedings.

22.81 As with disclosures about a child’s exposure to family violence, the Commissions conclude that the arguments in favour of making disclosures about family violence admissible do not outweigh the public interest in protecting the integrity and ability of FDR and family counselling to secure safe outcomes for family violence victims and those at risk of family violence.

Application of sections 10E and 10J to state and territory courts

22.82 Communications to family counsellors and FDR practitioners may be relevant to family violence and child protection matters before state and territory courts, as well as to matters before the family courts. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether ss 10E and 10J should be amended to apply expressly to state and territory courts when they are not exercising family law jurisdiction.94

22.83 Sections 10E(1) and 10J(1) provide that FDR and family counselling communications are not admissible:

- in any court (whether or not exercising federal jurisdiction); or

94 Consultation Paper, Question 10–16.
22. Confidentiality and Admissibility

• in any proceedings before a person authorised to hear evidence (whether authorised by a Commonwealth, state or territory law, or by consent of the parties).

22.84 In Anglicare (WA) v Department of Family and Children’s Services, the Supreme Court of Western Australia held that the prohibition on admissibility ‘in any court (whether or not exercising federal jurisdiction)’ set out in s 19N of the Family Law Act—the predecessor to the current s 10E—was limited by the definition of ‘court’ in s 4 of the Family Law Act to the court exercising jurisdiction in the Family Law Act proceedings. Accordingly, the inadmissibility provisions did not extend to proceedings in the Children’s Court of Western Australia.95

22.85 Similar reasoning was used by the majority of the Supreme Court of South Australia in R v Liddy (No 2) to permit the admission of Family Law Act counselling records in criminal proceedings. However, in a dissenting opinion, Wicks J expressed the view that ‘any court (whether exercising federal jurisdiction or not)’ should be interpreted more broadly:

Where non-federal jurisdiction, ie State jurisdiction, is concerned, the words (whether exercising federal jurisdiction or not) clearly make the expression ‘court’ applicable to courts generally, including this court, the Supreme Court of South Australia.

If the expression ‘court’ is used to have the widest possible meaning and is not limited merely to courts exercising federal jurisdiction relating to family law, the structure of sub-s (2) is logical. The sub-section begins by prohibiting courts of every complexion and whether exercising federal or State jurisdiction, from admitting into evidence anything said at a meeting or conference to which the sub-section applies. Par (b) then proceeds to deal with tribunals, mediations and arbitrations where the bodies concerned are authorised to hear evidence. In other words, sub-s (2) embraces the entire field in Australia of bodies authorised to hear evidence, be they courts or otherwise, from admitting into evidence anything said or any admission made at a meeting or conference referred to in the sub-section. …

It seems to me that it would be illogical to limit the operation of the section to a few courts which deal with family law and yet to express par (b) in the widest possible terms specifically including persons authorised by a law of the Commonwealth, or of a State or territory or even by the consent of the parties, to hear evidence.96

22.86 The Commissions note that the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department—in guidance material for FDR practitioners and family counsellors published on the Department’s website—has indicated that ss 10E and 10J extend to state and territory courts when they are not exercising family law jurisdiction. With respect to s 10E, the Attorney-General’s Department’s resource for FDR practitioners, Frequently Asked Questions: Family Dispute Resolution Practitioner Obligations, explains that ‘[c]ommunications made in family dispute resolution are not admissible

---

95 In this case, the communications to the family counsellor were inadmissible due to s 64(2) of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA): Anglicare (WA) v Department of Family and Children’s Services (2000) 26 Fam LR 218.

96 R v Liddy (No 2) (2001) 79 SASR 401, [24]–[26].
in any court or proceedings, in any jurisdiction'. 97 The Attorney-General’s Department’s resource for family counsellors, Family Counsellors in the Family Law System, also explains that ‘[s]ections 10E and 10J of the Family Law Act provide that a communication made in family counselling (and family dispute resolution) is not admissible in any court or proceedings, in any jurisdiction’.98

Submissions and consultations

22.87 There was some support in submissions for amendments to expressly apply ss 10E and 10J to state and territory courts when they are not exercising family law jurisdiction.99

22.88 The Family Issues Committee of the Law Society of New South Wales expressed strong opposition to such amendments because, in the Committee’s view, ss 10E and 10J operate inappropriately and potentially to the detriment of children.100 The Dispute Resolution Committee of the Law Society of New South Wales, on the other hand, expressed its strong support for amendments to expressly apply ss 10E and 10J to state and territory courts on the basis of the Committee’s view that the existing admissibility provisions in ss 10E and 10J operate appropriately and so should apply to state and territory courts.

Commissions’ views

22.89 The Commissions note that there is no clear policy rationale for making communications to family counsellors and FDR practitioners inadmissible in Family Law Act proceedings but admissible in protection order proceedings or child protection proceedings under state and territory family violence or child protection legislation.

22.90 Consistency in the application of admissibility rules for FDR and family counselling communications across jurisdictions is important for both fairness and certainty. The Commissions consider that ss 10E and 10J should be amended to make it clear that the application of these provisions extends to state and territory courts when they are not exercising family law jurisdiction.

---

Recommendation 22–4  Sections 10E and 10J of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), which regulate the admissibility of family dispute resolution and family counselling communications, should be amended to state expressly that the application of these provisions extends to state and territory courts not exercising family law jurisdiction.

Section 60I Certificates: information about family violence

22.91 As discussed in Chapter 21, s 60I of the Family Law Act requires that, before applying for an order under pt VII of the Act (child-related proceedings), a person must first make a genuine effort to resolve the dispute by FDR. Subject to certain exceptions—including where the court is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that there has been, or there is a risk of, family violence by one of the parties to the proceedings—a court must not hear an application for such an order unless the applicant has filed a certificate from an FDR practitioner (a s 60I certificate).

22.92 A s 60I certificate may be issued on a number of grounds, including on the basis of an assessment by an FDR practitioner that ‘it would not be appropriate’ to conduct or continue FDR.101 Such an assessment requires the FDR practitioner to consider whether the ability of a party to negotiate freely is affected by one or more of a number of factors, all of which are potentially relevant to violence.102 The required form for s 60I certificates, however, allows the FDR practitioner to do no more than nominate the ground upon which the certificate is issued.103 Where a s 60I certificate indicates that ‘it would not be appropriate’ to conduct or continue FDR, for example, it will not state why FDR was considered inappropriate.

22.93 In a submission to the 2009 Family Courts Violence Review undertaken by Professor Richard Chisholm (the Chisholm Review), Family Relationships Service Australia submitted that:

Currently Family Dispute Resolution practitioners have limited options for passing on information about risks identified to the Family Court where this would be appropriate. The Certificates prescribed in Section 60I of the Family Law Act allow for limited identification of reasons why Family Dispute Resolution is either inappropriate or unsuccessful.104

22.94 The Chisholm Review suggested that ‘it may prove useful’ to reconsider the drafting of s 60I of the Family Law Act.105

---

101  Sections 60I(8)(aa) and (d). The other grounds upon which certificates may be issued are: a party did not attend FDR due to the refusal or failure of the other party (or parties) to attend (s 60I(8)(a)); the parties attended FDR with the practitioner, and all parties made a genuine effort to resolve the issue or issues (s 60I(8)(b)); the party attended FDR with the practitioner, but that party, or another party did not make a genuine effort to resolve the issue or issues (s 60I(8)(c)).

102  See Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) reg 25(2).

103  See Ibid reg 27(1), sch 1, which includes the Certificate by Family Dispute Resolution Practitioner form.

105  Ibid.
22.95 The Family Law Council considered the issue in more detail its 2009 report. In its view, the function of the Certificate as simply the vehicle which authorises parties to move to litigation does not reflect the financial investment by Government in creating family relationship centres, or the skill of the family dispute resolution practitioner in working with the family to provide guidance to the Court as to the program or services best suited to the needs of the participants. In discussions with Family Relationship Centres, legal aid and others, the Council was not able to ascertain a consensus across all of the relevant agencies as to whether Family Relationship Centres could have some responsibility for communicating relevant information to the court without it compromising the inadmissibility of the intervention, or the anonymity of a violence allegation thereby placing a victim at risk.106

22.96 The Council noted that ‘many unintended consequences’ would flow from changing the role of the FDR practitioner in this way, including: the need for increased funding for the additional report writing skills and tasks required; the probability that FDR practitioners would have to testify about their methods and conclusions; and the disincentive for those committing violence to participate in, and for victims to disclose violence in, FDR processes.107 The Council’s recommendation was that an options paper be written, outlining the advantages and disadvantages of reforms in this area, for comment by stakeholders.108

22.97 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that s 60I certificates should include information about why FDR was inappropriate or unsuccessful—for example, because there has been, or would be a future risk of family violence by one of the parties to the proceedings.109

Submissions and consultations

22.98 Some of the submissions received by the Commissions indicated unequivocal support for the inclusion of additional information relating to family violence concerns in s 60I certificates.110 Chief Justice Bryant of the Family Court of Australia and Chief

---

107 Ibid.
110 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FY 220, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 183, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 171, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FY 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 162, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 160, 24 June 2010; UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FY 151, 24 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FY 149, 25 June 2010 (as long as the information is restricted to family violence, child abuse or personal safety risks); The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FY 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FY 148, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FY 146, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 139, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FY 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 82, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell,
Federal Magistrate Pascoe noted in their submission that there is merit in at least limited information being included in s 60I certificates to the effect that FDR was inappropriate or ineffective because of family violence. Legal Aid NSW argued that some indication of risk of harm should be included in s 60I certificates because at the early or interim stage of a matter, a s 60I certificate may be one of the only sources of independent information available to a judicial officer who, otherwise, has to rely on the untested evidence of parties and the quality of their representation. The Women’s Legal Service Queensland commented that, given that family violence is often very hard to prove, the inclusion of such additional information on s 60I certificates may provide some limited corroboration.

In contrast, the Law Council of Australia and the Peninsula Community Legal Centre, although supporting the inclusion of such additional information, commented that the information should only be used for screening and risk assessment purposes and not as evidence of a disputed allegation. A number of submissions opposing the proposed inclusion of additional information relating to family violence raised significant objections. These objections are discussed below.

Undermining the nature of FDR

Submissions opposing the proposed inclusion of additional information pointed to the benefits of FDR in encouraging and allowing parties to raise matters on a confidential basis and to discuss options for settlement without prejudice and outside court processes. It was argued that the culture of alternative dispute resolution is open and co-operative, not adversarial. There was concern that publication of the factors that made FDR inappropriate would undermine the fundamental nature and benefits of a private, confidential out-of-court dispute resolution process. It was argued that undermining the confidentiality of the FDR process makes FDR less effective and less attractive, and that lack of confidentiality may discourage disclosure and honesty in communications. Concern was also expressed about the undermining of FDR practitioner neutrality and impartiality.
Section 60I certificates as signals of family violence concerns

22.101 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions noted that federal magistrates have pointed to the benefit of s 60I certificates signalling that a proceeding under pt VII of the Family Law Act involves family violence concerns. However, as acknowledged by the FRSA, and noted by Chief Justice Bryant and Chief Federal Magistrate Pascoe, the limited amount of information currently included in s 60I certificates constrains their potential for passing on information about family violence concerns.

22.102 On this point, it was argued that a s 60I certificate indicating simply that a matter was not appropriate for FDR should be sufficient to trigger an investigation by the court, and that in such cases parties should be referred to the court’s family consultants for a report. Submissions also indicated that the provision of more detailed information on s 60I certificates based on FDR practitioners’ assessments would not remove the need for such further screening and assessment.

22.103 In its submission, the Australian Institute of Family Studies (AIFS) cautioned against expansion of the role of s 60I certificates to include more specific information about allegations and admissions. In the view of AIFS the existing option for indicating on s 60I certificates that a matter is inappropriate for FDR does provide a mechanism to send a clear signal to a court (or to an advocate) that there are indications that something is ‘seriously wrong’. AIFS also commented, however, that while such a signal would be expected to trigger a response from lawyers or courts, the data from AIFS’ evaluation of the 2006 family law reforms suggest that this rarely happens. This observation was supported in the submission by the FRSA.

---

120 Federal Magistrates Court, Consultation, Sydney, 3 February 2010.
122 Dispute Resolution Committee, Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
123 Family consultants are psychologists and/or social workers who specialise in child and family issues after separation and divorce: Family Court of Australia and Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Fact Sheet—Family Consultants. They are employed by the family law courts to assist and advise parties and courts in family law proceedings. Amongst other things, they may provide reports to the court and give evidence on matters relevant to the care, welfare and development of children. Communications with a family consultant are not confidential and are admissible as evidence. A court must consider seeking the advice of a family consultant before exercising certain powers, including the power to order that a person attend FDR: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 11A, 11B, 11C, 11E, 55A, 62.
124 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
126 The FRSA makes the observation that ‘the Family Courts rarely rely on the type of Certificate issued for any purpose and the Certificate goes on file but rarely comes before the judicial officer’: Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
The role of FDR practitioners is not forensic

22.104 Submissions expressed concern about the possibility that information about family violence on s 60I certificates would be regarded as evidence.127

22.105 The FRSA commented that it is not the role of the FDR practitioner to form a judgment about allegations of violence that have been contested or denied and expressed concern about the potential for the s 60I certificate to become part of the dispute and another point of contest.128 Dr Rundle noted the negative implications of FDR practitioners being subjected to cross-examination about their methods and conclusions.129

22.106 AIFS commented that treating information about family violence on s 60I certificates as evidence would be 'problematic'. FDR practitioners do not perform a forensic function and must accept communications from the parties at face value.130 National Legal Aid commented that untested screening and risk assessments by FDR practitioners and counsellors cannot replace screening and assessment in the court context where evidence can be tested and reviewed.131

Other unintended consequences of including additional information about family violence on s 60I certificates

22.107 Submissions also pointed to the possibility that publication of allegations of violence on s 60I certificates, which are provided to both parties, may place victims— and FDR practitioners—at risk of retaliation by alleged perpetrators,132 particularly where a victim has raised concerns with an FDR practitioner without the knowledge of the perpetrator.133 While the National Council of Single Mothers agreed that s 60I certificates could include additional information about family violence, this stakeholder commented that a more effective method should be developed for passing on 127 As noted above, some support for the inclusion of such information on s 60I certificates was given on the basis that the information only be used for screening and risk assessment purposes and not as evidence of a disputed allegation.

---

128 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
129 Rundle referred to the financial burden on service providers, FDR practitioners being taken away from direct service activity and the possible financial cost for self-employed FDR practitioners: O Rundle, Submission FV 50 27 May 2010.
130 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010. AIFS commented that while acceptance of these communications will affect how or whether FDR continues, it is not the FDR practitioner’s role to make judgments about substantive issues. Geoff Charlton, an FDR practitioner, also commented that FDR is not an investigatory process and is not concerned with evidentiary proof: G Charlton, Submission FV 240, 9 August 2010.
131 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. The One in Three Campaign also expressed concern about untested allegations being placed before the court: One in Three Campaign, Submission FV 35, 12 May 2010.
132 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010; O Rundle, Submission FV 50 27 May 2010. National Legal Aid was also concerned that the provision of more detailed information on s 60I certificates may place victims of family violence at risk: National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
133 National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010. In general comments relating to the Consultation Paper’s Proposals 10–7 to 10–15 and Questions 10–12 to 10–20, the Women’s Legal Services NSW also expressed concern about the potential risk of harm to the person disclosing violence: Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
information to avoid putting victims who raise family violence concerns at risk.\textsuperscript{134} Another stakeholder, a legal service provider, indicated general reservations about any amendments ‘which compromise mediation processes as a safe and confidential space where everything can be frankly discussed and all relevant information put on the table without fear of repercussions’.\textsuperscript{135}

22.108 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (AFVPLS Victoria) commented that, for various reasons, including reluctance of Indigenous women to disclose, there are problems with Family Relationship Centres identifying family violence experienced by Indigenous people. AFVPLS Victoria noted that if a certificate fails to mention family violence, it may become problematic for the victim to raise family violence in later proceedings.\textsuperscript{136} Women’s Legal Services NSW also expressed concern that failure to indicate family violence could lead to an incorrect assumption that there is no family violence.\textsuperscript{137}

\textbf{Alternatives to including additional information on s 60I certificates}

22.109 The FRSA supported greater information sharing by FDR practitioners with the courts about risks identified during the provision of family and relationship services. The FRSA noted, however, that s 60I certificates ‘are not the best or only mechanism for achieving this’. Rather than making the s 60I certificate an information sharing mechanism, the FRSA favoured retaining the current purpose of s 60I certificates—that is, as verification that a party has fulfilled the obligation to attempt FDR before going to court.

22.110 As an alternative, the FRSA supported the recommendation of the Chisholm Review for the development of a mechanism to improve information sharing as part of a broader approach to risk assessment. In particular, the FRSA indicated support for common risk assessment to incorporate mechanisms that would allow FDR practitioners and family counsellors to make case management recommendations to the court for management of the early stages of the case. In the FRSA’s view, this could obviate the need for s 60I certificates to contain additional information.\textsuperscript{138}

\begin{footnotes}
\footnotetext[134]{National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[135]{Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[136]{Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[137]{Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010. Alexandra Harland also queried what inference would be drawn if a party alleged violence in court proceedings, but the FDR practitioner had decided not to refer to violence on the s 60I certificate: A Harland, Submission FV 80, 2 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[138]{Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010. The FRSA indicated that case management recommendations could operate similarly to a referral from a General Practitioner to a specialist or a diagnostic service, including suggestions on how the case might be managed and what further assessment might be warranted. As an example, The FRSA have suggested that an FDR practitioner could alert the Family Court Registrar to a concern about a parent’s behaviour, and recommend that the case be ‘fast tracked’ or make suggestions such as the use of a children’s contact or family violence program. The FRSA have suggested that case management advice might include the practitioner’s assessment of urgency, safety concerns (in very general terms, for example recommending the appointment of an independent children’s lawyer, and giving a rating from a scale to indicate the existence of any safety issues and whether these are significant), and procedural fairness issues (case management recommendations to the Court that an interpreter, advocate or liaison worker be involved to assist the process).}
\end{footnotes}
22. Confidentiality and Admissibility

22.111 The National Council of Single Mothers and their Children suggested that screening and assessment through an integrated response framework, with information sharing across services and a standardised risk assessment and risk management framework, might be one way of dealing with concerns about the safety of women who raise concerns about violence during the mediation process.139

22.112 According to AIFS it could be argued that, for the sake of any children involved, all cases deemed inappropriate for FDR deserve a rapid and informed response if parties subsequently pursue legal avenues to resolve their dispute. As noted above, AIFS has suggested that the s 60I certificate signal, which is currently rarely acted upon, could be amplified if the s 60I certificate categories were simplified from the existing five to three categories, one of which could indicate that the matter was not suitable for FDR. This suggestion involves removing the s 60I certificate categories relating to whether or not the parties have made a ‘genuine effort’ to resolve their dispute through FDR. AIFS notes that interviews with dispute resolution practitioners undertaken for the AIFS evaluation indicated that most FDR practitioners regard the ‘genuine effort’ categories as problematic—‘mainly because they introduce a level of judgment about client motivation that is seen as largely incompatible with the role of an FDR [practitioner].’141

22.113 In its submission, National Legal Aid argued that, rather than diluting the current confidentiality of the FDR process, adequate resources need to be provided to the family law courts for screening and assessment and for timely and appropriate determination of these matters. National Legal Aid has also suggested appropriate education for registry staff, family consultants, and judicial officers on the need for screening and risk assessment where a certificate that a matter was inappropriate for FDR is issued. A further suggestion is that an amendment to the s 60I certificate could be made to include an optional alternative clause in the certificate allowing the FDR practitioner to recommend that the court conduct screening and risk assessment in the matter. This would draw the court’s attention to the existence of issues such as family violence as a factor for consideration in their case management process.142

Commissions’ views

22.114 The Commissions accept that requiring FDR practitioners to perform a forensic role for the purpose of including additional information, as proposed, will change the role of FDR practitioners, and that this is undesirable.

---

140 For a description of the existing five categories, see above.
141 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010. On this point, Dr Rundle similarly argued that the requirement to make judgments about ‘genuine effort’ undermines the perception of practitioner impartiality: O Rundle, Submission FV 59 27 May 2010. In its submission, AIFS also discussed the possibility of passing information from the family relationship sector to the court through a validated screening and assessment self-reporting tool; the self-reported information generated would belong to the client, who could decide later to tender it as evidence in court.
142 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. National Legal Aid also suggested that such education may be appropriate where a s 60I certificate indicating that one of the parties failed or refused to attend FDR is issued. National Legal Aid argued that in some cases a party may not attend FDR because of a history of family violence, and may or may not have disclosed this to the FDR organisation.
22.115 The Commissions note concerns about reluctance of some Indigenous women to disclose family violence. Considerations relating to factors inhibiting disclosure are also relevant in relation to CALD women. The various factors which affect the identification of family violence experienced by Indigenous and CALD women, including reluctance to disclose, may be better addressed through culturally sensitive screening and risk assessment at appropriate times through the course of proceedings. The Commissions do not consider that an option to provide more detailed information on s 60I certificates will adequately address these concerns or remove the need for ongoing screening through subsequent legal proceedings.

22.116 The Commissions accept that the recording of information about family violence on a s 60I certificate may be an incentive for perpetrators to conceal family violence in FDR; it may also discourage victims from disclosing violence. The Commissions are concerned, therefore, that compromising confidentiality of FDR communications by allowing additional information about family violence to be included on s 60I certificates, as proposed, may result in unsafe arrangements and agreements being made, and so place victims and potential victims of family violence at risk.

22.117 The Commissions accept that while the information currently included on s 60I certificates limit their potential for passing on information about family violence risks to family courts, the existing option to nominate that FDR is inappropriate does allow a s 60I certificate to function as a signal that family violence may be an issue. The Commissions agree that concerns about the failure of family courts and advocates to respond appropriately to s 60I certificates as a signal could be addressed by ensuring appropriate education of advocates, registry staff, family consultants, and judicial officers about the need for screening and risk assessment where such certificates have been issued.

22.118 Accordingly, the Commissions are of the view that s 60I certificates should not include information about why FDR was inappropriate or unsuccessful—for example, because there has been or is a future risk of family violence by one of the parties.

22.119 The Commissions note advice from the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department that the Department is developing a common risk assessment framework to support screening and risk assessment across the family law system. While the Commissions understand that this is a framework rather than a tool, the Commissions believe this will create an opportunity for considering alternative mechanisms for identifying family violence as a concern.

144 Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010.
Recommendation 22–5 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should coordinate the collaborative development of education and training—including cross-disciplinary training—for family courts’ registry staff, family consultants, judicial officers and lawyers who practise family law, about the need for screening and risk assessment where a certificate has been issued under s 60I of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) indicating a matter is inappropriate for family dispute resolution.
23. Intersections and Inconsistencies

Contents

Introduction 1055
ADR in family violence legislation 1056
Interaction between FDR and protection orders 1063
   Inconsistencies between protection orders and participation in FDR 1063
   The role of family violence protection orders in FDR processes 1069
Dispute resolution in child protection—law and practice 1073
Family law, child protection and family violence intersections in ADR 1085
Restorative justice 1092

Introduction

23.1 This chapter examines the use of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) processes in family violence, family law and child protection matters, and the potential for inconsistencies in practices and outcomes as well as the potential for seamless and effective resolution of issues that intersect across jurisdictions.

23.2 In Chapter 21, the Commissions consider potential benefits and concerns relating to the use of (family dispute resolution) FDR\(^1\) in cases involving family violence. One of the difficulties associated with the use of FDR in this context is that of ensuring that victims are not attempting or participating in FDR inappropriately. In this chapter, the Commissions consider the role of family violence protection orders in assisting FDR practitioners to identify family violence, and to manage family violence risks appropriately and effectively as they undertake FDR processes. The Commissions also consider possible inconsistencies between family violence protection order conditions and the arrangements made for, or the requirements under, the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) to attend, FDR.

23.3 The use of ADR in relation to protection order applications generally raises concerns about the exposure of victims to danger, and the potential for unfair or unsafe agreements to be made. The dynamics that typically characterise family violence raise particular concerns about the safety of victims participating in ADR processes with those who have committed family violence, and the appropriateness and efficacy of ADR processes in this context. In Chapter 21, the Commissions discuss the legislative and policy framework regulating the use of FDR in cases involving family violence. In this chapter, the Commissions consider the need for consistency between approaches to the use of ADR in matters arising under family violence legislation and to the use of FDR in family law matters involving family violence.

---

\(^1\) The term ADR is used at different points in this chapter to include FDR.

23.4 The use of ADR in child protection matters involving family violence also raises a number of concerns similar to those relating to the use of FDR in family law cases involving family violence. The risk of compromising the safety of children, as well as parents who are victims of family violence where risks of family violence are unidentified, inadequately assessed or inappropriately managed, are significant concerns. Nevertheless, the potential benefits of using ADR in child protection matters involving family violence are also significant. For example, ADR processes may be faster and more cost-effective than court processes. In addition, the potential of ADR to offer more flexible and culturally responsive procedures means that outcomes may be more effective and sustainable.

23.5 In this chapter, the Commissions consider whether there is a need for legislative or other reforms to ensure that ADR mechanisms in child protection matters address family violence appropriately. The Commissions also consider the disconnection between the family law and the child protection systems and the need for consistency in practices and outcomes across jurisdictions to ensure the protection of women and children. The potential for collaboration between professionals across socio-legal service systems and for resolution of complex and intersecting family law and child protection issues within the same, integrated, ADR process is significant, and may lead to important benefits for children and their families in cases involving family violence. The Commissions consider that there would be value in exploring ADR models that can overcome jurisdictional divides to offer seamless and effective responses to family violence.

23.6 Finally, this chapter briefly considers the application of restorative justice practices in the context of family violence and in relation to sexual assault offences.

ADR in family violence legislation

23.7 In most Australian jurisdictions, there is no specific provision in family violence legislation empowering courts to refer parties to mediation, although there may be power to refer matters to mediation under other legislation.²

23.8 In the ACT, the Magistrates Court does have express power under the Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) to recommend that the respondent or an aggrieved person take part in (amongst other things) mediation.³ The Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act also specifically mandates referral of matters to mediation in protection order proceedings involving family violence in certain circumstances.⁴ Section 25 of the Act provides that if, during a preliminary conference for an application for a protection order,⁵ the registrar is satisfied that the application is

---

² For example, see Alternative Dispute Resolution Act 2001 (Tas) s 5(1).
³ Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 89.
⁴ The term ‘protection order’ is generally used throughout this Report to refer to a family violence protection order. See Ch 1 for discussion on definitions and terminology.
⁵ This provision does not apply to emergency protection orders.
likely to be more effectively resolved by mediation than by a hearing, the registrar must:

- recommend mediation to the parties;
- give the parties information about mediation; and
- adjourn the preliminary conference to enable mediation.

23.9 The Act was amended to include this requirement in 2005. The Explanatory Statement for the relevant bill explains that the obligation ‘highlights the importance of alternative dispute mechanisms in preventing further violence by facilitating discussions between the parties to an order’.6

23.10 In NSW, there is legislative power to refer matters to mediation in relation to Apprehended Personal Violence Orders (APVOs),7 but not in relation to Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders (ADVOs), which apply to domestic relationships, broadly defined.8 This reflects the recommendations of the New South Wales Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC) in its 2003 report, Apprehended Violence Orders.9 In that report, while the NSWLRC recommended an express legislative basis for referral to mediation in the context of APVOs,10 it expressed the following view:

It should be emphasised that this section deals exclusively with mediation of APVO disputes. The Commission is of the view that mediation should not be encouraged in relation to ADVOs. The Commission concurs with the arguments put in submissions that the fear and imbalance of power typically characterising domestic violence makes mediation in ADVO matters unsuitable, unproductive and unsafe.11

23.11 Consistently with this view, the NSWLRC also considered that there should not be a power of referral in the case of APVOs where there was a history, or allegations, of personal violence, or conduct amounting to serious harassment.12 This view is reflected in the legislation.13

6 Explanatory Statement, Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Amendment Bill 2005 (ACT). The present clause is the same as s 18A of the Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2001 (ACT), which was inserted by s 11 of the Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Amendment Act 2005 (ACT). This clause was not discussed in the Legislative Assembly of the ACT during the passage of the latter Act.
7 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 21.
8 Ibid s 15.
9 New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Apprehended Violence Orders, Report 103 (2003), Ch 5.
10 Ibid, Rec 17.
11 Ibid, [5.50].
12 Ibid, [5.51].
13 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 21(2) provides that a matter is not to be referred to mediation if the court is of the opinion that there has been a history of physical violence to the protected person by the defendant; the protected person has been subjected to conduct by the defendant amounting to a personal violence offence or stalking or intimidation under s 13 of that Act; the defendant has engaged in conduct amounting to harassment relating to the protected person’s race, religion, homosexuality, transgender status, HIV/AIDS infection or disability; or there has been a previous attempt at mediation in relation to the same matter and the attempt was not successful. Further, the Community Justice Centres Act 1983 (NSW) provides the Director with a discretion to decline any dispute: ss 20(3), 22, 24.
23.12 The NSWLRC considered the issue again in its 2005 review of Community Justice Centres, which provide mediation services in NSW.\(^{14}\) It noted that negotiations concerning a return to a violent relationship or the level, frequency and the intensity of violence ‘will always be inappropriate’, a view which was reflected in the policy of the Community Justice Centres.\(^{13}\)

23.13 Similarly to the NSW legislation, the Intervention Order (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) distinguishes between protection orders in relation to family violence and other cases. Section 21(4) of that Act provides that a court must consider, in determining whether to dismiss an application, ‘whether it might be appropriate and practicable for the parties to attempt to resolve the matter through mediation or by some other means’. However, this only applies where the application alleges ‘non-domestic abuse’.\(^{16}\)

23.14 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether, in practice, ADR mechanisms are used in relation to protection order proceedings under family violence legislation and, if so, whether reforms are necessary to ensure these mechanisms are used only in appropriate circumstances.\(^{17}\)

Submissions and consultations

23.15 A number of stakeholders reported that ADR is either not used, or is used in very limited cases in some jurisdictions. In NSW, ADR is not used in family violence protection order proceedings because, as observed by Women’s Legal Services NSW, the prevailing view of the government, courts and legal aid is that mediation in these matters is inappropriate.\(^{18}\) Similarly, the North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency advised that mediation never takes place for family violence matters in the Northern Territory,\(^{19}\) and Family Relationship Services Australia commented that FDR services do not report receiving referrals from local courts for ADR in protection order proceedings.\(^{20}\)

23.16 According to the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria and the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (AFVPLS Victoria), ADR is used extremely rarely, if ever, in cases involving intimate partner relationships in Victoria.\(^{21}\) However, ADR may be used for disputes involving other 15 Ibid, [4.31]–[4.34]. The NSWLRC recommended that a list of factors indicating when mediation might be inappropriate be included in the Community Justice Centres Act 1983 (NSW). This recommendation was not implemented in the subsequent Community Justice Centres Amendment Act 2007 (NSW).

---

16 This provision is not discussed in the Second Reading Speech or canvassed in M Pyke, South Australian Domestic Violence Laws: Discussion and Options for Reform (2007).
family members, such as disputes involving low level violence between a parent and child or between siblings. The AFVPLS Victoria also noted that exceptions to conditions in protection orders are usually put in place to allow potential family law FDR to proceed.

23.17 In other jurisdictions, stakeholders reported that ADR processes are used in protection order proceedings. The Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) reported that a conferencing process—although not called ADR—is used for protection order applications in ACT courts. This process is conducted by a Registrar in a shuttle model, often with unrepresented parties. National Legal Aid advised that Tasmanian courts hearing protection order proceedings may, and do, refer matters to mediation with the court’s dispute resolution service. However, National Legal Aid remarked that the level of expertise among court-provided mediators varies significantly as does judicial officers’ recognition of issues relating to power imbalances and their sensitivity to the appropriateness or otherwise of mediation.

23.18 The Queensland Government reported that Queensland courts may refer parties to ADR when making a domestic violence protection order, or parties may make their own application for ADR. Under s 25(2) of the Domestic and Family Violence Prevention Act 1989 (Qld), a court may also require a respondent to attend ADR as a condition of a family violence protection order. The Queensland Government advised that the use of mediation processes in situations involving family violence is subject to guidelines and practices to ensure the safety of the parties and the appropriateness of ADR. The guidelines provide, for example, that before approving a mediation process, the mediator must take into account any existing domestic violence protection order, whether any such order prohibits contact between the parties, and if there are any exceptions to contact for the purposes of mediation. The mediator must also consider whether the allegations of domestic violence are so serious as to put a party at risk of danger or power imbalance in the mediation. The Queensland Government stated that participation in ADR is voluntary, safeguards are put in place to address safety concerns and parties are free to end the mediation at any point.

23.19 A number of stakeholders expressed support for the use of ADR in protection order proceedings. The Family Reform Association NSW advocated for ADR to be used as the preferred option for resolving protection order applications prior to hearing. The Commissioner for Children (Tas) also supported the use of ADR to... resolve protection order applications. The Commissioner considered that ‘an agreement crafted by the parties themselves is far more likely to be sustained than one imposed on them unwillingly by a disinterested Court’. The Commissioner was also of the view that final protection orders should not be made until the parties had attended accredited mediation, the Family Relationship Centre or an accredited FDR Practitioner.29

23.20 Other stakeholders, however, raised concerns about the use of ADR mechanisms in relation to protection order proceedings. Women’s Legal Services NSW, for example, commented that living free from violence is an absolute right and should not be subject to mediation. Women’s Legal Services NSW also commented that ADR processes should never be used with respect to a protection order itself, however mediation about other issues where there is violence or a protection order in place may be appropriate, depending on the circumstances, risk assessment and a safety plan.30 Other stakeholders expressed the view that ADR is not appropriate to resolve protection order applications.31

23.21 National Legal Aid recommended that caution be exercised in the use of ADR in protection order proceedings. In its view, it was essential that appropriate screening and assessment processes be established to determine the appropriateness of matters for ADR, and that training be provided to mediators on the nature and dynamics of family violence and on methods to manage mediation in the context of family violence.32 The Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region)—commenting with respect to ACT conferencing processes where parties are often unrepresented—referred to the importance of the parties being well-informed about the process, and having the opportunity to seek legal advice about their situation.33

23.22 In its submission, the Queensland Government commented that, due to safety concerns for the victim, ADR is not appropriate where there are pending criminal proceedings in relation to domestic violence. The Queensland Government also commented that, while it is generally accepted that ADR is not appropriate for the majority of cases involving domestic and family violence, consultations for the Queensland Government’s review of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act have indicated support for making ADR processes available for Indigenous communities34 and young people.35

29 Commissioner for Children (Tas), Submission FV 62, 1 June 2010.
33 Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
34 The Queensland Government referred to the Community Justice Group Program, which aims to reduce Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples’ contact with the court system. Community justice groups decide, on the basis of local and familial knowledge, whether the use of an ADR or restorative justice process is appropriate in a particular situation: Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
35 Ibid.
23.23 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) indicated that reforms are necessary to ensure ADR mechanisms are used only in appropriate circumstances because ‘at the moment there does not seem to be consistency in the application of this or an in depth knowledge of family violence dynamics’.36

Commissions’ views

23.24 The Commissions note inconsistencies across Australia in the approach taken to the use of ADR in protection order proceedings. In NSW and South Australia, for example, legislative provisions allow referral of protection order proceedings to ADR, but specifically exclude protection order proceedings that involve family violence. Elsewhere in Australia, legislative provisions and policy guidelines allow for referral of protection order applications involving family violence to ADR in some circumstances, either on a party’s application, or with the parties’ consent.37 Family violence legislation in some jurisdictions allows courts to order matters to ADR, and to require parties to attend or participate in ADR. Submissions to this Inquiry also reported that in some protection order matters relating to family violence, courts are ordering mediation.

23.25 The Commissions reiterate the NSWLRC’s view that negotiations concerning a return to a violent relationship, or negotiations concerning the level, frequency and intensity of violence are inappropriate, and that violence should never be mediated. The Commissions consider, therefore, that state and territory legislation and policies for ADR in family violence protection order proceedings should provide that violence cannot be negotiated or mediated within alternative dispute resolution processes.

23.26 The Commissions are mindful, however, of the distinction between the mediation of violence and the mediation of other issues where there is violence in the relationship between the parties.

23.27 As discussed in Chapter 21, FDR may take place in parenting disputes where family violence is a factor. However, while family violence may arise as an issue in FDR, the subject of the dispute resolution in FDR is the parenting dispute, not the family violence. FDR—which seeks to resolve a parenting dispute—is, therefore, to be distinguished from ADR that attempts to mediate or negotiate violence itself. As indicated above, in the Commissions’ view, protection from violence should never be mediated or negotiated in ADR. The Commissions agree with Women’s Legal Services NSW that where there is violence (or a protection order is in place), ADR for issues other than violence may be appropriate, depending on the circumstances. There may be some matters other than violence that are ancillary to a protection order application and that may be resolved through ADR—for example, arrangements for the respondent’s return to the family home to collect belongings, or for telephone contact with the parties’ children.

36 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
37 In Western Australia, the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) makes no provision for mediation.
23.28 In the Commissions’ view, where protection order proceedings are to be referred to ADR for resolution of issues other than violence, screening and risk assessment will be necessary to determine the appropriateness of ADR in the particular circumstances, and to ensure the safety of the parties. The Commissions note, however, that submissions have raised concerns about courts’ understanding of family violence and their assessment of the suitability of matters for ADR. Stakeholders have observed that the expertise of court-provided mediators varies; that judicial officers’ understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence varies, as does their sensitivity to the appropriateness of mediation; and that court assessment of the suitability of cases involving family violence for ADR is inconsistent.

23.29 The use of FDR in family law disputes is subject to a comprehensive legislative and policy framework for screening and risk assessment. The Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) prescribe assessment of the suitability of matters for FDR in accordance with a minimum list of considerations relating to family violence, safety of the parties, equality of bargaining power, risk of child abuse, and the emotional, psychological and physical health of the parties, as well as any other matter deemed relevant by the FDR practitioner. Considerable work has been done in the family law jurisdiction to develop screening and assessment tools for use in risk assessment and determining suitability of matters for FDR.³⁸ The Commissions are concerned that in jurisdictions where protection order proceedings may be referred to ADR, without such screening and risk assessment of matters relating to safety, parties may be referred to ADR by judicial or court officers in inappropriate circumstances and victims, or potential victims of violence, may be placed at risk.

23.30 In the Commissions’ view, the family law FDR framework and state and territory ADR frameworks should operate consistently to protect victims and potential victims from family violence. In jurisdictions where protection order proceedings may be referred to ADR, legislation and policies for ADR in protection order proceedings should provide for comprehensive screening and risk assessment mechanisms to ensure that resolution of issues other than violence may be attempted safely. Further, state and territory governments, courts and ADR service providers should ensure that education and training is provided to judicial and court officers and ADR practitioners on the nature and dynamics of family violence, and the conduct of ADR processes in the context of family violence. The Commissions also agree with the Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) about the need, where parties are unrepresented, for parties to be well-informed about the ADR process, and to have the opportunity to seek legal advice.

---

³⁸ As noted above, this includes the development of the Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line by the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department and the Australian Catholic University, and the publication by the Victorian Government of a comprehensive screening and risk assessment framework. A national common risk assessment framework to support screening and assessment for family violence across the federal family law system is also currently being developed by the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department.
Recommendation 23–1 Where state and territory family violence legislation permits the use of alternative dispute resolution in family violence protection order proceedings, such legislation should provide that violence cannot be negotiated or mediated.

Recommendation 23–2 State and territory legislation and policies for alternative dispute resolution in family violence protection order proceedings should provide for comprehensive screening and risk assessment mechanisms.

Recommendation 23–3 State and territory governments, courts, and alternative dispute resolution service providers should ensure that, where alternative dispute resolution is permitted in relation to family violence protection order proceedings, education and training is provided to judicial and court officers and alternative dispute resolution practitioners on:

(a) the nature and dynamics of family violence; and

(b) the conduct of alternative dispute resolution processes in the context of family violence.

Interaction between FDR and protection orders

23.31 As discussed in Chapters 21 and 22, s 60I of the Family Law Act requires that, before applying for a parenting order under pt VII of the Act, a person must first make a genuine effort to resolve the dispute by FDR. In some cases, however, separating families who have experienced family violence will already have made contact with the legal system through protection order proceedings under state and territory family violence legislation. Where parties have obtained a protection order under a state or territory law and then seek to resolve their parenting disputes through FDR, the existence of, and conditions contained in, the protection order will be relevant to an FDR practitioner’s assessment of whether and how FDR should be conducted.

23.32 This section discusses two issues arising out of interactions between FDR for family law matters and protection orders made under family violence legislation: the potential for FDR processes to be in conflict with protection orders, and the role of protection orders in FDR processes. The Commissions consider options to minimise inconsistency between protection orders and the requirement to attend FDR, and the use of protection orders in FDR processes to identify family violence and manage the risks associated with it.

Inconsistencies between protection orders and participation in FDR

23.33 As discussed in Chapter 21 of this Report, s 60I of the Family Law Act requires that, before applying for a parenting order, a person must first make a genuine effort to resolve the dispute by FDR. Subject to certain exceptions—including where the court is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that there has been, or there is a risk of, family violence by one of the parties to the proceedings—a court must not hear an application for such an order unless the applicant has filed a certificate from an FDR practitioner. A s 60I certificate may be issued on a number of grounds, including on the basis of an assessment by an FDR practitioner that ‘it would not be appropriate’ to conduct or continue FDR. Such an assessment requires the FDR practitioner to consider whether the ability of a party to negotiate freely is affected by one or more of a number of factors which are potentially relevant to violence.

23.34 The determination by an FDR practitioner that a matter is unsuitable for FDR and the consequent issuing of a s 60I certificate to that effect, relieves the parties of the obligation to attempt to resolve their dispute in FDR prior to initiating family law proceedings. The court, however, retains the power under s 13C of the Family Law Act to order the parties to attend FDR at any point in the proceedings—even where a s 60(I) certificate has been issued.

23.35 In some cases, conditions of protection orders made under family violence legislation may be inconsistent with an order or a requirement, under the Family Law Act, obliging the parties to attend FDR. This may give rise to an issue of inconsistency of laws as envisaged by s 109 of the Australian Constitution. Section 109 operates so that where an order made under state legislation is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth law will prevail and the order will be invalid, to the extent that the order is inconsistent with the Commonwealth law. On this point, the High Court has held that, pursuant to s 109, a state or territory law will be inoperative to the extent that it would alter, impair or detract from the Commonwealth law’s conferral of jurisdiction [on a federal court] by directly or indirectly precluding, overriding or rendering ineffective an actual exercise of that jurisdiction. The practical effect of that pro tanto invalidity of the state or territory law is that orders made in the exercise of the Commonwealth jurisdiction will prevail over the provisions of the state or territory law or orders made or acts done in the exercise of power or authority which the state or territory law purportedly confers.

23.36 In the context of a protection order relating to parties who become involved in a family law parenting dispute, inconsistency may arise, for example, in circumstances where the protection order imposes an absolute prohibition on contact of any kind, including indirect contact. In such circumstances, s 109 of the Constitution will render inoperative the protection order conditions, to the extent that they are inconsistent with requirements, or orders made, under the Family Law Act with respect to FDR. In

39 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60I(9).
40 Ibid ss 60I(8)(aa) and (d). The other grounds upon which certificates may be issued are: a party did not attend FDR due to the refusal or failure of the other party (or parties) to attend: s 60I(8)(a); the parties attended FDR with the practitioner, and all parties made a genuine effort to resolve the issue or issues: s 60I(8)(b); the party attended FDR with the practitioner, but that party, or another party did not make a genuine effort to resolve the issue or issues: s 60I(8)(c).
41 Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) Reg 25(2).
43 While s 109 refers expressly to inconsistency between state and federal laws, it has operated—in effect—in cases of inconsistency between the provisions of orders made in the exercise of legislative powers. For example, the High Court has applied the section to inconsistencies between an order of the Family Court and the provisions of state legislation: Ibid, 601–603. In this case, the relevant ‘law’ for the purposes of practice, where inconsistencies arise, an FDR practitioner will generally refer parties to a magistrates court to obtain a variation of the order. This has the undesirable effect of repeated contact with the justice system and increased costs for parties.

23.37 In addition to possible inconsistency of laws, as discussed above, practical problems may be caused by protection order conditions that conflict with the arrangements made for FDR. For example, a protection order will often prohibit a person from contacting or approaching another person. FDR processes requiring the presence of both parties could, therefore, be in conflict with a protection order.

23.38 Most commonly, this issue is dealt with expressly in the application forms for protection orders, which allow for an exception to prohibitions on contacting the protected person for certain purposes, including in relation to FDR processes. There is such an exception in the application forms of Victoria, Tasmania, the Northern Territory and the ACT. The form for South Australia also allows for a standard exception for counselling (but not mediation) if it is directed by the Family Court, and for any orders made by the Family Court. The application form in NSW refers to an exception for counselling, mediation and conciliation. There is no standard exception referred to in the forms for Queensland or Western Australia.

23.39 Typically, the standard condition prohibiting contact automatically includes an exception allowing contact for the purposes of FDR process. The ACT form, however, enables the applicant to nominate which exceptions to the prohibition on contact should apply, including at counselling or mediation.

23.40 A different approach is taken in Western Australia. The Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) provides that it is a defence to a breach of a protection order if the person was using FDR as defined by the Family Law Act or using conciliation, mediation or

---

44 Conditions of protection orders are discussed in Chapter 11.
47 New South Wales, Application—Apprehended Domestic Violence Order. The condition states that the defendant must not ‘approach or contact the protected person(s) by any means whatsoever, except through the defendant’s legal representative or as agreed in writing or as permitted by an order or directions under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), for the purpose of counselling, conciliation, or mediation’.
49 Magistrates Court of Western Australia, Violence Restraining Order Application <www.magistratescourt.wa.gov.au/content/restraining.aspx> at 16 August 2010. The application form for Western Australia does not allow applicants to indicate which conditions they would like imposed upon the respondent. The Commissions recommend that application forms for protection orders should be amended to allow applicants to do so: Rec 11–6.
another form of consensual dispute resolution provided by a legal practitioner.\textsuperscript{50} This is the only such provision in family violence legislation.

23.41 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the view that it is preferable to minimise the potential for conflict between protection orders and Family Law Act provisions relating to FDR through an exception to a condition of a protection order, rather than provide (as is done in Western Australia) in legislation that attendance at mediation is a defence to a breach of a protection order. The Commissions proposed that state and territory courts should ensure that application forms for protection orders include an exception allowing contact for the purposes of FDR processes (an FDR exception clause).\textsuperscript{51} The Commissions indicated that this exception should apply to participation in FDR processes as ordered or directed by a family court, or provided under the Family Law Act.

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

23.42 A number of stakeholders indicated their support for an FDR exception clause to be included in application forms for protection orders.\textsuperscript{52} A small number of these submissions expressly stated their support for an optional rather than automatic FDR exception.\textsuperscript{53} It was noted that the automatic addition of an exception clause would not be safe or appropriate in some situations.\textsuperscript{54} It was also suggested that the court making the protection order should assess whether FDR is appropriate before including such an exception clause.\textsuperscript{55} Where a court making an interim or final protection order has considered the appropriateness of parties attending FDR, and determined not to insert an exception clause in the protection order, National Legal Aid submitted that the court

\textsuperscript{50} Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 62(1)(a),(b).
\textsuperscript{51} Consultation Paper, Proposal 11–4.
\textsuperscript{52} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; O Rundle, Submission FV 50, 27 May 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010. The Queensland Law Society supported the exception but commented that this is a matter within the responsibility of state and territory governments rather than the courts: Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010. One stakeholder agreed subject to the use, where FDR is to be employed in a parenting dispute, of screening and risk assessment frameworks and tools by legally trained assessors who consider more than the terms and conditions of a protection order when determining whether FDR should proceed: Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010. Women’s Legal Service Queensland agreed but suggested careful consideration of the wording of the exception clause: Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.Women’s Legal Services NSW also made suggestions with respect to the wording of FDR exception clauses, discussed below: Women’s Legal Services Queensland, Submission FV 182, 26 June 2010. One stakeholder disagreed with the proposal: Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{54} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010. Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010 also indicated assessment should be undertaken to ensure safety and appropriateness of FDR.
should clearly indicate on the order that it has considered the nature of the dispute and has made an order excluding FDR.\textsuperscript{56}

23.43 A Victorian stakeholder, arguing that an FDR exception should only be inserted at the discretion of the protection order applicant, noted that the standard entry of FDR exceptions in protection orders confuses women who think they are obliged to undertake mediation and therefore agree to contact.\textsuperscript{57} National Legal Aid supported the protection order applicant being given the option to elect to have an exception clause for FDR, but was of the view that even if the applicant chose such an exception clause, the court should still consider the appropriateness of FDR.

23.44 Concern was expressed about the potential for an FDR exception clause to undermine the use of screening and risk assessment tools because it might be seen, or relied upon, as an endorsement of the use of FDR in family violence cases.\textsuperscript{58} Another stakeholder was concerned that an FDR exception clause appeared to be inconsistent with a protection order prohibiting contact and with s 60I(9) of the 	extit{Family Law Act}, which exempts parties from the s 60I requirement (to attempt to resolve a parenting dispute by FDR) in cases of actual or potential family violence.\textsuperscript{59}

23.45 Some stakeholders also commented about the wording of the FDR exception clause. Women’s Legal Service Queensland suggested that, rather than ‘allow contact for the purposes of FDR’, the exception should state ‘FDR is allowed to be conducted between the parties’.\textsuperscript{60} This would avoid the respondent harassing the applicant on the pretext of making contact for the purposes of setting up the FDR. Domestic Violence Victoria and others, in a joint submission, commented that the exception clause should specify the type of contact and its limitations\textsuperscript{61} to avoid the contact arrangement being used for further abuse.\textsuperscript{62} Women’s Legal Services NSW submitted that the exception clause should clearly refer to FDR processes as ordered or directed by the Family Court, or provided under the 	extit{Family Law Act}.\textsuperscript{63}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

23.46 As noted above, the 	extit{Family Law Act} provides for exemption from the requirements for FDR on the basis of, amongst other things, family violence. In many cases, FDR processes are likely to be inappropriate if a family violence protection order has been made. As discussed in Chapter 21, however, there may be cases where FDR is appropriate—despite the existence of a protection order.

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{56} National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV 232}, 15 July 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{57} Berry Street Inc, \textit{Submission FV 163}, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{58} J Stubbs, \textit{Submission FV 186}, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, \textit{Submission FV 149}, 25 June 2010. The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation referred to an example of this happening despite an alleged history of extreme family violence.
\item \textsuperscript{59} Confidential, \textit{Submission FV 171}, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{60} Women’s Legal Service Queensland, \textit{Submission FV 185}, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{61} For example, phone contact only, contact through FDR practitioner.
\item \textsuperscript{63} Women’s Legal Services NSW, \textit{Submission FV 182}, 25 June 2010.
\end{itemize}
23.47 A family violence protection order prohibiting contact between parties to a family law dispute need not necessarily conflict with the use of FDR. Strategies such as shuttle mediation may be employed, for example, to enable compliance with a family violence protection order prohibiting direct contact. In the Commissions’ view, qualified and experienced FDR practitioners, considering the matter at the time that the family law dispute arises—employing appropriate screening and risk assessment tools and taking into account the conditions of a family violence protection order, amongst other things—are well placed to consider the arrangements that may be made for appropriate and safe contact between the parties through FDR processes.

23.48 The Commissions note that the suitability or otherwise of a matter for FDR is an issue to be determined by an FDR practitioner in accordance with the Family Law Act and the Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008, and the family courts in accordance with the Family Law Act. These matters are properly determined, at the relevant time, by the family courts, and by FDR practitioners, in accordance with family law legislation, rather than family violence courts exercising jurisdiction under state or territory family violence legislation.

23.49 In addition, conditions of protection orders that are inconsistent with an order or a requirement, under the Family Law Act, will be rendered inoperative. The approach taken in most jurisdictions, of allowing an exception to prohibition on contact for the purposes of FDR, as part of a standard order, minimises the potential for inconsistency between protection orders and legislative requirements and arrangements for participating in FDR.

23.50 The Commissions appreciate the concern expressed by the Women’s Legal Service, Queensland that allowing contact for the purposes of FDR may provide a means by which the respondent to a protection order is able to harass the protection order applicant. FDR may be conducted without direct contact to minimise the potential for such harassment—for example, by using shuttle mediation, as noted above. To further minimise the potential for harassment, the Commissions are of the view that, rather than stating that contact is permitted for the purposes of FDR, the terms of a protection order should indicate that participation in FDR is not precluded by the protection order. Arrangements can then be made for FDR without direct contact between the parties.

23.51 The Commissions note that informal attempts to mediate by family or community members may not include appropriate safeguards for addressing family violence, and may leave victims vulnerable to pressures to mediate. The Commissions are of the view, therefore, that family violence protection orders should expressly refer to participation in FDR processes as ordered or directed by a family court, or provided under the Family Law Act.

64 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60I(8)(aa), 60I(8)(d); Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) reg 25(2).
Recommendation 23–4  State and territory courts should ensure that the terms of a family violence protection order indicate that participation in family dispute resolution, as ordered or directed by a family court, or provided under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), is not precluded by a family violence protection order.

Recommendation 23–5  State and territory courts should ensure that parties to family violence protection order proceedings are informed that, if involved in proceedings or family dispute resolution under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth):

(a) they may be exempt from requirements to participate in family dispute resolution under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth);

(b) they should inform a family dispute resolution practitioner about any family violence protection orders or proceedings; and

(c) they should inform family courts about any family violence protection orders or proceedings, where family court proceedings are initiated.

The role of family violence protection orders in FDR processes

23.52 The next issue for consideration is the use of family violence protection orders in FDR processes. An evaluation of FDR practices in the legal aid sector noted that FDR practitioners across all jurisdictions commented that failures to ask about and obtain copies of protection orders could ‘derail the conferencing process’.66

23.53 Some, but not all, examples of screening tools in the Framework for Screening and Risk Assessment published by the Australian Government for use in the family law sector include questions about the existence of protection orders.67 An example of a question about seeking revocation of protection orders is also included.68 The Victorian Government’s comprehensive family violence screening and risk assessment refers to

---

66 KPMG, Family Dispute Resolution Services in Legal Aid Commissions: Evaluation Report (2008), prepared for the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, 32. In an older survey conducted in 1996, the agencies surveyed all reported asking about protection orders and indicated that a current order would increase their caution about proceeding, although they would not definitely exclude mediation merely because of the order: Keys Young, Research/Evaluation of Family Mediation Practice and the Issue of Violence: Final Report (1996), prepared for the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, 38.

67 See Australian Catholic University and Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line (2008). For examples where protection orders are not asked about, see Attachment A, 79; Attachment F; Attachment G, 109–110. For examples where protection orders are asked about, see Attachment A, 87; Attachment D; Attachment G, 110–111.

68 Ibid, Attachment G, 111.
the existence of protection orders, and includes questions about breaches of protection orders as relevant to assessment of family violence risks.

23.54 The existence of a protection order is significant for screening and risk assessment because it indicates that there are likely to be issues of safety involved that need to be addressed. The conditions of a protection order may also provide useful information about the nature of the risks involved. Further, it may be necessary to obtain a copy of a protection order so that FDR practitioners can take protection order conditions into account when making arrangements for FDR.

23.55 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether, in practice, protection orders are identified and used in risk assessment and management in FDR processes and whether any reforms are necessary to improve these processes.

Submissions and consultations

23.56 A number of submissions on this point indicated that protection orders are being used appropriately in FDR processes to identify and manage the risks associated with family violence. National Legal Aid responded that legal aid commission FDR conferencing programs identify existing protection orders through intake and screening processes, and take them into account when assessing suitability of matters for mediation, and in the management of mediation and resulting agreements.

23.57 Family Relationship Services Australia commented that well-developed tools for intake and ongoing risk assessment are used to ensure that Family Relationship Services ask both parties questions about violence and abuse, and about the existence of family violence protection orders and any previous Family Court orders. These issues are followed up throughout the FDR process. Family Relationship Services rely on clients to answer the questions honestly and to provide copies of any current orders.

23.58 Other stakeholders expressed some concerns about the use of protection orders in FDR processes to identify family violence and manage the associated risks. One stakeholder from a community service and advocacy organisation observed that there is inconsistency in the practice of mediation services; some services are very aware of family violence issues, while others are focused on parent agreement outcomes. This stakeholder referred to ‘poor practice’, including some mediators suggesting to women that they ‘bury’ a protection order so mediation can continue. The Law Society of NSW also believed that the use of protection orders in FDR processes to identify family violence was inconsistent, but noted that this should be addressed by ongoing education of the police, solicitors, the judiciary and the community rather than by legislative reform.74

70 Consultation Paper, Question 11–3.

23.59 Another stakeholder (a legal service provider) referred to the risk of exception clauses in protection orders—that permit contact for FDR purposes—being inappropriately relied on to assess a matter as suitable for FDR.75 This stakeholder noted the need to apply screening and risk assessment frameworks and tools to ensure that legally trained assessors consider more than the terms and conditions of a protection order when assessing suitability of a matter for FDR. The Women’s Legal Service Queensland commented that issues of domestic violence are routinely mediated and that systemic rather than piecemeal reform was needed.76 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) indicated that protection orders are not identified and used in risk assessment and management in FDR processes; the Department referred to ‘issues and barriers to disclosure and family violence going undetected’ and commented that the sector’s ‘over confidence’ in its management of family violence is ‘problematic’. The Department also referred to an absence of long term research evidence indicating the efficacy of FDR in family violence cases.77

23.60 Women’s Legal Services Australia commented that, where there is a protection order, FDR services are more likely to ‘grant an exemption’ from FDR.78 Women’s Legal Services Australia noted, however, that concerns remain where the family violence victim has been unable to obtain a protection order, or proceedings are in progress, and that greater clarity is required about whether the exemptions from FDR will apply in such cases.79

23.61 Domestic Violence Victoria and others, in a joint submission, stated that any screening or risk assessment tool should ask about past or current protection orders, and about the circumstances that led to the application for the order.80

Commissions’ views

23.62 While a number of stakeholders indicated that protection orders are being used appropriately in FDR processes to identify and manage family violence risks, it is concerning that there were some indications that this not always the case. Protection

---

74  Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
75  This stakeholder referred to an instance where this had happened despite an alleged history of extreme family violence: The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010.
76  Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children was also of the view that protection orders were not being used appropriately and that reform is needed: Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010.
77  Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
78  As discussed in Chapters 21, 22, and above, an FDR practitioner may determine that a matter is not appropriate for FDR because of family violence concerns: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 60I(8)(aa) and (d); Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) reg 25(2).
79  Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
orders may provide valuable information about the concerns that need to be addressed for FDR to take place safely. The Commissions agree with Domestic Violence Victoria and other stakeholders that screening and risk assessment tools should ask about past or current protection orders, and the circumstances that led to the application for the orders.

23.63 The Commissions also note the concerns of Women’s Legal Services Australia about situations where the family violence victim has been unable to obtain a protection order or where an application for a protection order has not yet been determined. The Commissions are of the view that, where an application for a protection order is yet to be determined, the circumstances that led to the making of the application for a protection order may be relevant for the purposes of screening and risk assessment. In cases where an order was not made, the circumstances that led to the making of the application may nonetheless be relevant–particularly in cases where an application was withdrawn by the victim.

23.64 The Commissions note that existing family violence screening and risk assessment frameworks published by the Australian Government for use in the family law system, and the Victorian Government’s comprehensive family violence screening and risk assessment framework, include identification of existing and past protection orders and breaches of such protection orders as relevant to assessment of family violence risks. In the Commissions’ view, it would be helpful if family violence screening and risk assessment frameworks, intended for use in FDR processes, included questions about past and current applications for protection orders, as well as about past and current protection orders and any breaches of such orders. As noted elsewhere in this chapter, the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department is currently developing a national framework to support screening and assessment for family violence across the federal family law system. In the Commissions’ view it would be helpful if this framework addressed the need to ask parties about past and current applications for family violence protection orders, as well as about past and current protection orders and any breaches of such orders.

23.65 The Commissions are also of the view that FDR service providers should ensure that tools used for family violence screening and risk assessment include questions about past and current applications for family violence protection orders, as well as questions about past and current family violence protection orders, and any breaches of such orders. Copies of family violence protection orders should also be requested from the parties.

Recommendation 23–6
The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department and state and territory governments should ensure that family violence screening and risk assessment frameworks indicate the importance of including questions in screening and risk assessment tools about:

(a) past or current applications for protection orders;

(b) past or current protection orders; and
23. Intersections and Inconsistencies

(c) any breaches of protection orders.

Recommendation 23–7 Family dispute resolution service providers should ensure that:

(a) tools used for family violence screening and risk assessment include questions about past and current protection orders and applications, and any breaches of protection orders; and

(b) parties are asked for copies of protection orders.

Dispute resolution in child protection—law and practice

23.66 In most Australian states and territories, child protection legislation includes provisions designed to facilitate negotiated solutions. In addition, some government and community agencies use ADR procedures for child protection cases and have developed policy and practice in relation to ADR. There is a great deal of variation in the processes and terminology used to describe them.

23.67 Two frequently used processes are family group conferencing and mediation. Other examples of ADR in this area are conferences prior to a court hearing; the role of family consultants in the Family Court; and ADR processes developed for Indigenous families, such as Care Circles.

23.68 The use of ADR in child protection matters appears to be developing, and has received strong support from some quarters. There are, however, a number of concerns about the use of ADR in child protection cases, similar to those about the use of FDR in cases of family violence.

23.69 The potential for ADR processes to compromise the safety of children is a key concern. Further, there are significant imbalances in power between: the child and parents; between parents (especially in cases of violence); and between families and government departments and other experts. In their examination of family group conferencing and pre-hearing conferences in Seen and Heard: Priority for Children in the Legal Process (ALRC Report 84), the ALRC and the (then) Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC) noted that ‘the vulnerability of some

---

81 The Magellan project is considered below and in Ch 19.
82 In NSW the Wood Inquiry was ‘of the strong view that ADR should be used before and during care proceedings’: J Wood, Report of the Special Commission of Inquiry into Child Protection Services in NSW (2008), 489.
83 Ibid, 489.
86 Now the Australian Human Rights Commission. family members within violent and abusive families may mean that dynamics in conferences could hamper appropriate resolutions. 87

23.70 There is also the challenge of representing the interests of children who sometimes (appropriately) may not be part of the ADR process but are directly affected by it. 88 Additionally, the complexity of the cases means that most ADR involves multi-party processes requiring skilled management by well trained, experienced and possibly multiple conveners.

23.71 Nevertheless, as stated in ALRC Report 84, the use of ADR in child protection cases ‘hold[s] a good deal of promise for the resolution of disputes about the care and protection of children’. The potential benefits of using ADR in child protection matters include processes which are often faster and more cost-effective 89 and the potential to repair important relationships and open channels of communication. 90 ADR processes may also offer flexibility to tailor procedures and outcomes to the needs and interests of children, families and their cultures. 91 The pilot of Care Circles in the Children’s Court in Nowra NSW, which involves Indigenous elders as participants in a process to formulate care plans for Indigenous children, is one example of the flexibility of ADR to provide culturally responsive procedures and outcomes. 92 High levels of violence in some Indigenous communities, extensive involvement of child protection authorities with Indigenous children, and significant levels of distrust of child protection authorities by Indigenous peoples 93 are some of the factors which indicate a real need for culturally responsive ADR in child protection.

23.72 The family law and associated socio-legal service systems have been referred to as a maze. 94 It is possible that forms of ADR could assist in creating pathways of communication and decision making for the individuals who may find the ‘maze’ difficult to traverse. Many of the models of ADR in child protection involve group processes in which anyone who is relevant to the child’s life, care and safety can be 87 The report recommended further research into effective conferencing practices, and the setting down of procedures in child protection legislation based on this research. These recommendations have not yet been implemented.

89 N Thoennes, ‘What We Know: Findings from Dependency Mediation’ (2009) 47 Family Court Review 1, 31–32.

92 J Hatzistergos (New South Wales Attorney General), ‘Nowra Elders to Help Aboriginal Children at Risk’ (Press Release, 22 September 2010). Such Care Circles can be convened by consent where the Children’s Court has already determined a child or young person to be in need of care and protection: J Wood, Report of the Special Commission of Inquiry into Child Protection Services in NSW (2008), 479–80.

23. Intersections and Inconsistencies present. All of the agencies involved with the child and family can come together, talk directly with each other and hear and understand the perspectives of all involved.

Facilitating collaboration between professionals from the family law and family violence fields, as well as the child protection system, may be particularly beneficial for children and their families. Such collaboration across different systems may offer the possibility of using the same ADR process to resolve child protection issues together with intersecting parenting issues relating to the same family, and so provide more effective and consistent outcomes to protect children.

23.73 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how the potential of ADR mechanisms to improve collaboration in the child protection system could best be realised.95 The Commissions also asked whether there is a need for legislative or other reforms to ensure that ADR mechanisms in child protection address family violence appropriately.96

Submissions and consultations

23.74 Themes which emerged in submissions from stakeholders generally related to the need for reform in law, policy and practice in child protection ADR. Stakeholders commented on power differentials in child protection interventions and the role of lawyers; the importance of early non-adversarial intervention mechanisms; the need for legislative provisions and other guidelines to address family violence concerns; the need for culturally-appropriate ADR; and the importance of facilitating the participation of children in ADR processes. Stakeholders also told the Commissions about the development of important initiatives in child protection ADR practice through government-funded and community-supported pilots.

Power differentials in child protection interventions and the role of lawyers in ADR

23.75 AFVPLS Victoria noted the ‘serious human rights implications and significant power differentials present in child protection interventions’, highlighting the need to enhance judicial oversight. AFVPLS Victoria expressed concern about the upholding of natural justice, procedural fairness and legal rights in out-of-court meetings and conferences where parties are not legally represented. In its view, ADR processes must be conducted within a robust legal framework, and legal rights and systemic oversight of Indigenous children and families within the system must be enhanced.97

23.76 AFVPLS Victoria commented that ADR is not appropriate in many situations where family violence is involved, but where ADR does proceed, there must be an option for legal representation. Concern was expressed about the view, particularly within the Victorian Department of Human Services, that lawyers should be excluded from ADR processes.98 AFVPLS Victoria considered it critical that Indigenous people, particularly those who were victims of family violence and sexual assault, have the

95  Consultation Paper, Question 11–5.
96  Consultation Paper, Question 11–6.
98  In their submission, the AFVPLS Victoria cited an example where an Aboriginal lawyer was excluded from the ADFM process: Ibid.
option to choose to be legally represented in all out-of-court dispute resolution processes and that they be advised of their right to make that choice. AFVPLS Victoria also advocated for culturally-appropriate legal advice and representation for Indigenous children and families to ensure that cultural issues are at the core of legal advocacy and increase the accountability of the child protection system. AFVPLS Victoria commented that provisions for Indigenous children in the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) are not being adequately implemented.

23.77 Referring to an external court-referred mediation pilot (where cases are referred from Bidura Children’s Court), Legal Aid NSW commented that legal representatives are required to identify the issues in dispute and the factors potentially affecting a party’s ability to participate in ADR.99

23.78 The Law Society of New South Wales suggested that the potential for ADR mechanisms to improve communication and collaboration in the child protection system could best be realised by adopting an ADR mechanism similar to the legal aid commission FDR in which an independent children’s lawyer is a participant.100

23.79 The Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania was of the view that parents need to have legal assistance in child protection ADR because ‘victims of family violence have often been threatened with what will happen at court, and are untrusting of systems’.101 The Women’s Legal Centre (ACT and Region) also commented on the need for parents to have legal assistance and representation for ADR to work well. The Centre noted that in the ACT conference processes are run by a Registrar at particular stages in child protection matters and that both the child and the ACT child protection agency102 are legally represented. In the Centre’s view, this creates an imbalance of power between parents and the agency, which needs to be carefully managed in any ADR process.

23.80 The Women’s Legal Centre (ACT and Region) also commented on the ACT child protection authority’s lack of support for women trying to escape family violence, and the threat that women’s children will be removed if they do not remove themselves from the situation of family violence.103 Commenting on the lack of understanding of power differentials between victims and abusers, other stakeholders also reported that state child protection authorities hold women responsible for protecting their children from an abusive partner, rather than holding the abuser responsible. According to these stakeholders, if a woman is unable to protect her children from an abusive partner, or from exposure to family violence, she is punished.104 One stakeholder commented that 99 Legal Aid NSW advised the Commissions that the parties in the Bidura Children’s Court pilot will be legally represented: Legal Aid New South Wales, Correspondence, 10 September 2010. See further discussion about the Bidura Children’s Court pilot below.

---

102 This is the ACT Department of Disability, Housing and Community Services.

ADR in child protection matters should focus on removing the risk factors from the child’s current environment, rather than removing the child from his or her environment.\textsuperscript{105}

23.81 Stakeholders commented that the attitude and practice of child protection authorities, described above, is counterproductive for female victims of family violence in any dispute resolution process within the child protection system.\textsuperscript{106} In the view of the Women’s Legal Centre (ACT and Region), it would be more useful if the mandate of the child protection authority encompassed providing support for the parent escaping family violence. The Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania suggested that Departmental workers and mediators should undertake education and training about family violence issues, including the impact of family violence on victims and children.\textsuperscript{107}

ADR processes as early non-adversarial intervention mechanisms

23.82 There was some support in submissions for the use of ADR processes as early non-adversarial intervention mechanisms in child protection cases.

23.83 The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service (VALS) commented that the dispute resolution procedure in the Family Division of the Victorian Children’s Court is overly legalistic and adversarial and that changing the focus of ADR on matters as disputes was a necessary starting point for improvement. According to VALS, ‘[c]ollaboration is diminished through the inherent pressure of the situation’; the parties and legal representatives are aware a contest in court is the only alternative if a dispute resolution conference fails to achieve outcomes. Noting the current limited use of conferencing mechanisms for child protection matters in Victoria, VALS expressed the view that conferencing mechanisms should be used as a preferred dispute resolution method at an early intervention stage. In particular, VALS referred to the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Family Decision Making Program (ADFM) as the best model for early intervention alternative dispute resolution and referred to indications that, despite support for the use and expansion of ADFM, in practice it is not being utilised for child protection matters in Victoria. In VALS’ view, ‘all parents, children, families and communities coming into contact with Victoria’s child protection system’ could benefit from elements of the ADFM approach.\textsuperscript{108}

23.84 The Office of the Child Safety Commissioner (Victoria) (OCSC) was of the view that ADR needs to be conducted as early as possible in the child protection process to avoid attempts to impose collaboration on parties after oppositional positions have become entrenched. In the OCSC’s view, ADR mechanisms need to be ‘embedded as part of a standard routine practice that replaces an adversarial approach, rather than being an adjunct to it’. Elevating the status of ADR by requiring outcomes to be implemented, unless they are impractical or inconsistent with the legislation, would ensure that all parties are motivated to communicate and collaborate to develop a workable agreement.\textsuperscript{109}

\textsuperscript{107} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010, referring to the views of Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania.

23.85 AFVPLS Victoria, however, was concerned that ADR is being positioned as a mandatory process in child protection cases before the Victorian Children’s Court. AFVPLS Victoria commented that similar risks exist in Children’s Court ADR as in FDR in the family law jurisdiction, and noted that the ADFM process is not appropriate for all situations, particularly where there is entrenched family conflict that may involve violence.\textsuperscript{110}

23.86 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria emphasised the importance of providing a range of appropriate ways to resolve child protection matters before a court. Like AFVPLS Victoria, however, the Courts expressed concern about the use of ADR where family violence is an issue.\textsuperscript{111}

\textbf{Legislative provisions and other guidelines to address family violence concerns}

23.87 The Deputy Chief Magistrate of South Australia commented that if conferencing is conducted with appropriate protective protocols and victim support and by qualified individuals who are aware of family violence dynamics, it has the potential to provide the only safe venue for a family violence victim to confront the offender.\textsuperscript{112} A number of other stakeholders considered that legislative or other reforms were required to ensure that ADR mechanisms in child protection address family violence risks appropriately.\textsuperscript{113}

23.88 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria considered that legislation setting out broad principles in relation to family violence, and more specific guidelines, protocols or practice directions to support ADR processes were likely to be required. The Courts pointed out that any dispute resolution measures should observe the premise that family violence cannot be ‘negotiated’. The Courts noted that in many cases ADR may not be appropriate, and where ADR is appropriate, significant safeguards may be required.\textsuperscript{114}

23.89 AFVPLS Victoria argued that family violence exemptions, like those applying to FDR in the \textit{Family Law Act}, should apply to ADR in the child protection \textsuperscript{110} This last point was conveyed to AFVPLS Victoria by that organisations’ Aboriginal child protection lawyer: Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 173}, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{111} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 220}, 1 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{112} A Cannon, \textit{Submission FV 137}, 23 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{114} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 220}, 1 July 2010.
jurisdiction. Legislative provisions should ensure safety as the priority, and safeguards such as appropriate screening for ‘family violence, safety and duress’ must be ensured.

Another stakeholder commented that the high likelihood that child protection cases also involve other forms of family violence must be recognised, and that very clear minimum standards and safeguards are needed, combined with monitoring and evaluation.

23.90 The Department of Human Services (NSW) submitted that ‘the presence of family violence should not automatically exclude the use of ADR’. It suggested that measures, such as providing support persons or advocates for family violence victims or arranging for perpetrators to participate by letter, conference call or spokesperson, could allow families experiencing family violence to gain some of the benefits of ADR, such as personal empowerment and mobilisation of a range of supports. The Department also supported the implementation of comprehensive family violence screening mechanisms and proposed that the following screening criteria be incorporated in either legislation or guidelines:

- ADR should not be used where it would compromise the safety, welfare and well-being of the child or any other person [who] is a party to ADR (for example the child’s primary carer);
- In the event that there are allegations of violence between participants, participants will not be required to attend an ADR process. Where an ADR process is attended, those allegations must be addressed to the satisfaction of the participants, the agency conducting the mediation and the mediator;
- Parties have legal capacity and competency to participate; and
- Carers and designated agencies with case management should be able to participate (regardless of whether or not they were parties to the original care proceedings).

Culturally-appropriate ADR

23.91 Ensuring that ADR is culturally appropriate was emphasised by a number of stakeholders. VALS advocated for more holistic, community-based and culturally-appropriate dispute resolution for Indigenous children. It noted the value of involving respected local people of authority or elders in resolving disputes. Flexibility was also considered important, to deal with a range of issues, to accommodate family structures and groups of people who wish to be involved in the problem solving process, and so that the dispute resolution process can adapt when unanticipated cultural issues arise.

23.92 VALS referred to the ADFM program at Rumbalara Aboriginal Co-operative as an example of a decision-making forum for child protection that resolves issues from a whole-of-community perspective, in the spirit of self-determination and with collaboration as a key factor. This program involves Indigenous families and elders, community-based health and welfare organisations, the Victorian Department of Human Services, and generalist and specialist support services as participants in the resolution of child protection matters.

---

23.93 AFVPLS Victoria also commented on the need for culturally-appropriate processes to ensure better outcomes. AFVPLS Victoria noted that ‘experiences of racism, discrimination and oppression within and by the legal system have resulted in ongoing access barriers and mistrust by [Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander] people’, hence, legislation should ensure all ADR with respect to Indigenous children is culturally appropriate.

23.94 Legal Aid NSW advised that it has been funded to trial a mediation pilot, with matters referred from Bidura Children’s Court. Taking into account the demographic of children and families appearing before the Bidura Children’s Court, ADR practitioners selected to take part in the trial include practitioners who identify as Indigenous, as well as those from an Asian background. The parties will be legally represented; legal representatives will identify the issues in dispute and the factors potentially affecting a party’s ability to participate.

23.95 Legal Aid NSW also advised the Commissions that the Care Circle Pilot, operating at the Nowra Children’s Court since 2009, features ‘care circle’ panels with members who are recognised within their community and are able to provide community and cultural knowledge. It is their role to ensure that there is a strong focus on the child’s needs—including the need to be linked to their family, community and culture. They provide information on extended family and kinship networks, advice about support services, where the child should live and contact between the child and their family.

Participation of children in ADR processes

23.96 A number of submissions commented on the importance of facilitating consultation with, or participation of, children in ADR processes. For example, VALS expressed concern about the marginalisation and de-legitimisation of children’s voices in ADR processes based on an arbitrary age.

23.97 Family Relationship Services Australia (FRSA) noted that experts in the child protection field have called for increased consultation with children and young people when decisions are being made that affect them. FRSA commented that:

Children and young people are well placed to inform decision-makers about the likely impact of different alternatives on their safety and wellbeing as well as to participate in the identification of arrangements that allow them to maintain meaningful relationships with parents even when they are in out-of-home or kinship care.

---

120 Legal Aid New South Wales, Correspondence, 10 September 2010.
121 Ibid.
123 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
23.98 Some FRSA member organisations already provide FDR for some child protection authorities, and there is growing interest in applying FDR to child protection matters across Australian jurisdictions. In FRSA’s view, there is potential to develop a more substantial role for FDR in child protection matters. FDR can be used to resolve a dispute or to assist decision making involving a number of participants. In particular, FRSA referred to the use of child inclusive practice in FDR to facilitate supportive and developmentally appropriate consultation with children while avoiding or removing the burden of decision making from children.\textsuperscript{124}

23.99 Legal Aid NSW told the Commissions that in the Nowra Care Circle Pilot, children have their own legal representative in all matters; children can participate ‘if they are old enough to understand or want to participate and the magistrate approves this’.\textsuperscript{125}

23.100 As noted above, the Department of Human Services (NSW) advocated that legislation or guidelines should provide for the participation of parties on the basis that they have ‘legal capacity and competency to participate’.

\textit{Properly funded and developed pilots}

23.101 Stakeholders supported government-funded pilots to develop ADR mechanisms in order to improve communication and collaboration in the child protection system.\textsuperscript{126}

23.102 National Legal Aid suggested that Commonwealth, state and territory funding is required for the trial and evaluation of appropriate pilot programs. As an example, National Legal Aid referred to improvement in communication and collaboration between key stakeholders since the commencement of a state-funded Legal Aid (WA) pilot child dispute resolution program involving lawyer-assisted meetings for pregnant women in the care of the West Australian Department of Child Protection or who already have a child or children in the care of the Department.\textsuperscript{127}

23.103 Another stakeholder pointed to the importance of properly funded and developed pilots in the NSW Children’s Courts as a good way to begin increasing inter-professional collaboration between lawyers and those trained in social sciences and ensuring that specific mechanisms are put in place for children and parents to be heard in ADR processes.\textsuperscript{128}

\textsuperscript{124} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{125} Legal Aid New South Wales, Correspondence, 10 September 2010.
\textsuperscript{126} Legal Aid New South Wales told the Commissions about pilots in culturally responsive ADR—the Nowra Care Circle pilot and the Bidura Children’s Court external court-referred mediation pilot are discussed above.
\textsuperscript{127} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. The program referred to is the Signs of Safety child dispute resolution program, commenced in late 2009, in conjunction with the Perth’s Children’s Court, the West Australian Department for Child Protection, and the King Edward Memorial Hospital for Women. The program covers a combination of pre-court application meetings and matters referred to post-court application pre-hearing conferences. National Legal Aid also referred to a similar program underway in Victoria in which the Victoria Legal Aid Commission is collaborating with the Victorian Department of Human Services and Department of Justice and the Victorian Children’s Court.
\textsuperscript{128} N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010.
Commissions’ views

23.104 The Commissions’ view is that ADR in child protection may offer important benefits for children and their families. The Commissions also note, however, that, as with FDR in family law matters, ADR in child protection matters involves a number of challenges in the context of family violence. These include: dealing with relationships of power; protection from violence, abuse and intimidation; and ensuring that all voices are heard, including those of children. Some concerns may be addressed through training of ADR practitioners and ensuring best practice in ways similar to those discussed in Chapter 21 in the context of FDR. Others need additional measures, supported by legislation and policy.

23.105 As noted above, the Commissions support the view—expressed in the NSWLRRC report on Community Justice Centres—that ADR negotiations concerning violence will always be inappropriate. The Commissions are also of the view that, where family violence is a factor, ADR for issues other than violence may be appropriate, depending on the circumstances, and appropriate risk assessment and risk management. ADR may have significant benefits for children in cases involving family violence, if it is conducted by an experienced practitioner with appropriate safeguards. As the Commissions have previously discussed, ADR may offer opportunities for children and their families to repair important relationships and open channels of communication. ADR also provides a forum for communication and collaboration between various agencies and individuals involved in making decisions in child protection matters. This can facilitate more effective support for children, as well as members of their families, who have experienced family violence. The Commissions consider, however, that state and territory legislation and policies for ADR in child protection matters should make clear that violence cannot be negotiated or mediated.

23.106 Family violence concerns can arise in child protection ADR, as in FDR in the family law jurisdiction. The Commissions are of the view that, if family violence concerns render FDR inapposite for particular parties, it is likely that ADR in any child protection proceedings involving the same parties will also be inappropriate. The Commissions agree with stakeholders that legislative provisions, guidelines and policies, should ensure that ADR mechanisms in child protection address family violence risks appropriately. In the Commissions’ view, the FDR legislative and policy framework for family law matters and state and territory ADR legislative and policy frameworks for child protection matters should operate consistently to screen and assess risks relating to family violence.

23.107 As noted above and discussed in Chapter 21, the use of FDR in family law disputes is subject to a comprehensive legislative and policy framework requiring family violence screening and risk assessment, supporting tools used by FDR.

---

130 For further discussion on this, see Ch 21.
practitioners to screen, assess risk and determine suitability of matters for FDR.\textsuperscript{131} In order to promote consistency in understanding, identifying and responding to family violence in dispute resolution processes across the family law and child protection systems, the Commissions consider that it would be desirable if state and territory governments considered FDR screening and risk assessment frameworks and tools in any future development of family violence screening and risk assessment frameworks for ADR in the child protection sector. As noted in Chapter 18, stakeholders have indicated their view that the Victorian framework for common risk assessment is a good model. The Commissions suggest, in Chapter 18, that other state and territory governments consider the development of frameworks similar to Victoria to assess and manage the risk of family violence in their jurisdictions. The Commissions note that state and territory governments should also consider the application of a common risk assessment framework to ADR in child protection matters.

23.108 The participation of children in ADR processes was referred to by a number of stakeholders. As noted above, concern was expressed about the marginalisation of children in ADR processes on the basis of an arbitrary age. On this issue, the Commissions note that the \textit{Convention on the Rights of the Child} states that children have a right to express their views and to have those views given due weight in accordance with their age and maturity—in relation to issues concerning them.\textsuperscript{132} In the Commissions’ view, practice models such as child inclusive practice in FDR and other initiatives in ADR, such as the Nowra Care Circle Pilot may provide useful models for determining the appropriate level of a child’s direct involvement in ADR processes, depending on the child’s understanding, ability and desire to participate.

23.109 The Commissions also note stakeholder concerns about the participation of unrepresented parents in child protection ADR, and about the lack of support by child protection staff for victim parents, and the impact this may have on ADR outcomes. In Chapter 5, the Commissions refer to stakeholder concerns about practices on the part of child protection agencies which may take a punitive rather than supportive approach to parents who are also victims of family violence. The Commissions agree with stakeholders that legal advisers, in addition to other support persons, can help to address power imbalances between parents and child protection authorities in ADR. This is particularly important where parents are victims of family violence. Lawyers advising parents in child protection ADR can work collaboratively with children’s legal representatives and other professionals in the child protection system to help achieve the best outcomes for children and their families. Lawyers can also play a valuable role in helping families understand and navigate their way through the multiple legal systems and ADR processes in cases involving intersecting child protection, parenting and family violence issues.

\textsuperscript{131} As noted above, the Australian Government has published the \textit{Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line}; the Victorian Government has also developed a comprehensive screening and risk assessment framework. The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department is also currently developing a national framework to support screening and assessment for family violence across the federal family law system.

In this Report, the Commissions recommend that Australian, state and territory governments prioritise the provision of, and access to, legal services and culturally-appropriate victim support services for victims of family violence. These recommendations include enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups. The Commissions reiterate the view expressed in Chapter 5 that practical measures are required to bring about cultural change in the way child protection workers deal with family violence—including family violence training and changes in policies, practices and procedures. Policies and guidelines should make clear that parents are entitled to seek legal advice and other support in relation to their participation in ADR, particularly where family violence is involved. Family violence training for staff participating in ADR on behalf of child protection authorities and for ADR practitioners should highlight the need for parents, as well as children, who are victims of family violence to have access to appropriate support and assistance. Such an approach has particular significance for Indigenous people because of the high levels of involvement of child protection agencies with Indigenous children, the high levels of violence in some Indigenous communities, and the significant levels of distrust of child protection agencies by Indigenous people.

The Commissions note stakeholder comments about the need for culturally-appropriate dispute resolution for Indigenous children. Some of the ADR programs and initiatives referred to by stakeholders demonstrate the potential for ADR procedures and outcomes to reflect the needs and interests of particular children, their families and their cultures. In Chapter 21, the Commissions discuss the value of culturally responsive dispute resolution processes which have the flexibility to accommodate—in so far as is appropriate, practicable and within the limits of the law—the cultural, religious and social values and practices of Indigenous and CALD communities. The Commissions are of the view that, in child protection matters, agreements made in culturally responsive dispute resolution may be particularly beneficial for Indigenous and CALD children because they may be more sustainable and, therefore, more effective. Culturally responsive ADR is also valuable because it facilitates children’s rights, as set out in the Convention on the Rights of the Child and child protection legislation, to enjoy their culture.

As discussed in Chapter 21 in relation to culturally responsive FDR, however, the complexity of identifying and assessing family violence in Indigenous and CALD communities requires careful consideration in developing effective screening and assessment tools and appropriate referral protocols. The Commissions consider, therefore, that state and territory governments should take a comprehensive and strategic approach to support culturally responsive alternative dispute resolution processes—including screening and risk assessment processes—in child protection matters.

---

133 See Ch 29, Recs 29–3 and 29–4.
134 See Chs 19 and 20.
135 See Ch 21 for further discussion of culturally responsive dispute resolution processes.
Recommendation 23–8  State and territory legislation and policies for alternative dispute resolution in child protection matters should provide that violence cannot be negotiated or mediated within alternative dispute resolution processes.

Recommendation 23–9  State and territory legislation and policies for alternative dispute resolution in child protection matters should provide for comprehensive screening and risk assessment mechanisms.

Recommendation 23–10  State and territory child protection agencies and alternative dispute resolution service providers should ensure that child protection staff and alternative dispute resolution practitioners undertake training on:

(a)  the nature and dynamics of family violence; and

(b)  the need for parents, as well as children, who are victims of family violence to have access to appropriate support.

Recommendation 23–11  State and territory governments should take a comprehensive and strategic approach to support culturally responsive alternative dispute resolution—including screening and risk assessment processes—in child protection matters.

Family law, child protection and family violence intersections in ADR

23.113  As discussed in Chapter 3, families experiencing breakdown and family violence may have multiple and simultaneous engagements with different legal systems. For example, a child protection agency may commence care proceedings in the children’s court, while a parent may commence proceedings in a family court for parenting orders governing children’s living arrangements. Similarly, parties may engage in child protection ADR as well as FDR to resolve their parenting dispute. Additionally, while a dispute is pursued through non-judicial dispute resolution in one jurisdiction, a dispute involving the same family may be pursued through court proceedings in the other jurisdiction. Greater use of alternative processes as a primary form of resolving disputes increases the likelihood of dual non-judicial dispute resolution processes, or concurrent court proceedings and non-judicial dispute resolution across jurisdictions.

23.114  Where family law, child protection and family violence issues intersect, minimising duplication of processes in different jurisdictions will ensure more efficient and effective use of resources. Achieving consistency in practices and in the outcomes reached in the different jurisdictions is also important to ensure the effective protection of victims and potential victims of family violence.
23.115 Reliable and timely access by courts and non-judicial dispute resolution practitioners to information about relevant agreements made in other jurisdictions is important for consistency of outcomes across jurisdictions. As discussed in Chapter 30, there are some significant limitations on courts’ powers to obtain relevant information from other jurisdictions. This is even more pronounced for non-judicial dispute resolution practitioners who have no powers to require the production of relevant information and must rely on the voluntary provision of information by the parties.

23.116 The Commissions consider, below, the gaps between the family law, child protection and family violence systems and the intersection between parenting, child protection and family violence issues in the context of ADR. In particular, the Commissions consider the importance of reliable and timely inter-jurisdictional access to relevant FDR and ADR agreements, and how this may be best facilitated. The Commissions also consider how some ADR processes to resolve concurrent child protection and parenting disputes are operating in practice.

Submissions and consultations

23.117 A number of stakeholders commented on the gaps between the family law, child protection, and family violence systems and identified ways of overcoming these.

23.118 The OCSC commented on the gaps between child protection service systems and family violence service systems, and argued that reforms to ensure that ADR mechanisms in child protection incorporate considerations of family violence were needed to address the gaps between these two systems. Referring particularly to the need for integration of child protection and family violence protection orders, the OCSC suggested that courts’ awareness of relevant orders, including orders relating to family members, could be ensured through a shared database.

23.119 In its submission, FRSA expressed concern about the gap between the federal family law system and the state-based child protection system. In particular, it was concerned about children’s matters proceeding through family law courts when child protection agencies should be involved. FRSA argued that stronger connections between the child protection and family law systems could include, among other things, improved information sharing across the two systems and increased resources for risk assessment.

23.120 Stakeholders commented on the resolution of matters through dual ADR processes in the family law and child protection systems. As noted previously, parties to family law parenting disputes are subject to requirements for participation in FDR under the Family Law Act. The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department noted that families in the child protection system may also be required to 137 The Office of the Child Safety Commissioner noted that because family violence issues are primarily considered in the Victorian Magistrates’ Court system and child protection issues are primarily considered in the Victorian Children’s Court system, family violence protection orders and child protection orders are not necessarily integrated with consideration of all relevant information: Office of the Child Safety Commissioner, Submission FV 215, 30 June 2010.

---

138 Ibid.

139 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
participate in non-judicial dispute resolution processes, and raised the issue of dual ADR processes in the family law and child protection systems operating in practice.\footnote{140}

23.121 The national peak body for FDR and other family relationship services, FRSA, stated that, in addition to providing FDR for family law parenting disputes, some FDR service providers are providing dispute resolution as part of child protection processes.\footnote{141} Legal Aid NSW also noted that its FDR service provides dispute resolution in child protection cases.\footnote{142}

23.122 FRSA stated that it was not aware of problems arising in FDR cases as a result of dual family law and child protection ADR processes,\footnote{143} and made the following comment with respect to consideration by FDR practitioners of relevant information from the other jurisdiction in cases where families may be involved in both family law and child protection matters:

in cases where FDR is for the resolution of disputes over parenting arrangements, risks concerned with violence, child welfare and safety are explored in initial and ongoing assessment, typically one or both parents will identify any child protection involvement or concerns, domestic violence orders or other socio-legal processes that impact on the care provision. Similarly, if providing FDR as part of a child protection intervention or to address a dispute over care arrangements involving others (eg grandparent care) the assessment will include past or current parenting plans, family court orders and other socio-legal processes of relevance.\footnote{144}

23.123 FRSA also commented that when parties are asked, they usually disclose such information.\footnote{145} In the context of commenting about the role of lawyers in child protection ADR, AFVPLS Victoria pointed to the difficulties experienced by victims in disclosing family violence, and commented that the best interests of children would not be served if agreements are made on inadequate information about family violence or safety issues.\footnote{146} However, FRSA stressed the importance of thorough assessments by appropriately skilled practitioners to fully identify risks (including violence, abuse, neglect, drug and alcohol misuse, and mental health issues) and the interactivity between risks. FRSA explained that assessments are undertaken by FDR practitioners who are qualified social scientists with experience and qualifications in the areas of child protection and family violence.\footnote{147}

\begin{footnotes}
\footnotetext[140]{Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, \textit{Submission FV 166}, 25 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[141]{Family Relationship Services Australia, \textit{Submission FV 231}, 15 July 2010.}
\footnotetext[142]{Legal Aid New South Wales, \textit{Correspondence}, 10 September 2010.}
\footnotetext[143]{Family Relationship Services Australia, \textit{Correspondence}, 21 September 2010; Family Relationship Services Australia, \textit{Correspondence}, 20 September 2010. The term FDR in this context refers to a practice model for dispute resolution, rather than simply ADR for family law disputes.}
\footnotetext[144]{Family Relationship Australia Services, \textit{Correspondence}, 20 September 2010.}
\footnotetext[145]{Family Relationship Services Australia, \textit{Consultation}, By telephone, 15 September 2010; Family Relationship Services Australia, \textit{Consultation}, By telephone, 30 June 2010}
\footnotetext[146]{Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 173}, 25 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[147]{Family Relationship Australia Services, \textit{Correspondence}, 20 September 2010.}
\end{footnotes}
23.124 According to FRSA, there is growing interest in applying FDR to child protection matters across Australian jurisdictions, and FDR is increasingly being identified as an alternative to potentially complex and resource-intensive court processes in child protection matters. FDR can be used to resolve a dispute or to assist decision making involving multiple stakeholders, including parents, grandparents, child protection agencies, and children (through child-inclusive practice). FRSA also acknowledged, however, that the model of FDR used in child protection matters would have to be adapted to the power imbalance between the parents and child protection authorities. FRSA noted that further work may be warranted on practice models and implications for practitioner training and accreditation to support the application of FDR in child protection matters.

23.125 FRSA also made a number of comments with respect to how intersecting family law parenting issues and child protection issues relating to one family may be addressed together through the same FDR processes.

23.126 FRSA explained that the majority of families access FDR as ‘family law system clients’ to resolve a dispute over parenting arrangements. However, in some of these cases, family violence, mental health issues, or drug and alcohol misuse by parents may mean that children are at risk. Statutory child protection authorities may already be involved, or may become involved following notification by the FDR service. Grandparents or other family members may also become involved. FRSA noted that ‘at some point the issues being dealt with in FDR may become more concerned with addressing family violence and securing the safety of the child through the best placement option, rather than being limited to the dispute between the parents’. Strict distinctions between child protection and family law parenting issues may not work ‘on the ground’, and in some cases it may not be clear whether the primary issue is a parenting one or a child protection one:

While distinctions between ‘family law’, ‘family violence’ and ‘child protection’ may be meaningful to legislators, policy analysts and program administrators, such distinctions do not reflect the lived experience of families affected by violence where relationship breakdown, violence and child abuse/neglect are often connected and not discrete or isolated problems.

23.127 In FRSA’s view, there is ‘no apparent conflict between the Family Law Act and the child protection legislation that underpins the work of the child protection authority’. With respect to how family law and child protection legislative and policy frameworks might apply to dispute resolution processes dealing with intersecting

---

148 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
149 Family Relationship Services Australia, Correspondence, 21 September 2010.
150 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
151 Family Relationship Services Australia, Correspondence, 21 September 2010.
152 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010. Other stakeholders’ comments about the significance of power imbalances between parents and child protection authorities in child protection ADR are considered above.
153 Family Relationship Services Australia, Correspondence, 21 September 2010.
154 Family Relationship Services Australia, Consultation, By telephone, 15 September 2010.
155 Family Relationship Services Australia, Correspondence, 21 September 2010.
parenting and child protection issues, however, FRSA acknowledged that ‘there is the potential for issues to arise in relation to confidentiality, admissibility, risk assessment etc., particularly if the dispute is not resolved and/or the matter proceeds to court in either the family court or children’s court’.156

23.128 FRSA noted that there is a lack of research or documented case examples exploring the family law, family violence and child protection legislation intersections at the direct service delivery level. In FRSA’s view, further research in this area, as well as consideration of case examples to demonstrate the actual and potential use of FDR in child protection, would be useful.

Commissions’ views

23.129 The Commissions’ view is that some of the concerns discussed throughout this Report in relation to court proceedings, which arise out of fragmentation of jurisdictions, may also apply to non-judicial dispute resolution processes. In particular, the Commissions consider that the need for information sharing across systems to ensure that risk assessment is reliable and that outcomes are consistent, arises in the context of both court proceedings and non-judicial dispute resolution processes. The Commissions agree, therefore, with the OCSC that reforms to ensure the incorporation of family violence considerations into ADR mechanisms in child protection need to be implemented as part of a wider reform addressing the gaps between the child protection systems and family violence systems. The Commissions also agree with FRSA that greater connection between the family law and child protection systems is needed to improve information sharing and to increase resources for effective risk assessment.

23.130 The Commissions note FRSA’s comment about the importance of thorough assessments undertaken by qualified practitioners who have experience and qualifications in the area of child protection and family violence, as well as social science, and are able to identify risks and the interaction between risks. The Commissions also note FRSA’s comments that, as part of risk assessment procedures for dispute resolution in child protection or in family law matters proceeding through FDR in federally-funded family and relationship services, parties are asked about court orders, ‘socio-legal processes’ and agreements relating to the other jurisdiction.

23.131 The Commissions consider that dispute resolution practitioners’ reliable and timely access to information about relevant court orders and other non-judicial dispute resolution agreements is necessary to assist in such risk assessment, as well as to ensure that women and children are effectively protected against family violence by consistent outcomes across jurisdictions.

23.132 The Commissions discuss, above, the relevance of information about protection orders in assisting FDR practitioners to identify family violence and to manage the risks associated with it. Information about relevant orders or agreements

---

156 Ibid.
157 The Commissions have recommended that this screening and risk assessment frameworks and tools address the need to ask parties in FDR processes about the existence of relevant current protection orders, past protection orders, as well as applications for protection orders—see Recs 23–6 and 23–7.
and relevant legal proceedings or dispute resolution processes in the family law and family violence jurisdictions is also important to facilitate informed and appropriate responses to family violence by child protection dispute resolution practitioners, and to ensure that ADR in child protection disputes achieves safe outcomes for children. The Commissions are of the view that ADR service providers undertaking intake procedures for ADR in child protection should, therefore, ensure that parties are asked specifically about relevant orders and applications under state and territory family violence legislation, and relevant orders, injunctions and applications under the Family Law Act. 158 Similarly, intake procedures for child protection ADR should ask parties about relevant FDR agreements and FDR processes in the family law jurisdiction. 159

23.133 Clearly, courts considering matters involving family violence may also be assisted by access to information about relevant agreements reached in child protection ADR or in FDR. One way of facilitating access by courts to relevant agreements would be to register such agreements as consent orders in the relevant court and subsequently include them on a national register which can be accessed by family courts and state and territory courts that hear family violence protection applications and child protection matters. 160 Registering agreements as consent orders may, however, be considered undesirable for a number of reasons, including the costs involved to the parties. It may also reduce the flexibility of agreements, and the discretion of child protection agencies in implementing agreements. 161

23.134 In the Commissions’ view, some of the arguments in favour of improving courts’ access to relevant orders from other jurisdictions through a national register might also be made in favour of extending access to relevant orders to ADR and FDR practitioners. The Commissions note, however, that FDR and ADR may be undertaken by individuals and organisations in the private sector. As the Commissions do not have sufficient information regarding the concerns and implications that may arise out of an extension of access to private sector organisations and individuals, the Commissions make no specific recommendation on this point.

23.135 As noted above, where families are affected by violence, parenting and child protection issues may overlap. Stakeholders have indicated that, currently, FDR services may be utilised for the resolution of both child protection and parenting disputes. Dispute resolution processes that can address both types of disputes where the same family is involved—and so bridge jurisdictional divides which limit court processes—may have many benefits, particularly in minimising inconsistent outcomes. However, difficulties may also arise where legislative and policy frameworks for child protection dispute resolution may not be entirely consistent with legislative and policy 158 Relevant applications, orders and injunctions are those relating to the children and their family members.

159 Relevant FDR agreements and FDR processes are those relating to the children and their family members.
160 The Commissions recommend that a national register be established to include protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation; child protection orders under state and territory child protection legislation and related orders and injunctions under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth): see Rec 30–18.
161 Implementation of family conference outcomes, for example, is generally not mandated in Australia, and the relevant child protection departments retain some discretion: N Harris, Family Group Conferencing in Australia 15 Years On (2008), prepared for the National Child Protection Clearinghouse.
frameworks for family law parenting dispute resolution. For example, provisions setting out requirements, obligations and other matters in relation to dispute resolution under the Family Law Act may be different from provisions relating to dispute resolution under child protection legislation.\(^{162}\) Where disputes are not clearly characterised as either family law or child protection matters, there may be potential for confusion as to which provisions apply to the dispute resolution process. The need for cross-training and accreditation to enable practitioners to undertake dispute resolution in both family law and child protection disputes is a further consideration.

23.136 The comments made by FRSA suggest that the use of FDR—including child inclusive practice—as a model to resolve child protection issues together with intersecting parenting issues may be an emerging and significant trend. As FRSA has noted, however, evidence about this current and potential use of FDR is limited. The Commissions are unable, therefore, to come to any firm conclusions as to the implications—including the benefits and limitations—of applying FDR as a practice model to resolve child protection issues together with intersecting parenting issues relating to the same family.

23.137 The Commissions are of the view, however, that flexible dispute resolution processes, which can facilitate collaboration across socio-legal service systems and jurisdictional divides, may offer significant potential for seamless and effective resolution of intersecting child protection and parenting issues relating to the same family. This may be particularly valuable in cases involving family violence. In the Commissions’ view, further work to explore the current and potential use of dispute resolution models in this context would be valuable.

Recommendation 23–12 Alternative dispute resolution service providers should ensure that, in intake procedures for child protection matters, parties are asked about relevant:

(a) orders, injunctions and applications under state and territory family violence legislation and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth);

(b) family dispute resolution agreements and processes; and

(c) alternative dispute resolution agreements and processes in family violence matters.

Recommendation 23–13 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department and state and territory governments should collaborate with Family Relationship Services Australia, legal aid commissions and other alternative dispute resolution service providers, to explore the potential of resolving family law parenting and child protection issues relating to the same family in one integrated process.

---

\(^{162}\) For example, for a discussion of provisions relating to the confidentiality and admissibility of FDR communications under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), see Ch 22.
Restorative justice

23.138 Restorative justice has been described as ‘a process whereby parties with a stake in a specific offence collectively resolve how to deal with the aftermath of the offence and its implications for the future’. However, such processes need not involve face-to-face meetings between victims and offenders, and can be used for victims alone or involve representatives of victims. Restorative justice initiatives may be employed at any stage in the criminal justice process, including the sentencing stage. Other stages could include: before or at the time a person is charged; after a person is convicted but before sentencing; and after a person has served his or her sentence. There are a number of restorative justice practices, with the three most common being victim-offender mediation, conferencing, and circle and forum sentencing.

23.139 Restorative justice practices in Australia differ widely in their application to family violence. There are some general limits to, and criteria for, these programs that restrict their application to family violence. In addition, a large number of programs have specific exclusions, either by way of legislation or guidelines, for conduct that might constitute family violence. In particular, it is common for such programs to exclude sexual offences and certain violent offences.

23.140 The Consultation Paper raised questions about the application of restorative justice processes in family violence cases and in relation to sexual assault offences and offenders.

Submissions and consultations

23.141 Many of the submissions in response indicated concern about, or opposition to, the use of restorative justice in family violence cases, and particularly in cases involving sexual assault.

164 For example, the NSW legislation establishing youth justice conferencing, the Young Offenders Act 1997 (NSW), excludes its application to offences under the relevant family violence legislation (including a breach of a protection order, stalking and intimidation), and to a range of other offences that may constitute family violence.

165 Consultation Paper, Questions 11–7 and 11–8.

167 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.
However, there was some support for the use of restorative justice in family violence cases. One stakeholder argued that it is important to dispel the myths—particularly cultural assumptions and stereotypes—about restorative justice and to have restorative justice recognised as an alternative approach with respect to sexual violence within Indigenous communities. It was argued that such programs could potentially be tailored, with safety precautions and screening processes, and introduced in Victoria for persons of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander descent.

Hannah McGlade commented that, while family violence and sexual assault against Indigenous victims may be serious criminal offences, the criminal justice system often does not respond to them as such. She advocated for the use of Aboriginal justice models to deal with violence and abuse of Indigenous women and children:

Aboriginal customary law has not ceased to exist, although subjected to abuse from colonisation onwards. Violence offences against women and children are a grave breach of Aboriginal customary law, which includes women’s customary law, however, the non-Aboriginal criminal justice system continues to diminish Aboriginal women by supporting violence, often as a matter of ‘culture’. Aboriginal justice models will encourage the revival of our culture and lawful ways that prohibit violence and abuse of women and children.

Professor Julie Stubbs commented that restorative justice has limited application because it is not a forum for fact finding. In her view, claims made about restorative justice practices assisting victims have been ‘overstated, or not tested’. She noted that most of the evidence is derived from existing models in juvenile justice; and many of these models confine what might be provided to victims to apologies, or to the limited reparations the offender can make. She was of the view that ‘effective justice for domestic violence, sexual assault or gendered harms might reside in hybrid models that are not limited by [restorative justice] or by conventional criminal justice’.

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed a preliminary view that the use of restorative justice practices in the context of family violence appears to be fraught with difficulties. The Commissions also suggested that the dynamics of power in a relationship where sexual offences have been committed make it very difficult to achieve the philosophical and policy aims of restorative justice, and that the use of restorative justice practices in that context appears to be generally inappropriate. Many of the comments made in submissions reflected these concerns.

168 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010.
170 H McGlade, Submission FV 84, 2 June 2010.
171 J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010 (referring to international models).
172 Ibid.
173 Ibid.
As noted in the Consultation Paper, the Commissions agree with the Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) that appropriate models of restorative justice must be based on rigorous research. Further research, trials and evaluations had been recommended by the VLRC, the Victorian Parliament Law Reform Committee, and the National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children. Given current and proposed developments, the Commissions conclude that it is premature to make any recommendations in this area, and that this issue should be revisited at a later stage.

---

175 Ibid; Law Reform Committee—Parliament of Victoria, Inquiry into Alternative Dispute Resolution and Restorative Justice (2009), Recs 72–73. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions also referred to consultation and planning by the ACT Department of Justice and Community Safety’s Restorative Justice Unit to implement provisions in the Crimes (Restorative Justice) Act 2004 (ACT). These provisions apply restorative justice practices to crimes constituting family violence under ACT family violence legislation.
Part G

Sexual Assault
24. Sexual Assault and Family Violence

Contents

Introduction 1097
   Chapter outline 1098
   Terminology 1099
The prevalence of sexual violence 1100
   A limited picture 1100
   A snapshot of sexual violence 1103
Sexual assault in the family violence context 1106
   Multiple forms of sexual violence 1106
   Repetition of sexual violence 1106
   Coexistence with other forms of violence and abuse 1107
   Indigenous communities 1108
History of activism and legal change 1111
   Historical approaches to sexual violence 1111
   The nature of sexual offences 1114
   Balancing rights? 1117
Law reform 1119
   Focus of reform 1120
   Other legal responses 1123
   Law is not the only response 1125
The implementation gap 1125
   Judicial and legal education 1127

Introduction

24.1 This part of the Report concerns the second Term of Reference of the Inquiry. This requires the Commissions to focus on the impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws in cases of sexual assault occurring in a family violence context, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence.

24.2 This chapter outlines key background understandings of sexual assault in a family violence context, its nature and prevalence, and the response of the criminal justice system and other areas of law.

24.3 Chapter 25 describes the range of existing sexual offences and identifies inconsistencies in relation to elements of these offences, notably in relation to the issue of consent. It also discusses the role that guiding principles and objects clauses can play in the interpretation of sexual offences and the application of rules of evidence in sexual assault proceedings.
24.4 Chapters 26, 27 and 28 highlight ways in which particular laws and procedures operate for victims of sexual assault. In some cases, where it is possible to identify certain approaches as more promising and progressive than others, the Commissions recommend that the Australian, state and territory governments should implement consistent measures based on the best model. Uniformity is not, of itself, a goal, but rather consistency with respect to identified best policy.

24.5 For simplicity, the Commissions’ recommendations are most often worded to recommend that ‘federal, state and territory’ legislation should provide for certain matters, notwithstanding that:

- federal criminal law does not provide for ordinary sexual offences\(^1\) and, in practice, only a small number of criminal and quasi-criminal matters are heard in federal courts;\(^2\) and

- one or more jurisdictions may already have enacted legislation that fits the criteria recommended by the Commissions.

Chapter outline

24.6 This chapter canvasses what is known about the prevalence of sexual assault in the family violence context and situates the experience of sexual assault as part of family violence more generally. It highlights aspects of family violence that are important in understanding and responding to this category of sexual violence—for example, the many types of sexual violence experienced by women and children, its repetition within the family violence context, its cumulative impact and coexistence with other forms of family violence. Sexual assault by current and former intimate partners, for instance, requires responses that take account of these interrelated contexts and acknowledge the distinct experience of sexual violence by an intimate partner.

24.7 The chapter then introduces the response of the criminal justice system—an examination that is expanded in Chapters 25 to 28. It outlines some of the unique features of sexual assault and the legal response, as well as the myths and stereotypes about women, children and sexual assault that continue to hold some sway in the community and in the legal system. The chapter introduces the substantial reform of law and procedure that has been undertaken in this area over the last three decades to provide more appropriate criminal justice responses to sexual assault.

---

1 As opposed to sexual offences such as those relating to child sex tourism: Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) pt IIA; rape or sexual violence in the context of war or as a crime against humanity: Criminal Code (Cth) ss 268.14, 268.19, 268.59, 268.64. See also Crimes Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences Against Children) Act 2010 (Cth).

2 Rather, the Australian Parliament chooses to rely heavily on the state and territory courts to adjudicate proceedings with respect to federal offences in order to avoid the financial and administrative costs associated with establishing a separate system of federal criminal courts. The use of state courts was made possible by the Australian Constitution ss 71 and 77(iii). Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) s 39(2) invests state courts with federal jurisdiction in both civil and criminal matters, subject to certain limitations and exceptions. Under Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) ss 68(1), 79 state and territory procedural and evidence laws are applied to federal prosecutions in state and territory courts.
24.8 The chapter briefly discusses other areas of the law which also respond to sexual assault (including protection orders, family law, statutory compensation and tort law). This discussion recognises that the criminal justice system is not the only legal response, nor is it simply the law that is (or should be) called on to respond to and reduce sexual violence.

24.9 Finally, the chapter discusses the ‘implementation gap’—the gap between written law and its practice—that remains despite extensive changes to law and procedure related to sexual assault.

Terminology

24.10 In this chapter the Commissions use two terms to signify different aspects of sexual violence in a family violence context. First, the term ‘sexual violence’ is used to describe the full range of sexually coercive or unwanted acts that many women and children experience, not all of which are against the law. Secondly, the terms ‘sexual assault’ or ‘sexual offence’ are used to refer to those acts that are proscribed in the various Australian criminal laws (for example, sexual intercourse without consent, rape, indecent assault, offences against children, and offences against people with a cognitive impairment). This approach recognises both ‘experience-based’ and ‘offence-based’ definitions of sexual violence.3

24.11 The Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) provides the following experience-based definition of sexual violence:

- which makes that person feel uncomfortable, distressed, frightened or threatened, or which results in harm or injury to that person;
- to which that person has not freely agreed or given consent, or to which that person is not capable of giving consent;
- in which another person uses physical, emotional, psychological or verbal force or (other) coercive behaviour against that person.

Sexual assault may be located on a continuum of behaviours from sexual harassment to life-threatening rape. These behaviours may include lewdness, stalking, indecent assault, date rape, drug-assisted sexual assault, child sexual abuse, incest, exposure of a person to pornography, use of a person in pornography, and threats or attempts to sexually assault.4

---

24.12 Offence-based definitions are directly linked to the elements of the offences prescribed by the criminal law including, for example: penetration, absence of consent and the circumstances that negate consent (as defined in law).\(^5\)

24.13 An understanding of both definitions is important in recognising the continuum of unwanted sexual behaviours that may exist in the family violence context. It is also important in ensuring appropriate responses, including service delivery and support for people who have experienced sexual violence that is not necessarily addressed by the criminal law.\(^6\)

The prevalence of sexual violence

A limited picture

24.14 Information about the nature and prevalence of sexual assault is limited. This is due to a range of factors including lack of reporting generally, and under-reporting due to the methodologies and definitions employed in the various surveys or data sources.\(^7\)

24.15 Moreover, many sexual assaults are not reported to anyone, let alone to the police.\(^8\) For example, the 1996 ABS Women’s Safety Survey found that one in five women who had been sexually assaulted did not tell anyone about it. In 2002, the National Crime and Safety Survey found that 80% of women did not report the most recent incident to the police.\(^9\) Similarly, the Australian Component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS) found that only 15% of women who experienced physical or sexual violence from an intimate partner reported that incident to the police.\(^10\) In 2007, the Australian Institute of Criminology (AIC) estimated that less than 30% of sexual assaults and related offences are reported to the police.\(^11\)

24.16 Some forms of sexual violence may be less likely to be reported than others. Notably, incidents (whether sexual or physical) committed by current or former intimate partners are less likely to be reported than those incidents committed by strangers.\(^12\) In a submission to this Inquiry, Professor Patricia Eastal stated that research confirmed that ‘partner rape has particularly low reporting, prosecution, and

---

5 Ibid, 9. There is variation across the jurisdictions in what acts are defined as sexual offences and the way in which consent is defined: See Ch 25.
6 Ibid, 8.
7 Data collection is discussed further in Ch 26 and more generally in Ch 31. For a discussion of the limitations of various data sources, eg, police statistics, crime surveys and victim surveys, see B Cook, F David and A Grant, Sexual Violence in Australia: Australian Institute of Criminology Research and Public Policy Series, 36 (2001), 2–4.
8 See Ch 26 discussion of under-reporting and barriers to reporting sexual assault.
11 Australian Institute of Criminology, Guilty Outcomes in Reported Sexual Assault and Related Offence Incidents (2007). conviction rates. This has particular significance for an understanding of sexual violence in a family context.

24.17 Women and children may not report or disclose the sexual violence that they have experienced for a range of reasons, including because: they have not identified the act as sexual violence, let alone as a criminal offence; they do not consider the incident serious enough to warrant reporting; they are ashamed, fearful of the perpetrator, do not think that they will be believed, fear how they will be treated by the criminal justice system, and may consider that they can handle it themselves.

24.18 The failure to recognise or identify an act as sexual violence, or more specifically as a sexual assault, may also be a ‘survival strategy’ for some women, particularly those who have been sexually assaulted by an intimate partner. As Debra Parkinson reported in 2008:

If they had recognised it as rape, they could not have managed their situation. Some excused the behaviour of their partners—even the most brutal rapes—as a consequence of being married to him, ‘it was his right’. As a result, the way women complete surveys would be inaccurate.

… women told us that it was not until they were no longer in the relationship and sometimes not until many years later that they had the perspective to recognise they were being raped within their relationship. While they were in the relationship, they struggled to make sense of what was happening to them, and were caught in our society’s demand to make the marriage work. Whilst in the relationship, they minimised the rapes, they blamed themselves, or they feared even worse consequences if they didn’t comply.

24.19 Different surveys or data sources report different findings about the extent of sexual violence in Australia, including because different definitions of sexual violence or sexual assault are relied upon. Unsurprisingly, narrower offence-based definitions

13 P Easteal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
15 The perceived seriousness of an event has been identified as a critical determinant in whether a person reports an incident to the police (seriousness includes such factors as whether the victim had been detained in some way, injured, or threatened, and the relationship with the perpetrator): Ibid, 92–95.
17 D Parkinson, Partner Rape and Rurality (2008), prepared for the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, 18. Parkinson suggests that this may explain the disparity in some surveys between the number of women who disclose sexual assault by a current partner when compared to the number who disclose sexual assault by a former partner. For example, data in Australia Bureau of Statistics, Personal Safety Survey, 4906.0 (2005) show that of women who had experienced violence since the age of 15, 2.1% reported sexual violence by a current partner, compared to 21.7% by a previous partner: D Parkinson, Partner Rape and Rurality (2008), prepared for the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, 18, 133.
18 D Parkinson, Partner Rape and Rurality (2008), prepared for the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, 18.
tend to result in lower levels of sexual violence being recorded.\textsuperscript{20} Under-reporting, and under-estimates of prevalence, may also be caused by the mode of survey delivery. For example, surveys conducted via the telephone may mean that certain groups of women, particularly those who are more vulnerable to violence,\textsuperscript{21} may not be captured in the survey.\textsuperscript{22} Some survey instruments may be better designed to enhance disclosure, for example, through the use of multiple opportunities for disclosure, or open-ended questions that allow participants to talk about experiences that might not neatly fit within the categories set by survey questions.\textsuperscript{23} Other methodological variations include whether interpreters are available to assist in the administration of the survey, whether the criteria for inclusion are age-specific and so on. Results also vary depending on participants’ perceptions of whether certain conduct constitutes sexual violence or a crime.\textsuperscript{24}

\textbf{24.20} There is general agreement that, given these methodological problems (and direct evidence of under-reporting of sexual assault), the available survey data are likely to underestimate the incidence and prevalence of sexual violence.

\textbf{24.21} Understanding that sexual assault is under-reported is crucial background when considering the response of the criminal justice system. The vast majority of incidents of sexual assault do not come to the attention of the legal system. The problem is exacerbated in the family violence context. Therefore, an important part of the law reform focus should be on measures that might promote reporting and challenge community attitudes to sexual assault that continue to reinforce its invisibility.\textsuperscript{25}

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{20} See Australian Bureau of Statistics, \textit{Sexual Assault in Australia: A Statistical Overview} (2004), 16.
\item \textsuperscript{21} For example, those with unstable housing, Indigenous women particularly those living in rural and remote areas, women with limited or no English, women in custody, young women, or women in group homes or in institutional care.
\item \textsuperscript{22} National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, \textit{Time for Action: The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021} (2009), 15.
\item \textsuperscript{25} See similar discussion in Victorian Law Reform Commission, \textit{Sexual Offences: Discussion Paper} (2001), [1.11].
\end{itemize}
A snapshot of sexual violence

24.22 This section presents a snapshot of the statistics available about the experience of sexual assault and sexual violence in Australia. Where possible, statistics on sexual assault within the family violence context are highlighted.

24.23 Sexual violence is strongly gendered with many more women reported as experiencing sexual violence than men.26 When women and children are sexually assaulted, the perpetrator is likely to be someone well known to them, a current or former partner or family member.27 While all women and children may be at risk of sexual violence, some are more vulnerable than others, including young women, Indigenous women, women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds (CALD), and women with disabilities.

Children

24.24 There are limited available data about the extent of sexual violence against children. Available data come from crime statistics or child protection notifications. In 2003, it was estimated that 187 per 100,000 children aged 0–14 years were victims of sexual abuse.28 Rates of sexual assault were higher for children aged 10–14 and ‘three-quarters of reported victims were girls’.29

There are no national data on how rates of reported physical and sexual assault vary across population groups. There is limited evidence suggesting that child sexual assault is more prevalent in rural and remote areas than in urban areas and is associated with social disadvantage. Information available from New South Wales and the AIHW National Child Protection Data Collection indicates that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children are over-represented among victims of physical and sexual assault.30

24.25 By way of example, the Little Children Are Sacred report identified child sexual abuse as a significant issue for most of the remote Indigenous communities in the Northern Territory. While the report was not able to accurately estimate prevalence, it found that child sexual abuse involves both female and male victims; is committed by non-Aboriginal and Aboriginal males of all ages; has led to inter-generational cycles of offending; and occurs across urban and remote communities and in various circumstances.31

27 See Ibid, Table 19 in relation to women.
29 Ibid.
30 Ibid.
Young women

24.26 Young women are overrepresented as victims of sexual assault. The Australian component of the IVAWS found that younger women (aged 18–24) were more likely than other women to have reported experiencing sexual violence in the 12 months prior to the survey. In a study on non-reporting and the hidden reporting of sexual assault, it was noted that women in the ‘15–19 age group report the highest rates of sexual assault, at 495 per 100,000 compared to the total rate for all females of 139 per 100,000’. An over-representation of young women as victims of sexual violence was found in the ABS Personal Safety Survey—30.7% of women who reported sexual violence in the 12 months prior to the survey were aged 18–24, and a further 29.8% were aged 25–34.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women

24.27 Various surveys and police statistics generally confirm higher rates of sexual violence committed against Indigenous women compared to the non-Indigenous population:

- the Australian component of the IVAWS found that Indigenous women reported experiencing higher levels of all kinds of violence, with three times as many Indigenous women compared to non-Indigenous women reporting sexual violence in the 12 months prior to the survey.
- crime statistics recorded in 2008 found that the Indigenous victimisation rate for sexual assaults in NSW was nearly 3.5 times the rate for the non-Indigenous population. In South Australia and the Northern Territory the victimisation rate was over three times that for the non-Indigenous population.
- A NSW study on Aboriginal women in prison found that over three quarters had experienced child sexual assault, just under half had been sexually assaulted as adults, and almost 80% had experienced family violence.

---

35 J Mouzos and T Makkai, Women’s Experiences of Male Violence: Findings of the Australian Component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (2004), 29. Note that Mouzos and Makkai emphasise that these result should be viewed with caution due to the high relative standard error: 30.
36 Australian Bureau of Statistics, Recorded Crime: Victims, Catalogue No 4510.0 (2008), 22. The ABS only reported on Indigenous victimisation for NSW, South Australia and the Northern Territory. It did not report on Indigenous victimisation for other jurisdictions given limitations in the quality of the data: 22. This ABS publication reports on selected offences recorded by the police for the 2008 calendar year: 53.
Women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds

24.28 There is limited information available on the prevalence of sexual violence against women from CALD backgrounds. Not all surveys have adopted measures to assist in eliciting information from CALD women, and even when they have, there may be other limitations with the data.39

24.29 The Australian component of the IVAWS found that women from a non-English speaking background and English-speaking women reported similar levels of sexual violence in the preceding 12 months. While noting the difficulty in “quantifying the level of violence experienced by women from minority populations compared to women from the general population”40 the IVAWS found English-speaking women reported higher levels of all types of violence over their lifetimes.

24.30 The IVAWS also recognised the likely impact on survey results of factors which influence perceptions and understandings about what constitutes violence, and significant barriers to discussing and reporting violence.41 For example, there is variation in the extent to which women have knowledge about the law, ability to access the Australian legal system, willingness to engage with the police and other institutional actors, and knowledge about what unwanted sexual acts are against the law (for example, whether rape in marriage is illegal).42

24.31 It is important to recognise, however, that the CALD community is not a homogenous group, and includes women from a wide range of different backgrounds and experiences and varying English-language skills.

Women with disabilities

24.32 Many studies have documented the increased vulnerability to physical and sexual violence of people with disabilities. As with other groups of women, there is a dearth of statistics that document the extent of sexual violence. This is in part linked to the failure of existing data collection surveys and service providers, including the police, to ‘identify the disability status of participants’.43 However, one study has found that 90% of women with intellectual disabilities have been sexually abused; and 68% of women with an intellectual disability will be subjected to sexual abuse before they reach 18 years of age.44 This prevalence is consistent with overseas studies.45

39 See discussion in A Neame and M Heenan, What Lies Behind the Hidden Figure of Sexual Assault: Issues of Prevalence and Disclosure, Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Briefing (September 2003).
41 Ibid, 32. See discussion in A Neame and M Heenan, What Lies Behind the Hidden Figure of Sexual Assault: Issues of Prevalence and Disclosure, Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Briefing (September 2003).
43 S Murray and A Powell, Sexual Assault and Adults with a Disability: Enabling Recognition, Disclosure and a Just Response (2008), prepared for the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, 3.
Sexual assault in the family violence context

24.33 The important features of sexual assault in a family violence context include: multiple forms of sexual violence; a likelihood of repetition; and the fact that sexual violence is likely to be accompanied by other forms of violence.

Multiple forms of sexual violence

24.34 While this Inquiry is primarily concerned with sexual acts that are against the law, a range of unwanted or coercive sexual acts are experienced by many women and children in the context of their relationships. Recognising the broader range is contextually important to understanding women’s and children’s experiences of sexual violence—and family violence more generally.

24.35 The findings of the Australian component of the IVAWS emphasise the importance of acknowledging this context. The ‘most frequent type of sexual violence reported’ by women who participated in that survey was ‘unwanted sexual touching’. However, ‘few women reported experiencing attempted forced sexual intercourse or actual forced sexual intercourse’ over the same period.

24.36 The ABS Personal Safety Survey also documented the range of unwanted sexual experiences of men and women. 32.5% of women reported that since they were aged 15, they had experienced inappropriate comments about their body or sex life, compared to only 11.7% of men. In addition, just over a quarter of women reported that they had experienced unwanted sexual touching, compared to 9.9% of men.

24.37 Research has found that some women who experience family violence may also be subject to indecent assaults or unwanted touching. They may be exposed to pornography, have sexually explicit photographs taken without their permission, be subjected to degrading comments about their sexuality or sexual performance, or called sexually demeaning names. They may be constantly questioned about sexual activities with other people and placed under surveillance, or forced to engage in sexual activity without the protection of a condom.

Repetition of sexual violence

24.38 It is also important to recognise the extent to which sexual violence perpetrated in a family violence context is repeated and that this has ‘cumulative impacts’. Unlike stranger sexual assault, which is far more likely to be a single incident, sexual violence within a relationship is likely to be repeated given the ongoing nature of the relationship and the opportunity this provides for continued perpetration.\textsuperscript{51} For victims who are unable to escape such violence, the prospects of self-criticism and acquiescence are enhanced, as is the ‘normalisation’ of such conduct.

45 Ibid.

24.39 In a recent New Zealand study on pathways to recovery from sexual assault, over two thirds\textsuperscript{52} of the participants who had been sexually assaulted by a current or former intimate partner or family or whānau (extended family) member,\textsuperscript{53} reported that they had been sexually assaulted by that person before. The experience of repeat sexual assaults was highest for those reporting sexual assault by a former intimate partner (80%), followed by assaults by a current intimate partner (69%) and a family or whānau member (60%).\textsuperscript{54}

24.40 In this Inquiry, family violence services noted their experience that sexual violence and sexual assaults occur frequently in the context of intimate partner relationships and some women report repeated experience of sexual violence and sexual assault throughout their relationships.\textsuperscript{55}

Coexistence with other forms of violence and abuse

24.41 Various research reports and studies have documented the extent to which women and children experience multiple forms of violence in a family violence context.\textsuperscript{56} The World Health Organisation in its multi-country study on domestic violence and women’s health found ‘substantial overlap’ between the experience of physical violence and sexual violence by an intimate partner:

> In all sites, more than half of the women who reported partner violence reported either physical violence only or physical violence accompanied by sexual violence. In most sites between 30% and 56% of women who had ever experienced any violence, reported both physical and sexual violence.\(^{57}\)

\textsuperscript{52} 22 out of 33 participants.

\textsuperscript{53} V Kingi and J Jordan, Responding to Sexual Violence: Pathways to Recovery (2009), prepared for the Ministry of Women’s Affairs (NZ), 48. 59% of the people in this study indicated that they had been sexually assaulted in a family violence context (ie, by a current/former intimate partner or by a family/whānau member). Only 8% were described as stranger assaults.

Indigenous communities

24.42 The National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women and Children (the National Council) report, Time for Action, emphasised that there is no ‘one-size fits all approach’ to the problem of family violence against women and children; and acknowledged that different responses are needed for a range of vulnerable groups, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.\(^{58}\)

24.43 Family violence, encompassing sexual violence and assault and child sexual abuse, involving Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, has been the subject of much attention over the past decade.

24.44 Numerous reports have discussed the context and impact of sexual violence and documented potential approaches to understanding and countering its impact on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.\(^{59}\) The literature and reports which consider the interface between Indigenous family violence, child abuse and the criminal law,\(^{60}\) focus on enhanced service delivery and exploring approaches that ‘attend to needs of all members of the community’.\(^{61}\) However, as discussed above, inconsistent reporting and collection of information means there is a lack of comprehensive data in relation to the experience of family violence by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children.\(^{62}\)

24.45 It is clear that sexual violence affects Indigenous communities disproportionately. In essence, ‘sexual violence in Indigenous communities occurs at rates that far exceed those for non-Indigenous Australians’\(^{63}\) and is ‘reported to be at

---

62 Barriers to reporting sexual assault are discussed in Ch 26.

24. Sexual Assault and Family Violence

However, the lack of reliable data, including in relation to the effectiveness of measures introduced to reduce violence, hampers understandings about how to prevent and address such violence.\(^{65}\)

24.46 In preventing and addressing family violence, the importance of an historically and culturally-sensitive understanding of the causes and nature of Indigenous family violence, and the specific interactions between Indigenous people and the legal system cannot be underestimated.

24.47 Dr Kylie Cripps and Hannah McGlade consider that the causes of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander family violence are ‘a multitude of inter-related factors’ which can usefully be understood by categorising them into two groups:

- Group 1 factors include colonisation: policies and practices; dispossession and cultural dislocation; and dislocation of families through removal. Group 2 factors include: marginalisation as a minority; direct and indirect racism; unemployment; welfare dependency; past history of abuse; poverty; destructive coping behaviours; addictions; health and mental health issues; and low self-esteem and a sense of powerlessness.\(^{66}\)

24.48 There are two key access to justice issues for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children: first, a number of barriers impede access to assistance; secondly, services do not adequately recognise and respond to Indigenous experiences of family violence. A more nuanced understanding of family violence in Indigenous communities requires recognition of:

- the cumulative effects of ‘poor health, alcohol, drug abuse, gambling, pornography, unemployment, poor education and housing and general disempowerment [which] lead inexorably to family and other violence and then on to sexual abuse...’;\(^{67}\)

- the endemic and intergenerational nature and ‘normalisation’ of violence;

- the impact of Indigenous concepts of family and community, including a culture of blame being shifted to victims and associated pressure or retribution for reporting violence or pursuing legal avenues of redress;

\(^{64}\) M Keel, Family Violence and Sexual Assault in Indigenous Communities: 'Walking the Talk'(2004), 1.

\(^{67}\) Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse, Little Children are Sacred: Report of the Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse (2007), 6.
Indigenous peoples’ relationship with police, government agencies and courts, including a ‘belief that both authorities and mainstream sexual assault services will not respond appropriately’;

• cultural, systemic and institutional barriers faced by Indigenous people in seeking assistance; and

• the importance of framing family violence in a human rights context, in particular to ensure that violence against Indigenous women and children cannot be minimised by reference to cultural practices or arguments which supposedly condone violence.

Above all, it is important to recognise that neither Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children nor their experiences are the same, and to acknowledge the ‘diversity of peoples within and across Indigenous communities’; the variation ‘between communities in their current situation in terms of violence’, and the need to address the issues in a holistic way, if any real outcomes are to be achieved.

In addition, tensions may exist between mainstream approaches and those of Indigenous women and communities to understanding and responding to violence. Mainstream approaches are said to have ‘relied more heavily on feminist analyses of violence’ and Indigenous community members have consistently criticised [the approach to violence that largely criminalises violence and relies on the institutionalisation of the offender to protect the victim] as being irrelevant, discriminatory and a repeat of the kinds of violence inherent in policies and practices of colonisation. Indigenous experiences with these approaches have found them to be disempowering and processes by which methods of power and control can be reinforced.

In this part of the Report, the Commissions have recognised the particular experiences and needs of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander victims of sexual assault in a family violence context in developing their recommendations for reform.

---

69  Barriers faced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women in reporting family violence and sexual assault are discussed in Ch 26.

History of activism and legal change

24.52 This section briefly canvasses the last three decades of legislative and procedural change to improve responses to sexual offences, increase reporting and to reduce the negative experience of complainants in sexual assault proceedings. The changes made to the law and procedures have variously been intended to take greater account of the realities of rape and sexual abuse, to make the trial process less daunting for complainants and to encourage a higher proportion of victims of sexual assault to report these crimes to the police.74

24.53 Since the 1970s there has been considerable change to the law relating to sexual offences across Australia, as has been the case in many other countries—parallel to a move towards the introduction of family violence legislation and protection order regimes.75 In relation to sexual assault reforms, these developments were brought about by a number of factors including: growing community awareness about the extent of sexual violence and the manner in which complainants were historically treated by the legal system; the growth and activism of the women’s movement in this area;76 and growing awareness about the particular problems faced by child sexual assault complainants in the legal system.77

Historical approaches to sexual violence

24.54 Feminist research and advocacy from the 1970s argued that the law addressed sexual assault in discriminatory ways, including the way in which it viewed and assessed women and children as complainants. This work drew attention to a range of myths and misconceptions that underpinned the approach of not only the laws on sexual assault, but the approaches of key legal players (police, prosecutors, defence lawyers and judicial officers). This work highlighted the way in which the law in this area has largely been defined and implemented by men and presents particular historical ideas about women, children, men, sexual violence, and sexual relationships more generally.

Myths and misconceptions

24.55 A range of myths and misconceptions about women, children and sexual assault have underpinned the legal and evidential rules in sexual assault proceedings. They have been the subject of extensive commentary in the literature and of considerable law reform in order to counter their resilience. Key myths and misconceptions (frequently inter-related) include the following.

---

75 See Ch 4.
That women and children are inherently unreliable and lie about sexual assault

24.56 The idea that women and children are inherently unreliable and lie about sexual assault focuses on the ‘untrustworthiness’ of women and children generally, particularly when they complain about sexual assault. 78 It is clearly demonstrated in the emphasis on corroboration of women’s and children’s evidence in sexual assault trials. While corroboration is no longer required, remnants of this myth can be discerned in various common law directions to the jury that remain in currency despite successive restrictions in legislation around Australia. Judicial warnings are discussed in detail in Chapter 28.

That the accusation of rape is easily made, but difficult to challenge

24.57 This view is clearly reflected in the oft-quoted assertion by the 17th century English jurist Sir Matthew Hale that ‘rape is an accusation easily to be made, hard to be proved, and harder yet to be defended by the party accused, tho’ never so innocent’. 79 The belief is connected with the emphasis on corroboration and ideas about what a ‘real’ rape looks like. 80 It is a powerful notion not only in positioning women and children as potential liars, but feeds into other conceptions of particular women as vindictive or vengeful—for example, a woman who makes allegations against a former spouse might be characterised in this way; and wanting to hide their sexual behaviour—the suggestion that some young women, in order to hide their sexual activities from their parents, ‘cry rape’. 81 It is one basis for the ever present concern about ‘false’ allegations.

That sexual assault is most likely to be committed by a stranger

24.58 Most sexual assaults are actually perpetrated by someone known to the victim and often known very closely. This fact conflicts with popular ideas of who is a rapist, and who is a ‘real victim’. This myth connects with a range of other myths—for example, the assumption that victims of rape report without delay, while this may be a more complex process of recognition and decision for those who are raped by an intimate partner or family member.

79 As quoted in L Schafran, S Lopez-Boy and M Davis, Making Marital Rape a Crime: A Long Road Travelled, A Long Way to Go (2009), prepared for the Washington Coalition of Sexual Assault Programs, 15.
80 ‘Real rape’ is rape perpetrated by a stranger in a dark alley against a ‘good’ woman, as opposed to ‘not real’ rape where the women is assaulted by someone she knows in circumstances where there are questions about her behaviour, eg, in terms of sexual experience and drug and alcohol use: see S Estrich, ‘Rape’ (1986) 95 Yale Law Journal 1087, 1088. The VLRC drew a distinction between the ‘classic’ rape scenario and its reality: Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Discussion Paper (2001), [3.15].
24. Sexual Assault and Family Violence

That women cannot be sexually assaulted by their spouse

24.59 This was the situation under common law—although significantly not the reality for many women—until the 1980s, when all Australian jurisdictions amended their law. Prior to this time it was generally not possible for a man to be charged with, and prosecuted for, raping his wife or, in some cases, de facto partner. The marital rape immunity was based on historical notions that women became men’s property on marriage, and that through marriage women consent, on a continuing basis, to sex with their spouse. It is the articulation of this notion by Sir Matthew Hale that is most often quoted:

[T]he husband cannot be guilty of rape committed by himself upon his lawful wife, for by their mutual matrimonial consent and contract the wife hath given up herself in this kind unto her husband, which she cannot retract.

24.60 While this no longer holds true in the law across Australia, and in numerous overseas jurisdictions, it continues to hold some sway in community understandings about what is sexual assault. This influences the extent to which these cases continue to be less likely to be reported, prosecuted and result in conviction.

That some sexual assaults are more serious and damaging than others

24.61 Earlier studies revealed disparities in sentencing sexual assault offenders depending on their relationship to the victim—with spousal rapes traditionally being seen as less serious than stranger sexual assault—and the characteristics of the victim, with sexual assaults of sex workers, for example, either being seen as ‘not possible’ or less serious, given that the provision of sex is part of her occupation.

That non-consent is verbally articulated, evidenced by struggle and results in physical injuries

24.62 Many people still believe that a ‘true’ sexual assault involves the use of physical violence and that there will be physical injuries that provide independent verification of the complainant’s story. Research, however, indicates that very few cases of sexual assault and/or rape have such physical evidence. The 1996 ABS Women’s Safety Survey found that only 26% of women who had been sexually assaulted since the age

---

82 There were exceptions to this general approach: P Eastel, ‘Rape in Marriage: Has the Licence Lapsed?’ in P Eastel (ed) Balancing the Scales: Rape, Law Reform and Australian Culture (1998) 107, 111.
84 For a brief discussion of the different treatment of marital rape and the removal of this defence in various US jurisdictions see L Schafran, S Lopez-Boy and M Davis, Making Marital Rape a Crime: A Long Road Travelled, A Long Way to Go (2009), prepared for the Washington Coalition of Sexual Assault Programs, 12–13.
85 N Taylor and J Putt, Adult Sexual Violence in Indigenous and Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Communities in Australia (2007), 2–3 found that some CALD women do not know that rape by their spouse is against the law in Australia.
86 See discussion in R Graycar and J Morgan, The Hidden Gender of Law (2nd ed, 2002), 345–348.
of 15 had sustained physical injuries.\(^{88}\) It is worth reflecting here on the other ‘injuries’ and impacts sustained by women who have been sexually assaulted, including ongoing psychological impacts, fear, guilt, shame and depression.\(^{89}\) Contrary to what many may assume, women who are raped by their partner may be more likely to sustain serious injuries than those raped by a stranger.\(^{90}\) Considerable legislative change in the definition of consent and in directions to the jury, specifically seek to counter ideas about silence and the absence of physical struggle.

That a ‘true’ or ‘genuine’ victim of sexual assault does not delay in reporting

24.63 Many people still think that a person who has been sexually assaulted would report without delay, and that the failure to do so is suggestive of fabrication. Again this connects to the dominant idea that women and children lie about sexual assault. Given what is known about the fact that so few acts of sexual assault are reported in the first place, the resilience of this myth as an indicator of truth stands counter to the evidence. Despite legislation that requires a judge to explain to the jury that there may be ‘good reasons’ why a victim of sexual assault may delay in reporting to the police,\(^{91}\) women and children can still expect to be cross-examined at length on this point.

24.64 There are other myths and misconceptions, including that men have uncontrollable sexual urges,\(^{92}\) and related to this, that women have a responsibility to monitor and curtail their own behaviour (dress, intoxication, flirtation) in order to avoid sexual assault.

24.65 The various myths and misconceptions about sexual violence, women and children, have been challenged and addressed over time. There remain ongoing connections, however, between these historical notions demonstrated in prevailing community attitudes and in the application of the law in some instances, which is a key focus of this Inquiry. These connections are raised where appropriate in Chapters 25 to 28.

The nature of sexual offences

24.66 Research on legal responses to sexual assault highlights the unique features of these offences and their treatment by the legal system. These features include: the nature of the crime for the victim, the nature of the crime in terms of the elements that need to be proved and what this means for the content of the evidence that has to be elicited from the victim, the focus on credibility, the focus on consent in adult sexual assault matters, the length and nature of cross-examination, and the likelihood that there is some close relationship between the complainant and the victim (as current or former intimate partners or family members).

---

\(^{91}\) See, eg, Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(1)(b). See Ch 28 on jury warnings.

\(^{92}\) While much of the mythology in this area is in the form of negative perceptions of women it is worth reflecting on this rather narrow negative perception of men and their sexuality. As Heath notes, some of the traditional ideas about rape and marriage leave ‘little room for male sexualities that are respectful rather than possessory, and little space for female sexualities that are autonomous rather than submissive, there-to-be-possessed’: M Heath, ‘Disputed Truths: Australian Reform of the Sexual Conduct Elements of Common Law Rape’ in P Eastesal (ed) Balancing the Scales: Rape, Law Reform and Australian Culture (1998) 13, 16.

24.67 Two key empirical studies published in the mid-1990s highlighted the traumatic experience of the sexual assault trial, particularly for adult women victims. In 2003, the Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) commented:

During the late 1980s and early 1990s substantial reforms were made to procedure and evidence in sexual offence cases. The outcomes of our research and consultations suggest that these reforms have had limited success in improving the experience of complainants in sexual offence cases.

24.68 In fact, the experience of the sexual assault trial has often been characterised by victims as being a re-traumatising experience, and in some instances like being sexually assaulted again. One focus of the Commissions’ work is to examine to what extent changes made since those landmark reports have served to address and limit that traumatic experience.

The ‘nature of the crime’ for the victim

24.69 There are particular dimensions of sexual offences that distinguish victims’ experiences from those of other victims of crime. These dimensions are linked to the relationship between the victim and the offender, the nature of the harm and its longstanding impact:

The crime experienced by sexual violence victims is more than an assault. The sexual nature of the act adds an additional and highly complex dimension ... not only is the victim assaulted, but the private and protected physical and psychological boundaries of the person are intrusively invaded ...

The very nature of crime evokes certain emotions in all victims ... The crime of sexual violence is no exception ... the sexual violence victim is often confronted with a range of additional feelings resulting from the social stigma and physical invasiveness of the incident. These feelings can include shame, guilt, embarrassment, confusion, feeling dirty and used. Feelings of self-blame and self-recrimination are particularly common among sexual violence victims.

95 Ibid.
Consent and credibility

24.70 The vast majority of adult sexual offence cases rest on the issue of consent. More often than not, there is no physical evidence of the assault or witnesses to the assault. Therefore, the focus of the trial is on the competing evidence of the complainant and the defendant about whether the sexual activity was consensual. The Rape Law Reform Evaluation Project (RLREP) conducted in Victoria found that in 30% of rape trials conducted in 1992–93, the defendant’s main argument was that the complainant had consented to the sexual intercourse. In a further 23% the ‘main line of defence was either that the accused believed the complainant had consented, or a defence which involved a combination of consent and the accused’s belief that the complainant consented’.97

24.71 The focus on consent, and the way in which consent is constructed in law, have been the subject of considerable criticism. It is seen as the key way in which the focus of the trial is placed on the complainant, her actions and behaviour—rather than on the behaviour of the accused. The focus on consent, therefore, is inextricably linked to the focus on credibility, where women and children—particularly when they raise allegations about sexual violence—have generally been seen as less credible.

24.72 In both adult and child sexual assault cases the key aim of defence questioning is to challenge and undermine the credibility of the complainant. For adult complainants this is intertwined with the issue of whether the activity was consensual. For children (as well as for adults) it is about whether their evidence can be believed.

Elements of the offence

24.73 In sexual offence proceedings, a complainant may be required to discuss elements of the offence, such as penetration or other genital or anal contact—in explicit detail and on multiple occasions. As noted by the New South Wales Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC), giving this type of intimate and graphic evidence can be very ‘humiliating and distressing’ for all victims of sexual assault, and may be particularly difficult for ‘women who are from different cultural backgrounds in which such matters are not conventionally discussed in front of men’.98 Such discussions are, of course, especially disturbing and traumatic for children giving evidence of their experience.

Cross-examination

24.74 In addition to having to discuss in detail the elements of the offence in evidence-in-chief and in cross-examination, there is the experience of cross-examination itself. As one of the key strategies of the defence is to challenge the credibility of the complainant, cross-examination may take on particularly personal dimensions that may not be seen in other criminal proceedings. Research has found that, on average, cross-

98 New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Questioning of Complainants by Unrepresented Accused in Sexual Offence Trials, Report No 101 (2003), [2.5].
24. Sexual Assault and Family Violence

Balancing rights?

24.75 Possible changes to the law and procedure relating to sexual assault invariably raise questions and concerns about the need to balance the rights of the accused and the rights of the complainant. It is important to recognise that these are not necessarily rights in contest (although they are commonly positioned this way), but rather they both occupy important, related positions in the administration of the criminal justice system.

24.76 The VLRC in its sexual offences report articulated these positions as follows:

The criminal justice system must be, and be seen to be, fair to the accused. People accused of sexual offences are entitled to the presumption of innocence. Conviction for a sexual offence has very serious consequences for an accused, which may include a lengthy prison sentence and life-long stigma. It is vital to ensure that any conviction is based on reliable evidence.

However, the criminal justice system must also take account of the needs of complainants who have a direct interest in the outcome of the prosecution, and of the community interest in encouraging people to report alleged offences and in convicting perpetrators. Current deficiencies in the system contribute to substantial under-reporting of sexual offences and discourage people who allege they have been assaulted from giving evidence at committal or trial. Criminal procedures that discourage reporting or which stigmatise and traumatises witnesses in sexual assault cases may result in some offenders escaping apprehension, which may put more members of the community at risk.

24.77 In the present Inquiry, the Commissions are similarly mindful of the rights of the accused, and the rights of the complainant, in discussing possible changes to the law and procedure relating to sexual offences. The Commissions recognise the very serious consequences of being charged with a sexual offence for an accused, and the need to be able to effectively test the evidence that is presented in the case against the accused.

24.78 The ‘rights of the accused’, in essence, entail that they are not to be convicted except following the conduct of a fair trial according to the law. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) provides some further detail about elements of a fair trial.

---

101 Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Final Report (2004), [1.9]–[1.10].
102 See Dietrich v The Queen (1992) 177 CLR 292, 299–300.
103 Including: the presumption of innocence, guilt determined according to law, adequate time to prepare defence and brief lawyer of own choosing, being brought to trial in a timely manner, being tried in his or her presence, having access to an interpreter if required and being able to effectively test the evidence presented against him or her: International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 16 December 1966, [1980] ATS 23, (entered into force generally on 23 March 1976), art 14. See Ch 2.
24.79 The concept of a fair trial has not historically incorporated the rights of the complainant—instead the focus is on the Crown acting on behalf of the community.

However, the experience and role of victims in the criminal justice system has changed in recent times with greater recognition of the rights of victims, as evidenced by various charters of victims’ rights, and in the reception of victim impact statements in some jurisdictions. Rights to protection by the law and its processes are also articulated in various international conventions and declarations to which Australia is a party.

24.80 The ‘rights of the accused’ are frequently raised as a powerful rhetorical tool to limit possible changes in law and procedure which aim to ameliorate some of the more negative experiences for complainants of sexual offence proceedings. Measures that might assist complainants are sometimes opposed by lawyers on the basis of perceived incursions into the rights of the accused without an appreciation of exactly what the measure is, what it is designed to do, and how it operates.

24.81 The focus of reform that aims to reduce the traumatic experience of complainants in sexual offence proceedings should not be misconceived as merely aimed at increasing the rate of conviction (although this is important), but rather at improving the operation of the legal system and its response to serious criminal offences. Reform efforts to date have focused on challenging the myths that have underpinned the law’s responses to sexual assault and arguably continue to resonate with some current practices and attitudes. Such myths bear no relationship to reality and hence do not concern the accused and the right to a fair trial, but rather foster implicit prejudices to raise ‘doubts’ about the complainant’s credibility generally, and specifically credibility as a ‘true’ victim of sexual assault.

24.82 A good example of this process of interrogating what is a ‘right of the accused’ in a criminal proceeding is provided by recent legislative prohibitions on the accused conducting personal cross-examination of the complainant in sexual offence proceedings. In introducing these measures there was a need to maintain the ‘fundamental rule of natural justice that people on trial for criminal offences have the right to test the evidence against them’ while addressing the ‘highly distressing’ situation of a complainant being cross-examined by their alleged attacker. Law reform bodies that have considered this issue in detail have drawn a clear distinction between the right to test the evidence, and any perceived right to conduct cross-examination in any manner or format.

105 For example, Victims’ Rights Act 1996 (NSW); Victims’ Charter Act 2006 (Vic).
108 See Ch 28.
109 New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Questioning of Complainants by Unrepresented Accused in Sexual Offence Trials, Report No 101 (2003), [1.7].
A related theme can be characterised as the ‘spectre of false complaints’—that is, false complaints of sexual assault are commonly made. The extent of false complaints of sexual assault is difficult to establish. However, the available evidence suggests that it is small. A Victorian study, which analysed 850 rapes reported to the police over the period 2000–03, found that only 2.1% of reports were designated as false by the police. In these cases, the alleged victim was either charged or told that she would be charged unless she dropped the complaint. While this only represents a fraction of the sample, there was a much larger proportion of cases where police were confident, or reasonably confident, that the allegations were false, but there was no attempt to institute charges against the alleged victim.110

Despite these data, concern about lying and fabrication has been a central feature of the sexual assault trial. Research has indicated that many complainants are asked about lying in cross examination. In the Heroines of Fortitude study, for example, 84% of complainants were asked questions about lying, and one complainant was asked 98 questions about lying in cross examination.111 In addition, women are questioned about their motives for reporting, seeking revenge, and whether they made a report simply to access victims’ compensation—one-third of complainants in the Heroines study were asked about this.112

Law reform

The present Inquiry follows an extensive body of work by law reform commissions113 and other government bodies114 on reform of the law and procedure... relating to sexual offences. Since the 1970s, there have been successive rounds of legislative and procedural change across Australian jurisdictions.

Focus of reform

24.86 In relation to the substance of sexual offences, reform has focused, at different times and in different jurisdictions, on the following issues:

- Terminology. Some Australian jurisdictions have moved away from the language of rape to the language of sexual assault.\(^\text{115}\) This was generally seen as a way to move away from the emphasis on sexual elements, to focus instead on sexual assault as an assault—that is, as an act of violence. Other jurisdictions have retained the language of rape.\(^\text{116}\)

- Consent. Since the 1990s there has been a move to define consent in legislation.
All Australian jurisdictions, with the exception of the ACT, now have a legislative definition of consent.\(^\text{117}\) These definitions are based on a communicative model of consent.

- Definition of sexual assault. Definitions of what constitutes a sexual assault have been broadened, so that, for example, penetrative sexual offences includes penetration by a penis, object, part of a body or mouth.\(^\text{118}\)

- Gender neutral laws. All jurisdictions amended the laws relating to sexual assault or rape so that they are gender neutral. Before this, rape had been specifically defined as an offence perpetrated by a man against a woman.\(^\text{119}\)

---

115 In NSW, WA, ACT and NT, the offence of sexual penetration or sexual intercourse without consent is articulated as one of a number of sexual assault offences: see Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61I; Criminal Code (WA) s 325; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 54; Criminal Code (NT) s 192.

116 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 38; Criminal Code (Qld) s 349; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 48; Criminal Code (Tas) s 185. All jurisdictions, whether they call the penetrative offence ‘rape’ or ‘sexual intercourse without consent’, have broadened the offence beyond the common law offence of rape which was penile penetration of a women without her consent (or against her will). There are still debates about what is the best approach and most appropriate language to employ: see discussion in M Heath, ‘Disputed Truths: Australian Reform of the Sexual Conduct Elements of Common Law Rape’ in P Easteal (ed) Balancing the Scales: Rape, Law Reform and Australian Culture (1998) 13, 23–24. Professor Reg Graycar has observed that, while some jurisdictions have done away with the language of rape, the ‘phenomenon that women fear is still [called] rape’: R Graycar, ‘Frozen Chooks Revisited: The Challenge of Changing Law/s’ in R Hunter and M Keyes (eds), Changing Law: Rights, Regulation and Reconciliation (2005) 49, 55. See also discussion in J Bargen and E Fishwick, Sexual Assault Law Reform: A National Perspective (1995), prepared for the Office of the Status of Women, [6.2.2.1].

117 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36; Criminal Code (Qld) s 34R; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1925 (SA) ss 46–47; Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67; Criminal Code (NT) s 192. This issue is discussed in detail in Ch 25.

118 See, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61H(1).

119 A number of commentators thought that the move to gender neutrality might lead to improvements in the way that the law dealt with sexual offences as now men would have a ‘stake in making the law of rape work better’: M Heath, ‘Disputed Truths: Australian Reform of the Sexual Conduct Elements of Common Law Rape’ in P Easteal (ed) Balancing the Scales: Rape, Law Reform and Australian Culture (1998) 13,
• Graded sexual offences. Some jurisdictions introduced graded sexual offences—that is, a range of sexual offences with different penalties attached. This differentiation usually takes account of the presence of physical violence or other aggravating circumstances.\(^\text{120}\) It was an approach again intended to focus on sexual assault as an act of violence.

• Removal of the marital immunity. All jurisdictions legislated to remove the marital immunity.\(^\text{121}\)

• Age of criminal responsibility. With the exception of Tasmania, all jurisdictions removed notions that a person was not capable, simply on the basis of their age, of having or intending to have sexual intercourse.\(^\text{122}\)

24.87 In relation to criminal procedure and evidence law, reform has focused on:

• Evidence of sexual reputation and experience. Legislation was enacted to restrict the cross-examination of complainants and the admission of evidence of complainants’ sexual reputation and prior sexual experience.\(^\text{123}\)

• Protecting counselling communications. Legislation was enacted to protect confidential counselling communications from being disclosed or used in sexual offence proceedings.\(^\text{124}\)

• Jury warnings. Legislation was enacted restricting or providing greater guidance to judicial officers, on warnings to the jury regarding unreliable evidence and corroboration\(^\text{125}\) and the implications of delay in complaint.\(^\text{126}\)

---

120 For a discussion of arguments in favour and those against graded approaches see Heath in P Easteal (ed) Balancing the Scales: Rape, Law Reform and Australian Culture (1998), 22.

121 For express statutory provisions see Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61T; Crimes Act 1935 (SA) s 73(3); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 69. The remaining jurisdictions have removed the immunity by inference.

122 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61S; Crimes Act 1935 (SA) s 73(2); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 68; Criminal Code (Tas) s 18(3).

123 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 339(1); Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) ss 36A, 36B; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34L(1); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(1); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 49; Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 4.

124 Uniform Evidence Acts, s 165B; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34CB.

126 Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) s 164(3); Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 164(3); Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 164(3); Criminal Code (Qld) s 632(2); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 50; Criminal Code (Tas) s 136; Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 164; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) ss 69, 70.
Giving evidence. Legislation was enacted to restrict or provide limits on inappropriate and offensive questioning in cross-examination;\footnote{127} and to enable access to other modes of giving evidence, particularly for children and people with a cognitive impairment.\footnote{128} This has included the use of pre-recorded evidence, the use of closed circuit television or screens and enabling complainants to give evidence accompanied by a support person.\footnote{129}

24.88 At the same time, changes have occurred in relation to police and prosecutorial practices and procedure. For example, as discussed in Chapters 29 to 31, there have been moves towards more specialised and integrated police responses to sexual violence, aimed in part at ensuring that complainants receive appropriate support at the outset from the criminal justice system. In addition, prosecutorial guidelines require the interests of victims to be taken into account in various ways.

Recent work

24.89 A number of important projects and law reform initiatives intended to address continuing concerns with how the criminal justice system responds to allegations of sexual assault have taken place since 2003. These have included the:

- NSW Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce;\footnote{130}
- VLRC sexual offences inquiry;\footnote{131}
- Queensland Crime and Misconduct Commission inquiry into the handling of sexual offences;\footnote{132}
- Western Australian government Inquiry into the Prosecution of Assaults and Sexual Offences;\footnote{133}
- South Australian Review of Rape and Sexual Assault Laws;\footnote{134}
- ACT Sexual Assault Response Program;\footnote{135} and

---

\footnote{127} Uniform Evidence Acts, s 41; Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 21(2); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 26(3); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 41(2); Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 16(2).
\footnote{128} For example, in relation to the use of pre-recorded evidence: Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 368; Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) div 4, 4A; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) ss 106HB, Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 13A; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) div 4.2B, Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 21E.
\footnote{129} These issues of criminal procedure and evidence law are discussed in Chs 27–28.
\footnote{130} Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005).
\footnote{132} Crime and Misconduct Commission (Qld), Seeking Justice: An Inquiry into How Sexual Offences are Handled by the Queensland Criminal Justice System (2003).
\footnote{133} Community Development and Justice Standing Committee–Parliament of Western Australia, Inquiry into the Prosecution of Assaults and Sexual Offences (2008).
\footnote{134} L Chapman, Review of South Australian Rape and Sexual Assault Law: Discussion Paper (2006), prepared for the Government of South Australia.
\footnote{135} Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT) and Australian Federal Police, Responding to Sexual Assault: The Challenge of Change (2005).
• Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Child Abuse.¹³⁶

24.90 Other recent projects and law reform initiatives have examined aspects of evidence law and the giving of jury directions relevant to sexual assault proceedings. These include:

• NSWLRC and Queensland Law Reform Commission inquiries examining jury directions,¹³⁷ and
• the Tasmania Law Reform Institute inquiry examining tendency and coincidence evidence.¹³⁸

24.91 In addition, the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG), through the work of the SCAG National Working Group on Evidence, has been examining aspects of vulnerable witness protection and the sexual assault counselling communications privilege.¹³⁹ The ALRC has been specifically directed not to duplicate this work.¹⁴⁰

Other legal responses

24.92 As noted at the beginning of this chapter, sexual assault does not only appear in the criminal justice system—it is raised in, and may require a response from, a range of different legal areas, sometimes in relation to the same incident. These areas include:

• Protection orders. In most jurisdictions, sexual assault is nominated as one of the forms of violence that may ground an application for a civil protection order.¹⁴¹ Such allegations may be contained in the actual complaint or raised in oral evidence before the court. There is little research available about the extent to which sexual violence is included within protection order proceedings. It has, however, been suggested that sexual violence is rarely referred to expressly in protection order complaints.¹⁴² This has the potential to render this form of violence invisible in these proceedings and, in those cases where it has taken place—but has not been referred to—provides an inadequate picture in which to assess the need for protection. Protection orders and the relationship between protection orders and criminal law proceedings are discussed in Chapter 11.

¹³⁶ Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse, Little Children are Sacred: Report of the Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse (2007).
¹³⁹ See Ch 27.
¹⁴⁰ The Terms of Reference are set out at the front of this Report.
¹⁴¹ The main exception is Western Australia which does not specifically refer to sexual offences under the Criminal Code (WA). Queensland includes ‘indecent behaviour without consent’—which could potentially include a range of unwanted sexual behaviour.
Family law. Sexual violence may be raised in family law proceedings, including in relation to decisions about parenting or property orders. Child protection and the family law system is specifically discussed in Chapter 19. Research suggests that adult sexual assault is rarely raised in family law proceedings.\footnote{L Moloney and others, Allegations of Family Violence and Child Abuse in Family Law Children’s Proceedings: A Pre-reform Exploratory Study (2007), prepared for the Australian Institute of Family Studies, 69, Table 5.3.} It has been suggested that sexual violence may be less visible than other forms of family violence due to the reluctance of lawyers, and other professionals, to ask specifically about sexual violence.\footnote{Women’s Legal Services NSW, Consultation, Sydney, 23 September 2009.} There may be a lack of understanding about how sexual violence is a risk factor in the future seriousness and repetition of family violence and, therefore, how it should be taken into account in any family law determinations. As with civil protection orders, the experience of sexual violence as part of family violence is important in understanding the risk faced by a victim, and in considering the ways in which it might have an impact on determinations about whether and how contact with children should proceed.

Crimes compensation schemes. Compensation for victims of sexual assault may be available through the various state and territory crimes compensation schemes. For example, in NSW, persons injured by an act of violence, including a sexual assault, are eligible for an award of compensation between $7,500 and $50,000.\footnote{Under the Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW).} In recent years there have been changes to criminal injuries compensation schemes, in some jurisdictions, in terms of how family violence and sexual assault are dealt with, and flexibility around the time limits within which applications must be lodged. An area of concern for sexual assault victims is the manner in which related acts are defined and dealt with under the various statutory schemes. This is a particular issue given that family violence, including sexual assault, is the ‘quintessential repeat crime’\footnote{R Felson and A Cares, ‘Gender and Seriousness of Assaults on Intimate Partners and Other Victims’ (2005) 67 Journal of Marriage and the Family 1182, 1183.}. Often these provisions mean that acts perpetrated around the same time, by the same perpetrator, and in similar circumstances, may be treated as related acts—limiting the claim to a single event.\footnote{See, eg, the procedural history in JM v Victims Compensation Fund Corporation [2009] NSWSC.} This issue is discussed in detail in Chapter 29.

Law of torts. The acts comprising sexual assault or family violence also constitute a civil wrong, known as a tort. In particular, the torts of battery, assault and negligence are possible sources of redress for victims of family violence. Bringing an action in tort for assaults and batteries that took place as part of family violence is rare when compared to claims made under the various state and territory compensation schemes. This is because there are a number of barriers that plaintiffs encounter, including: the cost of bringing such an action; the limited prospect of recovery, even if successful; the effect of limitation periods; the difficulty in proving the case, particularly if the events took place... some time ago; and the adversarial nature of these proceedings (particularly when compared to the process available under crimes compensation schemes).\textsuperscript{148}

24.93 In each of these areas questions may be raised about the visibility of sexual assault and whether the response of the legal system is adequate.

Law is not the only response

24.94 The law (criminal and civil) is not the only mechanism available to respond to the problem of sexual assault. A range of legal and non-legal measures is required in order to substantially reduce sexual violence. This need is particularly clear given the very small number of cases that come to the attention of the criminal justice system.

The VLRC recognised this reality, noting that:

> An adequate response to the harm of sexual assault must go beyond the criminal justice process and include other mechanisms for assisting people who have been sexually assaulted such as access to information, provision of counselling and support services ... and compensation.\textsuperscript{149}

24.95 While the Commissions recognise that non-legal measures are vital in developing an appropriately integrated response to sexual assault, the main focus in this part of the Inquiry is on the interpretation and application of criminal law and procedure. In this context it is important to recognise the process of feedback between the legal system and the community. On the one hand, community attitudes inform the legal system’s responses to sexual assault; on the other, the law—how it defines and responds to sexual assault—plays a key symbolic role in forming community perceptions of sexual violence. As such, the law is a critical mechanism through which understandings of appropriate sexual relationships—based on notions of autonomy and freedom of choice—can be fostered.

The implementation gap

24.96 Despite extensive changes to law and procedure, research continues to highlight a gap between written law and its practice—referred to as an ‘implementation gap’. This gap highlights the resistance to change evident in the legal system through its legal players who may still hold views about sexual assault characterised by myths and misconceptions. Some commentators question the over-reliance on, or confidence in, legislative change alone to bring about substantive changes for women and children as complainants in sexual offences.\textsuperscript{150}

\textsuperscript{148} Notwithstanding such difficulties, women have successfully brought such actions for physical and sexual abuse perpetrated as part of family violence. See, eg, Morris v Karunarathne [2009] NSWDC; Giller v Procopets (2008) 40 Fam LR 378; Varmedja v Varmedja [2008] NSWCA.

24.97 The VLRC reflected on this problem in its report on sexual offences, noting that:

The changes to procedure and evidence laws which are recommended in this Report are unlikely to be effective unless they are also accompanied by changes to the culture of the criminal justice system.151

24.98 The likely continued disjunction between the purpose and intention of legislation and its application in practice without extensive cultural change needs to be borne in mind.

24.99 The disjunction is not confined to Australia. Commentators in other countries have also noted the limits of focusing on changes to legislation alone to bring about substantive change to sexual assault trials, the experience of complainants in those trials, the rates of conviction and acquittal, and the need instead to focus on attitudinal and cultural change.152 Cultural change requires general community education, education of police officers, lawyers and judicial officers, as well as changes to policies and procedures.

24.100 Time for Action noted that ‘enhanced community awareness and education programs are needed to change violence-supportive attitudes’.153 The report recommended a range of measures to strengthen community leadership, awareness and understanding of sexual assault and family violence; and to promote positive male behaviours.154

24.101 Community attitudes also determine the legal system’s response to sexual assault complaints. The key players in the legal system—police, lawyers, judicial officers, jury members—are also members of the general community (as are journalists), frequently sharing the same attitudes and beliefs about sexual assault, who perpetrates it, and who can be a victim. While there has been great progress in community attitudes about violence against women—including sexual assault—there are still a number of resilient myths in currency.

24.102 If key legal players also subscribe to some of these community attitudes and myths, the implementation of reform is hampered.155 For example, one stakeholder referred to the difficulties in challenging the ‘dominant’ culture of the legal profession with its ‘emphasis upon the rights of the accused’ and asked

---

154 Ibid, 50–51.
155 In its final report the VLRC noted that some police ‘are influenced by common myths surrounding sexual assault and the behaviour of victims’: Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Final Report (2004), xxii.
how do you open up the psyche of a judge, immersed within the culture of legal professionals, who remains immovable in a personal opinion and outdated knowledge that influences their professional judgments and then remains unaccountable for reprehensible decisions that are being made right now? \(^{156}\)

24.103 Time for Action included recommendations intended to ensure that judicial officers, law enforcement personnel and other professionals within the legal system have appropriate knowledge and expertise. These included the development and implementation of:

- a national education and professional development framework that recognises the specific roles and functions of police; prosecutors; defence counsel; family and migration lawyers; legal advisers; court staff and the judiciary. \(^{157}\)

Judicial and legal education

24.104 The National Council also recommended the production of a model Bench Book, in consultation with jurisdictions, and as part of a national professional development program for judicial officers on sexual assault and family violence. This Bench Book would ‘provide a social context analysis and case law to complement existing resources and enhance the application of the law.’ \(^{158}\) Specialist sexual assault bench books have been developed by the Judicial Commission of New South Wales \(^{159}\) and the Judicial College of Victoria. \(^{160}\)

24.105 The need for judicial education in relation to dealing with sexual assault cases is highlighted in different contexts in the following chapters. For example, judicial and practitioner education on the ‘nature of sexual assault, including the context in which sexual offences typically occur, and the emotional, psychological and social impact of sexual assault’ \(^{161}\) may be needed in relation to decisions about jury warnings on the effect of delay on the credibility of complainants. Similarly, there may be a need for guidance on expert opinion about children’s responses to sexual abuse and their reliability as witnesses; and the admission of evidence about a complainant’s prior sexual activity. \(^{162}\) In Chapters 26 to 28, the Commissions make a number of recommendations for the development and provision of education and training in relation to the response of the criminal justice system to sexual assault. In Chapter 31 the Commissions recommend the development of a national bench book for judicial officers dealing with family violence and sexual assault.

---

\(^{158}\) Ibid.

\(^{162}\) See Ch 27.
24.106 More generally, the need for a ‘common knowledge base’ of family violence has been identified by the Family Law Council.163 For this purpose, the Council has recommended that an expert panel be established that “considers research, distils accepted opinions, and agrees on information that should be included in the common knowledge base”.164 Such a centralisation of information attached to a specific judicial education or other body (such as the Australian Institute of Family Studies) could support consistency and improved legal responses. Judicial officers, prosecutors, defence lawyers, police and others involved in the criminal justice response to sexual assault in the family violence context might all be better informed.

164 Ibid, 38.
Contents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>1129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Overview of sexual offences</td>
<td>1130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legislative framework</td>
<td>1130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>‘Rape’: the penetrative sexual offence</td>
<td>1130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commissions’ views</td>
<td>1135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sexual offences against children and young people</td>
<td>1136</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Persistent sexual abuse of a child</td>
<td>1142</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sexual offences against people with cognitive impairment</td>
<td>1146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Consent</td>
<td>1147</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Statutory definition of consent</td>
<td>1147</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Circumstances where consent is vitiated</td>
<td>1150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The fault element</td>
<td>1158</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commissions’ views</td>
<td>1168</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jury directions about consent</td>
<td>1170</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Guiding principles and objects clauses</td>
<td>1176</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Introduction

25.1 This chapter outlines the legal framework of sexual assault offences, summarises the range of existing offences across Australian jurisdictions and identifies inconsistencies in relation to elements of these offences—notably concerning the issue of consent. It also discusses the symbolic, educative and practical role that guiding principles and statements of objectives can play in the interpretation of law and the application of rules with respect to sexual offences.

25.2 The summary of offences is not comprehensive, but focuses on those sexual offences that are most likely to be committed by a current or former intimate partner or family member. For example, sexual offences proscribed in the Commonwealth criminal law such as those relating to child sex tourism,\(^1\) or rape or sexual violence in the context of war or as a crime against humanity\(^2\) are not included.\(^3\)

25.3 Despite extensive reform of the laws relating to sexual offences, there remain some significant gaps and inconsistencies between jurisdictions in the construction of offences. While some of these are examined in this chapter, the focus of the

---

1. Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) pt IIIA.
3. See also Crimes Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences Against Children) Act 2010 (Cth).
Commissions’ work has been on inconsistency in interpretation or application of laws in those areas with most direct impact on victims of sexual assault in a family violence context—in relation to the reporting and prosecution of offences as well as pre-trial and trial processes. These issues are discussed in Chapters 26 to 28.

25.4 The purpose of summarising sexual assault offences in this chapter is to illustrate the range of sexually coercive behaviour that is proscribed in various criminal laws and, in some instances, to point to promising approaches to counter such conduct. The discussion also provides background for later examination of pre-trial and trial processes in sexual assault proceedings.

Overview of sexual offences

25.5 Extensive reforms of the laws relating to sexual offences over the last 25 years have resulted in a new range of sexual offences in most jurisdictions. Key areas of law reform have included a move away from the language of ‘rape’ to that of ‘sexual assault’ as a way of emphasising sexual offences as acts of violence. Related to this was the grading of sexual offences to take account of different circumstances and aggravating factors. The scope of the penetrative offence has also been broadened in all jurisdictions.

Legislative framework

25.6 Each Australian jurisdiction has its own set of substantive and procedural criminal laws. The main point of divergence between jurisdictions is whether the criminal law is codified or remains guided by the common law. Within that distinction, there is a further differentiation as to whether the jurisdiction has adopted the uniform Evidence Acts.

25.7 In the criminal code jurisdictions—Queensland, Western Australia, Tasmania and the Northern Territory—statutes comprehensively set out the criminal law such that ‘all crimes now exist in statutory form as defined by the various codes which have specifically supplanted common law crimes’. In the common law jurisdictions—NSW, Victoria, South Australia and the ACT—any legislation is ‘interpreted in the light of common law precepts unless Parliament has expressly, or by necessary implication, evinced a clear intention to displace the common law’.

‘Rape’: the penetrative sexual offence

25.8 Under the common law, rape was defined as carnal knowledge of a woman against her will and was subject to narrow and restrictive definitions of ‘sexual intercourse’. Statutory extensions and modifications to the common law crime of rape have been made in all jurisdictions to varying degrees, but with resulting

---

4 See Thomson Reuters, The Laws of Australia, vol 10, Criminal Offences, 10.3, [10].
5 The uniform Evidence Acts are: Evidence Act 1995 (Cth); Evidence Act 1995 (NSW); Evidence Act 2008 (Vic); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas); Evidence Act 2004 (Nt). See Ch 27.
7 Ibid, 18.
8 See Thomson Reuters, The Laws of Australia, vol 10, Criminal Offences, 10.3, [140].
inconsistency across jurisdictions. The penetrative sexual offence is no longer gender-specific and, despite some inconsistencies, generally includes penetration of the genitalia by a penis, object, part of a body or mouth.

25.9 A number of jurisdictions also prohibit a person from compelling another person to take part in sexual penetration. In addition, common law understandings of consent, and the conditions or circumstances that are seen as negating consent, have been considerably modified.

25.10 The penetrative sexual offence is described as: ‘rape’ in Victoria, Queensland, South Australia and Tasmania; ‘sexual intercourse without consent’ in the ACT and the Northern Territory, and ‘sexual penetration without consent’ in Western Australia. The offence includes the continuation of sexual intercourse after penetration in order to address cases where consent has subsequently been withdrawn.

25.11 The penalty for sexual intercourse without consent ranges from 12 years to life imprisonment, depending on the jurisdiction and the presence of aggravating factors.

---

9 For example, there is some inconsistency between jurisdictions with respect to penetration of vagina/female genitalia or anus by a body part or object as well as penetration of the mouth by a penis. Western Australia is the only state in which the penetrative sexual offence includes the use of a victim’s body for penetration of the offender in the definition of penetration/sexual intercourse: Criminal Code (WA) s 319(1).

10 In some jurisdictions it is specified as penetration of the vagina or anus: eg, Crimes Act 1990 (ACT) s 50. Penetration of a surgically constructed vagina is not included in legislative definitions in Western Australia or the ACT, nor is it included with respect to penetration of a surgically constructed vagina by an object in Tasmania (Criminal Code (Tas) s 1). For other jurisdictions, see Crimes Act 1990 (NSW) s 61H(1); Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 35; Criminal Code (Qld) s 1; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 5(3); Criminal Code (NT) s 1.

11 For example, in NSW, it includes ‘sexual connection occasioned by the penetration to any extent of the genitalia … of a female person or the anus of any person’ by ‘any part of the body of another person, or any object manipulated by another person’: Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61H(1). See also the definition of sexual penetration in the Model Criminal Code: Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), app 2, cl 5.2.1.

12 See, eg, Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 38A. See also Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), app 2, cl 5.2.7.

13 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 38.

14 Criminal Code (Qld) s 48.

15 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1925 (SA) s 48.

16 Criminal Code (Tas) s 185.

17 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61.

18 Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 54; Criminal Code (NT) s 192.

19 Criminal Code (WA) s 325.

20 Non-consensual continuation of sexual intercourse is recognised in all jurisdictions except Queensland. See: Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61H(1)(d); Criminal Code (WA) s 319(1); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 5; Criminal Code (Tas) s 1; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 50(e); Criminal Code (NT) s 1.

21 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 38(2)(b) refers to the failure to withdraw after becoming aware that a person is not consenting.
25.12 In all jurisdictions the prosecution must prove that sexual penetration took place without the consent of the complainant. These are the physical elements of the offence, or \textit{actus reus}. In the common law jurisdictions—NSW, Victoria, South Australia and the ACT—the prosecution must also prove that the accused knew that the victim was not consenting or was reckless about whether there was such consent.\footnote{\textit{Crimes Act} 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(3); \textit{Crimes Act} 1958 (Vic) s 38(2); \textit{Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935} (SA) s 48; \textit{Crimes Act} 1900 (ACT) s 54.} This is known as the mental element of the offence, or \textit{mens rea}. Similar provisions apply in the Northern Territory.\footnote{\textit{Criminal Code} (NT) s 192(3)(b).} By contrast, in the code jurisdictions—Queensland, Western Australia and Tasmania—the prosecution need only prove intention.\footnote{Thomson Reuters, \textit{The Laws of Australia}, vol 10, \textit{Criminal Offences}, 10.3, [320].}

25.13 Until recently, in all the common law jurisdictions, a defendant who could prove an honest albeit unreasonable belief in consent would be acquitted of the offence. In the code jurisdictions, a defendant may raise the defence of an honest \textit{and} reasonable belief in consent. Key changes in relation to the definition of consent and the mental element relating to consent are discussed later in this chapter.

\textit{Aggravated sexual assaults}

25.14 Each jurisdiction provides in some way for aggravating factors for the penetrative offence (as well as for other sexual offences). These may be outlined in a definition section,\footnote{\textit{Criminal Code} (WA) s 319.} articulated as a separate aggravating offence,\footnote{See, eg, \textit{Crimes Act} 1990 (NSW) s 61J; \textit{Criminal Code} (WA) s 326. A number of jurisdictions also have separate offences for sexual assaults taking place in these circumstances, eg, where the victim has a cognitive impairment or where the accused is in a position of authority in relation to the victim—these are discussed later in this chapter.} as a subsection of the substantive offence,\footnote{See, eg, \textit{Criminal Code} (WA) s 330, which creates an offence of having sexual intercourse with persons, other than children, incapable of consent.} or as an entirely separate offence.\footnote{Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, \textit{Model Criminal Code} (1st edn, 2009) pt 5.2, div 7.} The Model Criminal Code provides for increased penalties for all sexual offences when certain aggravating factors are present.\footnote{Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, \textit{Model Criminal Code} (1st edn, 2009) pt 5.2, div 2, cl 5.2.6.}

25.15 Factors that are commonly nominated as aggravating include: causing injury; using a weapon; detaining the victim; the victim’s age; if the victim had a disability or cognitive impairment; or where the accused was in a position of authority in relation to the victim.\footnote{Under the Model Criminal Code it is proposed that the penalty would be imprisonment for a maximum of 15 years which would increase to 20 years if aggravating factors were present: Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, \textit{Model Criminal Code} (1st edn, 2009) pt 5.2, div 2.}

25.16 For example, the penetrative sexual offence is supplemented with the separate crimes of ‘aggravated sexual assault’ in NSW and ‘aggravated sexual penetration without consent’ in Western Australia.33 These carry a higher maximum penalty than the basic offence. One of a range of aggravating factors must be proved including, for example, the infliction of harm, the use of a weapon or being in company with another.34

25.17 In the ACT, the law provides for different offences ranging from sexual assault in the first degree—the most serious—to sexual assault in the third degree, depending on the existence of aggravating factors.35 In the Northern Territory, the maximum punishment for the basic offence increases where there are aggravating factors—defined as where ‘harm’ or ‘serious harm’ is caused.36

Indecent assault and acts of indecency

25.18 Indecent assault covers sexual acts that do not constitute rape. Indecent assault is an offence in all states.37 For example, in Victoria, a person commits indecent assault if ‘he or she assaults another person in indecent circumstances’,38 and in NSW the offence applies where any person ‘assaults another person and … commits an act of indecency on or in the presence of the other person’.39 To establish this offence there must be an assault—actual or threatened—in addition to indecency. Some jurisdictions also have offences for aggravated indecent assault.40

25.19 The territories have adopted a different approach. The ACT has an offence for ‘acts of indecency without consent’,41 which does not require an assault. Other jurisdictions also proscribe acts of indecency,42 including in aggravated circumstances.43 In the Northern Territory, instead of an offence of indecent assault, the legislation increases the maximum penalty for assault where the victim is assaulted in an indecent manner.44

25.20 Indecency is not defined in any of the legislative schemes. It is considered a word of ‘ordinary meaning’ for the jury to assess in the circumstances of the case and according to the standards of the day.45

---

33 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61J; Criminal Code (WA) s 326.
34 In NSW, there is also a separate offence of aggravated sexual assault in company, which carries a maximum penalty of life imprisonment: Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61JA.
35 Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) ss 51–53.
36 Criminal Code (NT) s 192(7)–(8).
37 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61L; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 39; Criminal Code (Qld) s 352; Criminal Code (WA) s 323; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 56; Criminal Code (Tas) s 127.
38 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 39.
39 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61L.
40 Ibid s 61M; Criminal Code (WA) s 324; Criminal Code (Tas) s 127A.
41 Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 60.
42 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61N(2); Criminal Code (Qld) s 227; Criminal Code (Tas) s 137.
43 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61O(1A): aggravating circumstances include where the act is performed in company; s 61O(3): where the accused is in a position of authority over the victim, or where the victim has a physical disability or cognitive impairment. As for sexual intercourse without consent, in relation to acts of indecency without consent the ACT provides for three further offences that relate to circumstances of aggravation, first, second and third degree: Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) ss 57–59. See also Criminal Code (WA) s 324.
44 Criminal Code (NT) s 188(2).
Assaults with intent to commit sexual acts

25.21 In addition to crimes of sexual assault and indecent assault, some jurisdictions have offences involving assaults or acts with intent to commit sexual acts.\(^{46}\) These offences apply where the accused uses violence or threatens to use violence in order to facilitate a sexual act.

25.22 The impetus for such offences was to ‘place primary emphasis on the violence factor in sexual assault, rather than on the element of sexual contact and consent’.\(^ {47}\) For example, in NSW, it is an offence for any person ‘with intent to have sexual intercourse with another person’ to inflict or threaten to inflict ‘actual bodily harm on the other person or a third person who is present or nearby’.\(^ {48}\)

25.23 Some jurisdictions also provide for offences where drugs or other substances have been administered to the victim in order to render that person unable to resist the sexual activity.\(^ {49}\)

Submissions and consultations

25.24 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether significant gaps or inconsistencies arise among jurisdictions in relation to sexual offences against adults in terms of the:

- definition of sexual intercourse or penetration;
- recognition of aggravating factors;
- penalties applicable if an offence is found proven;
- offences relating to attempts; and/or
- definitions of indecency offences.\(^ {50}\)

25.25 Stakeholders highlighted gaps and inconsistencies across jurisdictions in relation to sexual offences, expressing the view that the Commissions should ‘be seeking to achieve fairness and consistency’ with respect to the formulation of sexual assault offences.\(^ {51}\) Overall, stakeholders who addressed the questions in this area focused on the definitions, aggravating factors and penalties for sexual offences.

---

\(^{46}\) See, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61K, 61P, Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 40; Criminal Code (Qld) s 351.

\(^{47}\) Thomson Reuters, The Laws of Australia, vol 10, Criminal Offences, 10.3, [780].

\(^{48}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61K.

\(^{49}\) See, eg, Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 53; Criminal Code (Qld) s 218(1)(e). See also Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 38A which is a general offence relating to ‘drink spiking’.

\(^{51}\) Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010. This sentiment was echoed in submissions by the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010 and National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010.
25.26 While there is much commonality among jurisdictions in the definitions of penetration and sexual intercourse, there are also ‘discrepancies resulting in different entitlements to justice depending on where the sexual assault occurs’.\(^{52}\)

25.27 This also appears to be the case with aggravating factors. It was emphasised that ‘the range of circumstances of aggravation vary considerably between jurisdictions’, \(^{53}\) and those circumstances which are more likely to be present as elements in intimate partner assault—such as threats to life, the presence of third parties or children and harm—are not universally recognised, resulting in the inconsistent application of aggravating circumstances between jurisdictions.

25.28 Finally, concerns were expressed about inconsistency in maximum penalties for sexual assault offences. However, the National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence (NASASV) highlighted the minimal impact this has on sexual assault in the family violence context. NASASV instead emphasised the need for guidance in relation to minimum penalties because the maximum penalty is rarely applied in such sexual assaults, which ‘seem to attract even lower sentences than, for example, stranger perpetrated sexual assaults’.\(^ {54}\)

Commissions’ views

25.29 Legislative reform is only one of a number of mechanisms available to respond to problems arising from the response of the legal system to sexual assault. Nonetheless, to the extent that reform of the content of sexual offences can help ensure fairness through consistent expectations and treatment of sexual assault matters across jurisdictions, the Commissions support further harmonisation of sexual assault offence provisions.

25.30 In line with this policy, the Commissions recommend that the definition of sexual intercourse or penetration should be broad and not gender-specific, and should be made more consistent across jurisdictions. The definition recommended below is in keeping with the shift away from historically gendered and restrictive definitions of sexual intercourse and is consistent with the definition in the Model Criminal Code.

25.31 While other gaps and inconsistencies have been identified, in particular with respect to the recognition of aggravating factors and penalties, the Commissions do not make recommendations in relation to these issues. The Commissions suggest, however, that when state and territory governments review sexual assault offences, they should have regard to inconsistency in these areas—particularly where offences arise in a family violence context.

---

\(^{52}\) National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010.

\(^{53}\) Ibid.

\(^{54}\) Ibid.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

Recommendation 25–1

State and territory sexual assault provisions should include a wide definition of sexual intercourse or penetration, encompassing:

(a) penetration (to any extent) of the genitalia (including surgically constructed genitalia) or anus of a person by the penis or other body part of another person and/or any object manipulated by a person;

(b) penetration of the mouth of a person by the penis of a person; and

(c) continuing sexual penetration as defined in paragraph (a) or (b) above.

Sexual offences against children and young people

25.32 Each jurisdiction provides a range of offences concerning sexual conduct with children. These include, for example: sexual intercourse; 55 attempts to have sexual intercourse; 56 acts of indecency; 57 procuring or grooming a child for ‘unlawful sexual activity’; 58 and abducting a child with the intention of engaging in unlawful sexual activity. 59

25.33 Offences against children are commonly expressed in terms of the age of the victim. For example, there are offences against young children—under the age of 10, 12 or 13 years of age, depending on the jurisdiction 60—and offences against older children—generally under the age of 16, 61 but in some cases 17, 62 or 18 years of age. 63

---

Notes:

55 NSW: Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66A—under the age of 10 years; s 66C—aged between 10 and 16 years. Victoria: Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 45—under the age of 16 years. Queensland: Criminal Code (Qld) s 215—offences of ‘carnal knowledge of a child’ relating to children under 16 years of age; s 208(1)—sodomy relating to children under the age of 18 years. Western Australia: Criminal Code (WA) s 200(2)—children under the age of 13 years; s 201(2)—children aged between 13 and 16 years. South Australia: Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 49(1)—under the age of 14 years; s 49(3)—under the age of 17 years. Tasmania: Criminal Code (Tas) s 124—under the age of 17 years. ACT: Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 55(1)—under the age of 10 years; s 55(2)—under the age of 16 years. Northern Territory: Criminal Code (NT) s 127 under the age of 16 years.

56 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) ss 66B, 66D.

57 Ibid s 61N(1); Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 47; Criminal Code (Qld) s 210—indecent treatment of a child under the age of 16 years; Criminal Code (WA) s 320(4)—indecently dealing with a child under the age of 13, s 321(4)—indecently dealing with a child aged 13 to 16; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 58—acts of gross indecency; Criminal Code (Tas) s 125B; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 61; Criminal Code (NT) s 127—gross indecency, s 132—indecent dealing with a child.

58 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66EB. See also: Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 58; Criminal Code (Qld) s 217—procuring child for carnal knowledge; Criminal Code (Qld) s 218A—using the internet to procure children; Criminal Code (WA) ss 320(3), 320(5), 321(3), 321(5); Criminal Code (Tas) ss 125C–125D; Criminal Code (NT) s 131. Western Australia also has an offence of using electronic communication to procure or expose a child to indecent material: Criminal Code (WA) s 204B.

59 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 56; Criminal Code (NT) s 201. See also Queensland which has an offence of ‘taking a child for immoral purposes’: Criminal Code (Qld) s 219.

60 Under the age of 10 years: Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66B; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 45(2)(a); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 55(1). Under 12 years of age: see Criminal Code (Qld) s 215(3). Under the age of 13 years: Criminal Code (WA) s 320.

61 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 45(2)(b); Criminal Code (Qld) ss 215(1); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 55(2); Criminal Code (NT) s 127. NSW creates two age groups: Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66C(1)—victims
This gradation generally reflects the seriousness of offences against very young children. Accordingly, the sentences attached to those offences are higher than for those against older children. For example, in NSW, different penalties are provided where the child is under the age of 10 years (25 years imprisonment); between the ages of 10 and 14 years (16 years imprisonment); and between the ages of 14 and 16 years (10 years imprisonment). As for offences against adults, aggravating factors are also applicable to offences against children.

25.34 In some jurisdictions, consent by a person who is under the age of consent to sexual activity is excluded from operating as a defence to sexual offence charges, regardless of any similarity in age between the victim and the accused. However, many jurisdictions recognise that consent may play a role in such situations, and consequently there are a range of statutory formulations involving consensual sexual activity between young people under the age of consent but similar in age. For example, in Victoria, consent may be a defence to the offence of sexual penetration or an indecent act where the victim is aged 12 years and over and the accused is not more than two years older than the victim. In South Australia similarity in age is recognised as a defence where the victim is over the age of 16 years and the accused is under the age of 17 years. In Tasmania, consent is a defence, except in relation to anal sexual intercourse, where the victim is aged 15 years and over and the defendant is not more than five years older, or where the victim is aged 12 years or over and the defendant is not more than three years older.

25.35 A related issue, of particular relevance in cases involving older children, is that of the age of consent. Historically, there were significant inconsistencies within and across jurisdictions with respect to the age of consent—the age at which young people are considered able to consent to sexual activity—based on gender, sexuality and other factors. Despite significant reforms, some inconsistency remains. For example,

---

In South Australia, the various sexual offences against children tend to be divided between those perpetrated against children under the age of 14 years, and under the age of 17 years: see Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 49(1), s 49(3). Tasmania also has sexual offences against children under the age of 17: see Criminal Code (Tas) s 124.

In Queensland, in relation to sodomy, see Criminal Code (Qld) s 208.

Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) ss 66A, 66C.

Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 49(4).

Criminal Code (Tas) s 124(3).
Commonwealth legislation sets the age of consent at 16 years of age,\(^\text{71}\) which is consistent with legislation in NSW, Victoria, Western Australia, ACT and the NT.\(^\text{72}\) However, the age of consent is 17 years of age in South Australia and Tasmania,\(^\text{73}\) and legislation in Queensland distinguishes between vaginal sex and sodomy, in relation to which the age of consent is 16 and 18 years of age respectively.\(^\text{74}\)

Offences by a family member

25.36 State and territory criminal law provides for a range of incest offences,\(^\text{75}\) where the victim and the accused are closely related. For example, Victorian legislation provides that a person must not take part in an act of sexual penetration with a person whom he or she knows to be:

- his or her child or other lineal descendant or his or her stepchild;
- the child or other lineal descendant or the stepchild of his or her de facto spouse;
- his or her father or mother or other lineal ancestor or his or her stepfather or stepmother; or
- his or her sister, half-sister, brother or half-brother.\(^\text{76}\)

25.37 Similarly, in most other jurisdictions sexual activity occurring in the context of biological and adoptive relationships or involving half-sisters and brothers or step-sisters and brothers is covered by the incest provisions.\(^\text{77}\) However, legislation across jurisdictions is inconsistent with respect to whether incest offences also cover conduct arising in the context of de facto relationships or those arising from fostering and other legal arrangements.\(^\text{78}\) Overall, incest type offences do not tend to make provision for offences arising in communities which may have extended family and kinship definitions and structures—as is the case within Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and some CALD communities.

---

\(^\text{71}\) See, for example, Criminal Code (Cth) s 272.8.
\(^\text{72}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66A; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 45; Criminal Code (WA) s 321; Crimes Act 1990 (ACT) s 55; Criminal Code (NT) s 127.
\(^\text{73}\) Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 49; Criminal Code (Tas) s 124.
\(^\text{74}\) Criminal Code (Qld) ss 208, 210.
\(^\text{76}\) Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 44(1)-(4).
\(^\text{77}\) See Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 78A; Criminal Code (Qld) s 222(5)-(7A); Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 329; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 72; Criminal Code Act 1924 (Tas) s 133; Crimes Act 1990 (ACT) s 62; Criminal Code Act 1983 (NT) s 134.
\(^\text{78}\) For example, Queensland is one of the few jurisdictions in which the incest provisions cover sexual activity in the context of adopted, step, de facto, foster and other ‘legal arrangement’-based relationships: Criminal Code Act 1899 (Qld) s 222(5)-(7A). In some jurisdictions, rather than being incorporated into incest provisions, the provisions that create an offence against a child where the accused is in a position of trust or authority specifically apply where the accused is a step-parent, guardian or foster parent: see, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 73(3)(a).
25.38 In some jurisdictions, these offences apply to all age groups—that is, children and adults.\(^{79}\) In others, general offences in respect of children are applicable, and the incest offence relates to cases where the victim is over 16 years of age.\(^{80}\)

Offences where the accused is in a position of trust or authority

25.39 A number of jurisdictions have introduced offences that apply to a defendant who has a special relationship with the victim as a result of the defendant’s position or authority, or the care that he or she provides to the child—for example, as a teacher, religious guide, doctor, employer or sports coach.\(^{81}\) The former Standing Committee of Attorneys-General Model Criminal Code Officers Committee (MCCOC)—now the Model Criminal Law Officers Committee—recommended offences of this kind in relation to sexual penetration, indecent touching, and indecent acts directed at a young person by a person in a position of trust or authority, and considered that young people up to two years over the age of consent may be vulnerable in this context.\(^{82}\)

Consultation Paper

25.40 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the age of consent for all sexual offences should be set at 16 years of age.\(^{83}\) The Commissions also asked questions about sexual offences against children and young people, including with respect to the availability and content of defences involving similarity in age, and honest and reasonable belief as to age.\(^{84}\)

25.41 Some stakeholders supported the proposal that the age of consent for all sexual offences should be 16 years of age.\(^{85}\) It was noted, however, that a higher or lower age of consent may be appropriate in some situations. For example, NASASV supported a higher age of consent where there is a care relationship or incest.\(^{86}\)

\(^{79}\) Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 44; Criminal Code (Qld) s 222; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 72; Criminal Code (Tas) s 133; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 62; Criminal Code (NT) s 134. This last section also provides for harsher penalties where the victim is a child under the age of 10, or between 10 and 16 years of age. See also Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code (1st edn, 2009), pt 5.2, div 6, cl 5.2.34.

\(^{80}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 78A.

\(^{81}\) The relationships included vary across the jurisdictions, see, eg, Crimes Act (NSW) s 73(3); Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 49(4); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 49(5a); Criminal Code (NT) s 128(3).

\(^{83}\) Consultation Paper, Proposal 16–1.

\(^{84}\) Ibid, Questions 16–3, 16–4.

\(^{85}\) For example, Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010.

25.42 Stakeholders also highlighted issues arising from underage consensual sexual activity. Legal Aid NSW noted that an age of consent of 16 may well be out of touch with the sexual habits of many teenagers below this age and a fixed age of consent means that many teenagers engaging in consensual sex are committing a criminal offence. 87

25.43 Other stakeholders echoed this view, emphasising the need for provisions to ‘reflect contemporary practices in sexual relations between young people’, 88 provided such relations are consensual.

25.44 Legal service providers in the Northern Territory, including the North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency and the Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission (NTLAC), expressed particular concern about the prosecution of non-exploitative consensual (but under-age) teenage sexual behaviour following the Northern Territory Emergency Response and in light of mandatory sentencing provisions for sexual offences. 89 NSW stakeholders highlighted similar concerns about the operation of NSW legislation on the basis that all sexual contact with a child under 16, even consensual contact, is an offence, even where both parties are under 16. Secondly, an offence involving two juveniles is automatically ‘aggravated’ because it is designated as a ‘child sex offence’ which places the offence in a more serious category, attracting higher penalties. In addition, child sex offences attract the provisions of the Child Protection Register set up under the Child Protection (Offenders Registration) Act 2000 (NSW), even where the offender and the victim are both children. 90

25.45 Related to this issue, the Commissions asked how ‘similarity in age’ of the complainant and defendant should be dealt with. 91 Some stakeholders opposed similarity in age being used as a defence, despite operating as a defence in many jurisdictions. 92 Others emphasised that consent should remain a relevant consideration, or favoured the inclusion of lack of consent as an element of the offence in such circumstances. 93 Other stakeholders suggested that there should not be an offence

87 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
90 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
91 Consultation Paper, Question 16–3.
where the age gap is two years or less, or that similarity in age could be a relevant sentencing consideration.

25.46 Stakeholders held differing views about the defence of honest and reasonable belief that a person was over a certain age. For example, the Law Society of NSW, Legal Aid NSW and NTLAC suggested that such a defence should be available at any age. The Canberra Rape Crisis Centre and NASASV expressed the opposite view, arguing that it should not be available at any age. The Canberra Rape Crisis Centre observed that ‘the impact on the young victim is the same regardless of the belief of the perpetrator and this should be the primary consideration’. NASASV stated that ‘an honest and reasonable belief that a person was over a certain age is at best irrelevant and at worst likely to be used as a difficult-to-challenge defence of the heinous crime of engaging sexually with children’.

Commissions’ views

25.47 In considering offences involving children and young people there is a need to strike an ‘appropriate balance between the need to protect vulnerable persons from sexual exploitation, and the need to allow for sexual autonomy’, and to recognise the realities of sexual behaviour.

25.48 Issues of age of consent, similarity in age, or honest or reasonable belief that a person was over a certain age are much less likely to arise where sexual assault occurs in a family violence context and are, therefore, somewhat peripheral to this Inquiry. Accordingly, these issues were not matters on which the Commissions consulted widely.

25.49 The Commissions suggest that the age of consent for sexual offences should be set at 16 years of age. This is consistent with legislation in many jurisdictions and the approach taken by MCCOC, which considered the issue at length and received numerous submissions from a range of stakeholders. The Commissions’ recommendation, however, is that the age of consent for sexual activity should be made uniform both within and across jurisdictions, and that no distinction be made based on gender, sexuality or any other factor.

---

94 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FF 205, 30 June 2010.
95 Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Family Voice Australia, Submission FV 75, 2 June 2010.
96 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FF 205, 30 June 2010; National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
97 Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
99 Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences Against Children) Bill 2010 (Cth).
100 Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 119–123.
25.50 Similarly, the Commissions do not make any recommendation with respect to how similarity in age should be dealt with or the age at which a defendant should be able to raise an honest and reasonable belief that a person was over a certain age. The Commissions emphasise, however, that any review of the relevant legislative provisions or the exercise of prosecutorial discretion should recognise contemporary realities of consensual and non-exploitative sexual activity between young people.

Recommendation 25–2 Federal, state and territory sexual offence provisions should provide a uniform age of consent for all sexual offences.

Persistent sexual abuse of a child

25.51 All jurisdictions have introduced offences in relation to the ‘persistent sexual abuse of a child’,101 ‘maintaining a sexual relationship with a young person’,102 or the ‘persistent sexual exploitation of a child’.103

25.52 The impetus for the enactment of these offences was recognition of the practical difficulties encountered in successfully prosecuting child sexual offences. The requirement of particularity in child sexual offences—that is, precise details of single incidents—fails to capture the multiple, repetitive experiences of many children, particularly in the context of sexual abuse by family members.104

25.53 As then NSW Attorney General Jeff Shaw QC explained in the second reading speech for the Crimes Legislation (Child Sexual Offences) Bill 1998:

> children are often unable to give precise details of offences, particularly where the alleged sexual assaults took place over many years, involved numerous occasions of abuse, and the accused was in a position of trust or authority. … [I]f the prosecution is unable to prove particulars of the time, date and place of an allegation of child sexual abuse, then the accused cannot be prosecuted. … The Government is of the firm view that the time has come to introduce legislation to better protect children. This bill accomplishes that purpose. By creating the offence of persistent sexual abuse of a child, we recognise the reality of continuing or prolonged child sexual abuse.105

25.54 Generally these offences capture a number of unlawful sexual acts106—not necessarily of the same kind—against a child within the one indictment. The provisions stipulate that ‘it is not necessary to specify or to prove the dates and exact

---

101 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66EA; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 47A; Criminal Code (WA) s 321A. See also Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code (1st edn, 2009) cl 5.2.14.
102 Criminal Code (Qld) s 229B; Criminal Code (Tas) s 125A; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 56; Criminal Code (NT) s 131A, maintaining a relationship of a sexual nature.
103 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 50.
104 See, eg, Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 133–137. See also, S v The Queen (1989) 168 CLR 266.
106 Generally three or more, although in Queensland and South Australia it is simply more than one unlawful act: Criminal Code (Qld) s 229B(2); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 50(1). circumstances of the alleged occasions on which the conduct constituting the offence occurred'. Instead, reasonable particularity for the period during which the offences are alleged to have taken place is required, and there must be a description of the ‘nature of the separate offences alleged to have been committed by the accused during that period’. Judicial criticism of the provisions has highlighted the problems associated with such lack of particularity, specifically the potential to jeopardise the defendant’s right to a fair trial and the impact on the admissibility of evidence.

25.55 Most Australian jurisdictions require the approval of the Attorney-General or Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) before proceedings for the offence may be commenced; and the maximum penalty for the offences is relatively similar across the jurisdictions—ranging from life imprisonment in Queensland and South Australia, to 20 years imprisonment in Western Australia.

25.56 Various inquiries and reviews have indicated that the persistent sexual abuse provisions are rarely charged and that the specific provisions do not address the problems in the area. This view was echoed in submissions to this Inquiry and is discussed further below.

Consultations and submissions

25.57 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions asked whether the offence of ‘persistent sexual abuse’ or ‘maintaining a relationship’ had achieved its aims in assisting the prosecution of sexual offences against children in the family context, where there are frequently multiple unlawful acts.

25.58 The majority of stakeholders were supportive of the policy rationale underlying the introduction of ‘persistent sexual abuse’ type offences, particularly in a family violence context, but highlighted that this is an area in which there ‘is an implementation gap between written law and its practice’. 115 Most stakeholders who addressed the issue indicated that the provisions are ‘profoundly under utilised’. 116

25.59 Some stakeholders outlined concerns about the potentially oppressive operation of the provisions and their impact on the rights of the accused, given the absence of particularity and resulting difficulties for the defence. 117 Similar concerns have been raised in the past, including by the MCCOC. 118

25.60 The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW ODPP) expressed the view that the NSW provision requires recasting because it is under-utilised for three reasons:

Firstly the reading down of the nature and purpose of the section by the Court of Criminal Appeal, secondly the failure of the section to sufficiently relieve the burden on the complainant to particularise offences and thirdly, by the requirement that the DPP sanction the laying of the charge. 119

25.61 In relation to the requirement for DPP approval, the NSW ODPP stated that:

while the reasoning behind the sanction requirement was sound in 1998, as the offence was of a novel nature and should only be used in cases of substantial abuse, the [Sexual Assault Review Committee] question that the sanction is still necessary to commence proceedings. It does seem, by reference to the Police complaints that the charge is not being considered, that the practicalities and the resources involved in sanctioning the charge are prohibitive to the proper application of the section. 120

25.62 Women’s Legal Service Queensland identified another practical limitation of the provisions where persistent sexual abuse occurs over a lengthy period, during which time the victim becomes an adult. Acts which occur after the child becomes 18 years of age are either consensual, in which case no offence has been committed unless it is incest, or non-consensual, and therefore constitute a separate criminal offence. However, the Legal Service emphasised that this assumes that victims of persistent sexual abuse have the capacity to consent—which in many instances neither recognises nor reflects the reality of the lives of young people who are subjected to such abuse. 121

115 National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010. This was echoed by the Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
116 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010. This was also supported by stakeholders such as the Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010 and Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Consultation, Perth, 4 May 2010.
117 Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Consultation, Perth, 4 May 2010.
118 See Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 137.
119 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010, endorsed by the NSW ODPP Interagency Sexual Assault Review Committee. See also M Powell, K Roberts and B Guadagno, ‘Particularisation of Child Abuse Offences: Common Problems When Questioning Child Witnesses’ (2007) 19(1) Current Issues in Criminal Justice 64, 64–74 for discussion of the argument that narrow judicial interpretation has contributed to the failure of the legislation to achieve its objectives.
121 Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
25.63 National Legal Aid and Legal Aid NSW suggested that persistent sexual abuse offences would ‘benefit from further investigation by the NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research or the Australian Institute of Criminology’.

Commissions’ views

25.64 The Commissions reaffirm the need for ‘persistent sexual abuse’ type offences in recognising and responding to the realities of child sexual abuse—particularly in a family violence context. As discussed by the MCCOC, the question in considering such offences is one of appropriate balance between addressing the difficulties faced by the prosecution in particularising sexual abuse and protecting the defendant’s right to a fair trial.

25.65 The current legislative provisions in this area appear to be under-utilised, in part due to the limits of current legislative formulations, and factors related to judicial interpretation and the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. In a general sense it appears that the provisions, in at least some jurisdictions, have not been effective in overcoming the need to particularise offences, which was the rationale behind their introduction.

25.66 Jurisdictions such as Victoria and South Australia have enacted amendments intended to address under-utilisation of these offences. For example, in the revised South Australian provision, reference to ‘persistent sexual abuse of a child’ was replaced with ‘persistent sexual exploitation of a child’. The offence now focuses on acts of sexual exploitation that comprise a course of conduct, rather than requiring a series of separate particularised offences. The NSW Attorney General has referred the issue of recasting the persistent sexual abuse provisions in NSW to a government Sex Offences Working Party.

25.67 Further work is required across jurisdictions to establish why persistent sexual abuse type offences are not being used, and in jurisdictions where they are, how the offences can be reformed to address the difficulties faced by both the prosecution and defendants in these cases. The Commissions, therefore, recommend that the Australian and state and territory governments review the utilisation and effectiveness of these offences, with a particular focus on offences committed in a family violence context.

122 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
124 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 50.
125 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66EA.
126 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010. At the time of writing the report of the Working Party had not been released.
Recommendation 25–3  The Australian, state and territory governments should review the utilisation and effectiveness of persistent sexual abuse type offences, with a particular focus on offences committed in a family violence context.

Sexual offences against people with cognitive impairment

25.68 Specific offences have been enacted to address the particular vulnerabilities to sexual assault of people with a cognitive impairment.127 These specific offences may supplement other sexual offences where offending against a victim with a cognitive impairment is an aggravating factor. The offences often regulate people in a particular position, for example those who have a role in caring for the person,128 or are providers of medical or therapeutic services129 or special programs.130

25.69 The additional complexities surrounding sexual assault of adults with a cognitive impairment are particularly evident with respect to the issue of consent. In some jurisdictions, where the accused is a person responsible for the care of the person with the cognitive impairment, or where sexual intercourse was conducted with the intention of taking advantage of that person, consent is not a defence to the charge.131

25.70 In the case of sexual assault in a family violence context, the key question with respect to the construction of offences is one of balance—reconciling the need to protect people with a cognitive impairment from sexual exploitation while at the same time acknowledging their agency.

25.71 While legislative amendments have addressed some problematic areas in the engagement of victims of sexual assault with a cognitive impairment with the criminal justice system, the key issues appear to arise in relation to barriers to reporting sexual assault and in the tendency for crimes against people with a cognitive impairment to be ‘dealt with by administrative’ rather than legal channels, particularly within an institutional setting.132 In light of this, and in the absence of any significant

---

127 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66F; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) ss 51–52; Criminal Code (Qld) s 216; Criminal Code (WA) s 330; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 49(6); Criminal Code (Tas) s 126; Criminal Code (NT) s 130. See also Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code (1st edn, 2009) pt 5.2, div 5.
128 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66(F)(2); Criminal Code (Tas) s 126.
129 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 51.
130 Ibid s 52; Criminal Code (NT) s 130.
131 See, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 66F(5)–(6); Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) ss 52–52; Criminal Code (Tas) s 126(2).
132 J Pestersilia, ‘Crime Victims with Developmental Disabilities: A Review Essay’ (2001) 28 Criminal Justice and Behavior 655. See Ch 26 for further discussion of the barriers faced by victims of sexual assault who have a cognitive impairment. See also, S Murray and A Powell, Sexual Assault and Adults with a Disability: Enabling Recognition, Disclosure and a Just Response (2008), prepared for the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault. Several inquiries and reports have examined the response of the criminal justice system to sexual assault of people with a cognitive impairment, see for example: Criminal Law Review Division Attorney General’s Department (NSW), Intellectual Disability and the Law of Sexual Assault: Discussion Paper (2007); Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual stakeholder comment on this issue, the Commissions do not make any recommendations with respect to specific sexual offences against persons with a cognitive impairment.

Consent

25.72 Sexual offences against adults generally require the prosecution to prove that the complainant did not consent to the sexual conduct. This is a matter for the jury to determine by reference to the complainant’s actual state of mind at the time the sexual conduct occurred.

25.73 In adult sexual assault trials, it is common for the defendant to admit sexual activity but assert a belief that it was consensual. This is a matter for the jury to determine by reference to the defendant’s actual state of mind—and, in some jurisdictions, by reference to whether that state of mind was reasonable—at the time the sexual conduct occurred. In a family violence context, where the complainant and the defendant know each other, the issue of consent is complex.

25.74 The report of the National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children (Time for Action) noted variations across Australia in terms of:

- the definition of consent;
- the conditions or circumstances that are seen as negating consent;
- the way in which a defendant’s ‘honest belief’ in consent is dealt with; and
- the use of judicial directions as a way in which to inform and educate the jury about what amounts, or does not amount, to consent.133

Statutory definition of consent

25.75 Statutory definitions of consent seek to provide legal clarity, make clear that resistance and injury are not required to prove lack of consent, and educate the general community about ‘the boundaries of proscribed sexual behaviour’.134 They may, however, be criticised as inflexible—because the dividing line between real consent and mere submission may be difficult to draw—and as introducing greater complexity.135

---

134 Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 33, 35. See also: Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 34. A definition of consent was subsequently inserted in the NSW legislation.

25.76 With the exception of the ACT, every Australian jurisdiction has a statutory definition of consent based on one of the following formulations:

- free agreement;\(^{137}\)
- free and voluntary agreement;\(^{138}\) or
- consent freely and voluntarily given.\(^{139}\)

25.77 The legislation of all jurisdictions—except Queensland—also specifically addresses the continuation of sexual intercourse after consent has been withdrawn.\(^{140}\)

25.78 The Australian definitions accord with the recommendation of the United Nations Division for the Advancement of Women that legislation should approach consent as ‘unequivocal and voluntary agreement’ and that the accused should be required to prove the steps taken to ‘ascertain whether the complainant/survivor was consenting’.\(^{141}\)

25.79 The United Kingdom definition of consent explicitly requires agreement: ‘a person consents if he agrees by choice, and has the freedom and capacity to make that choice’.\(^{142}\) This model was initially recommended by the NSW Criminal Law Review Division in 2007 and included in its consultation draft bill.\(^{143}\)

Consultation Paper

25.80 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory sexual offences legislation should provide statutory definitions of consent based on ‘free and voluntary agreement’.\(^{144}\)

---

136 Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67 lists a range of circumstances in which there is no consent. In 2001, the ACT Law Reform Commission recommended the enactment of a statutory definition, which was supported by the ACT Government: ACT Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences, Report No 17 (2001), 71.

137 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic)  s 36; Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(1).

138 Criminal Code (Cth) s 192(1); Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(2); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 46(2); Criminal Code (NT) s 192(1). See also Criminal Code (Cth) ss 268.14, 268.19, 268.59, 268.64, 268.82, 268.87. As these are all sexual violence or rape offences in the context of war crimes or crimes against humanity, they are not discussed in this chapter.

139 Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(1); Criminal Code (WA) s 3319(2). Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(1) further provides that consent means ‘consent freely and voluntarily given by a person with the cognitive capacity to give the consent’. See also Michael v Western Australia (2008) 183 A Crim R 348 for a discussion of the statutory definitions of consent and the role of deceit and fraud.

140 Continuation is not explicitly addressed in Queensland legislation but the ‘weight of authority supports treating the continuation of sexual intercourse as satisfying the physical act required for a charge of rape’: Thomson Reuters, The Laws of Australia, vol 10, Criminal Offences, 10(3), [190].

141 United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs Division for the Advancement of Women, Handbook for Legislation on Violence Against Women (2009), 27. See also discussion of this approach in Time for Action, 108, n 183 referring to earlier work by the Division of the Advancement of Women. The latter component of this definition regarding the steps taken by the accused is discussed below.

142 Sexual Offences Act 2003 (UK) s 74.

144 Consultation Paper, Proposal 16–2. Alternative formulations of the penetrative sexual offence, which seek to focus the offence away from issues of consent and instead focus on the circumstances under which 25.81 Stakeholders generally expressed support. The Australian Institute of Family Studies (AIFS), for example, observed that a positive and communicative model of consent defined by legislation is an important step to take because it contributes to ‘a shift in how the offence of sexual assault is understood—from an offence that is committed forcibly and against the will of another person to an offence against a person’s agency’.

25.82 Professor Patricia Easteal considered that a definition of consent based on free and voluntary agreement recognises the difficulty of proving lack of consent in the context of sexual assault by a partner. Jenny’s Place Women and Children Refuge supported the proposal and considered that uniformity across all jurisdictions in relation to the definition of consent would provide ‘a clear standard and statement of the law that can be used to educate the community, and in particular victims of sexual assault’.

25.83 Some stakeholders expressed concerns that the Consultation Paper proposal gives rise to issues of interpretation that may cause greater uncertainty about the law and does not appropriately reflect the reality of sexual interactions—which are best conceived as a spectrum from consensual sex to criminal behaviour.

Commissions’ views

25.84 The Commissions support the adoption of a statutory definition of consent across all Australian jurisdictions. In taking this view, the Commissions are informed by the MCCOC’s discussion of the relative merits of a statutory or common law definition of consent.

25.85 As discussed above, the Commonwealth, NSW, South Australia and the Northern Territory have already adopted ‘free and voluntary agreement’ as the current statutory definition of consent. That definition is also consistent with the Model Criminal Code. Few stakeholders have expressed reservations about the adoption of a statutory definition of consent.

---

146 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.

147 P Easteal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.

148 Jenny’s Place Women and Children Refuge, Submission FV 54, 28 May 2010.

150 Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 41–47.

151 Criminal Code (Cth) s 192(1); Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(2); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 46(2); Criminal Code (NT) s 192(1).

152 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
25.86 The Commissions agree that a definition based on agreement properly reflects the two objectives of sexual offences law: protecting the sexual autonomy and freedom of choice of adults; and reinforcing both positive and communicative understandings of consent through use of the term agreement. A majority of stakeholders similarly considered that consent should be conceived as a positive state of mind.

25.87 To the extent that introducing the concept of ‘agreement’ to the definition of consent may give rise to interpretation issues and problems in practice, the Commissions consider that supplementing any legislative provision that defines consent with a provision that includes a list of circumstances where free agreement may not have been given will assist, in practice, to clarify the meaning and expression of ‘agreement’.

25.88 The legislative definition of consent sets the standard to inform the community about the boundaries of proscribed sexual behaviour. The Commissions acknowledge criticisms that legislation alone is too blunt a tool to effectively inform community understandings, attitudes and beliefs about appropriate sexual interactions, and for this reason suggest that law reform driven by communicative understandings of consent should be supported by community education.

Recommendation 25–4 Federal, state and territory sexual offence provisions should include a statutory definition of consent based on the concept of free and voluntary agreement.

Circumstances where consent is vitiated

25.89 In every Australian jurisdiction, legislation prescribes some circumstances where consent to a sexual act is defined not to exist. If the prosecution proves the presence of such a circumstance in a particular case, consent is deemed to be vitiated, or the complainant is to be regarded as not consenting.

25.90 Many of the circumstances prescribed are common to all Australian jurisdictions. There is, however, considerable variation in scope and approach. Some codify the position at common law; others go beyond the common law position—rectifying anomalies, deficiencies or gaps.

153 Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 43.
154 For example, education and training about the myths, facts and law in relation to sexual assault could be delivered to school students, teachers, parents and carers, social workers, guidance officers, nurses, doctors, police recruits and journalists.
155 Ibid, 43.
156 Ibid, 43.
157 See, eg, the discussion in Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 36; Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 43–49. For a general discussion of the common law’s resistance to
25. Sexual Offences

Use of force and threat of the use of force

25.91 In all jurisdictions, where force is used or threatened to be used against the complainant or another person there is deemed to be no consent.\(^{158}\) The use of force or threatened use of force against another person is of particular relevance in the family violence context—for example, force or threats of force against children may be made to force the mother to agree to sexual intercourse.

25.92 Similarly, in some jurisdictions, there is no consent in circumstances of ‘fear of harm of any type’,\(^{159}\) ‘fear of bodily harm’,\(^{160}\) ‘threats of terror’,\(^{161}\) and ‘reasonable fear of force’.\(^{162}\) South Australia specifically provides that a ‘threat of the application of force’ may be express or implied.\(^{163}\)

Intimidation, coercion, extortion, deceit or fraud

25.93 In a small number of jurisdictions, there is or may be no consent where agreement to engage in the sexual activity is obtained by intimidation,\(^{164}\) coercive conduct,\(^{165}\) extortion,\(^ {166}\) deceit\(^ {167}\) or fraud.\(^ {168}\)

Other threats

25.94 In South Australia, there is no consent when it is obtained because of ‘an express or implied threat to degrade, humiliate, disgrace or harass the person or some other person’.\(^ {169}\)

25.95 In the ACT, there is no consent where it is caused ‘by a threat to publicly humiliate or disgrace, or to physically or mentally harass, the person or another person’.\(^ {170}\) recognising that consent may be vitiated by fraud or mistake and hence the introduction of legislative provisions see Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 39–40.

---

\(^{158}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(4)(c); Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36(a); Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(a); Criminal Code (WA) s 319(2)(a); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 46(3)(a)(i); Criminal Code (Tas) 2A(2)(b); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(a)(c); Criminal Code (NT) s 192 (2)(a). In the ACT, this other person is required to be ‘present or nearby’—no other jurisdiction has this qualification around the use or threat of the use of force to a person other than the complainant. See also Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 38, app 2, cl 5.2.3.

\(^{159}\) Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36(b); Criminal Code (NT) s 192(2)(a).

\(^{160}\) Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(c).

\(^{161}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(4)(c).

\(^{162}\) Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(2)(b).

\(^{163}\) Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 46(3)(a)(i).

\(^{164}\) Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(b); Criminal Code (WA) s 319(2)(a). See also Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(6)(b): ‘if the person has sexual intercourse because of intimidatory or coercive conduct, or other threat, that does not involve a threat of force’.

\(^{165}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(6)(b).

\(^{166}\) Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(c), including extortion against another person.

\(^{167}\) Criminal Code (WA) s 319(2)(a).

\(^{168}\) Ibid s 319(2)(a); Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(1); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(g).

\(^{169}\) Criminal Law Consolidation (Rape and Sexual Offences) Amendment Act 2008 (SA) s 46(3)(a)(ii).

\(^{170}\) Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(d).
25.96 Some jurisdictions seek to prescribe non-physical threats and acts as circumstances in which there is, or may be, no consent by including threats ‘that do not involve a threat of force’,\(^{171}\) ‘of harm of any type’\(^ {172}\) or ‘of any kind’.\(^ {173}\)

Asleep, unconscious or affected by drugs

25.97 In NSW, Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania and the Northern Territory, there is no consent when the complainant is asleep or unconscious.\(^ {174}\)

25.98 In Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania and the Northern Territory, there is no consent where the complainant is so affected by alcohol or other drugs as ‘to be incapable of freely agreeing’ to the sexual activity.\(^ {175}\) In the ACT, the effect of alcohol or other drugs is less qualified; there is no consent if it is caused by ‘the effect of intoxicating liquor, a drug or anaesthetic’.\(^ {176}\) In NSW, there may be no consent where a complainant was ‘substantially intoxicated by alcohol or any drug’.\(^ {177}\) This formulation adopts the view expressed in the report of the Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce that the degree of intoxication and whether it was such that a person was ‘unable to consent’ are matters for the jury.\(^ {178}\)

Mistaken identity

25.99 In all jurisdictions—except Western Australia—\(^ {179}\) there is no consent where the complainant is mistaken as to the identity of the person with whom he or she has engaged in sexual activity.\(^ {180}\) In addition, NSW provides that there is no consent where the complainant mistakenly believed that he or she was married to the person.\(^ {181}\)

\(^{171}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(6)(b).

\(^{172}\) Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36(b), which covers a threat against another person; Criminal Code (NT) s 192(2)(a). See also Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(c), which includes ‘fear of bodily’ harm.

\(^{173}\) Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(2)(c).

\(^{174}\) In some jurisdictions, being asleep or unconscious is specified on its own as a circumstance that negates consent: Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(4)(b); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 46(3)(c). These jurisdictions deal with the lack of consent in the context of the effect of alcohol and other drugs separately. Other jurisdictions specify being asleep or unconscious along with the effect of alcohol and other drugs: Crimes Act 1938 (Vic) s 36(d); Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(h); Criminal Code (NT) s 192(2)(c). See also Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), cl 5.2.3, 38.

\(^{175}\) Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36(d); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 46(3)(d); Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(2)(h); Criminal Code (NT) s 192(2)(c). See also Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 38, app 2, cl 5.2.3.

\(^{176}\) Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(e).

\(^{177}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(6)(a).

\(^{178}\) Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 37.

\(^{179}\) Western Australia does however specify that consent is negated where it has been obtained by ‘deceit, or any fraudulent means’: Criminal Code (WA) s 319(2)(a).

\(^{180}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(5)(b); Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36(f); Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(f); Criminal Law Consolidation Act (SA) s 46(3)(g); Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(2)(g); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(f); Criminal Code (NT) s 192(e).

\(^{181}\) Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(5)(b). See also Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(f) which specifies that there is no consent where the person agrees to the sexual activity when they had the ‘mistaken belief’ induced by the accused that they were sexual partners.
Mistaken about the sexual nature of the act

25.100 In Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania and the Northern Territory there is no consent where the person agreed or submitted to sexual activity being mistaken about the sexual nature of the act. Other specific factors in this category include:

- in NSW, Victoria and the Northern Territory—mistaken belief that sexual intercourse is for medical or hygienic purposes; and
- in NSW and Queensland—agreeing or submitting to an act because of false or fraudulent representations about the nature or purposes of the act.

Capacity to understand nature of the act

25.101 Most jurisdictions prescribe that there is no consent where the person who has agreed or submitted to the sexual act does not have the capacity to understand the sexual nature of the act. The question of capacity is part of the Queensland definition of consent.

Abuse of position of authority or trust

25.102 There is no consent when the accused person is in a position of authority or trust over the complainant in Queensland, Tasmania and the ACT. There may be no consent where the accused has abused a ‘position of authority or trust’ in NSW. In addition, the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) specifies that consent is not a defence to a range of sexual offences occurring within relationships of authority or trust. For example, it is an offence for a person who is ‘responsible for the care’ of a person with a cognitive impairment to have sexual intercourse with that person, and consent is not a defence.

---

182 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36(f); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 46(3)(h); Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(g), where the complainant must have been ‘reasonably mistaken about the nature or purpose of the act’; Criminal Code (NT) s 192(2)(e). See also Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), cl 5.2.3, 38.
183 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(5)(c); Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36(g); Criminal Code (NT) s 192(1)(f).
184 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(5)(c); Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(e).
185 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(5)(c); Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(e).
186 Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(1).
187 Ibid s 348(2)(d); Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(e); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(h).
188 Ibid s 348(2)(d); Criminal Code (Qld) s 348(2)(e); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(h).
189 Ibid s 66F(2). The penalty applicable for this offence, a maximum of 10 years imprisonment, is less than that for sexual assault without consent (14 years).
Unlawful detention

25.104 In most jurisdictions a person unlawfully detained does not consent to sexual activity.\(^{190}\)

Communicating consent

25.105 Tasmania is the only jurisdiction in which there is no consent in the absence of verbal or physical communication as to free agreement.\(^{191}\) In other jurisdictions, such as Victoria, the implications of communicating consent are dealt with by directions to the jury.\(^{192}\)

Consultation Paper

25.106 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory sexual offences legislation should prescribe a non-exhaustive list of circumstances where consent may be vitiated—that is, made legally invalid or defective. The proposal stated that the circumstances ‘need not automatically negate consent, but the circumstances must in some way be recognised as vitiating consent’.

25.107 The proposal stated that, at a minimum, the non-exhaustive list of vitiating factors should include:

- lack of capacity to consent, including because a person is asleep or unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or other drugs as to be unable to consent;
- the actual use of force, threatened use of force against the complainant or another person, which need not involve physical violence or physical harm;
- unlawful detention;
- mistaken identity and mistakes as to the nature of the act (including mistakes generated by the fraud or deceit of the accused); and
- any position of authority or power, intimidation or coercive conduct.\(^{193}\)

25.108 The Commissions also asked to what extent the circumstances vitiating consent set out in current legislation are appropriate to sexual assault committed in a family violence context, and whether any amendments are required to draw attention to the coercive environment created by family violence, or whether the current provisions are sufficient.\(^{194}\)

\(^{190}\) Ibid s 61HA(4)(d); Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 36(c); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 46(3)(b); Criminal Code (Tas) s 2a(2)(d); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 67(1)(j); Criminal Code (NT) s 192(2)(b). See also Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), cl 5.2.3, 38.

\(^{191}\) Criminal Code (Tas) s 2A(2)(a).

\(^{192}\) See Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 37AA.

\(^{193}\) Consultation Paper, Proposal 16–3.

\(^{194}\) Ibid, Question 16–6.
25. Sexual Offences

Submissions and consultations

25.109 Stakeholders generally supported the proposal. There was near unanimous support from stakeholders for the idea that legislation should prescribe a non-exhaustive list of circumstances in which there may not be consent. Points of difference arose, however, in respect to the legal effect of the existence of a prescribed circumstance—that is, whether in the circumstances prescribed consent is automatically negated or may be negated—and the adequacy of the proposed circumstances.

25.110 AIFS commented that a non-exhaustive list of circumstances where there can be no consent is an important step to support the conception of consent as ‘free agreement’. Legal Aid NSW agreed this is consistent with a communicative model of consent, but argued that the existence of a prescribed circumstance should give rise to a rebuttal presumption of no consent. The Law Council of Australia (the Law Council) considered the Consultation Paper proposal to be ‘internally inconsistent’ and opposed it to the extent that it attempted to specify circumstances in which the tribunal of fact must find there is no consent. The Law Council did not object, however, to a list of circumstances that would be ‘material’ to a finding of absence of consent.

25.111 Stakeholders expressed a range of views about the circumstances proposed to be specified. In relation to threats of force, NASASV and the Canberra Rape Crisis Centre submitted that the legislation should prescribe ‘implied threats of use of force’ as a relevant circumstance.

25.112 Other stakeholders provided anecdotal evidence suggesting the importance of including threats against others as a circumstance where there is no consent—

---

196 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.

197 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.

198 That is, because the proposal stated that legislation should provide a non-exhaustive list of ‘circumstances where there is no consent to sexual activity, or where consent is vitiated’ and that those circumstances ‘need not automatically negate consent’: Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010. Also Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.

especially as some women’s partners threaten to abuse the children if the woman does not comply with her partner’s demands.201

25.113 Women’s Legal Service Queensland considered that the circumstance of ‘any position of authority or power, intimidation or coercive conduct’ would cover most sexual assault perpetrated in a family violence context.202 NASASV suggested that legislation should also provide illustrative examples of such circumstances; and that the circumstance should be modified so as to capture any person in a position of authority or trust.203

25.114 Stakeholders emphasised that the issue of consent in the context of family violence and intimate relationships is complex; and that complexity is magnified where there is a history of violence and coerced ‘consent’.204 The disjunction between the criminal justice system’s focus on isolated incidents, as opposed to a pattern or history of family violence, was identified as a particular challenge in proving lack of consent.205

25.115 Professor Patricia Easteal referred to research that identified four types of coercion in ‘wife rape’: social coercion, interpersonal coercion, threat of physical force and physical force. She noted that the literature suggests victims of sexual assault by an intimate partner ‘may experience a combination of these types of coercion, and the nature of the coercion may change over the course of the relationship, in the context of changing abuse patterns’.206

25.116 Stakeholders had different views about how legislation can best address these realities. Easteal argued that vitiation of consent needs to be defined specifically to include the type of intimidation that can be generated in a marital or intimate relationship.207

25.117 Some stakeholders suggested that legislation should either prescribe family violence as a circumstance where there is no consent, or recognise family violence as an environment characterised by threats of force or terror and prescribe that there is no consent where it is obtained by such threats.208 Others emphasised that the family violence context is such that actual threats or coercive behaviour need not be immediately present to affect the validity of consent and that the prescribed

206 P Easteal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
207 Ibid.
208 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Jenny’s Place Women and Children Refuge, Submission FV 54, 28 May 2010. As in Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(4)(c). circumstances should refer to a history of force and intimidation. Rather than recognising the coercive nature of family violence as a circumstance affecting the validity of consent, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria and Professor Julie Stubbs considered that this issue should be dealt with as part of an objects clause to assist in the interpretation of the relevant provisions.

Stakeholders also suggested that the circumstances vitiating consent set out in the Commissions’ proposal should be expanded to include:

- economic abuse;
- where consent is purported to be given by persons with a cognitive impairment to sexual activity with a carer;
- fear of force or fear of harm of any type;
- threats to harm animals; and
- threats to damage property.

Commissions’ views

Identifying the circumstances where there can be no consent, and where there may be no consent, as determined by the jury, has been a key concern of law reform in this area.

The approach to circumstances vitiating consent varies across Australia. The ACT identifies the most circumstances and Western Australia the least. The Victorian approach is similar to that recommended by the MCCOC. NSW is unique in separately specifying circumstances where there: (a) can be no consent; (b) may be no consent in the circumstances of the case—which is a question for the jury to decide.

---

210 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010.
214 Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010.
215 Ibid.
217 Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 49. However, since the MCCOC report, NSW has legislated in a different way from other jurisdictions, as discussed below.
218 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(4)–(6).
25.121 The Commissions’ view remains that, at a minimum, federal, state and territory legislation should recognise certain specified circumstances as ones where consent may be vitiated. The recommendation below intentionally leaves it open to the Commonwealth, state and territory parliaments to decide whether particular circumstances should be considered as automatically negating consent. The list of circumstances is non-exhaustive, as is presently the case in all Australian jurisdictions. This allows juries to find, on the evidence, that there was no consent, even if a case does not fall within one of the listed circumstances.219

25.122 The recommendation below incorporates minor changes of wording from the proposal, including to refer to abuse of a position ‘of authority or trust’; and to threats against the ‘complainant or any other person’—better reflecting circumstances that may arise in a family violence context.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recommendation 25–5</th>
<th>Federal, state and territory sexual offence provisions should set out a non-exhaustive list of circumstances that may vitiate consent including, at a minimum:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(a)</td>
<td>lack of capacity to consent, including because a person is asleep or unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or other drugs as to be unable to consent;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(b)</td>
<td>where a person submits because of force, or fear of force, against the complainant or another person;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(c)</td>
<td>where a person submits because of fear of harm of any type against the complainant or another person;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(d)</td>
<td>unlawful detention;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(e)</td>
<td>mistaken identity and mistakes as to the nature of the act (including mistakes generated by the fraud or deceit of the accused);</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(f)</td>
<td>abuse of a position of authority or trust; and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(g)</td>
<td>intimidating or coercive conduct, or other threat, that does not necessarily involve a threat of force, against the complainant or another person.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The fault element

25.123 The discussion below focuses on the fault elements220 of sexual offences and the relationship between fault and lack of consent.

25.124 The penetrative sexual offence, or ‘rape’, comprises physical elements and fault elements. In all jurisdictions, the physical elements of the offence require the 220 Referred to as the ‘mental’ element in the Consultation Paper, [16.69]–[16.110].

---

25. Sexual Offences

prosecution to prove that sexual penetration took place without the consent of the complainant.

25.125 The fault element—the ‘state of mind of the accused which must be established beyond reasonable doubt before the accused can be convicted’—differs among Australian jurisdictions.

25.126 In Queensland, Western Australia and Tasmania, the fault element for rape is merely an intention to have intercourse. In the remaining jurisdictions, the fault element for rape is both an intention to have intercourse and:

- in NSW, the ACT and the NT, that the accused ‘knows that the other person does not consent’ or is ‘reckless as to whether the other person consents’,
- in Victoria, that the accused commits the act ‘while being aware that the person is not consenting or might not be consenting’ or ‘while not giving any thought to whether the person is not consenting or might not be consenting’, and
- in South Australia, that the accused ‘knows, or is recklessly indifferent to, the fact that the other person does not so consent’.

25.127 It is these additional fault elements—knowledge and recklessness—that have raised the most contentious questions for law reform, both as elements of offences and in the context of the defences based on an accused’s ‘reasonable belief’ or ‘honest and reasonable belief’ that the complainant was consenting.

25.128 In all jurisdictions except NSW, the accused may raise a defence that he or she honestly believed that the complainant was consenting. In Victoria, South Australia, and the ACT, where this defence is under the common law, the honest belief in consent need not be reasonable. In Queensland, Western Australia, Tasmania, and the Northern Territory, the belief must be both honest and reasonable.

222 This is the only mental element required: Criminal Code (Qld) s 349; Criminal Code (WA) s 325; Criminal Code (Tas) s 13.
223 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(3); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT). Similar terminology to that set out in the text is used in the Northern Territory: Criminal Code (NT) s 192(4). In NSW, it is also sufficient if the accused has no reasonable grounds for believing that the other person consents to sexual intercourse: Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(3)(c).
224 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 38(2)(a).
225 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 48(1).
227 Director of Public Prosecutions v Morgan [1976] AC.
228 Criminal Code (Qld) s 24; Criminal Code (WA) s 24; Criminal Code (NT) s 32. See also Tasmania which has included recklessness within its treatment of a mistaken belief: Criminal Code (Tas) s 14A(1)(b). See discussion in Model Criminal Code Officers Committee—Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 71; and Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Final Report (2004), [8.4].
25.129 Defences of mistaken belief in consent, or honest and reasonable belief in consent, are no longer relevant under the NSW legislation. Instead, the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) definition of consent refers to the accused’s knowledge about consent in such a way that it is relevant to that legislation’s definition of consent. 229

Recklessness

25.130 The concept of ‘recklessness’, in the context of sexual offences, differs substantially among Australian jurisdictions.

25.131 Recklessness is not defined in the NSW legislation, but may be established where the accused:
- ‘realised the possibility that the complainant was not consenting’ but went ahead regardless; 230 or
- ‘failed to consider whether or not the complainant was consenting … notwithstanding the risk that the complainant was not consenting would have been obvious to someone with the accused’s mental capacity if they had turned his or her mind to it’. 231

25.132 Both of these kinds of recklessness—‘advertent’ or ‘non-advertent’ recklessness respectively—are ‘wholly subjective’. 232

25.133 By criminalising ‘non-advertent’ recklessness, NSW is said to ‘go further’ than other jurisdictions. 233 The policy reasons why non-advertent recklessness should be included were expressed by Kirby P in R v Kitchener:

To criminalise conscious advertence to the possibility of non-consent, but to excuse the reckless failure of the accused to give a moment’s thought to that possibility, is self-evidently unacceptable. In the hierarchy of wrong-doing, such total indifference to the consent of a person to have sexual intercourse is plainly reckless, at least in our society today … Such a law would simply reaffirm the view that our criminal law, at crucial moments, fails to provide principled protection to the victims of unwanted sexual intercourse, most of whom are women. 234 a person is recklessly indifferent to the fact that another person does not consent to an act, or has withdrawn consent to an act, if he or she—

25.134 In South Australia, ‘recklessly indifferent’ is defined in the following way:

---

229 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 61HA(3).
232 Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 43. See also, Banditt v The Queen (2005) 224 CLR 262.
233 Thomson Reuters, The Laws of Australia, vol 10, Criminal Offences, 10.3, [300].
25. Sexual Offences

25.135 The Victorian provision refers to a person who did not give ‘any thought’ as to whether or not the complainant was consenting.236 This provision addresses the position in R v Ev Costa, where it was held that recklessness required conscious advertence to the question of whether the complainant was consenting.237

Defence of ‘honest belief’

25.136 Fault elements, such as knowledge and recklessness, are elements of some defences. That an accused may be acquitted on the basis of an honest, but unreasonable, belief or mistake in consent was established by the House of Lords in DPP v Morgan.238 In that case three men were told by the husband of the complainant that they could have sexual intercourse with her and that any resistance (physical or verbal) she made was pretence, with the husband suggesting that his wife found such behaviour exciting. The men proceeded to have intercourse with the woman and were subsequently charged with and found guilty of rape. The men appealed on the basis that they held an honest belief that the woman was consenting. The convictions were ultimately upheld on the basis that a jury ‘would have been extremely unlikely … [to have] accepted this defence on the facts of the case’.239

25.137 The significance of Morgan is that a majority of the House of Lords held that where the accused held an honest, albeit unreasonable belief, that the complainant was consenting to the sexual intercourse, the offence of rape was not committed:

\[
\text{to insist that a belief must be reasonable to excuse it is to insist that the accused is to be found guilty of intending to do that which in truth he did not intend to do, or that}
\]

---

235 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 47. For a discussion of the significance of the accused being aware of the ‘possibility’ as opposed to the ‘probability’ that the other person might not be consenting to the act or has withdrawn consent to the act, see R v Egan (1985) 15 A Crim R 20.
237 R v Ev Costa [1996] VSC, cf R v Kitchener (1993) 29 NSWLR 696, where complete failure to consider or avert to consent was held sufficient to constitute recklessness.
238 Director of Public Prosecutions v Morgan [1976] AC. In the Australian common law jurisdictions see: Banditt v The Queen (2005) 224 CLR 262; R v Brown [1975] 10 SASR 139. The decision in Banditt was made before the most recent legislative change in NSW, which has introduced an objective element. Morgan does not apply in the Code jurisdictions.
239 Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 73.
his state of mind although innocent of evil intent, can convict him if it be honest but not rational.240

25.138 The decision in Morgan was controversial and generated considerable debate. It led to the creation in 1975 of an Advisory Group on the Law of Rape,241 which concluded that the test was correct but that there should be clarification of the significance of ‘reasonableness’ in the legislation.242

25.139 The defence of honest belief is currently available to accused persons in Victoria, South Australia, and the ACT in respect of the offence of rape or sexual intercourse without consent.243 In Victoria, judges must direct juries to consider whether an accused’s belief was reasonable in all the circumstances, including reference to ‘whether the accused took any steps to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting’.244

Defence of ‘honest and reasonable belief’

25.140 Generally, where the statutory defence of honest and reasonable belief is available to an accused, the question of whether a defence is available on the facts of a case is answered by a two-stage inquiry: (a) did the accused believe that the complainant was consenting; and (b) if so, was that belief reasonable?245

25.141 The Tasmanian Criminal Code, however, articulates a defence specific to mistake as to consent. This defence articulates that an accused’s mistaken belief about the existence of consent is not honest or reasonable if the accused:

- (a) was in a state of self-induced intoxication and the mistake was not one which the accused would have made if not intoxicated; or
- (b) was reckless as to whether or not the complainant consented; or
- (c) did not take reasonable steps, in the circumstances known to him or her at the time of the offence, to ascertain that the complainant was consenting to the act.246

New South Wales approach

25.142 Until recently, the defence of honest belief that the complainant consented was available in NSW—a common law jurisdiction. Substantive changes in relation to

---

240 Director of Public Prosecutions v Morgan [1976] AC, 210 (Hailsham LJ).
241 The Advisory Group became known as the Heilbron Committee.
242 This recommendation was implemented in 1976, and was substantially superseded by later extensive reform of the law in the UK.
243 See, eg, R v Brown [1975] 10 SASR 139 (decided before Morgan but reaching the same decision); Banditt v The Queen (2005) 224 CLR 262.
244 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 37AA. This approach was also recommended by Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 85.
245 Criminal Code (Qld) s 24; Criminal Code (WA) s 24; Criminal Code (NT) s 32. See also Tasmania which has included recklessness within its treatment of a mistaken belief: Criminal Code (Tas) s 14A(3)(b). See also, Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 73.
246 Criminal Code (Tas) s 14A. consent were enacted in 2007. Section 61HA(3) of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) now provides:

A person who has sexual intercourse with another person without the consent of the other person knows that the other person does not consent to the sexual intercourse if:

(a) the person knows that the other person does not consent to the sexual intercourse, or
(b) the person is reckless as to whether the other person consents to the sexual intercourse, or
(c) the person has no reasonable grounds for believing that the other person consents to the sexual intercourse.

For the purpose of making any such finding, the trier of fact must have regard to all the circumstances of the case:

(d) including any steps taken by the person to ascertain whether the other person consents to the sexual intercourse, but

(e) not including any self-induced intoxication of the person.

Subjective and objective fault elements

25.143 Subjective fault elements, such as recklessness, knowledge and honest belief, emphasise the perspective of a particular defendant. Objective elements, such as reasonableness, focus on ‘the actual consequences of an accused’s conduct or the actual circumstances under which the conduct occurred rather than on the accused’s mental state during the performance of the conduct’. In this context, ‘honest and reasonable belief’ incorporates both a subjective and objective element.

25.144 The arguments for and against subjective fault elements have been canvassed in reports by the MCCOC and the VLRC. The main arguments in support of subjective fault elements include the following.

• Consistency with fundamental notions of criminal responsibility—for example, the notion that the criminal law, particularly in relation to serious offences, should not impose guilt where the person did not knowingly transgress the law.

---

247 Crimes Amendment (Consent—Sexual Assault Offences) Act 2007 (NSW).
248 See, Director of Public Prosecutions v Morgan [1976] AC, in relation to the classification of honest belief in consent as a subjective test.
249 M Findlay, S Odgers and S Yeo, Australian Criminal Justice (2005), 15.
Avoiding the practical difficulties of formulating objective standards—for example, the ‘reasonable person’ test raises issues in relation to whether the jury ought to consider what they would have done in the situation or whether the standard is that of a ‘reasonable man’. In addition, questions arise in relation to the qualities and attitudes about men and women that are ascribed to a ‘reasonable person’.252

The view that the trier of fact, in determining whether a subjective mental state existed, may take into account the reasonableness of the mental state.253

In respect of a defendant’s mistaken belief—the focus of only a small number of rape trials—an objective element would ‘jeopardise the principles of criminal responsibility without ensuring that a higher proportion of people who are actually guilty of rape are convicted’.254

25.145 The main arguments in support of objective fault elements include the following.255

Subjective fault elements reinforce myths about men, women and children and sexuality—in particular as to whether sexual access is always available and expectations about how consent is conveyed.256

An objective test is in accordance with the communicative model of consent established in the definitional frameworks.257

A defendant should not ‘be able to avoid culpability’ on the basis that ‘he did not give any thought at all as to whether the complainant was consenting or not’.258

The law ‘ought to impose a higher standard of care in sexual circumstances’,259 because ‘it is possible for a man to ascertain whether a woman is consenting or not with minimal effort’;260 and to have sexual intercourse with a woman without her consent is ‘to do her great harm’.261

---
255 See discussion in Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 79.
256 The defence of honest belief ‘supports the attitude that a person is entitled to have sex, unless the other person actively indicates they do not wish to do so. This places the onus on a person approached for sex to indicate lack of consent, instead of requiring the initiator to ascertain whether the other person is consenting’: Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Final Report (2004), [8.7].
258 Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Final Report (2004), [8.11]. See, eg, the Victorian decision of R v Ev Costa [1996] VSC 27, compared to the position in NSW stated in R v Kitchener (1993) 29 NSWLR 696, which found that failure to consider or advert to consent at all is reckless.
261 Ibid, 15–16.
Subjective tests are difficult because they contain a ‘double subjective element’: that is, both the complainant’s (was she consenting?) and defendant’s (did he know she was not consenting?) states of mind. This difficulty is compounded because the jury often must make its decision on the basis of the competing evidence of the complainant and the accused.

Consultation Paper

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory sexual offences legislation should adopt legislation based on the NSW approach to the fault element. That is, legislation should provide that a person who performs a sexual act with another person, without the consent of the other person, knows that the other person does not consent to the act if the person has no reasonable grounds for believing that the other person consents. Further, for the purpose of making any such finding, the trier of fact must have regard to all the circumstances of the case, including any steps taken by the person to ascertain whether the other person consents, but not including any self-induced intoxication of the person.

To better determine the impact of the defence of honest belief on complainants who have, or have had, an intimate relationship with the accused, the Commissions asked whether an honest belief in consent is more likely to be raised in cases where the complainant has or has had an intimate relationship with the accused; whether the insertion of an objective element would assist in such cases; and whether any other measures are required to clarify or restrict the defence of honest belief in such cases.

Submissions and consultations

Some stakeholders expressed support for the proposal but did not give reasons for their view. Others supported the proposal, expressly or impliedly, by reason of the objective elements. One stakeholder commented that, while there needs to be an objective element, even objective elements are not immune to bias and prejudice about sexuality, including the sexuality of certain groups, such as Indigenous women.268

25.149 Some stakeholders noted than an objective element would make it easier for the prosecution to discharge the onus of proof.269 Jenny’s Place Women and Children Refuge stated that the legislation should require proof by the accused of the steps taken to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting, as recommended by the United Nations Division for the Advancement of Women.270

25.150 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria did not express an opinion about the proposal, but noted that:

    a communicative model of consent … can be difficult to reconcile with a purely subjective mental element. There is a perception that reconciling these elements makes it extremely difficult to give comprehensible jury directions.271

25.151 AIFS commented that legislative measures that require a belief in consent to be reasonable ‘set up a situation in which the victim’s behaviour can be used as evidence … [of] the defendant’s state of mind at the time’ and have ‘frequently resulted in the defence counsel drawing on information about the complainant’s sexual history, or to appeal to rape myths in order to show that the defendant could have held that belief’.272

25.152 The Law Council and the Law Society of NSW strongly opposed the proposal to the extent that it ‘provides for a single offence where alternative subjective and objective fault elements are applicable’.273 The Law Council stated that, under the proposal:

    a person who knows that consent is absent is convicted of the same offence and liable to the same maximum penalty as the person who honestly believes that there is consent but is found to have been negligent (that is, the tribunal of fact is satisfied that the person did not have ‘reasonable grounds’ for that belief).274

25.153 Both organisations criticised the approach because a negligent offender is not equally culpable as a deliberate offender and should not be liable to the same maximum penalty.275 This, it was said, creates a situation where, after a jury trial resulting in a conviction, the sentencing judge will not know the basis upon which the

268 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
269 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Jenny’s Place Women and Children Refuge, Submission FV 54, 28 May 2010; P Eastal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
271 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
272 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.
25. Sexual Offences 1167

jury found the accused guilty and could proceed to sentence on a more serious basis than in fact determined by the jury.276

25.154 In the Law Council’s view, if an objective fault element is to be adopted, ‘it must be in a discrete offence with a considerably lower maximum penalty than the penalties currently applicable to intentional or reckless sexual assault’.277 The Law Society of NSW also submitted that:

- sexual assault is a serious crime with severe maximum penalties and it should be reserved for behaviour that is ‘so seriously wrong as to be deserving of criminal punishment’;
- although there are negligence offences with substantial penalties within the criminal law, this is the exception, rather than the rule with the vast majority of criminal offences requiring a ‘guilty mind’; and
- an accused who lacks the capacity of a hypothetical reasonable person (for example, an accused with a cognitive impairment) and who mistakenly believes that consent is present should not be held to the standard of people who have full capacity.278

25.155 Some stakeholders considered the proposal’s treatment of the self-induced intoxication of the accused to be problematic. Generally stakeholders agreed that self-induced intoxication is irrelevant to the question of whether a belief in consent is ‘reasonable’, but argued that it is relevant to the question of whether the accused ‘honestly’ held that belief:279

If the person does not know that consent is absent nor is reckless in that regard, then the person should not be found guilty of such an offence. It makes no difference whatsoever that the person was intoxicated. The necessary guilty mind is absent. There is no justification whatsoever for imposing liability for such a serious offence on the basis that, if the person had not been intoxicated, he or she would have known that consent was absent.280

25.156 NTLAC observed that the proposal’s treatment of self-induced intoxication is ‘out of kilter with patterns of actual sexual conduct (including misconduct) in the Northern Territory’ and favoured the retention of the current Northern Territory fault provisions.281

278 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
281 Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.
25.157 The Canberra Rape Crisis Centre also preferred an alternative approach, namely, making available the defence of honest and reasonable belief in all jurisdictions.282

25.158 There is some anecdotal evidence that the defence of honest belief is more likely to be raised in cases where there has been an intimate relationship283 and may be ‘treated as more credible’ in the family violence context than other contexts.284 Some stakeholders considered that other measures are required to clarify or restrict the defence of honest belief in this context. Women’s Legal Services NSW, for example, considered that ‘community education is a key aspect of ensuring the mutuality of consent in adult sexual relations’.285

Commissions’ views

25.159 ‘Honest belief’ is rarely the main or predominant issue in sexual offence proceedings, but the centrality of consent to sexual assault trials means that it invariably plays some role in how the legal system, its key players and jury members, understand and approach consent.286 For this and other reasons, the VLRC recommended that the fault element should be changed to ensure that an accused takes reasonable steps to ascertain that the complainant was consenting. In addition, the VLRC recommended that a mandatory jury direction on consent should be required by legislation.287 Only the latter of these recommendations has been implemented.288

25.160 In contrast, the MCCOC recommended that criminal liability for sexual offences should be determined on the basis of the subjective mental state of the accused. That is, that an accused should not be found guilty of sexual penetration without consent ‘unless the prosecution proves’ that the accused:

- knew that the victim was not consenting;
- was ‘reckless to the absence of consent’; or
- ‘failed to give any thought to the question of consent’.289

25.161 As such, the MCCOC approach permits an accused to rely on an honest, albeit unreasonable, belief in consent. Its reasons for this were based on the fact that the extent to which such a belief is unreasonable goes to the question of whether it has been established as a genuine or honest belief in consent. The MCCOC, like the

---

282 Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
283 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
287 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 37AA. This approach was also recommended by Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 85.
VLRC, recommended that juries be directed in relation to whether the mistake or belief in consent was reasonable in all the circumstances.\textsuperscript{290}

25.162 In the Commissions’ view, the issues are best addressed by legislation providing that it is a defence to the charge of rape that the accused held an honest and reasonable belief that the complainant was consenting. In addition, legislation should require that judges direct juries in relation to the evidence presented about that belief and whether, as part of the honesty requirement, the accused took any steps to ascertain whether consent was present.\textsuperscript{291}

25.163 In forming this view, the Commissions have sought to promote the communicative model of consent and reconcile it with the general proposition of law that the onus of proof in criminal trials lies with the prosecution.

25.164 The insertion of an objective fault element, or the modification of the subjective fault element by requiring reasonable steps to ascertain consent, has also been adopted by various overseas jurisdictions, for example, in New Zealand,\textsuperscript{292} the United Kingdom,\textsuperscript{293} and Canada.\textsuperscript{294} In the United Kingdom, the fault element is simply that a person commits rape when ‘A does not reasonably believe that B consents’.\textsuperscript{295}

25.165 The recommendation is consistent with the basic position in the Australian criminal code jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{296} For complainants in non-code jurisdictions, it will introduce a second standard to be met by an accused who seeks to avoid criminal culpability because of their belief that the complainant consented. The introduction of an objective fault element discourages the assumption of consent, including in the context of a previous consensual relationship or family violence.\textsuperscript{297}

25.166 In relation to the intoxication of the accused, the Commissions’ view is that intoxication is relevant to the honesty of the accused’s belief. The effect of intoxication on the accused, however, should not be a relevant factor in assessing the reasonableness of the accused’s belief.

\textsuperscript{290} Ibid, 85.
\textsuperscript{291} Jurors, when assessing the honesty and reasonableness of a belief, would have two tasks: assessing the honesty of the belief, including any steps taken by the accused to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting; and assessing the reasonableness of the belief, an objective factor to be judged by the standard of a reasonable person familiar with all the circumstances that were known to the accused at the relevant time.
\textsuperscript{292} Crimes Act 1961 (NZ) s 128(2).
\textsuperscript{293} Sexual Offences Act 2003 (UK) s 1. See also, s 75(1).
\textsuperscript{294} Criminal Code RSC 1985 C-46 s 273.2 However, see discussion of the effectiveness of these provisions in the context of sexual assault by a current or former intimate partner in M Randall, ‘Sexual Assault in Spousal Relationships,”Continuous Consent” and the Law, Honest but Mistaken Judicial Beliefs’ (2008) 32 University of Manitoba Law Journal 144.
\textsuperscript{295} Sexual Offences Act 2003 (UK) s 1.
\textsuperscript{296} Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 49.
\textsuperscript{297} Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Final Report (2004), [8.15].
Recommendation 25–6
Federal, state and territory sexual assault provisions should provide that it is a defence to the charge of ‘rape’ that the accused held an honest and reasonable belief that the complainant was consenting to the sexual penetration.

Jury directions about consent

25.167 Judicial directions to the jury on consent are an important mechanism for addressing the ‘stereotypical views of sexual roles in … [the] assessment of consent, which some ‘jurors and judges continue to bring to bear’.298 Where jury directions are directly responsive to continuing myths and misconceptions about sexual violence—for example, that physical resistance is necessary to convey lack of consent and that ‘true victims’ sustain injuries—they are also an important mechanism to reinforce the communicative model of consent. As the VLRC stated:

The jury direction performs an educative function by clarifying the law and establishing standards of behaviour for sexual relations which are based on principles of communication and respect.299

25.168 Victoria and the Northern Territory have legislated jury directions about consent. The MCCOC also recommended mandatory jury directions on consent in relevant cases.300

25.169 The Victorian model, introduced in 1991 and subsequently amended on a number of occasions,301 has been referred to as ‘the most significant and progressive reform’.302 In Victoria, the judge must direct the jury on consent only where it is ‘relevant to the facts in issue in a proceeding’.303 The judge must relate any such direction to ‘the facts in issue in the proceeding’ and the ‘elements of the offence being tried … so as to aid the jury’s comprehension of the direction’.304 The matters about which the judge must direct the jury include the meaning of consent (free agreement) and the circumstances, prescribed by legislation, in which the complainant does not consent, as well as:

(d) that the fact that the person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person’s free agreement;

(e) that the jury is not to regard a person as having freely agreed to a sexual act just because—

299 Ibid, [7.61].
301 Between 2001 and 2004 the VLRC reviewed the law concerning sexual offences and recommended further reform of jury directions about consent. These recommendations were subsequently enacted, see Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 2006 (Vic).
303 Crimes Act 1935 (Vic) s 37.
304 Ibid s 37.
25. Sexual Offences

(i) she or he did not protest or physically resist; or

(ii) she or he did not sustain physical injury; or

(iii) on that or an earlier occasion, she or he freely agreed to engage in another sexual act (whether or not of the same type) with that person, or a sexual act with another person.305

25.170 There is considerable controversy about the Victorian model in the literature and the case law.306 Concerns include that the directions may be seen to usurp the function of the jury in deciding the factual issue of consent, that they present an inaccurate picture of sexual activity and how people agree to such activity, that they are convoluted and confusing, and in some cases may contradict other aspects of the law—for example, the subjective test for an honest belief in consent.

25.171 The Northern Territory direction to the jury about consent is similar, but of more limited scope. In a relevant case, the judge must give a direction that a person is not to be taken as having consented to sexual intercourse simply because the person:

(a) did not protest or physically resist;

(b) did not sustain physical injury; or

(c) had, on that or an earlier occasion, consented to:

(i) sexual intercourse; or

(ii) an act of gross indecency, whether or not of the same type, with the accused.307

25.172 The Victorian legislation also requires a judge to direct juries about the accused’s knowledge and awareness about the presence of consent where the defence raises in evidence, or asserts that, the accused believed that the victim was consenting to the sexual act.308 In such circumstances, the judge must direct the jury that:

in considering whether the offence has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting, the jury must consider—

(a) any evidence of that belief; and

(b) whether that belief was reasonable in all the relevant circumstances having regard to—

(i) [in a case where one of the circumstances that vitiate consent exists] whether the accused was aware that that circumstance existed in relation to the complainant; and 305 Ibid s 37AAA.

307 Criminal Code (NT) s 192A. This was introduced in the Northern Territory in 1994.

308 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 37AA.
(ii) whether the accused took any steps to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting, and if so, the nature of those steps; and

(iii) any other relevant matters.\(^{309}\)

25.173 The Queensland Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code considered that 'compulsory directions would not necessarily overcome undesirable attitudes held by judges or juries', but endorsed the Victorian model to the extent of recommending that the jury be directed to consider the steps taken by the accused to ensure that the complainant consented in cases where honest and reasonable belief in consent is raised.\(^{310}\)

25.174 The MCCOC recommended a provision which follows the Victorian model, except for a significant amendment to the first clause.\(^{311}\) This provision stated:

1. … the judge must, in a relevant case, direct the jury (if any) that a person is not to be regarded as having consented to a sexual act just because:
   a. The person did not say or do anything to indicate that she or he did not consent; or
   b. The person did not protest or physically resist; or
   c. The person did not sustain physical injury; or
   d. On that or an earlier occasion, the person consented to engage in a sexual act (whether or not of the same type) with that person, or a sexual act with another person.

2. … the judge must, in a relevant case, direct the jury (if any) that in determining whether the accused was under a mistaken belief that a person consented to a sexual act the jury may consider whether the mistaken belief was reasonable in the circumstances.\(^{312}\)

Consultation Paper

25.175 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory legislation should provide that a direction must be made to the jury on consent in sexual offence proceedings where it is relevant to a fact in issue. Such directions must be related to the facts in issue and the elements of the offence and expressed in such a way as to aid the comprehension of the jury. Such directions should cover:

a. the meaning of consent (as defined in the legislation);

\(^{309}\) Ibid.

\(^{310}\) Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code (Qld), Report of the Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code (2000), Rec 64.3.

\(^{311}\) This recommendation was made before the term 'normally' was removed from Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 37(1)(a). See discussion of problems with the term 'normally' in Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Interim Report (2003), [7.34]–[7.40].

\(^{312}\) Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), app 2, cl 5.2.43. Most of the submissions received by the MCCOC generally supported its approach. Some considered the Victorian model should be followed more closely. Model Criminal Code Officers Committee–Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 265.
the circumstances that vitiate consent, and that if the jury finds beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances exists then the complainant was not consenting;

(c) the fact that the person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act when the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person’s free agreement; and

(d) that the jury is not to regard a person as having freely agreed to a sexual act just because she or he did not protest or physically resist, did not sustain physical injury, or freely agreed to engage in another sexual act (whether or not of the same type) with that person, or a sexual act with another person, on an earlier occasion.

25.176 The Commissions also proposed that, where the defence asserts that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting to the sexual act, then the judge must direct the jury to consider:

(e) any evidence of that belief; and

(f) whether that belief was reasonable in all the relevant circumstances having regard to (in a case where one of the circumstances that vitiate consent exists) whether the accused was aware that that circumstance existed in relation to the complainant;

(g) whether the accused took any steps to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting, and if so, the nature of those steps; and

(h) any other relevant matters. 313

Submissions and consultations

25.177 Many stakeholders supported the Consultation Paper proposal. 314 The main reasons stakeholders gave for supporting a jury direction about consent were the need to educate the jury, 315 to assist jurors to understand and apply the legal definition of consent; 316 to redress juror bias, where it exists; 317 to debunk myths about sexual assault; 318 and to reinforce a communicative model of consent. 319

316 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
317 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
319 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
Some stakeholders strongly opposed a direction that the fact that the person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement is enough to show that the act took place without the person’s free agreement. Concerns included that the direction goes too far—because such circumstances are material to the question of consent but cannot be determinative—and because the direction creates a presumption that a sexual act is unlawful unless proved otherwise.

The Law Society of NSW also specifically opposed a direction that consent is not to be regarded as having been freely given just because the complainant freely agreed to engage in another sexual act on an earlier occasion. It considered that such a direction ‘is fraught with difficulty if the fairness of the trial … is to be maintained’, and concerns matters for the jury. For example, where the accused may have made an honest and reasonable mistake about consent because of the nature of a previous relationship, it would be relevant for the jury to consider how consent had been shown in the past, rather than being directed that this evidence was irrelevant to the issue of consent. In contrast, Women’s Legal Services NSW supported a broader direction, directing the jury that it is irrelevant to the issue of consent that the complainant ‘was previously or at the time of the sexual act in a sexual relationship with that person or another person’.

To the extent that the proposed direction addresses the accused’s belief that the complainant was consenting, some stakeholders commented that the proposal reflected current practice. The NASASV supported this aspect of the proposal on the basis that the limitations of the defence of honest and reasonable belief should be clearly understood by the jury.

Jenny’s Place Women and Children Refuge specifically supported a direction that the jury consider whether the accused took any steps to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting in order to quash ‘conjecture and assumptions about continuous consent in intimate relationships’.

Commissions’ views

Research suggests that jurors find consent a difficult concept to understand and apply, and that jurors’ pre-existing attitudes have been found to influence their judgments more than the facts of the case and the manner in which the evidence was given. For these reasons, the Commissions support enacting positive judicial directions on consent: its meaning; the circumstances where there may be no consent; and the relevance of not communicating consent, physical resistance, physical injury and consent to other sexual acts. Such directions may assist jurors to determine the facts of the case and apply the law to those facts, and reinforce the communicative model of consent. They may also operate to effect cultural change for those involved in the prosecution of sexual offences and where coupled with education in the community.

25.183 The Commissions’ recommendation largely reflects the Victorian model to the extent that it requires a judge to direct the jury about the meaning of consent, the circumstances where there may be no consent and an accused’s belief that the complainant was consenting. The manner by which the recommendation requires a judge to direct the jury about the relevance of certain factors to a jury’s determination of whether a complainant consented in a particular case reflects the Model Criminal Code provisions.

Recommendation 25–7 State and territory sexual offence provisions should provide that the judge must, if it is relevant to the facts in issue in a sexual offence proceeding, direct the jury:

(a) on the meaning of consent, as defined in the legislation;

(b) on the circumstances where there may be no consent, and the consequence of a finding beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances exists;

(c) that a person is not to be regarded as having consented to a sexual act just because:

(i) the person did not say or do anything to indicate that she or he did not consent; or

(ii) the person did not protest or physically resist; or

(iii) the person did not sustain physical injury; or

(iv) on that, or an earlier, occasion the person consented to engage in a sexual act—whether or not of the same type—with that person or another person.

Where evidence is led, or an assertion is made, that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting to the sexual act, then the judge must direct the jury to consider:

(d) any evidence of that belief;

(e) whether the accused took any steps to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting, and if so, the nature of those steps;
(f) the reasonableness of the accused’s belief in all the circumstances, including the accused’s knowledge or awareness of any circumstance that may vitiate consent; and

(g) any other relevant matter.

Guiding principles and objects clauses

25.184 The Time for Action report drew attention to the important role that guiding principles can play in the interpretation of the law relating to sexual offences and in the application of rules of evidence in sexual offence proceedings. Victoria is currently the only Australian jurisdiction which provides an objects statement and guiding principles in relation to sexual offences and related procedural and evidentiary matters.

25.185 The Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) provides that the objectives of its sexual offences provisions are:

(a) to uphold the fundamental right of every person to make decisions about his or her sexual behaviour and to choose not to engage in sexual activity;

(b) to protect children and persons with a cognitive impairment from sexual exploitation.

25.186 In addition, guiding principles were included within the legislation, which set out the facts that the court should have regard to when interpreting the various sexual offences in that Act. These are that:

(a) there is a high incidence of sexual violence within society; and

(b) sexual offences are significantly under-reported; and

(c) a significant number of sexual offences are committed against women, children and other vulnerable persons including persons with a cognitive impairment; and

(d) sexual offenders are commonly known to their victims; and

(e) sexual offences often occur in circumstances where there is unlikely to be any physical signs of an offence having occurred.

25.187 There are identical provisions in the Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 (Vic) to assist the court when interpreting the provisions relating to confidential communications, and in the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) to assist

---

328 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 37A.
329 Ibid s 37B.
330 Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 (Vic) s 32AB.
the court when interpreting the provisions relating in whole or in part to sexual offences.331

25.188 These objects statements and guiding principles were introduced following the recommendations of the VLRC.332 The VLRC considered that such provisions are an important educative tool, addressing the need for cultural change and the implementation gap discussed in Chapter 24. The VLRC articulated three main arguments for including guiding principles:

The criminal law has both a regulatory and an educative function. It should emphasise that people have a right to make decisions about their sexual activity and to choose not to engage in sexual activity. The interpretation clause will ensure that the provisions of sexual offences laws are interpreted consistently with the goals of the legislation.

A statement of principles of interpretation will give added weight to any directions or instructions that a judge gives to the jury. The judge and jury can refer to the principles to shed light on where any ambiguity may exist in the interpretation of particular sections.

Sexual assault continues to be under-reported, and the serious social harm of sexual assault has only recently begun to be given the recognition that it deserves. The unique nature and context of sexual assault should be clearly stated by the legislature, so that this underwrites the interpretation of the particular provisions in the legislation.333

25.189 Some states and territories have also incorporated objects clauses and/or guiding principles in their family violence protection order legislation.334 While there is some question about the extent to which such provisions have been effective in practice,335 such principles may provide an important symbolic statement about the nature of such violence, the community’s lack of tolerance for such violence, and the response of the law.336

331 In Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic) v Theophanous [2009] VSC, the Supreme Court of Victoria considered the applicability of the guiding principles contained in, what was then, the Evidence Act 1958 (Vic) s 32AB. This case considered, in part, whether the magistrate had applied those guiding principles when allowing the publication of certain parts of the complainant’s evidence given in a committal proceeding. The court rejected the argument that s 32AB, and its intention to encourage the reporting of sexual assault, would necessarily mean that there could be no publication of evidence from a sexual assault proceeding.

333 Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Interim Report (2003), [8.88]. See also [8.87].

334 See Ch 7.

335 In the family violence context see J Wangmann, “‘She Said …’ “He said ...” : Cross Applications in NSW Apprehended Domestic Violence Order Proceedings”, Thesis, University of Sydney, 2009, 55–56.

Consultation Paper

25.190 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory sexual offence legislation should include a statement that the objectives of the legislation are to:

- uphold the fundamental rights of people to make decisions about their sexual behaviour; and
- protect children and persons with a cognitive impairment from exploitation.\(^\text{337}\)

25.191 The Commissions also proposed that state and territory sexual offences, criminal procedure or evidence legislation should provide for guiding principles, to which courts should have regard when interpreting sexual offence provisions, which should at a minimum refer to the following:

- the high incidence of sexual violence within society;
- under-reporting of sexual offences;
- a significant number of sexual offences are committed against women, children and other vulnerable persons;
- sexual offenders are commonly known to their victims; and
- sexual offences often occur in circumstances where there are unlikely to be any physical signs of an offence having occurred.\(^\text{338}\)

25.192 Finally, the Commissions asked whether a statement of guiding principles should make reference to other factors, such as recognising specific vulnerable groups of women or acknowledging that sexual violence constitutes a form of family violence.\(^\text{339}\)

Submissions and consultations

25.193 Many stakeholders supported the inclusion of statements of objectives\(^\text{340}\) and guiding principles.\(^\text{341}\) For example, AIFS emphasised that the introduction of a statement of objectives and guiding principles would be of benefit in providing:

\(^{337}\) Consultation Paper, Proposal 16–6.
\(^{339}\) Ibid, Question 16–8.
25.194 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria also supported the inclusion of statements of objectives and guiding principles, which ‘provide useful guidance to the court in determining an approach to construing the meaning of relevant provisions’. 343

25.195 Some stakeholders considered that ‘it is desirable to specifically acknowledge that sexual violence constitutes a form of family violence’ 344 and emphasised the need to refer explicitly to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children, those from CALD communities, and persons with a disability. 345

25.196 For example, Hannah McGlade emphasised that the fact that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children are more vulnerable to sexual assault should be expressly acknowledged in guiding principles. 346 Other stakeholders agreed but urged caution, emphasising the importance of not undermining the sexual autonomy of vulnerable groups of women, 347 and that ‘consultation is critical with respect to wording’. 348 NASAV submitted that:

groups should not just be tokenly listed as where the reader is otherwise ignorant of the factors this may feed existing prejudices, and potentially lead to further

---

342 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

disempowerment/reinforcement of stereotypes and racism. It would be preferable if the dynamics that make these groups of women more vulnerable could be identified so that they can then be recognised for what they are in the evidence.349

25.197 Stakeholders suggested other matters be included in any statement of objectives and or guiding principles.350 Suggestions included reference to:

- the occurrence of sexual violence in the context of intimate relationships;351
- the need to protect young people as well as children from sexual exploitation;352
- the impacts of sexual assault, with particular emphasis on the fact that ‘there is no “typical” sexual assault, and no typical response to having been assaulted’;353 and
- sexual assault constituting a human rights violation, including reference to international human rights standards.354

25.198 Some stakeholders opposed the proposals. National Legal Aid argued that appropriate education and training should instead be provided to law enforcement authorities, prosecutors, lawyers, judicial officers, and other relevant service providers.355 The Law Society of NSW proposed including reference to the right of the accused to a fair trial, but stated that guiding principles are not needed because judges already take these matters into account on sentence in NSW. The danger with enunciating these principles in legislation is that they may be given added weight thus leading to a double-counting effect in relation to matters that are already regarded as aggravating factors on sentence.356

Commissions’ views

25.199 Statements of objectives and guiding principles can perform an important symbolic and educative role in the application and interpretation of the law, as well as in the general community. While much more is required to change culture, such 350 AIFS, for example, suggested including: emphasis on the fact that there is no ‘typical’ sexual assault, and no typical response to having been assaulted; that overt force and violence not being the norm in sexual offences; that the fact there is an ongoing sexual relationship does not negate the fact that non-consensual sex occurs; and that being sexually ‘experienced’ does not decrease the harm of sexual violence, nor does it mean a woman is more likely to have consented to an unwanted encounter: Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.

351 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre
352 Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010.
353 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010. Other submissions, such as Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010 suggested adding reference to the trauma of sexual assault and resulting impacts on complainants’ capacity to report and participate in legal processes.
354 For example, Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; H McGlade, Submission FV 84, 2 June 2010.
356 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010. Also Legal Aid NSW, Submission
FV 219, 1 July 2010. statements provide an important opportunity for governments and legal players to articulate their understanding of sexual violence and provide a benchmark against which to assess the implementation of the law and procedure.

25.200 In the Commissions’ view, the statements of objectives and guiding principles articulated in the Victorian legislation are an instructive starting point for similar provisions in other jurisdictions.

25.201 While such objectives and principles are, however, intended to provide a contextual framework for the legislative response to sexual assault, rather than any exhaustive list of issues to which judicial officers and jurors should have regard, the recommendations below expand on the Victorian provisions to incorporate certain other matters.

25.202 In particular, the Commissions consider that it is desirable to acknowledge that sexual violence constitutes family violence, as it is precisely these cases that criminal justice systems deal with least effectively. 357 Further, it is important to recognise the particular vulnerability of certain groups of women and, as a result, specifically recognise Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, those from CALD backgrounds and women with a cognitive impairment as victims of sexual violence. 358

25.203 The Commissions recommend that legislative statements of objectives should underline the aims of upholding individual sexual autonomy and agency, while ensuring the protection of vulnerable persons from sexual exploitation. In addition, guiding principles should be incorporated in sexual offences, criminal procedure or evidence legislation, to recognise the nature and dynamics of sexual assault.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recommendation 25–8</th>
<th>State and territory legislation dealing with sexual offences should state that the objectives of the sexual offence provisions are to:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(a)</td>
<td>uphold the fundamental right of every person to make decisions about his or her sexual behaviour and to choose not to engage in sexual activity; and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(b)</td>
<td>protect children, young people and persons with a cognitive impairment from sexual exploitation.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recommendation 25–9</th>
<th>State and territory legislation dealing with sexual offences, criminal procedure or evidence, should contain guiding principles, to which courts should have regard when interpreting provisions relating to sexual offences. At a minimum, these guiding principles should refer to the following:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(a)</td>
<td>sexual violence constitutes a form of family violence;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(b)</td>
<td>there is a high incidence of sexual violence within society;</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

---

358 See also, Recs 5–1(b), 7–1.
| | |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>c</td>
<td>sexual offences are significantly under-reported;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>d</td>
<td>a significant number of sexual offences are committed against women, children and other</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>vulnerable persons, including those from Indigenous and culturally and linguistically</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>diverse backgrounds, and persons with a cognitive impairment;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>e</td>
<td>sexual offenders are commonly known to their victims; and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>f</td>
<td>sexual offences often occur in circumstances where there are unlikely to be any physical</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>signs of an offence having occurred.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
26. Reporting, Prosecution and Pre-trial Processes

Contents

Introduction 1183
Decision points 1184
Attrition in sexual assault cases 1187
Statistics on attrition rates 1187
Data collection 1190
Recognising and reporting sexual assault 1193
Barriers to reporting 1193
Reporting to the police 1196
The prosecution phase 1196
The decision to prosecute 1197
Prosecution of sexual offences 1198
Charge and fact bargaining 1201
The views of victims 1202
Information and assistance 1205
Additional measures to reduce attrition 1212
Giving evidence at committals 1214
Joint or separate trial 1218
Implications of joint and separate trials 1219
A presumption of joint trial? 1220
Pre-recorded evidence 1225
Evidence of interview 1226
Other pre-recorded evidence 1226
Benefits and drawbacks 1228

Introduction

26.1 The Terms of Reference for this Inquiry require the Commissions to inquire and report on ‘the impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws in cases of sexual assault occurring in a family/domestic violence context, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence’.

26.2 Chapters 26 to 28 highlight ways in which particular laws and procedures operate for victims of sexual assault. In many instances, Australian jurisdictions take different approaches to law and procedure in the areas discussed. As a result, these chapters examine which approaches best recognise the nature of sexual violence and address the negative experience of complainants in the criminal justice system. Where it is possible to identify certain approaches as more promising and progressive than others, the Commissions recommend that the Australian and state and territory governments should implement consistent measures of these kinds.

26.3 This chapter begins by mapping out the key ‘decision points’ in the prosecution of sexual assault offences. These decision points extend from reporting to the police, through the handling of cases by various offices of the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) and to procedures involved in the trial of sexual offences. At each of these decision points, cases are filtered out and this process—referred to as ‘attrition’—may lead to offences not being reported and cases being unnecessarily withdrawn or dismissed.

26.4 This chapter also discusses some of the problems that may lead to attrition of sexual assault cases at the reporting, investigation, prosecution and other pre-trial stages. Chapter 27 focuses on issues that arise at trial, notably in relation to the application of laws of evidence. Chapter 28 considers other trial processes, including the giving of jury warnings and the cross-examination of complainants and other witnesses in sexual offence proceedings. Overall, these chapters examine selected developments aimed at reducing attrition and improving the experiences of those who have suffered a sexual assault.

26.5 The focus of this aspect of the Inquiry is sexual assault committed in a family violence context—that is, for those who have been sexually assaulted by a current or former intimate partner (spouse, de facto, boyfriend/girlfriend) or family member. However, most of the issues apply to all sexual assault proceedings, regardless of the relationship between the complainant and the perpetrator.

26.6 The Commissions acknowledge that many areas of law and procedure relating to sexual assault proceedings are not addressed in this Report. Given the timeframe and ambit of the Terms of Reference, the Commissions’ work focused on inconsistencies in the interpretation or application of laws in those areas which have the most direct impact on victims of sexual assault in a family violence context.

26.7 The Commissions acknowledge that reform in this area has been substantial over the last three decades, resulting in legislative and procedural changes which have improved legal responses to sexual assault committed in a family violence context. However, as discussed in the preceding chapters, much remains to be done to address both legislative and practice-based gaps and inconsistencies which have a negative impact on victims of sexual assault.

Decision points

26.8 The way in which complaints of sexual assault progress through the criminal justice system is complex. Decisions are made at multiple points which may in turn result in a complaint not proceeding:

> From the point where a victim decides to report a sexual offence to the police—and the majority never do—various decision makers exercise discretion at multiple decision points, based on a range of criteria, so that only a small proportion of all sex crimes ever reach trial and conviction … This filtering of cases begins with police decisions to record and investigate a complaint and to charge a suspect with the offence. The exercise of police discretionary powers means that they are perhaps the most significant gatekeepers to the criminal justice system.

Once the police charge a suspect, DPP lawyers review the file to determine whether the case should be prosecuted. Cases that proceed are subject to continuous reassessment because the circumstances of the case can change over time. In addition different evidentiary standards apply at each decision-making stage: the police decision to charge is based on the prima facie test, which is a more inclusive standard than the reasonable prospects test applied by the prosecutor, while the jury’s decision to convict is based on the stringent standard of beyond reasonable doubt.¹

26.9 In addition, in the context of sexual assault, as attrition occurs at numerous decision points throughout the criminal justice process, poor criminal justice outcomes for sexual offences have generated a self-perpetuating cycle in which decisions made at each stage of the process—from report to prosecution—are informed by anticipation of the decision which might be made at the next stage.²

26.10 These multiple decision points are summarised in the following diagram extracted from the 2004 report *Prosecutorial Decisions in Adult Sexual Assault Cases:
An Australian Study* by Dr Denise Lievore.³
Figure 1: Decision Points for Indictable Sexual Offences

- Offence Committed
  - Offence Reported
    - Police Investigate Offence
      - Suspect Arrested
        - Police Lay Charges
          - Director Screens Case
            - Committal Hearing in Lower Court
              - Not Guilty Plea: Committed for Trial
              - Guilty Plea: Committed for Sentencing
                - Director Screens Case
                  - Indictment Presented
                    - Trial
                      - Convicted
                        - Sentenced
  - No Report
    - No Action
      - Unsolved, Cautioned, Diverted
        - Released
          - Charges Dropped
            - Case Rejected
              - Defendant Discharged
        - Case Discontinued (No Bill)
          - Case Discontinued (Nolle Prosequi)
            - Acquitted
26. Reporting, Prosecution and Pre-trial Processes

Attrition in sexual assault cases

26.11 Research has established that only a small proportion of sexual assaults enter the criminal justice system, and those that do face a range of barriers and filtering mechanisms, which means that few result in a charge, prosecution, or conviction. This steady process of attrition has been the subject of much concern and is well documented.5

26.12 Substantial reforms over the last three decades—including legal and procedural reforms and policy changes—have been intended, at least in part, to address factors and barriers that have contributed to victims making decisions to withdraw, or key decision makers making determinations that cases not proceed.

Statistics on attrition rates

26.13 While research indicates that the number of sexual assault cases that reach the point of adjudication is minimal,6 much of the research into sexual assault has emphasised the difficulty of accurately measuring the extent of sexual assault or rates of attrition.7

26.14 The primary sources of sexual assault statistics are official police statistics, crime victimisation surveys, and more customised or targeted surveys.8

26.15 The limited availability of comprehensive statistics is evidently in part due to the very nature of under-reporting of sexual assault, an issue discussed further below, which is inherently difficult to measure accurately. However, the lack of data with respect to those cases which do enter the criminal justice system may also be attributed to factors such as inconsistencies in definitions of sexual assault as well limitations associated with current methods of data collection and evaluation.9

---

7 For further discussion see: D Lievore, Prosecutorial Decisions in Adult Sexual Assault Cases: An Australian Study (2004), prepared for the Office of the Status of Women; D Lievore, Non-Reporting and Hidden Recording of Sexual Assault: An International Review (2003), prepared for the Commonwealth Office of the Status of Women; B Cook, F David and A Grant, Sexual Violence in Australia: Australian Institute of Criminology Research and Public Policy Series, 36 (2001); Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010. In relation to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, see, eg, F Al-Yaman, M Van Doeland and M Wallis, Family Violence Among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Peoples (2006), prepared for the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare.
9 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.
26.16 By way of overview, Lievore concluded that the available Australian studies, taken together, indicate that:

- case attrition is highest at the police stage, but prosecutors regularly exercise their discretion to discontinue cases;
- in recent years there has been an increase in the numbers of persons charged with sexual assault, but this is not reflected in conviction rates;
- the proportion of defendants pleading guilty to sexual assault is low relative to other offence types; and
- the high proportion of cases proceeding to trial is reflected in high numbers of acquittals compared to other offences.10

26.17 More specifically, some of the key published statistics available on attrition rates at various points of the criminal justice system are set out below. The figures relate to data collection across different time periods, jurisdictions and sample sizes, making it difficult to draw any firm conclusions from them. However, the figures do provide a useful statistical overview of sexual assault matters at the investigation, prosecution and trial stages, which is illustrative of the process of attrition.

Investigation

- The Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) reported that in 2009, 30 days after the initial complaint an offender been proceeded against in only 19.8% of sexual assault investigations.11 Similarly, for incidents of sexual assault recorded by police in 2002, offenders were proceeded against for approximately one in four victims of sexual assault.12
- A 2000–03 Victorian study found that police did not proceed with more than 60% of sexual assault investigations.13 Offenders were charged in only 15% of cases.14
- New South Wales research showed that only 28% of sexual and indecent assaults against children and 30% of those against adults, reported to NSW police in 2004, were ‘cleared’ within six months.15

---

12 Measured at six months from the date the incident became known to the police: Australian Bureau of Statistics, Sexual Assault in Australia: A Statistical Overview (2004), 54.
13 Of these cases, 15% of rape complaints were withdrawn; and 46% resulted in no further police action: Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Sexual Assault (Vic), Study of Reported Rapes in Victoria 2000-03: Summary Research Report (2006), 5. Offenders were proportionately more likely to be a current or former partner of the victim in cases where the complaint was subsequently withdrawn compared to cases where charges were laid.
14 Ibid.
15 J Fitzgerald, ‘The Attrition of Sexual Offences from the New South Wales Criminal Justice System’ (2006) 92 Crime and Justice Bulletin 3, 3. A cleared criminal incident is one that police are no longer investigating, either because they have commenced criminal proceedings against a suspect or the complaint has been withdrawn. Incidents that are not cleared are unlikely to proceed any further.
• A 2003 South Australian study noted that 40% of child sexual assault incidents reported in 2000–01 had not been cleared by police when followed up a year later; and 23% of cases were cleared other than through a suspect being apprehended, including because the victim requested no further action.

• In 2007, the Australian Institute of Criminology (AIC) estimated that less than 20% of sexual offence incidents which are reported to the police result in charges being laid and criminal proceedings being instigated.

Prosecution

• The Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) found that, based on cases between 1997–99, fewer than one in six reports to police of rape, and fewer than one in seven reports of incest or sexual penetration of a child, proceeded to prosecution.

• NSW research found that it was common for incidents to be recorded as cleared by the police, even though there had been no criminal proceedings commenced through the issuing and filing of a court attendance notice. Among all sexual offences reported to police, criminal proceedings are initiated in only 15% of incidents involving child victims and 19% of incidents involving adult victims.

• A 2003 South Australian study found that 27% of reports of child sexual assault incidents proceeded to prosecution.

Trial

• The ABS reported that in 2008–09 (of a total of 3,085 defendants in sexual assault and related cases finalised in higher criminal courts) 49.4% entered a guilty plea, 15.1% were acquitted and 11.9% pleaded not guilty and were convicted. A total of 21.7% of cases were withdrawn by the prosecution.

• Similar figures were reported by the ABS for 2002–03, where (of 1,567 defendants) 60% of sexual assault defendants entered a guilty plea, 20% pleaded... not guilty and were convicted and 19% were acquitted.\textsuperscript{23} Defendants in higher criminal courts, with a principal offence of sexual assault and related offences, were three times more likely to have an acquittal outcome (20%) than defendants for all offences (7%).\textsuperscript{24}

- The VLRC found in 2004 that, even if a sexual offence is reported and the defendant is prosecuted, guilty pleas and conviction rates are lower than for other criminal offences.\textsuperscript{25}

- NSW research found that 44% of persons prosecuted for a sexual offence against a child, and 42% of persons prosecuted for a sexual offence against an adult, were found guilty on at least one count.\textsuperscript{26}

- South Australian research found that less than 10% of cases reported to South Australian police in 2000–01 resulted in a conviction on at least one of the offences arising from a reported child sexual assault incident.\textsuperscript{27}

- An analysis of finalised child sexual offences in the Northern Territory between 2001–02 and 2005–06 found that 28% resulted in a guilty verdict (the vast majority of which resulted from a guilty plea) while 47% of cases were withdrawn by the prosecution.\textsuperscript{28}

Data collection

26.18 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault (ACSSA), the AIC and similar state and territory agencies should prioritise the collection of comprehensive data on attrition rates and outcomes in sexual assault cases, including in relation to sexual assault perpetrated in a family violence context.\textsuperscript{29}

\textsuperscript{24} Ibid, 54.
\textsuperscript{25} Victorian Law Reform Commission, \textit{Sexual Offences: Final Report} (2004), [1.6].
\textsuperscript{28} Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse, \textit{Little Children are Sacred: Report of the Northern Territory Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse} (2007), 252.
Submissions and consultations

26.19 Many stakeholders supported the proposal, highlighting high rates of attrition and the fact that there is great complexity involved in estimating attrition rates of sexual assault cases and case outcomes in Australia. This complexity results from the need to collect police and court data from different jurisdictions with different record keeping systems and legislation. Data collection systems may not be compatible or readily available. Yet it is important to grapple with these issues to begin to understand attrition in sexual assault cases.31

26.20 Several stakeholders articulated the need for comprehensive data which details not only the reasons for attrition but also the point of attrition. In particular, the National Association of Services Against Sexual Assault (NASASV) submitted that data ‘should be collected that specifies exactly when the case fell out, how far along the process it got and exactly why it was not pursued/Successful’.32

26.21 Several stakeholders recognised that adequate resourcing is essential to ensure adequate data collection and analysis.33 However, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria noted that, despite ‘challenges and resourcing implications involved in identifying this data and arranging for its collection and analysis’, the Courts nonetheless regard data collection as an ‘urgent priority’—highlighting that the paucity of adequate data is a significant impediment to appropriate and effective policy development and coordinated support for relevant court users’.34

26.22 Stakeholders noted the positive role the process of data collection can play in ‘institutional change in and of itself’35 and emphasised that in the course of collecting data on attrition rates and outcomes in sexual assault cases, care should be taken to ensure that specific data and trends can be identified in relation to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.36 Finally, in addition to collecting data in relation to criminal sexual assault matters, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of

---

31 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.
32 For example, Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010. Also Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
34 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Victoria suggested that data collection and evaluation should ‘include reference to other relevant jurisdictions where allegations of sexual assault are made’.

Commissions’ views

26.23 Improved data collection in relation to the reporting and prosecution of sexual assault, including in a family violence context, is clearly desirable. The collection of more comprehensive statistics on attrition rates and outcomes in sexual assault cases, as well as access to such data, is critical to identifying problems as well as designing and monitoring solutions in relation to how the criminal justice system deals with sexual assault.

26.24 Bodies such as ACSSA and the AIC, along with state and territory counterparts, have an important role to play in this regard. One of the roles of ACSSA, in particular, is to ‘improve access to current information on sexual assault in order to assist policymakers and others interested in this area to develop evidence-based strategies that respond to, and ultimately reduce, the incidence of sexual assault’. Another body, the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, plays a role in providing information about domestic and family violence issues and practice, including through an online good practice database.

26.25 The Commissions recognise the role that police, DPPs, courts and other bodies play in collecting raw data. However, in light of the specific roles of bodies such as ACSSA, the Commissions recommend that ACSSA, the AIC and similar state and territory agencies should prioritise the collection of comprehensive data in relation to sexual assault, particularly where perpetrated in a family violence context. In particular, the Commissions emphasise the need to collect data using a consistent methodology as well as identifying the reasons for attrition, the decision point at which attrition occurred, outcomes of cases and trends in relation to particular groups such as Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

Recommendation 26–1

The Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, the Australian Institute of Criminology and similar state and territory agencies should prioritise the collection of comprehensive data in relation to sexual assault perpetrated in a family violence context. In particular on:

(a) attrition rates, including reasons for attrition and the attrition point;

(b) case outcomes; and

(c) trends in relation to particular groups including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.

37 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Recognising and reporting sexual assault

26.26 The first step in engaging with the criminal justice system following sexual assault involves the complainant understanding that what happened to them constitutes a sexual offence. There is a wide range of acts of sexual violence that a victim may experience as part of family violence, many of which constitute a sexual offence under criminal law.48

26.27 As discussed in Chapter 24, many women may find it difficult to recognise what an intimate partner or family member has done to them is a sexual assault. WESNET—The Women’s Services Network submitted that:

Workers report that quite often women do not see what they have experienced as sexual abuse until the worker provides a definition. At that point many women acknowledge that they have experienced sexual violence.49

26.28 Particular groups of women may face special difficulties in recognising sexual assault. For example, for some Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women the ‘normalisation of violence’; or for women from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) backgrounds, lack of knowledge about the Australian legal system may make it difficult to identify the harm suffered as a criminal offence—as can the fact that ‘in some traditional cultures there may not be a concept of sexual violence occurring in marriage and no definitions of consenting sexual activity’.50

26.29 More generally, women and other victims of sexual assault may lack knowledge about the options that they have, and the mechanisms that are available to assist them in reporting sexual violence and engaging with the criminal justice system.

Barriers to reporting

26.30 Where victims do recognise that what happened to them is a criminal offence, in many instances they may decide not to make a report to the police in any event. Numerous surveys show that the majority of sexual assaults never enter the criminal justice system because few victims report sexual assaults to the police.51

26.31 There are several reasons underlying some victims’ reluctance to disclose sexual assault or report sexual assaults to the police, including considerations related to: the relationship that they have with the perpetrator; fear of the perpetrator; how serious the victim perceives the assault to be; lack of confidence in the criminal justice system to assist; previous experiences with reporting; and notions of privacy, shame, trauma and stigma.

---

48  See Ch 25.
49  WESNET—The Women’s Services Network, Submission FV 217, 30 June 2010.
50  Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service, Submission FV 61, 1 June 2010.
26.32 During the Inquiry, stakeholders emphasised the shame and trauma surrounding sexual assault. For example, Hannah McGlade remarked that:

Rape is a severe, profound violation of the physical, emotional, psychological and spiritual self and the trauma of sexual assault and violence can ‘suppress’ sexual assault as a coping response. Women and children may be so harmed by sexual assault they are unable to even articulate the offence. Women and girls may also be well aware that the law does not respond sensitively to rape, and this fear is especially valid for Aboriginal women and girls.42

26.33 Where sexual assault occurs in a family violence context, there are additional factors associated with the nature and dynamics of family violence which mean victims may not report the assault to police. These factors may include, for example, an ongoing relationship between the victim and perpetrator; economic dependence and potential homelessness; the presence of children; and other avenues for redress such as civil protection orders.

26.34 While some barriers to reporting sexual assault are unique to the victim, others are heavily influenced by more general characteristics and factors including: the victim’s age; disability;43 geographical location;44 sexual orientation or gender identity;45 and race or ethnicity.

26.35 For example, children as victims of sexual assault face specific barriers to disclosure, particularly in a family violence context. These include: fear of not being believed; ‘fear of family breakdown’; ‘a sense of ongoing responsibility’ for the stability of the family or safety of siblings and other family members; and fears for their own personal safety.46

42 H McGlade, Submission FV 84, 2 June 2010.
43 For further discussion see for example: S Murray and A Powell, Sexual Assault and Adults with a Disability: Enabling Recognition, Disclosure and a Just Response (2008), prepared for the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault; Melbourne Disability Discrimination Legal Service, Beyond Belief, Beyond Justice: The Difficulties for Victims/Survivors with Disabilities when Reporting Sexual Assault and Seeking Justice: Final Report (2003); J Keilty and G Connelly, ‘Making a Statement: An Exploratory Study of Barriers Facing Women with an Intellectual Disability When Making a Statement about Sexual Assault to Police’ (2001) 16(2) Disability and Society 273.
44 For further discussion, see for example: L Bartels, Emerging Issues in Domestic/Family Violence Research (2010), prepared for the Australian Institute of Criminology; D Parkinson, Partner Rape and Rurality (2008), prepared for the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, 21; A Neame and M Heenan, Responding to Sexual Assault in Rural Communities (2004), prepared for the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault.
46 A Neame and M Heenan, What Lies Behind the Hidden Figure of Sexual Assault: Issues of Prevalence and Disclosure, Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Briefing (September 2003). This was also emphasised in Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.
26.36 Barriers faced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women may include:

- family and community pressure concerning speaking out about sexual assault, including a culture of blame being shifted to victims;
- feelings of guilt and shame as well as privacy concerns associated with not wanting issues publicly aired;
- the potential for retribution from the perpetrator and the perpetrator’s family as well as the victim’s own family and community;
- issues associated with police, including: lack of permanent police presence in some communities; past inappropriate police responses; lack of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander or female police officers; as well as fear of police attention in light of other matters such as outstanding arrest warrants;
- cultural and linguistic communication barriers; and
- systemic barriers such as lack of appropriate services.\(^{47}\)

26.37 Women from CALD backgrounds also face a range of cultural and systemic barriers—based on language and other issues—including:

- limited knowledge of, or access to, culturally appropriate and sensitive avenues for reporting or support services;
- family and community pressures concerning disclosure of sexual assault or, alternatively, isolation where there is an absence of immediate or extended family and community support in Australia;
- cultural and linguistic communication barriers, such as the lack of information in diverse community languages or of professional interpreters; and
- fears about immigration status.\(^{48}\)

26.38 The Immigrant Women’s Support Service also emphasised that:

Women may also have a strong internal sense of responsibility to protect their family/community identity and reputation. There may also be cultural values and traditions that foster violence against women and children that remain unchallenged in CALD communities, and gender related roles that may result in restrictive behaviours, beliefs and institutional arrangements.\(^{49}\)

---

\(^{47}\) These barriers were highlighted in consultations and submissions including: Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; K Hall, Submission FV 113, 8 June 2010; A Cousins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; H McGlade, Submission FV 84, 2 June 2010.

\(^{48}\) Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service, Submission FV 61, 1 June 2010. See also A Neame and M Heenan, What Lies Behind the Hidden Figure of Sexual Assault: Issues of Prevalence and Disclosure, Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Briefing (September 2003).

\(^{49}\) Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service, Submission FV 61, 1 June 2010.
Finally, McGlade pointed out that both Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and CALD women face common institutional and structural barriers, including discrimination in the form of sexism and racism which in turn contributes to women’s reluctance to report sexual assault.50

Reporting to the police

Where a victim recognises that a sexual assault has occurred and is willing to make a report, the next step in engaging with the criminal justice system about a sexual offence is to make a report to the police, or have the offence notified to the police in some way (for example through a parent, teacher, doctor or neighbour).51

Stakeholders emphasised that the initial response of the criminal justice system is vital, not only to ensuring that subsequent stages function effectively, but also to minimise the trauma of the process for complainants.52 Consequently, where sexual assault is reported, the response of the police is vital to the complainant’s decision to continue to pursue their complaint. As the VLRC observed:

> How the police are perceived by people who report an assault and the quality and consistency of their investigative and decision-making practices will have a major impact on reporting and prosecution patterns.53

In light of this and the barriers to reporting outlined above, the function of police should include protecting and supporting victims.54 The issue of specialised police responses and investigation as well as other aspects of victim support and liaison are discussed in more detail in Chapters 29 and 32.

The prosecution phase

Determining whether to commence or continue prosecution of sexual assault offences is a significant decision point within the criminal justice process. The exercise of prosecutorial discretion is also one of the key points of attrition for sexual assault cases. Prosecutors play a key role as gatekeepers, ‘determining which victims of crime have access to justice and which defendants will be processed through the criminal justice system’.55

Commonwealth, state and territory DPPs exercise considerable discretion in deciding whether to prosecute alleged offenders and how any such prosecution should proceed. This discretion is subject to prosecution policies or guidelines in each jurisdiction. DPPs are regularly subject to criticism about the exercise of their discretion.

---

52 For example, this was raised by P Eastal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
discretion in sexual assault matters and the exercise of prosecutorial discretion has been characterised as ‘one of the most important but least understood aspects of the administration of criminal justice’.\textsuperscript{56}

The decision to prosecute

26.45 Prosecutorial decision making in sexual assault matters is influenced by a range of factors. Each Australian jurisdiction has adopted guidelines and policies which contain similar criteria for the exercise of the discretion to prosecute an alleged offender. While there is variation between policies, prosecutorial discretion is guided by two primary considerations: first, the sufficiency of the evidence and, secondly, the public interest.

26.46 The first consideration informing the decision is whether the evidence is sufficient to justify the commencement or continuation of a prosecution. There must be enough admissible, substantial and reliable evidence not only to support a prima facie case but also to provide a reasonable prospect of a conviction being secured.\textsuperscript{57}

26.47 An evaluation as to whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction requires an assessment of a number of factors including: the availability, competence, credibility and reliability of witnesses; the likely impression that the witnesses will make on the judge or jury; the admissibility of evidence such as a confession by the accused; and any lines of defence open to the accused.\textsuperscript{58} Such an evaluation is also, at least in part, based on the prosecutor’s assessment of the likely views of judges and juries at trial. Consequently, ‘without prosecutions which test and redefine understanding of the boundaries of rape legislation, opportunities to clarify the law and improve the chance of future convictions are lost’.\textsuperscript{59}

\textsuperscript{56} Ibid, 1.

26.48 Once the prosecutor is satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to justify the institution or continuation of a prosecution, the second key consideration is whether it is in the public interest to pursue the prosecution.60 The factors which are taken into account in determining the public interest are multifaceted and non-exhaustive. These include: the seriousness of the alleged offence; mitigating or aggravating circumstances impacting upon the appropriateness of the prosecution; the age, mental state, physical health or vulnerability of the alleged offender or victim; the period of time elapsed since the offence; the background and prior convictions of the alleged offender; the attitude of the victim to the prosecution; the actual or potential harm occasioned by the alleged offence; the length and expense of a trial; and the necessity to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.61

26.49 Guidelines also specify a number of factors that must not influence a decision to prosecute. These include: the race, religion, sex or beliefs of the alleged offender; personal feelings concerning the alleged offender or victim; possible political advantage to the government or a political group; or the possible personal or professional effect of the decision to prosecute on those making that decision.62

Prosecution of sexual offences

26.50 In recognition of the fact that the exercise of prosecutorial discretion is one of the key points of attrition for sexual assault cases, considerable attention has been focused in recent years on the way in which sexual offences are prosecuted.63

---

60 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Prosecution Policy for the Commonwealth: Guidelines for the Making of Decisions in the Prosecution Process, cl 2.8; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, cl 4(3); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 2.1.6; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Qld), Director’s Guidelines, cl 4(ii); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Statement of Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2005), cl 23; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (SA), Prosecution Policy, 4; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Tas), Prosecution Guidelines; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT), Prosecution Policy, cl 2.5; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NT), Guidelines, cl 2.1.

61 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Prosecution Policy for the Commonwealth: Guidelines for the Making of Decisions in the Prosecution Process, cls 2.9–2.10; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 2.1.10; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Qld), Director’s Guidelines, cl 4(ii); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Statement of Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2005), cl 31; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (SA), Prosecution Policy, 4; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Tas), Prosecution Guidelines; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT), Prosecution Policy, cl 2.5; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NT), Guidelines, cl 2.5.

62 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Prosecution Policy for the Commonwealth: Guidelines for the Making of Decisions in the Prosecution Process, cl 2.13; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, cls 4(i)–(v); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 2.1.12; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Qld), Director’s Guidelines, cl 4(iii); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Statement of Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2005), cl 33; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (SA), Prosecution Policy, 6; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Tas), Prosecution Guidelines; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT), Prosecution Policy, cl 2.7; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NT), Guidelines, cl 2.7.

63 See, eg, Community Development and Justice Standing Committee—Parliament of Western Australia, Inquiry into the Prosecution of Assaults and Sexual Offences (2008); Office of the Director of Public...
26. Reporting, Prosecution and Pre-trial Processes particular, the study by Lievore in 2004 on the exercise of prosecutorial discretion in adult sexual assault cases across the Australian jurisdictions analysed 141 case files from five jurisdictions in which the primary charge was rape or the equivalent penetrative sexual assault offence. This involved 148 victims and 152 defendants. Overwhelmingly the victims in this study were women (99%).

64 Most had been sexually assaulted by someone known to them (76%) with 15% having been assaulted by a current partner, 15% by a family member, 11% by a former partner and 35% by another known person.

26.51 Fifty-three of the cases in this study were withdrawn (38 prior to indictment; 15 after indictment). Almost half of the cases (24) were withdrawn because the victim did not wish to proceed, and in the remaining 29 cases the decision was based on prosecutorial assessment of the prospect of conviction and/or victim credibility.

26.52 There were significant differences in the circumstances of the sexual assault between the cases that were withdrawn and those that proceeded. In those that proceeded, the victim was more likely to have been injured, to have expressed non-consent either in words or through resistance, the assault was more severe in some way (for example, it involved a weapon), additional evidence was available, the defendant used force, the defendant was ‘non-Caucasian’, and the defendant was a stranger.

26.53 In terms of outcomes, 33% of cases were finalised by guilty plea (half of these pleas were entered after negotiations which resulted in the level of the charges or number of charges being reduced); and 29% of cases proceeded to trial (38% of which resulted in a guilty verdict).

26.54 Importantly in the context of family violence, cases ‘involving strangers and other known defendants were more likely than cases involving intimate or family relationships to proceed through the criminal justice process and to end in conviction’. Some of the other conclusions of the Lievore study are particularly relevant to cases involving sexual assault in a family violence context and to the range of evidence law and other issues discussed in Chapters 27 and 28.

There is ample empirical evidence, including the results of this study, that attrition of sexual assault cases at the prosecution stage is usually related to evidentiary matters, which are most complex in cases where the victim and the defendant are acquainted. These cases usually come down to word against word, with little or no corroborating evidence. The defence usually centres on consent or the defendant’s mistaken belief in Prosecutions (ACT) and Australian Federal Police, Responding to Sexual Assault: The Challenge of Change (2005); D Lievore, Prosecutorial Decisions in Adult Sexual Assault Cases: An Australian Study (2004), prepared for the Office of the Status of Women; Crime and Misconduct Commission (Qld), Seeking Justice: An Inquiry into How Sexual Offences are Handled by the Queensland Criminal Justice System (2003); G Samuels, Review of the New South Wales Director of Public Prosecutions’ Policy and Guidelines for Charge Bargaining and Tendering of Agreed Facts (2002).

66 ‘This finding should be considered in the light of the large proportions of Indigenous defendants in the Northern Territory and Western Australian samples’: Ibid, 33.
67 Ibid, 32–33.
68 Ibid, 37.
69 Ibid.
consent, which is more likely to succeed if there has been prior consensual sex. Cases involving current or former partners are often discontinued due to victim withdrawals and insufficient prospects of conviction. It is understandable then that experienced prosecutors, who are mindful of the limits imposed by the substantive, evidence and procedure laws of sexual assault, would assess the prospects of conviction by considering prior relationship in combination with other factors, such as the strength of the evidence. At the same time, it is also clear that cultural assumptions about consensual sex impact on legal definitions of consent and the conduct of trials.\footnote{Ibid, 49.}

26.55 As discussed, prosecutorial decision making in sexual assault matters is influenced by a range of factors, some of which are ‘extraneous to the legal elements of the case’.\footnote{D Lievore, ‘Prosecutorial Decisions in Adult Sexual Assault Cases’ (2005) 291 \textit{Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice} 1.} It is said to be ‘unclear from current research what differences exist in prosecutorial decision-making processes for sexual assault occurring within a family violence context compared to those occurring outside of a family violence context’.\footnote{Australian Institute of Family Studies, \textit{Submission FV 222}, 2 July 2010.} However, factors that may contribute to attrition of family-violence related sexual assault cases at the prosecutorial stage include:

- evidentiary matters, including in relation to corroboration and consent as well as witness evidence and credibility;
- socio-demographic characteristics of the victim and offender;
- the relationship between the victim and offender;
- cultural assumptions about issues such as consensual sex, responses to sexual assault as well as ‘typical’ psychological and emotional reactions to sexual assault;\footnote{To a certain degree the stereotypes and myths surrounding sexual assault also influence the prosecution process, particularly decisions to discontinue: P Easteal, \textit{Submission FV 38}, 13 May 2010.} and

26.56 The availability of forensic evidence is another evidentiary matter of particular importance in influencing prosecutorial decision making as to the sufficiency of evidence in sexual assault cases.\footnote{Australian Institute of Family Studies, \textit{Submission FV 222}, 2 July 2010; P Easteal, \textit{Submission FV 38}, 13 May 2010.} This presents particular difficulties ‘in the context of intimate sexual assaults [where] obtaining forensic evidence to strengthen an investigation, police brief or prosecution case is much less likely'.

Charge and fact bargaining

26.57 While the police make initial decisions about what charges are to be laid against a person, the prosecution also has the discretion to lay additional charges and amend the charges in a number of ways, including by reducing the number or the seriousness of the charges.

26.58 The critical question in determining the appropriate charges generally involves an assessment of what charges the evidence can support. However, there may also be negotiation between the defence and the prosecution known as ‘charge and fact bargaining’ whereby the number and level of charges may be reduced in return for the defendant entering a guilty plea to some or all charges. Such bargaining may also involve the prosecution agreeing to present a recommendation for sentence, including on the basis of an agreed summary of facts.

26.59 Lievore found that half of the guilty pleas in her study (33% of cases in her study were finalised this way) were the result of negotiations to reduce the level or number of the charges. Interviews with Crown Prosecutors revealed a willingness to ‘look for opportunities to negotiate charges rather than risk an acquittal’.

26.60 While charge and fact bargaining may be criticised as placing the interests of expediency over those of justice, these processes can also be seen as vital to the administration of the legal system:

> Charge negotiations are a legitimate means of resolving criminal litigation. The process is widely viewed as fundamental to the efficient operation of an under-resourced system and comprises a relatively informal process that incorporates both adversarial and cooperative aspects. In a situation of uncertainty, the prosecution and defence exchange risks and benefits to achieve mutually satisfactory goals.

---

76 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.
80 Ibid, 2.
Prosecutors avoid a costly trial and the risk of an acquittal, while the defendant avoids the risk of additional charges or facing a maximum sentence. 81

26.61 Some victims express dissatisfaction about charge negotiation and fact bargaining, often because they are not consulted about the process or the outcome. As discussed in more detail below, while it may be desirable for the prosecution to seek the views of a complainant before charge or fact bargaining, this is not always required and, in some jurisdictions, guidelines expressly state that the victim has no right of veto in the charge negotiation process. 82 An example of how charge bargaining may be perceived by victims was provided, in the course of the present Inquiry, by a women’s legal service coordinator

[There was] one case where [a young] Indigenous … woman went through the whole process of providing evidence against her ex-partner for assaulting her. There were eight charges pending and each involved a serious domestic violence incident. The matter was resolved by the prosecution doing a deal with the defence. They agreed to dropping five charges and three were downgraded so that the ex-partner ended up with only a four month suspended sentence. The victim was not consulted and neither were we as the victim’s advocate in the matter. To have something like that happen sends a negative message not only to that particular woman but to all other women. Essentially, although the law may in essence appear to be colour blind, in practice it is not always colour blind. Before an Indigenous or Culturally and Linguistically Diverse woman can even get her matter to trial she needs to convince the police to proceed with her matter and then she needs to navigate the complicated pre-trial processes. This is all before the matter proceeds to trial where the woman may have to counter issues/stereotypes that intersect between racism and sexism. On top of this, their access to justice is also hampered by the lack of suitable interpreters and by the general lack of cultural sensitivity and awareness of professionals within the system. 83

The views of victims

26.62 There is some variation across jurisdictions in relation to the extent to which regard must be had to the wishes of victims in instituting or continuing the prosecution of an alleged offender, or in charge and fact bargaining.

26.63 As outlined above, prosecutorial discretion is guided by two primary considerations: first, the sufficiency of the evidence and, secondly, the public interest. 84 The guidelines in each jurisdiction stipulate that one of the factors that may be relevant in determining whether the public interest requires a prosecution includes the attitude

81 Ibid, 9.
82 See G Samuels, Review of the New South Wales Director of Public Prosecutions’ Policy and Guidelines for Charge Bargaining and Tendering of Agreed Facts (2002); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 2.6.6. Note, the code outlined in Amnesty International, Setting the Standard: International Good Practice to Inform an Australian National Plan of Action to Eliminate Violence Against Women (2008), 52 recommends that plea bargains be recorded and justified and that victims be consulted prior to any plea reduction.
83 Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.
84 The Commonwealth guidelines specify that consultation will occur in relation to public interest, rather than evidentiary decisions, a distinction emphasised by the Commonwealth DPP. Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions, Submission FV 76, 2 June 2010.
of the alleged victim to a prosecution. Most jurisdictions have additional guidelines stipulating requirements to engage victims in decision-making processes. For example, the Commonwealth guidelines state that the views of victims may be taken into account where they are available, and where it is appropriate in determining whether it is in the public interest to commence or discontinue a prosecution, agree to a charge negotiation or decline to proceed with a prosecution after committal.

26.64 The NSW guidelines state that the victim must be advised and consulted whenever the DPP is considering whether or not to discontinue a prosecution. The victim should also be consulted where the DPP is considering whether to reduce a charge in scope or severity, where charge negotiations are undertaken, or where a statement of agreed facts is being prepared. The views of the victim about the acceptance of a plea of guilty and the contents of a statement of agreed facts will be taken into account before final decisions are made but those views are not alone determinative.

26.65 The Victorian legislation and guidelines state that the DPP is obliged to have regard to the need to ensure that the prosecutorial system gives appropriate consideration to the concerns of the victims of crime. In exercising the power to discontinue a prosecution, the views of the victim or, where appropriate, the relatives of the victim are sought. Their views are taken into account but are not determinative.

Specific provisions in relation to sexual assault

26.66 DPP policies and guidelines in many jurisdictions also contain specific provisions in relation to victims of sexual assault.

26.67 Guidelines in most jurisdictions dictate that careful consideration should be given to any request by a victim that proceedings be discontinued, particularly in sexual assault matters. For example, both the NSW and Western Australian guidelines provide that requests by victims of sexual offences to discontinue proceedings, where freely made, should be accorded significant weight. The guidelines note, however, that the expressed wishes of victims may not coincide with the general public interest. In such cases, particularly where there is other evidence implicating the accused person, a history of similar offending, or where the gravity of the alleged offence requires it, the general public interest in prosecution must prevail.92

26.68 Many of the cases in the Lievore study were withdrawn because the victim did not wish to proceed. Importantly, the files indicated that ‘the prosecutors believed that the victims who chose to withdraw from prosecution were telling the truth’.93 There is a range of reasons why a victim of sexual assault committed in a family violence context may request a matter be discontinued, including:

- fear of the defendant;
- ongoing relationship with, or attachment to, the defendant, including where children are involved;
- family or community pressure; and
- trauma or other issues associated with the trial process, including the impact of giving evidence and often lengthy delays.94

26.69 The Victorian guidelines provide that in the great majority of cases involving allegations of sexual offences, the public interest will strongly suggest that the prosecution should proceed.95 However, the guidelines also specify that careful attention must be given to the public interest test in ‘boyfriend/girlfriend’ cases involving sexual offences.96 In these cases, the guidelines note that, although the evidence indicates that ‘an offence has technically been committed’, the objective circumstances of the offence, in combination with the personal circumstances of the complainant and offender, do not satisfy the ‘public interest test’.97

26.70 The Queensland guidelines provide that, where there is sufficient reliable evidence to warrant a prosecution, there will seldom be any doubt that the prosecution is in the public interest.98

92 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, cl 19; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Statement of Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2005), cl 128.
94 These factors were emphasised in Ibid, 30 as well as submissions such as Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FF 222, 2 July 2010 and P Eastal, Submission FF 38, 13 May 2010. See also: Z Morrison, ‘What is the Outcome of Reporting Rape to the Police?’ (2008) (17) Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Newsletter 4.
95 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 2.9.1.
96 Ibid, cl 2.9.2.
97 Ibid. The guideline also provides a list of factors to which consideration should be given when deciding whether prosecution is in the public interest, which relate to the subjective features of the complainant and the alleged offender and the nature of their relationship.
98 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Qld), Director’s Guidelines, cl 5(iv).
26.71 The Northern Territory guidelines also note that prosecutions that involve offences committed in the context of family violence, including sexual assault, require special attention. The guidelines cover the procedures which must be followed where a victim indicates that they do not wish to give evidence, and note that suitable prosecutions should proceed without the evidence of an unwilling victim.

26.72 DPP policies and guidelines across jurisdictions also include a range of other provisions with respect to sexual offences, including child sex offences and the prosecution of sexual assault.

Information and assistance

26.73 It is clear that the most positive experiences of the criminal justice system for victims arise when they are ‘treated respectfully ... listened to, believed and taken seriously’ as well as being provided with timely and accurate information. In addition it is said that ‘ensuring the complainant is well informed and well supported can improve not only their wellbeing and experience as a witness but their capacity to testify confidently’. Accordingly, Australian jurisdictions all recognise that victims of crime are entitled to receive information about the prosecution of the alleged offender. In each state and territory support and liaison services are in place to keep victims and witnesses informed and to assist them with navigating the criminal justice process.

26.74 The Commonwealth Victims of Crime Policy provides that victims should, on request, be kept informed in a timely manner about the progress of a prosecution. Where a victim is required to give evidence, any inconvenience to the victim should be minimised as far as possible and victims should be advised about their role as a witness. The Commonwealth DPP has a Witness Services Officer and is piloting a Witness Assistance Service to provide formalised assistance to witnesses and victims.

26.75 New South Wales guidelines provide that victims, whether witnesses or not, should have explained to them, at an early stage of proceedings, the prosecution process and their role in it. The NSW Charter of Victims’ Rights, contained within the Victims’ Rights Act 1996 (NSW), provides for numerous safeguards to be afforded to victims. Victims are to be informed about the investigation of the alleged crime, the prosecution of the accused, the outcome of any bail applications, and their role as a

---

99 Notably, the NT Guidelines include specific guidelines in relation to domestic violence, the role of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander customary law and the prevalence of violence ‘by Aboriginal men against their Aboriginal female partners or ex-partners’: Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NT), Guidelines, cl 20.
100 Ibid, cl 21.
101 Ibid, cl 21.3.
102 D Lievore, No Longer Silent: A Study of Women’s Help-Seeking Decisions and Service Responses to Sexual Assault (2005), vi, 42.
105 Ibid, cl 5.
106 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, cl 19.
witness in the trial. 107 Although a victim is entitled to make a formal complaint if the Charter is not complied with, non-compliance does not give victims any civil cause of action or legal right. 108

26.76 The NSW DPP is required to seek the services of the Witness Assistance Service as early as possible in cases involving sexual assault, domestic violence or child victims and witnesses. The Service can assist with providing information, identifying special needs of victims and witnesses, referring victims for counselling and support, providing court preparation and coordinating court support. 109

26.77 In 2006, the Victorian Government passed the Victims’ Charter Act 2006 (Vic), which sets out principles governing how participants in the criminal justice system, including the DPP, should respond to victims of crime. 110 The Charter principles set out the rights of the victim to be informed of the progress of any investigation, prosecution or bail application involving the alleged offender. In addition, the Charter provides that victims should be provided with information about the court process, their role as a witness and their entitlements to support services and the protection of their personal information. 111 While the Act does not create legal rights or give rise to any civil cause of action, victims can complain to the DPP if the Charter principles have not been upheld. 112

26.78 The Victorian DPP also has a Witness Assistance Service which is available to all prosecution witnesses and victims of crime who are involved in cases handled by the DPP. This service provides information and support including written guides and is staffed by professionals experienced in witness and victim support. The role of the service is to ensure that witnesses have been made aware of their rights and the processes they are likely to experience, and to ensure they are kept aware of the progress of their case. 113

Consultation Paper

26.79 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions acknowledged that it may be possible, and desirable, to reduce attrition rates at the prosecution stage by providing additional support and information to victims. As a result, the Commissions proposed that the policies and guidelines of DPPs in dealing with sexual assault cases should:

- facilitate the referral of victims and witnesses to appropriate legal and support services;

---

107 Victims’ Rights Act 1996 (NSW) s 6.
108 Ibid s 8.
109 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, cl 19.
110 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 7.2.1.
111 Victims’ Charter Act 2006 (Vic) s 6–10. The Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) provides a similar declaration of nine fundamental principles that the criminal justice system and victim support agencies must follow when responding to victims of crime.
112 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 7.2.8; Victims’ Charter Act 2006 (Vic) ss 20–22.
113 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Prosecution Policies and Guidelines, cl 7.1.2. There are similar services in other states and territories, for example the Queensland DPP refers victims directly to Victim Assist Queensland.
• require consultation with victims in relation to prosecutorial decisions;
• require and facilitate the provision of information and assistance to victims about legal and court processes and the status of proceedings; and
• ensure that necessary protection and intervention orders are sought in all relevant circumstances.\textsuperscript{114}

26.80 The Commissions also asked what further prosecutorial guidelines, policies or other measures should be taken to reduce the attrition of sexual assault cases, including where committed in a family violence context, during the prosecution phase.\textsuperscript{115}

\textit{Submissions and consultations}

26.81 A majority of stakeholders who addressed these issues supported additional measures to reduce attrition and trauma to complainants during the prosecution phase, and emphasised the importance of ‘relevant and timely support for victims and witnesses’.\textsuperscript{116}

26.82 Stakeholders proposed a range of measures to reduce the attrition of sexual assault cases, including those committed in a family violence context, during the prosecution phase. Primarily these concerned: victim information and support; integrated responses;\textsuperscript{117} education, training and awareness raising;\textsuperscript{118} and specialisation.\textsuperscript{119} In many instances, the measures suggested are also discussed in a general sense in other parts of this Report.\textsuperscript{120} A more detailed examination of some of these issues in the sexual assault context appears below.

\textsuperscript{114} Consultation Paper, Proposal 17–2.
\textsuperscript{115} Ibid, Questions 17–6 and 17–7.
\textsuperscript{116} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. This was also supported by Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010, Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{117} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{118} Women’s Legal Service Brisbane, Submission FV 223, 2 July 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{119} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010 and Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. For similar recommendations see also D Lievore, \textit{Prosecutorial Decisions in Adult Sexual Assault Cases: An Australian Study} (2004), prepared for the Office of the Status of Women, 53.
\textsuperscript{120} See Chs 29–32.
Provision of additional information and support

26.83 Numerous stakeholders expressed support for DPP guidelines requiring the provision of additional information and support to victims and witnesses. As submitted by Women’s Legal Services NSW:

the availability of clear and consistent advice about the process and any protective provisions available and general information about investigation and trial processes would provide complainants with a greater degree of support and security to participate.

26.84 In particular, some stakeholders proposed that guidelines should require information to be given about claiming the privilege for sexual assault counselling communications. Many submissions also emphasised the importance of ensuring that victims and witnesses are aware of the protective provisions available when giving evidence in criminal proceedings.

Consultation and engagement with victims

26.85 Stakeholders expressed a consistent view that victims and witnesses would benefit enormously from assistance in navigating the criminal process—in effect, having someone ‘walk with them through the system’.

26.86 While recognising resource constraints, stakeholders emphasised the importance of ‘consistency of lawyers throughout the process, early assignment of briefs to allow adequate preparation’ and the need for prosecutors to establish a relationship, or at a minimum, regular communication with victims in the lead up to the hearing.

26.87 Some stakeholders also highlighted the benefits of special victim and witness support, liaison and advocacy services located within ODPPs.

---

125  Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.

126  J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010. Also supported by Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010 and Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.

128  For example, Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
26.88 With respect to the proposal to require consultation with victims about key prosecutorial decisions, NASASV noted that any such consultation should be with a view to achieving the highest charge possible and supporting and encouraging the victim to continue with the charges. By this we do not in any way endorse any kind of pressure on the victim, but it has been observed that often options are presented in a cautious and ‘neutral’ way that does not accurately represent the strength of the complainant’s case and chances of success.129

26.89 This was echoed in a confidential submission from a women’s legal service which observed that, in sexual assault cases, prosecutors often ‘adopt a neutral manner towards the victim which can be extremely isolating and discouraging’.130

26.90 A number of stakeholders reiterated that the decision by victims to withdraw from prosecution is one of the key issues impacting upon attrition of sexual assault matter. AIFS submitted that it is likely that further research is required here to establish what support women require to prevent them from withdrawing charges against current or former partners, without diminishing the choice and autonomy of the woman.131

26.91 Further, in order to balance the need to avoid victims being pressured into withdrawing with a victim’s right to decide to do so, stakeholders emphasised the importance of ascertaining the victim’s wishes without the defendant being present and the role played by victim impact statements in conveying the victim’s expressed desire to withdraw.132

26.92 Finally, several stakeholders in the Northern Territory expressed the view that the Northern Territory Emergency Response, and subsequent increase in police presence and attention on prosecution of sexual assault, had a tendency to impact on the exercise of prosecutorial discretion.

Sensitive and appropriate services and support

26.93 Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander individuals and organisations emphasised that in engaging with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women there needs to be regular, ongoing and culturally appropriate support throughout the whole process from the beginning of the investigation phase to the end of the prosecution phase. There is enormous pressure placed on Aboriginal women who report family violence by her partner/ex-partner, his family and sometimes their community. In cases of sexual violence, where the legal stakes and consequences can be even higher, that pressure can be unbearable.133

26.94 Stakeholders emphasised the need for training and education in relation to the often unique experiences and needs of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander victims

131 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.
132 For example, Domestic Violence Legal Service, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010; Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council, Consultation, Alice Springs, 28 May 2010.
133 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
and witnesses as well as those from CALD backgrounds. Stakeholders noted that any referral of victims and witnesses to ‘health, legal, counselling and other support services should be to culturally appropriate services where available’. The Immigrant Women’s Support Service highlighted the need for service providers to provide ‘relevant information in appropriate community languages’ as well as the need for professional interpreters.

Stakeholders noted the importance of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander-specific liaison and support positions throughout the legal system, including within the police, courts and service providers, such as witness assistance services. The Aboriginal Family Violence and Prevention Legal Service Victoria referred to the need to delineate between victim and defendant support and advice services. The submission emphasised that such a distinction is necessary to ensure ‘confidentiality and to avoid perceived conflicts of interest’, in particular because ‘victims may mistrust ... Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander staff ... whose role is to support both victims and offenders’.

Finally, individuals and organisations representing the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex (GLBTI) community emphasised the need for sensitive and appropriate service provision recognising and catering for gender and sexuality diverse individuals.

Commissions’ views

The fact that the prosecution phase is a significant attrition point within the criminal justice process is emphasised in the available data. It is apparent that many cases are withdrawn because of the attitude of the victim. While some of these cases would undoubtedly also have encountered evidentiary issues—and hence may have been subject to ‘subtle’ encouragement to withdraw—other factors, such as feared re-

---

136 Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service, Submission FV 61, 1 June 2010. Support for interpreters was also expressed by a range of other stakeholders including Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.

139 Same Sex Domestic Violence Interagency, Submission FV 116, 10 June 2010.

140 For example, in Lievore’s study, almost half the cases were withdrawn because the victim did not wish to proceed. D Lievore, Prosecutorial Decisions in Adult Sexual Assault Cases: An Australian Study (2004), prepared for the Office of the Status of Women.
victimisation from the defendant or the court process, family or community pressures or an ongoing relationship with the defendant, often contribute to victims’ decisions to withdraw. This suggests that it may be possible—and desirable—to reduce attrition rates at the prosecution stage by providing additional support and information to victims. This is recognised in the Commissions’ recommendation with respect to prosecutorial guidelines and policies below.

26.98 The data also appear to indicate that substantial numbers of sexual assault cases are discontinued by prosecutors—both before and after indictment. As discussed, while it may be difficult to assess the basis for prosecutorial decisions, it is evident that factors such as evidentiary matters, the characteristics of the victim and offender as well as cultural assumptions influence prosecutorial decision making in sexual assault cases. This suggests that measures to ensure that prosecutorial discretion is exercised taking into account the dynamics and issues associated with sexual assault in a family violence context may assist in reducing attrition in these cases. Consequently, in addition to recommending amendments to prosecutorial guidelines and policies, the Commissions recommend a range of other measures aimed at addressing this issue and reducing attrition of sexual assault matters.

26.99 The Commissions have identified best practice in the policies and guidelines of DPPs in dealing with sexual assault cases and have incorporated these into the recommendation below. To the extent that guidelines and policies in some jurisdictions already include those matters recommended, the Commissions suggest DPPs oversee the provision of ongoing training in relation to those existing obligations and processes as well as monitoring compliance.

26.100 Building upon this, case management or compliance monitoring mechanisms may be an important component of ensuring adherence to prosecutorial guidelines. For example, a joint Queensland Police Service and DPP Working Party has been created to examine individual failed sexual offence matters, in order to determine why matters fail and identify systemic issues contributing to such failures.141

26.101 The Commissions are also of the view that the establishment of special victim and witness support, liaison and advocacy services within DPPs is desirable.

---

Recommendation 26–2  Commonwealth, state and territory Directors of Public Prosecution should ensure that prosecutorial guidelines and policies:

(a) facilitate the referral of victims and witnesses of sexual assault to culturally appropriate welfare, health, counselling and other support services at the earliest opportunity;

(b) require consultation with victims of sexual assault about key prosecutorial decisions, including whether to prosecute, discontinue a prosecution, or agree to a charge or fact bargain;

(c) require the ongoing provision of information to victims of sexual assault about the status and progress of proceedings;

(d) facilitate the provision of information and assistance to victims and witnesses of sexual assault in understanding the legal and court process;

(e) facilitate the provision of information and assistance to victims and witnesses of sexual assault in relation to the protective provisions available to sexual assault complainants when giving evidence in criminal proceedings;

(f) ensure that family violence protection orders or stalking intervention orders are sought in all relevant circumstances; and

(g) require referral of victims and witnesses of sexual assault to providers of legal advice on related areas, such as family law, victims’ compensation and the sexual assault communications privilege.

Additional measures to reduce attrition

26.102  Cultural and societal change is important to address high rates of attrition in sexual assault cases—along with other aspects of the ‘implementation gap’ identified and discussed in Chapter 24. In addition to amendments to prosecutorial guidelines and policies, a range of other measures could be implemented to reduce attrition and trauma to complainants during the prosecution phase.

26.103  Several such measures are discussed in other parts of this Report, for example:

- increased integration and cooperation between prosecution agencies, victim support services, and forensic services;142 and

- specialisation by relevant stakeholders, including specialist courts, prosecutors and judges, as well as the introduction or further utilisation of appropriate case management methods.143

143  See Ch 32.
26.104 The importance of education and training is emphasised throughout this Report. In light of the specific dynamics of sexual assault, particularly in a family violence context, and in order to ameliorate some of the issues which have a particular impact on victims, the Commissions also recognise the need for training and education of those who engage with victims of sexual assault.

26.105 Training and education to be provided for police, the legal profession (particularly prosecutors and defence lawyers), judicial officers and victim referral and support services. The Commissions suggest that such training should encompass areas such as:

- myths and stereotypes surrounding sexual assault;
- understanding victims and the dynamics of sexual assault;
- the emotional, psychological and social impact of sexual assault on victims;
- barriers to recognising and reporting sexual assault;
- legislation and case law applicable in sexual assault cases;
- procedural and substantive provisions, rules and processes, for example in relation to the availability of special and protective measures in giving evidence; and
- the different experiences and needs of particular marginalised victims, such as people with a cognitive impairment, Indigenous people and those from CALD and GLBTI communities.

26.106 A range of bodies should be involved in providing this training and education, including the Australian and state and territory governments, legal professional organisations, judicial education bodies, and relevant service delivery organisations.

26.107 This recommendation is consistent with the recommendation in Time for Action for the development and implementation of a ‘national education and professional development framework’ in order to ensure that judicial officers, law enforcement personnel and other legal professionals have appropriate knowledge and expertise. Time for Action emphasised the need for a framework that recognises, and is developed in accordance with, the specific roles of these key actors and that is ‘informed by research on the social context ... emphasises the diversity of experiences

---

144 For example, the National Judicial College of Australia offers a variety of education and training programs for all Australian judicial officers, which have included programs in relation to child witnesses in sexual assault matters. The DPP NSW, the Judicial Commission of NSW and the Judicial College of Victoria have developed comprehensive training, materials and curricula for judicial officers in relation to sexual assault amongst Australian jurisdictions. See, eg, Judicial College of Victoria, Sexual Assault Manual: Investigation, Prosecution and Sentencing in Victoria (2007).
and needs of victims ... and enhances understanding of the intent and operation of relevant legislation.\textsuperscript{145}

26.108 Further, more community education in relation to sexual assault and, in particular, sexual assault committed in a family violence context, is desirable. Such education should focus on dispelling the myths and stereotypes surrounding sexual assault, the availability of avenues for reporting sexual assault, and support services for victims.\textsuperscript{146}

26.109 Finally, the Commissions emphasise the need for prosecution of sexual assault to occur in the context of a legal system which is alive to cultural and linguistic diversity, and the vital importance of culturally appropriate service provision. In particular, the Commissions strongly suggest:

- providing cultural awareness education and training for police, prosecutors, the legal profession, judicial officers, and victim referral and support services;
- prioritising the provision of, and access to, culturally appropriate victim support services, such as legal advice, counselling and other support services;
- ensuring the provision of professional translating and interpreting services where required and/or requested; and
- introducing or re-introducing Indigenous-specific victim liaison, support and advocacy positions throughout the legal system, including within the police, the courts and service providers.

26.110 The Commissions emphasise that Indigenous and CALD people must be given the opportunity to inform discussion surrounding which process and support mechanisms are most likely to assist victims of sexual assault from those communities.

| Recommendation 26–3 | Federal, state and territory governments and relevant educational, professional and service delivery bodies should ensure ongoing and consistent education and training for judicial officers, lawyers, prosecutors, police and victim support services in relation to the substantive law and the nature and dynamics of sexual assault as a form of family violence, including its social and cultural contexts. |

Giving evidence at committals

26.111 Before an adult charged with an indictable sexual offence can be sent for trial, a committal hearing may be held.\textsuperscript{147} Committal hearings or proceedings are a

---

\textsuperscript{146} Time for Action recommended a range of measures to enhance community awareness and understanding of sexual assault, including in the family violence context: see ibid 50–51.

\textsuperscript{147} That is, unless an ex-officio indictment is presented.
preliminary examination of the evidence by a judicial officer. Where the judicial officer finds there is sufficient evidence to support a conviction, the accused is committed to stand trial in a higher court.

26.112 At the committal stage, the defendant may apply to have witnesses produced for cross-examination. In many cases a committal hearing will be determined on the basis of documentary evidence alone, which is referred to as a ‘paper’ or ‘hand-up’ committal.\footnote{For example, in NSW, committal proceedings for all indictable offences proceed by way of tendering the written statements of adult prosecution witnesses, unless the magistrate directs the witness to attend the committal hearing for the purposes of cross-examination: \textit{Criminal Procedure Act 1986} (NSW) s 91.}

26.113 The purposes of committal proceedings include ensuring the defendant knows the case against him or her and that a trial is justified.\footnote{See, eg, J Willis and D Breerton, \textit{The Committal in Australia} (1990); \textit{Barton v The Queen} (1980) 147 CLR 75, 99; \textit{Grassby v The Queen} (1989) 168 CLR 1, 15.} The process has also come to provide an opportunity for the parties to: test evidence; filter out weak cases; refute evidence; identify early pleas; clarify issues before trial; and refine charges.\footnote{Department of Justice and Attorney-General (Qld), \textit{Review of the Civil and Criminal Justice System in Queensland} (2008), 162.}

26.114 Four key issues for complainants in sexual offence proceedings have been identified as arising from the committal process:

- The victim is required to give evidence not once but twice and be subject to cross-examination at both committal and trial, exacerbating the stress of the court proceedings.
- Cross-examination of complainants at committal is often more rigorous and intimidating because there is no jury present.
- The experience of cross-examination at committal often leads complainants to seek to have the proceedings discontinued.
- The final disposition of the proceeding is delayed.\footnote{Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT) and Australian Federal Police, \textit{Responding to Sexual Assault: The Challenge of Change} (2005), 120.}

26.115 All state and territory jurisdictions place restrictions on the right to cross-examine witnesses at committal hearings in sexual offence proceedings.\footnote{Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 91–93; \textit{Criminal Procedure Act 2009} (Vic) ss 123–124; \textit{Evidence Act 1977} (Qld) ss 21AG, 21AI; \textit{Summary Procedure Act 1921} (SA) s 106(3); \textit{Magistrates Court Act 1930} (ACT) s 90AB; \textit{Justices Act 1928} (NT) s 105AA. Western Australia and Tasmania have effectively abolished committal hearings and committal to the higher court takes place administratively.} These restrictions differ depending on whether the witness is a child, cognitively impaired or an adult complainant.

26.116 For example, in NSW, a complainant in a sexual offence who has a cognitive impairment, was under 16 years at the time of the alleged acts, or is under the age of 18 years at the time of the trial, cannot be directed to attend committal proceedings.\footnote{\textit{Criminal Procedure Act 1986} (NSW) s 91(7A)–(8).} In any committal proceedings in which the accused person is charged with a sexual offence, the magistrate may not direct the attendance of an adult victim unless satisfied... that there are ‘special reasons’ why the victim should ‘in the interests of justice’ attend to give oral evidence.\textsuperscript{154}

26.117 Similarly, in Victoria, leave to cross-examine in a committal hearing for a sexual offence will not be granted where the complainant is a child or person with a cognitive impairment and they made a written or recorded statement which was served in the hand-up brief. Other witnesses, including adult complainants of sexual assault, may only be cross-examined with leave of the court. Before leave may be granted, the defence must identify the issue on which they want the witness to be cross-examined and provide a reason why the evidence of the witness is relevant to that issue. The court must then be satisfied of those matters and that the cross-examination of the witness on that issue is justified having regard to a list of factors.\textsuperscript{155} Special mentions are held for this purpose.

26.118 Some states and territories prohibit child complainants in sexual offence proceedings from being required to attend or be cross-examined at committals,\textsuperscript{156} while in other states, child witnesses may be cross-examined with the leave of a judicial officer in prescribed circumstances.\textsuperscript{157}

26.119 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory legislation should prohibit any complainant in sexual assault proceedings from being required to attend to give evidence at committal proceedings.\textsuperscript{158} Alternatively, child complainants should not be required to attend committal proceedings and, for adult complainants, the court should be satisfied that there are special reasons for the complainant to attend.\textsuperscript{159}

Submissions and consultations

26.120 Stakeholders generally agreed that children or adult complainants in sexual offence proceedings should not be required to attend, or be cross-examined at, committal hearings.\textsuperscript{160}

\begin{footnotes}
\item[154] Ibid ss 93, 94.
\item[155] Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) ss 123–124.
\item[156] Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 91(8); Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 123; Magistrates Court Act 1930 (ACT) s 90AB; Justices Act 1928 (NT) s 105AA.
\item[157] Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) ss 21AG(4), for example, allows cross-examination of a child witness where: the questioning relates to matters that could not reasonably have been anticipated before the committal; and the interests of justice cannot adequately be satisfied by leaving cross-examination to the trial. Summary Procedure Act 1921 (SA) s 106(3) provides that leave to call a child under the age of 12 years for oral examination must not be granted unless the court is satisfied that the interests of justice cannot be adequately served except by doing so.
\end{footnotes}
26.121 However, a complete ban on cross-examination of complainants could, on some occasions, work to the detriment of complainants—where, for example, a guilty plea might result from their testimony.\(^\text{161}\) In some cases, the complainant may also wish to give evidence and, by doing so, may be better prepared for the trial.

26.122 NASASV emphasised that steps need to be taken to ensure that ‘the absence of the victim does not jeopardise the strength of any case’ and that ‘paper committals, such as those used in the ACT, achieve the same ends as oral evidence from the victim’.\(^\text{162}\) The Law Society of NSW submitted that

> Although it is rare for complainants to be called to give evidence in sexual assault committals, defendants who are required to answer charges decades after they are alleged to have occurred, have significant disadvantages in preparing their defence. For this reason, cross examination of a complainant at committal, even if restricted to issues relating to date and time of offences, can assist in preparation. Clarification of lengthy charge periods or details surrounding old offences assists with trial preparation for both the Crown and the defence.\(^\text{163}\)

26.123 Some stakeholders considered that there should be some capacity for adult complainants to be required to attend to give evidence at a committal where there are ‘special’ or ‘exceptional’ reasons for evidence to be given in person.\(^\text{164}\) It was submitted that such inflexibility is unwarranted, and may produce great unfairness in individual cases.\(^\text{165}\)

26.124 On the other hand, there was some concern that, if complainants may be required to give evidence in committals on the basis of ‘special reasons’, the definition of special reasons should be ‘restricted to limited circumstances and be defined in the legislation to prevent being broadened via broad judicial interpretation’. For this reason, Women’s Legal Services NSW believes that the ‘special reasons’ test is not the appropriate threshold test to require complainants to give evidence at committals.\(^\text{166}\)

Commissions’ views

26.125 As discussed above, there are restrictions in all states and territories on child complainants in sexual offence proceedings being required to give evidence at committal hearings.\(^\text{167}\) Some states and territories prohibit child complainants in sexual

---

\(^{161}\) Public Defenders and Prosecutors, Consultation, Sydney, 7 June 2010.

\(^{167}\) The age of a child for these purposes differs among jurisdictions. See, eg, Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 91(7A)–(8) (under the age of 16 years at the time of the alleged acts, or under the age of... offence proceedings from being required to attend or be cross-examined at committals. In the Commissions’ view, the latter position is appropriate and should apply in all jurisdictions.

26.126 Another question is whether further restrictions on giving evidence at committals should apply to adult complainants in sexual offence proceedings. For example, the Magistrates Court Act 1930 (ACT) provides that complainants in sexual offence proceedings must not be required to attend, give evidence or be cross-examined at a committal hearing in relation to the offence. There is no provision for leave to be granted by the court.

26.127 While the Commissions agree that there is generally ‘little or no benefit in requiring that complainants give evidence twice’, prosecutors and others expressed concern about a complete prohibition on adult complainants providing oral evidence at committal hearings. Circumstances will arise in which it is in the interests of justice for a complainant to be required to attend to give evidence at committal.

26.128 It is preferable, therefore, that adult complainants of sexual assault be able to attend, give evidence and be cross-examined in special or prescribed circumstances. There is a range of different approaches that might be adopted, including those in NSW and Victoria.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recommendation 26–4</th>
<th>State and territory legislation should prohibit:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(a)</td>
<td>any child; and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(b)</td>
<td>any adult complainant, unless there are special or prescribed reasons,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>from being required to attend to give evidence at committal hearings in relation to sexual offences.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Joint or separate trial

26.129 Sexual assault cases—especially those within a family violence context—commonly involve multiple incidents and multiple complainants. The following discussion deals with situations where there are two or more complainants who have allegedly been sexually assaulted by the same defendant—for example, in a family context, a number of siblings may allege that a parent has sexually abused them.

18 years at the time of the trial); Summary Procedure Act 1921 (SA) s 106(3) (child under the age of 12 years).
168 Magistrates Court Act 1930 (ACT) ss 90AA(8), AB(1). In June 2010, legislation was introduced in the Northern Territory providing that, in sexual offence proceedings, a child or the alleged victim of a sexual offence is not required to attend a committal hearing; and cannot be examined or cross-examined at such a hearing. Justice Legislation Amendment (Committals Reform) Bill 2010 (NT) cl 7, proposed new Justices Act 1928 (NT) s 105L.
169 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT) and Australian Federal Police, Responding to Sexual Assault: The Challenge of Change (2005), 130.
171 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 93; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 124.
26.130 In such situations, the prosecution is likely to make a pre-trial application to have the counts against the defendant heard in a joint trial, rather than separate trials. The defence, in contrast, is more likely to apply for separate trials for each offence. The power to order a joint trial is discretionary and is exercised in order to prevent prejudice to the defendant.\(^\text{172}\) There is no limit to the circumstances which will justify separate trials. However, two factors which have received detailed consideration by the High Court are: charges where evidence in relation to one count is not admissible in relation to another, but is prejudicial; and where the charges are for sexual offences.\(^\text{173}\)

26.131 The threshold question for holding a joint trial is whether or not each complainant’s evidence will be admissible in respect of the charges involving the other complainant or complainants (that is, whether such evidence is ‘cross-admissible’). Decisions to hold separate trials or refuse to admit relevant tendency or propensity evidence about a defendant’s sexual behaviour can be seen as barriers to the successful prosecution of sex offences.\(^\text{174}\)

26.132 Laws of evidence affecting the admissibility of tendency or coincidence evidence (under the uniform Evidence Acts), and as propensity or similar fact evidence at common law, are relevant in this context. The nature and admissibility of these kinds of evidence is discussed in detail in Chapter 27.

Implications of joint and separate trials

26.133 When deciding whether to order joint or separate trials, a trial judge needs to determine whether each complainant’s evidence will be cross-admissible. A possibility of prejudice to defendants is recognised to arise from joint trials, because jurors ‘might use evidence relating to an offence charged in one count to decide that the person has also committed a different offence, even though there may be insufficient evidence to support a conviction for the second offence’.\(^\text{175}\) It is commonly believed that jurors will

---

\(^\text{172}\) Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 21(2); Criminal Code (Qld) s 597A(1AA); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 278(2a); Criminal Code (Tas) s 326(3); Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 194; Criminal Procedure Act 2004 (WA) s 133; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 264; Criminal Code (NT) s 341.

\(^\text{174}\) In NSW, Gallagher and Hickey compared the outcomes of joint trials with the outcomes from separate trials involving multiple complainants against the same accused. They found that ‘the proportion of guilty and not guilty verdicts [was] quite close when there was one trial, while for multiple trials, the vast majority result[ed] in not guilty verdicts’. P Gallagher and J Hickey, Child Sexual Assault: An Analysis of Matters Determined in the District Court of New South Wales during 1994 (1997), prepared for the Judicial Commission of New South Wales, 20. The study examined the prosecution of 158 child sex offences in joint trials and 43 such offences in separate trials.

‘assume that past behaviour is an accurate guide to contemporary conduct, and knowledge of other misconduct may cause the jury to be biased against the accused’. 176

26.134 This view needs to be balanced against the research on juries that shows that a significant proportion of both jurors and jury-eligible citizens believe in various myths and hold a range of prejudices and misconceptions about women and children who report sexual assault. 177

26.135 Separate trials can be considered to create an artificial individualised context in which the charges relating to each complainant are heard separately rather than in context. This is particularly the case where complainants come from the same family. The jury may not know that other children in the family have also made similar complaints. The prosecution case ‘will be considerably weakened’, 178 including in family violence contexts. Separate trials are said, therefore, to ‘confer a significant tactical advantage on the accused’.

The defendant will be able to conduct his defence in each trial in isolation from the other charges and will be able to more convincingly argue that each complainant has fabricated her/his evidence due to lack of corroborating evidence from other victims, thus increasing the likelihood of acquittal. 179

A presumption of joint trial?

26.136 In 1997, Victoria established a presumption in favour of joint trials in sexual offence cases. 180 The presumption is now located in s 194(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic), which provides that:

(2) … if in accordance with this Act 2 or more charges for sexual offences are joined in the same indictment, it is presumed that those charges are to be tried together.

(3) The presumption created by subsection (2) is not rebutted merely because evidence on one charge is inadmissible on another charge.

176 Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Evidence Act 2001 Sections 97, 98 & 101 and Hoch’s Case: Admissibility of Tendency and Coincidence Evidence in Sexual Assault Cases with Multiple Complainants, Issues Paper 15 (2009), [3.3.16]; footnotes omitted.

177 These include the beliefs that: delay in complaint is evidence of fabrication; sexual assault will result in physical evidence and injury; a rape victim would scream and shout; a rape victim would be visibly upset in court; children are easily manipulated into giving false reports of sexual abuse; and a victim of sexual abuse will avoid the offender: See N Taylor and J Joudo, The Impact of Pre-recorded Video and Closed Circuit Television Testimony by Adult Sexual Assault Complainants on Jury Decision-Making: An Experimental Study (2005), 59; A Cossins, ‘Children, Sexual Abuse and Suggestibility: What Laypeople Think They Know and What the Literature Tells Us’ (2008) 15 Psychiatry, Psychology and Law 153, 156; A Cossins, J Goodman-Delahunty and K O’Brien, ‘Uncertainty and Misconceptions about Child Sexual Abuse: Implications for the Criminal Justice System’ (2009) 16 Psychiatry, Psychology and Law 435, 440. See also D Koski, ‘Jury Decisionmaking in Rape Trials: A Review and Empirical Assessment’ (2002) 38 Criminal Law Bulletin 21.

178 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 179.

179 Ibid, 181.

180 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 372(3AA)–(3AC).
26.137 In 2008, South Australia introduced a similar presumption.\textsuperscript{181} The South Australian provision modifies rules for the admissibility of evidence in sexual offence cases, in response to common law restrictions on propensity and similar fact evidence.

26.138 In Western Australia, the court has a discretion to order separate trials——otherwise the decision as to whether there will be a joint trial is that of the prosecution. The \textit{Criminal Procedure Act 2004} (WA) states that a court can only order separate trials if satisfied that there would be a likelihood of prejudice to the accused by the joinder of two or more charges.\textsuperscript{182} However, the court does not need to automatically order separate trials of particular offences simply because they are of a particular nature or because evidence in relation to some of the charges is not admissible in relation to others. Under s 133(5), it is open to the court ‘to decide that any likelihood of the accused being prejudiced can be guarded against by a direction to the jury’.\textsuperscript{183}

26.139 At the same time, s 31A was inserted into the \textit{Evidence Act 1906} (WA) to deal specifically with the problems associated with admitting propensity evidence in a joint trial. These modifications of evidence law, and those in other jurisdictions, are discussed in more detail in Chapter 27.

26.140 NSW and Queensland have considered—but specifically recommended against—the adoption of a presumption of joint trial due to concerns that juries may improperly use evidence in relation to one count when considering another count.\textsuperscript{184} As discussed below, there are different views on the extent to which this concern may be able to be addressed through appropriate directions to the jury.

26.141 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should create a presumption of joint trial when two or more charges for sexual offences are joined in the same indictment and provide that this presumption is not rebutted merely because evidence on one charge is inadmissible on another charge.\textsuperscript{185} This wording closely followed that of the Victorian provision.\textsuperscript{186}

\textit{Submissions and consultations}

26.142 A number of stakeholders agreed that legislation should provide for a presumption of joint trial.\textsuperscript{187} Dr Anne Cossins, for example, submitted that there are

\begin{flushleft}\begin{tabular}{l}
\textsuperscript{181} \textit{Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935} (SA) s 278(2a).
\textsuperscript{182} \textit{Criminal Procedure Act 2004} (WA) s 133(3). When considering the likelihood of prejudice to the accused from joinder of charges, the court cannot take into account that the evidence of two or more complainants or witnesses may be the result of collusion or suggestion: s 133(6).
\textsuperscript{183} Ibid s 133(5) is similar to \textit{Criminal Procedure Act 2009} (Vic) s 194 because it envisages that a joint trial may be held even where the evidence of two or more complainants is not cross-admissible. It differs because it envisages that the risk of impermissible propensity reasoning by juries and prejudice to the accused can be corrected by an appropriate judicial direction: \textit{Donaldson v Western Australia} (2005) 31 WAR 122, [146].
\textsuperscript{185} Consultation Paper, Proposal 17–4.
\textsuperscript{186} \textit{Criminal Procedure Act 2009} (Vic) s 194(2).
\textsuperscript{187} Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, \textit{Submission} FV 212, 28 June 2010; National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, \textit{Submission} FV 195, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs,\end{tabular}\end{flushleft} ‘good public interest reasons’ for joint trials, particularly given the frequency and serial nature of sex offending:

> while trial judges must consider the accused’s right to a fair trial when considering whether to order joint or separate trials, legislation governing this procedural issue shows that the decision is not black or white. In other words, it is possible to hold a joint trial that does not ‘prejudice or embarrass’ an accused’s defence.188

26.143 The DPP NSW strongly supported the proposal in the Consultation Paper, despite the rejection of this idea in 2005 by the NSW Sexual Offences Taskforce.189 The DPP NSW noted that ‘the separation of trials can weaken the case to the point that there is no prospect of conviction’. Further, if trials are separated, complainants may have to give evidence in more than one trial and their evidence needs to be confined when it is not their own complaint. Severance of trials ‘increases the likelihood of inadmissible evidence being given inadvertently and possibly aborting the trial’.190 The DPP also referred to the negative effects on complainants that may arise as a result of uncertainty about how trials are to proceed.

When the decision is finally made to proceed on separate indictments either by the court or the prosecutor, it can be devastating for complainants. This is probably a significant factor contributing to attrition during the prosecution phase of the case.191

26.144 Women’s Legal Services NSW (WLS NSW) stated that separating trials means that juries ‘do not get a full picture’ of the context and circumstances of the alleged offence and ‘is particularly difficult for child witnesses in child sexual assault matters and all witnesses/complainants in interfamilial matters’. WLS NSW supported the introduction of a presumption of joint trial based on the Victorian model.192

26.145 Others argued against the introduction of any presumption of joint trial and considered jury directions unlikely to be effective in ensuring that evidence is not improperly taken into account by jurors.193 The Law Council, for example, submitted

---

Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010; A Cossins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010; Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010; Commissioner for Children (Tas), Submission FV 62, 1 June 2010.

188 A Cossins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010.

189 Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 85.

191 Ibid.

192 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010. WLS NSW and other stakeholders also referred to the distress that may be caused by inconsistent outcomes in separate sexual offence proceedings involving victims from the same family: Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010. Also National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010. The Canberra Rape Crisis Centre commented that sometimes ‘clients do not understand why this evidence is “not relevant” and are distressed when they are not believed or when they hear evidence adduced from the alleged offender that is patently untrue’: Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.

194 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010. WLS Qld also questioned whether it is possible to give ‘clear and that where evidence is not cross-admissible, ‘the presumption should be that trials are separated’ to avoid the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant.\textsuperscript{195}

26.146 NSW Public Defenders stated that ‘there can be no legitimacy in conducting joint trials in circumstances other than where the evidence in one charge is admissible on the other charge’. The Public Defenders also observed that any higher rate of conviction in trials where evidence is not cross-admissible could only result from, in effect, ‘endorsing the suspension of the rule of law—or hoping that juries will disregard judicial direction as to the evidence which may be taken into account by them in connection with each charge’.\textsuperscript{196}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

26.147 The \textit{Time for Action} report recommended that state and territory sexual assault legislation should be reviewed to ensure it ‘ceases the artificial separation of court hearings involving multiple victims of the same offender’.\textsuperscript{197}

26.148 In some cases, however, it is clear that the separation of court proceedings will be justified and not ‘artificial’. Even in those jurisdictions that have implemented a presumption of joint trial in sexual offence proceedings, some matters are still separated for valid reasons, notably the right of the defendant to a fair trial. It should be open to a court to order separate trials where evidence on one charge is inadmissible on another charge—for example, because its probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant.\textsuperscript{198} In a recent case involving consideration of the presumption of joint trial, the Victorian Court of Appeal noted that

\begin{quote}
[the capacity to ensure a fair trial for the accused must always be the dominant consideration governing the exercise of a discretion; and the more complainants there are whose evidence is not admissible in the trials affecting other complainants, the more difficult it will be for adequate directions to be given by the trial judge to avoid prejudice occurring to the accused.\textsuperscript{199}
\end{quote}

26.149 On the other hand, the present situation in some jurisdictions appears to place judges in a difficult position in ordering joint trials of sexual offences. If the judge rules in favour of a joint trial which results in one or more convictions, it is said to be ‘almost inevitable’ that there will be an appeal against both the joinder and the trial judge’s decision to admit the evidence.\textsuperscript{200} If the appeal is successful, this ‘will result in re-trials with all the attendant emotional costs to the complainants and financial costs to the State and the defendant’.\textsuperscript{201} In this context, the DPP NSW stated that:

\begin{quote}
understandable’ directions to a jury in these circumstances. Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
\end{quote}

196 Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
198 For example, in the case of tendency evidence under Uniform Evidence Acts, ss 97, 101.
199 \textit{CGL v Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic)} [2010] VSCA,8.
200 A Cossins, \textit{Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia} (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 180.
201 Ibid.
Sexual assault indictments in NSW involving more than one victim are regularly severed; indeed, it could be said anecdotally [that] there is a presumption in favour of separation.

26.150 In ALRC 84, the ALRC and the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC) noted that when the complainant’s credibility is attacked in a separate trial, ‘evidence that would support his or her credibility is disallowed and the jury are kept in ignorance of the fact that there are multiple allegations of abuse against the accused’. This is a situation which may appear to offend common sense and experience, and have the potential to cause unfairness and injustice.

26.151 Further, if separate trials are held, children involved may have to give evidence numerous times in their own trial, as well as in other trials, a process which can multiply the emotional stress experienced by child complainants. Child complainants may have protection as complainants, which may not be extended to them as witnesses in separate trials, despite facing the same accused. Adult victims of sexual offences in a family violence context also face additional trauma, especially as the pattern of offending is often long term rather than centred on one specific incident.

26.152 In the Commission’s view, a presumption of joint trial, along the lines of the Victorian provision, is desirable to encourage judges to order joint trials in sexual offence proceedings wherever possible. The main justification for this recommendation is that joint trials tend to reduce trauma for complainants.

26.153 There is some reason to suggest that joint trials can be more frequently conducted without unfair prejudice to defendants. The Victorian reforms were evaluated by the VLRC in its 2004 Sexual Offences report. The evaluation found that the new legislation had made it easier for sexual offence matters involving multiple complainants to be heard together. Stakeholders also suggested that the reforms in Western Australia have been successful in ensuring that more joint trials proceed than would otherwise have been the case. The Commissions understand that there are very few challenges when the prosecution charges on joint indictments.

204 Ibid, 334. For example, although a complainant’s evidence may be held to be generally inadmissible in relation to the charges involving other complainants, portions of a complainant’s evidence may be admissible for a non-tendency or non-propensity purpose. See also Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Evidence Act 2001 Sections 97, 98 & 101 and Hoch’s Case: Admissibility of Tendency and Coincidence Evidence in Sexual Assault Cases with Multiple Complainants, Issues Paper 15 (2009), [3.2.2], [3.2.4].
205 For example, in relation to the means of giving evidence or the coverage of vulnerable witness protections.
206 Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Final Report (2004), 251. The VLRC noted that the Victorian Court of Appeal had recognised that the ‘mischief’ to which the new provisions were directed is ‘the rule of practice that had developed whereby severance was almost automatically granted’. The provisions now started from the presumption that such matters will be heard together: Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Final Report (2004), 251.
207 Judicial Officer (WA), Consultation, Perth, 5 May 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Consultation, Perth, 4 May 2010.
Recommendation 26–5
Federal, state and territory legislation should:
(a) establish a presumption that, when two or more charges for sexual offences are joined in the same indictment, those charges are to be tried together; and
(b) state that this presumption is not rebutted merely because evidence on one charge is inadmissible on another charge.

Pre-recorded evidence

26.154 In the following discussion pre-recorded evidence refers to evidence recorded before the trial and replayed at the trial. The focus of the Commissions’ interest in pre-trial processes in sexual offence proceedings is on reform to reduce the trauma caused to complainants of sexual assault. In this context, the use of pre-recorded evidence is important because it may lessen or eliminate the need for complainants to give evidence in person at the trial.\(^ {208} \)

26.155 Pre-recorded evidence used in criminal proceedings can be categorised into recordings of:
- the initial interview between police and the witness (evidence of interview); and
- other evidence given by the witness.\(^ {209} \)

26.156 Federal, state and territory legislation provides for the use of pre-recorded evidence in criminal hearings and trials.\(^ {210} \) Such legislation applies to the use of pre-recorded evidence in sexual offence proceedings, and may apply to other criminal proceedings.\(^ {211} \)

26.157 The provisions generally apply to child witnesses and witnesses who are ‘cognitively’ or ‘intellectually’ impaired. In some jurisdictions, however, the provisions extend to any ‘special’ witness who requires protection\(^ {212} \) or all witnesses who are complainants of sexual assault.\(^ {213} \)

\(^{208}\) The use of pre-recorded evidence—like giving contemporaneous evidence by closed circuit television or video-link, using screens to restrict contact between the witness and the defendant, and excluding persons from the court—can be considered a form of vulnerable witness protection. Other aspects of vulnerable witness protection, in the specific context of cross-examination, are discussed in Ch 28.

\(^{209}\) See Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT) and Australian Federal Police, Responding to Sexual Assault: The Challenge of Change (2005), 130.

\(^{210}\) Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YM; Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) ss 306S(2), 306U(1)–(2); Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) ss 21A, 21AI–21AO; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) ss 13, 13A; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) ss 366–368; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) ss 106A, 106HA, 106HB, 106K; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) pt 4, div 4.2A, 4.2B; Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 21B.

\(^{211}\) For example, to any ‘indictable offence which involves an assault on, or injury or a threat of injury to a person’: Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 366(1)(b); or to any criminal proceeding: Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 306S.

\(^{212}\) Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 21A(1)(b). See also Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 106R(3).

\(^{213}\) Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 21B.
Evidence of interview

26.158 Evidence of interview refers to audiovisual recordings of an interview or interviews with the victim, which are typically done shortly after the complaint is initially disclosed. The person is interviewed by police or child protection workers, the interview is recorded, and the recording of the interview is played at the hearing or trial as the person’s evidence-in-chief. This method of taking pre-recorded evidence applies, for example, under federal, NSW and Victorian legislation.\(^{214}\)

26.159 In NSW, legislation provides that a ‘vulnerable person is entitled to give, and may give, evidence in chief of a previous representation … made by the person wholly or partly in the form of a recording made by an investigating official of the interview in the course of which the previous representation was made’.\(^ {215}\) Similarly, in Victoria, legislation provides that a ‘witness may give evidence-in-chief (wholly or partly) in the form of an audio or audiovisual recording of the witness answering questions’ put to him or her by a member of Victoria Police, or other person authorised in writing by the Chief Commissioner of Police who has successfully completed a training course on the relevant procedures.\(^ {216}\)

26.160 These provisions do not apply to all witnesses in sexual offence proceedings. The Commonwealth provisions apply only to child witnesses, and the NSW and Victorian provisions to children and cognitively impaired witnesses.\(^ {217}\) In the Northern Territory, however, a ‘recorded statement’ of interview of a witness—including any witness who is the alleged victim of a sexual offence to which the proceedings relate—may be admitted in evidence as the witness’ evidence in chief.\(^ {218}\)

Other pre-recorded evidence

26.161 Other evidence given by witnesses in sexual offence proceedings may also be pre-recorded. This may involve the pre-recording of part or the entirety of a witness’ evidence. For example, at a pre-trial hearing the witness may give evidence via closed-circuit television from a remote room. The judge, prosecutor, defence lawyer and accused are all in the courtroom. There is no jury. The witness gives evidence, may be cross-examined and re-examined, and this is recorded. Some months later the trial is held. The witness does not attend the trial, and the jury is played the recording of the witness’ evidence.

\(^{214}\) Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YM; Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) ss 306R, 306U; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) ss 366–368.

\(^{215}\) Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 306U. ‘Vulnerable person’ means a child or a cognitively impaired person: s 306M.

\(^{216}\) Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 367; Criminal Procedure Regulations 2009 (Vic) r 5.

\(^{217}\) The Victorian provision applies only to witnesses in sexual offence and assault matters: Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 366.

\(^{218}\) Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 21B.
26.162 Similar methods of taking pre-recorded evidence apply under Queensland, South Australian, Victorian, Western Australian, ACT and Northern Territory legislation.219

26.163 In Victoria, the whole of the evidence—including cross-examination and re-examination—of young220 or cognitively impaired complainants in sexual offence proceedings must be given at a special hearing, recorded as an audiovisual recording, and presented to the court in the form of that recording.221 This has become known as the ‘VATE’ process (video or audio taping of evidence). The VATE recording is admissible in evidence as if its contents were the direct testimony of the complainant in the proceeding.222

26.164 At the special hearing, the accused and his or her legal practitioner are to be present in the courtroom, but the accused is not to be in the same room as the complainant when the complainant’s evidence is being taken. Rather, the accused is entitled to see and hear the complainant while the complainant is giving evidence (using closed-circuit television (CCTV) or other facilities) and to have at all times the means of communicating with his or her legal practitioner.223

26.165 Some legislation deals with both forms of pre-recorded evidence—pre-recorded evidence of interview; and other evidence. For example, in the ACT, audiovisual recordings of a witness answering questions of a ‘prescribed person in relation to the investigation of a sexual or violent offence’ may be admitted as evidence.224 In addition, prosecution witnesses in relation to sexual offence proceedings may give evidence in chief at a pre-trial hearing and an audiovisual recording of this evidence may be admitted as the witness’ evidence at the trial.225

26.166 While the Victorian VATE provisions apply only to young or cognitively impaired complainants in sexual offence proceedings, in other jurisdictions, adult complainants of sexual assault may also be covered in some circumstances. For example, the Queensland and Western Australian provisions apply to any ‘special witness’, defined to include any person who in the court’s opinion would be likely to suffer severe emotional trauma or be likely to be so intimidated as to be disadvantaged as a witness, if required to give evidence in accordance with the usual rules and practice of the court.226

26.167 In South Australia, pre-recorded evidence may be used in relation to the evidence of a witness who is the alleged victim of a sexual offence to which the proceedings relate; and ‘in any other case—where, because of the circumstances of the

---

219 Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) ss 21A, 21AI–21AO; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 13A; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 368; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 106HB; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) div 4.2B; Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 21E.
220 Under the age of 18 years.
221 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) ss 369–370.
222 Ibid s 374.
223 Ibid s 372.
224 Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) ss 40E, 40F.
225 Ibid ss 40P, 40Q, 40S.
226 Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 21A(1); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 106R.
Family Violence—A National Legal Response

witness or the circumstances of the case, the witness would, in the opinion of the court, be specially disadvantaged if not treated as a vulnerable witness.227 The Northern Territory extends the coverage of its provisions to any witness who is the alleged victim of a sexual offence to which the proceedings relate.228

Benefits and drawbacks

26.168 Pre-recorded evidence has been described as offering the following benefits:

- improving the quality of evidence;229
- facilitating pre-trial decisions by the prosecution and the defence;
- helping with the scheduling and conduct of the trial; and
- minimising system abuse of witnesses.230

26.169 The drawbacks to pre-recorded testimony are said to include that:

- it is unfair to require the defence to cross-examine the main prosecution witness before the formal trial has begun;
- defence lawyers are concerned that they cannot prepare to cross-examine the most important prosecution witness until shortly before the trial is scheduled;
- video technology lacks the immediacy and persuasiveness of a witness’ live-in-court testimony; and
- there can be problems with the technology.231

26.170 Other possible disadvantages include that the quality of the evidence is overly dependent on the skills of the interviewer, the evidence may be insufficiently tested by cross-examination, the witness may have to undergo multiple interviews to give a full account of the complaint and may suffer more stress and trauma where cross-examination is not preceded by giving evidence-in-chief in court.232 In this 227 Evidence Act 1929 (SA) ss 4, 13A.

228 Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 21B.
230 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT) and Australian Federal Police, Responding to Sexual Assault: The Challenge of Change (2005), 132–133. For example, pre-recorded evidence may reduce the need to repeat evidence, reduce trauma for victims in giving evidence in court and increase guilty pleas where the evidence given is compelling: C Corns, ‘Videotaped Evidence of Child Complainants in Criminal Proceedings: A Comparison of Alternative Models’ (2001) 25 Criminal Law Journal 75, 77–78.
231 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT) and Australian Federal Police, Responding to Sexual Assault: The Challenge of Change (2005), 133–134. WLS NSW stated that NSW courts ‘may not have access to adequate audio-visual equipment and/or there can be mistakes such as not recording the evidence or only partially recording it’: Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
context, Women’s Legal Services NSW stated that complainants should be advised of any possible disadvantages (including any possible effect of tendering pre-recorded material on the persuasiveness of the evidence, the experience of being cross-examined ‘cold’ without giving evidence in chief, potential delays etc) prior to the tendering of the evidence-in-chief. It is important that the complainant is advised they have a choice and can make an informed decision.233

Consultation Paper

26.171 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should allow the tendering of pre-recorded evidence of interview and other pre-recorded evidence of child victims of sexual assault and victims of sexual assault who are vulnerable as a result of mental or physical impairment. The Commissions also proposed that any adult victim of sexual assault be permitted to give pre-recorded evidence, by order of the court.234 Governments should, it was proposed, ensure that participants in the criminal justice system receive comprehensive education in relation to interviewing victims of sexual assault and creating pre-recorded evidence.235

26.172 Stakeholders expressed support for extending the potential use of pre-recording to evidence given by all adult complainants of sexual assault,236 and for appropriate education and training to encourage such use.237

26.173 Northern Territory stakeholders stated that pre-recorded evidence is often used in sexual offence proceedings in the Territory, including for adult complainants in remote communities, and that these procedures are generally operating well.238

---

238 Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NT), Consultation, Darwin, 27 May 2010; Northern Territory Police, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010; North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010; Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit and Central Australian Women’s Legal Service,
An advantage of the pre-recording of complainants’ evidence in sexual cases is that if it is strong, there is an opportunity for the case to settle by way of a plea without the need for a jury trial, and if it is weak there is an opportunity for the charges to be withdrawn, without the need for a jury trial.\(^{239}\)

26.174 The use of pre-recorded evidence was seen as important in increasing reporting of offences against Indigenous women in Central Australia and reducing the trauma attributable to giving evidence on multiple occasions and seeing the defendant in court.\(^{240}\)

26.175 NASASV submitted that legislation should allow for the use of pre-recorded evidence, while not making it the only possible option:

For example, a fourteen year old girl who recently reported a sexually abusive man to police expressed a strong desire to give evidence in court, in his presence. Her healing and her court case may be strengthened by the opportunity to do so, rather than to provide evidence via video recording.\(^{241}\)

26.176 While one advantage of pre-recording evidence of interview is to address forensic disadvantage caused by delay between the making of the complaint and the trial,\(^{242}\) one stakeholder also noted that, where trials are held expeditiously, it may not be as worthwhile to pre-record evidence.\(^{243}\) The NSW DPP opposed routine pre-recording of evidence:

Given that trials in NSW do proceed relatively expeditiously and any wholesale change to a system of pre-recording would, by adding an extra step, delay the final outcome, we are not in support of this change.\(^{244}\)

26.177 The Public Defenders Office NSW doubted whether, in NSW, cross-examination of children in advance would make any positive change to the court experience for child complainants, because all evidence of child sexual assault complainants is given from a remote location via CCTV. The adducing of pre-recorded interviews of adult complainants taken by investigators was opposed given ‘the need for an immediate account of the adult complainant’s version to be taken for investigative purposes, and the unavailability of the assistance of Crown Prosecutors at this point’.\(^{245}\)
26.178 A range of other concerns about the use (or over-use) of pre-recorded evidence was identified by stakeholders, including that:

- pre-recorded evidence of interview may, in practice, have limited value as evidence-in-chief, and the complainant may still be required to give evidence at the trial;
- where evidence is recorded at a pre-trial hearing and then replayed at the trial, the use of court resources is duplicated; and
- there may be problems where there is lack of continuity in legal representatives or judicial officers.246

26.179 In relation to the last point, the Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission noted that, wherever possible, pre-recording of evidence should be conducted by the trial judge:

Otherwise, serious unfairness can arise, for example where the judge who conducts the [pre-recording] permits cross-examination of the complainant which the trial judge subsequently indicates he or she would not have allowed … 247

26.180 Stakeholders, including those representing defendants in sexual offence proceedings, did not highlight any particular disadvantage of pre-recorded evidence for defendants. If anything, it was considered that pre-recorded evidence of a victim would generally make less of an impression on a jury than in court testimony.248

Commission’s views

26.181 As discussed, most states and territories have enacted regimes for the comprehensive pre-recording of evidence for child victims of sexual assault (and those who are cognitively or intellectually impaired). There is little firm information about the extent to which pre-recording is used249 or its effects on the experience of complainants or outcomes of trials.

26.182 In the Commissions’ view, however, there seems no reason why similar provisions should not be available in relation to the evidence of all adult complainants of sexual assault. It is important to facilitate mechanisms that minimise the negative experiences of complainants of sexual assault in the criminal justice system where this can be done without prejudicing defendants’ rights to a fair trial. All Australian jurisdictions should adopt comprehensive provisions dealing with pre-recorded evidence in sexual offence proceedings.

246 Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; Public Defenders and Prosecutors, Consultation, Sydney, 7 June 2010; Central Australian Aboriginal Legal Aid Service and Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Consultation, Alice Springs, 2010.

247 Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.

248 Barrister, Consultation, Sydney, 10 June 2010; NSW Legal Assistance Forum, Consultation, Sydney, 10 May 2010.

These provisions should permit the tendering of pre-recorded evidence of interview between investigators and a sexual assault complainant as the complainant’s evidence-in-chief and apply to all complainants of sexual assault (adults and children).

In addition, child complainants of sexual assault, and complainants of sexual assault who are vulnerable as a result of mental or physical impairment, should be permitted to provide evidence recorded at a pre-trial hearing. This evidence should be able to be replayed at the trial as the witness’ evidence. Adult victims of sexual assault should also be permitted to provide evidence in this way, by order of the court.

The Commissions do not consider that, in the context of this Inquiry, it would be appropriate to make recommendations detailing the grounds on which the admission of pre-recorded evidence should be ordered or the kind of evidence to which pre-recording should apply. The Commissions observe, however, that the wishes of the complainant should be taken into account in the decision-making process by the court and prosecutors.

The availability of mechanisms for giving pre-recorded evidence does not mean, however, that pre-recording will always be used. There is a range of reasons why it may not be appropriate to do so, for example:

- the prosecutor may have formed the view that [pre-recorded evidence] was not in an appropriate form to use because of the way in which the questions were asked or, because of some technical difficulty with the tape, such as poor quality sound or visual display. It may also be that some prosecutors prefer to call the complainant to give viva voce evidence … because, for whatever reasons, this is perceived as improving the chances of securing a conviction. In some cases the complainant may wish to give viva voce evidence and/or the prosecutor forms the view that viva voce evidence will present as more compelling and impressive evidence. This is simply an aspect of the overall prosecutorial discretion to decide what evidence shall be called at trial and how that evidence is to be presented.

A 2009 study identified problems with VATE, including concerns about the interview techniques and the technical quality of recordings. Clearly, legislation permitting wider use of pre-recorded evidence should be supported by investment in up-to-date technology and a comprehensive training program for interviewers. All participants in the criminal justice system should receive training in relation to the new provisions, including the rationale for them.

---

250 For example, Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 306T provides that ‘A person must not call a vulnerable person to give evidence of a previous representation by means other than a recording made by an investigating official of the interview in the course of which the previous representation was made unless the person has taken into account any wishes of the vulnerable person’.

252 M Powell and R Wright, ‘Professionals’ Perceptions of Electronically Recorded Interviews with Vulnerable Witnesses’ (2009) 21 Current Issues in Criminal Justice 205, 209–213. However, the study found that, ‘given the numerous benefits of the VATE process’, several stakeholders proposed that it should be extended to a wider range of witnesses and to all sex offence cases, 208.

253 See Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT) and Australian Federal Police, Responding to Sexual Assault: The Challenge of Change (2005), Rec 6.3.
The work of the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) on vulnerable witness protections, through the National Working Group on Evidence, is expected to include consideration of the use of audiovisual records of a witness to give evidence in proceedings. Any recommendations for reform of the uniform Evidence Acts (including to facilitate use of pre-recorded evidence in sexual assault proceedings) would need to be considered by the Australian and state and territory governments through the mechanism of SCAG.\textsuperscript{254}

Recommendation 26–6 Federal, state and territory legislation should permit the tendering of pre-recorded evidence of interview between a sexual assault complainant and investigators as the complainant’s evidence-in-chief. Such provisions should apply to all complainants of sexual assault, both adults and children.

Recommendation 26–7 Federal, state and territory legislation should permit child complainants of sexual assault and complainants of sexual assault who are vulnerable as a result of mental or physical impairment, to provide evidence recorded at a pre-trial hearing. This evidence should be able to be replayed at the trial as the witness’ evidence. Adult victims of sexual assault should also be permitted to provide evidence in this way, by leave of the court.

Recommendation 26–8 The Australian, state and territory governments should ensure that relevant participants in the criminal justice system receive comprehensive education about legislation authorising the use of pre-recorded evidence in sexual assault proceedings, and training in relation to interviewing victims of sexual assault and pre-recording evidence.

\textsuperscript{254} Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010.
27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings

Contents

Introduction 1235
Evidence issues 1236
Sexual reputation and experience 1237
  Evidence of witnesses who are not complainants 1238
  Terminology 1239
  Sexual reputation 1241
  Sexual experience 1242
  Granting leave to adduce sexual experience evidence 1246
  Procedural issues 1253
Sexual assault communications privilege 1257
  Current law 1257
  Assisting complainants to invoke the privilege 1260
Expert opinion evidence and children 1266
  Reform of the opinion rule 1267
Tendency and coincidence evidence 1274
  Current law 1274
  Impact in sexual assault proceedings 1275
  Reform options 1281
  Commissions’ views 1287
Relevance and consent 1291
Relationship evidence 1294
  Case law 1295
  Reform options 1297
Evidence of recent and delayed complaint 1299
  Uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions 1299
  Other modifications to the common law 1301
  Evidence of delayed complaint 1302

Introduction

27.1 The previous chapter discussed some of the problems that may lead to attrition of sexual assault cases at the reporting, investigation, prosecution and other stages before cases reach trial.

27.2 This chapter, and Chapter 28, examine selected issues that arise in the trial of sexual assault cases. This chapter deals with aspects of the application of the laws of evidence. Chapter 28 deals with the giving of jury warnings, the cross-examination of complainants and other witnesses in sexual assault proceedings and certain other aspects of giving evidence.

27.3 These issues have been selected because the application of law in these areas has a direct and significant impact on the experiences in the criminal justice system of women and children who have suffered sexual assault, including in a family violence context—the focus of the Commissions’ Terms of Reference. The way in which these aspects of the law are applied may lead to cases being withdrawn at a late stage or tried without the full evidentiary picture being before the jury. The procedures required at trial may make complainants reluctant to continue to give evidence in sexual assault proceedings.

Evidence issues

27.4 Evidence issues of particular concern in the context of sexual assault proceedings include the law and procedure relating to: evidence of sexual reputation and experience; the disclosure of confidential counselling communications; expert opinion evidence and children; tendency and coincidence evidence; relationship evidence; and evidence of recent and delayed complaint.

27.5 While these issues may appear disparate, there are some common themes—notably those relating to consent and credibility. Evidence issues often arise where the defence is seeking to show that sexual activity was consensual and, in doing so, to undermine the credibility of the complainant. This can sometimes result in unjustifiable trauma to complainants. In other contexts, the policy challenge is posed by evidence of prior misconduct by the defendant, which is highly prejudicial and may carry a risk of wrongful conviction. At the same time, it can be highly important and probative evidence.

27.6 The rules of evidence vary among jurisdictions depending, in particular, on whether the uniform Evidence Acts apply. In this Report, the term ‘uniform Evidence Acts’ is used to refer to legislation based on the Model Uniform Evidence Bill, which was considered and endorsed by the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) in July 2007, or on the Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) and Evidence Act 1995 (NSW). The Model Uniform Evidence Bill is based on these latter Acts, with amendments recommended in Uniform Evidence Law (ALRC Report 102).

27.7 The Australian Government has an ongoing commitment to the harmonisation of evidence law across Australian jurisdictions through the work of the SCAG National Working Group on Evidence. Recommendations for reform of the uniform Evidence Acts made in this Report need to be considered by the Australian and state and territory governments through the mechanism of SCAG.

---

2 Ibid, [11.15].
27.8 The uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions are the Commonwealth, NSW, Victoria, Tasmania, the ACT (which applies the federal legislation) and Norfolk Island. There are minor differences in the uniform Evidence Acts applying in these jurisdictions. The uniform Evidence Acts work in conjunction with evidentiary provisions contained in a range of other federal, state and territory legislation.

27.9 As discussed in ALRC Report 102, the uniform Evidence Acts in their entirety are not a code of the law of evidence. The enactment of the uniform legislation resulted in substantial changes to the common law in some areas. In other areas the common law remains an important reference assisting application of the uniform Evidence Acts. Stated simply, the uniform Evidence Acts govern admissibility issues, but reference to the common law can facilitate an understanding of underlying concepts and help to identify the changes brought about by the Acts.

27.10 In other jurisdictions, referred to for convenience as ‘common law evidence jurisdictions’, the common law has also been modified by statute in significant and varying ways, including in relation to the admissibility of evidence in sexual offence proceedings.

Sexual reputation and experience

27.11 This section considers legislation intended to restrict the admission of evidence of a complainant’s sexual reputation and sexual experience. A number of complexities arise in analysing existing legislation of this kind.

27.12 First, existing restrictions apply to evidence defined in varying ways, including as evidence of sexual reputation, sexual history, sexual experience and sexual activities. The implications of this terminology are considered below. For convenience, the Report uses the term sexual experience to mean the sexual activities (consensual or non-consensual) of a complainant.

27.13 Secondly, existing legislative provisions not only restrict the admission of sexual reputation and sexual experience evidence generally, but also for specific purposes—including for the purpose of establishing that the complainant is the ‘type’ of person who is more likely to consent to sexual activity, or as an indicator of the complainant’s truthfulness.

---

3 The corresponding legislation comprises: Evidence Act 1995 (Cth); Evidence Act 1995 (NSW); Evidence Act 2008 (Vic); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas); Evidence Act 2004 (NI).

4 For example, the Tasmanian Act has a number of sections not found in the Commonwealth or NSW legislation, such as those dealing with procedures for proving certain matters, certain privileges, certain matters concerning witnesses and rape shield provisions.

6 In 2006, the Northern Territory Law Reform Committee recommended that the uniform Evidence Act be adopted in the Northern Territory: Northern Territory Law Reform Committee, Report on the Uniform Evidence Act (2006).

7 The relationship between these provisions and the uniform Evidence Acts has previously been considered by the Commissions: Australian Law Reform Commission, New South Wales Law Reform Commission
Evidence of witnesses who are not complainants

27.14 State and territory legislation generally restricts the admission of evidence of the complainant’s sexual reputation and sexual experience in proceedings in which a person stands charged with a sexual offence. The Commonwealth restrictions apply to every child witness in sexual assault proceedings.

27.15 The provisions therefore do not apply to evidence about the sexual reputation or sexual experience of the following groups:

- in the Commonwealth jurisdiction, adult sexual assault complainants in sexual assault proceedings;
- in all jurisdictions, adult sexual assault victims who are witnesses, but not complainants in sexual assault proceedings; and
- in the state and territory jurisdictions, child witnesses who are not complainants in a sexual assault proceeding.

Submissions and consultations

27.16 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether federal, state and territory evidence laws and procedural rules should limit the admission of evidence about the sexual reputation and prior sexual history of all witnesses in sexual assault proceedings.

27.17 A number of stakeholders supported the extension of legislative restrictions in relation to the admission of evidence about sexual reputation and sexual experience to all witnesses in sexual assault proceedings.

27.18 Women’s Legal Service Queensland suggested that it would be unusual for evidence about the sexual reputation or sexual experience of a witness who is not the complainant to be relevant in sexual assault proceedings.

---

8 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 339(1); Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36A; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34L(1); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(1); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 49; Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 4.

9 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) ss 15Y, 15YB, 15YC.

Commissions’ views

27.19 The Commissions consider that, in practice, questions are not likely to arise often concerning the admissibility of evidence of the sexual reputation or sexual experience of a witness who is not the complainant in sexual assault proceedings. One possible scenario might involve attempts to adduce sexual experience evidence about a witness who has been engaged in prostitution, in order to impugn her credibility.

27.20 Where such evidence is sought to be adduced, existing evidence law may adequately deal with the possibility. For example, evidence about the sexual reputation or sexual experience of a witness may fail the relevance requirement under s 55 of the uniform Evidence Acts. If questioning on the subject is intended to harass or intimidate the witness, questioning may (or must) be disallowed under s 41 of the uniform Evidence Acts. Finally, if the evidence is sought to be admitted in cross-examination as to credibility, it will be excluded under s 102 of uniform Evidence Acts unless it ‘could substantially affect the assessment of the credibility of the witness’.13

27.21 While some stakeholders suggested existing restrictions in relation to the admission of evidence of sexual reputation or sexual experience should be extended to all witnesses, the Commissions consider that there are insufficient grounds to make such a recommendation.

Terminology

27.22 Australian legislation restricts the admission of evidence variously described as being of:

- the general reputation of the complainant with respect to chastity;14
- sexual reputation;15
- reputation with respect to sexual activities;16
- disposition of the complainant in sexual matters, or evidence that raises inferences about a complainant’s general disposition;17
- sexual history;19

---

13 Uniform Evidence Acts, s 103.
14 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 341. Section 4(1)(b) of the Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) uses a similar phrase: ‘the complainant’s general reputation as to chastity’.
15 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 293(2); Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4(1); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36B; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34L(1)(a); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(1)(a); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 50.
16 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YB.
17 Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BA; Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(6)(b).
18 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YC; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 352(a); Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4(4); Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34L(3); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 53(2); Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 4(2)(a).
19 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) ss 340, 343.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- sexual experience,\textsuperscript{20} or sexual experiences,\textsuperscript{21} and
- ‘experience with respect to sexual activities’,\textsuperscript{22} ‘sexual activity’\textsuperscript{23} or ‘sexual activities’.\textsuperscript{24}

27.23 Statutory and judicial guidance\textsuperscript{25} about the meaning and boundaries of each of these terms and the kinds of evidence covered are limited.\textsuperscript{26} In practice, this uncertainty may inhibit the ability of judicial officers and practitioners to apply and observe the current legislative provisions.\textsuperscript{27}

Submissions and consultations

27.24 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how judicial officers and legal practitioners can best be assisted to develop a consistent approach to the classification of evidence as being of ‘sexual reputation’ as compared with ‘sexual experience’ (or ‘sexual activities’).\textsuperscript{28}

27.25 National Legal Aid noted that the operation of the legislative provisions governing these kinds of evidence is not monitored, but should be, and that there is often no empirical evidence to assess whether the intention of Parliament in enacting particular provisions is being met.\textsuperscript{29} A number of other stakeholders observed that the classification of evidence as being of ‘sexual reputation’ or ‘sexual experience’ is not an issue in practice.\textsuperscript{30}

27.26 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria suggested that multifaceted education and training would assist the development of a consistent approach to the classification of evidence as being of ‘sexual reputation’ or ‘sexual experience’. This should include targeted judicial professional development.\textsuperscript{31}

\textsuperscript{20} Ibid s 293(4); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(1)(b).
\textsuperscript{21} Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BC.
\textsuperscript{22} Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YC.
\textsuperscript{23} Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 293(3); Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4(2).
\textsuperscript{24} Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 342; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34L(1)(b); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 51; Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 4(1)(b).
\textsuperscript{25} The leading case of Bull v The Queen (2000) 201 CLR 443, [54]–[64] discusses the distinctions between evidence relating to the ‘sexual reputation’, ‘disposition of the complainant in sexual matters’, ‘sexual experience’ and ‘sexual experiences’.
\textsuperscript{26} For further discussion about the meaning and boundaries of the terms, see Consultation Paper, [18.16]–[18.20].
\textsuperscript{27} For example, an empirical study undertaken in relation to sexual assault hearings in the District Court of New South Wales over a one year period between 1 May 1994 and 30 April 1995 concluded that sexual reputation evidence cannot be clearly distinguished from sexual experience evidence: J Bargen, Heroines of Fortitude: The Experiences of Women in Court as Victims of Sexual Assault, Gender Bias and the Law Project (1996), 11. In the context of the Western Australian legislation, ‘a difficulty arises because evidence of a complainant’s sexual experiences, which is made admissible by s 36BC, will often, but not necessarily, also be evidence relating to a person's sexual disposition’ which shall not be adduced or elicited by or on behalf of an accused: Bull v The Queen (2000) 201 CLR 443, [61].
\textsuperscript{28} Consultation Paper, Question 18–2.
\textsuperscript{29} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{30} Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Central Australian Aboriginal Legal Aid Service and Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Consultation, Alice Springs, 2010.
\textsuperscript{31} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Commissions’ views

27.27 It is important that sexual reputation evidence is distinguishable from sexual experience evidence because, broadly speaking, sexual reputation evidence is inadmissible in most jurisdictions, whereas sexual experience evidence is admissible in some circumstances. However, it is not clear whether, or to what extent, evidence is inconsistently categorised in practice.

27.28 The Commissions suggest that this is an area in which empirical research might usefully be conducted to establish how existing provisions are being applied and interpreted in sexual assault proceedings. Judicial and practitioner education concerning relevant definitions and their boundaries may also assist to ensure that the concepts are more clearly understood and delineated.

Sexual reputation

27.29 Evidence relating to a complainant’s sexual reputation is inadmissible in all Australian states and the ACT. Evidence of sexual reputation is excluded on the basis that, ‘even if relevant and therefore admissible, [it] is too far removed from evidence of actual events or circumstances for its admission to be justified in any circumstances’.

27.30 In the Northern Territory, evidence relating to the complainant’s general reputation as to chastity may be elicited or led with the leave of the court. Leave is not granted unless the evidence has substantial relevance to the facts in issue.

27.31 Under federal legislation, evidence of a child witness or child complainant’s sexual reputation is only admissible in a proceeding if the court is satisfied that the evidence is substantially relevant to the facts in issue.

Submissions and consultations

27.32 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should provide that a court must not admit any evidence of the sexual reputation of the complainant.

32 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 293(2); Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 341; Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4(1); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36B; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34L(1)(a); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(1)(a); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 50.

35 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YB.

36 Consultation Paper, Proposal 18–1.
Stakeholders generally supported the proposal. Some stakeholders, however, preferred a model where sexual reputation evidence may be elicited or led with the court's leave. The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria noted that the Consultation Paper proposal went further than the current restrictions in Victoria and that any such law needs to be supported by judicial education and lawyer accreditation in family violence and sexual assault.

Commissions’ views

The Consultation Paper proposal reflected the current legal position in most jurisdictions. It is clear that the policy basis for excluding evidence of sexual reputation—that it is too far removed from the evidence of actual events or circumstances for its admission to be justified in any circumstances—is widely accepted. However, the federal and Northern Territory exclusionary rules do not give the policy full effect.

In the Commissions’ view, federal, state and territory legislation should be consistent in providing that the court must not allow any questions as to, or admit any evidence of, the sexual reputation of the complainant. Judicial and practitioner education concerning the scope of evidence of sexual reputation may be desirable.

Recommendation 27–1 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that complainants of sexual assault must not be cross-examined in relation to, and the court must not admit any evidence of, the sexual reputation of the complainant.

Sexual experience

Australian jurisdictions have adopted different approaches to the admission of evidence of the complainant’s sexual experience—described variously as evidence of ‘sexual activities’, ‘sexual activity’, ‘sexual experiences’ and ‘sexual experience’.

This issue is an important one for all complainants in sexual assault cases for whom the admission of sexual experience evidence can have the effect of re-traumatisation through humiliation and ‘victim-blaming’.

---

38 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.

39 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
27.38 The Commissions have heard that evidence of a complainant’s prior sexual history is more likely to be admitted in proceedings concerning sexual offences perpetrated in a family violence context, as compared with other sexual assault proceedings.

27.39 Sexual experience evidence may also reinforce certain prejudices that jury members may hold. Statutory restrictions relating to the admission of sexual experience evidence have been enacted to curtail reasoning influenced by what have been described as the ‘twin myths’. That is, to forbid any chain of ‘reasoning’ that asserts that, because the complainant has a certain sexual reputation or a certain disposition in sexual matters or has had certain sexual experiences, he or she is the ‘kind of person’ who would be more likely to consent to the acts of the subject of the charge … [and] to forbid the chain of ‘reasoning’ that asserts that, because a complainant has a particular sexual reputation or disposition in sexual matters or has had certain sexual experiences, he or she is less worthy of belief than a complainant without those features.

Scope of the restrictions

27.40 The issues in this area include whether rules prohibiting the admission of evidence of sexual experience should apply to evidence of the complainant’s:

- sexual experience with the defendant, as well as with other persons; or
- non-consensual, as well as consensual, sexual experiences.

27.41 In the ACT, the restrictions apply only to evidence about sexual activity with persons other than the accused. In Victoria, Western Australia and Tasmania the sexual experience provisions apply (expressly or by implication) to prior sexual experience between the complainant and the defendant. In the remaining jurisdictions, the sexual experience or conduct provisions do not restrict the admission of evidence about ‘recent’ sexual activity between the complainant and the defendant.

27.42 The Victorian legislation is unique in expressly restricting questions and evidence about both the consensual and non-consensual sexual activities of the complainant. The legislation covers non-consensual sexual activities in order to clearly restrict cross-examination of complainants about earlier incidents of child

---

40 Ibid; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
42 Bull v The Queen (2000) 201 CLR 443, [53].
44 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 342; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BC(1); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(1)(b).
45 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 293(4); Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW); Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4(4) and Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 4(3) (acts which are ‘substantially contemporaneous’); Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34L(1)(b) (‘recent sexual activities with the accused’).
sexual abuse or sexual assault. The Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) noted that:

in many cases the main purpose of this type of cross-examination is to unsettle the complainant by suggesting he or she is prone to lie or is mentally unstable ...

Many complainants find it difficult to understand why the defence should be able to cross-examine them about prior abuse when evidence about the accused’s prior sexual behaviour is rarely admissible and the accused is entitled to exercise the right to remain silent.

27.43 In all jurisdictions, except Western Australia, the sexual experience provisions apply to evidence adduced or elicited by the prosecution or the defendant. In Western Australia the provisions apply only where the evidence is adduced or elicited by the defendant.

Discretionary and mandatory approaches

27.44 Another important distinction between the different approaches to restricting the admission of evidence of the complainant’s sexual experience is whether or not admissibility is subject to leave granted by a judicial officer in an exercise of their discretion.

27.45 New South Wales is the only Australian jurisdiction in which a judicial officer does not have an overriding or residual discretion to admit sexual experience evidence. Section 293 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) provides that sexual experience evidence is inadmissible unless it falls within a specific statutory exception. Evidence which falls outside of the exceptions is excluded.

27.46 In all other Australian jurisdictions, admissibility is a matter for the judicial officer’s discretion, the exercise of which is subject to legislative criteria.

Submissions and consultations

27.47 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should provide that the court must not admit any evidence as to the sexual activities (whether consensual or non-consensual) of the complainant other than those to which the charge relates, without the leave of the court.

27.48 Stakeholders expressed support for the Consultation Paper proposal. Some stakeholders commented that the NSW approach to the exclusion of sexual experience

---

49 Evidence Act 1906 (WA) ss 36A–36BC.
50 Consultation Paper, Proposal 18–2.
51 Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010; National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 193, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010.
27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings

Commissions’ views

27.49 The main policy objective informing restrictions on admitting sexual experience evidence concerns minimising the distress, humiliation and embarrassment experienced by complainants who testify at trial. To adequately safeguard sexual assault complainants against such distress, particularly where such evidence is sought to be adduced through cross-examination, restrictions should have broad application.

27.50 Restrictions should apply to evidence of both the consensual and non-consensual sexual experience of the complainant. This should prevent evidence of prior sexual assault and incidents of sexual abuse in childhood being admitted. It will also ensure that survivors of sexual abuse are offered protection from investigation into their sexual history. The provisions should also apply to the complainant’s sexual experience with the accused and with other persons, regardless of whether the experience was ‘recent’ or not.

27.51 The Commissions therefore support the enactment of legislation similar to s 342 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic), which states:

The complainant must not be cross-examined, and the court must not admit any evidence, as to the sexual activities (whether consensual or nonconsensual) of the complainant (other than those to which the charge relates), without the leave of the court.

27.52 In the Commissions’ view, such restrictions on the admission of evidence of the complainants’ sexual experience are unlikely to cause injustice to the defendant, provided that any evidence covered by the rule may be admitted with the leave of the court.

27.53 Concerns about whether the admissibility of sexual experience evidence is better dealt with by the statutory exception approach of NSW or the discretion-based approaches of other jurisdictions have been canvassed in reports by the former Model Criminal Code Officers Committee of SCAG (MCCOC)—now the Model Criminal Law Officers Committee—the New South Wales Law Reform Commission 52

---

52 Barrister, Consultation, Sydney, 10 June 2010; NSW Legal Assistance Forum, Consultation, Sydney, 10 May 2010.
53 The experience of testifying at trial is sometimes said to cause complainants almost as much trauma as the actual assault, and the anticipated admission of sexual history evidence may contribute to the reluctance of many women to report sexual assaults to the police. See, eg, S Bronitt and T Henning, ‘Rape Victims on Trial: Regulating the Use and Abuse of Sexual History Evidence’ in P Easteal (ed) Balancing the Scales: Rape, Law Reform and Australian Culture (1998) 76, 81; J Bargen and E Fishwick, Sexual Assault Law Reform: A National Perspective (1995), prepared for the Office of the Status of Women, 75.
55 The circumstances in which the leave of the court may be granted are discussed below.
These reports considered the relative merits of each approach and whether the statutory exception approach is too restrictive and excludes material relevant to the defendant’s defence. Each report favoured a structured discretionary model.

27.54 In the Commissions’ view, the relevant issues related to each approach—for both complainants and defendants—have been sufficiently canvassed in, and appropriately evaluated by, these earlier reports. The Commissions agree that the admission of sexual experience evidence should be determined by judicial officers exercising their discretion in accordance with criteria set out in legislation. The discussion that follows focuses on identifying the optimal formulation for this approach.

Recommendation 27–2 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that the complainant must not be cross-examined, and the court must not admit any evidence, as to the sexual activities—whether consensual or non-consensual—of the complainant, other than those to which the charge relates, without the leave of the court.

Granting leave to adduce sexual experience evidence

27.55 The discussion below considers the legislative criteria that apply to the judicial discretion to grant leave to admit evidence of the complainant’s sexual experience, including where the evidence is sought to be admitted because it:

- may raise an inference as to the complainant’s general disposition; or
- relates to the complainant’s credibility as a witness.

27.56 Generally, leave must not be given under the federal legislation to admit evidence of a child witness or child complainant’s sexual experience unless the evidence is substantially relevant to the facts in issue. In relation to evidence relating to the credibility of a child witness adduced in cross-examination of the child, leave must not be granted unless the evidence has substantial probative value. The court may have regard to a range of factors in deciding whether the evidence has substantial probative value, but must have regard to:

---

58 Including an inference that the complainant is the type of person who is more likely to have consented to the sexual activity to which the charge relates.

59 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YC(2)(a).

60 Ibid s 15YC(2)(b).
27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings

27.57 In addition, the federal legislation provides that sexual experience is not admissible merely because of any inference it may raise about general disposition.62

27.58 In Victoria, the court must not grant leave unless it is satisfied that the evidence has substantial relevance to a fact in issue and that it is in the interests of justice to allow the cross-examination or to admit the evidence, having regard to a list of considerations.63 One consideration is ‘whether the probative value of the evidence outweighs the distress, humiliation and embarrassment that the complainant may experience’.64

27.59 The admission of sexual history evidence to support an inference that the complainant is ‘the type of person who is more likely to have consented to the sexual activity to which the charge relates’ is prohibited in Victoria.65

27.60 In addition, s 352 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) provides that:

   Sexual history evidence is not to be regarded—
   (a) as having a substantial relevance to the facts in issue by virtue of any inferences it may raise as to general disposition; or (b) as being proper matter for cross-examination as to credit unless, because of special circumstances, it would be likely materially to impair confidence in the reliability of the evidence of the complainant.

27.61 The Queensland, ACT and Northern Territory legislation are substantially similar. The court must not give leave unless satisfied that the evidence has substantial relevance to the facts in issue or is a proper matter for cross-examination about credit.66 Evidence relating to, or tending to establish the fact that, the complainant has engaged in sexual activity with a person or persons is not to be regarded as being a proper matter for cross-examination about credit unless the evidence would be likely materially to impair confidence in the reliability of the complainant’s evidence.67 Sexual activity evidence that relates to or tends to establish that the complainant has engaged, or was accustomed to engaging, in sexual activity is not to be regarded as

---

61 Ibid s 15YC(4).
62 Ibid s 15YC(3).
63 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 349.
64 Ibid s 349(a).
65 Ibid s 343.
having a substantial relevance to the facts in issue because of any inference,68 or by reason only of an inference,69 it may raise about general disposition.

27.62 The Western Australian and Tasmanian legislation are alike in so far as they provide that the court shall not grant leave unless the evidence sought to be adduced or elicited has substantial relevance to the facts in issue and the probative value of the evidence that is sought outweighs the distress, humiliation or embarrassment which the complainant must suffer as a result of its admission.70

27.63 The Tasmanian legislation requires the judicial officer to take into account the age of the complainant and the number and nature of the questions likely to be put, when assessing the amount of the distress, humiliation or embarrassment to the complainant.71 It also provides that evidence relating to sexual experience does not have the requisite relevance to a fact in issue if it is relevant only to the credibility of the complainant.72

27.64 In South Australia, leave to ask questions or admit evidence about the complainant’s sexual activities must not be granted unless, taking into account the ‘principle that alleged victims of sexual offences should not be subjected to unnecessary distress, humiliation or embarrassment through the asking of questions or admission of evidence’, the admission of the evidence is ‘required in the interests of justice’ and is either of ‘substantial probative value’ or ‘would, in the circumstances, be likely materially to impair confidence in the reliability of the evidence of the alleged victim’.73 Evidence the purpose of which is only to raise inferences concerning some general disposition of the complainant, is not admissible.74 The admissibility of sexual experience evidence which relates to the credibility of the complainant is determined by general credibility rules.75

Consultation Paper

27.65 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions made a number of proposals, substantially based on the current Victorian legislation,76 relating to the federal, state and territory legislative provisions governing the admissibility of sexual experience evidence.

27.66 The Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should provide that the court shall not grant leave for complainants of sexual assault to be cross-examined about their sexual activities unless it is satisfied that the evidence has 68 Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4(4); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 53(2).

70 Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BC(2); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(2). The Western Australian legislation also prohibits the eliciting or admission of evidence relating to the disposition of the complainant in sexual matters: Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BA.
71 Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(4).
72 Ibid s 194M(3).
73 Ibid s 194M(3).
74 Ibid s 34L(3).
75 Ibid s 23.
76 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) ss 343, 349, 352.
significance probative value to a fact in issue and the probative value substantially outweighs the danger of unfair prejudice to the proper administration of justice. 77

27.67 The Commissions also proposed that legislation should provide that the court, in deciding whether the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighs the danger of unfair prejudice to the proper administration of justice, must have regard to:

(a) the distress, humiliation, or embarrassment which the complainant may suffer as a result of the cross-examination or the admission of the evidence, in view of the age of the complainant and the number and nature of the questions that the complainant is likely to be asked;

(b) the risk that the evidence may arouse in the jury discriminatory belief or bias, prejudice, sympathy or hostility;

(c) the need to respect the complainant’s personal dignity and privacy;

(d) the right of the accused to make a full answer and defence; and

(e) any other factor which the court considers relevant. 78

27.68 The Commissions asked whether federal, state and territory legislation should provide that sexual experience evidence is not:

(a) admissible to support an inference that the complainant is the type of person who is more likely to have consented to the sexual activity to which the charge relates; and/or

(b) to be regarded as having substantial probative value by virtue of any inference it may raise as to general disposition. 79

27.69 Finally, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should provide that sexual experience evidence is not to be regarded as being a proper matter for cross-examination as to credit unless, because of special circumstances, it would be likely materially to impair confidence in the reliability of the evidence of the complainant. 80

Submissions and consultations

27.70 Stakeholders who addressed the issue agreed generally with the proposals and answered the question about legislative restrictions on the admission of evidence of ‘general disposition’ in the affirmative. 81

77 Consultation Paper, Proposal 18–3.
79 Ibid, Question 18–4.
27.71 The Public Defenders Office NSW, for example, supported the introduction of a structured discretionary model for the admission of sexual experience evidence.\(^82\) It considered that the proposal that ‘the court shall not grant leave unless … the evidence has significant probative value to a fact in issue’ adequately deals with the focus of relevance, but that the phrase ‘to a fact in issue’ should be dropped from the proposal because it may cause technical problems. The Public Defenders Office NSW also considered that the primary restriction on the admission of sexual experience evidence\(^83\) should be redrafted to apply also to evidence that may raise an inference about the complainant’s ‘general disposition’ or the complainant’s credibility as a witness.

27.72 The Law Council of Australia (Law Council) opposed ‘any rigid exclusionary rule that prohibits reasoning in respect of sexual history evidence’ on the basis that, in some circumstances, such evidence is ‘highly probative and it would be unjust for the defence to be prevented from putting such evidence before the tribunal of fact’. The Law Council considered that restricting cross-examination about sexual activities to situations where the evidence’s probative value substantially outweighs the danger of unfair prejudice provides the appropriate test and ‘if that test is satisfied, it is impossible to see any justification for, nonetheless, excluding the evidence’.\(^84\)

27.73 National Legal Aid observed that ongoing education and professional development of the judiciary and legal practitioners would help to ensure that legislation effectively curtails the distress, humiliation and embarrassment of the complainant due to the admission of irrelevant sexual experience evidence.\(^85\)

27.74 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria commented on the similarities between the proposals and recently enacted Victorian legislation, and noted that the effects of the Victorian reforms are still to be fully assessed.\(^86\)

Commissions’ views

27.75 The Commissions have sought to identify the best formulation of the court’s discretion to admit evidence of the complainant’s sexual experience. Such a formulation should attempt to adequately safeguard complainants against irrelevant and harassing cross-examination, but also uphold the defendant’s right to a fair trial.

27.76 The Consultation Paper proposal on restricting the circumstances in which evidence of a complainant’s sexual experience may be adduced\(^87\) was based upon s 349 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic). The Commissions’ proposals are also

\(^82\) Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
\(^83\) That is, as set out in Consultation Paper, Proposal 18–3.
\(^85\) National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\(^86\) Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\(^87\) Consultation Paper, Proposal 18–3.
substantially consistent with relevant recommendations of the VLRC’s report, Sexual Offences,88 and the NSWLRC’s report, Reform of Section 409B.89

27.77 In the Commissions’ view, all jurisdictions should enact legislative provisions substantially similar to s 349 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic), and this is reflected in the recommendations set out below—with some changes.

27.78 First, the recommendation, if implemented, would require the evidence to have ‘significant probative value’, rather than ‘substantial relevance to a fact in issue’. The latter formulation appears in the legislation of a number of jurisdictions.90 The term ‘significant probative value’ is more consistent with the overall approach of the uniform Evidence Acts, under which relevance is a threshold test of admissibility91 and there is no concept of ‘substantial’ relevance. The use of ‘significant probative value’ as a test is also consistent with the formulation of other admissibility rules, including those applying to tendency and coincidence evidence,92 and was recommended by the NSWLRC.93

27.79 Secondly, the list of factors that the court must consider to balance the considerations of fairness to the defendant with the need to protect the complainant from distress, humiliation and embarrassment resulting from an invasion of her sexual privacy, should be non-exhaustive. In the Commissions’ view, the listed matters address the main concerns about admitting sexual experience evidence. Others may arise in the particular circumstances of a case, however, and a judicial officer should not be precluded from taking such a relevant matter into account.94

27.80 Finally, the words ‘in the jury’ have been deleted from the reference to evidence that might ‘arouse in the jury discriminatory belief or bias, prejudice, sympathy or 90  Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YC(2)(a); Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 349; Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BC; Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 53; Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 4(1).

91  That is, under uniform Evidence Acts ss 55–56.
92  See, eg, uniform Evidence Acts ss 97–98. In the context of those provisions, ‘significant probative value’ has been interpreted to require that evidence be ‘important’ or ‘of consequence’ to the issues. It has been held to mean something more than mere relevance but something less than a ‘substantial’ degree of relevance. For further discussion see: Australian Law Reform Commission, Evidence, (Interim) Report 26, vol 1, [806]; New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Review of Section 409B of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW), Report 87 (1998), [6.117]; S Odgers, Uniform Evidence Law (8th ed, 2009), [1.3.6680].
94  The VLRC considered that a non-exhaustive list ‘would leave open the possibility that sexual activity evidence could be introduced inappropriately’: Victorian Law Reform Commission, Sexual Offences: Interim Report (2003), [5.38]. In assessing the ‘interests of justice’ of a particular case, judicial officers should be informed not only by the circumstances of the case, but also by the guiding principles and objects clauses of the legislation: see Ch 25.
hostility’. This is consistent with similar provisions in the uniform Evidence Acts, which do not make any distinction between jury and non-jury trials.95

27.81 The recommendation differs from the Consultation Paper proposal in that it follows more closely the Victorian (and South Australian) legislation by requiring the admission of sexual experience evidence to be in ‘the interests of justice’ (having regard to the listed factors). The phrase ‘interests of justice’ is used in a number of evidentiary and procedural provisions, including in the uniform Evidence Acts.96

27.82 The Commissions also recommend that evidence as to the sexual activities of the complainant, other than that to which the charge relates, should not be admissible to show, for example, that the complainant is more likely to have consented to the sexual activity to which the charge relates, because of any inference it may raise about ‘general disposition’. A provision of this nature has been enacted in all Australian jurisdictions except NSW and Tasmania.97 Evidence of prior sexual activity is not normally relevant to the issue of consent, and tendency (or propensity) reasoning in this regard suffers from dangers of reliance on resilient myths and misconceptions about sexual assault complainants.

27.83 In the Commissions’ view, there is no need to make special provision concerning the admissibility of sexual experience evidence for credibility purposes.98 Section 103 of the uniform Evidence Acts already provides that evidence may not be adduced in cross-examination of a witness unless ‘the evidence could substantially affect the assessment of the credibility of a witness’.99 Sexual experience evidence is unlikely to meet this standard.100

Recommendation 27–3 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that the court must not grant leave under the test proposed in Rec 27–2, unless it is satisfied that the evidence has significant probative value and that it is in the interests of justice to allow the cross-examination or to admit the evidence, after taking into account:

96 See, eg, Commonwealth Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) s 128(4) (‘Privilege in respect of self-incrimination in other proceedings’); Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW), s 306Y (‘Evidence not to be given in the form of recording if contrary to the interests of justice’); Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 29(3) (‘When more than one offence may be heard at the same time’).
97 The Commissions note that the circumstances in which sexual experience evidence may be admitted pursuant to s 293(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) are so narrowly cast that evidence which only raises an inference as to the complainant’s general disposition in sexual matters is likely to be excluded in practice: Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 293(4).
98 As in Victoria under Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 352.
99 Uniform Evidence Acts, s 103(1).
100 S Odgers, Uniform Evidence Law (8th ed, 2009), [1.3.7760]. This constraint does not apply in common law evidence jurisdictions where, as a general rule, questions designed to attack the witness’ credit are permissible in cross-examination of another party’s witness: See Thomson Reuters, The Laws of Australia, vol 16 Evidence, 16.4.
(a) the distress, humiliation and embarrassment that the complainant may experience as a result of the cross-examination or the admission of the evidence, in view of the age of the complainant and the number and nature of the questions that the complainant is likely to be asked;

(b) the risk that the evidence may arouse discriminatory belief or bias, prejudice, sympathy or hostility;

(c) the need to respect the complainant’s personal privacy;

(d) the right of the defendant to fully answer and defend the charge; and

(e) any other relevant matter.

Recommendation 27–4 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that evidence about the sexual activities—whether consensual or non-consensual—of the complainant, other than those to which the charge relates, is not of significant probative value only because of any inference it may raise as to the general disposition of the complainant.

Procedural issues

27.84 In all jurisdictions, a determination about the admissibility of evidence of the complainant’s sexual reputation or sexual experience is decided by the court in the absence of the jury. In Victoria, Queensland, the ACT and the Northern Territory, an application for leave may be heard in the absence of the complainant at the defendant’s request. This approach allows for the full examination of the nature and purpose of the proposed evidence by counsel for both sides without causing embarrassment to the complainant and may afford a practical opportunity to limit and frame questions.

27.85 In the Commonwealth, Victorian and ACT jurisdictions, an application for leave is to be made in writing. The Victorian provisions require service of the application on the Office of Public Prosecutions (OPP) or the informant at least seven days before summary hearings, committal hearings and sentencing hearings, and 14 days before trials and special hearings. The written application for leave must set out the initial questions sought to be asked, the scope of the questioning and how the evidence sought

---

101 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YD(1)(b); Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 293(7); Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 344; Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4(6); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BC(1); Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34L(4); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(1)(b); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 52(b); Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 4(4).

102 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 344; Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4(6); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 52(c); Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 4(4).

104 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YD(1)(b); Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 344; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 52.

105 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 344.
to be elicited has substantial relevance to the facts in issue or why it is a proper matter for cross-examination as to credit. These procedural controls were imposed after studies showed that the legislation had a limited effect on the admission of prior sexual history evidence.

27.86 The Victorian OPP pursued a policy of writing to the defence in sexual offence matters and informing them of the procedural requirements imposed under then s 37A of the Evidence Act 1958 (Vic). As at December 2003, that practice increased the number of written applications for leave, but written applications were still only being made in approximately half of cases where they were required. The VLRC recommended the OPP continue that practice.

27.87 There is variation across the jurisdictions as to whether the court is required to record in writing the reasons for granting leave.

Consultation Paper

27.88 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions made a number of proposals relating to the procedure by which an application for leave to admit sexual experience evidence should be made, determined and implemented.

27.89 The Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should require any application for leave to admit sexual history evidence to be:

(a) made in writing; and

(b) filed with the relevant court and served on the informant or the Director of Public Prosecutions within a prescribed minimum number of days, and prescribe:

(a) the required contents of such an application;

(b) the circumstances in which leave may be granted out of time;

(c) the circumstances in which the requirement that an application for leave be made in writing may be waived; and

(d) that the application is to be determined in the absence of the jury, and if the accused requests, in the absence of the complainant.

27.90 The Commissions also proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should require a court to give reasons for its decision whether or not to grant leave, and if leave is granted, to state the nature of the admissible evidence.

---

106 Ibid s 345.
108 Replaced by Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 348.
109 Ibid, Rec 74.
110 Ibid, Rec 74.
111 A court may be required to record in writing the reasons for granting leave, eg: Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YD(2); Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 293(8); Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 351; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 52; or give reasons only, eg: Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 194M(5); or may be free of any legislative requirement.
112 Consultation Paper, Proposal 18–6.
27.91 Finally, the Commissions proposed that Commonwealth, state and territory Directors of Public Prosecutions (DPPs) should introduce and implement a policy of writing to the defence in sexual assault matters and informing them of the procedural application requirements imposed under the relevant legislation relating to admitting sexual experience evidence.

Submissions and consultations

27.92 Some stakeholders, including victims of family violence, supported the Consultation Paper proposals.

27.93 The Public Defenders Office NSW opposed any requirement that written notice be filed in advance and considered that a requirement for the full articulation of reasons for allowing questioning, and for the scope of the questioning to be recorded in writing, would be adequate. Other stakeholders noted that it is common for both prosecutors and defence counsel to be briefed on short notice in sexual assault proceedings. Accordingly, there needs to be a degree of flexibility in the process, including to allow applications to be made on short notice.

27.94 The Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions (CDPP) opposed the proposal that DPPs should inform the defence of the procedural application requirements, on the basis that this would require the CDPP to provide legal advice to the defence. The CDPP considered that the intent of the proposal could be met instead by professional bodies, such as the law societies, creating fact sheets for lawyers on the procedural requirements for admitting and adducing sexual experience evidence in a given jurisdiction.

27.95 National Legal Aid and the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria submitted that it is common for impermissible questions eliciting sexual experience evidence to be asked, without reference to the legislation or legislative procedures. National Legal Aid supported monitoring the provisions in practice. The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria observed that active case management of matters in a specialised sexual assault list improves the ability of the Court to control impermissible questioning and helps ensure that matters are addressed in advance of the hearing.

---

116 Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
117 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Barrister, Consultation, Sydney, 10 June 2010.
118 Other stakeholders opposed this aspect of the proposal on similar grounds: National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.
119 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
120 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Commissions’ views

27.96 Formalising the procedure by which leave to admit evidence of the complainant’s sexual experience is sought and granted will encourage judicial officers and legal practitioners to turn their minds to the admissibility issues before they arise in the course of proceedings and to help ensure compliance.

27.97 Legislation should require that an application for leave be made in writing and determined in the absence of the jury and, if the defendant so requests, in the absence of the complainant. The court should be required to give reasons for its decision whether or not to grant leave, and, if leave is granted, to state the nature of the admissible evidence.\(^{121}\) The requirement that the court ‘state the nature of the admissible evidence’ is necessary to prevent questioning of the complainant beyond the scope of the evidence which has been ruled admissible.\(^ {122}\)

27.98 These legislative measures should be supported by judicial and practitioner education and training about the procedural requirements for adducing sexual history evidence through cross-examination of the complainant.

Recommendation 27–5 Federal, state and territory legislation should require that an application for leave to cross-examine complainants of sexual assault, or to admit any evidence, about the sexual activities of the complainant must be made:

(a) in writing;

(b) if the proceeding is before a jury—in absence of the jury; and

(c) in the absence of a complainant, if a defendant in the proceeding requests.

Recommendation 27–6 Federal, state and territory legislation should require a court to give reasons for its decision whether or not to grant leave to cross-examine complainants of sexual assault, or to admit any evidence, about the sexual activities of the complainant and, if leave is granted, to state the nature of the admissible evidence.

Recommendation 27–7 Australian courts, and judicial education and legal professional bodies should provide education and training about the procedural requirements for admitting and adducing evidence of sexual activity.

---

122 Ibid.
Sexual assault communications privilege

27.99 Sexual assault communications are communications made in the course of a confidential relationship between the victim of a sexual assault and a counsellor. The defence may seek access to this material to assist with their preparation for trial and for use during cross-examination of the complainant and other witnesses.

27.100 From the mid-1990s, ongoing reform of sexual assault laws and procedure has included the enactment of legislation to limit the disclosure and use of these communications. Every state and territory—except Queensland—now has specific legislation protecting counselling communications.

27.101 The sexual assault communications privilege has been considered by a number of law reform bodies, including MCCOC, the VLRC, and by the ALRC, VLRC and NSWLRC in ALRC Report 102. These reports have generally taken the view that the privilege serves the important public interest of encouraging people who have been sexually assaulted to seek therapy, and may also encourage people who are sexually assaulted to report the crime to the police.

Current law

27.102 Models of a sexual assault communications privilege differ markedly. Provisions may be formulated either as a privilege or as an immunity. A ‘privilege’ is a right to resist disclosing information that would otherwise be required to be disclosed. An immunity prevents the disclosure of certain information in court proceedings, generally when the public interest in non-disclosure outweighs the public interest in disclosure.

27.103 For example, the NSW provisions operate as a privilege—a person can object to producing a protected confidence on the ground that it is privileged, but the primary protected confider (the victim of a sexual assault) can consent to disclosure. The South Australian provisions are formulated as an immunity, stating that sexual assault communications are ‘protected from disclosure in legal proceedings by public interest immunity’. The immunity cannot be waived by participants in the protected communication.

---

131 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 298(1).

27.104 For simplicity, the discussion below uses the term ‘privilege’ to refer to both models for protecting sexual assault communications from disclosure in court proceedings.

27.105 Other points of divergence are whether the privilege is qualified or absolute; and whether the privilege applies in preliminary criminal proceedings, such as committal proceedings.

27.106 The privilege for communications to sexual assault counsellors under s 127B of the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) provides absolute protection for the communications unless the complainant consents to their production.

27.107 In New South Wales, South Australia, the ACT and the Northern Territory, there is an absolute prohibition against requiring the production of counselling communications in preliminary criminal proceedings and against the use of counselling communication in such proceedings. Otherwise, the privilege that applies in all jurisdictions, except Tasmania, is qualified, both in relation to the production of documents and the use of notes in evidence.

27.108 One of the main issues relating to the scope of the privilege is that, in many jurisdictions, the current restrictions on admission of sexual assault counselling communications do not prevent a defence lawyer from issuing a subpoena requiring a person to produce counselling notes. As a result, subpoenas are frequently used to ‘require counsellors to attend and give evidence or produce notes’ and ‘[p]rivate counsellors who are unaware that the law protects confidential counselling communications may produce records, rather than appearing in court to resist a subpoena’.

27.109 Other factors that affect the scope of the privilege, and which are defined or dealt with inconsistently across the jurisdictions, include:

- the scope of the communications protected;

---

132 Ibid s 300.
133 Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 67F(1).
134 Ibid s 67F(3).
135 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 297.
136 Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 67F.
137 Evidence Act 1991 (ACT) s 57.
138 Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 56B.
139 See also, Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 (Vic) s 32C; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 19C.
141 Ibid.
142 See eg, Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 19A, cf Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 67D.
• whether preliminary examination by a judicial officer—to determine questions of leave to produce or adduce protected confidences—is a mandatory or discretionary requirement;\(^{143}\)

• the thresholds at which the court must be satisfied before ordering production;\(^{144}\)

• the factors the court must take into account for the purposes of the public interest balancing test;\(^{145}\) and

• the express exemptions to the privilege.\(^{146}\)

Further reform of sexual assault communications privilege

27.110 The harmonisation of sexual assault communications privileges has been considered by SCAG through the National Working Group on Evidence. The Working Group agreed that it is not appropriate to provide for a single model sexual assault counselling protection in Australia because of the ‘satisfactory operation of a variety of protections for sexual assault counselling communications and the variation between jurisdictions in criminal practice and procedure’.\(^{147}\)

27.111 Instead, the SCAG Ministers agreed on seven principles (the SCAG principles) to be applied as the minimum standard for protection of sexual assault counselling communications in Australia, if jurisdictions legislate to restrict the disclosure of sexual assault counselling communications in criminal trials.\(^{148}\)

27.112 In undertaking this Inquiry, the Terms of Reference instruct the ALRC to be ‘careful not to duplicate … the work being undertaken through SCAG on the harmonisation of uniform evidence laws, in particular the development of model sexual assault communications immunity provisions’. For this reason, the focus of the Commissions’ consideration of the sexual assault communications privilege has been on how they operate in practice rather than on the harmonisation of provisions.

27.113 The SCAG principles acknowledge the importance of practical measures that facilitate the implementation of the privilege and its protection. For example, one of the seven principles provides that ‘jurisdictions should consider adapting court processes, with the aim of limiting inadvertent disclosure of sexual assault counselling communications’.\(^{149}\)

---

\(^{144}\) See, eg, Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 298(3),(4), cf Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 19E.

\(^{146}\) See, eg, Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 (Vic) s 32E cf Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 56F.

\(^{149}\) Ibid.
Assisting complainants to invoke the privilege

27.114 As observed during this Inquiry, in practice, the sexual assault communications privilege may not achieve its intended policy objective of protecting the public interest in maintaining the confidentiality of the counselling relationship and its therapeutic benefits.

27.115 In 2009, Women’s Legal Services NSW coordinated a project providing pro bono representation to sexual assault victims seeking to maintain privilege over their counselling and medical records. The Sexual Assault Communications Pro Bono Referral Pilot Project in the Downing Centre (SACP Pilot)—a New South Wales Local Court—involved the NSW Bar Association, the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW (NSW ODPP) and three private commercial law firms. The project aimed to provide a ‘stop-gap’ measure for legal service provision, investigate the operation of the privilege, and identify areas in need of legislative and procedural reform.

27.116 Women’s Legal Services NSW has identified the following continuing problems for victims of sexual assault and counsellors pursuant to existing sexual assault communications privilege provisions:

- some counselling services do not inform sexual assault victims that their counselling notes have been subpoenaed;
- some counselling services produce material to the court without raising an objection or claiming the privilege;
- some counselling services give sexual assault victims inaccurate advice about the privilege;
- sexual assault victims may not receive written notice of the subpoenaed documents;
- sexual assault victims have difficulty obtaining legal assistance to uphold their privilege;
- sexual assault victims who seek to uphold their privilege often require legal representation at short notice, and the legal representation retained may only gain limited access to relevant materials;
- judicial officers permit reliance on improperly obtained confidences to support arguments about admissibility;
- the party seeking access to protected confidences may re-ventilate arguments about admissibility before trial judges—after a judicial officer presiding at an interlocutory hearing has made a ruling—and trial judges may overrule the decision;

150  Women’s Legal Services NSW, Consultation, Sydney, 20 January 2010.
151  Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010. At the time of writing, an evaluation report for the SACP Pilot was being prepared by Women’s Legal Services NSW.
• sexual assault victims have reported feelings of violation due to the legal processes associated with seeking disclosure of their counselling records and seeking to uphold their privilege.

27.117 Many of these problems appear to arise because, while the privilege is legally that of the participants in the counselling process, the privileged documents sought to be produced and admitted belong to counselling services or individual counsellors responsible for their creation whose attitude to disclosure may differ from that of the victim because of the different professional and privacy interests at stake.

27.118 A qualified sexual assault communications privilege serves the broader public interest of ensuring the legal system is fair both to the accused and the complainant. However, sexual assault victims, who are unrepresented in criminal proceedings, may not be in a position to claim or seek to enforce the privilege.

27.119 This difficulty has generated debate about whether victim advocates should be employed in the criminal justice process to make submissions as to rulings on the sexual assault communications privilege. It is beyond the scope of the current Inquiry to consider that debate, which would require detailed consideration of difficulties inherent in reconciling the role of a separate legal representative with the current constraints of the adversarial system.

27.120 Complainants, whether represented or unrepresented, may be assisted to invoke the sexual assault communications privilege by implementing some or all of the following measures:
• requiring the party seeking production to provide notice in writing to each other party and if the sexual assault complainant is not a party—the sexual assault complainant;
• requiring that any such written notice issued be accompanied by a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege and providing contact details for assistance;

---

152 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Consultation, Sydney, 20 January 2010.
153 For example, as the ‘protected confider’ who made the ‘counselling communication’: Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) ss 295, 296. This may include the sexual assault victim, the person who provides the counselling service, and those present to facilitate the counselling process, such as a non-offending parent.
155 See, eg, Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 179–180.
156 The NSW Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce observed that while ‘there may be some merit to utilising independent legal representation in matters arising under the sexual assault communications privilege, as this is a privilege that belongs to the complainant, the proposal, as it currently stands, appears to create more problems than it may solve’: Ibid, 180.
157 These proposed practices reflect the views of Women’s Legal Services NSW as contained in: Women’s Legal Services NSW, The NSW Sexual Assault Communications Privilege: Current Procedure and Issues for Reform: Submission to the NSW Attorney-General’s Department (2008).
• educating defence counsel about their obligation to identify records potentially giving rise to the privilege to encourage compliance with any such written notice provisions;

• providing counsellors with education about the sexual assault communications privilege and next steps if they are served with a subpoena;158

• requiring that subpoenas be issued with a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege, providing contact details for legal assistance;

• improving access to free legal assistance about the sexual assault communications privilege;

• requiring that the court issuing a subpoena provide a copy of all subpoenas to the prosecution;

• educating prosecutors: to identify possible claims of the sexual assault communications privilege arising out of subpoenas; to inform the court of any such possible claims of the sexual assault communications privilege during pre-trial processes; where subpoenas are served at short notice during a trial, to query short service applications; to inform the court where documents containing protected confidences are improperly adduced, admitted or used in the course of proceedings;

• educating defence counsel generally about the sexual assault communications privilege with a view to limiting the use of improperly obtained protected confidences; and

• educating judicial officers about the impact of sexual assault on complainants, the role of counselling in alleviating victims’ trauma and the desirability of encouraging people who have been sexually assaulted to seek therapy.

Submissions and consultations

27.121 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked what procedures and services would best assist sexual assault complainants to invoke the sexual assault communications privilege, assuming they continue to be unrepresented in sexual assault proceedings.159

27.122 Some stakeholders expressed support for the adoption of the measures raised in the Consultation Paper to assist sexual assault complainants to invoke the sexual assault communications privilege.160

27.123 The NSW ODPP submitted that the counselling communications privilege has not had adequate attention paid to it by participants in the criminal justice system in

---

159 Consultation Paper, Question 18–5.
NSW—including the courts, legal practitioners, counsellors, medical practitioners and organisations holding personal records. The NSW ODPP noted that the absolute prohibition on the production of a document recording a protected confidence in committal proceedings is not respected in practice. Rather, subpoenas are regularly issued and documents produced, often without the knowledge of the prosecution.

27.124 The NSW ODPP stated that complainants involved in the SACP Pilot gave ‘very positive’ feedback about the assistance they had received. The ODPP considers that the SACP Pilot has increased awareness of the privilege and the complainant’s rights and that legal assistance should be available to complainants either through a community victim’s advocacy service or the relevant legal aid commission. The NSW ODPP identified a number of problems with the sexual assault communications privilege, some of which were also identified by other stakeholders.

27.125 First, the prosecutor’s role in regard to privileged material was observed to be problematic because of the potential for conflict with the prosecutor’s obligations of disclosure. The NSW ODPP considered that it is inappropriate for the prosecutor to vet material, advise the complainant and argue the privilege, although the prosecutor should be present for any argument to assist the court.

27.126 Secondly, the subpoena of counselling records puts complainants at risk of having their place of residence, contact information and other personal details disclosed to the court and others without appropriate vetting.

27.127 Thirdly, the NSW ODPP observed that victims of family violence are particularly susceptible to the subpoena of counselling records because the offender’s knowledge of the victim enables them to identify potential sources of personal information. This can result in the issuing of multiple subpoenas, which can be perceived as an attempt to intimidate the victim.

27.128 Fourthly, late notice of the return date of a subpoena was a consistent problem encountered by the SACP Pilot and presented particular problems when this date was close to the scheduled trial date. In some instances, the complainant must choose between proceeding with the trial or claiming the privilege.

27.129 The NSW ODPP suggested that:

- stringent procedures need to be adopted and adhered to by the Court in regard to subpoenas;

---

162 The DPP NSW noted that one District Court Judge, on hearing an argument for privilege, observed: ‘again nobody paid any attention to the legislation and access was granted to those records [of a psychiatrist treating a complainant as a result of an assault] which is precisely the situation that the legislation is designed to avoid’: Ibid.
163 Women’s Legal Service Queensland similarly noted that the involvement of prosecutors in a claim for the privilege is limited: Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
164 This concern was also expressed by a victim of family violence who related their experience with the subpoenaing of counselling records during court proceedings: Confidential, Submission FV 14, 5 November 2009.
where counselling notes are subpoenaed, there should be mandatory notification of the ‘other party’, so that, for instance, the prosecution has the opportunity to ask that access is not granted until such time as the complainant has been notified; and

• consideration should be given to introducing provisions to ensure that subpoenas are issued in a timely way.\textsuperscript{166}

27.130 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria observed that the application of the privilege to civil proceedings, which may be related to criminal proceedings, has prevented ‘backdoor’ impermissible access to confidential communications. In the Courts’ experience, difficulties with the operation of the privilege in practice arise more commonly where access is sought from individual health professionals, as opposed to sexual assault-specific service providers. Centres Against Sexual Assault (CASA) are often represented and the complainant’s views are put before the court either by the prosecution or by the CASA.

27.131 The Courts observed that particular difficulties arise where access is sought to departmental records, particularly where child protection issues arise in relation to the complainant. The Courts suggested that it may be appropriate to require human services departments to categorise their material and be legally represented in relation to any subpoenas to which the department is required to respond.

27.132 The Courts expressed support for an approach that ensures that all stakeholders’ legitimate interests are put before the court and that minimises the potential for the subpoena of counselling records to operate as a ‘fishing exercise’.\textsuperscript{167}

27.133 Other stakeholders also expressed views about how to improve the operation of the privilege in practice for sexual assault complainants. For example, the Women’s Legal Service Queensland supported the development of processes to better enable unrepresented people to assert the privilege.\textsuperscript{168} The National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence (NASASV) suggested that measures should target third parties who hold confidential records to ensure that they are informed about the communications privilege.\textsuperscript{169} The Canberra Rape Crisis Centre supported absolute protection of communications unless the complainant consents to their production.\textsuperscript{170}

\textit{Commissions’ views}

27.134 The SCAG National Working Group on Evidence found that the varying models for protecting the confidentiality of sexual assault counselling communications are operating satisfactorily.\textsuperscript{171} The Commissions are, however, unconvinced by this conclusion.

\textsuperscript{166} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{167} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{168} Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{169} National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{170} Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{171} Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010.
27.135 While the SCAG principles may assist in harmonising legislative provisions, the Commissions consider that the principles do not deal adequately with the fundamental cause of difficulties with the operation of the privilege in practice identified by stakeholders in this Inquiry. That is, while the privilege is legally that of the participants in the counselling process, the documents subject to the privilege belong to counselling services or individual counsellors responsible for their creation, and it is to these parties that subpoenas will be directed. Counsellors may have professional and therapeutic reasons to oppose disclosure, but these interests may differ from the privacy and other interests of the complainant. Moreover, counsellors are not always aware of their rights and responsibilities in relation to subpoenas issued for the production of counselling communications concerning complainants.

27.136 In the Commissions’ view, more needs to be done to ensure that existing legislative provisions operate effectively to protect counselling communications. In particular, steps should be taken to ensure that complainants are notified, in a timely manner, about the subpoena of counselling communications and given information about their legal rights and options for accessing legal advice. In this context, SCAG Principle 4 states that jurisdictions ‘should consider adapting court processes, with the aim of limiting inadvertent disclosure of sexual assault counselling communications’.173

27.137 The Commissions recommend that federal, state and territory legislation relating to subpoenas and the operation of the sexual assault communications privilege should ensure that the interests of complainants in sexual assault proceedings are better protected, including by requiring:

- parties seeking production of sexual assault communications, to provide timely notice in writing to the other party and the sexual assault complainant;
- that any such written notice be accompanied by a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege and providing contact details for legal assistance;
- that subpoenas be issued with a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege, also providing contact details for legal assistance.

27.138 Education and training to improve awareness about the existence of the privilege and how it may be asserted would also assist in this regard. Bodies such as the Law Council and NASASV (the peak body for organisations who work with victims of sexual violence) may be appropriate bodies to pursue such an initiative. Judicial officers may also benefit from greater awareness of the privilege and how it may be asserted.

27.139 The release of the evaluation of the SACP Pilot may provide an opportunity for consideration by governments and law reform bodies of other measures that might be taken to improve the operation of the sexual assault communications privilege.

172 The sexual assault victim who is counselled, the person who provides the counselling service and those present to facilitate the counselling process, such as a parent.
173 Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Communiqué, 7 May 2010, 10.
Recommendation 27–8  Federal, state and territory legislation and court rules relating to subpoenas and the operation of the sexual assault communications privilege should ensure that the interests of complainants in sexual assault proceedings are better protected, including by requiring:

(a) parties seeking production of sexual assault communications, to provide timely notice in writing to the other party and the sexual assault complainant;

(b) that any such written notice be accompanied by a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege and providing contact details for legal assistance; and

(c) that subpoenas be issued with a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege, also providing contact details for legal assistance.

Recommendation 27–9  The Australian, state and territory governments, in association with relevant non-government organisations, should work together to develop and administer training and education programs for judicial officers, legal practitioners and counsellors about the sexual assault communications privilege and how to respond to a subpoena for confidential counselling communications.

Expert opinion evidence and children

27.140  There is a considerable body of research that shows that jurors and jury-eligible citizens hold a number of misconceptions about children’s ability to give truthful evidence and how children react to sexual abuse. It is said that the most common misconceptions, which apply equally in contexts of family violence, include that:

- children are easily manipulated into giving false reports of sexual abuse;
- child sexual abuse will result in physical damage and evidence;
- a typical victim would resist, cry out for help or escape the offender;
- delay in complaint is uncommon and such a delay is evidence of lying; and
- inconsistencies in a child’s report is evidence of lying.

174  An extensive summary of the literature on jurors’ and laypersons’ misconceptions can be found in A Cossins, ‘Children, Sexual Abuse and Suggestibility: What Laypeople Think They Know and What the Literature Tells Us’ (2008) 15 Psychiatry, Psychology and Law 153.

The key question posed by the literature on jurors’ and laypeople’s misconceptions about child sexual abuse is whether expert witnesses are needed in child sexual assault trials “to educate jurors about children’s memory, suggestibility, and reactions to abuse.”

Compared to the United States, Australian jurisdictions have had limited experience with admitting expert witness evidence about children. The general approach under the common law opinion rule “has been to exclude such evidence on the grounds that the behaviour of child sexual abuse victims is within the common knowledge or ordinary experience of the jury.”

However, many professionals recognise that some of the responses of children to sexual abuse are counterintuitive from a layperson’s perspective, such as delay in complaint, secrecy, protecting the offender and maintaining an emotional bond with the offender. Rather than the jury relying on its commonsense or collective experience, it is arguable that expert testimony about the behaviour of sexually abused children is necessary “to restore a complainant’s credibility from a debit balance because of jury misapprehension, back to a zero or neutral balance”, especially where the behaviour in question appears to a jury to be inconsistent with sexual abuse.

Reform of the opinion rule

There has been a consistent view that legislative reform is needed to allow the admissibility of expert opinion evidence on the behavioural patterns of sexually abused children and children generally. The first jurisdiction in Australia to legislate to overcome the limitations of the common law opinion rule was Tasmania. In 2001, a specific provision dealing with the admission of expert witness evidence in child sexual assault trials was included when Tasmania enacted the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas). The Tasmanian Act does not include a provision that permits the admissibility of such evidence as an exception to the credibility rule, as is the case under the

---

181 Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s79A. The Tasmanian Act does not include a provision that permits the admissibility of such evidence as an exception to the credibility rule, as is the case under the
In ALRC Report 102, the ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC noted wide support for amending the common law opinion rule to allow the admission of expert opinion evidence about children. The report highlighted the main problem with admitting expert opinion evidence about the development and behaviour of children—that is, if tendered for a credibility purpose, the credibility rule as well as exceptions to the credibility rule, are obstacles to admission. For this reason, the ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC made recommendations to amend s 79 of the uniform Evidence Acts to facilitate the admission of such evidence and to introduce a new exception to the credibility rule.

These amendments were subsequently adopted by the Commonwealth, NSW and Victoria. Section 79(2) of the uniform Evidence Acts confirms that for the purposes of the expert opinion exception to the opinion rule, ‘specialised knowledge’ includes ‘specialised knowledge of child development and child behaviour (including specialised knowledge of the impact of sexual abuse on children and their development and behaviour during and following the abuse)’. Section 108C of the uniform Evidence Acts provides that the credibility rule does not apply to evidence given by a person concerning the credibility of another witness if the person has specialised knowledge based on the person’s training, study or experience (including specialised knowledge of child development and child behaviour) and the evidence ‘could substantially affect the assessment of the credibility of a witness’.

In 2008, Western Australia enacted provisions dealing with the opinion evidence of experts on child behaviour in child sexual offence proceedings in the Evidence Act 1906 (WA). This states that evidence by such an expert about ‘child development and behaviour generally’, or ‘child development and behaviour in cases where children have been the victims of sexual offences’, that is relevant is admissible notwithstanding certain other rules of evidence.

Dr Anne Cossins has suggested, however, that the amendments to the uniform Evidence Acts ‘are a gateway only, rather than a complete answer to the problem of correcting juror misconceptions’. First, the gateway represented by s 108C is narrow, because the expert opinion evidence has to ‘substantially’ affect the assessment of the credibility of the complainant in a child sexual assault trial. This may represent a relatively high bar and impose ‘a significant limitation on the admissibility

Ibid, [9.147].

Ibid, Recs 9–1, 12–7.

Evidence Amendment Act 2008 (Cth); Evidence Amendment Act 2007 (NSW); Evidence Act 2008 (Vic).

At the time of writing, Tasmania had not adopted these amendments.

Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) s 79(2); Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 79(2); Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 79(2).

Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BE.

of expert evidence admitted solely for its credibility purpose’. 189 Secondly, expert opinion evidence can only be admitted with the leave of the court, which means that the court will need to refer to the matters listed in s 192 of the uniform Evidence Acts before giving leave—and consider any defence counsel objections about unfairness to the accused and lengthening of the trial. 190

27.149 In addition, while expert opinion evidence on children’s credibility may be desirable, those seeking to adduce such evidence face practical difficulties with the cost and availability of experts. Crown prosecutors have noted that it may not be possible to call expert witnesses to give evidence, because such witnesses are not available or because there is no such expert in a particular jurisdiction. For some prosecutors, it may be too costly to fly an expert from interstate. Even if expert opinion evidence is admitted, some experts may take a ‘hired gun approach’ to the literature and selectively choose research or misinterpret research to illustrate a particular point. 191

27.150 While the uniform Evidence Acts reforms were an attempt to address one of the barriers to prosecuting child sex offences, the provisions may be insufficient to address the problem of jurors’ misconceptions in child sexual assault trials.

Reform options

27.151 A number of options for further reform of the operation of the opinion rule with respect to expert evidence in child sexual assault trials have been canvassed. Barriers to the admission of such evidence could be lowered, for example, by:

- removing the word, ‘substantially’, from s108C(1)(b)(ii) of the uniform Evidence Acts; or
- making some categories of expert opinion evidence admissible without leave of the courts, as currently required.

27.152 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee 192 has suggested that, because the prosecution may be unable to lead evidence from an expert witness about children’s responses to sexual abuse and their reliability as witnesses, or a trial judge may refuse to give leave for such evidence to be admitted, a mandatory judicial direction, containing the same information that would be given by an expert witness, should be introduced into all Australian jurisdictions. This would counteract juror misconceptions and serve as an alternative to calling expert witnesses. 193

27.153 On one view, it is clearly to the defendant’s advantage for expert evidence not to be admitted in a child sexual assault trial, because this allows the defence to

---

190 Ibid, 166.
192 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee was formed in 2000 and comprises Directors of Public Prosecutions, judges, Children’s Commissioners, academics, legal aid representatives, senior police officers, crime commissioners and others.
exploit all the misconceptions associated with delay in complaint, behavioural disturbances and counterintuitive behaviour.\footnote{194} As it is likely that defence counsel will seek to have expert opinion evidence about the behaviour of sexually abused children declared inadmissible or excluded on the grounds that it is prejudicial or within the common knowledge of the jury, it may be more appropriate for a mandatory judicial direction to be given by the judge at the end of the trial.\footnote{195}

27.154 New Zealand provides an example of the type of instructions judges are required to give when a witness is a child under the age of six years of age, under reg 49 of the \textit{Evidence Regulations 2007} (NZ):

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textbf{(a)} even very young children can accurately remember and report things that have happened to them in the past, but because of developmental differences, children may not report their memories in the same manner or to the same extent as an adult would:
  \item \textbf{(b)} this does not mean that a child witness is any more or less reliable than an adult witness:
  \item \textbf{(c)} one difference is that very young children typically say very little without some help to focus on the events in question:
  \item \textbf{(d)} another difference is that, depending on how they are questioned, very young children can be more open to suggestion than other children or adults:
  \item \textbf{(e)} the reliability of the evidence of very young children depends on the way they are questioned, and it is important, when deciding how much weight to give to their evidence, to distinguish between open questions aimed at obtaining answers from children in their own words from leading questions that may put words into their mouths.
\end{itemize}

27.155 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee has recommended three similar draft mandatory directions that summarise the findings in the psychological literature about children’s memory, their reliability as witnesses, their resistance to suggestions of abuse and the importance of examining the way a child is questioned when deciding how much weight to give their evidence.\footnote{196}

\textit{Consultation Paper}

27.156 The Consultation Paper proposed that state and territory evidence legislation should provide that: the opinion rule does not apply to evidence of an opinion of a

\footnotesize
\begin{itemize}
  \item \footnote{196} All three recommendations address the typical juror misconceptions that have been identified in the literature: see A Cossins, \textit{Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia} (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 233–235.
\end{itemize}
person based on that person’s specialised knowledge of child development and child behaviour; and the credibility rule does not apply to such evidence given concerning the credibility of children.197

27.157 The Consultation Paper also asked whether federal, state and territory legislation should provide for mandatory jury directions, containing prescribed information about children’s abilities as witnesses or children’s responses to sexual abuse, 198 along the lines of the New Zealand model described above.

Submissions and consultations

27.158 There were few comments on the Consultation Paper proposal. 199 This is not surprising, as the proposal is consistent with the approach already taken in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions and the parallel approach in Western Australia.

27.159 Women’s Legal Services NSW supported the proposal, but expressed general concerns that using expert opinion on the development and behaviour of sexually abused children may lead to problems—as such evidence about children who have been sexually abused may be used as much to attack children as to bolster their credibility.200

27.160 There was some support in submissions and consultations for the use of jury directions about children’s abilities as witnesses or children’s responses to sexual abuse.201 The NSW ODPP, for example, stated that it is ‘necessary to take further action to dispel outdated myths and preconceived notions about children and their evidence’—particularly in respect of very young children.202

27.161 Stakeholders also noted the need to keep the content of such directions consistent with current knowledge. Jury directions need to be ‘based on sound understanding of child behavioural psychology’ and ‘reviewed over time to ensure they reflect current thinking’.203

Commissions’ views

27.162 There is recognition that, in at least some cases, expert evidence on the development and behaviour of children generally (and those who have been victims of sexual offences in particular) and the implications for the credibility of children as

197 Consultation Paper, Proposal 18–9.
198 Ibid, Question 18–6.
199 The National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence and Women’s Legal Services NSW agreed with Proposal 18–9: National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 200 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA), Consultation, Perth, 4 May 2010. National Legal Aid opposed any mandatory jury direction: National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
201 Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
witnesses may be desirable. As noted in the Bench Book for Children Giving Evidence in Australian Courts:

It would appear that courts in the past have overestimated the knowledge and capabilities of jurors in this context and underestimated the usefulness of expert evidence in child sexual abuse cases.

27.163 On this basis, whatever the problems in practice, the approach to the admissibility of such evidence taken under the uniform Evidence Acts is clearly an improvement on the position in jurisdictions that have not joined the scheme. For this reason, the Commissions recommend that state and territory evidence legislation should provide that (a) the opinion rule does not apply to evidence of an opinion of a person based on that person’s specialised knowledge of child development and child behaviour; and (b) the credibility rule does not apply to such evidence given concerning the credibility of children.

27.164 The intention of this proposal is that all states and territories that have not already done so should adopt provisions consistent with ss 79 and 108C of the uniform Evidence Acts. The Commissions consider it is preferable that all Australian jurisdictions join the uniform Evidence Acts scheme. Alternatively, reforms in the area of expert opinion evidence could be enacted in evidentiary provisions outside the uniform Evidence Acts—as in the Evidence Act 1906 (WA), which already contains modification of common law rules specific to evidence by an expert on the subject of child behaviour.

27.165 Another, complementary, approach would be to encourage the use of appropriate jury directions about children’s abilities as witnesses. In the light of research that shows that jurors hold a number of misconceptions about children’s ability to give truthful evidence and how children react to sexual abuse, there is a strong case for the use of jury directions when children give evidence in sexual assault proceedings. Such a jury direction would essentially summarise a consensus of expert opinion drawn from the work of psychiatrists, psychologists and other experts on child behaviour.

27.166 As the law currently stands, however, it is not permissible for a judge to give such directions to the jury, because the subject matter is not a matter for ‘judicial notice’. The Commissions, therefore, recommend that legislation authorise the 206 Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BE. See also Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 106H, modifying the hearsay rule with respect to children’s statements. Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 9C provides for expert evidence to be admitted about a child witness’s ability to give evidence.

27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings giving of jury directions about children’s abilities as witnesses and responses to sexual abuse—including in a family violence context.

27.167 It has not been possible, in the context of this Inquiry, to develop recommendations on any particular form of jury direction, or guidance on when such a direction should be given. The Commissions recommend that model directions should be developed by judges, through an appropriate body such as the National Judicial College of Australia, and drawing on the expertise of relevant professional and research bodies—such as the Australian Institute of Criminology and the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault.

27.168 Model directions might also be incorporated in bench books for judicial officers dealing with sexual assault cases. For example, the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration Bench Book for Children Giving Evidence in Australian Courts contains comprehensive information for judicial officers on matters such as assessing the credibility of children as witnesses, judicial assumptions about child witnesses, jury misconceptions about children and child abuse.

27.169 Finally, stakeholders also expressed some concerns about how adducing expert opinion evidence in child sexual assault cases works in practice. The Commissions note that problems with costs or delay attributable to adducing expert opinion evidence and undue partisanship or bias on the part of expert witnesses are not limited to those arising in sexual assault proceedings. These problems have been widely discussed in law reform reports and are not the subject of recommendations in this Inquiry.

Recommendation 27–10 State and territory evidence legislation should provide that:

(a) the opinion rule does not apply to evidence of an opinion of a person based on that person’s specialised knowledge of child development and child behaviour; and

(b) the credibility rule does not apply to such evidence concerning the credibility of children.

---

Recommendation 27–11 Federal, state and territory legislation should authorise the giving of jury directions about children’s abilities as witnesses and responses to sexual abuse, including in a family violence context.

Recommendation 27–12 Judges should develop model jury directions, drawing on the expertise of relevant professional and research bodies, about children’s abilities as witnesses and responses to sexual abuse, including in a family violence context.

Tendency and coincidence evidence

27.170 The following section discusses aspects of the law of evidence concerning the admissibility of ‘tendency’ and ‘coincidence’ evidence, as defined under the uniform Evidence Acts, and ‘propensity’ or ‘similar fact’ evidence at common law. These forms of evidence may include, significantly, the evidence of other complainants who have allegedly been sexually assaulted by the same defendant.

27.171 For example, evidence may be adduced to show that, because the defendant engaged in sexual activity with one child in his or her family, the defendant has a tendency to commit such acts. This evidence may have probative value in relation to allegations of sexual assault against other children in the family. Similarly, evidence may be adduced to show that a defendant engaged in sexual activity with two children in similar circumstances—for example, when another parent was absent. The evidence about one allegation may have probative value in relation to the other because it is improbable that the events were coincidental.

27.172 Tendency and coincidence evidence may also include, for example, evidence of prior convictions for sexual offences or other prior illegal sexual conduct—often referred to as ‘uncharged acts’—such as ‘grooming’ behaviours.

Current law

27.173 Under the uniform Evidence Acts—applicable in NSW, Victoria, Tasmania and the ACT—evidence about a defendant’s prior illegal sexual conduct may be characterised as ‘tendency’ or ‘coincidence’ evidence.212

27.174 Tendency evidence is evidence ‘of the character, reputation or conduct of a person, or a tendency that a person has or had’, adduced to prove that the person ‘has or had a tendency (whether because of the person’s character or otherwise) to act in a particular way, or to have a particular state of mind’.213

27.175 Coincidence evidence is evidence that ‘2 or more events occurred’ that is adduced to prove that ‘a person did a particular act or had a particular state of mind on

---

213 Ibid s 97.
27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings

the basis that, having regard to any similarities in the events … it is improbable that the events occurred coincidentally’.

27.176 The test for admissibility under the uniform Evidence Acts is whether the tendency or coincidence evidence has significant probative value which substantially outweighs any prejudicial effect it may have on the defendant.

27.177 At common law, evidence of these kinds is referred to as either ‘propensity’ or ‘similar fact’ evidence, depending on the purpose for which it is admitted. In jurisdictions that do not apply the uniform Evidence Acts, the admissibility of these forms of evidence is governed by the common law, as modified by statute in some jurisdictions.

27.178 At common law, as a matter of general principle, evidence of past criminal conduct, including convictions (for sexual offences or otherwise) is not admissible unless there is a ‘striking similarity’ or ‘underlying unity’ between the similar facts. Admissibility is governed by the test in Pfennig v The Queen—that is, propensity or similar fact evidence is admissible if its probative value is such that there is no rational view of the evidence that is consistent with the innocence of the accused.

27.179 Some common law evidence jurisdictions have enacted legislative provisions modifying common law rules relating to propensity or similar fact evidence:

- in Queensland, similar fact evidence must not be ruled inadmissible on the ground ‘that it may be the result of collusion or suggestion, and the weight of that evidence is a question for the jury’;
- in Western Australia, the Evidence Act 1906 (WA) governs the admissibility of propensity evidence by incorporating a ‘significant probative value’ test and a public interest test;
- in South Australia, propensity evidence relating to a count of sexual assault is only admissible in a joint trial if it has relevance beyond mere propensity. However, in deciding admissibility, the judicial officer is not to have regard to ‘whether or not there is a reasonable explanation in relation to the evidence consistent with the innocence of the accused or whether or not the evidence may be the result of collusion or concoction’.

Impact in sexual assault proceedings

27.180 The impact of these rules of evidence depends on the type of trial and the type of evidence the prosecution seeks to adduce. If there are two or more complainants who have allegedly been sexually assaulted by the same defendant—for example, two daughters of the defendant, the prosecution will often make a pre-trial application to have the counts against the defendant heard in a joint trial, rather than separate trials. As discussed in Chapter 26, the threshold question for holding a joint trial is whether each complainant’s evidence will be cross-admissible in respect of the charges involving the other complainant or complainants.

27.181 If there is only one complainant, the prosecution may have evidence from other witnesses about the defendant’s criminal sexual behaviour with them. Alternatively, it may wish to adduce relationship evidence to explain the nature of the relationship between the complainant and the defendant, and the context in which the sexual assault occurred.\(^{221}\)

27.182 Three aspects of the law of evidence concerning the admissibility of tendency and coincidence evidence are problematic in sexual assault cases. These are:

- the ‘striking similarities’ test;
- the ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test; and
- excluding ‘a reasonable possibility of concoction’.

The ‘striking similarities’ test

27.183 At common law, the cross-admissibility of the evidence of two or more complainants is, at the outset, dependent on the evidence revealing ‘striking similarities’.\(^{222}\) The cross-admissibility of evidence frequently arises in the child sexual assault context where it has been argued that the ‘striking similarities’ test ‘has been used to create artificial distinctions in relation to sex offender behaviour’.\(^{223}\)

27.184 This artificiality is said to arise because ‘when it comes to assessing the probative value of the evidence of child complainants, there will be higher or lower degrees of similarity depending on what a judge knows about sex offending behaviour’.\(^{224}\) For example, a trial judge who is unaware of the range of grooming and sexual practices of child sex offenders ‘may look for greater degrees of similarity in the evidence compared to a judge who is aware of the variety of ways in which … offenders gain a child’s trust and affection and the different sexual practices a serial offender will engage in’.\(^{225}\)

27.185 A lower threshold for determining probative value may be ‘appropriate in child sexual assault cases where the identity of the offender is not in issue, in order to capture the range of sexual and grooming behaviours of serial offenders’.\(^{226}\) Since most cases of sexual assault, especially in a family violence context, involve defendants known to the complainant, rather than strangers, the identity of the accused will not

---

\(^{221}\) Relationship evidence is discussed later in this chapter.

\(^{222}\) Phillips v The Queen (2006) 225 CLR 303.

\(^{224}\) Ibid.

\(^{225}\) Ibid.

\(^{226}\) Ibid.
usually be a fact in issue. It is also argued that, when applying the ‘striking similarities’ test, many cases have failed to recognise that any sexual practices with children ‘ought to be the sufficient similarity requirement since sex offenders will engage in different sexual conduct with different children depending upon the age and sex of the child, the passivity or resistance of the child, the degree of grooming of, and the degree of access to, the child, the defendant’s relationship with the child and so on’.227

Cases such as R v KP; Ex parte Attorney-General (Qld)—which involved evidence of sexual assaults against two brothers by a school music teacher and friend of the family (and against two of the defendant’s own children)—illustrate how rules on the admissibility of propensity and similar fact evidence can frustrate legislative attempts to increase the number of joint trials.228 This is because a decision to hold a joint trial is dependent on the cross-admissibility of each complainant’s evidence which, in turn, is dependent on finding sufficient similarities in the evidence. Recently, the culmination of the tension between cross-admissibility and joint or separate trials occurred in the High Court case of Phillips v The Queen. Since this decision, the applicability of the ‘striking similarities’ test has been reinforced as the standard for determining the admissibility of similar fact evidence at common law.229

Although the uniform Evidence Acts create a different regime for admitting tendency and coincidence evidence, it has been argued that the striking similarities test is still used in assessing the probative value of the evidence of two or more complainants about a defendant’s sexual conduct.230 For example, the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal has noted the similarity between the approach under the Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) and the common law.231 Common law formulations, including ‘striking similarities’ have been held to ‘guide’ the reasoning process when determining whether tendency or coincidence evidence has significant probative value under ss 97 and 98 of the uniform Evidence Acts.232

The ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test

At common law, even if the evidence of two or more witnesses has ‘striking similarities’, it can still be excluded because of its prejudicial effect. In order to prevent the admission of prejudicial propensity and similar fact evidence, the common law

227 Ibid, 195. See, eg, the facts in AE v The Queen [2008] NSWCCA (in which the complainant was the defendant’s step-father); R v KP; Ex parte Attorney-General (Qld) [2006] QCA; R v Fletcher (2005) 156 A Crim R 308.
228 R v KP; Ex parte Attorney-General (Qld) [2006] QCA. The Queensland Court of Appeal held that the evidence of the older brother about being sexually abused by the defendant was not cross-admissible in relation to the counts involving the younger brother because of lack of similarities in the defendant’s alleged sexual behaviour. The Court held that charges relating to all complainants should not have been joined.
231 R v F [2002] NSWCCA 125, [28].
developed the ‘no rational view of the evidence test’, adopted by a majority of the High Court in Hoch v The Queen:

> to determine the admissibility of similar fact evidence, the trial judge must apply the same test as a jury must apply in dealing with circumstantial evidence, and ask whether there is a rational view of the evidence that is inconsistent with the guilt of the accused.

27.189 The test was confirmed by a majority of the High Court in Pfennig v The Queen, which held that the probative force of similar fact evidence will outweigh its prejudicial effect only if there is no rational view of the evidence that is consistent with the innocence of the accused.

27.190 This test is now referred to as the ‘Pfennig test’ and is the means for determining how the probative force of the evidence and prejudicial effect should be balanced. Where there is a rational view of the evidence consistent with the defendant’s innocence, the probative force of the evidence is automatically outweighed by its prejudicial effect, thus removing any discretion on the part of the trial judge to admit the evidence.

27.191 Probative force and prejudicial effect must also be considered under s 101(2) of the uniform Evidence Acts. In R v Ellis, the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal considered whether the Pfennig test should continue to be applied. The fact that s 101(2) introduced a legislative formulation for balancing probative value against prejudicial effect led Spigelman CJ to conclude that it did not. He stated that the continued application of a ‘no rational view’ test is not ‘consistent with a statutory test which expressly requires a balancing process’ and that the reasoning in Pfennig is ‘inapplicable to a statutory test that probative value substantially outweighs prejudicial effect’.

_A reasonable possibility of concoction_

27.192 It has been argued that, since the decision in R v Ellis, ‘the necessity to exclude the possibility of collusion or other influence is questionable’ when applying the balancing test under s 101(2) of the uniform Evidence Acts. Recent case law

---

233 Sutton v The Queen (1984) 152 CLR 528, 564.
236 McHugh J considered that the test enunciated by Mason CJ, Deane and Dawson JJ in Pfennig was too stringent, although His Honour recognised that ‘where the prosecution case depends entirely on propensity reasoning, the evidence will need to be so cogent that, when related to the other evidence, there is no rational explanation of the prosecution case that is consistent with the innocence of the accused’: Ibid, 530.
239 Ibid, [89]. The High Court granted Ellis leave to appeal but later revoked that leave, stating that it agreed with Spigelman CJ’s construction of the Evidence Act 1995 (NSW): Ellis v The Queen [2004] HCA Trans 488. indicates, however, that _R v Ellis_ has not removed the issue of concoction from the admissibility equation under the uniform Evidence Acts.

27.193 Despite expectations that the courts would continue to develop the law away from _Hoch v The Queen_, obviating the need for legislative intervention, these expectations may have been ‘an overly optimistic view’. It has been argued that, in sexual assault cases, s 101(2) of the uniform Evidence Acts is only likely to be satisfied ‘if a reasonable possibility of concoction can be eliminated’.

27.194 In _R v Ellis_, Spigelman CJ accepted that there ‘may well be cases where, on the facts, it would not be open to conclude that the probative value of particular evidence substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect, unless the “no rational explanation” test were satisfied’, and that these cases may include those where a trial judge considers that there is a reasonable possibility of concoction.

27.195 The Tasmania Law Reform Institute (TLRI) has observed that, in practice, where a reasonable possibility of concoction is taken into account under s 101(2), this is no different from an application of the ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test, because concoction ‘weighs so heavily in the balance that the reality is that its existence means that there is no balancing to be undertaken’. The position, in the TLRI’s view, ‘effectively remains the same as that rejected … in _Ellis_’.

27.196 When a judge takes concoction or contamination into account, he or she can be seen as performing the task of the jury, by assessing the strength of the evidence—in particular, whether or not it is true. The TLRI noted that ‘no other exclusionary rule requires the court to determine the veracity of evidence as a basis for admission’.

---

242 Tasmania Law Reform Institute, _Evidence Act 2001 Sections 97, 98 & 101 and Hoch’s Case: Admissibility of Tendency and Coincidence Evidence in Sexual Assault Cases with Multiple Complainants_, Issues Paper 15 (2009), 38.

243 ‘[A]nd if there are sufficient similarities (striking or otherwise) between the evidence of two or more witnesses to be able to conclude that the probative value of the evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect’: _A Cossins, Striking Similarities between the Common Law and the Uniform Evidence Acts: Protecting Serial Offenders and Putting Children at Risk_, unpublished (2010), 19–20.

246 Tasmania Law Reform Institute, _Evidence Act 2001 Sections 97, 98 & 101 and Hoch’s Case: Admissibility of Tendency and Coincidence Evidence in Sexual Assault Cases with Multiple Complainants_, Issues Paper 15 (2009), 11.

248 Tasmania Law Reform Institute, _Evidence Act 2001 Sections 97, 98 & 101 and Hoch’s Case: Admissibility of Tendency and Coincidence Evidence in Sexual Assault Cases with Multiple Complainants_, Issues Paper 15 (2009), 39. This point was noted by McHugh J in _Pfennig v The Queen_ (1995) 182 CLR 461, 517.
27.197 The application of the ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test in sexual assault trials is seen to have ‘particular consequences, since where there are two or more complainants, the probative force of the similar fact evidence is destroyed if there is a reasonable possibility of concoction between the complainants’. The courts do not, however, apply a universal standard for measuring what amounts to a reasonable possibility of concoction.

27.198 Where two or more children give evidence about a defendant’s sexual behaviour with them, the admissibility of their evidence may depend on whether they had the opportunity to concoct their allegations. While the targeting and grooming strategies of serial sex offenders are well documented in the literature, the rules governing the admissibility of propensity evidence are based on the belief that, if two or more complainants know each other, the possibility of concoction must be ruled out for one complainant’s evidence to be admissible in the case of another.

27.199 This assumption is based on the common law’s traditional belief that children are unreliable witnesses, prone to fantasy and highly suggestible—a view that may still prevail despite the fact that it is not supported by the psychological literature. Recent literature is said to show that ‘children are highly resistant to abuse suggestions and do not readily make up stories of sexual abuse even when given the opportunity to do so’.

27.200 Further, the test for concoction does not take into account the practical effects on complainants, since in assessing the possibility of concoction the court will usually conduct a pre-trial hearing, at which the complainants may be required to give evidence.

253 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 185.

254 This is said to conflict with ‘public policy objectives behind preventing child complainants from giving evidence on more than one occasion which has seen some jurisdictions enact provisions to prevent children being required to give evidence at committal proceedings’: Ibid, 185. Complainants are also likely to be cross-examined ‘more aggressively’ at a pre-trial hearing because of the absence of a jury: Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Evidence Act 2001 Sections 97, 98 & 101 and Hoch’s Case: Admissibility of Tendency and Coincidence Evidence in Sexual Assault Cases with Multiple Complainants, Issues Paper 15 (2009), 14.
Reform options

27.201 Several jurisdictions have enacted legislation to overcome problems caused in sexual assault cases by the ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test and with evidence being excluded on the basis of possible concoction.

27.202 In Queensland, s 132A of the Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) governs the admissibility of similar fact evidence and leaves the question of concoction to the jury:

In a criminal proceeding, similar fact evidence, the probative value of which outweighs its potentially prejudicial effect, must not be ruled inadmissible on the ground that it may be the result of collusion or suggestion, and the weight of that evidence is a question for the jury, if any.

27.203 In addition, s 597A(1AA) of the Criminal Code (Qld) provides that, in determining whether there should be joint or separate trials, ‘the court must not have regard to the possibility that similar fact evidence, the probative value of which outweighs its potentially prejudicial effect, may be the result of collusion or suggestion’.

27.204 In South Australia, reforms concerning the prosecution of sexual assault charges were enacted in 2008, following a review of rape laws. Under s 278(2a) of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA), issues of joinder, the ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test and concoction are dealt with together. The provision creates a presumption that where there are two or more counts involving complainants, the counts are to be tried together. A judge may only order separate trials if the evidence of two or more complainants is not cross-admissible.

27.205 The ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test has been specifically abrogated in relation to determining whether evidence will be cross-admissible. Section 278(2a)(c) states that in determining admissibility for these purposes:

(i) evidence relating to the count may be admissible in relation to another count concerning a different alleged victim if it has a relevance other than mere propensity; and

(ii) the judge is not to have regard to—

(A) whether or not there is a reasonable explanation in relation to the evidence consistent with the innocence of the defendant; or

(B) whether or not the evidence may be the result of collusion or concoction.

255 Criminal Law Consolidation (Rape and Sexual Offences) Amendment Act 2008 (SA).
257 In contrast, the Victorian provision (discussed above in relation to a presumption of joint trials) attempts to encourage joint trials even where evidence is not cross-admissible: Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 194.
27.206 In Western Australia, s 31A of the Evidence Act 1906 (WA) deals with propensity evidence.\textsuperscript{258} Section 31A(2) provides:

\begin{enumerate}
\item Propensity evidence or relationship evidence is admissible in proceedings for an offence if the court considers:
\begin{enumerate}
\item that the evidence would, either by itself or having regard to other evidence adduced or to be adduced, have significant probative value; and \item that the probative value of the evidence compared to the degree of risk of an unfair trial, is such that fair-minded people would think that the public interest in adducing all relevant evidence of guilt must have priority over the risk of an unfair trial.
\end{enumerate}
\end{enumerate}

(3) In considering the probative value of evidence for the purposes of subsection (2) it is not open to the court to have regard to the possibility that the evidence may be the result of collusion, concoction or suggestion.

27.207 Like the Queensland reforms, s 31A(3) removes the issue of concoction from the admissibility equation and leaves it to the jury when deciding the weight to be given to the evidence.\textsuperscript{259} The possibility of concoction cannot be taken into account when determining whether the propensity evidence has significant probative value.\textsuperscript{260} This means that the court has to take the evidence at ‘its highest’.\textsuperscript{261} Nor can the possibility of concoction be taken into account when the court is applying the balancing test under s 31A(2)(b), in particular the risk of an unfair trial, because of the ‘quite clearly articulated legislative purpose’ of the provision.\textsuperscript{262}

27.208 Section 31A abrogates the common law ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test. The test introduced by s 31A(2)(b) is taken directly from the balancing test suggested by McHugh J, dissenting in Pfennig v The Queen.\textsuperscript{263} This test is much less stringent than the Pfennig test.\textsuperscript{264} In enacting s 31A, the legislature has accepted that, because of its nature, the admission of propensity evidence will always create the risk of an unfair trial.\textsuperscript{265} However, that risk must be balanced against the competing public interests in holding a joint trial in which all relevant evidence is admitted.\textsuperscript{266}

27.209 The balancing test, when referring to fair-minded people, clearly envisages that the public interest in the prosecution of sexual offences ought to be taken into consideration when weighing up the risk of prejudice to the accused. These \textsuperscript{258} The definition of propensity evidence under s 31A is more extensive than at common law and includes tendency, relationship and character evidence.

\textsuperscript{259} Di Lena v Western Australia (2006) 165 A Crim R 482, [51]; Wood v Western Australia [2005] WASCA, [41]; Donaldson v Western Australia (2005) 31 WAR 122, [108].

\textsuperscript{260} Donaldson v Western Australia (2005) 31 WAR 122, [154].

\textsuperscript{261} Ibid, [153] (Roberts-Smith JA).

\textsuperscript{262} Ibid, [157] (Roberts-Smith JA).

\textsuperscript{263} Pfennig v The Queen (1995) 182 CLR 461, 528.

\textsuperscript{264} Di Lena v Western Australia (2006) 165 A Crim R 482, [94].

\textsuperscript{265} Ibid, [58].

\textsuperscript{266} The decision made under s 31A is a question of law, not an exercise of a judicial discretion and, once admitted, there is no room to exclude the evidence under the discretion at common law: Ibid, [60], referring to R v Christie [1914] AC.
considerations may be important, especially in relation to child sexual assault, since a particular complainant’s evidence will often make more sense when evidence is given of the alleged serial nature of a defendant’s sexual behaviour. For example, in VIM v Western Australia, separate allegations of sexual assault over many years had been made by the two step-daughters of the accused, who was indicted on 44 counts. The Western Australian Court of Appeal considered that this was ‘an example of the very type of case in which the legislature intended the jury to have the benefit of a full evidentiary familial picture’.

None of the reforms enacted in Australia has addressed expressly the striking similarities test, which may still constitute a major barrier to the admissibility of tendency and propensity evidence and the ability to hold joint trials. The Western Australian reforms represent the most complete break from the common law. By articulating a particular threshold test of admissibility—that the evidence must have significant probative value—the common law striking similarities test may no longer be ‘a necessary criterion for admissibility’.

The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee has reviewed the effectiveness of the reforms discussed above. It concluded that the most successful appear to be those enacted in Western Australia—although in the absence of empirical research it is not possible to determine the extent to which, for example, the number of joint trials has increased in Western Australia as a result of those reforms.

Consultation Paper

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should provide that, in sexual assault proceedings, a court should not have regard to the possibility that the evidence of a witness or witnesses is the result of concoction, collusion or suggestion when determining the admissibility of tendency or coincidence evidence.

The Consultation Paper also stated that further consideration may need to be given to the continued reliance of Australian courts on the striking similarities test for the admission of tendency, coincidence, propensity and similar fact evidence.

---

267 VIM v Western Australia (2005) 31 WAR 1.

268 Ibid, 168.

269 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 202. The Western Australian Court of Appeal has accepted that, in a child sexual assault trial, propensity evidence need not show ‘striking similarities’ or sexual interference by the defendant in a particular way: Donaldson v Western Australia (2005) 31 WAR 122, [149]. If the evidence in question reveals an underlying unity, system or pattern, that will be sufficient to establish that the evidence has significant probative value under s 31A(2) ‘irrespective of what physical acts [were] individually involved’. In Donaldson, the evidence of the four complainants showed that the defendant, a swimming coach, had a particular pattern of conduct ‘or a tendency … by essentially similar means, to inveigle young girls under his charge into situations in which he then commits sexual offences upon them’: [149]. This was sufficient for the evidence of the four complainants to be cross-admissible.

Family Violence — A National Legal Response

(including in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions). The Commissions asked to what extent the ‘striking similarities’ test impedes the ordering of joint trials in relation to sex offences; and whether the Western Australian reforms in relation to the cross-admissibility of evidence should be adopted in other jurisdictions.

Submissions and consultations

27.214 Stakeholders expressed a range of views relating to the need for reform to address the implications of the striking similarities test. The perspectives of legal stakeholders differed, however, about the extent to which the test is being applied, in practice, in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions. A number also emphasised the impact of the issue within the family violence context.

27.215 The NSW ODPP submitted that the test is a ‘flawed approach to establishing the modus operandi of most sexual predators, but particularly in a family violence context and other instances where there is no issue as to the identity of the offender’. The NSW ODPP noted that rather than acting with a ‘hallmark’, there is more likely to be a ‘progression or an evolution’ in the offending behaviour—for example, in the case of a father who assaults several of his children.  It stated that:

the striking similarities test does impede the ordering of joint trials. The need to satisfy the test for the purposes of relying on tendency or coincidence evidence is one thing, but if the evidence fails that test it does not follow that the evidence is not relevant and probative in other ways.

27.216 Cossins considered that the striking similarities approach focuses on a need to find that ‘the sexual practices of the defendant with one complainant are more or less identical to his sexual practices with another complainant’ before their evidence will be considered to be tendency or coincidence evidence and cross-admissible in a joint trial.  In her opinion, in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions, like the common law, it is only where there are sufficient similarities between the accounts given by the complainant and another witness that that witness’ evidence will be considered to have significant probative value under the [uniform Evidence Acts].

27.217 She submitted that the striking similarities test has been applied by the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal in a number of child sexual assault cases and is problematic for three key reasons:

(i) Because the test does not accord with information about child sex offender behaviour described in the psychological literature, it amounts to a false measure for assessing the probative value of evidence about a defendant’s sexual behaviour.

---

272 Ibid, Questions 18–7, 18–8.
274 Ibid.
275 This approach, she considers, has no empirical basis and appears to ‘reflect a subjective belief that sex offenders are highly specialised’ in the type of sexual behaviour they engage in, a view that is not supported by the research literature: A Cossins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010.
276 Ibid.
Corroborative evidence of child sexual abuse is uncommon which is likely to be one of the reasons why low conviction rates are found in child sexual assault trials. Thus the striking similarities test is likely to contribute to low conviction rates where its effect is to exclude relevant corroborative evidence which is judged to be insufficiently similar with the evidence of the complainant.

If there is a lack of striking similarities between the evidence of two or more complainants, a joint trial is less likely to be held. This, in turn, will result in more separate trials with a decreased likelihood of serial sex offenders being convicted.

Cossins proposed eliminating the ‘striking similarities’ test from the admissibility equation under the uniform Evidence Acts. She suggested that provisions be inserted stating that, in respect of a sexual offence, if two or more counts charging sexual offences involving different complainants are joined in the same indictment, the court must not have regard to whether that evidence has striking similarities with other evidence about the sexual conduct of the defendant, in considering its probative value.

The need for any reform in relation to the striking similarities test, at least in NSW, was contested by other stakeholders. The Public Defenders Office NSW submitted that NSW courts are not bound to a ‘striking similarities’ test, but rather a rational assessment of probative value under the Evidence Act 1995 (NSW). Further, it was submitted that the distinction between the positions in NSW and Western Australia with regard to the admissibility of tendency (or propensity evidence) may not be as significant as suggested by the Consultation Paper. In particular, in NSW as in Western Australia, a distinctive system of grooming and exploitation will often have more sway than similarity of the physical acts involved.

Stakeholders also held divergent views on the desirability of reforms to evidence laws to ensure that the possibility of concoction does not, by itself, render inadmissible the evidence of witnesses in sexual assault proceedings. Some stakeholders, including legal professionals, supported the Consultation Paper proposal.

The NSW ODPP stated that allegations of concoction, collusion or suggestion are better assessed by a jury than rendered inadmissible. Otherwise these matters become a significant barrier to the joinder of charges in respect of multiple complainants because:

---

277  Ibid.
278  Ibid.
279  National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
280  See, eg, Donaldson v Western Australia (2005) 31 WAR 122.
281  Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
• it is very difficult to exclude a reasonable possibility of concoction if the complainants are well known to each other, particularly siblings;
• this issue arises in all institutional sexual assault allegations such as involving teachers, because invariably the victims know each other as they were all at school together;
• there is not a great deal of case law in this area, because many prosecutors do not run counts together if they involve siblings because it is almost impossible to exclude the reasonable possibility of concoction ... 283

27.222 Women’s Legal Services NSW submitted:

The unique features of sexual assault offences and child sexual assault offences require, in our view, unique legislative solutions. These solutions must reflect the realities for many sexual assault complainants: complainants, particularly children, often know each other and often have some form of connection or relationship. This connection is most often not indicative of concoction.284

27.223 The Law Council stated that it would not oppose a provision that stated that ‘the possibility’ of concoction should not be a basis on which to hold tendency or coincidence evidence inadmissible—as long as the provision did not preclude concoction from being taken into account in determining admissibility under relevant tests.285

27.224 Other stakeholders opposed the proposal.286 National Legal Aid observed that if ‘the possibility of concoction, collusion or suggestion cannot be excluded, the probative value of the evidence is properly diminished’.287

27.225 The Public Defenders Office NSW submitted that there was insufficient cause ‘for taking the radical step of pulling one area of criminal prosecution outside the uniform framework of evidentiary rules’. The Public Defenders noted that specific consideration needs to be given to whether the evidence is being put forward as tendency or coincidence evidence. That is, if the evidence is coincidence evidence ‘the reduction in probative value where there is a real possibility of contamination has nothing to do with assumptions based on the common law’s traditional belief that children are unreliable witnesses, prone to fantasy, and highly suggestible’. Rather, it was submitted that:

it is a realistic assessment of the difference in the force of the argument ‘What are the chances of two people coming up with a similar allegation?’ where the complainants know one another. Logic requires recognition that such an argument has greater force 285 Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010. That is, it should still be inadmissible where ‘the evidence is, for example, overwhelming that two complainants have jointly prepared their complaints’.

286 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Barrister, Consultation, Sydney, 10 June 2010.
Commissions’ views

27.226 The application of rules of evidence applying to tendency and coincidence evidence has an important impact on sexual assault proceedings, including in relation to sexual assault committed in a family violence context. These rules of evidence may render some evidence inadmissible and mean that, where two or more complainants have allegedly been sexually assaulted by the same defendant, a joint trial may not be possible.

27.227 In ALRC 102, the ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC highlighted the difficult task of formulating appropriate rules to deal with probative but prejudicial evidence. In relation to tendency and coincidence evidence, the Commissions recognised ‘a stark contrast between the policy objectives of receiving all probative evidence, and minimising the risk of wrongful conviction’.

27.228 In child sexual assault cases, however, it seems unfair to victims and their families that:

in so many cases the isolation of one child pitted against an adult alleged to be the perpetrator leads to acquittal of the adult, when at the same time there are other allegations of similar behaviour against the adult from other family members not before the Court, or when a history of such offending is known but excluded, or when the conduct is part of an alleged wider course of conduct, but evidence of which for one reason or another is excluded.

27.229 In common law evidence jurisdictions, such perceived problems with the operation of rules of evidence in sexual assault proceedings have led to legislative reform. In the Commissions’ view, there is no reason to recommend reform in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions to respond to the ‘striking similarities’ or ‘no rational view of the evidence’ (Pfennig) tests—as has occurred in Western Australia and South Australia. There is a case, however, for specific reform in relation to the impact on admissibility of evidence of a ‘reasonable possibility of concoction’.

Striking similarities

27.230 Although there have been a number of reforms in different jurisdictions to increase the frequency of joint trials in relation to sex offences, only one common law jurisdiction (Western Australia) has abandoned striking similarities as the test for admissibility of propensity evidence.

---

288 Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
289 See Ch 26.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

27.231 It has been suggested that, without changes in the application of the striking similarities test, including in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions, reforms to increase the number of joint trials may be undermined. The striking similarities test may also impede the prosecution’s ability to adduce evidence about the defendant’s sexual conduct from witnesses in trials which involve one complainant.

27.232 In Ellis, the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal confirmed that the tendency and coincidence rules in the uniform Evidence Acts should be construed according to their own terms and excluding prior common law principles (such as the striking similarities test). Rather, the test for the admissibility of tendency and coincidence evidence is whether the evidence has significant probative value substantially outweighing any prejudicial effect.

27.233 Similarity or dissimilarity are still commonly referred to in assessing probative value in applying this statutory balancing test—as are other concepts such as ‘pattern’. For example, in R v Fletcher, the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal, in finding that certain evidence was not admissible, stated that there was ‘in the matter now before the Court, insufficient pattern or underlying unity; there are no striking similarities or unusual features …’. Similarity or dissimilarity are still commonly referred to in assessing probative value in applying this statutory balancing test—as are other concepts such as ‘pattern’. For example, in R v Fletcher, the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal, in finding that certain evidence was not admissible, stated that there was ‘in the matter now before the Court, insufficient pattern or underlying unity; there are no striking similarities or unusual features …’.

27.234 The NSW cases since Ellis confirm the continuing role that the existence of similarities and dissimilarities has in assessing the probative value of tendency and coincidence evidence. They do not show, however, that any strict ‘striking’ similarities test continues to be applied. The use of the concept of similarity seems unavoidable in construing the uniform Evidence Acts tendency and coincidence provisions. The coincidence rule itself refers to ‘similarities’ in the events or circumstances about which evidence is sought to be adduced. This may not, however, prevent development of the law to recognise that evidence of patterns of behaviour or systematic activities (such as those relating to ‘grooming’) may have significant probative value, even where there is no close similarity in the physical acts involved.

27.235 In the Commissions’ view, there is insufficient reason to recommend reform in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions to address perceived over-reliance on ‘striking similarities’ as a test for the admissibility of tendency or coincidence evidence. The real question is whether the tendency and coincidence rules should continue to apply to

---

292 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 197.
294 Uniform Evidence Acts, ss 97, 98, 101. The TLRI has recently stated that there is no requirement under the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) for a striking similarity: Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Evidence Act 2001 Sections 97, 98 & 101 and Hoch’s Case: Admissibility of Tendency and Coincidence Evidence in Sexual Assault Cases with Multiple Complainants, Issues Paper 15 (2009), Part 6, 57.
295 For example, R v Fletcher (2005) 156 A Crim R 308.
296 Ibid, [165]. In Victoria, under the Evidence Act 2008 (Vic), the Court of Appeal has stated that there must be something ‘distinctive’ about evidence of an accused’s conduct for it not be excluded as coincidence evidence: PNJ v Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic) [2010] VSCA, [20].
298 Uniform Evidence Acts, s 98.
299 As suggested by Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
sexual assault proceedings involving multiple complainants or entirely different rules developed for this particular category of evidence. The Commissions are not convinced that a case has been made out for such special rules of evidence applicable only in sexual assault proceedings. Such rules would risk introducing complexity and uncertainty in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions.

27.236 Further, the Commissions do not consider it would be appropriate, in the context of this Inquiry, to recommend reforms to evidence law in common law evidence jurisdictions directed to the striking similarities test. Rather, the Commissions consider it is preferable that all Australian jurisdictions join the uniform Evidence Acts scheme.

No rational view of the evidence

27.237 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee suggested reforms to overcome the effect of the ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test in jurisdictions which have not already introduced reforms to do so. The suggested reform would expressly eliminate ‘whether or not there is a reasonable explanation in relation to the evidence consistent with the innocence of the defendant’ as an issue when a court is required to decide whether to order joint or separate trials.\(^{300}\)

27.238 The test does not apply in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions and has been overridden by legislation in Western Australia and South Australia. It may still apply in Queensland and the Northern Territory. The Commissions do not consider it would be appropriate, in the context of this Inquiry, to recommend specific reforms to evidence law in those two jurisdictions. Again, the Commissions consider it is preferable that all Australian jurisdictions join the uniform Evidence Acts scheme.

Reasonable possibility of concoction

27.239 In the Commissions’ view, in sexual assault proceedings it is not appropriate for the possibility of concoction to render evidence inadmissible—for example, when the prosecution seeks to call a witness who, while not a complainant, can give evidence about the defendant’s sexual behaviour with him or her and has had contact with the complainant. This may occur in cases of sexual assault in a family violence context.

27.240 The current law appears to be that a reasonable possibility of concoction can affect the admissibility of propensity and similar fact evidence in common law evidence jurisdictions. At common law, the possibility of concoction will almost certainly render propensity and similar fact evidence inadmissible.

27.241 Under the uniform Evidence Acts, concoction is a factor that the court may consider in assessing probative value and applying the balancing test under ss 97, 98 and 101 respectively. However, it appears that case law may be evolving towards exclusion of evidence of multiple complainants where there is a possibility of concoction.301

\(^{300}\) A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, Rec 3.7. The recommendation is based on Criminal Procedure Act 2004 (WA) s 133(5)–(6).

27.242 In NSW, while some stakeholders submitted that the concoction issue does not dominate consideration of admissibility,302 others considered that judicial officers tend towards excluding evidence where possible concoction is raised. Prosecutors perceived a resulting high bar to joint trial in such cases.303 In practice, it is difficult to exclude a reasonable possibility of concoction where, for example, complainants are siblings.

27.243 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee has made recommendations to address this barrier to the admission of tendency and coincidence (propensity and similar fact) evidence.304 The Commissions agree that there is a case for reform.

27.244 The Commissions recommend that federal, state and territory legislation should provide that, in sexual assault proceedings, tendency or coincidence evidence is not inadmissible only because there is a possibility that the evidence is the result of concoction, collusion or suggestion.

27.245 In uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions, the appropriate mechanism would be amendment of Part 3.6 of the Acts—for example, by the insertion of a new section following s 101 (which deals with restrictions on tendency evidence and coincidence evidence adduced by the prosecution). This recommendation for reform of the uniform Evidence Acts would need to be considered by the Australian and state and territory governments through SCAG.

27.246 The Commissions’ preference would be for all Australian jurisdictions to join the uniform Evidence Acts scheme. Failing this, however, common law evidence jurisdictions that have not already done so should enact similar amendments in criminal procedure or evidence legislation providing that propensity evidence and similar fact evidence must not be ruled inadmissible only because there is a possibility that the evidence is the result of concoction, collusion or suggestion.

Recommendation 27–13 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that, in sexual assault proceedings, tendency or coincidence evidence is not inadmissible only because there is a possibility that the evidence is the result of concoction, collusion or suggestion.

---

301 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
302 Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
304 The Committee proposed amendments to ss 97, 98 and 101 of the uniform Evidence Acts, of general application to tendency and coincidence evidence and that other jurisdictions make similar amendments with respect to the admissibility of propensity and similar fact evidence: A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, Recs 3.8, 3.9.
Relevance and consent

27.247 A related concern arises from the High Court’s decision in Phillips v The Queen \(^{305}\) (Phillips). Phillips involved a joint trial with six complainants. The prosecution called all six complainants who gave evidence about the defendant pursuing sex activity with them in circumstances where they did not consent.

27.248 The trial judge had found that the probative value of the evidence was its ability to show the ‘improbability of similar lies by each of the complainants’ \(^{306}\)

That is, one girl might deliberately make up a lie that [the appellant] dealt with her sexually without her consent; two might possibly make up a lie to that effect; but the chances or the probability that all six have made up such a lie, in my view, becomes remote in the extreme in the absence of any real risk of concoction. \(^{307}\)

27.249 The High Court quashed the convictions based on its finding that the decision to join the charges in a single indictment was wrong in law. \(^{308}\) The Court observed that:

Normally similar fact evidence is used to assist on issues relating only to the conduct and mental state of an accused … But where a particular count supported by one complainant’s evidence raises the issue of whether she consented to certain conduct by an accused, the issue relates much more to her mental state than his. The trial judge kept referring to ‘the improbability of similar lies’ on that issue. That is an expression used by Mason CJ, Wilson and Gaudron JJ in Hoch v The Queen … ; however, as counsel for the appellant pointed out, they used it not on the question of whether the complainants in that case consented, but on whether the accused behaved towards them as he said he did. To tell the jury that the evidence went to the improbability of each complainant lying or being unreliable about consent was to say that a lack of consent by five complainants tended to establish lack of consent by the sixth. \(^{309}\)

27.250 The Court held that the evidence of each complainant about whether they consented to sexual activity with the accused was not cross-admissible in relation to the counts involving the other complainants on the grounds of lack of relevance.

27.251 On one view, Phillips may have application to any sexual assault proceedings where there are multiple complaints of sexual assault against the same defendant and where consent is a fact in issue. \(^{310}\) There is some case law indicating that

---

306 Ibid, [33].
307 Ibid, [38] quoting White J, the trial judge.
308 Phillips was a serial offender who was later convicted of other counts of sexual assault while awaiting the outcome of his High Court appeal: D Hamer, ‘Similar Fact Reasoning in Phillips: Artificial, Disjointed and Pernicious’ (2007) 30 University of New South Wales Law Journal 609, 610.
309 Phillips v The Queen (2006) 225 CLR 303, [46].
Phillips may be applied to prevent joint trials being held in relation to multiple allegations against the same defendant.\(^{311}\)

Consultation Paper

27.252 The Consultation Paper asked what impact Phillips v The Queen has had on the prosecution of sexual assaults where there are multiple complaints against the same defendant and whether there is a need to introduce reforms to overturn the decision.\(^{312}\)

27.253 Some stakeholders considered that reform should address the implications of the decision in Phillips.\(^{313}\) The Women’s Legal Service Queensland stated that, at least in Queensland, the decision had made it more difficult to conduct joint trials.\(^{314}\) NASASV supported ‘overturning the rulings’ in Phillips. NASASV emphasised the impact of Phillips in the family violence context, noting that where ‘victims are from the one family the impact of multiple trials is enormous’ and can adversely affect the complainants’ ‘motivation and determination to continue through the whole process’.\(^{315}\)

27.254 Cossins put forward a detailed case for legislative reform to address the impact of the decision in Phillips.\(^{316}\) She submitted that, without such reform, the effect of the Commissions’ proposal to encourage more joint trials where there are multiple complainants, by introducing a presumption of joint trial,\(^{317}\) would be undermined.

27.255 Cossins suggested that evidence law should recognise that multiple complaints of sexual assault can be ‘corroborative in nature’ where there is a ‘sufficient connection in the circumstances associated with the complaints’.\(^{318}\) The provision would apply to sexual assault proceedings if two or more counts charging sexual offences involving different complainants are joined in the same indictment. It would state that, in a joint trial involving two or more counts, the evidence of one complainant about the alleged sexual acts and behaviour of the defendant or the circumstances giving rise to the sexual acts, is admissible as corroborative evidence in relation to the issue of lack of consent by another complainant, if there is a ‘sufficient relationship’—in terms of the circumstances and events giving rise to the offences, between the evidence of the first and second complainants.\(^{319}\)

---

312 Consultation Paper Questions 17–8, 17–9.
318 A Cossins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010. The application of any striking similarities test to such evidence would also be excluded.
319 These circumstances would include but not be limited to: (i) the proximity in time of the sexual acts; (ii) the number of occurrences of the sexual acts; (iii) the behaviour accompanying the sexual acts, including evidence of the use of intoxicating substances, pornography, force, violence or threats of force or violence; and (iv) the social context surrounding or relating to the sexual acts: Ibid.
Commissions’ views

27.256 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions observed that the decision in Phillips has also been the subject of strong academic criticism. The most stringent criticism relates to use of relevance in the High Court’s reasoning in Phillips.

27.257 Associate Professor Jeremy Gans states, for example, that while the Court could have overturned the convictions on the basis of rules relating to the admissibility of propensity or similar fact evidence, the Court, ‘having misunderstood the reasoning left to the jury, instead framed its rejection of the cross-admissibility of the multiple complaints in terms of relevance’. That is, the Court held that ‘evidence that five complainants did not consent could not rationally affect the assessment of the probability that the sixth complainant did not consent’. However, it may be argued that the jury was actually being asked to consider the improbability that all six complainants lied when they said they did not consent to the defendant’s sexual acts—quite a different premise.

27.258 David Hamer has also questioned the logic of the High Court’s decision in Phillips, stating that:

The relevance of such evidence is clear. The fact that the defendant forced other victims to have non-consensual sex with him tends to show he has a propensity for forcing women to have non-consensual sex with him, and it increases the probability that the defendant forced the complaining party to non-consensual sex with him.

27.259 The fact that the High Court made its ruling on the relevance of propensity or similar fact evidence means the case is applicable in all jurisdictions because all retain a requirement of relevance as the threshold test for admissibility.

27.260 The Commissions recognise that there are valid concerns about the effect of this aspect of the decision in Phillips on the conduct of sexual assault proceedings, including those involving family violence. However, the practical implications of Phillips, and for the prospects of joint trials in particular, remain unclear. The TLRI, in its critique of the decision, stated that:

it is not inevitable that the High Court’s ruling on consent will apply. In particular, the Institute considers that the decision’s potentially restrictive impact on the issue of consent can be avoided by approaching the evidence of multiple complainants as

---

322 Ibid, 231.
tendency evidence that reveals the accused’s tendency to have sexual intercourse without consent. This is relevant to the circumstances of the sexual intercourse.324

27.261 A recent Western Australian Court of Appeal decision, Owen JA stated that he did ‘not read anything said in Phillips as meaning that where consent is in issue propensity evidence that might bear on the presence or absence of consent must necessarily be inadmissible’.325

27.262 Any proposed legislative solution to overturn the decision would be complex and risk introducing new uncertainties—as is the case with the solution proposed by Cossins and its new test of ‘sufficient relationship’. The Commissions therefore do not make any recommendation in this regard.

Relationship evidence

27.263 If there is only one complainant, the prosecution may want to lead evidence from other witnesses about the defendant’s criminal sexual behaviour with them, or it may wish to adduce relationship evidence to explain the nature of the relationship between the complainant and the defendant, as well as the context in which the sexual assault occurred.

27.264 Evidence of uncharged acts of sexual misconduct is commonly referred to as ‘relationship’, ‘context’ or ‘background’ evidence and is a type of circumstantial evidence. While relationship evidence describes all conduct ‘of a sexual kind’ which is often referred to as ‘uncharged acts’, it also includes grooming behaviours that do not amount to an offence, such as the purchase of gifts and non-sexual touching.326

27.265 Relationship evidence forms part of the background against which the complainant’s and the defendant’s evidence are assessed.327 In a sexual assault trial, relationship evidence may be relevant for a number of different reasons including to: provide a context in, or background against, which to understand the charges laid against the defendant; explain why the complainant complied with the sexual demands of the defendant without surprise; explain why the complainant failed promptly to complain; and explain the defendant’s confidence in committing the sexual acts or his control over the complainant.328

27.266 Where such evidence is admissible, it ‘cannot be used by the jury to reason that, if the accused committed the uncharged acts, he or she is more likely to have committed the charged acts’.329 However, the distinction between relationship evidence

---

324 Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Evidence Act 2001 Sections 97, 98 & 101 and Hoch’s Case: Admissibility of Tendency and Coincidence Evidence in Sexual Assault Cases with Multiple Complainants, Issues Paper 15 (2009), 54.
325 Stubley v Western Australia [2010] WASCA, [2].
327 B v The Queen (1992) 175 CLR 599, 610 (sexual offences against defendant’s daughter).
328 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 235. See, eg, R v Vonars [1999] 3 VR.
27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings and tendency evidence has been described as ‘somewhat artificial’ since evidence which shows the ‘existence of a sexual relationship must surely tend to show that the accused [has a tendency] to do the sort of things the subject of the charge’.

Nonetheless, many cases have held that evidence of uncharged sexual behaviour between a complainant and an accused is admissible. Relationship evidence has a long history of being admitted in all types of criminal trials.

In the last decade, however, the admissibility of relationship evidence has had a conflicted history with ‘sharp divisions’ in the High Court about when and for what purposes such evidence should be admissible. This division saw a majority attempt to restrict the admission of such evidence at common law in Gipp v The Queen. This case resulted in considerable uncertainty about the test that should be applied to admit relationship evidence.

Case law

It is possible that this uncertainty has been resolved by the High Court decision in HML v The Queen (HML). HML only applies to cases of child sexual assault, where lack of consent is not one of the issues to be decided and in jurisdictions that have not overturned the ‘no rational view of the evidence’ test.

---

330 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 236.

333 The reception of ‘this type of evidence has come to be routine and unsurprising’: HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [271]–[272].

334 Ibid, [328].

335 Gaudron J considered that the admissibility of propensity evidence in the form of past criminal conduct (including relationship evidence) was only warranted in a few specified situations, eg, where the defence raised specific issues such as evidence of good character or lack of surprise or failure to complain on the part of the complainant: Gipp v The Queen (1998) 194 CLR 106, 112. Callinan J stated that if such evidence is to be admitted ‘it must owe its admissibility to some, quite specific, other purpose, including eg, in an appropriate case, proof of a guilty passion, intention, or propensity, or opportunity, or motive’: Gipp v The Queen (1998) 194 CLR 106, [182]. See also Tully v The Queen (2006) 230 CLR 234, [144]–[145]. Kirby J stated that relationship evidence should only be ‘admissible if its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect’: Gipp v The Queen (1998) 194 CLR 106, [141].

336 HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [163]. This uncertainty has been evident, eg, in the different approaches taken by the Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia in R v Nieterink (1999) 76 SASR 56 and the Court of Appeal of Victoria decision in R v Vonarx [1999] 3 VR.

337 Although ‘the six different judgments in the case may continue to confound rather than enlighten the law on relationship evidence’: A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 237.

338 HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [102].

339 Ibid, [54]. The case does not apply to the admission of relationship evidence under the uniform Evidence Acts, nor under Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 31A. The Pfennig test still applies in Queensland, SA and the NT.
The issues in HML, a case involving sexual abuse by a father of his daughter, included when and in what circumstances evidence of uncharged acts of sexual misconduct is admissible in a child sexual assault trial and what test applies to its admission. All seven judges accepted that there are important reasons why evidence of uncharged acts of sexual misconduct by the defendant ought to be admissible in child sexual assault trials. The public policy reasons recognised for permitting the child to give evidence of uncharged acts included:

- ‘multiple and repeated incidents over a period of time’ are typical of the sexual abuse of children (and this is particularly so in the context of sexual assault perpetrated by family members);
- the impracticality or impossibility of being able to charge every multiple incident of sexual abuse;
- the importance of legal procedure to facilitate the giving of a ‘fair and coherent account’ by the complainant of what has occurred;
- the exclusion of evidence of uncharged acts would mean that the complainant’s evidence of the charged acts of sexual misconduct would be viewed in isolation and sometimes as if the complainant was sexually abused ‘out of the blue’;
- the artificiality of attempting to ‘quarantine the charged acts’ from other incidents;
- the seriousness of child sexual assault as a crime and its historical under-enforcement which ought not to be frustrated by ‘unjustifiably restrictive court procedures’; and
- because today’s juries are ‘better educated and more literate’, there is less need for restrictive rules for excluding relevant but prejudicial evidence.

In HML, all seven judges agreed that uncharged acts of sexual misconduct are likely to be relevant to the facts in issue in a child sexual assault trial, that is, whether the defendant committed the sexual acts that constitute the charges. However, the relevance test was not considered to be a sufficient control on the admissibility of relationship evidence by Gummow, Kirby and Hayne JJ, all of whom

---

341 HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [56].

342 This includes ‘the social interest in convicting those guilty of crimes against small children which are both grave and difficult to prove’: Ibid, [331].

343 For example, Hayne J stated that ‘[p]roving that the accused not only had that sexual interest but had given expression to that interest by those acts, made it more probable that he had committed the charged acts’: Ibid, [103]. As discussed above, the evidence may also be relevant on other grounds, such as to explain the complainant’s delay in complaint, although some of those reasons may only be directly relevant to the credibility of the complainant: HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [426].
agreed that, in addition to relevance, evidence of uncharged acts should not be admissible unless the Pfennig test is satisfied.\(^{344}\)

27.272 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee has noted that ‘lower courts may not find it all that easy to decide whether to apply the approach of Gummow, Kirby and Hayne JJ, or the approach of the other four judges’,\(^{345}\) who either did not agree that the Pfennig test applied to relationship evidence at all,\(^{346}\) or did not think the Pfennig test applied to the relationship evidence in the cases at hand, even though there may be other situations in which it would apply.\(^{347}\)

27.273 In HML, Kiefel J considered that only where relationship evidence is being tendered for its tendency purpose should the Pfennig test be applied. This is the same approach that is taken in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions where the test under s 101(2) does not apply to relationship evidence which is tendered for a non-tendency purpose.\(^{348}\)

Reform options

27.274 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee proposed that, because of the different and inconsistent approaches taken by the judges in HML to the admissibility of relationship evidence, the Pfennig test at common law should be abolished in relation to the admissibility of relationship evidence.\(^{349}\) This would bring common law jurisdictions in line with those that do not use the test (or use the balancing test under s 101 of the uniform Evidence Acts) to admit relationship evidence—that is, Western Australia and the uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions.

---

\(^{344}\) HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [359] (Kirby J); [106] (Hayne J with whom Gummow J agreed). The purpose for adopting the Pfennig test is to place an extra control over ‘the discreditable facts’ that are admitted against an accused. Without such a control any relevant discreditable facts would be able to be tendered against an accused simply because they throw some light on the ‘context’ of the offences: HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [80]. Nonetheless, Hayne J considered that evidence of uncharged acts would usually satisfy the Pfennig test because ‘there will usually be no reasonable view of the evidence … other than as supporting an inference that the accused is guilty of the offence charged’: HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [107]. Although Hayne J recognised the disadvantage to the defendant by admitting such evidence, His Honour considered that ‘its admission would work no prejudice to the accused over and above what the evidence establishes’: HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [110].

\(^{345}\) A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 240.

\(^{346}\) HML v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334, [455] (Crennan J); [511]–[512] (Kiefel J).

\(^{347}\) See Ibid, [27] (Gleeson CJ); [264] (Heydon J).

\(^{348}\) Ibid, [503], [505]. In ALRC Report 102 the ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC considered whether the balancing test under s 101(2) of the uniform Evidence Acts should be extended to apply to any evidence tendered against a defendant which discloses disreputable conduct although tendered for a non-tendency or non-coincidence purpose—such as relationship evidence: see Australian Law Reform Commission, New South Wales Law Reform Commission and Victorian Law Reform Commission, Uniform Evidence Law, Report 102, NSWLRC Report 112, VLRC FR (2005), [11.76]–[11.93]. The Commissions concluded that the case had not been made out for change, which would be unlikely to result in different outcomes where questions arise as to the admissibility of evidence relevant for tendency or coincidence purposes and for other purposes.

Consultation Paper

27.275 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether the Pfennig test should be applied to determine the admissibility of relationship evidence at common law.350 Few stakeholders responded to this question.351 The Public Defenders Office NSW confirmed that the Pfennig test is not applied to relationship evidence.352

27.276 Cossins provided a detailed analysis of HML and associated law and submitted that the application of the Pfennig test to relationship evidence ‘is to interpose an extra test of relevance which is both illogical and unnecessary’. Cossins submitted that a specific provision that abrogates the Pfennig test should be enacted ‘to ensure that relationship evidence is admissible if it passes the relevance test, with appropriate warnings to be given to the jury about how they may use the evidence’. In her view, such a provision would ensure that relationship evidence at common law ‘is not subject to the rule in Pfennig where the evidence is tendered for a non-tendency purpose in a child sexual assault trial’.353

Commissions’ views

27.277 In the Commissions’ view, the ‘no rational view of the evidence’ (Pfennig) test should not apply to relationship evidence. As discussed above, in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions, the Pfennig test does not apply, even to tendency and coincidence evidence. There is no need for further provisions to deal specifically with relationship evidence, as defined in this discussion, beyond the general relevance test and other rules set out in the uniform Evidence Acts.

27.278 Reform directed to the admissibility of relationship evidence in common law evidence jurisdictions would be problematic given the uncertainty over the meaning and practical effect of the decision in HML. Complex legislative drafting would be required to remove doubt about the possible application of the test to relationship evidence in Queensland, South Australia and the Northern Territory. The reform would require the development of a statutory definition of relationship evidence and deal with the purposes for which the evidence may be used, directions to the jury and so on.354

27.279 The Commissions do not consider it would be appropriate, in the context of this Inquiry, to recommend reforms to evidence law in common law evidence jurisdictions directed to relationship evidence. Rather, the Commissions consider it is preferable that all Australian jurisdictions join the uniform Evidence Acts scheme.

350 Consultation Paper, Question 18–9.
351 The Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission responded in the affirmative: Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.
352 Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
354 See, eg, A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee.
Evidence of recent and delayed complaint

27.280 Complaint evidence is a type of prior consistent statement which is given by a witness or the complainant about when the complainant made their first report of sexual assault. The common law recent complaint rule only allows this type of evidence to be admissible if the complaint was made at the first reasonable opportunity after the alleged sexual assault. Further, it is only admissible for credibility purposes, that is, to bolster the credit of the complainant. At common law, evidence of recent complaint cannot be used to prove the facts in issue—that is, whether or not the complainant consented or the defendant committed the alleged sexual conduct.

27.281 By the beginning of the eighteenth century, a failure to complain immediately had evolved into a presumption of fabrication on the part of the rape complainant. Since the rule was based on ‘the belief that a rape complainant could only be believed if she could demonstrate she had publicly denounced the perpetrator, rape complainants became a special category of witness whose credibility could be boosted by evidence of recent complaint’.

27.282 The common law’s approach to recent complaint evidence meant that evidence of delayed complaint was also considered to be relevant to credibility but for a different purpose—to undermine the complainant’s credibility. Evidence of delayed complaint is commonly used by defence counsel to argue that a complainant has falsely accused the defendant of sexual assault. This may be especially likely in a family violence context where, for example, there has been sexual abuse of a family member over a number of years.

Uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions

Recent complaint

27.283 The recent complaint rule is no longer applicable in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions. In Papakosmas v The Queen, the High Court held that recent complaint evidence is relevant to the facts in issue in a sexual assault trial, for example, whether the complainant consented to have intercourse with the appellant. In a child sexual assault trial, evidence of recent complaint is relevant to whether the defendant committed the act, since consent is not a fact in issue.

27.284 Evidence of a complainant’s recent complaint is caught by the exclusionary hearsay rule under s 59 of the uniform Evidence Acts. Evidence of the complaint may nevertheless be admissible under the first-hand hearsay exception, where the complainant is available to give evidence, and the ‘fresh in the memory’ test is satisfied. Section 66(2) of the uniform Evidence Acts states:

357 A Cousins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 141.

358 Papakosmas v The Queen (1999) 196 CLR 297, 309.

(2) If a person has been or is to be called to give evidence, the hearsay rule does not apply to evidence of the representation that is given by:

(a) that person; or

(b) a person who saw, heard or otherwise perceived the representation being made;

if, when the representation was made, the occurrence of the asserted fact was fresh in the memory of the person who made the representation (emphasis added).

27.285 The effect of s 66(2) was confirmed in Papakosmas v The Queen, in which evidence of recent complaint was held to be relevant to the issue of consent and to satisfy s 66(2).

Delayed complaint

27.286 In Graham v The Queen, the High Court was required to consider the scope of the ‘fresh in the memory’ test under s 66(2). Instead of evidence of recent complaint, a witness had given evidence about the complainant’s disclosures made six years after the alleged sexual assault. The High Court held that the witness’ evidence was not admissible under s 66(2) because the complainant had not told her friend she was sexually abused by her father when the events were fresh in her memory. The High Court interpreted the word, ‘fresh’ to mean ‘recent’ or ‘immediate’ so that the lapse of time ‘will very likely be measured in hours or days, not, as was the case here, in years’.

27.287 In ALRC 102, the ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC recommended retention of the concept of ‘fresh in the memory’ under s 66(2) with an extension of the matters to be taken into account in determining what is ‘fresh in the memory’ to address the restrictive interpretation in Graham v The Queen. The Commissions concluded that ‘understanding of memory processes has progressed significantly’ since the uniform Evidence Acts were first introduced and ‘the law should reflect that knowledge’.

359 The complainant is the person who made the previous representation and is available to give evidence about the asserted fact, the asserted fact being a fact that a person (who made a previous representation) intended to assert by the representation: s 59. In a sexual assault trial, the complainant is the Crown’s chief witness who, if competent, is available to give evidence.

360 Three of the complainants’ work colleagues were able to give evidence not only of the complainant’s crying and distressed state after emerging from the ladies’ toilets but also of her statements to them that ‘Papakosmas raped me’. This particular statement was held to fall within s 66(2) because the complainant had informed her work colleagues about being sexually assaulted by the accused almost immediately after the events in question so that the ‘fresh in the memory’ requirement was satisfied: Papakosmas v The Queen (1999) 196 CLR 297, 300–301.

362 Australian Law Reform Commission, New South Wales Law Reform Commission and Victorian Law Reform Commission, Uniform Evidence Law, Report 102, NSWLRC Report 112, VLRC FR (2005), 253. ALRC Report 102 noted research showing that ‘while focusing primarily on the lapse of time between an event and the making of a representation about it might be justifiable in relation to memory of 27.288 ALRC 102 recommended that a new sub-section should be inserted into s 66.363 This recommendation was subsequently enacted, with some re-wording, as s 66(2A):

(2A) In determining whether the occurrence of the asserted fact was fresh in the memory of a person, the court may take into account all matters that it considers are relevant to the question, including:

(a) the nature of the event concerned, and
(b) the age and health of the person, and
(c) the period of time between the occurrence of the asserted fact and the making of the representation.364

Other modifications to the common law

27.289 Queensland, Western Australia and South Australia have enacted provisions that address some of the problems with the recent complaint rule at common law.365 Queensland has enacted a specific provision that applies to the admission of out-of-court statements in sexual assault trials. Section 4A(2) of the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) states:

Evidence of how and when any preliminary complaint was made by the complainant about the alleged commission of the offence by the defendant is admissible in evidence, regardless of when the preliminary complaint was made.

27.290 This provision does not allow evidence of the content of the statement to be admissible, only evidence of how and when the statement was made—although it does allow this evidence to be admitted regardless of when the complaint was made. Admissibility is not dependent on the person being available for cross-examination.

27.291 However, evidence of a preliminary complaint admitted under s 4A(2) is still only relevant to the complainant’s credibility so that juries in Queensland will be instructed that they cannot use the evidence as proof of the facts in issue, such as lack
This means that Queensland has not abolished the common law recent complaint rule.

In Western Australia, a child-specific modification to the law on hearsay evidence was enacted in 1992. Under s 106H of the Evidence Act 1906 (WA), the admissibility of out-of-court statements is left to the discretion of the judge, and is dependent on the child being available for cross-examination. The aim of the provision is to allow any statement made by a child to another person to be admissible in certain criminal trials, including child sexual assault trials.

In South Australia, a child-specific hearsay exception was enacted, after the 2006 Chapman review of rape and sexual assault laws. A substituted s 34CA of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) was intended ‘to facilitate the proof of sexual offences against children’. The provision abolishes the recent complaint rule because out-of-court statements admitted under this provision can be used to prove the truth of the facts asserted.

Evidence of delayed complaint

Hearsay evidence has been considered unreliable because the maker of the statement could not be cross-examined about its veracity. The position at common law is that hearsay evidence of delayed complaint will not be admissible, unless this has been amended by specific legislation.

The hearsay exception under s 66(2) of the uniform Evidence Acts overcomes this problem because the maker of the statement (the complainant) is available to give evidence and to be cross-examined about the complaint as long as he or she is competent to give evidence. The relevance of evidence of delayed complaint ‘is not to compete with the quality of the complainant’s evidence but to illustrate the context in which she made her disclosure and the reasons for any delay’.

The psychological literature shows that delay is the most common characteristic of both child and adult sexual assault. Significantly in the context of this Inquiry, the ‘predictors associated with delayed disclosure’ reveal differences in reporting patterns depending upon the victim’s relationship with the abuser.

---

366 R v RH [2005] 1 Qd R; R v GS [2005] QCA.
367 This provision was enacted to implement the recommendations of the Western Australian Law Reform Commission, Report on Evidence of Children and Other Vulnerable Witnesses (1991). See also RPM v The Queen [2004] WASCA, [46].
370 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 34CA(3).
371 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 147.
372 For a review of this literature see Ibid, 86–97; D Lievore, Non-Reporting and Hidden Recording of Sexual Assault: An International Review (2003), prepared for the Commonwealth Office of the Status of Women.
373 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 89.
example, where the victim and defendant are related, research suggests there is a longer delay in complaint. 374 Since complainants are routinely cross-examined by defence counsel about delays in complaint in ways that suggest fabrication, ‘it is likely that evidence about a complainant’s first complaint would answer the type of questions that jurors can be expected to ask themselves’. 375

27.297 In uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions, s 66(2) will, in some cases, permit the admission of evidence of delayed complaint where the occurrence of the events was ‘fresh in the memory’ of the complainant. In other cases, the ‘fresh in the memory’ requirements will be a barrier to admissibility.

27.298 Evidence of delayed complaint may also be admissible under s 108 of the uniform Evidence Acts. The relevant part of this exception to the credibility rule 376 provides that the credibility rule does not apply to evidence of a prior consistent statement of a witness if evidence of a prior inconsistent statement of the witness has been admitted; or there are suggestions that evidence given by the witness has been fabricated or reconstructed or is the result of a suggestion. 377 That is, where delay in complaint is used to impugn the credibility of the complainant, s 108 can be used to admit evidence about the complaint including, for example, the reasons for the delay in complaint and the surrounding circumstances.

Problems with the operation of s 66

27.299 Some commentators have identified the operation of s 66 of the uniform Evidence Acts as a problem in relation to evidence of delayed complaint. This view has been summarised by the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee as follows:

Trial and appellate judges may consider that a complainant’s representation is unreliable because of their young age at the time it was made, or because too much time has elapsed between the events in question and the preliminary complaint. Because s 66(2A) does not actually change the ‘recent’ or ‘immediate’ requirement imposed by Graham’s case it is unlikely that the amendment will have the effect of admitting evidence of delayed complaint, as a matter of course. 378

27.300 One option to avoid the ‘fresh in the memory’ requirement would be to adopt the Queensland approach to evidence of delayed complaint. This would ensure that evidence of the content of, and the circumstances surrounding, a sexual assault complaint was admissible, regardless of the length of time between the complaint and the alleged sexual abuse. The Queensland approach recognises that the law has considered the time lapse between the assault and the making of a complaint as ‘evidence of truthfulness and fabrication, despite the fact that delay in complaint has been consistently found to be the most typical feature’ of sexual assault. 379

374 For example, see analysis in Ibid, 86–90.
375 Ibid, 148.
376 The rule that credibility evidence about a witness is not admissible: Uniform Evidence Acts, s 102.
377 Ibid s 108.
378 A Cousins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 150.
379 Ibid, 150.
27.301 Questions have been raised about whether ‘courts and judges are the appropriate forum and personnel to be making … assessments’ about the quality of a witness’ memory.\textsuperscript{380} If there are issues of reliability, options for reform could be to ensure that a complainant is available to be cross-examined about their out-of-court statements and that courts are able to give appropriate warnings to the jury.

Submissions and consultation

27.302 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether federal, state and territory legislation should provide that, where complainants in sexual assault proceedings are called to give evidence, the hearsay rule does not apply to evidence of a preliminary complaint, regardless of when the preliminary complaint was made.\textsuperscript{381}

27.303 Cossins submitted that because of ‘the different approaches in WA, Queensland, SA, Victoria and the [uniform Evidence Acts] to out-of-court disclosures made by a child about being sexually abused, there is a need to bring consistency to this area of evidence law’.\textsuperscript{382}

27.304 Cossins recommended that new provisions be inserted into s 66 of the uniform Evidence Acts providing that, if a person is a complainant in a child sexual assault trial and has been or is to be called to give evidence, the hearsay rule does not apply to evidence of a preliminary complaint given by that person or a person who saw, heard or otherwise perceived the preliminary complaint being made regardless of when the preliminary complaint was made.\textsuperscript{383} Common law evidence jurisdictions should, in her view, enact a provision based on that in Queensland,\textsuperscript{384} with modifications to overcome present limitations regarding the admissibility of evidence of a child’s complaint of sexual abuse.\textsuperscript{385}

27.305 A number of other stakeholders agreed that evidence of preliminary complaint should be more readily admissible.\textsuperscript{386} The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service submitted that the hearsay rule should not apply to evidence of a preliminary complaint, regardless of when the preliminary complaint was made. The NSW ODPP stated:

> We are supportive of complaint evidence being admitted in the Crown case as part of the narrative to put the complainant’s actions in context, in line with the Queensland

\textsuperscript{380} Ibid, 151.
\textsuperscript{381} Consultation Paper, Question 18–10.
\textsuperscript{382} A Cossins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{383} A preliminary complaint would be defined as any complaint other than the complainant’s first formal witness statement to a police officer or other qualified person given in relation to, or in anticipation of, criminal proceedings in relation to the alleged offence: Ibid.
\textsuperscript{384} Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4A.
\textsuperscript{385} A Cossins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010.
27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings

provision, in all cases. In some cases, depending on the facts it may still be appropriate to admit the evidence as hearsay.387

27.306 Other stakeholders opposed any special exception to the general rules of evidence applicable to preliminary complaints in sexual assault proceedings.388 The Law Council agreed that ‘a general proposition that children often delay in making complaint does not make evidence of the complaint inherently more reliable than in-court evidence, the usual justification for exceptions to the hearsay rule’.389 National Legal Aid submitted that allowing evidence of a disclosure to be admitted ‘as truth of the substance of that disclosure, in circumstances where the disclosure is lacking in detail and was made when the accuracy of the complainant’s recollection may already have been affected by the passage of time, would be improperly prejudicial to an accused’.390

Commissions’ views

27.307 The Commission is not convinced that a strong enough case has been made for reform of s 66 of the uniform Evidence Acts to create an exception for the evidence of child or other complainants in sexual assault proceedings. The possibility of such a reform was considered, but not pursued, by the ALRC, the NSWLRC and VLRC in their 2005 report reviewing uniform evidence law.391

27.308 It has been argued that the ‘fresh in the memory’ requirement under s 66 can mean that, for example, when a jury warning is given regarding the forensic disadvantage suffered by the defendant as a result of a delay in complaint, evidence of when the complaint was made, what was said and the reasons for delay may be ‘technically inadmissible in examination-in-chief’.392

27.309 This can mean that evidence about the delay is left to the defence to raise during cross-examination, ‘leaving the jury with an inaccurate impression about the reasons for the complainant’s delayed disclosure and, unless addressed during re-examination, an incomplete account of why, when and how the complainant made her first complaint’.393

27.310 One option to address these concerns would be for legislation to provide that, where complainants in sexual assault trials are called to give evidence, the hearsay rule does not apply to evidence of a preliminary complaint, regardless of when the preliminary complaint was made. The mechanism for reform would be amendment of s 66 of the uniform Evidence Acts in those jurisdictions. In other jurisdictions, reforms could be enacted in criminal procedure legislation relating to sexual offences.

27.311 Such a reform may be criticised, however, for attempting to amend an exception to the hearsay rule to address concerns primarily about attacks on the credibility of complainants in sexual assault cases. The Consultation Paper noted that evidence of a long delayed complaint is not inherently more reliable than in-court evidence (the usual justification for exceptions to hearsay rule).\(^{394}\) It can be seen as wrong in principle to retain s 66 generally, while creating a special exception for complainants in sexual assault proceedings.

27.312 Cossins submitted that this objection to reform of s 66 fails to ‘understand the importance and relevance of evidence of a child’s preliminary or first complaint’.\(^{395}\) In her view, it is necessary to recognise the value judgments used when assessing the relevance of such evidence. This value judgment should be:

> informed by the knowledge that children typically delay disclosure of sexual abuse [which] means that evidence of a child’s delayed disclosure, together with the circumstances in which it was made and the trigger for the disclosure (for example, [disclosure] to the child’s mother when a child does not want to be baby-sat by the offender) satisfies the relevance test under s 55 of the [uniform Evidence Acts] because it rationally affects the assessment of the probability of the existence of a fact in issue, namely whether the accused committed the alleged sexual abuse.\(^{396}\)

27.313 On the other hand, the hearsay rule is not concerned with the relevance of evidence, but with its reliability according to the proposition that the ‘best evidence available’ to a party should be received. The concept of ‘best available evidence’ can be seen to involve two elements—the quality of the evidence and its availability. Reasons to do with the quality of evidence led to a distinction being drawn between statements made while relevant events were ‘fresh in the memory’ and statements which were not.\(^{397}\)

27.314 Another factor dictating against a specific recommendation for reform is that there may not have been enough time to establish whether s 66(2A) of the uniform Evidence Acts has had any impact on the admission of evidence of delayed complaint.\(^{398}\) This amendment to the uniform Evidence Acts was intended, in part, to address ‘special difficulties’ with the ‘fresh in the memory’ criterion in sexual offence cases\(^{399}\) and only came into operation in January 2009.

\(^{394}\) Consultation Paper, [18.223].
\(^{395}\) A Cossins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010.
\(^{396}\) Ibid.
27.315 The ALRC, VLRC and NSWLRC, in ALRC 102, recommended that in order to ensure the ‘maintenance of harmonisation over time and the general effectiveness of the uniform Evidence Acts’, Australian governments should consider initiating a joint review of the uniform Evidence Acts within 10 years from the tabling of the Report. This would be an appropriate time to review the operation of s 66(2A).

400 Ibid, Rec 2–3.
28. Other Trial Processes

Contents

Introduction 1309
Jury warnings 1309
Warnings about unreliable evidence and corroboration 1311
  Statutory response to the corroboration component 1312
  Statutory response to the reliability component 1312
Murray warning 1313
Warnings about delay in complaint 1316
Longman warning 1317
  Uniform Evidence Acts approach 1319
  Options for reform 1321
Crofts warning 1324
  Options for reform 1327
Cross-examination 1334
  Cross-examination of children and vulnerable witnesses 1334
  Unrepresented defendants 1337
Other aspects of giving evidence 1343
Evidence on re-trial or appeal 1344

Introduction

28.1 This chapter deals with the giving of jury warnings, the cross-examination of complainants and other witnesses in sexual assault proceedings and other aspects of giving evidence.

28.2 As noted in the preceding chapter, these issues have been selected because the application of law in these areas has a direct and significant impact on the experiences in the criminal justice system of women and children who have suffered sexual assault including in a family violence context—the focus of the Commissions’ Terms of Reference.

Jury warnings

28.3 In jury trials, the judge directs the jury as to the legal rules that it must apply to the evidence, including any legal limits on the use it may make of the evidence. This task also encompasses a responsibility to give an appropriate warning or caution where acting upon particular evidence involves potential ‘dangers’.

28.4 Where a warning is required, this is usually in respect of legal matters about which the court is said to have ‘special experience’ not possessed by members of the jury. The duty of a trial judge to give appropriate and adequate warnings stems from the overriding duty to ensure a fair trial. The failure to give an appropriate jury warning may lead to a miscarriage of justice.¹

28.5 Judges are required to give a number of specific, and sometimes quite complex, jury directions in criminal trials. These reflect both common law and statutory developments in the criminal law.²

28.6 In this Inquiry, the ALRC and New South Wales Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC) only consider warnings about unreliable evidence and corroboration, and warnings about delay in complaint, in the context of sexual assault proceedings.

28.7 The Tasmania Law Reform Institute (TLRI) delivered a report on jury warnings in sexual offences cases relating to delay in complaint in 2006.³ In 2009 the Victorian and Queensland law reform commissions each released completed reviews of directions and warnings given by judges to juries in criminal trials.⁴ The NSWLRC’s inquiry into jury directions is ongoing.⁵

28.8 The purpose of jury warnings in the context of sexual assault has changed over time. Historically, they served to protect the accused against an unfair conviction. Increasingly, however, they serve to ‘counter myths about sexual assault and to ensure that complainants, as well as people charged with sexual offences, are treated fairly’.⁶

28.9 In a sexual assault trial, numerous complex directions and warnings ‘which focus on the unique characteristics of sexual assault such as delay, one witness to the offence and a lack of corroborating evidence’ may be required.⁷ The duties of the trial judge to direct the jury in a manner which is clear, intelligible, relevant, brief and insulated from appeal, and the duty of jurors to comprehend and apply each direction are problematic to discharge.⁸

⁷ A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 67.
⁸ For a summary of both the common law and uniform Evidence Act directions, which highlights the complexity of a trial judge’s task see, R v BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241, 250–251.
28. Other Trial Processes

28.10 The Commissions recognise that community knowledge about sexual assault, especially in the family violence context, is limited and susceptible to influence by inaccurate misconceptions and myths.9 As members of the judiciary and jury are also members of the community, it stands to reason that they are vulnerable to be influenced by inaccurate understandings in making an assessment of a sexual assault case.10 Jury directions go some way in providing jury members with accurate, objective information on sexual assault, and may assist in counteracting any misperceptions or adherence to rape myths in jury members or members of the judiciary.11

Warnings about unreliable evidence and corroboration

28.11 Historically, sexual assault complainants12 and children13 were considered by the common law, as classes of witness, to be inherently unreliable.14 Their unreliability was considered a matter capable of affecting the evaluation of the evidence and about which judges had special knowledge or experience beyond the jury’s appreciation.15

28.12 For this reason, the common law required corroboration warnings to be given by trial judges to juries in respect of the evidence of both sexual assault complainants and child witnesses. The common law corroboration warning has two components:

- the corroboration component—the caution that, as it is dangerous to convict on a child or sexual assault complainant’s ‘uncorroborated’ evidence, it was necessary to have corroborating evidence; and

- the reliability component—the caution that, as children and sexual assault complainants as classes of witness are unreliable, the evidence of a particular child or complainant had to be treated with care.16

28.13 Corroboration warnings about the potential unreliability of categories of witnesses are now recognised as discriminatory and based on prejudice rather than empirical evidence.17

---

9 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission FV 222, 2 July 2010.
10 Ibid.
11 Ibid.
12 Kelleher v The Queen (1974) 131 CLR 534.
13 Hargan v The King (1919) 27 CLR 13.
14 For example, Brennan J in Bromley v The Queen (1989) 161 CLR 315 noted: ‘The courts have had experience of the reasons why … [children and sexual assault complainants] may give untruthful evidence wider than the experience of the general public, and the courts have a sharpened awareness of the danger of acting on the uncorroborated evidence of such witnesses’: 324. See also JJ B v The Queen (2006) 161 A Crim R 187; R v TN (2005) 153 A Crim R 129, [69].
17 For a review of the literature on suggestibility studies and the reliability of children’s evidence, see A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 114–124 and the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration, Bench Book for Children Giving Evidence in Australian Courts (2009), 28–40.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

Statutory response to the corroboration component

28.14 All Australian jurisdictions have enacted legislation that abolishes the requirement that a judge warn the jury that it is dangerous to act on uncorroborated evidence. These provisions do not, however, prohibit a warning that it would be dangerous to convict on uncorroborated evidence. Under such legislation, trial judges retain their general powers and obligations to give appropriate warnings ‘necessary to avoid the perceptible risk of miscarriage of justice arising from the circumstances of the case’.

28.15 The South Australian and the Northern Territory (NT) provisions deal exclusively with the uncorroborated evidence of child witnesses, whereas the provisions in other jurisdictions have general application to uncorroborated evidence.

28.16 These statutory responses to the common law requirement to give a corroboration warning recognise that the typical sexual assault offence takes place in private, without other witnesses. While corroboration for an assault may exist by way of ‘an admission, DNA evidence, medical evidence, recent complaint, or tendency evidence … for the most part, particularly in child sexual assault matters, such evidence may be rare’.

Statutory response to the reliability component

28.17 In all Australian jurisdictions, except Queensland, a judge is prohibited from warning or suggesting to the jury that children as a class are unreliable witnesses. This statutory response addresses the misconception that the evidence of children is inherently less reliable than that of adults.

28.18 New South Wales (NSW), Victoria, the ACT and the NT have enacted legislation pursuant to which a judge must not warn, or suggest in any way to, the jury that it is unsafe to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of a complainant because the law regards complainants as an unreliable class of witness. These provisions mirror the 18 Conway v The Queen (2002) 209 CLR 203, [53].

---

20 Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 12A; Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 9C.
21 Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) s 164(3); Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 164(3); Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 164(3); Criminal Code (Qld) s 632(2); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 50; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 12A; Criminal Code (Tas) s 136; Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 164; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) ss 69, 70; Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 9C.
22 See, eg, New South Wales, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 18 October 2006, 2958 (G McBride—Minister for Gaming and Racing and Minister for the Central Coast).
23 Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 103.
24 Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) s 165A; Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 165A; Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 165A; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 106D; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 12A; Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 164(4); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 70; Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 9C. Criminal Code (Qld) s 632(2) provides only that ‘a judge is not required by any rule of law or practice to warn the jury that it is unsafe to convict the accused on the uncorroborated testimony of 1 witness’.
prohibition on the warning that children as a class are unreliable witnesses, and prevent judges from stating or suggesting to the jury that complainants in sexual assault proceedings are unreliable witnesses as a class.26

28.19 These provisions do not prevent a judge from making any comment on evidence given in a trial that it is appropriate to make in the interests of justice—for example, warning that a particular child’s or complainant’s evidence, or the particular circumstances of the witness, may affect the reliability of that evidence.27

Murray warning

28.20 The Murray warning is named after the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal case in which it was discussed.28 The warning, which may be given by a trial judge pursuant to common law powers, cautions about the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of a sexual assault complainant—including a child complainant. It is frequently given in sexual assault trials, if requested by the defence,29 and is generally to the effect that:

> where there is only one witness asserting the commission of the crime, the evidence of that witness must be scrutinised with great care before a conclusion is arrived at that a verdict of guilty should be brought in.30

28.21 Legislation that prohibits a judge from stating or suggesting to a jury that complainants in sexual offence proceedings are unreliable witnesses as a class31 may have been enacted with the parliamentary intention of relieving a trial judge from giving a Murray warning.32 However, because those provisions are directed at warnings that refer to complainants of sexual offences as an unreliable class of witness and not whether the evidence of one witness must be scrutinised with great care, they are unlikely to prevent a trial judge from giving the Murray warning.33

---

26 See, eg, New South Wales, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 18 October 2006, 2958 (G McBride—Minister for Gaming and Racing and Minister for the Central Coast).

27 The Commissions note also that judges in the uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions are obliged to give a warning in respect of evidence that may be unreliable, including several broadly described categories of evidence, unless there is good reason for not doing so: Uniform Evidence Acts, s 165. As s 165 concerns warnings in respect of categories of evidence, rather than categories of witnesses, it is not of immediate relevance to the present discussion.

28.22 Criticisms of the Murray warning include that it:

- is ‘superfluous where the complainant’s unreliability [is] obvious or useless where the complainant [is] a skilled and convincing liar’;\(^{34}\)
- is ‘patently obvious’;\(^{35}\)
- is supported by a rationale that is inconsistent with the psychological literature;\(^{36}\)
- potentially undermines a complainant’s evidence and perpetuates myths about women;\(^{37}\) and
- may be interpreted by jurors as an invitation to acquit.\(^{38}\)

28.23 It is open to question whether the standard directions regarding the burden and standard of proof adequately address the situation where the only evidence comes from the complainant. Some commentators argue the warning is unnecessary given the judge will direct the jury not to convict unless they are satisfied of the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt.\(^{39}\) Other sources suggest the Murray warning is a useful reinforcement of the direction on the standard of proof.\(^{40}\) Another view questions what the Murray warning actually means and suggests that it is likely to confuse jurors as to whether there is a difference between being ‘satisfied beyond reasonable doubt’ and ‘scrutinising the evidence with great care’.\(^{41}\)

28.24 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should prohibit a judge in any sexual assault proceedings from:

- warning a jury, or making any suggestion to a jury, that complainants as a class are unreliable witnesses; and
- warning a jury of the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of any complainant.\(^{42}\)

\(^{35}\) Ibid, 267.

\(^{39}\) New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Jury Directions, Consultation Paper 4 (2008), [7.35].

\(^{41}\) J Wood, ‘Sexual Assault and the Admission of Evidence’ (Paper presented at Practice and Prevention: Contemporary Issues in Adult Sexual Assault in New South Wales, Sydney, 12 February 2003), [17]–[20].

Submissions and consultations

28.25 There was significant support among stakeholders for the Consultation Paper proposal.\(^43\)

28.26 National Legal Aid agreed with the proposal except to the extent that it provided that a trial judge be prohibited from warning a jury of the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of any complainant, on the basis that a corroboration warning may be required in a particular case.\(^44\)

28.27 Dr Anne Cossins supported the proposal but considered that it did not go far enough in restricting the ability of trial judges to give the Murray warning, particularly in the case of child complainants.\(^45\) Cossins noted that the proposal—by extending the basic terms of s 165A of the uniform Evidence Acts to all complainants—preserves the trial judge’s power to give common law warnings, including the Murray warning. Cossins considered that, although s 165A(1)(b) appears to address the problems associated with the Murray warning, it does not abolish the use of the words ‘scrutinised with great care’ and its effect is merely that a warning or suggestion must not be given to a jury that a child’s evidence requires greater scrutiny than an adult’s evidence.

28.28 Cossins acknowledged that, in some circumstances, the evidence of a child will be considered to be unreliable for particular reasons but that those reasons should be grounded on up-to-date research rather than suppositions about age, memory or reliability or outdated prejudice and assumptions.

28.29 Ultimately, Cossins submitted that the power of trial judges to give common law warnings in relation to the reliability of a child witness’ evidence should be abolished, and that a warning concerning a child’s evidence should only be given in exceptional and particular circumstances prescribed by legislation.

Commissions’ views

28.30 It is now generally accepted that judges should be prohibited from warning or suggesting to the jury that children as a class are unreliable witnesses.\(^46\) In the Commissions’ view, similar provisions should prohibit warnings about complainants in sexual assault cases generally.

\(^44\) National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

\(^45\) A Cossins, Submission FV 112, 9 June 2010.

\(^46\) Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 104.
28.31 The Commissions also consider that legislation should prohibit a judge from giving general warnings to a jury about the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of any complainant or witness who is a child. As the NSW Taskforce observed:

this would prevent a general warning being given about scrutinising the evidence of the complainant with great care, simply because he or she is alleging sexual assault. However, where there is specific evidence, which suggests that aspects of a complainant’s evidence may be unreliable, a comment may still be made about needing to treat such evidence with care.47

28.32 Legislation of the kind proposed by the Commissions would preserve a trial judge’s power to give a Murray warning in an appropriate case. The Commissions consider that judicial education should be undertaken and judicial bench books updated to assist judges to identify, with reference to recent literature on the matter, the circumstances in which it is in the interests of justice to give a warning about the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of a particular complainant or child witness.48

Recommendation 28–1
Federal, state and territory legislation should prohibit a judge in any sexual assault proceedings from:

(a) warning a jury, or making any suggestion to a jury, that complainants as a class are unreliable witnesses; and

(b) giving a general warning to a jury of the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of any complainant or witness who is a child.

Recommendation 28–2
Australian courts and judicial education bodies should provide judicial education and training, and prepare material for incorporation in bench books, to assist judges to identify the circumstances in which a warning about the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of a particular complainant or child witness is in the interests of justice.

Warnings about delay in complaint

28.33 At common law it was assumed that ‘a genuine sexual assault victim would make a complaint at the first opportunity and the failure to do so was considered relevant to the complainant’s credibility’.49

---

47 Ibid.
48 Although the Australasian Institute for Judicial Administration’s bench book for children giving evidence in Australian courts does not specifically address the Murray warning, the bench book is illustrative of how legal and psychological material may be collated in a text which is intended for use by judicial officers in court: Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration, Bench Book for Children Giving Evidence in Australian Courts (2009).
28.34 This assumption has since been discredited by research.\(^{50}\) Delay in complaint is now known to be a typical feature of reporting sexual assault. Parliaments in a number of jurisdictions have responded to these developments by enacting legislative provisions to require the trial judge to warn the jury that delay in complaint does not necessarily indicate that the allegation is false and that a person may have a good reason for delaying in making a complaint.\(^{51}\)

28.35 Arguably, these legislative reforms have subsequently been undermined by the High Court decisions in Longman v The Queen\(^{52}\) and Crofts v The Queen\(^{53}\) which discussed what are now referred to as the Longman and Crofts warnings respectively.

Longman warning

28.36 In Longman,\(^{54}\) a complaint was made more than 20 years after the alleged offence. In general terms, the case requires that the jury be warned that, because of the passage of a number of years, it would be ‘dangerous to convict’ on the complainant’s evidence alone unless the jury is satisfied of its truth and accuracy, having scrutinised the complainant’s evidence with great care.\(^{55}\) The rationale for the warning is that a significant delay puts the accused at a forensic disadvantage because he or she has lost the ‘means of testing the complainant’s allegations which would have been open to him [or her] had there been no delay’.\(^{56}\)

---

\(^{52}\) Longman v The Queen (1989) 168 CLR 79.

\(^{53}\) Crofts v The Queen (1996) 186 CLR 427.

\(^{54}\) Longman v The Queen (1989) 168 CLR 79.

\(^{55}\) Ibid, 91. See also 108–109.

\(^{56}\) Ibid, 91.
28.37 The Longman warning has attracted a great deal of comment and criticism,\(^{57}\) including that:

- the combined effect of Longman and subsequent High Court cases\(^ {58}\) has been to ‘give rise to an irrebuttable presumption that the delay has prevented the accused from adequately testing and meeting the complainant’s evidence’\(^ {59}\) and, as a result, trial judges are required to give the warning irrespective of whether the accused has in fact been prejudiced or suffered a forensic disadvantage;
- warning the jury in the terms that it would or may be ‘dangerous or unsafe’ to convict ‘risks being perceived as a not too subtle encouragement by the trial judge to acquit’,\(^ {60}\) thereby encroaching improperly on the fact-finding task of the jury;
- the actual length of delay which necessitates the giving of a Longman warning is unclear;\(^ {61}\)
- a practice has developed of giving the Longman warning to ‘appeal-proof’ trial judges’ directions even if it is unnecessary in the particular case;\(^ {62}\) and
- the warning is given even where there is corroboration of the complainant’s evidence.\(^ {63}\)

28.38 The Longman warning also raises a range of other issues in relation to perpetuating myths and misconceptions about sexual assault and discriminatory attitudes towards women and children. For example, at common law, the warning focuses on the evidence of the complainant, rather than the forensic disadvantage

---

\(^{59}\) R v BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241, [14]–[15].

\(^{60}\) Ibid, [34].

\(^{62}\) Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 89–90. See also, New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Jury Directions, Consultation Paper 4 (2008), [7.49]–[7.54]; Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Warnings in Sexual Offences Cases Relating to Delay in Complaint, Final Report 8 (2006), [2.1.1]–[2.2.1], [2.3.1]–[2.3.2].

suffered by the defendant.64 Also, the warning continues to link delay in complaint with the complainant’s credibility and reflects discredited assumptions as to the reliability of memory, particularly that of children.65

Uniform Evidence Acts approach

28.39 In ALRC Report 102, the ALRC, NSWLRC and Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) identified two options for reform to address the concerns raised in relation to the Longman warning: to legislate to abolish the warning in its entirety; or to legislate to clarify, modify or limit its operation.66

28.40 Ultimately the ALRC and the VLRC, but not the NSWLRC, recommended that:

the uniform Evidence Acts be amended to provide that where a request is made by a party, and the court is satisfied that the party has suffered significant forensic disadvantage as a result of delay, an appropriate warning may be given.

The provision should make it clear that the mere passage of time does not necessarily establish forensic disadvantage and that a judge may refuse to give a warning if there are good reasons for doing so.

No particular form of words need to be used in giving the warning. However, in warning the jury, the judge should not suggest that it is ‘dangerous to convict’ because of any demonstrated forensic disadvantage.67

28.41 The recommendation was subsequently enacted as ss 165B of the Evidence Act 1995 (Cth), Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) and Evidence Act 2008 (Vic).68

28.42 In its 2008 consultation paper on jury directions, the VLRC considered whether ss 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts provided a satisfactory approach to warning the jury in relation to the forensic disadvantage because of delay and whether such a warning continues to be necessary, or the matter ought to be left to counsel to address.69 The VLRC concluded that ss 165B of the Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) appropriately deals with Longman warnings:

Section 165B provides that the judge must be satisfied that the accused has suffered forensic disadvantage because of the delay before giving the jury a warning. The judge is probably better placed than the jury to make this threshold assessment. If the judge makes this determination he or she must inform the jury of the nature of the disadvantage and instruct them to take it into account when considering their verdict.

Section 165B of the Evidence Act is activated by a request from counsel for a warning. The trial judge has a discretionary power to refuse to give a warning which has been requested when satisfied that ‘there are good reasons for not doing so’. This approach is consistent with our recommendations concerning all directions other than those which are mandatory.70

28.43 Cossins has identified a number of weaknesses and limitations in the operation of s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts.71 The limitations arise, in her view, because:

- s 165B ‘does not affect any other power of the judge to give any warning to, or to inform, the jury’,72 meaning that trial judges are still able to give a Longman warning; and

- the Longman warning is mandatory in nature but s 165B warnings are dependent on an application by ‘a party’73 or ‘the defendant’.74

28.44 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee has identified a number of issues that may arise in practice as a result.75 These are that:

- a trial judge could give both Longman and s 165B warnings;76

- a trial judge may be persuaded to give the Longman warning instead of a s 165B warning to ‘appeal-proof’ the case;77 and

- in the federal and Victorian jurisdictions, the defendant must request the s 165B warning before it can be given, and it is doubtful whether the defence would make such a request if the more advantageous Longman warning can be given in the alternative.

72 Uniform Evidence Acts, s 165B(5).
73 Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 165B.
74 Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) s 165B; Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 165B.
75 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 78.
76 The Committee contends this may occur where the prosecution makes an application for a s 165B warning to be given and the defence reminds the judge of the mandatory nature of the Longman warning. The Committee also contends that in this situation, it would be more likely that the judge will refuse to give the s 165B warning (pursuant to Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 165B(3)) and give the Longman warning instead.
77 The Committee explains that a s 165 warning is less advantageous to a defence case than the Longman warning. A defendant who is convicted by a jury who has been directed in the terms of Longman would therefore be unlikely to assert on appeal that the trial judge failed to give a s 165B warning. By comparison, a defendant who is convicted by a jury who has been directed in terms of a s 165B warning is more likely to assert on appeal that the conviction should be overturned because the trial judge failed to warn the jury in the terms of Longman.
Options for reform

28.45 The Queensland Law Reform Commission (QLRC) and the TLRI have recommended the enactment of legislative provisions to override the Longman warning in terms which are broadly consistent with the uniform Evidence Acts approach.78

28.46 South Australia has pursued an alternative reform option by enacting s 34CB of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA). Section 34CB of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA) was enacted with the clear intention of abolishing the Longman warning.79 Arguably, however, the drafting abolishes the trial judge’s obligation to give the Longman warning, without limiting the power to give the warning, providing that a ‘rule of law or practice obliging a judge in a trial of a charge of an offence to give a warning of a kind known as a Longman warning is abolished’.80

28.47 As a result, s 34CB of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA) differs from s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts to the extent that it abolishes the trial judge’s obligation to give the Longman warning.

28.48 In practice, however, the provisions may differ little in the extent to which they regulate the trial judge’s general power to give a Longman warning.81 The key distinction which emerges between s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts and the South Australian provision is that under the uniform Evidence Acts, a judge may be obliged to give a Longman warning—irrespective of whether a s 165B warning is requested—whereas a judge under s 34CB of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA) is not obliged to give a Longman warning.

28.49 Other points of difference between s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts and s 34CB of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA) include that:

- a judge under the uniform Evidence Acts is not obliged to give a s 165B direction to the jury if it is not requested,82 whereas a judge under s 34CB of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA) must do so if the court is of the opinion ‘that the period of time that has elapsed between the alleged offending and the trial has resulted in a significant forensic disadvantage to the defendant’;83

---

81 Cf Uniform Evidence Acts, s 165B(5).
82 Ibid s 165B(2).
83 Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34CB(2).
• a judge under the uniform Evidence Acts provision has a discretion to refuse to give a warning relating to delay where the defendant is forensically disadvantaged if there are good reasons for doing so,84 whereas no such discretion is available to a judge under s 34CB of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA);
and
• the uniform Evidence Acts do not explicitly require that the direction given must be specific to the circumstances of the particular case, whereas the South Australian provision makes this explicit.85

28.50 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee has proposed an alternative provision to address the inadequacies of s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts.86 The Committee proposed that the defendant should have to show—on the balance of probabilities—‘actual forensic disadvantage’ before the court is required to give a s 165B warning.87 The Committee also proposes that s 165B should prescribe the exact wording of the warning and prohibit any other form of words being used.88
Section 165B should, in the Committee’s view, require the trial judge to give reasons for not giving a warning and explicitly abrogate the court’s power to give a Longman warning.

Consultation Paper

28.51 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should provide that:

(a) if the court, on application by the defendant, is satisfied that the defendant has suffered a significant forensic disadvantage because of the consequences of delay, the court must inform the jury of the nature of the disadvantage and the need to take that disadvantage into account when considering the evidence;
(b) the judge need not comply with (a) if there are good reasons for not doing so;
and
(c) no particular form of words needs to be used in giving the warning pursuant to (a), but in warning the jury, the judge should not suggest that it is ‘dangerous to convict’ because of any demonstrated forensic disadvantage.

28.52 The Commissions also asked what issues arise in practice pursuant to s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts and whether the abrogation of the trial judge’s obligation and power to give a Longman warning under s 165B(5) is sufficiently explicit.

84 Uniform Evidence Acts, s 165B(3).
85 Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34CB(3)(a).
86 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 79–82.
87 Ibid, Rec 2.1.
88 The proposed wording would require the judge to inform the jury that they ‘may’ take the forensic disadvantage into account in determining whether the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt. Uniform Evidence Acts s 165B(2) provides the court must ‘inform the jury of the nature of that disadvantage and the need to take the disadvantage into account when considering the evidence’ (emphasis added).
Submissions and consultations

28.53 Many stakeholders supported the Consultation Paper proposal. Some members of the NSW legal profession observed that s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts works satisfactorily in practice and does not lead to trial judges giving Longman warnings in addition to, or instead of, s 165B warnings.

28.54 National Legal Aid noted that the Longman warning has a strong effect on trial outcomes and that, before the uniform Evidence Acts were enacted, research suggested that judicial misdirection in relation to the Longman warning was a common ground of criminal appeal and a common basis for successful criminal appeals in NSW. Nonetheless, National Legal Aid considered that it is appropriate that Longman warnings be given where the defendant is at a forensic disadvantage in, for example, locating witnesses, testing or adducing evidence, where there has been substantial delay.

28.55 Cossins did not support the Consultation Paper proposal, because it would not abolish the Longman warning or the power of trial judges to give the warning. In her view, there is ‘no reason to think that [the proposal] will change the practice of giving the warning, particularly since trial judges know that the failure to give a Longman warning is an obvious and common ground of appeal’. Cossins questioned the grounds on which a trial judge can refuse to give a Longman warning, if requested by the defence, and argued that very clear words of abrogation need to be included to remove the power to give a common law warning.

28.56 In Cossins’ view, the preferred reform would replace Longman with an alternative warning and specify a particular form of words to describe the disadvantages suffered by the defendant because of delay in complaint. This alternative warning should only be given where the defendant can show that he or she has suffered an actual forensic disadvantage as a result of a delay in complaint. It is necessary, Cossins argues, to restrict the form of words used by the trial judge.

---

92 Ibid.

94 Dr Cossins refers to Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(1E) and Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34B as examples of clear abrogation. Those parts of Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61 which affect Longman warnings were displaced by Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 165B.

Commissions’ views

28.57 In the Commissions’ view, s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts provides a satisfactory approach to the problems raised by the Longman warning. In forming this view, the Commissions recognise that delay in complaint is a typical feature of reporting sexual assault and that the mere passage of time ought not to ‘count against’ a complainant in sexual offence proceedings.

28.58 Provisions consistent with s 165B should be adopted by all jurisdictions because a jury could fail to appreciate that delay can cause forensic disadvantage to a defendant. Where (and only where) a significant forensic disadvantage is identified and has an evidentiary basis, the court ought to inform the jury of the nature of that disadvantage and the need to take it into account when considering the evidence.

28.59 The Commissions acknowledge that, in some cases, the existence of a very long delay may satisfy the court that the defendant has suffered a significant forensic disadvantage such as to require a s 165B warning, but also consider that the provision makes it clear that the mere passage of time does not necessarily establish forensic disadvantage.

Recommendation 28–3  State and territory legislation should provide, consistently with s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts, that:

(a) if the court, on application by the defendant, is satisfied that the defendant has suffered a significant forensic disadvantage because of the consequences of delay, the court must inform the jury of the nature of the disadvantage and the need to take that disadvantage into account when considering the evidence;

(b) the judge need not comply with (a) if there are good reasons for not doing so; and

(c) no particular form of words needs to be used in giving the warning pursuant to (a), but in warning the jury, the judge should not suggest that it is ‘dangerous to convict’ because of any demonstrated forensic disadvantage.

Crofts warning

28.60 The Crofts warning requires the trial judge to warn the jury that delay in complaint can be used to impugn the credibility of the complainant.

28.61 The Crofts warning originates from a jury direction mandated by the High Court in Kilby v The Queen.\(^96\) In Kilby v The Queen, the High Court observed that evidence of recent complaint is not evidence of the facts alleged, but goes to the credibility of the complainant as it demonstrates consistency of conduct. However, the court also held as a corollary that where there has been a failure to make a complaint at the earliest available opportunity, this fact may be used to impugn the credibility of the complainant.\textsuperscript{97} Kilby \textit{v} The Queen therefore endorsed a court direction to juries that delay or absence of complaint can be used as a factor in determining a complainant’s credibility—known as the Kilby direction.

\(^96\) Kilby v The Queen (1973) 129 CLR 460.

28.62 Legislation was subsequently passed in a number of Australian jurisdictions to require the judge to warn the jury that a delay in making a complaint of sexual assault does not necessarily mean that the allegation is false.\textsuperscript{98} Although such provisions were designed to remove stereotypes as to the unreliability of evidence given by sexual assault complainants, their protective effects have arguably been negated by the High Court decision in \textit{Crofts v The Queen}.\textsuperscript{99}

28.63 In \textit{Crofts v The Queen}, the complainant reported that she had been sexually assaulted by a family friend over a period of six years, and made a complaint six months after the last assault. The trial judge directed the jury, as required by s 61(1)(b) of the \textit{Crimes Act 1958} (Vic), that delay in complaint did not necessarily indicate that the allegation of sexual assault was false and that there were good reasons why a complainant might delay making a complaint.

28.64 The High Court held that s 61(1)(b) does not preclude the court from giving a Kilby direction or from commenting that delay in complaint of sexual assault may affect the credibility of the complainant. It considered that the purpose of s 61(1) and like provisions is to ‘restore the balance’ and rid the law of stereotypical notions as to the unreliability of sexual assault complainants, but not to immunise complainants from critical comment where necessary in order to secure a fair trial for the accused.

28.65 The Court held that a Kilby direction must be given where the delay is ‘substantial’. Two qualifications were placed on this requirement: first, the direction need not be given where the facts of the case and the conduct of the trial do not suggest the need for a direction to restore the balance of fairness (for example, where there is an explanation for the delay); and secondly, the warning must not be expressed in terms that suggest a stereotyped view that sexual assault complainants are unreliable.\textsuperscript{100}

28.66 As a result, subject to the two qualifications, where a trial judge gives the jury the statutory direction that delay in complaint does not necessarily indicate that the allegation is false and that there may be good reasons why a victim of sexual assault hesitates in complaining about it,\textsuperscript{101} the judge should also consider giving the direction

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{97} Ibid, 472.
\item \textsuperscript{98} Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294; Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(1)(b); Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4A(4); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BD; Criminal Code (Tas) s 371A; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 71.
\item \textsuperscript{99} Crofts \textit{v} The Queen (1996) 186 CLR 427.
\item \textsuperscript{100} This history is taken from Australian Law Reform Commission, New South Wales Law Reform Commission and Victorian Law Reform Commission, \textit{Uniform Evidence Law}, Report 102, NSWLRRC Report 112, VLRC FR (2005), [18.147]–[18.151].
\item \textsuperscript{101} Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 35BD; Criminal Code (Tas) s 371A; Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 71; Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT). Under Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(1)(b) the judge is not required to warn the that ‘delay in complaint may be taken into account in evaluating the evidence of the complainant and in determining whether or not to believe the complainant’.

28.67 As with the Longman warning, the Crofts warning has attracted a great deal of comment and criticism. Major criticisms of the Crofts warning include that:

- It has produced uncertainty about when a judge is to direct the jury that it is entitled to take into account delay in assessing the complainant’s credibility. As a result, to limit the risk of a successful appeal on the basis of a potential miscarriage of justice, trial judges ‘as a general rule’ direct in this way irrespective of whether the complainant is the sole witness and even where reasons have been advanced for the delay in complaint.

- It requires trial judges to give competing and apparently contradictory statutory and common law warnings. That is, ‘to balance the explanation that evidence of a failure to complain of an assault, at the earliest reasonable opportunity, does not necessarily mean that the complaint was untrue … with a direction that the jury can take that delay into account as reducing the complainant’s credibility, is also problematic’. The unnecessary complexity may confuse jurors and render the warnings meaningless.

- The near mandatory nature of the requirement to direct the jury that it is entitled to take delay into account in assessing the complainant’s credibility risks ‘undermining the purpose of the legislative provisions which was to avoid misconceptions about the behaviour of victims of sexual abuse’.

- The premise on which the Crofts warning is given reflects discredited assumptions as to the nature of sexual assault and the behaviour of sexual assault complainants. It may be misleading and unfairly disadvantageous to a complainant to give a Crofts warning ‘if there is no evidentiary basis for suggesting a nexus between delay and fabrication of the complaint’.

103 See, the list of reports cited in relation to Longman above.
106 See, eg, R v Markuleski (2001) 52 NSWLR 82, [175], [187].
108 Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), 97.
110 Ibid.
28. Other Trial Processes

Options for reform

28.68 A number of law reform bodies have considered the Crofts warning, the existing statutory responses to the warning and the appropriateness of those statutory responses. The recommendations and proposals made by these bodies are briefly discussed below.

28.69 The VLRC’s 2004 report, Sexual Offences,\(^\text{111}\) recommended an amendment to s 61 of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) which was subsequently enacted as s 61(1)(b)(ii), in this Report, referred to as the ‘s 61 Victorian amendment’. This provides that the judge must not warn, or suggest in any way to, the jury that the credibility of the complainant is affected by the delay unless, on the application of the accused, the judge is satisfied that there is sufficient evidence tending to suggest that the credibility of the complainant is so affected to justify the giving of such a warning.\(^\text{112}\)

28.70 In ALRC Report 102, the ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC concluded that the problems created by the Crofts warning should be dealt with in offence-specific legislation and by judicial and practitioner education on the ‘nature of sexual assault, including the context in which sexual offences typically occur, and the emotional, psychological and social impact of sexual assault’.\(^\text{113}\)

28.71 Also in 2005, the NSW Criminal Justice and Sexual Offences Taskforce recommended an amendment in similar terms to the s 61 Victorian amendment.\(^\text{114}\) That recommendation was subsequently enacted in the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW). Section 294(2) requires the judge to warn the jury that absence of complaint or delay in complaining does not necessarily indicate that the allegation that the offence was committed is false.

28.72 Following the 2006 Chapman inquiry into sexual assault laws in South Australia,\(^\text{115}\) s 34M of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA) was enacted. Section 34M(1) abolishes the Kilby and Crofts directions.

28.73 Section 34M(2) states that:

\[
\text{no suggestion or statement may be made to the jury that a failure to make, or a delay in making, a complaint of a sexual offence is of itself of probative value in relation to the alleged victim’s credibility or consistency of conduct.}
\]

28.74 Evidence relating to how and why the complainant made his or her complaint, and to whom, is admissible.\(^\text{116}\) If such evidence is admitted, the judge must direct the jury that it is admitted to inform the jury as to how the allegation first came to light; as evidence of the consistency of conduct of the alleged victim; and it is not admitted as \(^{112}\) Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(1)(b)(ii) (emphasis added).

\(^{114}\) Criminal Justice Sexual Offences Taskforce (Attorney General’s Department (NSW)), Responding to Sexual Assault: The Way Forward (2005), Rec 37.

\(^{116}\) Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 34M(3). evidence of the truth of what was alleged. The judge must direct that there may be varied reasons why the alleged victim of a sexual offence made a complaint of the offence at a particular time or to a particular person but that, otherwise, it is a matter for the jury to determine the significance (if any) of the evidence in the circumstances of the particular case.\textsuperscript{117}

28.75 In 2006, the TLRI criticised the s 61 Victorian amendment on the basis that it could be interpreted as simply enacting \textit{Crofts}.\textsuperscript{118} The view of the TLRI was that the \textit{Criminal Code (Tas)} should be amended so as to prohibit entirely trial judges giving the \textit{Crofts} warning.\textsuperscript{119} That recommendation has not been implemented.

28.76 In its 2008 consultation paper on jury directions, the NSWLRC asked whether s 294(2) of the \textit{Criminal Procedure Act 1986} (NSW) is sufficient to address ‘the issue of what (if any) warning judges should give the jury on the impact of delay on the complainant’s credibility’.\textsuperscript{120} The NSWLRC considered the competing arguments in respect of s 294(2). On the one hand, it is considered that to prevent a judge from warning a jury that ‘delay in complaining is relevant to the victim’s credibility unless there is sufficient evidence to justify such a warning’\textsuperscript{121} is ‘simply a reiteration of the High Court’s ruling in \textit{Crofts}’.\textsuperscript{122} On the other hand, reinforcing the ‘sufficient evidence’ requirement may serve to prevent judges from indiscriminately giving the \textit{Crofts} direction for the main purpose of ‘appeal-proofing’ the case, particularly in cases where there was in fact no delay, or where there are indisputably good reasons for a delay.\textsuperscript{123}

28.77 In its 2009 report on jury directions, the VLRC noted that s 61 of the \textit{Crimes Act 1958} (Vic) ‘acknowledges that there may be cases where the credibility of the complainant is affected by delay in making a complaint’. In order to avoid that acknowledgment being used to justify a mandatory warning ‘the legislation describes the circumstances in which a warning may be given and its content’.\textsuperscript{124}

28.78 The main issue the VLRC identified was in relation to the ‘extent to which the judge should be involved in giving the jury directions about the credibility of the \textsuperscript{117} Ibid s 34M(4). See also s 34M(5): ‘It is not necessary that a particular form of words be used in giving the direction under subsection (4)’. For a discussion of concerns which arise in respect of s 34M of the \textit{Evidence Act 1929} (SA), see Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, \textit{Court Intervention Programs}, Consultation Paper (2008), [18.276].

\textsuperscript{118} Tasmania Law Reform Institute, \textit{Warnings in Sexual Offences Cases Relating to Delay in Complaint}, Final Report 8 (2006), 24. That is, the Victorian amendment makes provision for the trial judge to warn the jury where he or she is ‘satisfied that there exists sufficient evidence in the particular case to justify such a warning. The facts of \textit{Crofts} itself, as viewed by the High Court, arguably satisfy this condition’: Tasmania Law Reform Institute, \textit{Warnings in Sexual Offences Cases Relating to Delay in Complaint}, Final Report 8 (2006), 24. See also, New South Wales Law Reform Commission, \textit{Jury Directions}, Consultation Paper 4 (2008), 151.

\textsuperscript{121} \textit{Criminal Procedure Act 1986} (NSW) s 294(2).

\textsuperscript{122} New South Wales Law Reform Commission, \textit{Jury Directions}, Consultation Paper 4 (2008), [7.75].

\textsuperscript{123} Ibid, [7.76].

28. Other Trial Processes

The VLRC questioned whether a threshold assessment about ‘sufficient evidence’ by the judge on the question of credibility ‘can be justified when it is the task of the jury to assess the credibility of witnesses and decide whether they accept or reject their evidence’. The VLRC’s final view was that:

the trial judge should not be obliged to give the jury directions about delayed complaint but should have a discretionary power to give appropriate directions to correct statements by counsel that conflict with the evidence or are based upon stereotypical assumptions about reporting of sexual offences.

28.79 The VLRC recommended that legislation should provide that the issue of the effect of any delay in complaint, or absence of complaint, on the credibility of the complainant should be a matter for argument by counsel and for determination by the jury and that:

(i) Subject to subsection (ii), save for identifying the issue for the jury and the competing contentions of counsel, the trial judge must not give a direction regarding the effect of delay in complaint, or absence of complaint, on the credibility of the complainant, unless satisfied it is necessary to do so in order to ensure a fair trial.

(ii) If evidence is given, or a question is asked, or a comment is made that tends to suggest that the person against whom the offence is alleged to have been committed either delayed making or failed to make a complaint in respect of the offence, the judge must tell the jury that there may be good reasons why a victim of a sexual offence of that kind may delay making or fail to make a complaint in respect of the offence.

28.80 The National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee criticised the s 61 Victorian amendment because it did ‘not abolish the Crofts warning, nor specify what amounts to “sufficient evidence”’. The Committee recommended that new provisions be introduced in each jurisdiction, except Queensland and South Australia, to abolish the Crofts warning.

28.81 In Queensland, s 4A of the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) provides that the Crofts warning cannot be given, although the judge may make such other comments on the complainant’s evidence as may be appropriate in the interests of justice, including on any remarks made by a party that might be based on erroneous or

---

125 Ibid, [3.135].
126 Ibid, [5.88].
127 Ibid, [5.94].
128 Ibid, Rec 38.
129 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 101. See also, Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(2) ‘nothing in subsection (1) prevents a judge from making any comment on evidence given in the proceeding that it is appropriate to make in the interests of justice’. Other commentators also consider that the words ‘sufficient evidence’ do ‘not make clear the standard of persuasion or standard of proof required’: H Donnelly, ‘Delay and the Credibility of Complainants in Sexual Assault Proceedings’ (2007) 19(3) Judicial Officers’ Bulletin 17, 19.
130 A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 106, Recs 2.2, 2.3.
131 ‘The judge must not warn or suggest in any way to the jury that the law regards the complainant’s evidence to be more reliable or less reliable only because of the length of time before the complainant made a preliminary or other complaint’: Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4A(4).
poorly based stereotypical assumptions about complainants. The main criticism of this response is that ‘it does not allow the judge to make any comment that might be warranted in the light of comments by the parties, especially defence counsel’. This means, for example, where defence counsel have raised the issue of delay, the judge may be prevented from commenting that there may be good reasons for delay in complaint. Section 4A may produce less fair outcomes for complainants—particularly where little evidence is adduced by the prosecution about the reason for the complainant’s delay in complaint—than the current s 61 of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) approach to jury warnings.

28.82 To address this concern, the QLRC’s discussion paper proposed an amendment to s 4A to give judges the power to ‘give appropriate directions to correct statements by counsel that conflict with the evidence or are based upon stereotypical assumptions about reporting of sexual offences’. In its final report, the Commission considered that any amendment ‘should not permit the re-introduction into Queensland of directions and warning based on outdated and discredited assumptions’ and considered that no further amendment to the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) was warranted.

Consultation Paper

28.83 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions asked whether warnings about the effect of delay on the credibility of complainants are necessary in sexual assault proceedings.

28.84 The Commissions also proposed two options for reform. The first was for federal, state and territory legislation modelled on the VLRC’s recommendation in its 2009 report on jury directions, discussed above.

28.85 The second and alternative option was for federal, state and territory legislation modelled on elements of the Queensland provision including the amendment proposed by the QLRC, and the Victorian provision.

133 Ibid, [15.67]; Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Warnings in Sexual Offences Cases Relating to Delay in Complaint, Final Report 8 (2006), [3.4.5].
134 Note that Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(1)(b)(i) provides that the judge ‘must inform the jury that there may be good reasons why a victim of sexual assault may delay or hesitate in complaining about it’. See also A Cossins, Alternative Models for Prosecuting Child Sex Offences in Australia (2010), prepared for the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee, 102–103; L Chapman, Review of South Australia Rape and Sexual Assault Law: Discussion Paper (2006), prepared for the Government of South Australia, 114.
137 Consultation Paper, Question 18–12.
140 Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4A(4).
28.86 This proposal would provide that, in sexual assault proceedings, the judge: must inform the jury that there may be good reasons why a victim of a sexual assault may delay or hesitate in complaining about the assault; must not warn or suggest in any way to the jury that the law regards the complainant’s evidence to be more reliable or less reliable only because of the length of time before the complainant made a complaint; maintains a discretion to give appropriate directions to correct statements by counsel that conflict with the evidence or are based upon stereotypical assumptions about reporting of sexual offences; and maintains a discretion to comment on the reliability of the complainant’s evidence in the particular case.143

Submissions and consultations

28.87 Some stakeholders144 considered that warnings about the effect of delay on the credibility of the complainants are unnecessary or inappropriate in sexual assault proceedings, including because:

- delay is the norm rather than the exception, and is even greater when the offender is a family member or intimate partner of the victim;145
- there are different schools of thought about how delay affects a victim’s testimony,146 and
- delay may occur for a range of reasons, including the adjournment of the criminal proceedings.147

28.88 Other stakeholders considered that warnings about the effect of delay on credibility of complainants are necessary in some cases, for example to ensure the jury is aware that delay is common in reporting sexual offences and the reasons why this is so.148

28.89 Some stakeholders supported the Consultation Paper proposal modelled on a recommendation of the VLRC.149 Where stakeholders took this view they generally considered that the alternative proposal, modelled on Queensland and Victorian

142 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(1).
143 See, Consultation Paper, Proposal 18–13(b).
146 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
legislation, may confuse juries if the warning is given without an evidentiary basis, or expressed the view that the jury should continue to be directed in the terms of Crofts.151

28.90 Another group of stakeholders supported the alternative proposal.152 Professor Julie Stubbs preferred this option because, in her view, it is more likely to result in consistent handling of the issue by judicial officers.153

28.91 The Public Defenders Office NSW opposed both alternatives on the basis that significant restrictions have been recently introduced in NSW by virtue of s 294(2)(c) of the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 and there is ‘no justification for further erosion of the rights of the accused in this area’.154

28.92 Cossins also opposed both alternatives. In response to the first option, modelled on a recommendation of the VLRC, Cossins commented that leaving it to counsel to comment on the issue of delay removes the authoritative voice of the trial judge informing juries that there are good reasons why a victim may delay. Further, ‘it is a clumsy way of getting rid of the Crofts warning’ because it is likely that either the evidence, or counsel, will suggest to the jury that the complainant delayed or failed to make a complaint and, in those circumstances, the judge must tell the jury that there may be good reasons for the delay. In response to the second option, the proposal modelled on Queensland and Victorian legislation, Cossins commented that that proposal retains the ability of the trial judge to give a Crofts warning.

28.93 Cossins submitted instead that legislation should clearly abrogate the Crofts warning;155 permit a warning by the judge to the jury that delay in making a complaint of sexual assault does not necessarily mean that the allegation is false;156 and require trial judges to instruct the jury about the specific reasons why the complainant delayed his or her complaint, where those reasons are admitted into evidence in the trial.157

Commissions’ views

28.94 As discussed above, since 2004 many different law reform bodies have considered the Crofts warning and the most appropriate statutory response to the warning. No clear consensus about the best option for reform has emerged from these deliberations.

---

151 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
154 Public Defenders Office NSW, Submission FV 221, 2 July 2010.
155 For example, in the terms of s 34M of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA).
156 Cossins refers to this as a ‘s 61-type direction’, referring to Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61.
28.95 The views of stakeholders, in response to the Consultation Paper proposals, are also disparate and difficult to reconcile. It is clear, however, that the credibility of sexual assault complainants should not be determined by stereotypical assumptions, including those based on the timing of complaints.158

28.96 In dealing with this issue, the Commissions reiterate the views expressed in ALRC Report 102:

While there may be cases in which delay in complaint accompanies fabrication, there is nothing inherent in delay that makes it likely that the complainant is being untruthful. On the contrary, delay in reporting sexual assault is well within the spectrum of expected responses to sexual assault. Rather than balancing the statutory direction explaining that there are reasons why a sexual assault complainant might delay in reporting an assault, the Crofts warning undermines the purport of those legislative provisions and unfairly disadvantages the prosecution.

Further, in an oath against oath trial, as sexual assault cases almost invariably are, the credibility and reliability of the complainant’s evidence is likely to be one of the central issues. Given that this is the case, it is questionable whether there is any need for the judge to give a warning or make a comment in relation to the credibility of the complainant. In cases where there is evidence to support the suggestion that the delay in complaint bears some relation to the credibility of the complainant, such matters should be the subject of counsel’s address, rather than the subject of a judicial warning.159

28.97 Whether, in a particular case, evidence of delay in complaint could substantially affect the assessment of the credibility of the complainant is a matter for the court to determine.160 This is the standard which the court must apply in determining whether credibility evidence is admissible under s 103 of the uniform Evidence Acts. It is imperative that judicial officers and legal practitioners receive appropriate education, training and assistance to ensure that their reasoning in determining this question is not based on stereotypical assumptions about sexual assault complainants.

28.98 However, whether, in a particular case, delay does in fact affect the complainant’s credibility is a matter for the jury. The assessment is not one about which a judicial officer has ‘special experience’ not possessed by members of the jury. The issue of any delay in complaint, or absence of complaint, on the credibility of the complainant should be a matter for argument by counsel and for determination by the jury.

28.99 In the Commissions’ view, federal, state and territory legislation should adopt provisions modelled on the recommendations of the 2009 VLRC report on jury directions.161 The advantages of this approach include that it: better acknowledges the adversarial nature of the criminal trial process and is more consistent with the roles of judge and jury; is consistent with the simplification of the law; and overcomes the problem of juries having to understand and apply directions about delay which appear contradictory and which may suggest to the jury that the evidence of the complainant has no probative value.\textsuperscript{162}

\begin{center}
\begin{tabular}{|l|}
\hline
\textbf{Recommendation 28–4} Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that, in sexual assault proceedings:
\begin{enumerate}
\item the effect of any delay in complaint, or absence of complaint, on the credibility of the complainant should be a matter for argument by counsel and for determination by the jury;
\item subject to paragraph (c), except for identifying the issue for the jury and the competing contentions of counsel, the judge must not give a direction regarding the effect of delay in complaint, or absence of complaint, on the credibility of the complainant, unless satisfied it is necessary to do so in order to ensure a fair trial; and \item if evidence is given, a question is asked, or a comment is made that tends to suggest that the victim either delayed making, or failed to make, a complaint in respect of the offence, the judge must tell the jury that there may be good reasons why a victim of a sexual offence may delay making or fail to make a complaint.
\end{enumerate}
\hline
\end{tabular}
\end{center}

\section*{Cross-examination}

28.100 Cross-examination is a feature of the adversarial process and is designed, among other things, to allow the defence to confront and undermine the prosecution’s case by exposing deficiencies in a witness’ testimony, including the complainant’s testimony. Under the common law, the uniform Evidence Acts and other legislation, limitations have been placed on inappropriate and offensive questioning under cross-examination. It has been argued, however, that the effect of these provisions in practice has not provided a sufficient degree of protection for complainants in sexual assault proceedings. The following section:

\begin{itemize}
\item briefly discusses the cross-examination of children and other vulnerable witnesses in sexual assault cases; and \item examines issues concerning cross-examination where the defendant is not represented by a lawyer.
\end{itemize}

\subsection*{Cross-examination of children and vulnerable witnesses}

28.101 Cossins has documented inquiries relating to the prosecution of child sex offences, and children as witnesses within the criminal justice system over the last 14

\footnotetext{162} Ibid, [3.137].
28. Other Trial Processes

She found that cross-examination is one of the most difficult parts of testifying for children; children are subject to complex, developmentally inappropriate and repetitive questioning and questioning deliberately designed to confuse and create inconsistencies; and the powers of judicial officers to intervene to prevent improper questioning are either ‘exercised sparingly’ or sometimes have no effect on defence counsel questioning.164

28.102 Unless they have a cognitive impairment, adults are much less vulnerable than children during cross-examination. Nonetheless, they can be subject to the same types of leading, repetitive, aggressive, intimidating and humiliating questions as children. There is, however, much less information available about the impact of cross-examination on adult sexual assault complainants, particularly recent information. Because of the extent of juror misconceptions about how women and children respond to sexual assault, cross-examination is likely to play a central role in confirming the pre-existing attitudes and beliefs of jurors.165

Improper questioning

28.103 The Commonwealth, NSW and ACT uniform Evidence Acts impose a positive duty on the court to intervene to disallow improper (‘disallowable’) questions.166 Under this provision a court ‘must’ disallow a question that:

- is misleading or confusing; or
- is unduly annoying, harassing, intimidating, offensive, oppressive, humiliating or repetitive; or
- is put to the witness in a manner or tone that is belittling, insulting or otherwise inappropriate; or
- has no basis other than a stereotype (for example, a stereotype based on the witness’s sex, race, culture, ethnicity, age, or mental, intellectual or physical disability).167

28.104 When recommending, in ALRC Report 102, that such a duty should be enacted, the ALRC, the NSWLRC and the VLRC considered the duty was necessary to: protect vulnerable witnesses from improper questioning; ensure ‘the best evidence

---

165 The Heroines of Fortitude report highlighted the experience of Indigenous women under cross-examination in sexual offence proceedings: J Bargen, Heroines of Fortitude: The Experiences of Women in Court as Victims of Sexual Assault, Gender Bias and the Law Project (1996), 99–103.

166 Uniform Evidence Acts, s 41. Such provisions were previously enacted under Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 275A, which also imposed a positive duty on the court ‘to intervene in relation to a range of improper questions, irrespective of whether or not the other party raised an objection’: See A Cossins, ‘Cross-Examination in Child Sexual Assault Trials: Evidentiary Safeguard or an Opportunity to Confuse?’ (2009) 33 Melbourne University Law Review 68, 93.

167 Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) s 41(1); Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 41(1).
is received by the court’; and overcome judges’ long standing reluctance to intervene in cross-examination. 168

28.105 The Commonwealth, NSW and ACT provisions apply to all witnesses, not just vulnerable ones. 169 The equivalent provision in Victoria is specific to vulnerable witnesses, defined to include persons: under the age of 18 years; who have a cognitive impairment or an intellectual disability; or whom the court considers to be vulnerable, having regard to the characteristics of the witness and the context in which the questions are put. 170

28.106 Apart from South Australia, 171 no other Australian jurisdiction places a positive duty on the court to disallow improper questions. 172

Further reform

28.107 Perceived problems with the reluctance of judicial officers to intervene to protect witnesses in criminal trials and to control cross-examination have led to proposals for reform. For example, Cossins and the National Child Sexual Assault Reform Committee have set out a range of recommendations aimed at enabling children to give their best evidence in sexual assault trials. These include recommendations to:

- prohibit suggestive questions or statements that are designed to persuade the child to agree with the proposition or suggestion put to them;
- prohibit asking the same question or making the same statement more than once;
- prohibit questions or statements made by the defence that directly accuse the child of lying or being a liar;
- place restrictions on the use of prior inconsistent statements by the defence; and
- introduce court-appointed intermediaries (social workers, psychologists or other relevant professionals) trained in child cognition, language and development to assess defence questions during the cross-examination of a child complainant. 173

---

169 The VLRC did not agree that s 41 should apply to all witnesses. Rather, it concluded that ‘a specific duty in relation to vulnerable witnesses offers the best prospect of changing the culture of judicial non-intervention’: Ibid, [5.123].
170 Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 41(4). The Victorian and Tasmanian Acts provide a discretion to disallow improper questions put to any witness in cross-examination: Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 41(1). See also Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 41. See also Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YE in relation to cross-examination of children in proceedings for sexual offences.
171 Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 25(4).
172 See Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 21(2); Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 26(3); Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) s 41(2); Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 16(2).
28. Other Trial Processes

28.108 Such matters, as with duties to disallow improper questioning, are aspects of vulnerable witness protection. The Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) is developing, through the National Working Group on Evidence, proposed amendments to the uniform Evidence Acts dealing with vulnerable witness provisions. Model provisions are expected to be drafted later in 2010.

28.109 The Terms of Reference instruct the ALRC, in undertaking this Inquiry, to be ‘careful not to duplicate … the work being undertaken through SCAG on the harmonisation of uniform evidence laws, in particular the development of model … vulnerable witness protections’. For this reason, the Commissions do not make any proposals for reform of these aspects of vulnerable witness protection.

Unrepresented defendants

28.110 Every Australian jurisdiction, with the exception of Tasmania, has enacted legislation to place restrictions on the cross-examination of complainants in sexual offence proceedings by unrepresented defendants.174

28.111 In some jurisdictions this protection is only afforded to child complainants and child witnesses.175 In other jurisdictions it has application beyond sexual offences, and applies to a broader range of legal proceedings or wider class of witness. In Western Australia, the court’s power to prohibit personal cross-examination by the defendant is discretionary (albeit for a wider class of witness across a range of criminal proceedings).176

28.112 The NSWLRC explored the issue of cross-examination by an unrepresented accused in detail.177 It canvassed the competing interests of the rights of the accused to a fair trial—the critical consideration being the ability to test the evidence against them—and the rights of the complainant (that is, the need to reduce the potential distress and humiliation to complainants caused by personal cross-examination).

28.113 In regard to this last area, the NSWLRC drew attention to the particular nature of sexual offences, the nature of the evidence that needs to be elicited from the complainant, the length of cross-examination, and its focus on issues of credibility and consent. To be personally cross-examined by the defendant was seen as having a negative impact on the complainant’s ability to answer questions, thus affecting the quality and nature of the evidence received. This is likely to be amplified in those cases where the complainant and the defendant have, or have had, an intimate or family relationship.178 The VLRC and QLRC, who dealt with this issue part of broader 175 See Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) ss 15YF–15YG.

176 Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 25A(1).

178 Raised in submissions to Ibid, [2.11].
inquiries, also emphasised the negative effect of personal cross-examination on child complainants and child witnesses.

28.114 In order to ‘strike a balance’ between the rights of the accused to test the evidence against them, and the importance of limiting the traumatic experience of complainants in sexual offence proceedings, most jurisdictions prohibit personal cross-examination. However, jurisdictions differ as to:

- whether this protection applies to witnesses other than sexual assault complainants or alleged victims and whether it applies in other legal proceedings; and
- who asks the questions on behalf of the unrepresented defendant and whether that person has any role or responsibility in providing advice to the defendant.

Which witnesses are protected?

28.115 In some jurisdictions, protection from cross-examination by an unrepresented defendant is limited to the cross-examination of a complainant in sexual offence proceedings, or to child complainants and child witnesses in sexual offence proceedings, while in others it applies to a wider range of proceedings and witnesses:

- In Victoria, the protection applies to ‘protected witnesses’ in sexual offence proceedings and offences that would amount to family violence within the meaning of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).
- In Queensland, the protection applies to witnesses under 16 years of age, witnesses with an ‘impairment of the mind’ and alleged victims in a ‘prescribed special offence’ (this covers rape and sexual assault along with a range of other offences) or, subject to conditions, victims of a ‘prescribed offence’.
- In the ACT, the protection applies to the complainant or a ‘similar act witness’ in a sexual offence proceeding, a serious violent offence proceeding, and to a less serious violent offence proceeding where the witness and the accused have

---

180 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294A prohibits personal cross-examination by an unrepresented accused in ‘prescribed sexual offence proceedings’ which are defined in s 3; Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 5.

181 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15YF prohibits the cross-examination of a child complainant (that is the child who is alleged to be the victim of the offence) and s 15YG prohibits the cross-examination of a child witness (other than the child complainant) unless the court grants leave to do so. Both of these sections apply to sexual offence proceedings as specified in s 15Y. These protections apply to committal proceedings and other proceedings related to the prosecution of the prescribed offences: s 15Y(2).

182 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 354, ‘Protected witness’ is defined broadly and includes the complainant, a family member of the complainant, a family member of the accused person, and any other witness that the court declares protected.

183 ‘Prescribed special offence’ and ‘prescribed offence’ are defined in Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 21M(3).
been in an intimate relationship\footnote{‘Intimate relationship’ is defined in Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 38B(2)–(4).} or the court considers that the witness has some particular vulnerability.\footnote{Ibid s 38D(1). The protection also applies to a child or person with a disability who is giving evidence in a sexual or violent offence proceeding (i.e. where they are not the complainant who is already protected): Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 38D(2).}

- In South Australia, the protection applies to children or witnesses who are the alleged victims of a ‘serious offence’, or an offence of contravening or failing to comply with a domestic violence restraining order or a restraining order.\footnote{Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 13B(5).}
- The provision in Western Australia is discretionary, but it is open to the court to ‘forbid’ such personal cross-examination for any witness in a criminal proceeding.\footnote{Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 25A(1)(c); Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294A(4); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 38D(5). The NSW legislation does not accord with the conclusion of the NSWLRC which had recommended that the person appointed to conduct the cross-examination should be the legal representative for the accused for the purposes of that cross-examination: see New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Questioning of Complainants by Unrepresented Accused in Sexual Offence Trials, Report No 101 (2003), [5.38], Rec 7.}

Who asks the questions?

28.116 In the Commonwealth, NSW and ACT jurisdictions, the defendant’s cross-examination questions are to be asked on their behalf by ‘a person appointed by the court’. The role of the appointed person is simply to ask the questions. In NSW and the ACT it is made clear that this appointed person ‘must not independently give the accused person legal or other advice’.\footnote{Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 357; Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 25A(1)(c); Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 13B(2)(b); Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 5(1)(b).}

28.117 In Western Australia, South Australia and the NT, the defendant’s cross-examination questions are either put by the court or a person appointed by the court.\footnote{Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 25A(1)(c); Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 5(1)(b).} In Western Australia and the NT the questions must be ‘repeated accurately’ by the judge or other appointed person.\footnote{Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 25A(1)(c); Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 5(1)(b).}

28.118 In Victoria\footnote{Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 13B(2)(b).} and Queensland,\footnote{Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 357.} the person who asks the questions must be a legal practitioner and has a more active legal role in asking the questions. In Victoria the court ‘must order Victoria Legal Aid to provide legal representation’ to the accused for the purpose of cross-examining the protected witness.\footnote{Criminal Procedure Act 1977 (Qld) s 21O(2)(b). The legal practitioner provided by Victoria Legal Aid ‘must act in the best interests of the accused person if the accused person does not give any instructions to that legal practitioner’. In Queensland, the lawyer appointed to ask the questions on behalf of the accused is ‘the person’s legal representative for the purposes only of the cross-examination’.

28.119 In all the jurisdictions where this alternative mode of cross-examination is conducted, the judge is required to explain to the jury that this is a ‘standard’ or ‘routine’ procedure, and that they are not to draw any adverse inferences from this practice, nor are they to give the witness’ evidence any greater or lesser weight.

28.120 A key difference of approach in the jurisdictions—and in the literature on this issue—is whether the person appointed to ask the cross-examination questions on behalf of the accused should be legally trained and in a position to provide the accused with legal advice in the context of the cross-examination only.

28.121 The NSWLRC’s report on this issue canvassed whether it was necessary for the person to be a legal practitioner. Reasons for not having a legal practitioner included the fact that the person has ‘already decided against legal representation’ and that it is not a necessary requirement. Ultimately, the NSWLRC concluded that a legal practitioner should cross-examine the complainant as ‘this is not only in the interests of the accused, but also of the administration of justice, particularly since sexual offences are such serious charges’.

28.122 The approach in NSW, which involves the appointment of a person who is not necessarily legally trained and is specifically not to provide legal advice, has been held to be valid. It has, however, been criticised, including by judicial officers. The NSWLRC and the VLRC both recommended that the appointed representative should be legally trained and in a position to provide legal advice for the purposes of cross examination. This is the approach that has been enacted in Victoria.

Submissions and consultations

28.123 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that federal, state and territory legislation should: prohibit an unrepresented defendant from personally cross-examining any complainant or other witness in sexual assault proceedings; and provide that any person conducting such cross-examination is a legal practitioner representing

---

195 Ibid s 357(4). Where an accused refuses this representation, the court must warn them that they will not be allowed to adduce evidence from another witness that contradicts the evidence of the protected witness where the protected witness has not been given the opportunity to respond to that contradictory evidence: Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 357(5). The ACT also makes this explicit in its legislation: Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 38D(4)(b). This is known as the rule in Browne v Dunn: Browne v Dunn (1893) 6 R 67.

196 Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 21P.

197 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 29A(A); Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 358; Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 21R; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 13B(4); Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) s 38D(7); Evidence Act 1939 (NT) s 21A(3).

198 New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Questioning of Complainants by Unrepresented Accused in Sexual Offence Trials, Report No 101 (2003), [5.6].

199 See Ibid [5.19]–[5.20].

201 For example, by the trial judge (Sully J) in R v MSK (2004) 61 NSWLR 204.

202 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 357.
the interests of the defendant.203 There was no objection to the proposal that restrictions on the cross-examination of complainants in sexual offence proceedings by unrepresented defendants should apply in all Australian jurisdictions. The Commissioner for Children (Tas), for example, submitted further that Tasmania should legislate to prohibit ‘personal cross-examination of child witnesses by an unrepresented accused in all cases, not just those of a sexual nature’.204

28.124 Stakeholders expressed different views, however, on who should ask questions on the defendant’s behalf. While some stakeholders agreed that the person asking the questions should be a legal practitioner,205 most stakeholders who responded to the second aspect of the proposal opposed the requirement that the questioner be a legal practitioner or expressly supported the NSW model, under which questions may be asked by any person appointed by the court.206

28.125 The Law Society of NSW, for example, observed that ‘it is not appropriate for a legal practitioner to undertake the role of questioner’ in NSW because a person appointed by the court is limited to asking the complainant only the questions that the accused person requests,207 and is therefore ‘acting merely as a mouthpiece’ for the defendant.

The limited terms of engagement impact on a practitioner’s ability to act in the client’s interests, and to prepare and conduct a full interrogation of the witness. Acting in such a capacity conflicts with a practitioner’s legal, professional and ethical obligations to the client and the court.208

28.126 The Law Council of Australia agreed that the person conducting a cross-examination should be a person appointed by the court to act as the defendant’s ‘mouthpiece’ and ‘not representing his or her interests of the defendant’.209

Commissioners’ views

28.127 The Commissions recommend that federal, state and territory legislation prohibit an unrepresented defendant from personally cross-examining any complainant, child witness or other vulnerable witness in any sexual assault proceeding.

28.128 The widely accepted rationale for prohibiting an unrepresented defendant from personally cross-examining any complainant in sexual assault proceedings is to avoid causing unnecessary distress or humiliation to complainants.210 Only Tasmania currently has no express restrictions on cross-examination of complainants by unrepresented defendants in sexual assault proceedings. As discussed above, existing 204 Commissioner for Children (Tas), Submission FV 62, 1 June 2010.

205 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Barrister, Consultation, Sydney, 10 June 2010.
206 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010.
207 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294A(3).
208 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
prohibitions vary in relation to the categories of witness covered. In the Commissions’ view, it is also important to protect child witnesses and other witnesses defined as vulnerable.

28.129 The Commissions consider that it is inappropriate to have the judicial officer ask questions on behalf of the accused. Such an approach (which exists in the NT and Western Australia) places a judicial officer in a difficult position in determining the admissibility of the questions and may raise perceptions of bias.211

28.130 There are differences of opinion about who should ask questions on behalf of the defendant and the extent to which legal representation should be provided. On one hand, the critical advantages of legal practitioner involvement include: benefits associated with the professional duty the lawyer owes to the court and the client; the skills that lawyers bring to this work in terms of understanding the rules of evidence; the public interest in testing the evidence presented by the witness, and in addressing the imbalance between the prosecution and the unrepresented defendant.212

28.131 On the other hand, there are practical problems in requiring legal representation to be provided by legal aid commissions or otherwise and, in effect, forcing legal representation for these purposes onto a defendant. There may also be ethical problems for legal practitioners required to ask questions on behalf of a defendant. For these reasons, the Commissions do not recommend that legislation require any person conducting cross-examination on behalf of an unrepresented defendant to be a legal practitioner.

28.132 In the Commissions’ view, an unrepresented defendant in sexual assault proceedings should be permitted to examine the complainant through a person appointed by the court to ask questions on behalf of the defendant. Such a person need not be a legal practitioner and should not independently give the defendant legal or other advice.

28.133 As discussed above, SCAG is developing, through the National Working Group on Evidence, proposed amendments to the uniform Evidence Acts dealing with vulnerable witness provisions. Model provisions are expected to be drafted later in 2010 and may deal with aspects of this issue.213

212 See New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Questioning of Complainants by Unrepresented Accused in Sexual Offence Trials, Report No 101 (2003), [5.7]-[5.10].

Recommendation 28–5  Federal, state and territory legislation should:

(a) prohibit an unrepresented defendant from personally cross-examining any complainant, child witness or other vulnerable witness in sexual assault proceedings; and

(b) provide that an unrepresented defendant be permitted to cross-examine the complainant through a person appointed by the court to ask questions on behalf of the defendant.

Other aspects of giving evidence

28.134 Leaving aside the specific issue of cross-examination, some jurisdictions provide ‘alternative’ or ‘special’ arrangements for the giving of evidence by complainants or other witnesses in sexual offence proceedings. Aspects of these arrangements were discussed in Chapter 26, in relation to the use of pre-recorded evidence.

28.135 These regimes provide a range of measures dealing with the giving of contemporaneous evidence by closed circuit television (CCTV) or video-link, the use of screening to restrict contact between the witness and the defendant, and the exclusion of persons from the court.214 All jurisdictions also permit a complainant in sexual offence proceedings to have a support person present with them while they give evidence.215

28.136 There are some variations among jurisdictions. In most jurisdictions, the giving of evidence by way of alternative or special arrangements ‘may’ be ordered by the court.216 In other cases, the arrangements are something to which, subject to exceptions, the complainant is entitled,217 or are mandatory (especially in the case of evidence given by children).218

28.137 Some methods for giving evidence by complainants, such as the use of CCTV, are broadly used. However, not all jurisdictions expressly permit, for example, the use of screens or planned seating arrangements;219 or require evidence of the complainant in sexual offence proceedings to be given in closed court.220

---

214 For example, Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294B; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 13.
215 For example, Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294C; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 360(c).
216 For example, Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 106R; Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act 2001 (Tas) s 8.
217 For example, Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294B; Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 13.
218 For example, Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 15Y1.
219 For example, Tasmania.
220 For example, while a court in Victoria may direct that only persons specified by the court be permitted to be present while the witness is giving evidence, in NSW, proceedings must be held in closed court when the complainant gives evidence: Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 291; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 360(d).
28.138 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether there are significant gaps or inconsistencies among Australian jurisdictions in relation to ‘alternative’ or ‘special’ arrangements for the giving of evidence by complainants or other witnesses in sexual offence proceedings.221

28.139 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria noted that, in Victoria, special hearings are not available in summary proceedings and, that in terms of consistency of policy, it is not clear why ‘child complainants in Children’s Court rape prosecutions should not be able to have their evidence visually recorded, and if necessary replayed on appeal’. The definition of a sexual offence for the purpose of accessing alternative arrangements was also criticised for not extending to all offences in which the offending conduct is of a sexual nature.222

28.140 The SCAG National Working Group on Evidence is expected to include consideration of ‘alternative’ or ‘special’ arrangements for the giving of evidence by vulnerable witnesses.223 The Commissions do not, therefore, make any proposals for reform of these aspects of vulnerable witness protection.

Evidence on re-trial or appeal

28.141 Chapter 26 noted that some jurisdictions provide that pre-recorded audiovisual evidence of complainants in sexual offence proceedings may be admissible in evidence in a re-trial or appeal.224

28.142 Such provisions may also apply to a recording of a complainant’s evidence at trial. For example, the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) provides that such a recording ‘is admissible in evidence as if its contents were the direct testimony of the complainant’, including, unless the relevant court otherwise orders, in ‘any new trial of, or appeal from, the proceeding’.225

28.143 NSW has introduced broader provisions relating to evidence in re-trials of sexual offence proceedings.226 The Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) provides that if a person is convicted of a prescribed sexual offence and, on an appeal against the conviction, a new trial is ordered, the prosecutor may tender as evidence in the new trial ‘a record of the original evidence of the complainant’, despite the rule against hearsay evidence.227 While the original evidence might include any pre-recorded evidence used in the trial,228 it covers ‘all evidence given by the complainant in the proceedings from which the conviction arose’, including court transcripts of

---

221 Consultation Paper, Question 18–13.
222 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. On 26 June 2010, the application of div 4 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) was extended to include the summary offences of obscene, indecent, and threatening language, offensive or indecent behaviour and indecent exposure.
224 For example, Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) pt 5 div 3; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 374.
225 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) s 379.
226 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) pt 5 div 3 inserted by the Criminal Procedure Amendment (Evidence) Act 2003 (NSW).
227 Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 306B.
228 Such as a recording of a police interview: ibid s 306U.
28. Other Trial Processes

If a record of the original evidence of the complainant is admitted in proceedings, the complainant is not compellable to give any further evidence in the proceedings, including for the purpose of any examination in chief, cross-examination or re-examination.\(^{229}\)

28.144 The problem addressed by the provision was described as being that:

Not surprisingly, some complainants who have given evidence that resulted in a conviction decide they simply cannot return to give evidence again if a new trial is ordered on appeal. Significant time will have passed and the complainant will have tried as best as possible to put the matter out of their mind.\(^{231}\)

28.145 Similar, but more limited, provisions have been enacted in other jurisdictions. For example, in South Australia, an ‘official record’ of the evidence of a vulnerable witness may be admitted as evidence in later proceedings, at the discretion of the court. Where such evidence is admitted it ‘may relieve the witness, wholly or in part, from an obligation to give evidence in the later proceedings’.\(^{232}\)

Submissions and consultations

28.146 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether federal, state and territory legislation should permit prosecutors to tender a record of the original evidence of the complainant in any re-trial ordered on appeal.\(^{233}\) The Commissions suggested that such legislation might be modelled on that in NSW.

28.147 Stakeholders who addressed the question generally expressed support for such reform.\(^{234}\) The National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence noted that such provisions alleviate ‘the need to apply more stress on a victim and re-traumatising them by having to repeat evidence, often years after the event. It prevents them from being able to get on with their lives and can effectively put their lives “on hold” ’.\(^{235}\) The Women’s Legal Service Queensland noted concerns that, if the jury on re-trial do not see the complainant, re-trials simply using records of the original evidence ‘may just become yet another acquittal’.\(^{236}\)

Commissions’ views

28.148 In the Commissions’ view it would be desirable to harmonise federal, state and territory approaches to the use in re-trials, of records of the original evidence of the complainant—including pre-recorded or recorded audiovisual evidence. The NSW

---

\(^{229}\) Ibid s 306B.

\(^{230}\) Ibid s 306C.

\(^{232}\) Evidence Act 1929 (SA) s 13D.

\(^{233}\) Consultation Paper, Question 18–14.

legislation, discussed above, provides the most comprehensive model on which to base reform.

28.149 The Commissions note that the SCAG National Working Group on Evidence work is expected to include consideration of using audiovisual records of a witness to give evidence in a re-trial.237

Recommendation 28–6 Federal, state and territory legislation should permit prosecutors to tender a record of the original evidence of the complainant in any re-trial ordered on appeal.

---

Part H

Overarching Issues
29. Integrated Responses

Contents

Introduction 1349
   Integrated responses 1349
   Terminology 1350
Integrates responses in the context of family violence 1352
Integrates responses in the context of child protection 1360
Essential elements of integrated responses 1369
   Common principles and objectives 1370
   Inter-agency collaboration 1373
   Victim support services 1378
   Legal advice and representation 1385
   Victims’ compensation 1388
   Maintaining momentum 1395

Introduction

29.1 This chapter examines integrated responses across Australia to issues of family violence and child maltreatment, including the essential elements of such responses: common policies and objectives; inter-agency collaboration; and the provision of victim support, including legal services and victims’ compensation. Information sharing, which underpins effective integrated responses, is discussed in Chapter 30. Specialisation—in particular specialised courts—which may also be a feature of integrated responses, is discussed in Chapter 32.

Integrated responses

29.2 ‘Integrated responses’ to family violence have flourished since a pioneering model, the Domestic Abuse Intervention Project, was established in Duluth, Minnesota in 1981 (the Duluth Model). This model is based on four key principles: the need for coordination and cooperation between agencies; the need for collaboration between partners; a focus on victim safety; and the need for offenders to be held accountable for their actions.1 The Duluth model features offender programs, community awareness-raising and training, and case management. It works in tandem with, and monitors,

---

1 Domestic Abuse Intervention Programs, Duluth Model on Public Intervention <www.theduluthmodel.org/duluthmodelonpublic.php> at 11 January 2010.
Terminology

Integration

29.3 ‘Integration’ is sometimes considered synonymous with the terms ‘coordination’, ‘cooperation’ and ‘collaboration’. These latter terms tend to indicate degrees of integration. Agencies that coordinate service delivery ‘might share information and dovetail their processes but they do so essentially in order to each pursue their own goals more efficiently’. Integration, on the other hand, requires agencies to decide on and articulate common goals and agree on ways to pursue those goals. Integration of services is more than coordinated service delivery—it is a whole new service. Co-location of agencies, agreed protocols and codes of practice, joint service delivery, agencies reconstituting or realigning their core business to confront the challenges posed by a broadened conception of the problem: these are the key indicators of an integrated response.

29.4 Cooperation, coordination and integration may be conceptualised as part of a scale of integration, as set out below:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Autonomy</th>
<th>Cooperative links</th>
<th>Coordination</th>
<th>Integration</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Parties/agencies act without reference to each other, although the actions of one may affect the other(s).</td>
<td>Parties establish ongoing ties, but formal surrender of independence does not occur. A willingness to work together for some common goals. Communication emphasised. Requires goodwill and some mutual understanding.</td>
<td>Planned harmonisation of activities between the separate parties. Duplication of activities and resources is minimised. Requires agreed plans and protocols or appointment of an external coordinator or (case) manager.</td>
<td>Links between the separate parties draw them into a single system. Boundaries between parties begin to dissolve as they become effectively work units of sub groups within a single larger organisation.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

29.5 According to this scale, most of the ‘integrated responses’ described in this chapter are more accurately characterised as forming cooperative links or coordination, rather than integration.

29.6 Integration may occur at different levels, including national, state government or local level, and between individual consumers and staff. The degree of integration may be loose—where there are independent decentralised organisations ‘interacting as the occasion arises’: or tight, where there are centralised independent organisational units acting in a coordinated or collaborative way.5

29.7 There are also different models of integration. A report produced for the NSW Cabinet Office and Premier’s Department in 2005 identified 10 different models of service delivery, including ‘one stop shops’ (involving co-location of services), ‘case management’ (integrated delivery of services focusing on client outcomes) and ‘inter-agency collaboration’.6 The report noted that most projects tend to combine elements of these different conceptual models.

Integrated responses

29.8 The term ‘integrated responses’ is typically used in the literature to refer specifically to inter-agency models of collaboration, often based on the Duluth model. They may be distinguished from ‘whole of government’ responses to family violence, which are government policy frameworks that span a range of departments and agencies. Whole of government responses may form an element of an integrated response (as discussed below), but they do not necessarily exhibit other features of an integrated response such as mechanisms for inter-agency collaboration and service delivery.

29.9 Features of an integrated response may include:

- common policies and objectives, potentially including pro-arrest and prosecution policies;7
- inter-agency collaboration and information sharing, which may include: coordinated leadership across services and resources; sharing of resources and protocols; and inter-agency tracking and management of family violence incidents;
- the provision of victim support;
- commitment to ongoing training and education;8
- ongoing data collection and evaluation, with a view to system review and process improvements;9 and
- specialised family violence courts, lists, and offender programs for those who engage in family violence.10

29.10 While a comprehensive integrated response has all of these features, not all features are required for a project to be considered an integrated response. Both

---

5 Ibid, 5.
6 Ibid.
7 Pro-arrest and pro-prosecution policies are discussed in Chs 8 and 9.
8 Discussed in Ch 31.
9 Discussed in Ch 31.
comprehensive, and more limited, integrated responses in the family violence and child protection contexts in Australia are discussed below.

Integrated responses in the context of family violence

29.11 Integrated responses to family violence in Australia have flourished in the past decade. The most comprehensive responses operate in the smaller jurisdictions of the ACT and Tasmania, combining both policy and operational elements. In Victoria, a broader policy response has been initiated, with funding for smaller-scale local partnerships as part of an Integrated Family Violence Service program. In other Australian jurisdictions, the focus has been on small-scale projects. The following is a brief overview of the large-scale projects, and notable smaller-scale projects, in each Australian jurisdiction.\(^\text{11}\)

Australian Capital Territory

29.12 The Family Violence Intervention Program (FVIP) is a coordinated criminal justice response established in 1998, following recommendations of the ACT Community Law Reform Committee in 1995.\(^\text{12}\) It includes most of the key elements of the Duluth model. Its focus is the criminal justice system in the context of family violence. The FVIP operates within the context of an overarching ACT Government policy framework oriented towards the safety of women and children.\(^\text{13}\)

29.13 The FVIP has no legislative basis and operates under protocols established in 1998 and under a 2006 Memorandum of Agreement. The key agencies involved are the Australian Federal Police (ACT Policing); Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ODPP); ACT Magistrates Court; ACT Corrective Services; Domestic Violence Crisis Service (DVCS); Office for Children, Youth and Family Support; the Department of Justice and Community Safety; and the Office of the Victims of Crime Coordinator.

29.14 At the policy level, the FVIP is steered by a coordinating committee chaired by the Victims of Crime Coordinator (acting as the Domestic Violence Project Coordinator).\(^\text{14}\) The role of the committee is to act as the forum for discussion about strategic planning and coordination, as well as policy and procedural frameworks.

29.15 The core components of the FVIP are:

- pro-charge, pro-arrest policies with a presumption against bail;

\(^{11}\) Descriptions of these projects are usefully compiled by the Australian Domestic Violence Clearinghouse in its Good Practice Database: see Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Good Practice Database <www.austdvclearinghouse.unsw.edu.au/good_practice.html> at 11 January 2010.

\(^{14}\) The Domestic Violence Project Coordinator is a statutory appointment under the Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986 (ACT), and the Victims of Crime Coordinator is a statutory appointment under the Victims of Crime Act 1994 (ACT).
29. Integrated Responses

- early provision of victim support (by DVCS);
- pro-prosecution policies;
- coordination and case management; and
- an offender program as a sentencing option.\(^\text{15}\)

29.16 Under the FVIP, police are encouraged to lay charges and arrest offenders when they are called to an incident. They are trained in evidence collection methods particular to family violence and equipped with Family Violence Investigation Kits. DVCS workers are contacted to attend all family-violence related incidents and offer victim support services at the time of the incident, as well as ongoing victim support. The police identify all family violence incidents and these are transferred to a specialist list for family violence matters in the Magistrates Court.

29.17 The ODPP is responsible for prosecuting offences and their policy is to continue prosecutions even where victims are reluctant or give unfavourable evidence. Evidence is disclosed earlier, in line with a practice direction, and all pre-trial matters are managed by a single magistrate, although trials are heard by other magistrates in the court. If a person is found guilty, the usual result is the imposition of a good behaviour bond with a number of conditions, and may include a mandated referral to a behaviour change program for offenders run by ACT Corrective Services.

29.18 The FVIP was implemented in phases, and a key feature is the periodic evaluation of the program. The evaluations indicate that the FVIP has helped to establish better relations between agencies; has contributed to victim safety and protection; has contributed to offender accountability by ensuring incidents are charged and processed in court; and has implemented practices to improve and develop the program.\(^\text{16}\)

New South Wales

29.19 In New South Wales, integrated responses to family violence have tended to be localised, smaller-scale and focused on service delivery. These projects include:

- Mt Druitt Family Violence Response and Support Strategy;
- Canterbury Bankstown Inter-Agency Domestic Violence Response Team;
- Green Valley Domestic Violence Service;
- Domestic Assault Response Team (Tuggerah Lakes);
- Domestic Violence Intervention Response Team (Brisbane Waters);
- Staying Home Leaving Violence (Bega and East Sydney);
- Operation Choice (Shoalhaven and Lake Illawarra);

Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- Manning/Great Lakes Police and Women’s Refuge Partnership Against Domestic Violence Project; and
- Domestic Violence Intervention Court Model (Wagga Wagga and Campbelltown) (discussed in Chapter 32). 17

29.20 Some of these, such as the Domestic Violence Intervention Response Team, involve police referring victims to victim support workers. The Green Valley project refers victims of family violence to a specialist team of family violence, drug and alcohol and child protection workers located within NSW Health, and also facilitates applications for housing.

29.21 The Wyong and Tuggerah Lakes Domestic Assault Response Team (DART) combines police and Community Services caseworkers. When police apply for a protection order in relation to family violence, the DART is alerted and performs an extensive background check on the parties, including any child protection interventions and outcomes and current or pending Family Court orders. The police conduct home visits or contact victims and, if children are involved, a DART caseworker also comes to explain child protection issues and make appropriate referrals. In joint meetings between Community Services and police, high-risk families are identified for support through ‘intensive case management’. 18

29.22 In 2007, an independent review emphasised the need for coordination in the delivery of services in relation to family violence in NSW. 19 This has led to the establishment of both a centralised Violence Prevention Coordination Unit (VPCU) within the NSW Department of Premier and Cabinet, and an expert advisory committee, the Premier’s Council on Preventing Violence against Women. The VPCU and the Premier’s Council are currently developing a Strategic Framework for addressing family violence in NSW, which is likely to strengthen inter-agency responses. 20

Northern Territory

29.23 In the Northern Territory, the Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council (NPY Women’s Council) has established the Cross Borders Domestic Violence Service, which covers a remote area crossing the borders of the Northern Territory, South Australia and Western Australia. It provides access to 17 The projects are listed in NSW Ombudsman, Domestic Violence: Improving Police Practice (2006), 47. The Commissions are aware that other arrangements may apply informally, such as a protocol for expediting information exchange in family violence matters on the Katoomba and Lithgow circuit of the Local Court, which developed from a court users’ meeting.

---

medical and legal services, and also focuses on the development of inter-agency protocols.\textsuperscript{21}

\textbf{Queensland}

29.24 In 2009, Queensland released a whole of government strategy for addressing family violence.\textsuperscript{22} This focused on five areas of reform: prevention; early identification and intervention; connected victim support services; perpetrator accountability; and system planning and coordination.\textsuperscript{23} It also included a focus on improving integrated responses.\textsuperscript{24} As part of the Queensland Government’s 2009–10 program of action, one key measure is to test an enhanced integrated response in Rockhampton comprising: case management services for those with multiple support needs; a specialised court program; enhanced legal services; offender programs; community awareness raising and capacity building of the service sector.\textsuperscript{25}

29.25 A long-running integrated response in Queensland is the Gold Coast Domestic Violence Integrated Response (GCDVIR), a community-based program that has been operating since 1996. It has a coordinating committee with representatives from family violence centres and shelters; police; the Gold Coast Hospital; the Southport Magistrates Court; Legal Aid; the offenders’ program service provider; and government departments for corrective services, justice, child safety, community services, and housing.

29.26 The GCDVIR has developed a number of programs, including:

- the Police Fax Back Project;
- Domestic Violence Court Assistance Program: a secure and specially designed family violence office at the Southport Magistrates Court, staffed by the Domestic Violence Prevention Centre Gold Coast Inc (DVPC), which provides victim support, information and advocacy;
- Mandated Men’s Program: a 24-week court-ordered family violence program for offenders, run collaboratively by Community Correction Southport and DVPC;
- the Safety First Project: a service where basic information and a comprehensive risk assessment about women leaving refuges is faxed to the DVPC for quicker access to its services;

\textsuperscript{23} Ibid, 8–9.

\textsuperscript{24} Ibid, 11.

Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- inter-agency protocols on communication and inter-agency training; and
- development of family violence resources.26

29.27 Townsville and Thuringowa in northern Queensland have developed an integrated response to family violence, known as Dovetail. Government partners include Centrelink, Corrective Services, Department of Child Safety, Department of Communities and Department of Housing. Dovetail partners also include the legal sector—Family Court, Legal Aid, Legal Services, Townsville Magistrates Court—as well as the police; city councils; and non-government services, including the Northern Queensland Domestic Violence Resource Service, Salvation Army, and women’s services.27

29.28 These agencies commit to key principles and goals, including the development of protocols for all services, and monitoring of the legislation and family violence systems. Agencies meet regularly and monitor relevant programs, which include fax-back protocols with the police; court support; and offender programs.

29.29 The Logan River Valley Integrated Community Response to Domestic Violence Group Fax-Back Project also provides a fax-back process in that region.28

South Australia

29.30 The South Australian Government, as part of its Women’s Safety Strategy and Keeping them Safe—Child Protection Agenda, piloted the Family Safety Framework (FSF) in Holden Hill, the South Coast Local Service area and the Far North Local Service Area between late 2007 and 2008.

29.31 The FSF involves an inter-agency agreement on key principles and is focused on targeting high risk families for risk assessment by a local Family Safety Meeting, attended by a range of agencies. The sharing of information in that meeting is governed by a specially developed Information Protocol, and an Action Plan is prepared for each referral. The agencies involved in the Protocol include the police, a range of government departments, and non-government family violence services. No additional funding was allocated to agencies.

29.32 The FSF was evaluated in November 2008 and was found to have achieved improved responses to victims and their children and enhanced victim safety and reduced re-victimisation.29 In October 2009, the FSF was expanded to three other regions.30

Tasmania

29.33 Tasmania has implemented ‘Safe at Home’, an integrated whole of government criminal justice response to family violence. Safe at Home comprises 16 funded initiatives across the Departments of Justice; Police and Public Safety; Health and Human Services; and Premier and Cabinet. Part of the response included the reforms that led to the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas). The Department of Justice is responsible for its implementation; a Statewide Steering Committee chaired by the Department of Premier and Cabinet is responsible for high level issues including resource distribution; and an Inter-Departmental Committee chaired by the Department of Justice is responsible for operational planning and development, supported by Regional Coordinating Committees.31

29.34 In respect of police, initiatives include a Family Violence Response and Referral Line, which operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week and refers callers either to police, counselling or support services; specialist Victim Safety Response Teams (VSRT) in each policing district; and specialist police prosecutors. Police attending family violence incidents play a key role in identifying the presence of family violence; administering risk assessment tools; and entering a Family Violence Management System report which is quality assured by a VSRT or supervising Sergeant. Operational police also issue police-initiated Family Violence Orders, apply for Family Violence Orders, determine bail, and prepare oppositions to bail. Police are also responsible for notifying Children and Family Services if a child is affected by family violence.32

29.35 There are weekly Integrated Case Coordination (ICC) meetings attended by relevant agencies to consider all new and ‘active’ family violence cases in each policing district, supported by an ICC database linking police and Department of Justice databases.33

29.36 Victim support is provided by a Court Support and Liaison Service, a Child Witness Service and a Special Needs Liaison Service, which provide support to victims, children and people with special needs such as drug and alcohol problems. In addition, there is a specialist Children and Young Person’s Program counselling service. For offenders, there is a Family Violence Offender Intervention Program.

29.37 Specific additional funding has been provided for legal aid, the Tasmanian Magistrates Court and the Department responsible for child protection. There has also been specific funding for alternative accommodation for offenders removed from their homes,34 and for the Ya Pulingina Kani Aboriginal Advisory Group, to advise on the most culturally appropriate ways to manage Indigenous offenders and provide support to victims.

32 Ibid, 12.
33 Funding has been provided for an Integrated Case Coordination Management System as the next stage: Ibid, 13.
34 Ibid, 15. However, this funding was returned from the contracted non-government service provider as the service was unsuccessful.
29.38 The Safe at Home initiative was independently reviewed in June 2009. The review found evidence that the objectives were being achieved, but made 37 recommendations for improvement, including: the adoption of family safety as a unifying paradigm; a strengthened risk assessment program; a Victims' Rights Charter; case management for high-risk offenders; establishment of a specialist family violence court and use of specialist prosecutors; and improved support for child witnesses.

Victoria

29.39 In 2002, the Victorian Government established a Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence, including representatives from police, government departments, family violence services, the courts, peak bodies for family violence, support organisations for sexual assault victims, the No to Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association, legal services and the Victorian Health Promotion Foundation. This Committee advised on the need for, and developed a model for, an integrated response in Victoria. The Government also established an Indigenous Family Violence Task Force in 2002, which reported in 2003.

29.40 Since 2005, the Victorian Government has invested $140 million in whole of government policies to address violence against women. These initiatives include:

- reforms to family violence and sexual offences legislation, based on the recommendations in two reports of the Victorian Law Reform Commission;
- a new Code of Practice and five-year strategy plan for the Victorian police in respect of family violence;
- the establishment of specialist family violence courts, as well as sexual assault lists and prosecution teams and multi-disciplinary sexual assault centres;
- the provision of counselling and offender treatment programs in the context of family violence and sexual assault;
- the establishment and funding of a child witness service;
- funding for the Department of Human Services to develop partnerships with community and local organisations to provide integrated services such as housing, counselling and treatment programs (known as the Integrated Family Violence Service program);

35 Ibid.
38 Office of Women’s Policy (Vic), Right to Respect: Victoria’s Plan to Prevent Violence Against Women 2010–2020 (2009), 4. These strategies involve the Minister for Housing and Minister for Local Government; the Minister for Women’s Affairs; the Attorney-General; the Minister for Police and Emergency Services; and the Minister for Community Services and Children.
29. Integrated Responses

- the development of a comprehensive risk assessment framework and tools;\(^{41}\) and
- ten-year plans to: address Indigenous family violence;\(^{42}\) prevent violence against women;\(^{43}\) and the forthcoming Strategic Framework for Family Violence Reform 2010–2020 to build on existing reforms for the handling of family violence.

29.41 The Integrated Family Violence Service program includes common risk assessment tools, protocols, and accreditation and funding for specialist family violence services according to a Code of Practice.\(^{44}\)

29.42 One notable multi-agency local project in Victoria is the Violence Against Women Integrated Services Partnership project in Warrnambool. The key focus of this partnership has been the establishment of protocols responding to family violence with the police, the Magistrates’ Court, Accident and Emergency Department at South West Healthcare, Emma House Domestic Violence Services and the Salvation Army. These partners refer victims, with their consent, to Emma House, through a fax-back service. Services such as counselling, referrals to mental health and sexual assault services, and a children’s worker are provided. The Salvation Army provides emergency accommodation for offenders; the Warrnambool Magistrates’ Court operates a special family violence list to enable victim support on-site; the RSPCA provides emergency accommodation for pets; and the partnership meets monthly to discuss broader strategic issues.\(^{45}\)

Western Australia

29.43 In Western Australia, an integrated response is developing through whole of government strategic plans to address family violence, developed and implemented by a Senior Officers’ Group, consisting of senior state and Australian Government departmental representatives as well as the community sector. As part of the 2004–08 plan, the Western Australian Government developed specialist Family Violence Courts and protocols between the police and child protection authorities.\(^{46}\)

29.44 The 2009–13 plan commits to a range of initiatives, including a focus on prevention and early intervention strategies; and a ‘statewide integrated response’ for victims of family violence, including an accessible, integrated 24-hour response throughout the state.\(^{47}\)

\(^{46}\) Ibid.
There are two notable local multi-agency projects in Western Australia. The first inter-agency model adopted in Western Australia was the Armadale Domestic Violence Intervention Project (ADVIP), established in 1993. It includes representatives from the police, women’s refuges, community corrections, the hospital and Curtin University. Fortnightly Core Group meetings are held to discuss problems in specific cases and to coordinate interventions in particular cases, while monthly meetings of the Inter-agency Safety Committee focus on broader systemic issues. An accountability audit has been conducted of the ADVIP.

Domestic Violence Advocacy Support Central in Perth provides a ‘one stop shop’ for family violence services, through the co-location of refuge, legal, family support, police and counselling services. The agencies involved include Orana Women’s Refuge, Legal Aid, Police and Department for Community Development, with visiting sessions from Centrecare and the Domestic Violence Children’s Counselling Service.

In the child protection context, a number of the states and territories have established inter-agency models to deliver coordinated services to children and young people who have been abused, or who are at risk of abuse. Each state and territory has developed specific investigative models based on its own child protection legislation and discrete definitions of abuse and neglect. These deal with the way in which abuse of children and young people is reported, referrals to other agencies, information exchange between agencies, the conduct of investigations and interviews, and how services are delivered. While some of these processes are legislatively based, practical guidance is often provided through a variety of protocols, inter-agency guidelines and memorandums of understanding (MOUs).

In addition, the Family Court of Australia has developed a case management model, the Magellan project—which is discussed further below—to address the needs of children and families where serious allegations of sexual or physical abuse are raised during parenting disputes in the Family Court.

In several jurisdictions—including South Australia, the ACT and the Northern Territory—reports of child abuse are directed to a centralised intake service or hotline. In Victoria, Queensland and Western Australia, reports are directed to the district child protection department office closest to the child’s location, from which they are then referred to the police and/or an inter-agency team.\textsuperscript{53}

---

49 Ibid.

29.50 In Victoria, reports can either be made to the child protection agency or the community-based Child and Family Information Referral Support Teams (Child FIRST). Where the initial assessment reveals safety concerns for the child, the matter is referred to the child protection agency. Where the concerns are more about a child’s wellbeing, the matter will be referred to Child FIRST (or another community service organisation).\textsuperscript{54} A similar community-based intake model has recently been adopted in Tasmania.\textsuperscript{55}

29.51 In NSW, mandatory reporters who work in one of the six government agencies where there is a Child Wellbeing Unit (CWU)\textsuperscript{56} may make a report to their CWU. With the assistance of the specially trained staff at the CWU, the reporter will apply the Mandatory Reporters Guidance assessment tool to determine whether their concerns for the safety of the child meet the legislative threshold for intervention. Where the tool indicates that there is a ‘risk of significant harm’, the CWU will make a report to the Child Protection Helpline. If, on the other hand, the tool indicates that the matter does not satisfy the threshold, and the CWU does not have concerns about accumulated harm, CWU staff and the reporter will work together to determine where best to refer the child and the family for appropriate support and assistance.

\textit{Initial assessment and referral to police}

29.52 The systems in place for initial assessment of a report and its referral to the police and/or the inter-agency team differ in each state and territory. In a number of jurisdictions, there is a positive obligation on the child protection agency to refer a report immediately to the police where the report contains allegations of harm that may involve a criminal offence.\textsuperscript{57}

29.53 Generally, the initial assessment involves obtaining more detailed information about the child who is the subject of the report, and making an assessment of the degree of harm that the child has suffered, or the degree of risk of harm, to determine whether the report satisfies the reporting threshold. The criteria for referring cases to the police vary between jurisdictions, and sometimes even within jurisdictions. A criticism of some child protection systems has been that there is inconsistency in the

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{53} See, eg, Department of Communities (Qld), \textit{Reporting Child Abuse} (2010) <www.childsafety.qld.gov.au/child-abuse/report/index.html> at 12 April 2010 although in Tasmania, reports may also be made to community based Gateway Services.
\item \textsuperscript{55} \textit{Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997} (Tas) pt 5B, as amended by \textit{Children, Young Persons and Their Families Amendment Act 2009} (Tas).
\item \textsuperscript{56} These have been created within NSW Health (Area Health Services and the Children’s Hospital at Westmead), NSW Police, the Department of Education and Training, the Department of Housing, the Department of Ageing, Disability and Home Care and the Department of Juvenile Justice.
\item \textsuperscript{57} See, eg, \textit{Child Protection Act 1999} (Qld) s 14(2).
\end{itemize}
assessment of reports between district offices or different entry points. For example, in a review of the Victorian child protection service, the Victorian Ombudsman stated:

> Evidence obtained during my investigation shows that the degree of tolerance of risk to children, referred to as the ‘threshold’, varies across the state according to the local office’s ability to respond. I located many examples of cases where I consider that the risk of harm to children was unacceptable and the department had not intervened.58

29.54 To address this issue, a number of jurisdictions have developed and implemented diagnostic assessment tools to ensure that assessments are performed accurately and consistently across the various entry points.59

Police response to reports

29.55 The police must investigate allegations of abuse or neglect when there is a reason to believe that a criminal offence may have been committed. Invariably this involves interviewing the child or young person. The child or young person must also usually submit to an interview by community services caseworkers to assess whether there are legislative grounds for making an application to the court for a care and protection order, and to determine what family, social support and medical services should be provided.

29.56 Across the states and territories, there are different models of police responses to reports of child abuse and neglect. Essentially these can be divided into three types:

- inter-agency teams, involving police and other agencies;
- joint investigations between police and other agencies; and
- specialised police units.

29.57 Five states and territories have inter-agency teams, as follows:

- New South Wales—Joint Investigation Response Team (JIRT);
- Queensland—Suspected Child Abuse and Neglect (SCAN);
- Western Australia—ChildFirst Assessment and Interview Team (CAIT);
- Northern Territory—Child Abuse Taskforce (CAT); and
- Victoria—Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation Team (SOCIT).

29.58 All inter-agency teams include, as core members, the child protection agency and the police in each state and territory, but some jurisdictions also include other agencies or persons. For example:

- JIRT includes the health department as a core team member (although it is not co-located with the others);

---

58 Ombudsman Victoria, Own Motion Investigation into the Department of Human Services Child Protection Program (2009), [170].
59 See, eg, NSW Health, NSW Police, Department of Community Services (NSW), NSW Joint Investigative Response Team (JIRT) Review, unpublished (2006), [7.2].
29. Integrated Responses

- SCAN includes the health and education departments as core team members, as well as Indigenous representatives and other agencies as required;
- CAIT has included the health and justice departments in training programs;
- CAT includes Indigenous representatives and other agencies as required;
- SOCIT includes sexual assault counsellors as core team members, and forensic medical officers as required.

29.59 Inter-agency teams have the potential to increase the types of services and support that victims receive in addition to child protection and police assistance; and to allow access to greater information and resources by the child protection agency and the police.

29.60 Some inter-agency teams, such as SCAN in Queensland, have a legislative basis. Part 3 of the Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) sets out the membership and responsibilities of the core members of SCAN and states that its purpose is to enable a coordinated response to the protection needs of children, by facilitating:

- information sharing between members;
- planning and coordination of actions; and
- responding in a holistic and culturally responsive way to children’s protection needs.60

29.61 The JIRT program in NSW is policy-based. It provides services exclusively to children and young people aged under 18 years. The roles and responsibilities of each of the agency members are outlined in an MOU between them, which provides:

> The role of the NSW Police is to detect and investigate alleged child abuse and neglect. Where appropriate they are to initiate legal proceedings against identified offenders.

> The role of [Community Services] is to receive and assess reports of risk of harm to children and young people. [Community Services] also ensure the safety of children and their ongoing care. Where appropriate they initiate Children’s Court proceedings.

> The role of Health is to identify and report risk of harm to children and young people. They provide treatment, crisis and ongoing counselling as well as medical examinations.61

29.62 Caseworkers with the NSW child protection agency and police officers, who are specially trained in interviewing child victims, are jointly responsible for investigating allegations of abuse to determine whether a care and protection order is warranted and whether a criminal offence may have been committed.

---

60 Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 159J.

61 The original MOU was signed in 1997 and was revised in August 2006 following an inter-agency review of JIRT in 2006; see NSW Health, NSW Police, Department of Community Services (NSW), NSW Joint Investigative Response Team (JIRT) Review, unpublished (2006).
29.63 A joint response from the three agencies means that a victim is interviewed once and the information is shared among the agencies so that appropriate services are provided to the child or young person and their family members. Not having to repeat his or her story to officers from different agencies significantly reduces trauma and distress to the abuse victim.

29.64 Queensland and Victoria on occasions also organise joint investigations, sometimes between the child protection agency and the police or, in Victoria, between the child protection agency and the Sexual Offences and Child Abuse units.

Submissions and consultations

29.65 In the course of the Inquiry, a number of issues were raised in relation to the operation of inter-agency teams, for example, that the police may not always be aware of the impact of their actions in collecting evidence of abuse when matters of family violence or child abuse are raised in family law proceedings. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether the existing inter-agency arrangements were effective in practice to ensure that victims are better protected, and that professionals in each part of the system understand the consequences of their actions for other parts of the system.

29.66 A number of stakeholders suggested that parties to inter-agency arrangements, including the police, should receive ongoing training to ensure that each party clearly understands the impact of their actions for other parts of the system, and to ensure that inter-agency teams work effectively.62 One stakeholder noted that high staff turnover was a problem and that inter-agency arrangements could not rely on particular individuals to make them work.63 Legal Aid NSW commented that such arrangements have assisted professionals in different parts of the system to a limited extent to understand each others’ work and its consequences, but noted that there was scope for an improved level of cooperation.64

29.67 The Queensland Government’s view was that effective relationships between agencies are best achieved by fostering local agency connections supported by a centrally led agenda.65

Commissions’ views

29.68 In Chapter 30, the Commissions express the view that information-sharing protocols and MOUs are important, but cannot stand alone, and are dependent on the knowledge and involvement of officers and staff. Simply putting protocols in place is not sufficient. In the same way, integrated response arrangements are not simply formal arrangements between agencies. They must be given an ongoing profile among court and agency officers; they must form the basis of an ongoing and responsive

---

62 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 131, 21 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010; Commissioner for Children (Tas), Submission FV 62, 1 June 2010.
63 F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010.
64 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
relationship between the parties and must be supported and implemented in practice. Therefore, the Commissions recommend, below, that integrated responses include a set of common policies and objectives; mechanisms for inter-agency collaboration—including information-sharing protocols, regular inter-agency meetings and liaison officers—and provision for victim support. Chapter 31 acknowledges the importance of ongoing training and education programs.

The Magellan project

29.69 The Magellan project involves special management of cases where serious allegations of sexual or physical abuse of children are raised during parenting disputes in the Family Court of Australia.66 Once a case is identified as suitable for the Magellan pathway, it is dealt with by a small, designated team of judges, registrars and family consultants. The Magellan project relies on a collaborative and coordinated set of processes and procedures, with significant resources directed to each case in the early stages.67 A crucial aspect is strong inter-agency coordination, in particular with state and territory child protection agencies, which helps to ensure that problems are dealt with efficiently and that information sharing is of high quality. An independent children’s lawyer is appointed to every Magellan case. Formal protocols for information sharing between child protection agencies and federal family courts apply.

29.70 A pilot program of 100 cases was conducted in Victoria from June 1998 to December 2000,68 after which the project was rolled out by the Family Court in all states and territories, except Western Australia.

29.71 The Magellan approach commences when a Form 4 is filed with an application for parenting orders.69 The application is referred to the Family Court Magellan Registrar to be considered for inclusion in the Magellan list.70 If the court is made aware of allegations of sexual or physical abuse that it deems ‘serious’, it can request the intervention of the relevant child protection agency as a party under s 91B of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). The state or territory agency then assesses the allegations of abuse and reports its findings to the Family Court. This report (the Magellan Report) is the key mechanism for sharing information and includes information about the history of abuse in the family, any previous notifications, and subsequent action by the child protection agency. It is a significant factor in encouraging parties to settle matters, as such reports often either support or contradict a party’s assertion of abuse.71

---

In non-Magellan cases, the child protection agency does not make a report, and merely proffers information it has in respect of the child.72

29.72 A team of Magellan judges, registrars and family consultants at each family law registry manages the cases. Generally, the aim is to complete Magellan cases within six months from the case being listed. Early steps in a Magellan case include:

- making appropriate interim orders to protect the child until the matter comes on for trial;
- ordering a Magellan report from the respective state or territory child protection agency including whether it intends to intervene in the Family Court proceedings, whether it has previously investigated these or other allegations, the conclusion and the reasons for the conclusion of the investigation, and any recommendations or other relevant information;
- ordering a subpoena of the child protection agency file;
- ordering the appointment of an independent children’s lawyer; and
- ordering a detailed family report, where appropriate, analysing the family dynamics and the needs of the children.

Reviews of the Magellan project

29.73 The Magellan project was reviewed in 2001 and 2007. Both reviews noted the information-sharing and cooperative arrangements between government agencies and the courts significantly reduced friction between the child protection and family law systems.

29.74 The 2001 review found that:

- the child protection services and family court interface was much improved—the time taken by the child protection service to submit a report fell from an average of 42 days to 32 days, meaning that the reports were undertaken well within the time frame set up for their completion;
- the substantiation rate by child protection staff rose from 23% to 48%;
- disputes were resolved far more quickly, with the average time being taken falling from 17.5 months to 8.7 months;
- the average number of court events fell from an average of five to three events;
- far fewer cases proceeded to a judicial determination—only 13% proceeded this far, compared with 30% previously;
- court orders broke down less frequently—previously some 37% of final orders broke down, while 5% broke down in the new program;

72 Ibid, 146.
29. Integrated Responses

- the amount Victoria Legal Aid spent on all parties per case averaged over all cases in the pilot program was $13,770 per case—well under the cap allowed for legal aid expenditure on family law cases and compared to the $19,867 in the non-Magellan comparison group of cases;
- the proportion of highly distressed children fell from 28% to 4%; and
- the parental and legal practitioner levels of satisfaction were high.\(^{73}\)

29.75 The 2007 review—conducted by Dr Daryl Higgins—also concluded that the Magellan project encourages a greater involvement of child protection agencies in the family law system.\(^{74}\) In particular:

- Magellan cases were investigated by child protection agencies in 80% of cases, compared to 26.3% of non-Magellan cases; and
- the child protection agency planned to give evidence at trial in 22.5% of cases, compared to 1.3% of non-Magellan cases.\(^{75}\)

29.76 Both reviews indicate that the interactions of the family law and child protection systems have improved as a result of the project and its method of intensive and coordinated case management of child abuse cases.

29.77 Higgins found that child protection agency compliance with subpoenas in Magellan cases was generally high, and that this was a result of the funded role of independent children’s lawyers in:

- gathering information about the proceedings and facilitated discussions between parents where appropriate;
- procuring funding for family reports in cases where the Family Court’s internal family consultants were not used;
- approaching relevant experts to give evidence in proceedings, ascertaining their availability to give evidence and providing them with documentation relating to the matter; and
- liaising between the parties to ensure that experts selected were not opposed.\(^{76}\)

Federal Magistrates Court

29.78 The Federal Magistrates Court (FMC) has no current involvement with the Magellan project. The FMC has adopted provisions for the transfer of more complex matters that are filed in the FMC to the Family Court. This includes matters identified for the Magellan list. The court has adopted a benchmark of two days for hearing a family law matter itself or transferring the proceedings to the Family Court. With the 75 Ibid, 70 (table 5.10) and 214 (table 8.3).

---

76 Ibid, 78, 107.
implementation of a common registry for the Family Court of Australia and the FMC, the transfer of matters between the courts appears to have become less of an issue for complex child abuse cases which are part of the Magellan project.

Submissions and consultations

29.79 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether the gap between the family law and child protection systems could be resolved by collaborative arrangements, such as the Magellan project, and whether the principles of the Magellan project could be applied in the FMC.\textsuperscript{77}

29.80 There was some support for extending the principles of the Magellan project to the FMC,\textsuperscript{78} although the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department noted that any such extension would have resource implications.\textsuperscript{79} Legal Aid NSW was of the view that the Magellan principles could be applied in the FMC, including the appointment of a nominated judicial officer and registrar to case manage matters, the determination of interim and final applications in a more reasonable time frame, and the development of protocols between the courts and agencies. The submission expressed the view, however, that a Magellan report—summarising the child protection agency file—was insufficient and that child protection agencies should be more closely involved in the management of Magellan cases.\textsuperscript{80}

29.81 The Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate stated, however:

As the Family Court deals with the most complex disputes, it is appropriate for Magellan and ‘Magellan-type’ cases … to be dealt with by the Family Court. There are doubts about the effectiveness of Magellan-type principles in a high volume court like the FMC.\textsuperscript{81}

29.82 The Queensland Law Society was of the view that, given the resource implications for the FMC, Magellan matters should remain with the Family Court.\textsuperscript{82} The Law Society of NSW suggested that the proposed integration of the two courts may eliminate this issue.\textsuperscript{83} In the interim, protocols between the two courts should ensure that cases involving serious abuse are transferred to the Family Court Magellan.

\textsuperscript{78} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{79} Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{80} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{82} Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 176, 25 June 2010.
Commissions’ views

29.83 The Commissions note the positive outcomes associated with the Magellan project reflected in the two reviews discussed above. While there was some support for extending the principles of the Magellan project to the FMC, the majority of stakeholders were of the view that Magellan matters—where serious allegations of sexual or physical abuse of children are raised during parenting disputes—should be referred to and dealt with by the Family Court of Australia, applying the full range of Magellan project initiatives. In particular, the Commissions note the views of the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate that the Magellan principles might not be effective in a high volume court like the FMC. The Commissions are not, therefore, recommending that the full range of Magellan project principles be formally applied in the FMC.

29.84 On the other hand, collaborative relationships between courts and agencies involved in family law and child protection matters are important to ensure that child abuse is identified and responded to in an appropriate way. This applies in the FMC, as well as in the Family Court. In Chapter 30, the Commissions note that the FMC has protocols in place with child protection agencies in a number of jurisdictions—NSW and Queensland. These arrangements are intended to facilitate cooperation and sharing of information to ensure that the protective needs of children are met. In that chapter, the Commissions recommend that the federal family courts, including the FMC, and child protection agencies develop protocols to provide a framework for the exchange of information in those jurisdictions that do not yet have such arrangements in place. The Commissions also recommend that parties to such protocols should receive ongoing training to ensure that the arrangements are effectively implemented.

29.85 The Commissions note, in addition, the arrangements for the transfer of more complex matters, including Magellan matters, that are filed in the FMC to the Family Court of Australia and that the court has adopted a benchmark of two days for hearing a family law matter itself or transferring the proceedings to the Family Court. In the Commissions’ view, these arrangements and the benchmarked timeframe for transfer to the Family Court are appropriate.

Essential elements of integrated responses

29.86 Integrated responses offer clear benefits for service delivery to victims, including—importantly for this Inquiry—improving the experience of victims involved in multiple proceedings across different legal frameworks. For example, fax-back protocols between police and victim support services, and co-location of services, facilitate victims’ access to a range of options and referrals. Another benefit is that such responses enable networks to be formed across services and government departments at a local level, fostering collaboration and communication between key players in different legal frameworks, and providing ongoing improvements to practice and understanding.

29.87 As discussed above, a number of Australian jurisdictions have either implemented, or are in the process of implementing, various forms of integrated responses. Some of these are quite comprehensive, while others are smaller in scale, for example, liaison arrangements between police and victim support services.

29.88 In the course of the Inquiry, the Commissions sought feedback on what key features were required to ensure the success of an integrated response. The elements that emerged most clearly from consultations and submissions, which are discussed below, are: common principles and objectives; mechanisms for inter-agency collaboration; and provision of victim support, including legal representation. Information sharing, which is another essential element of integrated responses, is discussed separately in Chapter 30. Specialised courts and offender programs, which may also be features of integrated responses, are discussed in Chapter 32.

Common principles and objectives

29.89 One of the first steps in developing any integrated response is for key players to agree upon shared principles and objectives, which are sometimes set out in legislation. The Safe at Home program in Tasmania is based on the following principles:

- family violence is a crime and where evidence exists that it has been committed arrest and prosecution will occur;
- police are responsible for providing immediate intervention to secure victim safety and manage the risk that the offender might repeat or escalate the violence;
- the safety of victims is paramount;
- the victim does not determine the response of the justice system;
- wherever possible, victims should be able to choose to remain in or return (as soon as possible) to their own homes; and
- the criminal justice response to family violence should be seamless and the roles and responsibilities of each participating agency and service should be clear.

29.90 The objectives of the Program are to:

- achieve a reduction in the level of family violence in the medium to long term;

---

• improve safety for adult and child victims of family violence; and
• change the offending behaviour of those responsible for the violence.\(^90\)

29.91 Principles and objectives are sometimes set out in state and territory strategic plans or responses to family violence. For example, similar principles and objectives have been stated as part of the NSW Strategy to Reduce Violence against Women; Queensland’s whole of government response to family violence, released in July 2009;\(^91\) South Australia’s statement on the Women’s Safety Agenda;\(^92\) and Western Australia’s strategic plan for family violence.\(^93\) At the time of writing, both Victoria and the Northern Territory were preparing similar strategic plans. It is likely that these will also include shared principles and objectives, as in other state and territory plans or strategies.

29.92 Ensuring a shared understanding of the nature of family violence is a foundational step in ensuring integration. In Chapters 5 and 6, the Commissions recommend a common definition of family violence across state and territory family violence legislation, the Family Law Act and other legislation.\(^94\) In addition, in Chapter 18, the Commissions examine the need for a common approach to risk assessment for family violence based on that common definition. The Commissions consider the Victorian framework for common risk assessment to be a good model, and suggest that other state and territory governments consider the development of similar frameworks to assess and manage the risk of family violence in their jurisdictions.

29.93 In the Commissions view, this shared understanding of the nature of family violence and shared approach to risk assessment must then be reflected in the objectives and principles that underpin state and territory strategic plans and inter-agency programs. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that integrated responses should be underpinned by common policies and objectives.\(^95\)

Submissions and consultations

29.94 The Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service submitted that:

> A common set of domestic and family violence policies and objectives be adopted Australia-wide, emphasising the criminal nature of domestic and family violence; the safety of victims and accountability for perpetrators; and the need for a coordinated and integrated response to domestic and family violence which emphasises victim support.\(^96\)

---

90 Ibid.
92 South Australian Government, Our Commitment to Women’s Safety in South Australia (2005)
94 Rec 5–1.
95 Consultation Paper, Proposal 19–1(a).
The joint submission from Domestic Violence Victoria and others noted that the Victorian family violence integrated model is based on a whole of government approach in which five ministers—the Attorney-General, the Minister for Housing and Local Government, the Minister for Police and Emergency Services, the Minister for Community Services, and the Minister for Women’s Affairs and Children and Early Childhood Development—and their departments work within a single policy framework. The Family Violence Ministers Group meets quarterly, provides leadership and oversees family violence reforms:

Multi-ministerial responsibility provides a holistic approach to addressing the issue and encourages mutual accountability. Within this model Victoria has benefited from high-level leadership and the weight this carries in driving reform.\(^7\)

The National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence noted that in the ACT a ‘Wraparound’ Charter had been developed to provide an underpinning set of standards for the FVIP and expressed the view that the Charter and program represented best practice in this area.\(^\)\(^8\)

The NPY Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service noted that it was particularly important to the work of that Service that Western Australia, South Australia and the Northern Territory have common policies and objectives.\(^9\)

The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (AFVPLS Victoria) stated that integrated family violence responses were critical. Importantly, any such response required dedicated Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander strategies and services to be developed, but then incorporated into mainstream strategy. Developing dedicated strategies and services provides an opportunity for Indigenous communities to participate and lead change. The submission indicated, however, that incorporating such strategies and services into the mainstream was likely to strengthen the response of mainstream agencies to Indigenous victims of family violence.\(^10\)

Commissions’ views

Where organisations work together to develop and deliver integrated responses to family violence—whether this involves just two organisations or many more—there is value in coming to an agreement about the principles and objectives that are to underpin the response. In Chapters 5 and 6, the Commissions discuss the importance of developing a shared understanding of what amounts to family violence across the different legal frameworks considered in this Report, to help close gaps between the systems. The Commissions are also of the view that developing common principles and objectives when integrating the work of different agencies and organisations in response to family violence will help to ensure that all the parties involved in the integrated response understand what they are working together to achieve.

---

29.100 The Commissions note that the process of developing common principles and objectives should involve all the agencies and organisations that are to be involved in the integrated response, including those working with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, CALD communities and the disability sector. As noted by the AFVPLS Victoria, the development process itself is an important point of contact and empowerment for those involved. It may also provide a basis for ongoing and active collaboration between the parties, which is essential to the success of any integrated response. Inter-agency collaboration is discussed further below.

29.101 The Commissions note that there are a number of ways in which the Australian, state and territory governments may foster the development and dissemination of common principles and objectives to underpin integrated responses to family violence. These include developing strategic plans and creating regional, state and territory or national steering committees. Any such process should, however, involve close consultation with relevant stakeholders to ensure that the principles and objectives of any particular integrated response mechanism accurately reflect and respond to the diversity of local conditions and needs.

Recommendation 29–1 The Australian, state and territory governments, in establishing or further developing integrated responses to family violence, should ensure that any such response is based on common principles and objectives, developed in consultation with relevant stakeholders.

Inter-agency collaboration

29.102 Inter-agency collaboration is an essential feature of integrated responses. The need for collaboration between agencies, including the courts, is one of the most important issues raised in this Inquiry. In particular, the need to share information in appropriate circumstances to ensure that people do not fall into gaps between the family law, family violence and child protection systems is discussed in detail in Chapter 30. That discussion canvasses issues including the impact of privacy legislation on the sharing of agency information; information sharing protocols and MOUs; and the development of a national database.

29.103 In this chapter, the Commissions consider other issues that arise in relation to inter-agency collaboration. These include the advantages and challenges of collaboration, as well as some of the methods of collaboration.

Advantages of collaboration

29.104 The way government services are delivered tends to follow the structure of government. For example, services for child protection are typically delivered by a different department from that responsible for crime and justice. Similarly, the delivery of legal services reflects both jurisdictional divisions and different governing legal frameworks.
29.105 These divisions are convenient for those administering the services, but are less convenient for those receiving services. For these reasons, there has been an increasing trend towards coordination and integration of services, by either co-locating or by integrating services delivered to a particular category of ‘client’. The advantages of integration have been described as follows:

In essence there are three main sets of arguments for improved integration: improved access for consumers; increased efficiency, achieving more from the use of limited resources; and enhanced effectiveness, resulting in enhanced outcomes for consumers and funders.

29.106 More specifically in the context of this Inquiry, the advantages of inter-agency collaboration include:

- ensuring that victims of family violence are referred to appropriate services wherever and whenever they are brought into contact with government agencies or services;
- minimising elements of duplication or inefficiencies arising from the delivery of multiple services by multiple agencies, such as through the sharing of information;
- increasing the capacity of services and legal systems to manage complex cases through networks of information and services, and improving the decisions made by agencies and courts as a result;
- ensuring that victims of family violence do not fall into gaps between agencies and legal systems working in isolation from each other; and
- avoiding or reducing the prospect of conflict between measures or policies adopted by different agencies.

Challenges of collaboration

29.107 Despite these advantages, caution needs to be exercised in the promotion of inter-agency collaboration for its own sake. While inter-agency collaboration has a number of advantages, what is required … is not the promotion of the goal of service integration as an end in itself, but a more differential approach. Clear evidence of the nature and extent of problems in particular spheres of service provision together with evidence of the value of specific initiatives to address these difficulties is necessary before an ongoing commitment is made to new initiatives.

29.108 Not all services need to be integrated for all people, and services may have such different approaches or philosophies that they ought not to be integrated. For this reason, recommendations and suggestions for specific inter-agency collaboration are discussed in the specific contexts in which they arise in this Report.

---

102 Ibid.

29.109 It is also important to recognise a number of challenges of inter-agency collaboration. One of these is the need for adequate resourcing, training and support. Inter-agency collaboration ‘costs before it pays’: it requires resourcing for staff and support systems, services, and start up costs.\textsuperscript{104} There is also often a need for cultural change within organisations and the development of trust between organisations. Staff may experience a certain amount of pressure, and be required to undertake ‘tasks of greater complexity requiring more training and expertise, time and effort, if their resources do not expand’.\textsuperscript{105} Another key challenge is ensuring that the mechanisms of collaboration are flexible enough to meet the respective needs of the different partners, and yet stable enough to endure.

Methods of collaboration

29.110 As discussed above, there are different mechanisms of collaboration. At the level of policy, agencies may collaborate in establishing overarching policy bodies or steering committees and agreeing upon common principles and objectives.

29.111 At an operational level, key ways in which agencies may collaborate include:

\begin{itemize}
  \item developing inter-agency networks and contact points, including placing liaison officers from one agency in another agency;
  \item sharing information obtained by agencies;
  \item sharing knowledge by agencies (such as joint training);
  \item referring victims to different agencies;
  \item developing protocols for communication and working together; and \item establishing collaborative decision making mechanisms, such as joint case management conferences.
\end{itemize}

29.112 Collaboration between agencies and other actors is discussed at various points in this Report. For example, information sharing between agencies—including the courts—and the development of protocols that set out procedures for working together and for exchanging information are discussed in Chapter 30. The need for joint training is discussed in Chapter 31. Joint case management, including the Magelllan project is discussed above. Cooperation between federal family courts and state and territory courts dealing with family violence is discussed in Chapters 15 to 17. Cooperation in the context of child protection and family law is discussed in Chapter 19 and in the context of child protection and the criminal law, in Chapter 20.

\textsuperscript{104} Ibid, 6.
\textsuperscript{105} Ibid.
Submissions and consultations

29.113 The joint submission from Domestic Violence Victoria and others noted that the Victorian integrated response is supported by the Family Violence Statewide Steering Committee, which convenes quarterly and provides advice to ministers. The Committee includes representatives from both government and non-government sectors, such as the police, courts, family violence crisis and recovery services, community legal services and men’s behaviour change programs. The Committee focuses on the development of integrated, multi-agency responses to family violence.

29.114 The submission noted that close collaboration and consultation with non-government service providers is important to ensure that the work of the Committee is informed by the expertise of individuals working in the community, so that it is grounded in practical experience. In addition, these stakeholders submitted that it was critical to include those working with the most vulnerable individuals, for example, Indigenous women, CALD women, and women with disabilities. The submission also noted the importance of clear information sharing arrangements and inter-agency protocols.

29.115 National Legal Aid noted in relation to the inter-agency agreement and MOU between the Family Court of Western Australia, the Department of Child Protection (DCP) and Legal Aid WA, that:

To facilitate the operation of the MOU, DCP has located a DCP worker at the Family Court. The worker represents the values, practices and concerns of DCP in problem solving and client management processes, increasing the court and DCP’s knowledge and understanding of each other, their respective roles and their shared responsibility for the welfare of children.106

29.116 National Legal Aid also noted that the MOU commits the parties to share information and resources as far as is practicable and permissible pursuant to provisions of the relevant legislation in order to achieve the best possible outcomes for children. It also commits the parties to ensuring that information and training are provided to agency staff to ensure the workability of the arrangements and to meeting regularly to monitor the operation of the MOU and to address any case management issues that are identified.107

29.117 As noted above, the AFVPLS Victoria was supportive of integrating dedicated Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander strategies and services into the mainstream in order to strengthen the response of mainstream agencies to Indigenous victims of family violence. The submission also indicated that, in Victoria, there was a need to better integrate broader criminal justice initiatives with family violence initiatives because the two are often interrelated. In addition, the submission expressed strong support for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander liaison officers to be placed in federal family courts.108

107 Ibid.
Commissions’ views

29.118 In Chapter 30 the Commissions discuss the importance of establishing information-sharing arrangements between agencies and organisations to facilitate communication and a more integrated approach—based on common objectives and principles—in the family law, family violence and child protection systems. However, as discussed above, such arrangements, protocols and MOUs cannot stand alone and are dependent on the knowledge and involvement of officers and staff. Simply putting such arrangements in place is not sufficient. They must be given an ongoing profile among court and agency officers; they must form the basis of an ongoing and responsive relationship between the parties and must be supported and implemented in practice.

29.119 In Chapter 30, the Commissions recommend ongoing training for parties to protocols and MOUs to ensure that the arrangements are well known and understood and that the arrangements are effectively implemented.109

29.120 The Commissions also note stakeholder feedback that other mechanisms are important to support effective collaboration. Consultations and submissions noted the importance of personal contact between officers and staff in agencies and organisations working together, in particular, the importance of regular meetings. Such meetings provide an opportunity for parties to discuss the advantages and challenges of the relationship, and to address operational issues on an ongoing basis.

29.121 Finally, stakeholders noted that designated contact people within agencies, and the use of liaison officers from one agency placed in another agency or organisation were of assistance. Such individuals provide an accessible and knowledgeable point of contact, and establish bridges between agencies and organisations that can help them to understand each other and work together more effectively.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recommendation 29–2</th>
<th>The Australian, state and territory governments, in establishing or further developing integrated responses to family violence, should ensure ongoing and responsive collaboration between agencies and organisations, supported by:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(a)</td>
<td>protocols and memorandums of understanding;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(b)</td>
<td>information-sharing arrangements;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(c)</td>
<td>regular meetings; and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(d)</td>
<td>where possible, designated liaison officers.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Victim support services

29.122 Victim support is also an important element of integrated responses, because victim support workers play a pivotal role in ‘integrating’ the system for victims by helping them to navigate between the different legal frameworks. In addition, and as discussed in detail in Chapter 26, relevant and timely support for victims of sexual assault may help to reduce attrition rates in the criminal law context.\textsuperscript{110} Victims who are supported make better decisions and are more likely to use both the legal system and available government services. In consultations, stakeholders repeatedly emphasised the importance of victim support services as the key mechanism of integration from the point of view of victims.

29.123 In each state and territory, victim support services offer some or all of the following:

- assistance to understand the legal process and court procedures;
- tours of courts to familiarise clients;
- support during court attendance;
- information on the responsibilities and rights of witnesses and victims;
- information on the status and progress of proceedings;
- liaison between clients and prosecutors or police;
- provision of, or referral to, appropriate welfare, health, counselling and other support services;
- assistance with victims’ compensation claims; and
- assistance with the preparation of victim impact statements.

29.124 Victim support may be provided at different points of entry into the legal system. Support may be offered at, or soon after, a family violence incident, for example, where the police have been called to attend. Support may also be provided later by telephone or at centres where victims call for advice and information. Support is also important in the lead up to a court appearance and on the occasions the victim attends court.

29.125 The ACT’s model of victim support delivery was widely recognised among stakeholders as a leading model, although not necessarily feasible in larger jurisdictions.

29.126 In the ACT, the DVCS has an MOU with the Australian Federal Police (AFP). This provides that police should offer the services of DVCS at the time of a family violence incident to all parties present at the incident, except those taken into custody. Approximately 85% of people accept this suggestion.\textsuperscript{111} DVCS crisis workers are informed by the police if the parties wish to use their services, and typically arrive at the scene where police brief the workers. The MOU is implemented and administered by a management committee constituted jointly by the AFP and DVCS. As noted above, ‘fax-back protocols’ also operate in other areas and enable close collaboration between police and victim support services, and early delivery of victim support.

\textsuperscript{110} See, in particular, Rec 26–2.

29.127 The DVCS is also an approved crisis support organisation under the \textit{Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986} (ACT).\textsuperscript{112} Under s 18 of that Act, a police officer or staff member of the AFP,\textsuperscript{113} on suspicion of past or future commission of a ‘domestic violence offence’, may disclose ‘any information that is likely to aid the organisation in rendering assistance to the person or to any children of the person’. The DVCS also offers 24-hour telephone support and court support (although not court advocacy) services. It also acts as an advocate with government agencies including child protection agencies.

29.128 Another aspect of victim support is court assistance schemes. In NSW, for example, the Legal Aid Commission operates 33 Women’s Domestic Violence Court Assistance Schemes. Support workers can provide information about protection orders, act as a support person in court, explain the court process, and refer victims to other services. Victim support workers are also provided as part of the Domestic Violence Intervention Court Model (DVICM) in NSW. Notably, an independent evaluation indicated that victim support was by far the most successful element of the DVICM.\textsuperscript{114}

29.129 While court support workers cannot themselves provide legal advice, they may be able to organise lawyers to provide legal advice in a particular case.\textsuperscript{115} The Women’s Family Law Support Service also provides court support and information at the Sydney and Melbourne registry of the Family Law Courts,\textsuperscript{116} and a similar service—the Women’s Information Service Family Court Support—is provided in South Australia.

29.130 Victim support is a key aspect of the Victorian specialised family violence courts, discussed in Chapter 32. An on-site victim support worker is available during the court days allocated to family violence hearings. In a joint submission with a number of other stakeholders, Domestic Violence Victoria noted that:

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{111} Domestic Violence Crisis Service (ACT), \textit{Domestic Violence Crisis Service (ACT)} <www.dvcs.org.au/domiciervcenh.html#CrisisIntervention> at 14 April 2010.
  \item \textsuperscript{112} See Domestic Violence (Crisis Support Organisation) Approval 1992, 8 July 1992, authorised under s 17 of the \textit{Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986} (ACT).
  \item \textsuperscript{113} A branch of the AFP, ACT Policing, is responsible for policing in the ACT.
  \item \textsuperscript{114} L Rodwell and N Smith, \textit{An Evaluation of the NSW Domestic Violence Intervention Court Model} (2008), prepared for the NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research.
  \item \textsuperscript{116} Richard Chisholm noted in his 2009 report that this service had proved particularly invaluable to victims of family violence: R Chisholm, \textit{Family Courts Violence Review} (2009), 151, fn 161.
\end{itemize}
In Victoria a number of regions are currently establishing Crisis Advocacy Response Services (CARS). This multi-agency model is premised upon a sexual assault crisis model and offers women the opportunity to explore the full range of options for safety without necessarily being dislocated from their home and community. The CARS model typically involves participation by family violence agencies, the central statewide crisis intake and referral agency and Victoria Police. This twenty-four-hour, seven-day-per-week program differs from the ACT’s Family Violence Intervention Project (FVIP) model in that a support worker does not accompany the police to the incident. Instead they meet soon after (within forty minutes) at a safe place (eg police station, hospital, motel or safe unit) where the woman is provided with a focussed intervention at the point of crisis. She is provided with face-to-face crisis counselling, information about legal options, information about material aid, referrals, advocacy and support. Preliminary findings through a CARS pilot in metropolitan Melbourne demonstrate that a majority of women assisted have been able to return home with an exclusion order in place and a range of support options available to them.117

29.131 The importance of victim support has also been recognised in the United Kingdom’s national strategy for reducing family violence, which includes as a core element the funding of Independent Domestic Violence Advisors (IDVAs) and Independent Sexual Violence Advisors (ISVAs). The role of these advisors is to ‘help victims navigate their way through various systems; for example, the criminal justice system … the civil court system, and other systems such as housing, health, and education’.118 They are especially associated with the specialised family violence courts in the United Kingdom and Multi-Agency Risk Assessment Conferences (MARACs), which provide multi-agency responses to very high-risk victims.

29.132 In 2009, an independent evaluation of IDVAs in the United Kingdom found:

The IDVA role offers a unique opportunity to provide independent, objective advice to victims about their options, and one that is not duplicated by any other worker. IDVAs navigate multiple systems and are crucial contributors to multi-agency initiatives, especially MARACs. Their specialist skills and ability to provide both individual and institutional advocacy are very highly valued.119

29.133 The evaluation found strong support for the work of the advisors in court support, citing one victim as follows:

To have that support, it just gives you the strength to go and give evidence. I could have backed out many times because I was afraid to stand up and go against my exhusband but having [the Advisor] there, she gave me the strength to go on with it. It is a hard thing to do, but having someone there to talk to you and listen to you, to reassure you everything will be ok, it did really help.120

---

118 A Robinson, Evaluation of Independent Sexual Violence Advisors (ISVAs) and Independent Domestic Violence Advisors (IDVAs) (2009), prepared for the Home Office (UK), 15.
119 Ibid, 4.
120 Ibid, 16.
29. Integrated Responses

29.134 The evaluation also noted that partner agencies were quick to comment on the importance of providing support to victims, as they were sympathetic to the stress involved in a court case. In fact, IDVA support was viewed as a necessary precursor to having successful court outcomes; for example, reducing retraction, giving better evidence, and obtaining convictions.\(^\text{121}\)

Submissions and consultations

29.135 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria expressed the view that it was important to have victim support services available at various stages in the legal process, in particular, when a victim first attends court to apply for a protection order. The submission also noted the importance of support for respondents, stating that victims will not be safe unless steps are taken to address the respondents’ underlying issues, which may include alcoholism, drug addiction, mental health and accommodation issues.\(^\text{122}\)

29.136 A number of stakeholders underlined the importance of victim information and support in reducing the attrition rate in sexual assault cases, including those arising in a family violence context.\(^\text{123}\)

29.137 The Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service noted that in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and New Zealand, victim advocates are an integral feature of domestic violence courts. The submission noted that the most critical feature of the specialised family violence courts in Manitoba, Canada is reported to be the in-house Women’s Advocacy Program, consisting of three social workers and one lawyer with ‘access to all information including that provided to the court and who provide information, support and advocacy for family violence victims and have particular regard to safety plans and safety measures for victims’. The Service submitted that:

State and territory governments should, to the extent feasible, make victim advocates available at family and domestic violence-related court proceedings, and enable advocates access to all relevant information including that provided to the court.

In this regard, SWDVCAS agrees with the Commissions’ statement that the NSW Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service is a useful precedent for productively mainstreaming across all courts dealing with domestic and family violence.\(^\text{124}\)

---

\(^{121}\) Ibid.

\(^{122}\) Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

\(^{123}\) Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010. The importance of victim support in the context of sexual assault cases is discussed in detail in Chapter 26.

\(^{124}\) Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service, Submission FV 132, 22 June 2010.
29.138 The joint submission from Domestic Violence Victoria and others noted that:

While provision of Magistrates’ and Family Court support is recognised as an important, indeed best practice element of the work undertaken by family violence refuge and outreach services as part of their case management practice, many agencies are unable to meet demand for court support to their clients due to funding constraints that do not allow agencies to release staff to attend court hearings. While some agencies do have dedicated court support staff, DV Vic, the peak body for specialist family violence services in Victoria, has heard of numerous instances of agencies unable to provide this service, or forced to cease an existing service to its clients due to lack of capacity.\(^\text{125}\)

29.139 In addition, even where integrated systems are more navigable for women generally, the submission noted that some high risk groups still have difficulty accessing services. In Victoria, funding for Intensive Case Managers has gone some way to addressing this issue. Based regionally, Intensive Case Managers provide extra support for women with disabilities and women from CALD communities to assist them to access services. The submission expressed the view that, where such positions are well resourced, they have the potential to greatly enhance an integrated system.\(^\text{126}\)

29.140 The Julia Farr Association also noted that it was important to ensure that there is adequate provision of augmented victim support for people living with disability who may require additional communication, advocacy and decision-making support because of their circumstances.\(^\text{127}\)

29.141 The AFVPLS Victoria discussed the importance of dedicated Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander victim support services, in particular, after hours crisis support for victims, including children:

Significant problems remain with respect to contact between ATSI people and police. Appropriate support at the point of crisis intervention is more likely to lead to safer outcomes in the short and long term. Significant decisions are required to be made at the point of crisis when women are traumatised and generally ill-equipped to make considered decisions. Mistrust of police and legal processes by ATSI women compound these difficulties. Attendance of workers with police at family violence incidents should be trialled. In large rural areas this may not be practical however offering an ATSI family violence victim the option to contact a dedicated ATSI crisis service by telephone would be an improvement. The service could assist in communicating/negotiating with police.\(^\text{128}\)

29.142 The submission noted that, anecdotally, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women were not accessing mainstream after hours crisis support services in Victoria in significant numbers:

It is the experience of FVPLS Victoria that ATSI women are more likely to seek assistance in relation to family violence and sexual assault from an ATSI service.

---

\(^{126}\) Ibid.

29. Integrated Responses

Culturally appropriate and trusted legal representation is key to ATSI women engaging with and sustaining legal processes. The role of paralegal support workers working alongside solicitors and providing broader holistic support to women who are experiencing multiple layers of disadvantage has also proved highly successful at FVPLS Victoria. ATSI women must be given options as to whether they prefer to access an ATSI or mainstream service.\(^{129}\)

29.143 The submission noted that the Australian Government did not provide funding for the Family Violence Prevention Legal Service (FVPLS) program in metropolitan areas, so that Indigenous women and children in urban areas had to rely on mainstream services. FVPLS Victoria noted that it had secured state government funding for metropolitan services but that no formal agreement between the state and federal governments had been reached about funding the service.

29.144 The NPY Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service noted that:

> The clients that the Service works with are often under immense pressure from the perpetrator’s family, the community and sometimes even their own family to drop the charges. Clients often are blamed for the perpetrator being in gaol and want to get the perpetrator out of gaol to stop that blame. Clients need ongoing support from the time charges are laid, when the matter is heard in court and even while the perpetrator is serving a gaol sentence.\(^ {130} \)

29.145 Another stakeholder also emphasised the need for specialised Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander, CALD and disability victim support services.\(^ {131} \)

29.146 The Shoalcoat Community Legal Centre discussed the domestic violence intervention service operating out of the Shoalhaven Local Area Command, sponsored by the YWCA NSW. The submission noted that it was very expensive and difficult to sustain a service in which victim support workers are available 24 hours a day to accompany police to family violence incidents. The submission expressed the view that a more sustainable model is one in which police are trained to deal appropriately with incidents and victim support is provided at other points in the process.\(^ {132} \)

29.147 One stakeholder noted that there was a degree of service duplication across NSW and that this situation required review and analysis to determine which existing services were working effectively and where better integration and other improvements could be made.\(^ {133} \)

\(^{129}\) Ibid.

\(^{131}\) Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010.

\(^{132}\) Shoalcoat Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 141, 24 June 2010.

\(^{133}\) Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
29.148 There was significant support expressed for the proposal that court support services for victims of family violence should be available at federal family courts. A number of stakeholders noted that funding would be necessary to support such a service. FVPLS Victoria suggested that, in relation to specialised support services in federal family courts for Indigenous women, this could be implemented through the FVPLS program or through a national Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women’s legal service.

Commission’s views

29.149 There is strong evidence that victim support provided at the time of, or shortly after, an incident to which the police are called, in the lead up to a court appearance and at court, and at other key times during the legal process is an important measure that can improve the ability of victims to navigate between legal frameworks, make better decisions and achieve better outcomes. There is also evidence to suggest that appropriate support can help reduce attrition rates in sexual assault cases.

29.150 In the Commissions’ view, one of the most practical methods of improving the interaction in practice of the family law, family violence and child protection frameworks is through strengthening and supporting victim services. Although extra resourcing would be required, it is likely that this would ultimately be one of the most cost-effective measures for improving victim satisfaction and safety.

29.151 There is much to be said for the delivery of victim support at the time the police are called out to an incident, although the Commissions note stakeholder comments about the difficulties of sustaining such services. A number of fax-back protocols have been initiated between police and victim support services that ensure that victims are put in contact with appropriate services soon after an incident occurs. This may be a more cost-effective practice in some jurisdictions.

29.152 Victim support is also particularly important leading up to and during court appearances. The Commissions note that, while victim support workers are a feature of specialised courts, this service need not be limited to such courts. Indeed, this is one element that the Commissions believe could be productively mainstreamed across other courts. The NSW Domestic Violence Court Assistance Scheme provides a useful precedent. The family court support schemes in NSW, Victoria and South Australia could also be extended nationally across the family court system.

29.153 The Commissions note stakeholder feedback on the difficulties faced by victims from vulnerable communities and sectors and acknowledge the pressing need for specialised Indigenous, CALD and disability victim support services. The Commissions recommend that federal, state and territory governments prioritise the provision of, and access to, culturally appropriate support services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and more vulnerable groups.

---

Recommendation 29–3 The Australian, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of, and access to, culturally appropriate victim support services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups.

Legal advice and representation

29.154 One important practical aspect of victim support is access to legal advice and representation in both family violence and family law proceedings. The role of legal representation and, in particular, the role of legal aid, in ensuring this access was discussed in detail in Richard Chisholm’s report, Family Courts Violence Review (the Chisholm Review). Chisholm recommended that careful consideration should be given in the funding and administration of legal aid to the serious implications arising from parties, especially children, being legally unrepresented.

29.155 The National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children also highlighted the importance of ensuring that adequate funding for legal aid and advocacy services is provided by the Australian Government, over and above State/Territory funding, to recognise the significant focus given to domestic and family violence in the 2006 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975.

29.156 The Commissions have heard that the limited availability of legal aid and community legal services often result in family violence victims being unable to obtain legal advice and representation, or needing to obtain separate representation for family law and protection order proceedings.

Submissions and consultations

29.157 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others noted that funding shortfalls in the area of family violence legal services mean that the most vulnerable members of the community—including victims of family violence and their children—are not able to access legal advice and representation. The submission noted that in Victorian family violence protection matters, particularly in the specialised courts, it is community legal centre (CLC) lawyers that usually represent applicants, while Victoria Legal Aid generally assists the respondent:

138 Ibid, Rec 4.5.
The most recent Victorian data suggests that in 40% of intervention cases, the police are the applicant. This therefore means that CLC duty lawyers are largely responsible for representing the other 60% of applicants. In addition, CLCs will often provide legal assistance, where capacity allows, to affected family members in police applications.

29.158 The submission also noted that legal aid and CLC lawyers not only provide legal advice and assistance in relation to protection order proceedings, but also provide or refer the client to legal assistance for family law matters. The submission included an extract from the Federation of Community Legal Centres (Victoria) State Budget Submission 2010–2011:

In 2005, Darebin and Central Highlands CLCs were funded to establish full-time family violence applicant duty lawyer positions servicing the Family Violence Court Division at Ballarat and Heidelberg Magistrates Courts. In July 2007, the Victorian Government and Victoria Legal Aid provided funding to 10 CLCs across Victoria to establish 6 full-time and 4 half-time specialist family violence lawyer positions. These funding initiatives have been welcome, however many CLCs continue to provide family violence duty lawyer services without any dedicated funding, or without sufficient funding relative to demand …

Additional family violence duty lawyer positions, supported by 0.5EFT administration support, will cost $150,000 per position in recurrent funding. New positions should be focussed on the un-funded and underfunded services with the highest demand.

29.159 Legal Aid NSW also noted the importance of providing victims with access to duty lawyers, and the need for lawyers to be better educated about working with family violence victims. The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria stated that the issues that arise in family violence protection order proceedings can be complex—often involving family law and criminal law matters—and that legal advice for both victims and respondents was important.

29.160 The Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service (WDVCAS) agreed that access to legal services for both victims and defendants was crucial and noted that in NSW:

Legal Aid funds the Domestic Violence Solicitor Scheme (DVSS) which operates in conjunction with WDVCAS at a number of NSW Local Courts. The DVSS uses private solicitors who are rostered to attend court on AVO list days to represent WDVCAS clients in private ADVO applications at mentions and at hearings through a grant of legal aid, and to provide legal advice to women in police initiated ADVOs. The DVSS solicitor can also provide advice on ancillary legal matters, for example, family law matters. At courts with a WDVCAS, but where there is no DVSS, the 141 Ibid.

142 Ibid.
143 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
144 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
WDVCAS Coordinator is generally able to refer eligible clients to private solicitors who are willing to represent the client for the grant of legal aid.145

29.161 The WDVCAS submitted that all victims of family violence in NSW should be provided with access to legal advice in family-violence related court proceedings, through the expansion of Legal Aid’s DVSS. The Service also submitted that victims in other states and territories be provided with access to legal advice through a service similar to the DVSS.146

29.162 The AFVPLS Victoria noted that, in Victoria, legal services are not well incorporated into the family violence integrated strategy and that this could be improved.147

29.163 A number of stakeholders indicated the need for specific legal services for Indigenous women victims of family violence.148 The Immigrant Women’s Support Service noted the importance of providing interpreting and translating services for all legal appointments.149

Commissions’ views

29.164 In Equality before the Law: Justice for Women (ALRC Report 69), the ALRC highlighted the need for specialised legal advice and representation for Indigenous women noting that:

Most Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander legal services do not currently benefit women and men equally. This is a result of the combined effect of two common practices. First, most services implement a policy of not acting for either party in a matter between two Indigenous clients. Second, most legal services give priority to defending criminal cases over other matters. On their face these practices appear gender neutral, but their effect is to indirectly discriminate against Indigenous women.

Like most groups of women, Indigenous women often need legal assistance in relation to matters of family violence and family law. For most Indigenous women such disputes are with other Indigenous people. The outcome of precluding women from receiving assistance for such matters is that Indigenous women are disadvantaged compared to Indigenous men and compared to other women.150

29.165 In relation to women from CALD communities the ALRC stated that:

People of non-English speaking background are particularly in need of legal assistance. For many the Australian legal system differs markedly from that in their country of origin. Those from countries with a civil law system may not be aware of the way the Australian system works and the role of lawyers where the parties have to present all the evidence and arguments. For those reasons and because of language

---

146 Ibid.
difficulties, many women of non-English speaking background find it difficult or even impossible to represent themselves even in very routine matters.\textsuperscript{151}

29.166 The Commissions consider that access to legal advice and representation is crucial to ensuring an effective response to family violence. In Chapter 31, the Commissions express the view that lawyers engaging with issues of family violence should be provided with targeted education and training to help them to better assist victims and recommend that Australian law societies and institutes review continuing professional development requirements to ensure that legal issues concerning family violence are appropriately addressed.\textsuperscript{152}

29.167 In addition, the Commissions support the recommendations of both the National Council and the Chisholm Review in relation to the provision of legal advice and representation. The Commissions recommend that federal, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of, and access to, legal services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and more vulnerable groups such as Indigenous women, women with disabilities and women from CALD communities.

\textbf{Recommendation 29–4} The Australian, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of, and access to, legal services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups.

\section*{Victims’ compensation}

29.168 Family violence often has a significant impact on the financial security of victims.\textsuperscript{153} Victims of family violence may incur medical, counselling, legal and housing expenses, and may have been subject to economic abuse as an element of family violence.\textsuperscript{154} Financial compensation assists victims to meet expenses and may play a practical role in improving victim safety by providing, for example, access to funds to meet relocation expenses or to change locks.\textsuperscript{155}

29.169 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions identified statutory victims’ compensation schemes—funded by state and territory governments—as the principal

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{151} Ibid, [4.27].
\item \textsuperscript{152} Rec 31–4.
\item \textsuperscript{153} The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse are presently conducting a study on women’s financial security both before and after abusive relationships. See R Braaf and I Barrett Meyering, ‘When Does It End? The Continuation of Family Violence Through the Court Process, Financial Outcomes for Women and Good Practice’ (Paper presented at Family Violence: Towards Best Practice Conference, Brisbane, 1–3 October 2009).
\item \textsuperscript{154} See Access Economics, \textit{The Cost of Domestic Violence to the Australian Economy, Part I} (2004), ch 5.
\item \textsuperscript{155} National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, \textit{Time for Action: The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021} (2009), 98.
\end{itemize}
method of financial redress for most victims of family violence. However, the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse has identified a key problem with victims’ compensation in the context of family violence:

like the criminal law, [victims’ compensation schemes] are premised on a ‘stranger violence model’. The schemes assume that the victim does not know the assailant, that the violence is a random act and that the victim is not dependent on the assailant. … As such, many schemes have historically included—and in some cases continue to include—specific requirements that discriminate against women who experience domestic violence.

29.170 The Commissions identified a number of provisions in victims’ compensation legislation that did not adequately recognise the nature and dynamics of family violence and, as a consequence, have the potential to discriminate unfairly against victims of family violence. These provisions relate to the following areas:

- criminal acts and injuries;
- related acts or injuries; and
- advantage or benefit to the offender.

Criminal acts and injuries

29.171 Generally speaking, legislation links victims’ compensation to the commission of specific criminal acts of violence and the suffering of criminal injuries. This typically has the effect of under-compensating victims of family violence, for several reasons. First, acts of family violence may not be recognised as criminal, and in some jurisdictions only specified offences can trigger compensation. Secondly, there is a need to prove each discrete ‘incident’ and ‘injury’, which poses problems in the context of the patterns of abuse that typically constitute family violence.

29.172 Another issue is that, generally, the definition of ‘injury’ emphasises physical injury and does not include the psychological harms typical of family violence. In addition, this restrictive definition does not necessarily recognise the ‘differing impact of violence and sexual abuse on the variety of cultures and communities that make up Australian society’.

---

156 Consultation Paper, 928–929.
159 Breaches of protection orders are not included in some jurisdictions, such as Victoria, Queensland and the ACT: Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 3; Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 25(8); Victims of Crime (Financial Assistance) Act 1983 (ACT) s 3. The Queensland and ACT Acts allow for criminal acts to be prescribed in regulations, but none are presently prescribed.
160 The nature and dynamics of family violence are discussed in Part B of this Report.
These limitations have been addressed in NSW and the Northern Territory, where the victims’ compensation legislation defines domestic violence as a specific injury.\(^{162}\) The NSW legislation also defines ‘sexual assault’ as a specific compensable injury.\(^{163}\) Further, victims of family violence can elect to claim a specific (listed) physical, psychiatric or psychological injury, or claim for ‘domestic violence injuries’ or an injury of ‘sexual assault’.\(^{164}\) In Victoria, awards may be granted not only in respect of ‘injuries’, but also in respect of ‘significant adverse impacts’,\(^ {165}\) including ‘grief, distress, [or] trauma’.\(^ {166}\) In Queensland the definition of adverse impacts in relation to sexual offences is more specific and extensive.\(^ {167}\)

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory victims’ compensation legislation should:

(a) provide that evidence of a pattern of family violence may be considered in assessing whether an act of violence or injury occurred;

(b) define family violence as a specific act of violence or injury, as in the Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW) and the Victims of Crime Assistance Regulation (NT); or

(c) extend the definition of injury to include other significant adverse impacts, as is done in respect of some offences in ss 3 and 8A of the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) and s 27 of the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld).\(^ {168}\)

---

162 Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW) s 5(2), Dictionary, sch 1 cls 6, 7A; Victims of Crime Assistance Regulations (NT) regs 5, 22. Regulation 4 defines sexual offences as violent acts for the purposes of the governing Act.

163 Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW) s 5(2), Dictionary, sch 1 cls 6, 7A.

164 Ibid sch 1 cls 6, 7A, Table. The most serious category also includes cases of unlawful sexual intercourse in which: serious bodily injury is inflicted; two or more offenders are involved; or in which the offender uses an offensive weapon. The standard amount for the most serious category of sexual assault is $25,000–$50,000.

165 These provisions were inserted by the Victims of Crime Assistance (Amendment) Act 2000 (Vic), which commenced on 1 January 2001.

166 Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 3.

167 Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 27. These include: a sense of violation; reduced self-worth or perception; lost or reduced physical immunity; lost or reduced physical capacity, including the ability to have children; increased fear or increased feelings of insecurity; adverse effects of others reacting adversely to the person; adverse impact on lawful sexual relations; and adverse impact on feelings. This provision was introduced in 1995: Criminal Offence Victims Regulation 1995 (Qld) regs 1A(1), (3).

168 Consultation Paper, Proposal 19–4. The Queensland Government has repealed its Criminal Offence Victims Act 1995 and enacted the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (VOCA), after comprehensive research and consultation. The legislative scheme will be reviewed in five years, and the Queensland Government is not proposing any major reform until the new scheme is reviewed. The Commissions are also aware that, at the time of writing, the Victorian Department of Justice is conducting a broad review of existing victims of crime compensation in Victoria, including the assistance scheme under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 and under the Sentencing Act 1991.
29. Integrated Responses

Submissions and consultations

29.175 A large number of submissions supported this proposal.\textsuperscript{169} The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse noted its support for all the above options, particularly option (b). The experience of New South Wales indicates that the introduction of an offence based award for domestic violence can significantly improve women’s access to compensation. Based on previous discussion with stakeholders, we understand that there is strong support within the women’s and community legal sector for the introduction of similar provisions in Victoria.\textsuperscript{170}

29.176 This was confirmed in submissions from Domestic Violence Victoria and others, and the AFVPLS Victoria.\textsuperscript{171} However, Women’s Legal Services NSW expressed concern that ‘including a list of “adverse effects” in legislation could result in more restrictive interpretations, rather than broadening the range of matters to be taken into account when assessing injuries’.\textsuperscript{172}

Related acts or injuries

29.177 All Australian jurisdictions also have provisions deeming that related acts of violence or related injuries should be treated as one claim, or reducing the amount available for related acts or injuries.\textsuperscript{173} These provisions have been criticised for failing to adequately recognise the continuing and repetitive pattern of family violence.\textsuperscript{174}

\textsuperscript{170} Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{171} Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{172} Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{173} Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW) s 5(3), (4); Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 4; Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 25(4); Victims of Crime Act 2001 (SA) s 23(2); Criminal Injuries Compensation Act 1985 (WA) s 33; Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2006 (NT) s 5(3); Victims of Crime (Financial Assistance) Act 1983 (ACT) s 4(2).

29.178 The scope of these provisions varies across the jurisdictions. In Queensland, South Australia and the Northern Territory, the definition of related acts encompasses acts committed by the same person or group of persons, so all incidents within a pattern of family violence are likely to be deemed a single act.\footnote{Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 25(4); Victims of Crime Act 2001 (SA) s 23; Victims of Crime Assistance Regulations (NT) reg 5(3).} Moreover, the interpretation by courts of whether an act is ‘related’ varies both within, and between, the jurisdictions.\footnote{This is reviewed in C Forster, ‘The Failure of Criminal Injuries Compensation Schemes for Victims of Intra-Familial Abuse: The Example of Queensland’ (2002) 10 Torts Law Journal 143, 156.} In 2009, for example, the Supreme Court of New South Wales ruled that over 500 sexual assaults committed over 11 years by a member of a foster family were not ‘related’ acts for the purpose of compensation legislation.\footnote{JM v Victims Compensation Fund Corporation [2009] NSWSC 1300.} In Victoria and Queensland, there are provisions requiring that the applicant be given an opportunity to object to the treatment of claims as related.\footnote{Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 4(1); Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 70. In Victoria, this applies unless the Tribunal considers that they should not be treated as related.}

29.179 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory victims’ compensation legislation should provide that:

- acts are not ‘related’ merely because they are committed by the same offender; and
- applicants should be given the opportunity to object if multiple claims are treated as ‘related’, as in s 4(1) of the \textit{Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic)} and s 70 of the \textit{Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld)}.

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

29.180 This proposal received strong support.\footnote{National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; WESNET—The Women’s Services Network, Submission FV 217, 30 June 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; J Evans, Submission FV 60, 31 May 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.} For example, the Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc submitted that:

\begin{quote}
It is grossly unfair and unjust that a victim of multiple acts of violence should be disadvantaged by the fact that her offender happens to be the same person, as opposed to another applicant who was the victim of different acts of violence committed by different offenders.\footnote{Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.}
\end{quote}
29.181 Similarly, the AFVPLS Victoria submitted that:

Victim’s assistance legislation must acknowledge and appropriately compensate the often repetitive nature of family violence and sexual assault offending. At present, too much discretion and uncertainty prevails ... Specific legislation or practice directions are required to clarify determination of family violence/or sexual assault applications where there are multiple acts of violence and which recognises the serious impact of long term multiple offending upon victims.181

Advantage or benefit to the offender

29.182 In Victoria, Western Australia and the Northern Territory, victims’ compensation schemes may exclude claims on the basis that the offender might benefit from the claim.182 This has the effect of excluding most victims of family violence—especially where the victim continues to reside with the offender—and fails to take into account the fact the compensation award may be used to leave the offender.183

29.183 However, in jurisdictions such as Victoria and Queensland, where compensation is generally paid on the basis of expenses incurred, the potential for awards to benefit the offender is limited. Another option may be to restrict offenders’ access to funds.184 For example, in Queensland, prior to the replacement of its legislation in 2009, the administrative unit referred cases to the Public Trustee where victims might be at risk of psychological or emotional abuse by an offender who stood to benefit from an award.185

29.184 The Commissions proposed in the Consultation Paper that state and territory victim’s compensation legislation should not exclude claims on the basis that the offender might benefit from the claim.186

Submissions and consultations

29.185 A significant number of submissions supported this proposal.187 For example, Domestic Violence Victoria and others, in a joint submission noted:

---

182 Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 54(e); Criminal Injuries Compensation Act 1985 (WA) s 3; Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2006 (NT) s 41.
187 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; WESNET—The Women’s Services Network, Submission FV 217, 30 June 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission
Excluding claims on this basis fails to reflect the nature and dynamics of family violence, particularly where the victim has an ongoing relationship with the offender. Financial circumstances are a critical factor in women’s decisions about whether to leave or stay in violent relationships. Many women choose to remain in violent situations rather than risk homelessness, uprooting their children and living in poverty.\footnote{Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, Submission FV 117, 15 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.}

29.186 Other submissions, however, stressed the importance of ensuring that the offender does not have access to the compensation.\footnote{National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.} National Legal Aid submitted that

\[
\text{if victims continue their relationship with perpetrators, they may suffer further violence, with the compensation being taken from them forcibly by the perpetrator and used for such purposes as the purchase of drugs and alcohol.}\footnote{National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.}
\]

Commissions’ views

29.187 The Commissions consider that victims’ compensation schemes are an important element of victim support, assisting victims to meet medical, legal and other expenses. Compensation also allows victims to take safety measures, such as changing locks, where the victim remains in the same home; or securing emergency accommodation, where the victim leaves.

29.188 In the Commissions’ view, victims’ compensation legislation across Australia can be improved to ensure that victims of family violence are not disadvantaged. First, the Commissions recommend that victims’ compensation legislation should define an ‘act of violence’ or injury to include family violence. The Commissions make recommendations in Chapter 5 in relation to the definition of family violence.

29.189 Secondly, the Commissions agree with stakeholders that to treat all incidents of family violence as if they constituted a ‘single’ incident discriminates unfairly against victims of family violence. Legislation should provide that acts are not related merely because they are committed by the same person. Further, legislation should allow a victim to object if claims are to be treated as ‘related’.

29.190 Lastly, the Commissions are of the view that excluding compensation on the basis that it would advantage or benefit the offender discriminates against victims of... family violence who remain in relationships with offenders. However, the Commissions note that a range of mechanisms is available, including making payments on the basis of expenses incurred, to ensure that offenders cannot access victims’ compensation awards. The Commissions’ view is that victims’ compensation legislation should make provision for such mechanisms, rather than exclude claims on the basis that compensation would benefit the offender.

Recommendation 29–5 State and territory victims’ compensation legislation:

(a) should define an ‘act of violence’ to include family violence and ensure that evidence of a pattern of family violence may be considered;

(b) should not provide that acts are ‘related’ merely because they are committed by the same offender, and should provide that victims have the opportunity to object if claims are to be treated as related; and

(c) should ensure that victims’ compensation claims are not excluded on the basis that the offender might benefit from the claim. (Other measures should be adopted to ensure that offenders do not have access to victims’ compensation award.)

Maintaining momentum

29.191 In the course of the Inquiry, stakeholders commented that it was often a challenge to sustain the momentum and resourcing of integrated responses. Such responses often depend on the energy, enthusiasm and expertise of the people originally involved, and sustaining integrated responses when those people move on is a key challenge.

29.192 One key aspect for retaining momentum is leadership. The Commissions have heard from stakeholders that committed leadership is necessary to drive integrated responses forward. One model, used in the ACT, provides for a statutory position of coordinator. The ACT Victims of Crime Coordinator chairs the FVIP in the role of Domestic Violence Project Coordinator under the Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986 (ACT).\(^{191}\) This model has the benefit of ensuring that one person has statutory responsibility and access to resources for driving the integrated response forward, and ensuring a degree of continuity and victim-focused leadership.

29.193 A separate issue is whether integrated responses themselves should have a legislative basis. The FVIP, like other integrated responses in Australia, does not have a legislative basis. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought feedback from stakeholders on whether legislative support for integrated responses is desirable and, if so, what such legislation should address.

\(^{191}\) Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986 (ACT) pt 3.
Submissions and consultations

29.194 The Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) expressed the view that enshrining the ACT FVIP in legislation is critical to its continued development. The submission stated that the program should be convened by a statutory office holder and that the legislation should make provision for reporting obligations including key outcomes and interventions.\textsuperscript{192} A number of other stakeholders agreed that integrated responses should be recognised in legislation and coordinated by statutory office holders.\textsuperscript{193}

29.195 The Education Centre Against Violence was of the view that responsibility for coordinating integrated responses should be placed with a statutory office holder or agency head and that clear governance structures and accountability mechanisms should be put in place.\textsuperscript{194}

29.196 The National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence submitted that one agency should be given overall responsibility for coordinating an integrated response to family violence, but was unsure whether this needed to be a statutory office holder:

> The ACT experience is that the AFP currently performs the coordinating function and does so well. All stakeholders communicate and meet regularly to ensure processes are efficient. An overarching program development group with decision makers from each stakeholder undertakes this role. This ensures that there is ‘buy-in’ from all agencies.\textsuperscript{195}

Commissions’ views

29.197 The Commissions have come to the view in the course of the Inquiry, and as discussed in detail above, that the success of integrated responses to family violence relies to a large extent on strong and visionary leadership, shared principles and objectives, clear inter-agency arrangements, and an ongoing and responsive relationship between the parties. All of these elements can be put in place without a legislative basis.

29.198 In addition, the Commissions’ view is that enshrining integrated responses to family violence in legislation may restrict the flexibility of such arrangements. Integrated responses need to be sensitive to the needs and strengths of existing institutions and frameworks in a particular area, and these contextual factors may change over time. Legislation may restrict the capacity of integrated responses to evolve as part of an ongoing process of feedback. The Commissions’ view is that integrated responses to family violence are better established and maintained on an administrative, rather than a legislative, basis and so make no specific recommendation in relation to this matter.

\textsuperscript{192} Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{194} Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010.
30. Information Sharing

Contents

Introduction 1397
Benefits of and impediments to information sharing 1398
Information flow to the family law system 1399
  Notification of family violence and child protection matters 1399
  Registration of child protection orders in family courts 1405
  Non-publication provisions 1407
  Seeking information from child protection agencies 1410
Information flow to the family violence system 1416
  Notification of parenting orders 1416
  Non-publication provision 1421
  Access to federal family court records 1423
Information sharing between agencies 1427
  Privacy laws 1427
  Proposed reform of the privacy principles 1429
  Serious threat to life, health or safety 1430
  Required or authorised by or under law 1431
  Secrecy laws 1435
  Shared databases 1436
Strategies to improve information sharing 1443
  Information sharing protocols and MOUs 1443
  A national register 1450

Introduction

30.1 A central theme of this Inquiry is ‘seamlessness’—the idea that the laws and procedures with which victims of family violence engage should work together to protect and assist them. One of the issues identified in the course of this Inquiry was that, in some circumstances, important information was not being shared among courts and agencies, and that this was having a negative impact on victims.

30.2 This chapter considers ways to improve information flow between critical elements of the family violence system, including courts, relevant government agencies and other people and institutions involved in the family violence, family law and child protection systems. These include improving the way information is collected from parties and shared between courts—including the establishment of a national register of relevant court orders—some changes to confidentiality and privacy legislation, and the development of information sharing protocols and memorandums of understanding.
The intention is to avoid, as far as possible, victims falling into gaps between the various systems due to lack of relevant information.

30.3 Information sharing is one element of an integrated response to family violence. Integrated responses more generally, including inter-agency collaboration, are discussed further in Chapter 29.

Benefits of and impediments to information sharing

30.4 Information sharing has been identified as an ongoing challenge in ensuring the safety of victims of family violence in proceedings in federal family courts and state and territory courts. As noted in the 2009 report of the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children (Time for Action):

> obstacles to information-sharing by stakeholders in the family law system remain a significant impediment to ensuring that women and their children are safe. Evidence of violence is collected on a case-by-case basis via subpoenas to different organisations, but confidentiality guidelines and legislative limitations on disclosure restrict access to child-protection records, civil and criminal law records and education and medical records. With the exception of the Family Court of Australia’s Magellan Case Management project, there is a ‘factual vacuum’ as there are few formal agreements and communication channels between organisations able to provide this evidence, and neither the Family Court of Australia nor associated socio-legal services have the power to investigate allegations of abuse.¹

30.5 The National Council recommended that information-sharing systems and protocols should be developed and supported by all organisations in response to sexual assault and family violence. It also considered that such protocols should give primacy to the safety of women and children.²

30.6 In March 2010, the Queensland Department of Communities released a consultation paper on the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld). The Department noted that:

> Legislation generally allows information to be shared with consent. Also provisions may allow for information sharing without consent in emergency or high risk situations. The balance must be struck between protecting people’s privacy and enhancing victim safety.³

30.7 The consultation paper noted that the benefits of information sharing include, for example: the capacity to provide a holistic approach in service provision; assisting non-government organisations to undertake their functions more effectively; and alleviating the inconvenience associated with victims having to supply the same information on a number of occasions to different service providers.

---

² Ibid, Rec 6.2.1.
30.8 The paper noted, however, that increased information sharing could result in a reluctance to report family violence due to concerns about how information would be used. It was therefore important to ensure that information was shared appropriately and stored securely. In addition, it was important to ensure that those sharing information were sensitive to any cultural issues that may arise—for example, where the information related to Indigenous people or people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.4

30.9 In the following sections, the Commissions consider ways to harness the benefits of information flow between the family law, family violence and child protection systems, while balancing the concerns identified by the Queensland Department of Communities.

Information flow to the family law system

30.10 As discussed in Chapter 15, the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) sets out detailed considerations to which a family court must have regard in deciding whether to make a particular parenting order. The ‘paramount consideration’ in this regard is ‘the best interests of the child’.5 Pursuant to s 60CC, the primary considerations for determining what is in a child’s best interests are:

(a) the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both of the child’s parents; and

(b) the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence.6

30.11 Section 60CC also sets out a lengthy list of ‘additional considerations’. Two of the additional considerations have particular relevance in the context of allegations of family violence:

- any family violence involving the child or a member of the child’s family;7 and

- any family violence order that applies to the child or a member of the child’s family, provided the order is a final order or its making was contested.8

30.12 There are a number of ways that information about these matters may be brought to the attention of the court including where information is supplied by the parties, or by other professionals working with the parties. Information may also be shared between different courts or between agencies and organisations and the courts. All of these mechanisms are considered further, below.

Notification of family violence and child protection matters

30.13 One of the ways that information about these issues is channelled into the family law system is by way of application forms completed by the parties to a particular

---

4 Ibid, 36.
5 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 60CA, 65AA.
6 Ibid s 60CC(2).
7 Ibid s 60CC(3)(j).
8 Ibid s 60CC(3)(k).
matter. Section 60CF(1) of the Family Law Act provides that if a party to parenting proceedings is aware that a family violence protection order applies to a child, or a member of the child’s family, that party must inform the court of that order. Further, a person who is not a party to the proceedings but is aware of a protection order that applies to a child or a member of the child’s family, may inform the court of the order.9

30.14 The Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) specify that a party must file a copy of any family violence protection order when a case starts or as soon as practicable after the order is made.10 This accommodates situations where parenting proceedings before the Family Court and protection order proceedings before a state or territory court are running concurrently, as well as where protection order proceedings have been finalised before Family Court proceedings begin. If a copy of the protection order is not available, the party must file a written notice containing an undertaking to file the order within a specified time, as well as details of the order.11

30.15 Section 67Z of the Family Law Act requires a party to a parenting proceeding who alleges that a child has been abused, or is at risk of being abused, to file a Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence (Form 4). Once the form has been filed, the Registry Manager is required to inform the relevant child protection agency. Pursuant to s 60K of the Act, once a Form 4 has been filed, the court is required to undertake certain action, including dealing with the application promptly and considering the need for any interim or procedural orders.12

30.16 Form 4 includes definitions of ‘abuse’ in relation to a child and ‘family violence’—as set out in s 4(1) of the Family Law Act—and provides space for a party to describe acts or omissions that are alleged to comprise the abuse or family violence.13 However, there is no designated space on the form for a party to list any relevant family violence protection or child protection orders that have been obtained.

30.17 Part F of the initiating application for proceedings in the Family Court, Federal Magistrates Court and Family Court of Western Australia—Initiating Application (Family Law)—requests information about ‘any ongoing cases in this or any other court’ or ‘any existing orders, agreements, parenting plans or undertakings to this or any other court’ about ‘family law, child support, family violence or child welfare issues’ that involve any of the parties or children listed in the application.14 The form is accompanied by notes to assist applicants to fill out the application, but these do not expand on what information is required in Part F.

---

9 Ibid s 60CF(2).
10 Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 2.05.
11 Federal Magistrates Court Rules 2001 (Cth) sch 3 applies r 2.05 of the Family Law Rules to proceedings in the Federal Magistrates Court.
12 Questions have been raised, however, about how often these forms are filed in practice: see, eg, R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), 70.
30.18 The 2009 Family Law Council advice recommended that the federal family courts consider revising Form 4, including making it more user-friendly.\(^{15}\) In addition, the Council recommended that:

The Attorney-General propose an amendment to the \([Family Law Act]\) to place a positive obligation on the parties to inform the court about any relevant orders or arrangements in place under child welfare laws.\(^{16}\)

30.19 Some commentators argue, however, that the notification of involvement in other jurisdictions should not be left to the parties—parties may fail to disclose through ignorance, neglect or malice. Instead, they suggested that there should be greater communication between the courts and child protection agencies.\(^{17}\)

30.20 The Chisholm Review also considered the process for identifying family violence and child abuse in the context of family law proceedings, and expressed support for a more pro-active approach that would shift the onus for providing relevant information away from the parties:

Experience has shown that [the current] system is not working. This Report suggests that because of this, and because issues of family violence and other risk factors are so common in parenting cases brought to the courts, it would be better to have a system of risk identification and assessment that applies to all parenting cases. This approach would reflect the best available thinking about these issues, and would reinforce a lot of measures that are already being taken by the courts to identify and deal with issues of violence as early as possible.\(^{18}\)

30.21 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department has indicated that a framework for screening and assessment for family violence across the family law system is under development.\(^{19}\) This issue is discussed further in Chapter 18.

30.22 In relation to application forms, the Commissions suggested in the Consultation Paper that the \(Initiating Application (Family Law)\) should more clearly seek information about existing protection orders obtained under state and territory family violence legislation or pending proceedings for such orders.\(^{20}\) The Commissions also asked what changes to the \(Initiating Application (Family Law)\) would make it clear to parties that they are being asked to disclose ongoing child protection proceedings and existing child protection orders.\(^{21}\) In addition, the Commissions suggested including a question on the form seeking further information about any significant safety concerns, including in relation to any children party to the proceedings.\(^{22}\)

\(^{16}\) Ibid, Rec 7.1.

\(^{18}\) R Chisholm, \(Family Courts Violence Review\) (2009), Recs 2.3, 2.4.

\(^{19}\) Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, \(Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010.\)

\(^{21}\) Ibid, Question 14–6.

\(^{22}\) Ibid, Proposal 14–1.
Submissions and consultations

30.23 A number of submissions expressed support for the proposal that the Initiating Application (Family Law) should more clearly seek information about existing family violence protection orders. Others expressed the view that the Initiating Application (Family Law) should also seek information in relation to child protection orders.

30.24 Legal Aid NSW suggested that the application form should also include questions about the nature of the violence; involvement by state and territory child protection agencies; involvement by the police; and whether the other party was, or had been, in prison, or was on remand, in relation to family violence. Legal Aid NSW was of the view that this would assist the court’s assessment of risk. The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service (Victoria) was of the view that it would be helpful to require that orders be attached to the application, or to seek consent so that the court could obtain copies of the orders.

30.25 However, a number of submissions raised concerns about using the existence of family violence protection orders as evidence of family violence in the family courts, noting that it may be more difficult to achieve orders by consent in the state and territory courts if those orders could be used for collateral purposes. It was suggested that the Initiating Application should clearly seek information about whether the protection orders were achieved by full consent, consent without admissions or in a contested hearing.

30.26 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department noted that Part B of the Parenting Questionnaire—which is completed by the parties once a matter is... going to trial—clearly asks whether there are any past or current family violence protection orders that affect the party or the party’s children. The Questionnaire also asks whether the party, or any person with whom a child resides or has contact, has been involved in any child welfare proceedings.

30.27 In their submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and the Chief Federal Magistrate expressed the view that the inclusion of a general question in the Initiating Application (Family Law) asking whether an applicant had concerns for the safety of the applicant or the applicant’s children may assist clients, especially unrepresented clients, to provide appropriate notification of family violence or child protection issues to the court. A number of other submissions agreed with this proposal. Women’s Legal Services NSW noted that the same question should be included on the Response to an Initiating Application.

30.28 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department noted, however, that s 60Z of the Family Law Act requires the parties to notify the court of any concerns that a child has been abused or is at risk of abuse. The Department’s view was that the use of the qualifier ‘significant’ in the Commissions’ proposal might deter parties from notifying the court of relevant concerns.

30.29 A number of submissions—while supporting clarification of the Initiating Application—noted that other initiatives were also necessary. Some supported, in addition to clearer application forms, the establishment of a national register of orders, discussed further below, and the establishment of a risk identification and assessment system as recommended by the Chisholm Review, discussed in Chapter 18.

Commissions’ views

30.30 The Commissions are of the view that a range of mechanisms should be used to collect information relevant to parenting proceedings in the family courts. The

---

32 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Solomums Australia for Family Equity, Submission FV 200, 28 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.
33 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
34 Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Submission FV 166, 25 June 2010. See also: Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.
35 The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; D Bryant, Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and J Pascoe, Chief Federal Magistrate of the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Submission FV 168, 25 June 2010.
36 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
Commissions support, for example, the development of a risk screening and assessment process across the family court system, discussed in Chapter 18, and the establishment of a national register, discussed below.

30.31 The forms filed by parties to parenting proceedings in family courts are, however, another important source of information. The Commissions’ view is that these forms—both the Initiating Application (Family Law) and the Response to the Initiating Application (Family Law)—should seek information from the parties in relation to past or present family violence protection or child protection orders, as well as past, pending or ongoing proceedings in relation to such orders. The Commissions note, for example, that the Parenting Questionnaire\(^{37}\) seeks information about past or current family violence protection orders. More detailed information—such as that suggested by Legal Aid NSW and discussed above—should be collected as part of screening and risk assessment processes discussed in Chapter 18.

30.32 Currently, the Initiating Application (Family Law) includes one general question seeking information on existing orders and one general question seeking information on ongoing cases about family law, child support, family violence or child welfare. In comparison, some state and territory protection order application forms ask separately for details about, for example, children’s court orders, protection orders, and family court orders. The Commissions support this more detailed approach in which questions are asked, or tick boxes provided, in relation to each different order and each different kind of case.

30.33 The Commissions acknowledge that some caution must be exercised in using family violence protection orders as evidence of family violence in the family court system in some circumstances, and this issue is discussed in detail in Chapter 17. However, it is important that the family court system be aware that such orders exist so as to avoid, as far as possible, the making of inconsistent parenting orders.

30.34 In addition, the Commissions are of the view that the Initiating Application (Family Law) and Response should include a more general question which targets concerns or fears the party has for their safety, or for the safety of their child. The question should focus on safety, rather than upon the notion of ‘child abuse’ which is the current focus of the Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence (Form 4). The Commissions agree with the Australian Government Attorney- General’s Department that the question should not set the threshold too high by use of the term ‘significant’, but should simply enquire about any safety concerns a party may have.

30.35 Form 4 does not include a designated space for parties to note existing orders. However, if a separate question seeking information about family violence protection and child protection orders is included in the Initiating Application (Family Law), another question about protection orders in Form 4 would involve unnecessary duplication. The Commissions do not, therefore, propose any change to Form 4 in this respect.

---

Recommendation 30–1 The Initiating Application (Family Law) and Initiating Application (Family Law) Response forms should clearly seek information about past and current family violence protection and child protection orders obtained under state and territory family violence and child protection legislation and past, pending or current proceedings for such orders.

Recommendation 30–2 The Initiating Application (Family Law) and Initiating Application (Family Law) Response forms should be amended to include a question seeking more general information, for example, ‘Do you have any fears for the safety of you or your child or children that the court should know about?’

Registration of child protection orders in family courts

30.36 One mechanism for bridging the information gap between the child protection and family law systems is s 70C of the Family Law Act, which enables the registration of ‘state child orders’—that is, orders dealing with residence and contact. Section 70D provides a similar mechanism for the registration of a child protection order made in another state. A registered order has the same force and effect as if it were an order made under the Family Law Act. The operation of this provision with respect to orders of the NSW Children’s Court has been described as follows:

if a New South Wales Children’s Court made an order that a child live with X, that order could be registered in the Family Court of Australia or the Federal Magistrates Court, in New South Wales or elsewhere, and then enforced as if it were an order of that court. The same applies to an order that a child should spend time with X (orders of the kind formerly referred to in the Family Law Act as ‘contact’ or ‘access’ orders).

30.37 To register a relevant child protection order, a sealed copy of the order is filed in a family court registry. The effect of the registration is to invoke the enforcement mechanisms of the Family Law Act. Chisholm considered the operation of the registration provision and suggested that ‘there would be no difficulty in [a child protection agency] making an application for any of these various forms of enforcement of a Children’s Court order registered in a family law court’.

30.38 Section 69ZK of the Family Law Act provides that the family courts must not make an order under the Act in relation to a child who is under the care of a person under a child welfare law, unless the order is expressed to come into effect when the child ceases to be under care; or the order is made with the written consent of a child. welfare officer. Chisholm suggested that, even where a child protection order is registered, s 69ZK means that the family courts could only make enforcement orders in relation to a child in care, if the state child welfare officer of the relevant state or territory had given written consent to the institution or continuation of the proceedings. The Review noted that, although such written consent could be given as part of the application to register the child order, the absence of a delegated power to give consent may cause difficulty.\footnote{Ibid, 35.}

30.39 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions asked whether the registration of child protection orders under ss 70C and 70D is a useful strategy that enhances the safety of children, and whether the absence of a delegated power to provide the consent required by s 69ZK was of concern.\footnote{Consultation Paper, Question 14–11.}

\textit{Submissions and consultations}

30.40 The Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate noted in their submission that there is no statistical information available on how often child protection orders are registered pursuant to ss 70C and 70D. They expressed the view, however, that the capacity to register orders is important as it minimises the need to rely on parties disclosing the orders.\footnote{D Bryant, Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and J Pascoe, Chief Federal Magistrate of the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, \textit{Submission FY 168}, 25 June 2010.} The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria also noted that the registration process was useful.\footnote{Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FY 220}, 1 July 2010.}

\textit{Commissions’ views}

30.41 The Commissions note that the registration of child protection orders in the family courts appears to be a useful mechanism. The Commissions’ view is that, while the current registration system is useful, it would be more effective if the courts had access to the orders, without having to rely on parties or child protection agencies to register them. Accordingly, the Commissions recommend below that these orders should be included as a matter of course in the proposed national register.\footnote{Rec 30–18.} The current proposal in relation to the national register involves the registration and inter-state recognition of family violence protection orders. In the Commissions’ view, many of the arguments relating to the automatic registration and recognition of family violence orders might also be made in relation to child protection orders and it would be sensible to extend the registration and recognition arrangements to include them.

30.42 As no other major issues were identified by stakeholders in relation to the registration of child protection orders in the family courts, the Commissions make no further recommendations in relation to this matter.
Non-publication provisions

30.43 Family violence legislation in every state and territory prohibits the publication of certain information about persons involved in, or associated with, protection order proceedings. However, the legislation across the jurisdictions differs as to:

- whether non-publication is the default position or is triggered by a court order;
- whether a harm threshold must be met before a court makes an order for non-publication;
- whether the non-publication provisions apply indefinitely or only until such time as a court has disposed of the proceedings; and
- the exceptions that permit publication in some circumstances.

30.44 In some states and territories, the prohibition on publication of certain aspects of protection order proceedings applies by default. Under the Queensland family violence legislation, for example, it is an offence to publish an account of proceedings that identifies, or is likely to identify the aggrieved person, a named person, the respondent, the applicant, the appellant, a witness or a child concerned in the proceedings.48

30.45 In comparison, under the Tasmanian family violence legislation, a prohibition on publication only applies following a court order to this effect. However, a court must make an order prohibiting the publication of material which may disclose the identity of a child affected by protection order proceedings.49

30.46 In New South Wales (NSW), a prohibition on publication also applies where there is a court order to this effect. A default prohibition applies in relation to information about children.50 The Northern Territory family violence legislation sets out a harm threshold that must be satisfied before a court can make a non-publication order in relation to a protected person or witness in a proceeding—that is, the court must be satisfied that publication would expose the person to risk of harm.51 There is, however a default prohibition in relation to publishing identifying information about children.52

Exceptions allowing communication of information

30.47 Many of the prohibitions on publication in state and territory family violence legislation include exceptions where publication is with the consent of the person to whom the information relates, or the consent of the court.53

---

48 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 82(1).
49 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 32(2).
50 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 45.
51 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 26.
52 Ibid s 123.
53 See, for example, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 45(4)(b).
30.48 The Queensland family violence legislation includes exceptions for publication with the court’s or the magistrate’s ‘express permission’, or where publication is permitted by regulation.54 There is also an exception for the communication of transcripts of evidence or other documents to persons concerned in proceedings in a court or to the police for use in such proceedings.55

30.49 The Australian Capital Territory (ACT) family violence legislation includes a detailed list of exceptions, including an express exception for information provided to a federal family court under s 60CF of the Family Law Act (‘informing the court of relevant family violence orders’), discussed above.56 Other exceptions in the ACT legislation include: where information is communicated in accordance with an order of the Magistrates Court or the written permission of a magistrate; and the provision of information to the child protection agency to allow it to exercise its care and protection powers.57 A court may also make an order to allow publication if it is in the public interest, will promote compliance with the protection order, or is necessary or desirable for the proper functioning of the Act.58

30.50 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked a range of questions about the non-publication provisions in state and territory family violence legislation, including whether the provisions were unduly restricting the flow of information from state and territory courts to the federal family courts,59 and whether state and territory courts should be required to provide details of protection orders and related proceedings to those courts.60 The Commissions also asked whether there should be express exceptions in the non-publication provisions to allow information to be available in other court proceedings, for example, in the federal family courts.61

Submissions and consultations

30.51 A number of submissions stated that these provisions do not appear to be a problem in practice.62 The Queensland Law Society commented, however, that the Queensland Police Service often referred to the provisions in response to subpoenas and expressed the view that the provisions should be reviewed to ensure that they did not restrict information flow to the police and child protection agencies where necessary.63 One stakeholder—while expressing support for allowing information to 54 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 82(1)(b).

55 Ibid s 82(3).
57 Ibid, sch 2, 2.2.
58 Ibid s 112(3).
59 Consultation Paper, Question 10–17.
60 Ibid, Question 10–19.
61 Ibid, Question 10–18.
flow to police or others involved in court proceedings—noted that the safety of victims of violence and their children should remain a key priority.64

30.52 A number of stakeholders expressed the view that state and territory courts should be required to provide details of protection order proceedings to the federal family courts where there is a related family law matter.65 The Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) stated that provision of this information to the federal family courts should not be dependent upon a request from one party or the discretion of the other party. The Council noted that one solution would be for federal family courts to have regard to the proposed national register of family violence protection orders.66

30.53 On the other hand, the Office of the Privacy Commissioner stated in its submission that prohibitions on publication of identifying information about individuals involved in protection order proceedings are an important privacy protection. The Office did not support modifying the general prohibition on publication and expressed the view that other mechanisms that limit the disclosure of personal information to those who legitimately require it should be used to improve information sharing.67

Commissions’ views

30.54 Limiting general publication—by, for example, the media—of identifying information relating to protection order proceedings is important to protect the privacy interests of the parties and others, in particular, children, involved in the proceedings. Stakeholders indicated that the existing non-publication provisions in state and territory family violence legislation did not appear to be unduly restricting the disclosure of information to the federal family courts.

30.55 In the Commissions’ view, however, such provisions should clearly set out where disclosure to other courts and agencies that legitimately require access to the information is allowed. This provides clarity for those being asked to disclose the information, and ensures that any disclosure is consistent with the family violence legislation and with relevant privacy legislation, as the disclosure will be ‘authorised by law’.68

30.56 The Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) provides an instructive starting point. In particular, the ACT legislation makes clear that disclosure of identifying information to the federal family courts under s 60CF of the Family Law Act does not breach the non-publication provision. Other important exceptions in this legislation relate to disclosure:

---

64 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.
66 Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
67 Office of the Privacy Commissioner, Submission FV 147, 24 June 2010.
68 Privacy legislation and the exception for disclosure that is ‘required or authorised by law’ is discussed further below.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

• to the child protection agency, to allow the exercise of the agency’s care and protection powers; and

• where a court is of the view that publication is in the public interest, will promote compliance with the protection order, or is necessary or desirable for the proper functioning of the Act.

The provision also provides a certain amount of flexibility by allowing disclosure on the basis of a court order or the written permission of the magistrate.

30.57 The Commissions are of the view that non-publication provisions in state and territory legislation should be reviewed to ensure that they expressly allow disclosure of information about protection orders and related proceedings—including identifying information—in appropriate circumstances. The exceptions to such provisions should expressly include disclosure of protection orders to the federal family courts under s 60CF of the Family Law Act.

30.58 The Commissions note the proposed development of a national register of state and territory family violence protection orders, which is discussed further below. State and territory family violence legislation may need to be amended to allow protection orders to be included in the national register, and this will provide an opportunity for the states and territories to consider the need for other exceptions. The Commissions’ view is that the proposed national register should be designed to ensure that this information is readily available to the federal family courts and others, such as child protection agencies and the police.

Recommendation 30–3 Non-publication provisions in state and territory family violence legislation should expressly allow disclosure of information in relation to protection orders and related proceedings that contains identifying information in appropriate circumstances, including disclosure of family violence protection orders to the federal family courts under s 60CF of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

Seeking information from child protection agencies

30.59 In each state and territory, the child protection legislation contains provisions for protecting the confidentiality of information collected by child protection agencies or for precluding such information from being admissible in another proceeding.69 The federal family courts may seek information from child protection agencies either at the request of parties by subpoena—issued under pt 15.3 of the Family Law Rules—or by

---

30. Information Sharing exercising the courts’ express power to seek information and documents from state and territory agencies set out in s 69ZW of the Family Law Act.

Subpoenas

30.60 The power of a federal family court to compel production of documents from a child protection agency under a subpoena was examined by the High Court in Northern Territory of Australia v GPAO. The specific issue was whether under the former Family Law Rules 1984 (Cth) O 28 r 1 the court could compel production of documents subject to s 97(3) of the Community Welfare Act (NT). Section 97(3) provided that:

A person who is, or has been, an authorized person shall not, except for the purposes of the Act, be required to—

(a) produce in a court a document that has come into his possession or under his control; or

(b) disclose or communicate to a court any matter or thing that has come under his notice, in the performance of his duties or functions under this Act.

30.61 A majority of the court held that the provisions of the Family Law Act did not override s 97(3) of the Community Welfare Act and that the provision was binding on the Family Court by operation of s 79 of the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth). Section 79 provided that:

The laws of each State or Territory, including the laws relating to procedure, evidence, and the competency of witnesses, shall, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution or the laws of the Commonwealth, be binding on all Courts exercising federal jurisdiction in that State or Territory in all cases to which they are applicable.

30.62 The High Court found that the provisions of the Family Law Act and the Family Law Rules did not ‘otherwise provide’ in the terms of s 79. Thus, the child protection agency could not be compelled by subpoena to produce the documents to the Family Court.

30.63 By way of contrast, in Queensland s 187 of the Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) allows disclosure of information if the disclosure is related to a child’s protection or welfare; or is otherwise required or permitted under law. This provision allows disclosure of information held by the Department of Communities to the federal family courts. Section 190 of the Child Protection Act specifically regulates the production of documents held by the Department where required by a party to a court proceeding.
Section 190 states that any such request must include information about the people to whom the request relates; the circumstances to which it relates—these must be relevant to the court proceedings; and state the period to which it relates. Section 190(4) provides that a person must not, directly or indirectly, disclose or make use of information obtained other than for a purpose connected with the proceeding.

70 Northern Territory of Australia v GPAO (1999) 196 CLR 553.
71 Ibid, 592.
72 Ibid, 589.
Power to require the production of documents or information

30.64 Section 69ZW of the Family Law Act provides that the court may make an order in child-related proceedings requiring a prescribed state or territory agency to provide the court with the documents or information specified.\(^{73}\) These must be documents recording, or information about, one or more of:

(a) any notifications to the agency of suspected abuse of a child to whom the proceedings relate or of suspected family violence affecting the child;

(b) any assessments by the agency of investigations into a notification of that kind or the findings or outcomes of those investigations;

(c) any reports commissioned by the agency in the course of investigating a notification.\(^{74}\)

30.65 An order under s 69ZW overrides any inconsistent state and territory law,\(^{75}\) but the agency does not have to comply with the order in relation to:

(a) documents or information not in the possession or control of the agency; or

(b) documents or information that include the identity of the person who made a notification.\(^{76}\)

30.66 Once information is provided in response to the order, the court must admit into evidence any such information on which it intends to rely.\(^{77}\) There is qualified protection for the identity of the person who made the notification—if the person does not consent, the court can only disclose their identity if satisfied that it ‘is critically important to the proceedings and that failure to make disclosure would prejudice the proper administration of justice’.\(^{78}\)

Protocols relating to information sharing

30.67 Information sharing protocols are in place between child protection agencies in a number of jurisdictions—such as NSW and Queensland—and the federal family courts, dealing with a range of issues including requests for information by way of subpoena and under s 69ZW.\(^{79}\) The Queensland protocol sets out the relevant law, discussed above, and the procedures that apply where a party to a family court proceeding requests the court to issue a subpoena to the Department of Child Safety (now the Department of Communities). The Protocol includes safeguards in relation to \(^{73}\) The agencies that have been prescribed in Family Law Regulations 1984 (Cth) sch 9 are the child protection agencies and the police in each state and territory.

---

\(^{74}\) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 69ZW(2).

\(^{75}\) Ibid s 69ZW(4).

\(^{76}\) Ibid s 69ZW(3).

\(^{77}\) Ibid s 69ZW(5).

\(^{78}\) Ibid s 69ZW(6). The agency must be notified and given an opportunity to respond in such circumstances: s 69ZW(7).

\(^{79}\) Family Court of Australia, Protocol between the Family Court of Australia and the NSW Department of Community Services (2005); Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Protocol between the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia and the NSW Department of Community Services (2009); Family Court of Australia, Protocol between the Department of Child Safety Queensland, the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia (2007).
subpoenaed documents, for example, that the Registry Manager of the Family Court must ensure that any file inspections are carried out under supervision and that photocopying does not occur unless ordered by the court.80

30.68 The Protocol also regulates the disclosure of information in response to an order made under s 69ZW and includes safeguards in relation to such documents, for example, that documents that are not admitted into evidence should be destroyed.81

30.69 In consultations, the Commissions heard that there were significant problems associated with information flow from state and territory child protection agencies to family courts in some jurisdictions. The Commissions understand, for example, that the decision in Northern Territory of Australia v GPAO has had an impact on the attitude of some jurisdictions to the exercise of the court’s power under s 69ZW, although the decision itself concerned the power to require production of documents by way of subpoena.

30.70 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how best to facilitate the information flow between child protection agencies and the family courts. The Commissions proposed, as a minimum, that protocols be developed between federal family courts and state and territory child protection agencies including procedures for responding to subpoenas issued by federal family courts and for dealing with requests for documents and information under s 69ZW of the Family Law Act.

Submissions and consultations

Subpoenas

30.71 A number of stakeholders expressed the view that state and territory legislation should be amended to address the issues raised in Northern Territory v GPAO and to facilitate child protection agencies providing information to the family courts.82 Some also suggested that the Family Law Act and Rules be amended to require that information be provided.83

30.72 Legal Aid NSW noted that the experience of legal practitioners in relation to the production of documents in response to subpoenas appeared to vary in different regions of NSW, noting that while some Community Service Centres (CSCs) were unresponsive, there had been better production in the last two years in a number of regions. Strategies to promote a cooperative response to the subpoena process included ensuring that subpoenas were clear about the information sought, and follow-up telephone contact between the CSC and the practitioner about what was required and what was available.84

80 Family Court of Australia, Protocol between the Department of Child Safety Queensland, the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia (2007), [6.4].
81 Ibid, [6.3].
82 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
84 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
30.73 One stakeholder commented that resources were required to support child protection agencies to enable them to respond to requests for information.85

30.74 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria stated that the Department of Human Services in Victoria usually responded to subpoenas on time, but noted that child protection agencies in other jurisdictions provided more limited information.86 The Queensland Law Society stated that the protocol between the family courts and the Queensland Department of Communities was working well, and that the Department complies appropriately with requests for information by way of subpoena as well as orders under s 69ZW.87

30.75 The Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian expressed support for the development of protocols between the federal family courts and child protection agencies, but stated that the power to compel the production of documents by way of subpoena should also be strengthened to ensure that child protection agencies are required to comply.88

Section 69ZW

30.76 The Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and the Chief Federal Magistrate stated in their submission that s 69ZW is an important mechanism to provide access to information held by state and territory child protection agencies. The submission noted that the provision generally worked well, but that ‘for reasons that are unclear, section 69ZW has not yet been able to produce similar results in NSW’.89

30.77 The submission suggested that relationship building between courts and agencies and perhaps direct access to a contact point in child protection agencies for court staff and independent children’s lawyers would assist. One way to achieve this might be to involve state and territory agencies in the Pathways networks across Australia. The submission also expressed some support for nationally consistent protocols to deal with requests for information under s 69ZW and by way of subpoena, but noted that it remained important to ensure that the enabling legislation was clear.90

30.78 A number of other stakeholders also expressed support for the development of protocols between federal family courts and state and territory child protection agencies that include procedures for responding to subpoenas issued by federal family courts and for dealing with requests for documents and information under s 69ZW of the Family Law Act.91

---

90 Ibid.
Commissions’ views

30.79 It appears that there are a number of legislative and administrative barriers preventing the federal family courts from accessing important information held by child protection agencies in some jurisdictions. Some of these barriers stem from the High Court’s decision in Northern Territory of Australia v GPAO.92 In the Commissions’ view, states and territories should review and amend, where necessary, their child protection legislation to ensure that the legislation is not preventing child protection agencies from disclosing relevant information to the federal family courts in appropriate circumstances.

30.80 The Commissions note that s 69ZW provides that where the federal family courts request the specified information—notifications of suspected abuse of a child or family violence affecting a child and related assessments and reports—from prescribed agencies, state or territory laws have no effect to the extent that they would hinder or prevent an agency complying with the order.93 While it would be possible to include a similar provision in relation to requests for information by way of subpoena, in the Commissions’ view a more nuanced outcome could be achieved through the amendment of state and territory legislation to allow information to flow in appropriate and controlled circumstances. The Queensland child protection legislation provides a model in this regard.

30.81 Administrative measures are also necessary to ensure that child protection agencies are aware of, and responsive to, requests for information. The Commissions recommend that federal family courts and state and territory child protection agencies in all states and territories develop protocols that include procedures for dealing with requests for documents and information under s 69ZW and for responding to subpoenas issued by federal family courts.

30.82 The Commissions note that simply putting protocols in place is not sufficient. These arrangements must be given an ongoing profile among departmental and court officers; they must form the basis of an ongoing and responsive relationship between the agencies and the courts; and they must be supported and implemented in practice. The Commissions also recommend, below, that these protocols include comprehensive information sharing arrangements.94

---

92 Northern Territory of Australia v GPAO (1999) 196 CLR 553.
93 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 69ZW(4).
94 Recs 30–16, 30–17.
Recommendation 30–4 State and territory child protection legislation should not prevent child protection agencies from disclosing to federal family courts relevant information about children involved in federal family court proceedings in appropriate circumstances.

Recommendation 30–5 Federal family courts and state and territory child protection agencies should develop protocols for:

(a) dealing with requests for documents and information under s 69ZW of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth); and

(b) responding to subpoenas issued by federal family courts.

---

Information flow to the family violence system

Notification of parenting orders

30.83 With the exception of the ACT, the family violence legislation in each of the states and territories includes provisions for the state and territory courts to gain access to information about parenting orders. However, the legislation differs in relation to the procedure by which the information is obtained. Most commonly, the legislation imposes obligations on persons who apply for a protection order, or a variation of such an order, to inform the court of any relevant parenting order, or any pending application for a parenting order, of which the person is aware. On the other hand, the Victorian family violence legislation places an obligation on a court that decides to make a family violence protection order—where one of the parties is the parent of a child—to enquire whether a parenting order or a child protection order is in force.

30.84 The application forms for protection orders in most states and territories ask whether a child is the subject of a current order under the Family Law Act, or whether there are pending proceedings for such an order. Queensland’s Protection Order Application asks whether a court has made any other orders involving the parties, or if there are other proceedings that are yet to be decided in another court. Individual check boxes are then set out for current and non-current: children’s court orders; Queensland domestic violence orders; interstate or New Zealand domestic violence orders; family

---

95 The Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) does not directly require an applicant for a protection order or any other person to inform the court about a family law contact order. Section 31 does, however, include a requirement for courts to consider any relevant family law contact order of which they are aware.

96 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 42; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 90; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 46B; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)s 20; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 15; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 66.

97 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 89.

98 This is the case, eg, in NSW, Victoria, Queensland, WA and Tasmania.
30. Information Sharing

30.85 However, some forms—for example, in the ACT—ask about pending or finalised proceedings without specifically asking whether there are existing family court orders. The application form for a protection order in the Magistrates Court of South Australia does not seek information about family court orders or pending proceedings for such orders, although this information is sought on the Affidavit to Support an Application for a Domestic Violence Restraining Order. In addition, few application forms for variation of protection orders request information about relevant family law orders.100

Consultation Paper

30.86 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should provide mechanisms for courts exercising jurisdiction under such legislation to be informed about existing parenting orders or pending proceedings for such orders. The Commissions suggested that this might be achieved by requiring parties to proceedings for a protection order to inform the court about any such parenting orders or proceedings; requiring courts making protection orders to inquire as to any such parenting orders or proceedings; or both of the above.101

30.87 The Commissions also proposed that application forms for protection orders in all states and territories, including applications for variation of protection orders, should clearly seek information about existing parenting orders or pending proceedings for such orders.102

Submissions and consultations

30.88 Submissions and consultations indicated that it was important to ensure that information about parenting orders should flow to state and territory courts and suggested a number of ways that this could be achieved. National Legal Aid, and a number of other stakeholders,103 supported the proposal to require parties to proceedings for a protection order to inform the court about any parenting orders or

---

100 Exceptions include the applications for variation of protection orders in Victoria and Tasmania.
101 Consultation Paper, Proposal 8–3.
103 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 04, 23 August 2009.
proceedings and to require courts making protection orders to inquire as to any parenting orders or proceedings.\textsuperscript{104} The submission noted, however, that it was not sufficient to rely on the parties to inform the courts about existing parenting orders and suggested that protocols should be put in place to allow state and territory courts to access the family courts’ database containing this information.\textsuperscript{105} Other parties suggested this information should be captured on a central national register.\textsuperscript{106}

30.89 In their submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate noted that the Commonwealth Courts Portal (CCP)—an initiative of the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia—provides secure web-based access to information about cases before these courts. The submission stated that the Family Court’s Policy Advisory Committee has considered extending access to the CCP to relevant organisations including possibly state and territory police, state and territory children’s courts, child protection agencies and the Child Support Agency and expressed support for a limited trial.\textsuperscript{107} This issue is discussed further, below.

30.90 One stakeholder submitted that requiring vulnerable parties, for example those from non-English speaking backgrounds, those with intellectual disabilities, or low levels of literacy to inform the court about parenting orders—particularly where they were self-represented—would be too difficult. This stakeholder was of the view that the obligation should lie with the court.\textsuperscript{108} A number of other stakeholders agreed.\textsuperscript{109}

30.91 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria also noted that most parties to proceedings under family violence legislation are unrepresented and may only get limited legal advice, if any, during the proceedings. The submission expressed the view that, in these circumstances, it would not be appropriate to impose a legal obligation on the parties to inform the court about parenting orders or proceedings. The Courts submitted that the best approach would be to ensure that the relevant questions are asked on application forms and to impose an obligation on courts to inquire as to any parenting orders or proceedings.

30.92 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria noted, in addition, that a national register, including family law orders affecting children as well as family violence protection orders would assist. Pending the establishment of such a register,

\begin{footnotes}
\footnotetext[104]{National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.}
\footnotetext[105]{This position was also supported by Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[106]{Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[107]{D Bryant, Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and J Pascoe, Chief Federal Magistrate of the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Submission FV 168, 25 June 2010.}
\footnotetext[108]{Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.}
\end{footnotes}
the Courts suggested that it would be useful to establish protocols between the federal family courts and the state and territory courts to ensure that copies of current family court orders are provided to state and territory courts.110

30.93 The submission from the NSW Local Court highlighted s 42(1) of the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW), which provides:

(1) A person who applies for, or for a variation of, a final apprehended violence order or interim court order must inform the court of:

(a) any relevant parenting order of which the person is aware, or

(b) any pending application for a relevant parenting order of which the person is aware.

The court is required to inform the applicant of the obligation of the applicant under this subsection.

30.94 The provision imposes an obligation on the parties to inform the court of any parenting order or pending application, but also requires the court to bring this obligation to the parties’ attention. The submission also noted that the application form for a protection order in NSW has a section for the applicant to indicate whether there are parenting orders in place.111

30.95 There was general support for ensuring that application forms for protection orders in all states and territories clearly seek information about existing parenting orders, or pending proceedings for such orders.112 One submission noted that the Queensland Protection Order Application form, discussed above, would provide a suitable model.113

110 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
111 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
Commissions’ views

30.96 It is clearly important that state and territory courts making protection orders are aware of existing parenting orders. This information is central to ensuring that proceedings for protection orders are conducted on an informed basis. The most common approach in state and territory family violence legislation is to impose a legal obligation on parties to inform the court about existing parenting orders. However, stakeholders have indicated that it is not helpful to impose an obligation of this kind on parties—where failure to provide the information is likely to involve a sanction of some kind—given that many will be unrepresented, and some will be more vulnerable, such as those from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and persons with a disability.

30.97 Accordingly, the Commissions are not recommending placing a legal obligation on the parties to provide information about parenting orders. However, application forms for protection orders should ask—clearly and specifically—about the existence of parenting orders or pending proceedings for such orders. In the Commissions’ view, including clear, specific questions on application forms is a more effective method of eliciting information from parties, than imposing a legal obligation on them. In addition, the Commissions recommend that states and territories should amend their family violence legislation to place an obligation on courts to ask for the required information.

30.98 The Commissions also recommend that parenting orders should be included on the national register and that state and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence and child protection legislation should have access to the register. In addition, the Commissions recommend that state and territory courts should be given access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal. This will ensure that those courts have timely access to accurate and up-to-date information about cases that are before the federal family courts, the outcomes of those cases and orders made by the courts.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recommendation 30–6</th>
<th>State and territory family violence legislation should require courts exercising jurisdiction under that legislation to inquire about existing parenting orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), or pending proceedings for such orders.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Recommendation 30–7</td>
<td>Application forms for family violence protection orders in all states and territories, including applications for variation of protection orders, should clearly seek information about existing parenting orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), or pending proceedings for such orders.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

114 Rec 30–18.
115 Rec 30–8.
Non-publication provision

30.99 Section 121 of the Family Law Act makes it an offence to publish any account of any proceedings under the Act that identifies a party to the proceedings; a person who is related to, or associated with a party to the proceedings; or a witness in the proceedings. The provision sets broad parameters for when information will be taken as identifying a person. These include any of the following particulars, where they are sufficient to identify a person to a member of the public, or a section of the public:

- the person’s name, title, pseudonym or alias;
- the address of any premises at which the person resides or works, or the locality in which premises are situated;
- the person’s physical description or style of dress;
- any employment or occupation in which the person engages;
- the person’s relationship to identified relatives, friends or businesses;
- the person’s recreational interests or political, philosophical or religious beliefs; and
- any real or personal property in which the person has an interest or with which the person is otherwise associated.

30.100 There are a number of exceptions to the publication offence in s 121—most relevantly, for disclosures to persons concerned in proceedings in ‘any court’ for use in connection with those proceedings. Other exceptions include, for example, disclosures made to legal professional disciplinary boards; disclosures made to bodies providing, or considering whether to provide, legal aid; notices or reports published pursuant to a court direction; and publications intended primarily for use by members of the legal profession. Accounts of proceedings may also be published with court approval.

30.101 The impact of the publication offence in s 121 on the communication of information for the purpose of protection order proceedings under state and territory family violence legislation will depend on the interpretation of the terms an ‘account of proceedings’ and dissemination ‘to the public or to a section of the public’. In Hinchcliffe v Commissioner of Police of the Australian Federal Police, Kenny J of the Federal Court gave a narrow interpretation to both of these terms. Kenny J commented that an ‘account of proceedings’ requires a narrative, description, retelling or recitation of something about, or that has happened in, the proceedings. This is not

116 The offence is punishable by a maximum penalty of imprisonment for one year. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights entitles all persons to a ‘fair and public hearing’. However, the Covenant provides that suits of law need not be made public in proceedings concerning matrimonial disputes or the guardianship of children: International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 16 December 1966, [1980] ATS 23, (entered into force generally on 23 March 1976), art 14.
117 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 121(9)(a).
made out merely because some allegations made in the proceedings are reiterated outside the court.

30.102 Kenny J noted with approval the ruling in Re Edelsten; Ex Parte Donnelly,119 that dissemination ‘to the public or to a section of the public’ should be taken as a reference to a ‘widespread communication with the aim of reaching a wide audience’.120 This does not encompass communications to close personal associates or members of a group with an interest that is substantially greater than, or different from, the interest of other members of the public.

30.103 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether the prohibition on publication set out in s 121 of the Family Law Act unduly restricted communication about family law proceedings to those involved in protection order proceedings, including the police.121

Submissions and consultations

30.104 In its submission, Legal Aid NSW noted that s 121 was designed to prevent the publication of the facts of a case in the media, rather than the use of Family Court proceedings in the state and territory courts. The submission noted, however, that where a party seeks to adduce evidence contained in family or expert reports in child abuse or assault cases brought in the state and territory courts, requests for these reports are dealt with on their merits by the family courts, the interests of children being the primary consideration. The submission noted that such reports are provided for use in other proceedings about 50% of the time.122

30.105 The Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate stated in their submission that they were not aware of any examples of the prohibition on publication in s 121 of the Family Law Act unduly restricting communication about family law proceedings to persons involved in protection order proceedings.123 The Queensland Law Society suggested that s 121 could be clarified to make clear that sharing information with the police or with child protection agencies did not amount to 'publication.'124

30.106 The Law Council of Australia stated that, in practice, s 121 does not unduly restrict the flow of family court information to the state and territory courts. A number of other stakeholders agreed.125 The Council noted that the exception in s 121(9)(a)—which allows the communication, to persons concerned in proceedings in any court, of 119 Re Edelston; Ex parte Donnelly (1988) 18 FCR 434.

121 Consultation Paper, Question 10–11.
122 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
125 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; National Peak Body for Safety and Protection of Parents and Children, Submission FV 47, 24 May 2010.
any pleading, transcript of evidence or other document for use in connection with those proceedings—allows the use of this information in protection order proceedings.126

Commissions’ views

30.107 The Commissions note that s 121 of the Family Law Act does not appear to be unduly restricting communication about family law proceedings to state and territory courts hearing protection order matters. Section 121 of the Family Law Act is primarily aimed at preventing widespread publication of family court proceedings that include identifying information in the media. In the Commissions’ view this general prohibition is appropriate.

30.108 There are a number of ways in which information can be shared between the federal family courts, state and territory courts, the police and child protection agencies. Section 121 allows communication of information to police involved in proceedings in any court. Section 67Z of the Family Law Act requires the Registry Manager of the Family Court to ‘as soon as practicable, notify a prescribed child welfare authority’ where a Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence (Form 4) is filed. In addition, those with a ‘proper interest’ may have access to federal family court files with the permission of the court.127

30.109 Finally, Justice Kenny’s view that dissemination ‘to the public or to a section of the public’ should be taken as a reference to a ‘widespread communication with the aim of reaching a wide audience’,128 means that s 121 will not apply to disclosures between courts and agencies with a legitimate interest in the matter. It is on this basis that state and territory courts, for example, might be given access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal.

30.110 In the Commissions’ view, the exception to allow disclosure to persons concerned in any court proceedings for use in connection with those proceedings sufficiently enables the sharing of information for the purpose of protection order proceedings under state and territory family violence legislation. The Commissions are not, therefore, recommending that s 121 be amended.

Access to federal family court records

30.111 Information included in federal family court records may also be relevant to proceedings under state and territory family violence laws. This information is wider than the details of current or prior parenting orders and may include, for example, the reasons for making these orders—such as interviews with or assessments of parents or children, including family consultant assessments and clinicians’ reports—and injunctions granted under the Family Law Act.

127 Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 24.13(1). This issue is discussed further, below.
30.112 The Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) specify a limited range of people who may search the court record relating to a case, or inspect or copy a document forming part of the record as follows:

(a) the Attorney-General;
(b) a party, a lawyer for a party, or an independent children’s lawyer, in a case;
(c) with the permission of the court, a person with a proper interest:
   (i) in the case; or
   (ii) in information obtainable from the court record in the case;
(d) with the permission of the court, a person researching the court record relating to the case.\(^{129}\)

30.113 In considering whether to give permission to a person seeking to obtain access to a part of the court record other than court documents, the court must consider:

(a) the purpose for which access is sought;
(b) whether the access sought is reasonable for that purpose;
(c) the need for security of court personnel, parties, children and witnesses;
(d) any limits or conditions that should be imposed on access to, or use of, the record.\(^{130}\)

30.114 The only situation in which the Family Law Act expressly provides for details of injunctions or orders to be provided to other courts is where a federal family court has made an order or granted an injunction that is inconsistent with an existing protection order.\(^{131}\)

30.115 The Family Law Council made a submission to the ALRC’s 2008 inquiry into Australian privacy laws,\(^{132}\) commenting on the challenge of information sharing in the context of family violence. It noted that:

In many cases information held by one part of the system is not available to another part because of privacy considerations. Decisions are therefore made in the absence of a complete picture of the family circumstances. This lack of transparency often leads to misguided decisions being taken or problems being ignored. This is particularly so when decisions have to be made on an urgent basis and there is no time for the leisurely process of subpoenas or information orders to be sought.\(^{133}\)

30.116 The Council advised that it was considering whether police officers should have access to the family courts’ databases to ensure that they had relevant information available when dealing with situations of family violence. One of the examples that the \(^{129}\) Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 24.13(1).

\(^{130}\) Ibid r 24.13(3).

\(^{131}\) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68P. Discussed in detail in Ch 17.

30. Information Sharing

Council provided was where a court has ordered that a supervisor be present when a parent spends time with a child:

Without access to information on the child related orders, police might attend a scene and remove the person responsible for supervising a parent spending time with a child without also removing the child ... At the moment, police must rely on seeing the physical orders when they attend the scene.134

30.117 It was noted in ALRC 108 that, pursuant to r 24.13 of the Family Law Rules, police officers are already able to obtain access to information held by the Family Court where the officer can demonstrate a ‘proper interest’ in the court record.135 Accordingly, the ALRC did not recommend legislative change in this regard.

Submissions and consultations

30.118 The Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and the Chief Federal Magistrate stated in their submission that there were no known examples of individuals or agencies seeking access to records for the purpose of protection order proceedings not being provided with the requested documentation in a timely fashion. The submission stated that the existing provisions provided sufficient flexibility to enable information to be exchanged, subject to appropriate safeguards.136

30.119 In addition, the submission noted that access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal (CCP) is currently available to registered litigants and legal practitioners and that, as noted above, the Family Court’s Policy Advisory Committee is actively considering extending access to the CCP to relevant agencies and organisations including state and territory police, state and territory children’s courts, child protection agencies and the Child Support Agency.137

30.120 The Queensland Law Society expressed the view that the records of proceedings under the Family Law Act were generally accessible in a timely fashion to those involved in family violence proceedings in Queensland, noting that:

Typically, magistrates do not want to be burdened with very long affidavits filed in family law proceedings, a great proportion of which are irrelevant to an application for a protection order. Magistrates certainly do want to be aware of existing current orders, particularly those impacting on children, provided that they are relevant. In the matters which are contested, parties ensure that these matters are properly brought to the attention of magistrates.138

30.121 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria stated, however, that:

In our experience, the process for obtaining family law orders from the federal family law courts in a timely fashion is unreliable. We believe that legislation requiring 134 Ibid.

137 Ibid.
federal family courts to provide copies of orders to state courts would assist in producing more reliable processes. We also support the development of a national database for family law, family violence and child protection orders relating to children that can be accessed by police as well as courts.\(^{139}\)

30.122 A number of other stakeholders also indicated that there were problems gaining access to federal family court records\(^{140}\) and suggested that there needed to be improvements in the legislation or procedures that regulate the provision of access.\(^{141}\)

Commissions’ views

30.123 In the Commissions’ view, there is adequate flexibility in the provisions in the Family Law Rules to allow those with a ‘proper interest’ to access information for the purpose of protection order proceedings under state and territory family violence legislation. The Commissions do not, therefore, recommend that the Rules be amended. However, there appear to be some issues with the provision of access to family court records in practice. This could be resolved in a number of ways, for example, by developing information sharing protocols between the relevant courts, government agencies and private sector organisations. This issue is discussed further, below.

30.124 The Commissions note, however, that state and territory courts are most interested in having reliable and timely access to information about existing family court orders and proceedings for such orders. This need could effectively be addressed by providing state and territory courts with access to the CCP, which includes information about outcomes of cases and orders made. The Commissions note that the Family Court’s Policy Advisory Committee is considering extending access to the CCP to relevant agencies and organisations. The Commissions’ view is that state and territory courts dealing with family violence and child protection matters—and others with a ‘proper interest’ in such matters, including police and child protection agencies—should have access to the CCP to ensure that they can reliably confirm in a timely way whether there are existing related orders in place or pending proceedings for such orders.

30.125 The Commissions are also of the view that, in the future, this information should also be included on the proposed national register. This issue is discussed further below.\(^{142}\)

\(^{139}\) Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\(^{142}\) Rec 30–18.
Federal family courts should provide state and territory courts dealing with family violence and child protection matters—and others with a proper interest in such matters, including police and child protection agencies—with access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal to ensure that they have reliable and timely access to relevant information about existing federal family court orders and pending proceedings for such orders.

Information sharing between agencies

Information flow to the federal family courts and the state and territory courts is important to ensure that the courts are making orders based on all the relevant information, and that the potential for inconsistent orders is minimised. It is also important that information is shared appropriately among relevant government agencies and private sector organisations—for example, private sector service providers, child protection agencies and the police—to ensure the safety of victims of family violence and their children.

In the following section, the Commissions examine the legislative framework that regulates the sharing of information among government agencies and private sector organisations—that is, privacy and secrecy laws—and consider what changes are necessary to allow information to flow in appropriate circumstances. Barriers to information sharing are not, however, always legislative in nature. Often the obstacles are cultural, or arise from an excess of caution based on a lack of understanding of the relevant rules, and the Commissions also consider ways to promote a culture of appropriate and effective information sharing.

Privacy laws

The handling of personal information is regulated by privacy legislation at the federal, state and territory level. The principal piece of federal legislation regulating privacy in Australia is the Privacy Act 1988 (Cth), which applies to Australian and ACT Government agencies and private sector organisations. The Act contains a set of 11 Information Privacy Principles (IPPs) that apply to government agencies, and 10 National Privacy Principles (NPPs) that apply to private sector organisations.

Of particular relevance to this Inquiry are IPPs 10 and 11, which impose limits on the manner in which Australian Government agencies use and disclose personal information. IPP 10 provides that a ‘record-keeper’ in an Australian Government agency who has possession or control of personal information shall not use the information for any other purpose unless:

the individual concerned has consented to use of the information for that other purpose;

---

143 Section 6 of the Privacy Act 1988 (Cth) defines ‘agency’ to include ‘a federal court’.
the record-keeper believes on reasonable grounds that use of the information for that other purpose is necessary to prevent or lessen a serious and imminent threat to the life or health of the individual concerned or another person;

use of the information for that other purpose is required or authorised by or under law;

use of the information for that other purpose is reasonably necessary for enforcement of the criminal law or of a law imposing a pecuniary penalty, or for the protection of the public revenue; or the purpose for which the information is used is directly related to the purpose for which the information was obtained.144

30.130 IPP 11 governs disclosure of personal information. The exceptions in IPP 11 closely reflect those in IPP 10. Similar, but not identical, limitations on use and disclosure apply to many state and territory government agencies under state and territory privacy laws and administrative obligations.

30.131 Time for Action noted that privacy laws can contribute to a lack of communication and collaboration between government and non-government organisations, which impedes systems working together effectively:

> While privacy laws generally allow the sharing of information between government agencies and other specified organisations where there is a serious and imminent threat to a person’s safety ... many service providers report inconsistencies in the way privacy laws and principles are applied, suggesting the need for clarification of, and/or education for, relevant agencies about privacy laws and principles.145

30.132 It appears from some reviews of child protection systems in Australia that there is confusion among agencies about the impact of privacy rules that has created obstacles to information sharing. In a recent report, the Victorian Ombudsman noted > a number of mistaken beliefs held by child protection staff about their responsibilities under the Information Privacy Act. Unfounded beliefs included that the department should not release the identity of reporters to Victoria Police when issues of physical and sexual abuse against children were alleged ... The department has not provided child protection workers with sufficient training, advice or resources to ensure an appropriate level of privacy compliance.146

30.133 In NSW, the privacy principles in the Privacy and Personal Information Protection Act 1998 (NSW) and the Health Records and Information Privacy Act 2002 (NSW) have been modified with respect to government agencies (and some private sector entities) that participate in the Domestic Violence Intervention Court Model.147 The amending orders provide that government agencies that participate in the scheme

---

144 Ibid s 14, IPP 10.
146 Ombudsman Victoria, Own Motion Investigation into the Department of Human Services Child Protection Program (2009), [78]–[79].
147 Privacy Code of Practice (General) Amendment (Domestic Violence Intervention) 2010 (NSW); Health Records and Information Privacy Code of Practice Amendment (Domestic Violence Intervention) 2010 (NSW).
30. Information Sharing are not required to comply with the Act in relation to the collection, use and disclosure of personal information about alleged perpetrators, victims and other family members. Agencies must, however, comply with codes of practice particular to the scheme.

30.134 Information sharing guidelines have been recommended as a way to clarify information sharing procedures between the relevant agencies.148 Numerous reviews have also recommended that specific training be provided to ensure that agencies and their officers understand what information may (or must) be shared, with whom and under what circumstances.149

Proposed reform of the privacy principles

30.135 In its report on privacy, For Your Information: Australian Privacy Law and Practice (2008) (ALRC Report 108), the ALRC recommended that a uniform set of privacy principles should apply to private sector organisations and federal, state and territory government agencies.150 The ALRC expressed the view that the use and disclosure of personal information should be permitted:

- with the consent of the individual to whom the information relates;
- for a secondary purpose that is related to the primary purpose of collection—or, if the information is sensitive personal information, directly related to the primary purpose of collection—where the individual to whom the information relates would reasonably expect the information to be used or disclosed in that way;
- where the agency or organisation reasonably believes that the use or disclosure is reasonably necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual’s life, health or safety; or public health or public safety;
- where the use or disclosure is required or authorised by or under law;
- where the agency or organisation reasonably believes that the use or disclosure is necessary for certain law enforcement and regulatory purposes, including ‘the prevention, detection, investigation or remedying of seriously improper conduct or prescribed conduct’; and
- for research purposes.151

---

151 Ibid, Model Unified Privacy Principle 5.
Generally, personal information should be used and disclosed only for the purpose for which it was collected, that is, the primary purpose of collection or a related purpose. Where sensitive personal information is collected, it should only be used for the primary purpose of collection or a directly related purpose that the person would reasonably expect.

The information can be used for other purposes with the consent of the individual to whom the information relates. An example of information being used for another purpose with the consent of the individual is the NSW Police Yellow Card Referral Program. The Program requires police to ask victims of family violence at the time of an incident if they would like their details forwarded to a victim support agency for follow up. The Yellow Card is signed by the victim, indicating express consent for disclosure of their personal information. The Yellow Card is then forwarded to a support agency via a Domestic Violence Liaison Officer.

Serious threat to life, health or safety

In ALRC Report 108, the ALRC noted that all states and territories have laws in place that expressly allow or require disclosure of personal information in certain circumstances, for example, where a child is at risk of physical or sexual abuse. However, the ALRC also noted reports that sometimes a child was seriously injured or killed by a parent where disclosure of information about the parent’s behaviour to appropriate service providers could have helped to prevent the injury or death. Reviews into child deaths have also highlighted the need for increased collaboration and information sharing in order to protect children from serious harm.

The ALRC was concerned that the existing exception for the use and disclosure of information where necessary to prevent or lessen a serious and imminent threat to the life or health of an individual, was too narrow. In the ALRC’s view there were compelling policy reasons for information to be used and disclosed, for example, where a child’s life, health or safety was at risk of harm in the medium to long term, not only where the threat of harm was imminent. In such circumstances, agencies and organisations should be able to take early preventative action to stop a threat from escalating to the point of materialisation.

The ALRC recommended, therefore, that the requirement that the threat be imminent should be removed, noting that an analysis of whether a threat was ‘serious’ would involve consideration of the relative likelihood that the harm would occur, as well as the gravity of the potential outcome.

---

152 Ibid, [69.103].
30.141 In June 2010, in response to these recommendations, the Australian Government released exposure draft Australian Privacy Principles for comment.\(^{155}\) The draft largely reflected the ALRC’s recommendations, including allowing the use or disclosure of personal information where an agency or organisation reasonably believes the use or disclosure is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual’s life, health or safety, or public health or safety. In light of stakeholder concerns about the possible breadth of the exception, the exposure draft principles stated that this exception should only apply where it is unreasonable or impracticable to obtain the individual’s consent to the use or disclosure.\(^{156}\)

Required or authorised by or under law

30.142 Privacy principles across Australia also generally provide exceptions for the use and disclosure of personal information where it is required or authorised by or under law.\(^{157}\) The exposure draft Australian Privacy Principles provide for the use or disclosure of personal information where it is required or authorised by or under an Australian law, or an order of a court or tribunal.\(^{158}\) ‘Australian law’ is defined to include federal, state and territory legislation.\(^{159}\)

Family violence legislation

30.143 Some state and territory family violence laws include information-sharing provisions that are designed to ensure that the use and disclosure of relevant information does not contravene privacy laws on the basis that the use or disclosure is authorised by law.

30.144 Under the Tasmanian family violence legislation, for example, ‘personal information custodians’—within the meaning of the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 (Tas)—are permitted (but not required) to collect, use, disclose or otherwise deal with personal information where this is done in good faith for the purpose of furthering the objects of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas).\(^{160}\) Section 3 of that Act states the objects as follows: ‘In the administration of this Act, the safety, psychological wellbeing and interests of people affected by family violence are the paramount considerations’.

30.145 Section 70A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) provides for ‘interested parties’ to share prescribed information if the parties agree that this is necessary to ensure the safety of a person who is the subject of a protection order or the wellbeing of a child who is affected by such an order. ‘Interested parties’ are defined as:

- the Commissioner of Police;

---

\(^{155}\) Exposure Draft Australian Privacy Principles 2010 (Cth).

\(^{156}\) Ibid cl 7(2)(c).

\(^{157}\) Privacy Act 1988 (Cth), IPPs 10.1(c) and 11.1(d) and NPP 2.1(g).

\(^{158}\) Exposure Draft Australian Privacy Principles 2010 (Cth) cl 7(2)(b).

\(^{159}\) Ibid, cl 15.

\(^{160}\) Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 37.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- the Chief Executive Officer of the agency assisting the Minister administering the Restraining Orders Act—presently the Attorney-General;
- the Chief Executive Officer of the agency assisting the Minister administering pt 8 of the Sentence Administration Act 2003 (WA)—presently the Minister for Corrective Services; and
- the Chief Executive Officer for child welfare.¹⁶¹

30.146 ‘Prescribed information’ includes, among other matters:
- the name, address, telephone number, age and ethnicity and other details of the victim, a child of the victim, or a person bound by a protection order;
- a description of any offence relevant to the granting of the protection order and an abridged description of the circumstances of its commission;
- any information about the grounds on which the protection order was granted; and
- the status of the investigation and prosecution of any offence relevant to the granting of the protection order by a police officer.¹⁶²

30.147 Persons who provide information under s 70A ‘in confidence and good faith’ are protected from any civil or criminal liability, or breach of professional ethics or standards, in respect of the provision of the information.¹⁶³

30.148 In the ACT, a more restricted information-sharing scheme is established under s 18 of the Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986 (ACT). This section enables police officers who suspect the past or future commission of a ‘domestic violence offence’ to disclose to approved crisis support organisations ‘any information that is likely to aid the organisation in rendering assistance to the person or to any children of the person’. Crisis support organisations are approved by the Minister pursuant to disallowable legislative instruments.

30.149 In some situations, agencies are required to share information relevant to family violence proceedings. For example, the South Australian family violence legislation requires South Australian Government agencies, and persons providing services to those agencies, to make available to police officers, on request, information that ‘could reasonably be expected to assist in locating a defendant to whom an intervention order is to be served’.¹⁶⁴

Child protection legislation

30.150 Currently, each state and territory child protection law provides for the exchange of information between police and the child protection agency, and between ¹⁶¹ Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 70A(1).

¹⁶² Restraining Orders Regulations 1997 (WA) reg 15.
¹⁶³ Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 70A(4).
¹⁶⁴ Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 38.
the police and other nominated persons or agencies, although there is great diversity in how these provisions are framed.165

30.151 The Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT), for example, permits information to be shared between ACT Policing, the child protection agency and other persons where it is in the best interests of the child or young person and for the purpose of performing a function under the Act.166 In NSW, the child protection agency is able to provide information to prescribed bodies and to request information from them where the information relates to:167

- the safety, welfare and wellbeing of a particular child or young person or class of children or young persons;168
- an unborn child who is the subject of a pre-natal report;
- the family of an unborn child the subject of a pre-natal report; or
- the expected date of birth of an unborn child that is the subject of a pre-natal report.169

30.152 The list of prescribed bodies is extensive and includes: NSW Police; government agencies; schools; hospitals; fostering agencies; child care services; out-of-home care services; adoption agencies; and any other organisation which is responsible for or supervises the provision of health care, welfare, education, children’s services, residential services, or law enforcement, wholly or partly to children. The NSW child protection agency is also authorised to exchange information with certain Commonwealth agencies including the Family Court, the Federal Magistrates Court, Centrelink and the Department of Immigration and Citizenship.170

30.153 The Act makes it clear that these provisions override any provision contained in any other law, including privacy law, which prohibits or restricts the disclosure of that information.171 A prescribed body therefore cannot refuse to release information to the child protection agency on the basis that the privacy law prohibits it from doing so.

30.154 In NSW and the Northern Territory, police and the child protection agency have a mutual obligation to share information on request where they believe that the information will assist the other in providing for the safety, welfare or wellbeing of the child to whom the information relates. The situation varies in other states and territories. The police are compelled to provide information at the request of the child protection agency in Queensland, South Australia, Tasmania and the ACT. Except for

---

165 See, eg Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ch 25; Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) ss 54, 38; Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) pt 4; Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) pt 5A.
166 Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ch 25.
167 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 248(6), Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Regulation 2000 (NSW) reg 7.
168 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 248(1).
169 Ibid s 248(1A).
170 Ibid s 245l.
171 Ibid s 248(5).
NSW and the Northern Territory, the child protection agency in other jurisdictions retains discretion as to whether to supply information to the police.

30.155 A shortcoming of the NSW information sharing provisions, identified by the Wood Inquiry, was the inability of human service and justice agencies (including the police), and those agencies and non-government agencies, to share information directly without needing to use the child protection agency as a hub.172

30.156 This was addressed by the addition of a new Chapter 16A into the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) that allows prescribed bodies to share information relating to the safety, welfare or wellbeing of children and young persons.173 The following principles apply to information sharing under this chapter:

(a) agencies that have responsibilities relating to the safety, welfare or well-being of children or young persons should be able to provide and receive information that promotes the safety, welfare or well-being of children or young persons,

(b) those agencies should work collaboratively in a way that respects each other’s functions and expertise,

(c) each such agency should be able to communicate with each other agency so as to facilitate the provision of services to children and young persons and their families,

(d) because the safety, welfare and well-being of children and young persons are paramount:

(i) the need to provide services relating to the care and protection of children and young persons, and

(ii) the needs and interests of children and young persons, and of their families, in receiving those services, take precedence over the protection of confidentiality or of an individual’s privacy.174

30.157 These provisions place a positive onus on prescribed bodies to take reasonable steps to coordinate decision making and delivery of services regarding children and young persons.175 Information sought by an agency must relate directly to that agency’s work in relation to the safety, welfare and wellbeing of a particular child or young person or class of children or young people.176 A prescribed body will be required to comply with a request for information when it believes this will assist the requesting body in providing for the safety, welfare and wellbeing of the child and/or young person to whom the information relates.177 Where there are inconsistencies between the Act and other legislation governing privacy, the provisions contained in 173 Amended by the Children’s Legislation (Wood Inquiry Recommendations) Act 2009 (NSW).

174 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 245A(2).
175 Ibid s 245A(1).
176 Ibid s 245D(2).
177 Ibid s 245D(3).
Chapter 16A take precedence. The legislation does, however, place a number of limitations on the obligation to provide information. For example, a prescribed body is not required to disclose information if the agency believes it would impact on a criminal investigation or coronial inquest, endanger a person’s life or is not in the public interest.

30.158 As in NSW, Tasmanian child protection legislation also makes provision for the police to share information with an extensive list of prescribed agencies other than the child protection agency. In Queensland, the list is limited to the departments of health, housing and homelessness, community care services, accredited schools, persons providing services to children or families and the Mater Misericordiae Hospital.

30.159 In the Northern Territory, police can request information from a list of prescribed persons, including employees of government agencies, schools, health practitioners and hospitals where they are conducting an inquiry into a child’s physical, psychological or emotional wellbeing or a child protection investigation. The prescribed person must comply with the police request.

30.160 Information sharing guidelines are one mechanism to explain to agencies and organisations how legislative provisions operate and to clarify information-sharing procedures between the relevant entities. For example, guidelines can set down processes for requesting and providing information. As recommended in several reviews of child protection systems, they can also highlight the importance of sharing information (between police, the child protection agency and other relevant agencies) early in the investigation process.

Secrecy laws

30.161 While privacy laws impose obligations on agencies with respect to the handling of personal information, secrecy laws impose obligations on individual public service officers with respect to the handling of personal and other information held by government. Frequently, secrecy laws impose criminal sanctions for the unauthorised disclosure of government information.

178 Ibid s 245H.
179 Ibid s 245D(4).
180 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 53B. An information sharing entity is defined broadly under s 3(1). See also Department of Health and Human Services (Tas), Guidelines: Information Sharing for Providers of Family and Disability Support (2010) <www.dhhs.tas.gov.au> at 14 April 2010.
181 Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 159M.
182 Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 34.
183 Community Development and Justice Standing Committee–Parliament of Western Australia, Inquiry into the Prosecution of Assaults and Sexual Offences (2008), 169–171. See also R Layton, Review of Child Protection in South Australia (2002), [7.9]–[7.13].
184 NSW Health, NSW Police, Department of Community Services (NSW), NSW Joint Investigative Response Team (JIRT) Review, unpublished (2006), 16; Department of Child Safety (Qld), Progress in Reforming the Queensland Child Protection System (2006), 60.
30.162 In 2009, the ALRC conducted a review of Commonwealth secrecy laws, with a focus on the increased need to share information within and between governments and with the private sector. The ALRC recommended that Australian Government agencies should review Commonwealth secrecy offences to determine whether criminal sanctions are warranted for the unauthorised disclosure of government information. The ALRC also recommended that secrecy offences should generally include an exception for disclosures in the course of an officer’s functions or duties. This exception would ensure that where disclosures are required or authorised by or under another law—for example, state and territory family violence legislation or child protection legislation—or where an officer disclosed information in accordance with an information sharing protocol or memorandum of understanding, the officer would not breach the relevant secrecy law.

Shared databases

30.163 A number of reviews have identified the utility of shared information and data collection systems between, for example, police and child protection agencies. Several models exist both in Australia, such as the Client Relationship Information System in Victoria, and overseas.

30.164 A database called ‘Wellnet’ has been established in NSW to improve sharing of information about at-risk children between Child Wellbeing Units (CWUs), and to provide limited information about children and young people known to the child protection agency. There are CWUs in NSW Health, the NSW Police Force, the Department of Education and Training, and the Department of Human Services. Wellnet allows CWU officers to search for a child or young person to determine whether they are being case managed by the child protection agency or if other CWUs have received notification of concerns. The database also assists officers to better support vulnerable children and young people, allows cumulative risk to be recognised and reported, and records information about services required and/or provided to families, thereby assisting in the identification of service gaps.

30.165 As part of its ‘Every Child Matters’ program, the United Kingdom has established an online directory called ContactPoint, which contains basic information on every child in the nation and allows authorised practitioners in different services (including health, education, welfare and the police) to find out who else is working with the same child or young person. Its aim is to assist services to work together as a team and deliver more timely and coordinated support, and thus decrease service

---

186 Ibid, Rec 11–1.
189 But note the criticisms made by the Victorian Ombudsman: Ombudsman Victoria, Own Motion Investigation into the Department of Human Services Child Protection Program (2009), 11–12, 26–30.
Regulations outline what information can be held, who can (or must) provide the information, how long it can be retained, who can be granted access and how accuracy will be maintained.\(^{191}\) There are also ‘shielding’ provisions to hide the contact details of people who are at increased risk of significant harm, such as victims of family violence.

Consultation Paper

30.166 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought feedback on whether privacy or secrecy laws were unduly impeding agencies from disclosing information which may be relevant to protection order proceedings or family law proceedings.\(^{192}\) The Commissions proposed that privacy principles at the federal, state and territory level should be amended, where necessary, to permit the use or disclosure of personal information where an agency reasonably believes it is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual’s life, health or safety—rather than a serious and imminent threat\(^{193}\)—as recommended by ALRC Report 108.\(^{194}\)

30.167 The Commissions also proposed that:

- state and territory family violence legislation should expressly authorise agencies to use or disclose information for the purpose of ensuring the safety of a victim of family violence or the wellbeing of an affected child;\(^{195}\) and

- state and territory child protection legislation should expressly authorise agencies to use or disclose information for the purpose of making accurate assessments of the needs of children and families and to ensure that appropriate programs are delivered in a timely and coordinated way.\(^{196}\)

30.168 The Commissions suggested a number of parties to whom information should be able to be disclosed under information sharing provisions.\(^{197}\) The Commissions also proposed the development of information sharing guidelines to assist agencies to understand their roles and responsibilities.\(^{198}\) Finally, the Commissions proposed the establishment of a shared database containing basic information about a child or family that authorised agencies could access to see which other agencies were dealing with a particular child or family.\(^{199}\)

---

190 Children Act 2004 (UK) s 12; see also Department of Children, Schools and Families (UK), Contact Point: Lessons Learned from the Early Adopter Phase (2009).
195 Consultation Paper, Proposal 10–12.
Submissions and consultations

30.169 Stakeholders expressed support for amending privacy principles at federal, state and territory level to permit the use or disclosure of personal information where an agency reasonably believes it is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual’s life, health or safety.200

30.170 There was general support for ensuring that family violence and child support legislation expressly allowed relevant agencies to exchange information, to keep children and families safe and to ensure timely and coordinated service provision.201 A number of stakeholders commented that careful consideration and consultation should occur in developing these provisions to ensure that they covered all necessary and relevant parties, in particular, non-government service providers such as family violence advocacy and support services;202 and independent children’s lawyers.203 A number of stakeholders commented that, in sharing information among government agencies and non-government service providers, it was important to ensure that the safety of victims and their families was not compromised by the inappropriate release of information.204

202 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

30.171 The Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service (WDVCAS) agreed, noting with approval s 18 of the ACT Domestic Violence Agencies Act, which allows police to share information with approved crisis support organisations where the police believe on reasonable grounds that a domestic violence offence has been, or is likely to be, committed. The information is shared to allow the organisations to provide assistance to the parties. WDVCAS also noted that the NSW Police Yellow Card Referral Program was a useful initiative that could be more widely used. 205

30.172 Guidelines were also seen as important to ensure that agencies understood their roles and responsibilities under information sharing laws. 206

30.173 The Office of the Privacy Commissioner expressed the view, however, that if privacy principles at the federal, state and territory level were amended as suggested above, this would allow agencies to share information in appropriate circumstances and that further provisions in state and territory legislation were unnecessary. The Office stated that:

Guidelines developed by the Office provide that a ‘serious’ threat must reflect significant danger, and could include a potentially life threatening situation or one that might reasonably result in other serious injury or illness. In the case of family violence involving controlling behaviour over a number of years, the degree of seriousness to allow disclosure of information may be considered to have been met where a series of incidents result in significant and demonstrable harm.

It should also be noted that threats to health under the exception are not limited to physical harm but would also include threats to an individual’s psychological wellbeing. The exception may therefore be relied on to disclose information where there is the threat of serious psychological harm that may be experienced as a result of ongoing domestic violence or fear for safety. 207

30.174 There was also support for shared child protection databases, 208 although some stakeholders noted that the privacy concerns around such databases would need to be carefully managed. 209 The Tasmanian Department of Premier and Cabinet stated

206 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010.
207 Office of the Privacy Commissioner, Submission FV 147, 24 June 2010.
208 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.
209 F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010.
that the development of a shared database in that jurisdiction was not a current priority.\textsuperscript{210}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

30.175 As noted above, \textit{Time for Action} identified privacy laws as one of the obstacles to an integrated and effective response to family violence. Many stakeholders consulted in this Inquiry agreed that they encounter difficulties sharing information because of actual or perceived limits imposed by privacy and secrecy laws.

30.176 Implementation of the model use and disclosure principle set out in ALRC Report 108 would address some of the issues identified. In particular, the Commissions recommend that Australian, state and territory governments ensure that the privacy principles applicable in each jurisdiction permit the use or disclosure of personal information where agencies and organisations reasonably believe it is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual’s life, health or safety. Given the high level of involvement of private sector service providers in the areas of family violence and child protection, this exception should apply to both government agencies and private sector organisations. The threat should not have to be imminent. Agencies and organisations should be able to share information in order to intervene early in family violence and child protection situations to prevent a serious threat from manifesting.

30.177 As noted above, in \textit{Secrecy Laws and Open Government in Australia} (ALRC Report 112) the ALRC recommended that secrecy laws should generally include an exception for disclosures in the course of an officer’s functions or duties.\textsuperscript{211} The recommendations in ALRC Report 112 were limited to Commonwealth secrecy laws, because that was the extent of the terms of reference for that Inquiry. In the Commissions’ view, however, the principles underlying the ALRC’s recommendation that Commonwealth secrecy laws should include an express exception for disclosure in the course of an officer’s functions and duties establishes a principle of wider application.

30.178 If this approach were adopted by Australian, state and territory governments it would ensure that, where an officer disclosed information, for example, in accordance with the provisions of state and territory family violence or child protection legislation, or in accordance with an information sharing protocol or memorandum of understanding—discussed further below—the officer would not breach the relevant secrecy law. The Commissions therefore endorse the relevant recommendations in ALRC Report 112 in relation to Commonwealth secrecy laws,\textsuperscript{212} and recommend that state and territory governments consider amending secrecy laws that regulate the disclosure of government information to include an express exception to allow the disclosure of information in the course of an officer’s functions and duties.

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{210} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), \textit{Submission FV 236}, 20 July 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{211} Australian Law Reform Commission, \textit{Secrecy Laws and Open Government in Australia}, Report 112 (2009), Recs 7–1 and 10–2.
\item \textsuperscript{212} Ibid, Recs 7–1 and 10–2.
\end{itemize}
30.179 The Commissions note the views of the Office of the Privacy Commissioner that the recommended amendment to the privacy principles to remove the ‘imminence’ requirement will be sufficient to ensure that information can be shared appropriately in the family violence and child protection contexts. The Commissions consider, however, that it would also assist those working in these areas to have an express provision allowing information to be shared to ensure the safety of victims of family violence, children and young people. In particular, the Commissions recommend in Chapter 20 that child protection legislation should authorise the disclosure to the police of the identity of a ‘reporter’ under the legislation in connection with the investigation of a serious offence alleged to have been committed against a child or young person; or where necessary to safeguard or promote the safety, welfare or wellbeing of a child or young person.213

30.180 Where sensitive personal information is disclosed for a purpose other than the primary purpose of collection, this should generally be done on the basis of consent. As noted above, the NSW Police Yellow Card Referral Program is an example of this. It is also important for agencies and organisations to have a clear basis for sharing information in situations that do not necessarily involve a risk to safety, for example, in order to ensure timely and effective service delivery, or to ensure the wellbeing of a child, as opposed to the safety of a child.

30.181 Where seeking consent is not reasonable or practicable, legislative provisions should clearly indicate those agencies with which, and the specific circumstances in which, information can be shared, for example what information can be disclosed by the police to child protection agencies. Given the high level of involvement of private sector service providers in the areas of family violence and child protection, provision should also be made in legislation to allow information to be shared with specified private sector organisations in some circumstances. The Commissions note that the approach adopted in the ACT Domestic Violence Agencies Act—which allows police to share information with approved crisis support organisations in some circumstances—is one possible model.

30.182 Provisions such as this mean that information can be shared without breaching privacy laws, because the information sharing is ‘required or authorised by law’, and without breaching secrecy laws, where those laws include an exception for disclosure in the course of an officer’s functions or duties. The Commissions reiterate, however, that, as a general rule, information should only be used for the purpose it is collected or a related purpose that the individual would expect. Whenever reasonable and practicable, the person’s consent should be sought if the information is to be used or disclosed for a purpose other than the one for which it was collected, where the purpose is not related to the original purpose of collection and the person would not expect the information to be used or disclosed in this way.

213 Rec 20–1.
30.183 The Commissions do not intend to specify the exact content of the information sharing provisions. Each jurisdiction will need to consider what information sharing arrangements are necessary and appropriate and, in particular, which private sector organisations should be included in the arrangements.

30.184 The Commissions note that databases in some jurisdictions facilitate the sharing of information between agencies working together, particularly in the area of child protection. Such databases provide a useful mechanism to help ensure that agencies are aware of the fact that other agencies are working with a particular child or family, and to prevent the duplication of services. It would be logical, for example, to establish a shared database where family violence or child protection legislation expressly provides for the disclosure of certain information from one agency to another, as discussed above. The Commissions note, however, that such databases raise significant privacy concerns. The Commissions recommend, therefore, that in developing any such databases federal, state and territory governments should ensure that appropriate privacy safeguards are put in place.

30.185 The Commissions’ recommendations set out below are intended to ensure that legislative provisions do not prevent the sharing of information in circumstances where there is a risk to an individual’s life, health or safety. In addition, the Commissions recommend that family violence and child protection legislation should clearly set out which agencies and organisations may use and disclose information and in what circumstances. This will provide clarity for individual officers and staff and will ensure that where information is shared it does not breach privacy or secrecy laws.

Recommendation 30–9 The Australian, state and territory governments should ensure that privacy principles regulating the handling of personal information in each jurisdiction expressly permit the use or disclosure of information where agencies and organisations reasonably believe it is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual’s life, health or safety.

Recommendation 30–10 The Australian, state and territory governments should consider amending secrecy laws that regulate the disclosure of government information to include an express exception to allow the disclosure of information in the course of a government officer’s functions and duties.

Recommendation 30–11 State and territory family violence legislation should expressly authorise the use or disclosure of personal information for the purpose of ensuring the safety of a victim of family violence or an affected child.

Recommendation 30–12 State and territory child protection legislation should expressly authorise agencies to use or disclose personal information for the purpose of ensuring the safety of a child or young person.
Recommendation 30–13  State and territory family violence legislation and child protection legislation should expressly provide for information sharing among specified agencies in specified circumstances, and should include provision to allow information to be shared with specified private sector organisations.

Recommendation 30–14  The Australian, state and territory governments should develop guidelines to assist agencies and organisations working in the family violence and child protection systems to better understand the rules relating to the sharing of information.

Recommendation 30–15  The Australian, state and territory governments should ensure that, in developing any database to allow the sharing of information between agencies and organisations in the family violence or child protection systems, appropriate privacy safeguards are put in place.

Strategies to improve information sharing

Information sharing protocols and MOUs

30.186  The NSW Ombudsman has noted that it is:

important to recognise that the formal arrangements being developed in relation to information exchange present only part of the challenge. Both government and non-government agencies alike need to appreciate that effective child protection practice is contingent on agencies understanding the need to be proactive in obtaining information from other agencies and in passing it on. From our review of child protection practice over a number of years we have seen an emphasis on the risks associated with the disclosure of confidential information at the expense of recognising the very significant child protection risks which can arise from the failure to pass on vital information. Therefore, while the recent legislative amendments represent an opportunity to improve practice in relation to the exchange of information, we believe this will not occur without a corresponding cultural shift that promotes information exchange as part of good child protection practice.214

30.187  As noted by the NSW Ombudsman, barriers to information sharing are not always legislative in character. Often the obstacles are administrative and cultural. The following section considers ways to promote a culture of effective information sharing within the legislative framework discussed above. One strategy is to put in place information sharing protocols and memorandums of understanding (MOUs) between elements in the family law, family violence and child protection systems to clarify and formalise what information can be shared, with whom, and in what circumstances.

A number of these arrangements exist in the child protection area, but they are less common in the family violence context. Western Australia has a number of protocols in place to assist with information sharing in matters involving family violence between the Family Court of Western Australia, the Magistrates Court (in particular, the specialist Family Violence Court), the Department of the Attorney-General, the Department of Corrective Services and Legal Aid Western Australia. The parties entered into the protocols in February 2009.\textsuperscript{215}

The protocols acknowledge that ‘as far as is practicable, and permissible under the relevant statutory provisions, the parties should share and exchange information and resources in individual cases’ where to do so would assist in achieving the parties’ common commitment to protecting victims of violence and providing the best possible outcomes for children.\textsuperscript{216}

The protocols make provision for the exchange of information between courts which share common clients. In order to ascertain the existence of a common client, officers from the Magistrates Court may access information from the Family Court of Western Australia, and officers from the Family Court of Western Australia and family consultants may access information from the Magistrates Court’s database.\textsuperscript{217} Where a common client is established, the protocols permit, on written request, inspection of the relevant court records.\textsuperscript{218} The protocols also specify processes for liaison between a family consultant in the Family Court of Western Australia and the case management coordinator in the Family Violence Court.\textsuperscript{219}

Where a family violence service worker (employed by the Attorney-General’s Department) is concerned that a child who is the subject of parenting order proceedings in the Family Court of Western Australia may be at risk, the worker may advise the family consultant that there is information or documentation available that may be relevant to the assessment of risk for the child.\textsuperscript{220} Further, where a family violence service worker has referred a client to the Family Court of Western Australia to file applications for parenting orders, or becomes aware that such an application is likely to be filed, the worker must notify the court that the service has information that may be of use to the court. The judicial officer dealing with the file may then make appropriate inquiries with the service and request any relevant information or documentation.\textsuperscript{221}

\textsuperscript{215} Family Court of Western Australia and others, \textit{Information Sharing Protocols between the Family Court of Western Australia, Magistrates Court of Western Australia, Department of the Attorney-General, Department of Corrective Services and Legal Aid Western Australia in Matters Involving Family Violence} (2009).
\textsuperscript{216} Ibid, cls 1.2.1, 1.2.2.
\textsuperscript{217} Ibid, cl 2.2.
\textsuperscript{218} Ibid, cl 2.3.
\textsuperscript{219} Ibid, cl 3.1.
\textsuperscript{220} Ibid, cl 4.1.1.
\textsuperscript{221} Ibid, cl 4.2.
In Tasmania—in response to police concerns about victim safety where protection orders operate alongside family court orders—a protocol has been negotiated between the police, the Magistrates Court of Tasmania and the Tasmanian Registry of the Family Court. Under the protocol, if a family court contact order poses a risk to the safety of a victim of family violence, the police prosecutor alerts the magistrate of this concern. The magistrate can suspend the order for a period of days and make a protection order. The Magistrates Court file with the grounds for suspension is transferred to the Family Court for review of the contact order within the period of suspension. A review of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) by Urbis recommended that the effectiveness of this protocol be evaluated over time, but no such evaluation appears to have taken place.

A number of state and territory child protection agencies have protocols or MOUs with the Family Court and the Federal Magistrates Court. These govern the handling of child protection matters and are designed to ‘assist cooperation, clarify procedures and improve decision-making in cases that may occur in either or both Commonwealth, state and territory jurisdictions’. Such documents ‘represent deliberate statements of policy and agreed procedures, but do not in any way change the law’. The form and content of the protocols and MOUs are different in each state and territory, largely reflecting the differences in the state and territory child protection laws.

The table below sets out the MOUs and protocols in place throughout Australia to facilitate the exchange of information between child protection agencies and the family law system. At the time of writing, Families South Australia and the Family Court are believed to be finalising an MOU. The Commissions also understand that the Family Court is negotiating in similar terms with the Department of Health and Human Services in Tasmania and the Victorian Department of Human Services.

---

222 Urbis, Review of the Family Violence Act 2004 (2008), prepared for the Department of Justice (Tas), [3.5].
223 Family Court of Australia, Protocol between the Family Court of Australia and the NSW Department of Community Services (2005); Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Memorandum of Understanding between the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia and the NSW Department of Community Services (2007); Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Protocol between the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia and the NSW Department of Community Services (2009); Family Court of Australia, Protocol between the Department of Child Safety Queensland, the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia (2007); Memorandum of Understanding between the Family Court of Western Australia, the Department for Child Protection, Legal Aid Western Australia (2008).
226 See D Higgins, Cooperation and Coordination: An Evaluation of the Family Court of Australia’s Magellan Case-Management Model (2007), prepared for the Family Court of Australia, 156.
Information sharing protocols and MOUs

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>State</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>NSW</td>
<td>Protocol between Legal Aid NSW and DoCS [now Community Services]—dealings with independent children’s lawyers in family law matters; MOU between the Family Court and DoCS; MOU between the Federal Magistrates Court (FMC) and DoCS; Protocol between the FMC and DoCS.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victoria</td>
<td>Unsigned draft[^227^]—although the Department of Human Services is currently in discussion with the Family Court and Victoria Legal Aid regarding dealings with independent children’s lawyers in family law matters.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Queensland</td>
<td>MOU between federal family courts and the Department of Child Safety.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Western Australia</td>
<td>MOU between the Family Court of Western Australia, Department of Child Protection and Legal Aid WA.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>South Australia</td>
<td>Arrangements under negotiation.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tasmania</td>
<td>Arrangements under negotiation.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACT</td>
<td>MOU between Department of Disability, Housing and Community Services, Department of Education and Training, ACT Health and the Department of Justice and Community Safety.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Northern Territory</td>
<td>None.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

30.195 The majority of the protocols and MOUs examined aim to meet the protective needs of children. The Western Australian MOU takes a more expansive approach and aims ‘to provide the best possible outcomes for children’[^228^].

30.196 In its report in 2002, the Family Law Council noted that the principles and procedures in the existing protocols and MOUs were at times difficult to translate into practice. While the arrangements played an important role in providing better coordination between the courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act and the state and territory child protection agencies, they were not a ‘panacea for [^227^]: Protocol between Victorian Department of Human Services and Family Court of Australia (unsigned, dated 19 April 1995).

[^228^]: Family Court of Western Australia and others, Information Sharing Protocols between the Family Court of Western Australia, Magistrates Court of Western Australia, Department of the Attorney-General, Department of Corrective Services and Legal Aid Western Australia in Matters Involving Family Violence (2009).
addressing all the problems associated with the interaction between the State and Federal systems concerned with the resolution of child protection concerns’. Other commentators agree that the protocols are insufficient to develop a seamless connection between the state and territory child protection systems and federal family courts. Higgins has observed that the mere fact that an MOU is in place does not necessarily lead to a more cooperative approach to the exchange of information.

30.197 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that there should be formal information sharing arrangements established between courts hearing protection orders, the federal family courts, police, relevant government agencies and private sector organisations. In particular, the Commissions proposed that such arrangements should be established between federal family courts and child protection agencies. The Commissions also asked for stakeholder feedback on the best way to ensure that these arrangements are well known and understood by the agencies and organisations involved.

Submissions and consultations

30.198 In its submission, the Office of the Privacy Commissioner expressed the view that information sharing protocols and MOUs can assist with communication and coordination between federal, state and territory agencies and with relevant private sector organisations. The Office noted, however, that such arrangements do not stand alone but are tools to support good practice and can help agencies and organisations to understand their legal obligations. The Office suggested that such arrangements might include guidance on good privacy practice and complaint procedures.

30.199 The Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate noted in their submission that protocols and MOUs are useful but they can be overlooked or misconstrued. If they are to be relied upon, it is important that resources are dedicated to promote their existence and to train staff in their use. They also require regular review. A number of other stakeholders also emphasised the importance of training.

30.200 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria noted that protocols and MOUs relied on relationships and goodwill in order to be effective and suggested that a national register—which included family court orders affecting children as well... as family violence protection orders—would be a more effective method of sharing information. The submission noted that there is a protocol in place between the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria and the federal family courts to have family court orders faxed through upon request, although the protocol is not well established and has encountered difficulties, particularly when personnel change. The submission suggested that one way to improve communication would be to have liaison officers in each court, for example, federal family court officers in the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court and vice versa.238 A number of other stakeholders agreed that liaison officers were an important element to support such arrangements.239

30.201 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service expressed support for information sharing protocols and MOUs, noting that they should be publically available and that ongoing training was important. The submission also noted liaison officers could be responsible for providing training in relation to the information sharing arrangements.240

30.202 The Queensland Law Society expressed support for the existing protocol between the federal family courts and the Queensland child protection agency and noted that the arrangements around the protocol included regular meetings between the parties.241 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others suggested that it was important that such arrangements sit within a broader model of integrated services.242

30.203 In its submission, the Tasmanian Department of Premier and Cabinet noted that, anecdotally, the Tasmanian protocol is not often used, suggesting that this was perhaps because family violence matters come before the courts soon after the breakdown of a relationship and before there are federal family court orders in place.243

30.204 National Legal Aid stated in relation to the Western Australian MOUs:

These memoranda of understanding are working well, particularly with respect to the Family Court’s access to information from [the Department of Child Protection] and the Magistrates Courts database. DCP 86 now has an officer permanently located at the Family Court of WA to facilitate the information sharing process.244

Commissions’ views

30.205 There is some evidence from stakeholders that information-sharing protocols and MOUs between the courts and relevant agencies and organisations do have a valuable role to play in facilitating communication and information exchange between

238 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
243 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
244 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
parties in the family law, family violence and child protection systems. However, there was also recognition that protocols and MOUs cannot stand alone and are dependent on the knowledge and involvement of officers and staff. The Commissions agree that simply putting protocols in place is not sufficient. These arrangements must be given an ongoing profile among court and agency officers; they must form the basis of an ongoing and responsive relationship between the parties and must be supported and implemented in practice. Ongoing training and liaison arrangements are also essential to ensure that the protocols and MOUs are actively and effectively implemented.

30.206 At present, there are few information-sharing protocols in the context of family violence. In the Commissions’ view, there would be value in developing formal information sharing arrangements between the state and territory courts, the federal family courts, police and other agencies in relation to family violence matters. It may also be appropriate to include non-government organisations such as family violence support workers in any such arrangements. The development of information-sharing protocols in the context of family violence is consistent with the views expressed in Time for Action.

30.207 Above, the Commissions recommend that federal family courts and state and territory child protection agencies develop protocols that include procedures for dealing with requests for documents and information under s 69ZW and for responding to subpoenas issued by federal family courts.245 The Commissions note that the federal family courts already have formal information sharing arrangements in place with child protection agencies in a number of jurisdictions and that negotiations are under way in several others. Stakeholders expressed a level of support for these arrangements and the Commissions are of the view that it would be of value to put protocols in place in every jurisdiction. The Commissions again emphasise that it will be necessary to ensure that the parties to the information sharing protocols receive ongoing training to ensure that the arrangements are well known and understood and that the protocol arrangements are effectively implemented.

Recommendation 30–16 Federal family courts, state and territory magistrates courts, police, and relevant government agencies should develop protocols for the exchange of information in relation to family violence matters.
Parties to such protocols should receive regular training to ensure that the arrangements are effectively implemented.

Recommendation 30–17 Federal family courts and state and territory child protection agencies should develop protocols for the exchange of information in those jurisdictions that do not yet have such arrangements in place. Parties to such protocols should receive regular training to ensure that the arrangements are effectively implemented.

245 Rec 30–5.
A national register

30.208 The capacity for family violence protection orders to be enforced across jurisdictions is essential to the safety of victims. The Australian Government Solicitor noted, in a background paper to Time for Action, that:

This is especially so given that it is not uncommon for victims to move interstate (or to move from New Zealand to Australia or vice versa) in order to escape violent relationships. People who have obtained a protection order may also relocate for other reasons, for example, to be closer to their extended family or to seek employment.246

30.209 Currently, a protection order that has been obtained in one state or territory is not automatically enforceable in another state or territory. Rather, the victim of family violence or some other person must register the ‘external protection order’ in the second jurisdiction.247 Registration is essentially an administrative process; however, there are some differences between jurisdictions with respect to the types of orders that are capable of registration, provisions for notification of the person against whom the order has been made, and duration for which the external protection order is in force. In some jurisdictions—including NSW, Queensland, Tasmania and the Northern Territory—a court may vary an external protection order before registration.

30.210 Family violence legislation in Victoria, Western Australia, the ACT and the Northern Territory provides that if the court registers an external protection order, the court or registrar is to provide notice of the registration to the court that made the order (the original court). In Victoria and the ACT, the court must also provide the original court with notice of any variation to the original order. The ACT is the only jurisdiction that also provides for feedback from the original court to a court which has registered a protection order made in the ACT—if an ACT court has been notified by an external court that it has registered an ACT protection order, the ACT court must notify the external court if it revokes or varies the order.248

30.211 Although every state and territory makes provision for the registration of external protection orders, the question of establishing a centralised national scheme has been considered on a number of occasions. In 1999, the Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group expressed the view that a national registration scheme, supported by a single register, would streamline and simplify inter-jurisdictional registration, and would enable protection orders:

[to] attain immediate and true nationwide portability and provide needed protection to the victims of domestic violence, no matter where they live in Australia.249

246 Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [3.4.1].
247 The one exception is the Northern Territory, where a police officer can enforce a protection order if the officer ‘reasonably believes a person in the Territory is a defendant named in an unregistered external order’. The police officer must, as soon as possible, make a declaration to the Commissioner of Police stating the belief and the grounds for belief. Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) pt 3.4.
30.212 In 2009, the Australian Government Solicitor (AGS) commented favourably on the proposed scheme, noting that it was unclear why a scheme of this kind had not yet been implemented.250

30.213 One of the ‘immediate actions’ to which the Australian Government committed in its response to Time for Action was to work with the states and territories, through the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG), to establish a national scheme for the registration and recognition of family violence protection orders. While registration involves simply putting information on a register so that it is available to those who access the register, recognition involves allowing another jurisdiction to give effect to and enforce the order that has been registered. The Australian Government noted that the proposed scheme would allow orders to be recognised and enforced across state and territory borders.251 A SCAG working group has been established to develop options for the national scheme.252

30.214 The 1999 Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group proposed a central database as the repository of the relevant information. Information entered on the database would include the names of the parties, the period for which the order had effect and the prohibitions or conditions imposed by the order. Information would also include whether the order had been extended, varied, revoked or set aside on appeal. Upon the entry of an order into the register, the order would be deemed to have been registered and to be enforceable in each state and territory.253

30.215 The Working Group noted the potential advantages of using CrimTrac—developed for exchanging national policing information—as the supporting database, commenting that:

CrimTrac appears to offer a vastly improved concept in national registration of orders and overcomes all of the problems associated with manual registration, such as notice to the defendant of registration, mechanical or administrative processes and costs incurred by State and Territory courts, reliability of orders and enforcement of orders.254

30.216 It appears that CrimTrac already includes some information about protection orders.255 The AGS has noted that:

Our understanding is that police in all jurisdictions provide at least some information to CrimTrac about such orders for inclusion in the database, although we understand that the amount of detail provided varies significantly between jurisdictions.256

252 Ibid, 12.
254 Ibid, 169.
256 Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [3.4.9].
30.217 CrimTrac includes extensive safeguards to ensure the integrity and security of information held on its systems. Access to operational data is provided on a ‘need to know’ basis and audit logs are maintained of access to, and disclosure of, information.\(^{257}\)

Extending the scope of the register

30.218 The 1999 Working Group recommendations and, from the information presently available, the Australian Government’s commitment to a national registration scheme are both limited to information about protection orders obtained under state and territory family violence legislation. A question that arises in this Inquiry is whether the register should be expanded to include other information, for example, orders and injunctions issued by the family courts and child protection orders.

30.219 In 1998, the Kearney McKenzie Report recommended that consideration should be given to establishing a central register of parenting orders made by the Family Court and protection orders made by state and territory courts. The Report recommended that this information should be accessible to judges and registrars of the Family Court, magistrates and registrars of local courts and to police.\(^{258}\) A similar option for reform was set out in the Pyke Review, which suggested that a register could:

- provide ready and immediate access to orders made by the Family Court inconsistent with family violence orders; and registered pursuant to s 68P(3) of the Family Law Act; and
- ensure that orders made in each of the State Courts, Supreme Court, District Court, Magistrates Court and Youth Court in family violence matters and child protection proceedings are immediately available on the database of each Court and immediately available to the Police.\(^{259}\)

30.220 There may also be scope for a national register to include other types of information, such as undertakings entered into by a person requesting that a child be returned to Australia under the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention).\(^{260}\) An overseas court can grant such a request on the condition that the person requesting the child’s return enters into an undertaking of non-molestation. The Full Court of the Family Court has noted that:

> If undertakings are to be given, it is important to make sure they can be enforced … There does not appear to be any existing mechanism by which the Court that extracts the undertaking can ensure that it is complied with. There does not appear to be any legal basis upon which the Court of the State in which the child has been returned, can require compliance with an undertaking given to another court.\(^{261}\)

---

258 Kearney McKenzie & Associates, Review of Division 11 (1998), 29. The Kearney McKenzie Report predates the establishment of the Federal Magistrates Court, so contact orders made by this court are not listed as orders which should be included in the database.

260 The Hague Convention is discussed in Ch 17.

261 Police Commissioner of South Australia v Temple [No 2] (1993) 114 FLR 148, [35].
In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the national register should include protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation as well as orders and injunctions made under the Family Law Act. The Commissions also proposed that the information be available to federal, state and territory police officers, federal family courts, and state and territory courts that hear protection order proceedings.\footnote{Consultation Paper, Proposal 10–15.} In addition the Commissions asked whether there was any other information that should be included on the register and whether there were any other persons who should have access to the register.\footnote{Ibid, Question 10–21.}

Submissions and consultations

The proposal for the establishment of a national register received support from a significant number of stakeholders.\footnote{Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Office of the Privacy Commissioner, Submission FV 147, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010; T Searle, Submission FV 108, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; National Peak Body for Safety and Protection of Parents and Children, Submission FV 18, 13 January 2010.} The Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) noted that the register should include interim, as well as final, orders and that the system should ‘allow for the real time interrogation by courts and law enforcement to assist in decision making and policing responses’. The Council also suggested that the register should contain information on breach of orders.\footnote{Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.} The Magistrates’ and Children’s Court of Victoria also suggested that the register should include information relating to ‘the contravention of intervention orders’.\footnote{Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.}
Similarly, the Law Council of Australia submitted:

The database should also include pending charges and criminal convictions with respect to family violence or child abuse if possible or practicable. Otherwise this would require the information being obtained from a number of state-based criminal databases.\(^{267}\)

A number of submissions suggested that child protection orders should be included in the national register.\(^{268}\) The National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, for example, submitted that:

It is our experience that in many instances, information in regard to child protection issues are not shared or made use of in determinations of the family law system. It is our view that child protection agencies and children’s courts should not only have access to such a database, but that any orders made by children’s court, or matters involved in child protection agencies should also be included on the national database.\(^{269}\)

Other submissions argued that it is important for non-government organisations, women and children’s legal and non-legal support workers, and—subject to safeguards—independent children’s lawyers who have been appointed under the Family Law Act to be included among those parties able to utilise the register.\(^{270}\) One stakeholder suggested that schools should be able to access the register in order to provide appropriate protection for pupils.\(^{271}\)

However, a number of submissions expressed reservations about expanding the register to include Family Law Act orders and injunctions. The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service submitted:

There is also a question around the usefulness of the amalgamation of family violence protection orders and injunction orders made under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in Victoria for the simple fact that injunction orders aren’t used by VALS (and presumably others) because they aren’t enforceable. Victoria Police do not act on Family Law matters. Therefore intervention orders are used instead.\(^{272}\)

The Queensland Law Society also expressed concern about including orders made under the Family Law Act, noting the wide range of orders that can be made in relation to matters such as property settlement and child support.\(^{273}\)

\(^{269}\) National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010.

30.228 Submissions also highlighted the need for any national register to adequately consider privacy and security concerns. The Office of the Privacy Commissioner argued that any proposal to create a national register needs to be accompanied by a comprehensive privacy framework that includes: designing systems architecture and the parameters governing information collection, flows and consent mechanisms; data security measures; legislative measures in relation to who can access the register and for what purpose; and oversight mechanisms including the provisions for audit and complaint handling. The Office also encouraged the undertaking of a privacy impact assessment (PIA) as part of developing a national register of this kind.

Commissions’ views

30.229 The Australian Government has committed to the development of a national scheme for the registration and recognition of family violence protection orders. The Commissions are of the view that this is an excellent development that should be supported as a constructive step towards improving the protection available for victims of family violence. It will allow victims of family violence to move seamlessly from one jurisdiction to another without the need to take action to register a family violence order in the second jurisdiction. It will also help to ensure that police in the second jurisdiction are aware of the existence of the order.

30.230 The Commissions agree with the Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) that the scheme should include interim, as well as final, orders. The Commissions are also of the view that the scheme should include police-issued orders. Interim and police orders are often issued to address acute family violence situations and it would leave a gap in the system if these critical orders were not included.

30.231 In the Commission’s view, a national register of this kind also provides an opportunity for a formalised exchange of information relevant to proceedings involving family violence more broadly. While the initial proposal is to include information about family violence protection orders, in the Commissions’ view there is scope to extend the ambit of the register to include, for example, child protection orders made under state and territory child protection legislation, and information about parenting orders and family violence related injunctions made under the Family Law Act. The Commissions agree that it will not be necessary to include all federal family court orders on the register, but only those that are relevant to family violence and child protection proceedings in the state and territory courts.

30.232 The Commissions are also of the view that the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department—as the Central Authority for the Hague Convention—should give future consideration to including conditions and non-molestation undertakings made in Hague Convention cases on the national register. While registration would not affect the enforceability of undertakings and conditions, it would ensure that police officers, state and territory courts, and federal family courts are aware that they exist, and may take them into consideration, where appropriate, in protection order or parenting proceedings.

---

275 Office of the Privacy Commissioner, Submission FV 147, 24 June 2010.

30.233 Throughout the course of this Inquiry, the Commissions have heard about the problems that arise because of the gaps in information flow between the family law system, the family violence system and the child protection system. In this chapter the Commissions have made a number of recommendations to improve information flows including: clarifying initiating application forms;\textsuperscript{276} amending legislation that regulates the disclosure of information in relation to parenting orders, family violence orders and child protection orders;\textsuperscript{277} providing state and territory courts with access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal\textsuperscript{278} and establishing information sharing protocols and MOUs between courts, agencies and organisations working in these areas.\textsuperscript{279}

30.234 The Commissions’ view is, however, that a central register including information about family violence orders, child protection orders and related federal family court orders would be a more efficient and effective mechanism to ensure that the various systems are aware of orders and proceedings relating to the same family. It would be a significant step towards closing the information gaps between the systems and improving the protection provided for victims of family violence. It will help to ensure that courts and agencies have access to the full range of orders applying in any particular case, and is likely to lead to more consistent decision making across the jurisdictions. In developing the register, further consideration could also be given to including information about criminal convictions for family violence related offences and breach of the relevant orders.

30.235 The Commissions note that the proposed national register is being established, not only to register family violence orders, but also to allow inter-jurisdictional enforcement of the orders. In the Commissions’ view, many of the arguments relating to the automatic registration and recognition of family violence orders in other jurisdictions, might also be made in relation to child protection orders and it would be sensible to extend the registration and recognition arrangements to include them.

30.236 A related issue is the persons and entities that may access information on the national register. The Commissions’ view is that—at a minimum—access should be available to federal family courts, state and territory courts that hear protection order and child protection order proceedings, child protection agencies and the police. The Commissions do not have sufficient information in relation to allowing private sector individuals and organisations to have access to the register and so do not make a recommendation on this point.

\textsuperscript{276} Recs 30–1 and 30–2.
\textsuperscript{278} Rec 30–8.
\textsuperscript{279} Recs 30–16 and 30–17.
30.237 The Commissions note that privacy and security concerns mean that access to such data should be restricted to a ‘need to know’ basis. Current safeguards in CrimTrac, such as audit logs, should also apply. The Commissions agree with the Office of the Privacy Commissioner that a national register of this kind needs to be accompanied by a comprehensive privacy framework and recommend that a PIA be prepared as part of developing the register.

Recommendation 30–18 A national register should be established. At a minimum, information on the register should:

(a) include interim, final and police-issued protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation; child protection orders made under state and territory child protection legislation; and related orders and injunctions made under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth); and

(b) be available to federal, state and territory police, federal family courts, state and territory courts that hear matters related to family violence and child protection, and child protection agencies.

Recommendation 30–19 The national register recommended in Rec 30–18 should be underpinned by a comprehensive privacy framework and a privacy impact assessment should be prepared as part of developing the register.
Introduction

31.1 A central and critical theme in this Inquiry is the need for effective education and training of individuals—including judicial officers, lawyers, police prosecutors, family dispute resolution practitioners and victim support services—working in the family law, family violence, criminal justice and child protection systems. A proper appreciation and understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence, and the overlapping legal frameworks is fundamental in practice to ensuring the safety of victims and their families. The Commissions have also identified data collection and evaluation as important means to ensure that systems continually improve through reflection on practice.

31.2 This chapter brings together the key recommendations in these areas to give an overall picture of the policy approach taken by the Commissions. In addition, it considers the possible mechanisms and institutions required to provide and maintain quality education and training in the family violence context at a national level.

31. Education and Data Collection

Contents

Introduction 1459
Education and training 1460
The importance of education and training 1460
Providing and maintaining quality education and training 1461
Key focus areas for education and training 1462
Nature and dynamics of family violence 1462
A national bench book for judicial officers 1465
Education of lawyers 1469
Other recommendations 1471
Ensuring quality and best practice 1474
National approach to education and training 1477
National Centre of Excellence 1477
Expert panel and reference group 1477
National Judicial Institute for Family Violence and Sexual Assault 1478
Data collection 1479
Summary of recommendations 1480
Death reviews 1482
Education and training

The importance of education and training

31.3 The importance of education and training in the family violence system has been addressed in two key reports commissioned by the Australian Government: Time for Action by the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children (National Council), and the Family Violence Courts Review, by Professor Richard Chisholm (the Chisholm Review).

31.4 A key theme of Time for Action was the need for ‘attitudinal change at all levels of government and society’, which involves ‘adequate funding and professional training of the workforce’. The report included a number of strategies relating to education and training in different fields.

31.5 In particular, Time for Action recommended that, in achieving the outcome of ensuring just responses, a key strategy was to ‘ensure judicial officers, law enforcement personnel and other professionals within the legal system have appropriate knowledge and expertise’. It recommended that a national education and professional development framework be developed that recognised the specific roles of those involved in the legal system. This framework should be designed with these specific audiences in mind; be informed by research on the social context within which violence against women and children takes place; emphasise the diversity of experiences and needs of victim/survivors of violence in the community; and enhance understanding of the intent and operation of relevant legislation.

31.6 Similarly, the Chisholm Review recommended that there should be consideration of the ways in which those working in the family law system ‘might be better educated in relation to issues of family violence’. It was further recommended that family law courts review the use of existing best practice principles in relation to family violence, and consider measures to make those principles more influential.

31.7 Judicial education and training were also identified as key issues by the Victorian Law Reform Commission in its reports on family violence and sexual assault laws, and as key areas in strategic frameworks for addressing family violence,
31. Education and Data Collection including the Australasian Policing Strategy for the Prevention and Reduction of Family Violence.11

31.8 Many stakeholders emphasised the importance of education and training as part of an integrated response, and as a necessary strategy for improving the system as whole.12 For example, the Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service submitted that:

An integrated response to domestic and family violence should include education and training programs for all stakeholders, including operational police, prosecutors, lawyers, judicial officers and victim’s services.13

31.9 Similarly, the Australian Association of Social Workers highlighted that:

One of the essential aspects of successful coordinated responses is the ability to build into systems consistent and appropriate training. As the ALRC has identified, ensuring training is effective, and measuring the effectiveness of training, is a challenge. It is essential to ensure that education and training is sensitive, specific and relevant to the needs of particular stakeholders, and that training programs are designed with the ultimate aim of improving service responses to victims of domestic and family violence.14

Providing and maintaining quality education and training

31.10 While quality education and training are critical, it must be recognised that education and training are subject to limitations—including the receptiveness of the audience and the persistence of social and cultural norms. The Commissions recognise that calls for further education and training are easy to make, but that there are numerous challenges to ensuring that education and training are relevant, useful and have a meaningful impact on behaviour in an ongoing way. In this respect, it is vital to have in place mechanisms for review to ensure that quality and best practice are maintained in education and training programs.

---

31.11 Ideally, effective education and training programs should properly equip those working in the area of family violence with a thorough understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence, and the ability to navigate the range of overlapping legal frameworks. The Education Centre Against Violence (ECAV) has identified a number of challenges in ensuring the quality of family violence training. These include: the adequacy of the content of training, the adequacy of the length of training, and the number and qualifications of trainers. An issue affecting quality and consistency is that most training in this area is not subject to accreditation and not otherwise assessed for quality or longer term impacts on practice.

31.12 Another key challenge is ensuring that training is delivered in an appropriate way. Education and training may be provided by way of formal training programs conducted face to face; online programs; or educational resources, such as bench books or DVDs. The mode of delivery must be appropriate, especially for those working in regional and remote communities, and those from cultural and linguistically diverse (CALD) backgrounds. Research suggests that adults learn best by applying skills in practice and engaging in critical reflection on their own practice. However, it appears that less appropriate classroom-based learning continues to be prevalent in family violence training.

31.13 Another significant challenge is that of adequate resourcing. Training needs to be resourced adequately and less visible costs of training need to be considered in funding.

31.14 Lastly, adequate access to training is also important, including for those working in remote or regional areas. Access can also be affected by organisational cultures and practices, such as attitudes to releasing staff for training.

Key focus areas for education and training

31.15 The Commissions have, throughout this Report, made recommendations in specific areas where the interaction in practice of legal frameworks may be improved through education and training. This section brings together some of those recommendations, and also considers a number of issues in relation to education and training at a national level.

Nature and dynamics of family violence

31.16 One important aspect of education and training is in relation to the nature, dynamics and effects of family violence, including sexual assault in the family violence

---

15 The need for education and training in relation to the nature and dynamics of family violence—considered below—forms a key part of the Commissions’ policy approach.
16 S Stewart (Education Centre Against Violence), Consultation, By telephone, 18 February 2010.
17 Ibid.
context. In Part B, the Commissions recommend a common interpretative framework comprising:

- consistent core definitions of family violence across the relevant legislative schemes—namely, state and territory family violence and criminal legislation, and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)—underpinned by a common understanding of the types of conduct that constitutes family violence;\(^{18}\) and

- provisions complementing consistent definitions of family violence, including those which address: guiding principles based on a human rights framework; features and dynamics of family violence; purposes of family violence legislation; and grounds for obtaining a protection order.\(^{19}\)

31.17 The Commissions consider, however, that this framework should be part of a package of recommendations to facilitate a common understanding of family violence across the legal sector and the community more broadly. In particular, it must be accompanied by ongoing education and training of all professionals in the family violence system—including judicial officers, legal practitioners, police prosecutors and other professionals—about the nature and dynamics of family violence, as recognised in the framework.

31.18 Judicial officers, legal practitioners, police prosecutors and other professionals in the family violence system should receive education and training on a regular basis in conjunction with the recommended legislative changes.

31.19 In addressing interactions between family violence and the criminal law in Part C, the Commissions emphasise the critical importance of, and make recommendations for, relevant education and training for professionals in the criminal justice system about recognising and responding to the nature and dynamics of family violence.\(^{20}\) These measures include:

- recognising the pattern-based nature of family violence within the predominately incident-based framework of the criminal law, namely by developing and using appropriate prosecutorial guidelines and education and training programs about the use of representative charges, charge negotiations, and negotiations as to agreed statements of facts;\(^{21}\) and

- increasing recognition and understanding of the potential relevance of federal offences committed in a family violence context, including when such offences should be prosecuted or used as a basis for obtaining a family violence protection order.\(^{22}\)

---

18 Recs 5–1 to 5–5, 6–1 to 6–4.
19 Recs 7–1 to 7–7.
20 Key recommendations concerning police and prosecutors are outlined below.
21 Rec 13–2.
22 Rec 8–2.
31.20 In Part E, in relation to child protection, the Commissions recommend that state and territory child protection authorities and alternative dispute resolution providers should ensure that staff and alternative dispute resolution service practitioners participating in alternative dispute resolution in child protection matters undertake training on: family violence dynamics; and the need for parents, as well as children, who are victims of family violence to have access to appropriate support.23

31.21 In Part G, in relation to sexual assault in the family violence context, the Commissions note that there is often an ‘implementation gap’ between the written law and practice. This is caused in part by some individuals continuing to subscribe to myths and misconceptions surrounding the nature and dynamics of sexual assault. In Chapter 26, the Commissions suggest that training for police, legal practitioners, judicial officers and victim referral and support services should encompass areas such as: the myths and stereotypes surrounding sexual assault; the emotional, psychological and social impact of sexual assault on victims; and the different experiences and needs of particular marginalised victims, such as those with a cognitive impairment, Indigenous people and those from CALD and gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities.24 The Commissions also emphasise the need for prosecution of sexual assault to occur in the context of a legal system which is alive to cultural and linguistic diversity, and the vital importance of culturally appropriate service provision.25

31.22 The Commissions recommend that state and territory governments and relevant educational, professional and service delivery bodies should ensure ongoing and consistent education and training in relation to the substantive law, as well as the nature and dynamics of sexual assault as a form of family violence, including its social and cultural contexts.26

Submissions and consultations

31.23 A number of submissions emphasised the need for greater education in relation to the nature and dynamics of family violence, and its effect on victims and their families, for all those involved in the system. For example, Legal Aid NSW submitted that:

Judicial officers need to undertake significant domestic violence training to ensure that they understand the complexity and the nature of this violence ... To enable judicial officers to make educated and informed decisions, they need to understand the dynamics of family violence and the impact of this violence on victims and their children.27

23 Rec 23–10.
24 See Chs 24, 31–32, and Chs 26, 30–32 for a discussion of these issues.
25 See Chs 26, 32.
26 Rec 26–3.
27 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
31.24 Similarly, National Legal Aid submitted that:

There is a need for courts and service providers to commit to ensuring that education and training are provided to judicial officers and service providers to facilitate the development of a common language for communication in relation to family violence issues. This will help to ensure the workability of the arrangements. NLA suggests that the nature, features and dynamics of family violence are matters to be addressed in providing comprehensive education, rather than for inclusion in legislation.28

31.25 The Canberra Rape Crisis Centre submitted that:

In developing responses to the various proposals and questions posed in the Consultation Paper, it is clear to us that members of the judiciary need to be included in education initiatives concerning the complexities of family violence and sexual assault and the resulting harm that arises for victims of these crimes ... [W]e believe this is essential.29

31.26 Other submissions highlighted the need for education and training on the nature and dynamics of family violence as it relates to children,30 women and girls with a disability,31 and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.32

Commissions’ views

31.27 As noted above, the Commissions consider that a proper understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence and its impact on victims better enables those in the system—including judicial officers, legal practitioners, police prosecutors, and other professionals—to support and assist victims. The Commissions note that family violence has a disparate impact on vulnerable groups in the community, such as children, women with a disability, and Indigenous women specifically, and that it is important to ensure that education and training addresses these impacts.

Recommendation 31–1

The Australian, state and territory governments and educational, professional and service delivery bodies should ensure regular and consistent education and training for participants in the family law, family violence and child protection systems, in relation to the nature and dynamics of family violence, including its impact on victims, in particular those from high risk and vulnerable groups.

A national bench book for judicial officers

31.28 Family violence may engage a range of overlapping frameworks. Familiarity with, and competence in, these frameworks by legal professionals and judicial officers is therefore vital to ensuring fair and just outcomes for victims. However, there appears

---

29 Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
to be limited training of judicial officers in Australia—even those in specialised courts—in the area of family violence. This has been identified as a key concern of those involved in the family law system, and by stakeholders in this Inquiry.

31.29 The Commissions make a number of recommendations in relation to judicial education. In Chapter 16, the Commissions recommend that those involved in protection order proceedings under state and territory family violence legislation be provided training on the courts’ jurisdiction under the Family Law Act. In Chapter 32, the Commissions make recommendations for regular training on family violence issues for judicial officers in specialised family violence courts.

31.30 In addition, the issue of a national bench book to assist judges in family-violence related matters in any court or jurisdiction featured prominently in this Inquiry. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions endorsed the recommendation in Time for Action for the development of a model bench book on family violence and sexual assault issues. The Commissions noted that an excellent comparative example of a bench book dealing with family violence issues had been published in Canada by the National Judicial Institute, titled Domestic Violence and Family Law in Canada: A Handbook for Judges (Canadian bench book). This covers, among other things, the use and misuse of social context information; understanding and assessing family violence; and interpreting victim and offender behaviour.

31.31 The Commissions also noted various developments in Australia. For example, the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration has published useful bench books and other resources including, relevantly, the Solution-Focused Judging Bench Book —including an excellent chapter on the nature of family violence—and the Bench Book for Children Giving Evidence in Australian Courts. The Judicial Commission of NSW and the Judicial College of Victoria have also published other bench books on sexual assault and sentencing issues (including family violence). The Judicial College of Victoria has made available online its bench books on family violence, sexual assault, and criminal charges.

---

33 The Commissions discuss specialised family violence courts in Ch 32.
34 Rec 16–9.
35 Rec 32–3.
31.32 The Commissions make recommendations for the development of a national bench book on family violence, including sexual assault, for judicial officers, as part of a national family violence education and training strategy. These recommendations envisage that the model bench book should be:

- comprehensive, in that it would cover all relevant civil and criminal laws in state, territory and federal jurisdictions;
- additional and complementary to existing bench books in state, territory and federal jurisdictions, in that the development of a national resource should not preclude the ongoing development and use of jurisdiction-specific resources;
- integrated with existing resources in state, territory and federal jurisdictions, in that jurisdiction-specific bench books should cross-refer to provisions in the national bench book; and
- developed by federal, state and territory governments, in consultation with relevant stakeholders to ensure the appropriate identification of, and responses, to the particular impacts of family violence upon persons from specific cultural, linguistic and social groups.

31.33 The Commissions consider that the content of such a national bench book should include the following.

Criminal law

- guidance about the potential relevance of family violence-related evidence to criminal offences and defences—for example, evidence of the pre-existing relationship between parties, including evidence of previous violence;\(^{40}\)
- guidance about sentencing in family violence-related matters—including sentencing offenders for breach of protection orders;\(^{41}\) and, in particular, how to treat, in sentencing, the consent of a victim to contact with a respondent that is prohibited by a protection order;\(^{42}\)
- guidance about the operation of defences to homicide where a victim of family violence kills the person who was violent towards him or her;\(^{43}\) and
- identifying the circumstances in which a warning about the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of a particular complainant or child witness in a sexual assault case is in the interests of justice.\(^{44}\)

Family violence legislation and the Family Law Act

- material to assist judicial officers in state and territory courts to understand and exercise their jurisdiction under the Family Law Act. This material should

---

40 Rec 13–1(a).
41 Recs 13–1(b), 12–8.
42 Rec 12–5.
43 Rec 14–3.
44 Rec 28–2.
include guidance on the considerations relevant to making protection orders that are inconsistent with current family law orders and options available for resolving such inconsistencies to ensure the safety of victims of family violence.45

Submissions and consultations

31.34 A number of submissions strongly supported the development of a national bench book, noting in particular the Canadian bench book.46 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria submitted that this bench book provides a model for a national bench book to assist Australian judicial officers in developing their understanding of the social context of family violence, the complexities of legislation across jurisdictions and identifying and applying those principles to judicial decision-making. While there is ample research in these areas, contribution of a bench book would allow judicial officers access to reliable information and assist them in translating that information into legal practice.47

31.35 Similarly, the Government of Victoria noted that the Canadian bench book is an example of best practice research undertaken to provide contextual material for judicial officers regarding family violence, and will be invaluable as a model for development of similar specialist tools in an Australian context. It is understood that such a tool has application to family law, family violence, state/territory and Commonwealth jurisdictions.48

31.36 Domestic Violence Victoria and others, in a joint submission, urged the Australian government to find a way to make the resource available to Australian courts for adoption locally, and to the wider family violence sector.49

Commissions’ views

31.37 In the Commissions’ view, the development of a national bench book would be a useful resource for judicial officers in Australia, and should be pursued. In particular, such a book would promote consistency in the interpretation and application of laws across jurisdictions, offer guidance and promote best practice among judicial officers.
As noted above, relevant bench books have been published by judicial institutes and bodies in Australia. The Commissions consider that these works could be built upon and, with adequate resourcing, that such bodies could contribute towards the development of a national bench book.

45 Rec 16–8.
46 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities
47 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
49 Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.
31.38 The Commissions are aware that the Victorian Department of Justice is currently in the process of securing access to the Canadian bench book, and that Victoria and South Australia are exploring a partnership agreement to progress work at a state level in relation to a bench book.\footnote{Victorian Government, \textit{Submission FV 120}, 15 June 2010.} The Commissions consider that there is potential for collaboration between the Australian, state and territory governments to develop a similar bench book in Australia, using the Canadian bench book as a model.

31.39 Lastly, the Commissions note that a national bench book should act as a complement to, rather than a substitute for, quality education and training.

\begin{center}
\textbf{Recommendation 31–2} The Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate with relevant stakeholders to develop and maintain a national bench book on family violence, including sexual assault, having regard to the Commissions’ recommendations in this Report in relation to the content that should be included in such a book.
\end{center}

\section*{Education of lawyers}

31.40 Lawyers represent another key target area for education and training. As noted above, lawyers engaging with issues of family violence need to be more aware of family violence issues, and be equipped to navigate through the different legal frameworks that apply.

31.41 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the view that family violence should be addressed in university law courses and in continuing professional development requirements. The Commissions proposed that:

- Australian universities offering law degrees should review their curriculums to ensure that family violence is appropriately addressed; and
- Australian law societies and institutes should review continuing professional development requirements to ensure that legal issues concerning family violence are appropriately addressed.\footnote{Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, \textit{Family Violence: Improving Legal Frameworks}, ALRC Consultation Paper 1, NSWLRC Consultation Paper 9 (2010), Proposal 19–14 and 19–15.}

\section*{Submissions and consultations}

subject.\textsuperscript{53} Others suggested that curriculums should also cover victim impact.\textsuperscript{54} A number of submissions also suggested that education needs to be linked with practical experience training.\textsuperscript{55} One stakeholder suggested that universities should be encouraged to invite practitioners from the field as guest lecturers.\textsuperscript{56}

31.43 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria asked the Commissions to consider a program of national accreditation for legal practitioners in family violence and sexual assault as a means of promoting interest in these areas of practice and complementing existing specialisation in family law and criminal law. It would be helpful for agencies working with victims and offenders and the parties themselves to be able to identify practitioners who understand the relationship between these areas of practice and can assist their clients to navigate complex judicial processes from start to finish. Such accreditation could promote higher levels of understanding and education in research relating to family violence and its application to legal practice.\textsuperscript{57}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

31.44 The Commissions’ view is that lawyers engaging with issues of family violence should be provided with targeted education and training to help them to better assist victims and to navigate through the different legal frameworks that apply. The Commissions are of the view that family violence should be addressed in university law courses and in continuing professional development requirements. To ensure that all students are introduced to the nature and dynamics of family violence, these issues should be covered in relevant elective and compulsory subjects, including family law and criminal law.

31.45 The Commissions note the views of the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria on the merits of a national program of accreditation for legal practitioners in family violence and sexual assault. Accreditation is available for family dispute resolution practitioners under the National Mediation Accreditation System, which \textsuperscript{56} Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, \textit{Submission FV 172}, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{57} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 220}, 1 July 2010.
31. Education and Data Collection

‘relies on voluntary compliance by mediator organisations that agree to accredit mediators in accordance with the requisite standards’.58 A number of stakeholders emphasised the need for more rigorous accreditation in the family dispute resolution context.59 The Commissions consider that the desirability of accreditation for legal practitioners in family violence and sexual assault should be explored as one element of the national audit of education and training in family violence, discussed below.

Recommendation 31–3 Australian tertiary institutions offering legal qualifications should review their curriculums to ensure that legal issues concerning family violence are appropriately addressed.

Recommendation 31–4 Australian legal professional bodies should review continuing professional development requirements to ensure that legal issues concerning family violence are appropriately addressed.

Other recommendations

31.46 The need for specific education and training for those working in the family violence, family law, criminal law, and child protection systems is discussed throughout this Report. As noted at the outset of this chapter, a central theme in ensuring that the recommendations for reform of legal frameworks in this Report are effective in improving the safety of victims and their families is through sustained education and training of all individuals working in the area and responding to family violence allegations or incidents.

Sexual assault

31.47 The Commissions identified the issue of responding to sexual assault, including in a family violence context, as an area where legal practitioners might particularly benefit from more education and training. In Chapters 27 and 28, the Commissions make a number of recommendations in relation to government and non-government bodies providing education to practitioners around issues relating to evidence in sexual assault matters, to complement other reforms. These include that practitioners receive:

- education and training about the sexual assault communications privilege and how to respond to a subpoena for confidential counselling communications;60
- education and training about procedural requirements for admitting and adducing evidence of sexual activity;61 and

---

60 Rec 27–9.
61 Rec 27–7.
• education about legislation authorising the use of pre-recorded evidence in sexual assault proceedings, and training in relation to interviewing victims of sexual assault and taking pre-recorded evidence.62

31.48 The Commissions also suggest that there may be a need for education concerning: the scope of evidence of sexual reputation;63 the nature of sexual assault, including the context in which sexual offences typically occur; the emotional, psychological and social impact of sexual assault in relation to decisions about jury warnings on the effect of delay on the credibility of complainants;64 and expert evidence about children’s responses to sexual abuse and their reliability as witnesses.65

Police and prosecutors

31.49 In Chapter 32, the Commissions recommend that state and territory police should ensure that all police—including specialised police units—receive regular education and training consistent with the Australasian Policing Strategy for the Prevention and Reduction of Family Violence. This includes training in communication skills, including cross-cultural communication, to address the different needs and contexts of family violence in the case of marginalised groups.66

31.50 Further, the Commissions make a number of recommendations with respect to education and training of police and prosecutors in relation to nature and dynamics of family violence, and in dealing with family-violence related incidents. These include:

• as part of their training on the dynamics of family violence, police should be trained to clearly identify persons who have used family violence and persons who need to be protected from family violence, and to distinguish one from the other. Guidance should also be given in police codes of practice and guidelines;67
• training police and prosecutors on how the dynamics of family violence might affect the decisions of victims of such violence to negate the existence of family violence or to withdraw previous allegations of violence;68
• training police about the matters which they seek victims of family violence to address in sworn or affirmed ‘statements of no complaint’—in which victims attest to the fact that they do not wish to pursue criminal action;69
• providing guidance to police about charging an offender with breach of a protection order and any underlying criminal offence constituting the breach;70

62 Rec 26–8.
63 Chs 27, 8.
64 Chs 24, 31.
65 Ibid.
66 Rec 32–5.
67 Rec 9–5.
68 Rec 12–2.
69 Rec 12–4.
70 Rec 12–6.
reinforcing, through training, police obligations when preparing witness statements in relation to breach of protection order proceedings, including asking victims about the impact on them of breach, and/or advising them that they may wish to make a victim impact statement and about the use that can be made of such a statement;\textsuperscript{71}

• training police and prosecutors about potential federal offences committed in a family violence context, including when such offences should be prosecuted or used as a basis for obtaining a family violence protection order;\textsuperscript{72}

• supporting the execution of police duties to inform victims of bail decisions;\textsuperscript{73} and

• ensuring that police and prosecutors are encouraged by appropriate prosecutorial guidelines and education and training programs, to use representative charges wherever appropriate in family-violence related criminal matters where the charged conduct forms part of a course of conduct.\textsuperscript{74}

Family dispute resolution practitioners

31.51 In Chapter 21, the Commissions recommend that the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, family dispute resolution service providers, and bodies responsible for legal education should develop ways to ensure that lawyers who practice family law are given adequate training and support in screening and assessing risks in relation to family violence and making appropriate referrals to other services.\textsuperscript{75}

31.52 In Chapter 22, the Commissions recommend that the Australian Government should co-ordinate the development of education and training (including cross-disciplinary training), for family courts’ registry staff, family consultants, judicial officers and lawyers who practise family law, about the need for screening and risk assessment where a s 60I certificate has been issued indicating a matter is inappropriate for family dispute resolution.\textsuperscript{76} Such training should be developed collaboratively with family courts, lawyers’ organisations and other bodies responsible for the education and training of family courts’ registry staff, family consultants, judicial officers, and legal practitioners.

31.53 The Commissions also recommend that bodies responsible for the education and training of family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors should develop education and training to ensure that provisions in the Family Law Act and in state and territory child protection legislation for disclosure of information relating to \textsuperscript{71} Rec 12–9.

\textsuperscript{72} Rec 8–2.
\textsuperscript{73} Rec 10–3.
\textsuperscript{74} Rec 13–2.
\textsuperscript{75} Rec 21–3.
\textsuperscript{76} Rec 22–3.
actual or potential abuse, harm or ill-treatment of children are understood and appropriately acted upon.\textsuperscript{77}

Integrated responses

31.54 In Chapter 29 the Commissions examine the range of responses to family violence across Australia where an attempt has been made to integrate services from different agencies and sectors. Where integration is occurring, there is a need for education about the roles of different players within the system itself. For example, government staff and community workers benefit from understanding the legislation and how the court system works, just as the court system benefits from understanding the social and financial consequences of their decisions.\textsuperscript{78}

31.55 In Chapter 30, the Commissions make recommendations that parties involved in integrated responses including courts, judicial officers, lawyers and practitioners, police and relevant agencies receive ongoing training to ensure that arrangements are effectively implemented.\textsuperscript{79}

Ensuring quality and best practice

31.56 As noted above, the Commissions recognise a number of challenges to the provision of quality education and training. The quality and effectiveness of training need to be regularly monitored and evaluated to ensure that resources are effectively utilised, and that best practice is maintained.

31.57 In 2009, ECAV conducted an audit of domestic and family violence training provided by government and non-governmental organisations in NSW, as part of the Intersectoral Domestic and Family Violence Education and Training project, established under the NSW Government’s whole of government approach to domestic and family violence. This audit involved a survey of training conducted in key agencies in 2008. The survey was followed by a number of regional cross-sector focus groups on training needs. This audit has not yet been published.\textsuperscript{80}

31.58 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the Australian and state and territory governments should ensure the quality of family violence training by:

- developing minimum standards for assessing the quality of family violence training, and regularly evaluating the quality of such training in relevant government agencies using those standards;
- developing best practice guidelines in relation to family violence training, including the content, length, and format of such training;

\textsuperscript{77} Rec 22–5.
\textsuperscript{78} S Stewart (Education Centre Against Violence), Consultation, By telephone, 18 February 2010: The legislative framework appears to be commonly used as a basis for training, at least in NSW.
\textsuperscript{79} See Recs 30–16, 30–17.
\textsuperscript{80} S Stewart (Education Centre Against Violence), Consultation, By telephone, 18 February 2010.
developing training based on evidence of the needs of those being trained, with the ultimate aim of improving outcomes for victims; and

• fostering cross-agency and collaborative training, including cross-agency placements.81

31.59 Further, the Commissions suggested that it would be desirable, before implementing any recommendations on training, that the Australian Government and state and territory governments collaborate in conducting a national audit of family violence training conducted by government and non-government agencies in order to:

• ensure that existing resources are best used;

• evaluate whether training meets best practice principles; and

• promote the development of best practice in training.82

Submissions and consultations

31.60 A significant number of submissions supported the proposal for a national audit.83 National Legal Aid submitted that:

Such an audit would be of benefit in consultation with the sector only to the extent necessary to identify the minimum standards for assessing the quality of family violence training and to identify gaps or areas of duplication which should be addressed to make use of available resources.84

31.61 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse agreed. However, it noted that ‘it is not only a question of making use of the resources—in some cases there are no resources and this needs to be remedied’.85

82 Ibid, Proposal 19–16.
84 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
85 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
Similarly, there was broad support for the development of minimum standards for assessing the quality of education and training, and for fostering cross-agency and collaborative training. ECAV submitted that:

We would suggest that consideration be given to the development of ‘minimum standards’ for domestic and family violence training at the national level, perhaps in conjunction with the proposed national development framework ... We note that ECAV’s recent audit of Domestic and Family Violence (DFV) training in NSW indicates that currently most training in NSW is occurring in single agency settings. However, the findings of a series of statewide cross-sector focus groups about DFV training needs indicate that service providers would welcome the opportunity to participate in more cross-agency professional development. Despite the challenges involved in implementing this type of training, its potential benefit in terms of supporting best practice integrated responses needs highlighting. Consideration ought also to be given to factoring intersectoral training into the development of a comprehensive professional development framework for DFV practitioners.86

A number of submissions also noted that the Australian Government has stated that it would ‘develop a multi disciplinary training package for lawyers, judicial officers and other professionals working within the family law system, to improve the consistency and handling of cases’.87

Commissions’ views

The Commissions agree that the Australian Government and state and territory governments should collaborate in conducting a national audit of training by government and non-government agencies. Such an audit—conducted in consultation with the sector—would be useful in identifying gaps and areas of duplication of existing resources. The Commissions consider that this is a desirable first step before implementing any recommendations on education and training. The Commissions note that the experience of the ECAV can be drawn upon in designing any audit.

The Commissions believe that developing minimum standards for assessing the quality of education and developing best practice guidelines are important tools to help improve the system. Below the Commissions consider the role of a national body that could develop minimum standards and promote best practice in family violence responses.

The Commissions also endorse the Australian Government’s response to Time for Action, in developing a multi-disciplinary training package for those working in the family law system. The problem of ‘silos’ separating the different areas of the legal framework dealing with family violence was a recurring theme in this Inquiry. The Commissions are of the view that cross-agency and collaborative training is important to ensure that those working in the system are adequately equipped to deal with all aspects of family violence. Cross-agency training is part of a suite of recommendations aimed at generating a more seamless and effective response to family violence.

86  Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010.
87  National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
31.67 Finally, the Commissions note that such an audit may also provide the opportunity to consider the merits and practicability of a system of accreditation for legal professionals working in the areas of family violence and sexual assault.

Recommendation 31–5 The Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate in conducting a national audit of family violence training conducted by government and non-government agencies in order to:

(a) ensure that existing resources are best used;
(b) evaluate whether training meets best practice principles; and
(c) promote the development of best practice in training.

National approach to education and training

31.68 One issue that emerged during the course of the Inquiry was whether there was a role for a national body charged with developing policy, promoting best practice and providing education and support to those working in the family violence area. The Commissions note a number of different options have been raised in previous reports, and in submissions to this Inquiry.

National Centre of Excellence

31.69 The National Council advocated the establishment of a National Centre of Excellence for the Prevention of Violence against Women.\(^88\) This would, among other things, provide a national resource for the development of policy and benchmarks, and develop and promote ‘gold-standard’ practice to reduce violence against women and their children across Australia.\(^89\) Further, there should be a specific funding stream to address prevention education policy, including training and accreditation of staff and programs.\(^90\)

Expert panel and reference group

31.70 A key recommendation by the Family Law Council in its 2009 advice to the Commonwealth Attorney-General concerned the development of a ‘common knowledge base’ by an expert panel and reference group for those working in the family law system.\(^91\) The reference group would include representatives of a diverse range of organisations and be involved in reviewing Australian and international research findings—to ensure that the common knowledge base is evidence based and current—and advising the Government on its research agenda in the area of family

---

89 Ibid.
90 Ibid, 68.
violence.\textsuperscript{92} It recommended that professional and peak bodies should use the common knowledge base to guide good practice and underpin training programs and professional development,\textsuperscript{93} and that family pathways networks are aware of and disseminate information from the family violence common knowledge base.\textsuperscript{94}

31.71 The Family Law Council also recommended that the expert panel and reference group ‘endorse the content of education and training on family violence for those involved in the system’, including family dispute resolution practitioners, lawyers, independent children’s lawyers, family consultants, and experts who provide evidence to courts.\textsuperscript{95} It recommended that all key players should undertake relevant ongoing training at least annually.\textsuperscript{96} The education and training would be conducted by, or performed under the auspices of, bodies including the Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia, state law societies and foundations, the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration, National Legal Aid and the federal family courts.\textsuperscript{97} The Family Law Council also recommended the revision and periodic updating of the \textit{Best Practice Guidelines for Lawyers Doing Family Law Work}.\textsuperscript{98}

\textbf{National Judicial Institute for Family Violence and Sexual Assault}

31.72 A number of submissions to the Inquiry asked the Commissions to consider the merits of establishing a National Judicial Institute for Family Violence and Sexual Assault.\textsuperscript{99} The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, for example, envisaged that such a body would be a central repository of best practice, current research and information to support judicial officers, across jurisdictions, to undertake their work in family violence family law and sexual assault. It could develop professional development programs for judicial officers to ensure more consistent application of research findings.\textsuperscript{100}

31.73 Further, the Courts supported the Institute playing a role in transferring specialised knowledge and expertise in dealing with family violence and sexual assault across federal, state and territory jurisdictions, and establishing and maintaining national networks of judicial officers and staff specialising in family violence or family law.\textsuperscript{101}

31.74 Similarly, the Victorian government submitted that

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{92} Ibid, Recs 6.3–6.4.
  \item \textsuperscript{93} Ibid, Rec 6.7.
  \item \textsuperscript{94} Ibid, Rec 6.9.
  \item \textsuperscript{95} Ibid, 40.
  \item \textsuperscript{96} Ibid.
  \item \textsuperscript{97} Ibid.\textsuperscript{[6.8].}
  \item \textsuperscript{98} Ibid, [6.8].
  \item \textsuperscript{100} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 220}, 1 July 2010.
  \item \textsuperscript{101} Ibid.
\end{itemize}
support for such a body was one of the key recommendations from the National Family Violence conference hosted by the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration in October 2009 ... such an Institute could support best practice across federal and state jurisdictions. It could also ensure a coordinated approach to best practice tools that would have application across jurisdictions (eg model benchbook).

31.75 The Victorian government also noted that the Institute could ‘promote judicial excellence through procedural reform, and highlight the critical role that judicial officers play in the overall justice response to family violence and sexual assault’.

Commissions’ views

31.76 The Commissions support the strategy of developing a comprehensive professional development framework for those working in family violence, as recommended in the Time for Action report. The Commissions also support the principle of a national body charged with developing policy, promoting best practice and providing education and support to those working the family violence area.

31.77 The Commissions make no specific recommendations as to whether a new body should be established in the form of a National Centre of Excellence (as proposed in the Time for Action report), or an expert panel and reference group (as recommended by the Family Law Council), or a National Judicial Institute for Family Violence and Sexual Assault (as suggested by the Victorian Government and the Magistrates’ and Children’s Court of Victoria). The Commissions note that while there is substantial merit in each of these proposed bodies, further work and consultation may be required to establish the most effective and efficient approach to national family violence policy development and education.

Data collection

31.78 Another important issue identified by the Commissions is the need for ongoing data collection and evaluation. In Time for Action, the National Council highlighted that ‘data relating to violence against women and their children in Australia is poor’, and proposed that one of the tasks of its proposed National Centre of Excellence for the Prevention of Violence against Women would be to ‘coordinate a national research agenda and data collection effort’. The Council noted that:

Data on services sought by, and provided to, victims is not readily available, and the way in which information is reported is generally inconsistent and does not allow for a comprehensive understanding of family violence against women.

103 Ibid.
105 Ibid.
106 Ibid, 47.
31.79 Similarly, the Family Law Council’s proposal for an expert panel and reference group, discussed above, would also provide a focus for coordinating bodies for improving data collection and analysis.107

31.80 The importance of accurate and comprehensive data in informing policy initiatives has been recognised in Victoria through the Victorian Family Violence Database.108 The database—the only project of its kind in Australia—was developed because ‘access to reliable and meaningful statistics on family violence is essential for the development of appropriate policy response in Victoria’.109 The Victorian Department of Justice stated in its report, Victorian Family Violence Database: Volume 4, Nine Year Trend Analysis 1999-2008, that:

> A lack of meaningful data collection and analysis has long been identified as a pressing issue by government and non-government agencies ... The reduction of family violence requires a whole-of-government—and inter-government—evidence-based approach. Accurate and reliable data analysis is central to pursuing such an approach and achieving effective response to family violence.110

31.81 In this Report, the Commissions have noted the inadequacy of current data, including: data on federal prosecutions relevant to family violence;111 court statistics in relation to family violence-related criminal matters;112 data on the extent of sexual violence against children, women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, Indigenous women and children;113 and data on the reporting and prosecution of sexual offences.114 The Commissions also note that adopting a common shared understanding of family violence will help to facilitate the capture of statistics about family violence, thereby providing more useful and comparable data upon which policies to address family violence can be based.115

Summary of recommendations

31.82 In Chapter 8, the Commissions recommend that the Australian Institute of Criminology (AIC), or another suitable agency, should gather and report data about federal offences committed in the family violence context. This should include:

- which federal offences are prosecuted and the result;
- who conducts the prosecution;

---

108 The Database holds data about family violence incidents reported by Victoria Police, intervention order applications finalised in the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria, family violence services provided by specific agencies funded through the Department of Human Services, family violence–related presentations to Victorian public hospital emergency departments and calls to the Victims Support Agency’s Victims of Crime Helpline and Victims Assistance and Counselling Programs.

110 Ibid, 19.

111 See Chs 8, 3–7.

112 See Chs 12, 22–23.

113 See Chs 24, 7–9.

114 See Chs 26, 8–1.

115 Ch 8, 34.
• whether the offences are prosecuted jointly with state and territory crimes committed in the family violence context; and
• when the offences form the basis of a protection order.\textsuperscript{116}

31.83 Similarly, in Chapter 26, the Commissions recommend that the Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, the AIC and similar state and territory agencies should prioritise the collection of comprehensive data in relation to sexual assault perpetrated in a family violence context. In particular on:

• attrition rates (including reasons for attrition and the attrition point);
• case outcomes; and
• trends in relation to particular groups including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.\textsuperscript{117}

31.84 In Chapter 12, the Commissions recommend that to the extent that state and territory courts record and maintain statistics about criminal matters lodged or criminal offences proven in their jurisdiction, they should ensure that such statistics capture separately criminal matters or offences that occur in a family-violence related context. In every other case, state and territory governments should ensure the separate capture of statistics of criminal matters or offences in their jurisdictions that occur in a family-violence related context.\textsuperscript{118}

31.85 Another major gap in the system identified by the Commissions is the absence of a national protection order database.\textsuperscript{119} In Chapter 30, the Commissions endorse the Australian Government’s commitment to the development of a national scheme for the registration and recognition of family violence orders. The Commissions recommend that such a register should, at a minimum:

• include interim, final and police-issued protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation; child protection orders made under state and territory child protection legislation; and related orders and injunctions made under the \textit{Family Law Act}; and
• be available to federal, state and territory police officers, federal family courts, state and territory courts that hear family violence and child protection related matters, and child protection agencies.\textsuperscript{120}

\textsuperscript{116} Rec 8–1.
\textsuperscript{117} Rec 26–1.
\textsuperscript{118} Rec 12–7.
\textsuperscript{119} See Ch 30. The Australian Government has committed to working with the states and territories to establish a national scheme for the registration of protection orders. Details have not yet been released about how such a national scheme would operate.
\textsuperscript{120} Rec 30–18.
Death reviews

31.86 Another area identified by stakeholders related to data collection aimed at reviewing and analysing deaths resulting from domestic violence. Women’s Legal Services Australia has previously supported such a review, stating that:

WLSA supports any mechanism aimed at monitoring and analysing deaths resulting from domestic violence ... The role of the review is to identify risk factors, barriers to effective intervention and gaps in service delivery or the integration of responses. These review processes are not aimed at attributing blame, but rather at making improvements to systems responses and preventing future deaths.121

31.87 Domestic Violence Victoria and others, in a joint submission, noted that its members are represented in the Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths led by the Victorian Coroners Court:

It is crucial that other states and territories establish their own appropriately resourced family violence death review, in consultation with family violence victim support services and peak bodies. We believe that national leadership is also important in ensuring that data and research from the various reviews are centrally coordinated so that jurisdictions are able to learn from one another about effective family violence death prevention.122

31.88 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria noted similarly in relation to the Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths that:

The courts believe this process has the potential to provide valuable information about the way the justice system (including its courts) interacts both with its agencies and external agencies in responding to family violence cases. A comprehensive and systematic review of family violence deaths provides a significant opportunity to examine the success or otherwise of integrated responses to family violence.123

Commissions’ views

31.89 In the Commissions’ view, a commitment to quality data collection and evaluation is crucial to ensuring systemic change and improvement—and is an important element in an effective and ongoing national response to family violence. Comprehensive, up to date and accurate data help to underpin evidence-based policy and legal responses to family violence, and inform quality education and training programs. Further, the collection and sharing of data are crucial elements of an integrated response.

31.90 In particular, the Commissions are of the view that states and territories should undertake systemic reviews into deaths resulting from family violence. The Commissions agree with the submissions that such data would aid the system in identifying risk factors, gaps in responses and other deficiencies that, if addressed, may help to prevent deaths resulting from family violence.

---

121  Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010, Attachment 4.
123  Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Elsewhere in this Report, the Commissions have highlighted many existing examples of good practice in relation to data collection and analysis that have helped the system reflect upon its own practices and inform policy directions. For example, a number of integrated responses have been evaluated, including the ACT’s Family Violence Intervention Program;\textsuperscript{124} the Tasmanian Safe at Home program;\textsuperscript{125} the NSW Domestic Violence Integrated Court Model;\textsuperscript{126} the Joondalup specialised court in Western Australia; and the ECAV evaluation of cross-sectoral training in NSW.\textsuperscript{127}

The Commissions also commend government initiatives such as the Victorian Family Violence Database, which is the most comprehensive database of its kind in Australia. As noted above, the database appears to have played an important role in the formulation of family-violence related policy in Victoria since its inception.

Finally, the Commissions consider there is role for bodies such as the AIC, or a national body as discussed above—if appropriately funded and resourced—to play a major role in fostering the collection of data and its dissemination to those working in the family system.

Recommendation 31–6  State and territory governments should undertake systemic and ongoing reviews into deaths resulting from family violence.

\textsuperscript{126} L. Rodwell and N. Smith, An Evaluation of the NSW Domestic Violence Intervention Court Model (2008), prepared for the NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research.
\textsuperscript{127} This report was not publicly available at the time of writing.
32. Specialisation

Contents

Introduction 1485
Advantages and challenges of specialisation 1486
   Advantages of specialisation 1486
   Challenges of specialisation 1487
Specialised family violence courts 1488
   Elements of specialised family violence courts 1489
   The value of specialised family violence courts 1490
   International models 1491
Existing specialised family violence courts in Australia 1494
   Jurisdiction and elements 1494
Expanding specialised family violence courts in Australia 1501
   Jurisdiction of specialised family violence courts 1501
   Elements of specialised family violence courts 1506
Mainstreaming specialised practices 1512
   Commissions’ views 1513
Specialised police 1514
   The roles and advantages of specialised police 1514
   Specialised police in Australia 1515

Introduction

32.1 In the course of this Inquiry, the Commissions have formed the view that the specialisation of key individuals and institutions is crucial to improving the interaction in practice of legal frameworks governing family violence, including sexual assault in a family violence context. This chapter considers ways to foster and improve the effectiveness of specialised family violence courts and specialised police units with the aim of producing safe, fair and just outcomes for victims and their families.

32.2 This chapter focuses in particular on specialised family violence courts. The term ‘specialised court’ can be used to refer to a number of things. For example, the term can be used to refer to separate stand alone courts that deal only with a particular subject matter—such as the Family Court of Australia— which ‘specialises’ in matters under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). Children’s courts, similarly, may be considered as specialised courts dealing with child related matters. There are, however, no stand alone specialised family violence courts in Australia.

32.3 In courts that deal with a range of subject matters, there can be a division or special program embedded within existing court structures that deals with a particular subject matter. For example, in Victoria, there is the Family Violence Division of the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria. In other instances, a court may operate a ‘specialised list’, in which certain categories of cases are heard on certain days of the week, often by dedicated judges. Both these types of ‘specialised courts’ are common in the Australian legal system.

32.4 Many specialised courts simply operate as a matter of practice, and their structures are established through administrative mechanisms. However, some specialised courts may be expressly established by legislation.1

32.5 In this chapter, the Commissions use the term specialised family violence courts as a general description to refer to a division, program, specialised list or a specialist family violence court room within existing state or territory magistrates or local courts set up to deal with family violence.

32.6 The Commissions make no recommendations in this chapter for establishment of specialised sexual assault courts or specialised child sexual assault courts. The Terms of Reference direct the Commissions to consider sexual assault in the family violence context. In Chapter 26, the Commissions express the view that where sexual assault occurs in the family violence context, it should be considered and dealt with as family violence.

Advantages and challenges of specialisation

Advantages of specialisation

32.7 Specialisation has been promoted by many working in family violence as a strategy for achieving best practice. However, there is a real debate about whether resources—such as funding, staffing, training and education—are better concentrated in specialised units and courts, or dispersed more generally throughout the system. It is also arguable that—given the cost of family violence to the Australian community—both specialisation and greater resourcing of the system generally represent achievable best practice benchmarks.2

32.8 Specialisation can help to ensure that victims have contact with those in the system—including judicial officers, lawyers, prosecutors, police and family dispute practitioners—with a better understanding of the nature, features and dynamics of family violence.3 This knowledge and understanding allows these individuals to better assist victims in navigating the legal, social and health systems by connecting together legal frameworks and social services.4

1  The Family Violence Court Division of the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria has its own legislative basis, and is discussed below.
2  The Commissions discuss the cost of family violence to the Australian community in Ch 1.
3  The Commissions consider the nature, features and dynamics of family violence in Ch 7.
4  For example, magistrates in the specialised family violence courts in Victoria, discussed below, routinely ask questions in applications for protection orders about pending prosecutions or past convictions, pending or past family law proceedings, the use of counselling and drug programs, and applications for victims’ compensation: Court Observation: Sunshine Magistrates’ Court of Victoria: Family Violence List, 25 January 2010.
Specialisation can also operate to improve the system as a whole. As many stakeholders have emphasised, attitudinal and behavioural change—although highly desirable—can be slow to achieve. Specialisation acts both as a way of attracting those with an interest and aptitude for family violence work, and allows education, training and other resources to be focused upon a smaller group for more immediate results and improved outcomes. Specialists can help to promote attitudinal change if they are given opportunities to share information with, and to contribute to, the education and training of those in the general system.5

Specialisation can improve consistency and efficiency in the interpretation and application of laws as a result of shared understandings and the awareness and experience of a smaller number of decision makers. Specialists can identify and solve problems more quickly and effectively and can develop and promote best practice that can then be mainstreamed to drive change in the system more generally.

In the long run, the efficiency gains through specialisation may produce better outcomes that result in substantial savings elsewhere in the system—for example, earlier and more effective legal intervention may result in fewer cases requiring child protection agencies to intervene, and fewer demands on medical and psychological services.

For these reasons, specialists are more likely to be effective in addressing family violence, and in their ability to make the system more efficient as a whole.

Challenges of specialisation

Stakeholders have identified a number of operational challenges associated with specialisation. These include: the accessibility of specialised services; the appropriate selection and retention of specialists; and the ongoing need to ensure and maintain adequate resourcing and support.6

One commonly expressed concern is that specialised services, because of the resources they require, may only reach a certain segment of the population, leaving some victims of family violence—especially those in regional and remote communities—no better off. This can lead to a degree of arbitrariness in which some victims receive better treatment than others.

Another concern relates to how specialists are selected. The attitudes and aptitudes of specialists are vital to ensuring consistent and quality outcomes for victims. Many models of specialisation, however, lack clarity about the selection criteria for specialised roles.7 For example, most specialised courts in Australia do not require judicial officers working in the courts to receive particular training as a prerequisite for appointment.

5 The Commissions emphasise below the importance of mainstreaming specialised practices. Further, in Ch 31, the Commissions note the importance of education and training (including cross-agency and intersectoral training) in promoting cultural and behavioural change in the system.

32.16 The recruitment and retention of staff is a common challenge for many specialised units working in the area of family violence. Due to the traumatising nature of the work, specialists can suffer ‘burnout’, unless adequate support and recognition is provided.

32.17 A related issue is the need to ensure appropriate incentives—including career progression opportunities—for specialists. For example, in 2006, the New South Wales (NSW) Ombudsman commented in relation to specialised police known as Domestic Violence Liaison Officers (DVLOs):

Unfortunately, there are still few, if any, incentives for police officers to act in the role, apart from the availability of regular daytime shifts. Conversely, the inability of DVLOs to work 12-hour shifts and have up to six consecutive rest days is one of the less appealing aspects of the role for many officers. There is no special allowance payable to DVLOs, and no recognised career path associated with the position. Partly for these reasons, there is little status attached to being a DVLO.

32.18 There is a need to ensure that adequate human and financial resources are available for specialists, and that there is a commitment to long-term resourcing. For example, the NSW Ombudsman noted that the effectiveness of DVLOs was being hampered by inadequate access to vehicles, computers and mobile phones.

32.19 The Commissions also recognise the particular challenge of ensuring that specialisation does not simply lead to parts of the system becoming so specialised as to operate in ‘silos’. As considered below, specialisation needs to be continually mainstreamed and promoted in the general system as best practice. This highlights the importance of inter-agency collaboration, information sharing, and consistent training and education for specialists and non-specialists alike.

32.20 In the following sections, the Commissions consider ways to maximise the benefits of specialised family violence courts and specialised police units, while addressing, as far as possible, the operational challenges.

Specialised family violence courts

32.21 Of particular interest to this Inquiry is the use of specialised courts. Since the 1990s, specialised courts have flourished in the form of drug courts, mental health courts, community courts and—most importantly, for the purposes of this Inquiry—family violence courts. In Australia, family violence courts now operate in NSW,

---

8 By way of contrast, under s 4H of the Magistrates' Court Act 1989 (Vic), the Family Violence Court Division (FVCD) is constituted only by magistrates gazetted by the Chief Magistrate. The Chief Magistrate is required to ‘have regard to the magistrate’s relevant knowledge and experience in dealing with matters relating to family violence’. Consultations reveal, however, that there has been some ‘dilution’ of the specialist training selection process over the life of the FVCD.
10 Ibid, 29.
11 See also Chs 29, 30, 31, in relation to inter-agency collaboration, information sharing, and education and training respectively.
32. Specialisation

Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia and the Australian Capital Territory (ACT).\textsuperscript{12} Such a court has also been recommended recently for Tasmania.\textsuperscript{13} In the US, where they originated, over 200 family violence courts now exist,\textsuperscript{14} and since 1999, the UK has rolled out over 120 Specialised Domestic Violence Courts (SDVCs).\textsuperscript{15} Canada has several well-established specialised family violence courts.\textsuperscript{16} Some have also been established in New Zealand.\textsuperscript{17}

Elements of specialised family violence courts

32.22 Specialised family violence courts differ significantly in their features and degree of specialisation. However, such courts will typically exhibit some, or all, of the following:

- Specialised personnel: These will include specialised judicial officers, but may also involve specialised prosecutors, lawyers, victim support workers, and community corrections officers. In some cases, these personnel may be chosen because of their specialised skills, or be given specialised training in family violence.

- Specialised procedures: These will include special days in court dedicated to family violence matters (‘dedicated lists’). They may also include ‘case coordination mechanisms’ to ‘identify link, and track cases related to family violence’, such as integrated case information systems, or the use of ‘specialised intake procedures’ (specialised procedures that apply when the victim first enters the court system).\textsuperscript{18}

- Emphasis on specialised support services: There will be someone, employed by the court or another organisation available to support family violence victims in managing the court process, and often these workers are responsible for referring victims to other services, such as counselling. There may also be specialised legal advice or representation available for both the victim and defendant.

\textsuperscript{12} An overview of these courts is set out below.
\textsuperscript{14} A national project on such courts in the US identified 208 courts with specialised dockets or dedicated judges at the end of 2009, although this was restricted to courts dealing with criminal cases: M Labriola and others, A National Portrait of Domestic Violence Courts (2009), Center for Court Innovation, ix. See D Shelton and E Donald, The Current State of Domestic Violence Courts in the United States, 2007 (2007); J Helling, Specialized Criminal Domestic Violence Courts (2005); S Kelitz, R Guerrero, AM Jones and DM Rubio, Specialization of Domestic Violence Case Management in the Courts: A National Survey (2001), prepared for the National Center for State Courts.
\textsuperscript{17} See New Zealand Family Violence Clearinghouse, Evaluating the Waitakere Family Violence Court (2007).
\textsuperscript{18} S Kelitz, R Guerrero, AM Jones and DM Rubio, Specialization of Domestic Violence Case Management in the Courts: A National Survey (2001), prepared for the National Center for State Courts, 5–6, describes case management in the US courts.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- Special arrangements for victim safety: Some courts will also include specially designed rooms and separate entrances to ensure the safety of victims, and may offer facilities which enable vulnerable witnesses to give evidence remotely.

- Offender Programs: Some courts have the capacity to order or refer an offender to a program which aims to educate the offender and address personal issues to prevent re-offending, usually through counselling.\(^{19}\) Some courts have offender support workers to engage and refer offenders to behavioural change programs.

- Problem solving or therapeutic approaches: Some courts adopt broader approaches aiming to ‘solve problems’ and achieve therapeutic outcomes.\(^{20}\)

The value of specialised family violence courts

32.23 The experiences of Australian and overseas jurisdictions provide some evidence of the value of specialised family violence courts in terms of improving the interaction in practice of legal frameworks relevant to this Inquiry. These benefits include:

- greater sensitivity to the context of family violence and the needs of victims through the specialised training and skills of staff;
- greater integration, coordination and efficiency in the management of cases through identification and clustering of cases into a dedicated list, case tracking, inter-agency collaboration, and the referral of victims and offenders to services;
- greater consistency in the handling of family violence cases both within and across legal jurisdictions;
- greater efficiency in court processes;
- development of best practice, through the improvement of procedural measures in response to regular feedback from court users and other agencies; and
- better outcomes in terms of victim satisfaction, improvement in the response of the legal system (for example, better rates of reporting, prosecution, convictions and sentencing in the criminal context), better victim safety, and—potentially—changes in offender behaviour.\(^{21}\)

---

International models

32.24 Overseas jurisdictions have adopted various models of specialised family violence courts. In the US, there are over 200 such courts in operation, more than half of which are in New York, Washington, Florida, California, and Alabama. Many of these, however, simply operate dedicated lists for matters relating to protection orders. Many others adopt the ‘criminal model’ of streaming all criminal matters related to family violence.

32.25 Perhaps the most notable example is the New York model, which includes both Domestic Violence Courts and Integrated Domestic Violence Courts (IDVCs). There are now 44 IDVCs in operation, servicing approximately 90% of the population of New York. While the Domestic Violence Courts deal with criminal matters relating to intimate partners, cases are transferred to the IDVCs where there are overlapping civil, criminal, or family law claims arising out of a family violence incident between intimate partners. In IDVCs, a single judge conducts all related criminal, civil and family law matters from beginning to end. As in other specialised courts, the cases are not consolidated, but rather remain separate civil, criminal, and family law matters. As a result, each case has its own burden of proof and is conducted as any other like case would be. A resource coordinator keeps judges informed of offender compliance and refers the defendant to appropriate services.

32.26 Another notable model is the Domestic Violence Unit in the District of Columbia, which includes a fully integrated court that handles civil, criminal, and family law matters in relation to disputes ‘where the parties are related by blood, legal custody, marriage, cohabitation, a child in common, or a romantic relationship’. The court hears protection order proceedings and all misdemeanour criminal charges and, once a case has been brought to it, any family law matters involving the same parties. These are consolidated and heard in the Domestic Violence Court. The court is serviced by two intake centres that serve as a ‘one stop shop’ for victim support, and a Domestic Violence Coordination Unit—a specialised section of the court registry.

---

22 S Moore, Two Decades of Specialized Domestic Violence Courts: A Review of the Literature (2009), Crime Prevention Branch, Attorney-General’s Department Center for Court Innovation, 2.
25 IDVCs have authority to hear a whole range of matters, including criminal domestic violence cases, protection order hearings, and all related family issues, including custody, visitation, and divorce: New York State Division of Criminal Justice Services, New York State Domestic Violence Courts Program Fact Sheet.
32.27 This court operates under federal legislation which requires related cases to be assigned for the duration of those proceedings to the same judge or magistrate, ‘[t]o the greatest extent practicable, feasible, and lawful’. The legislation also requires the provision of accessible materials, and an integrated computerised case management system. In addition, judges must certify to the chief judge that they will participate in the ongoing training programs.

32.28 Considerable research into the effectiveness of specialised family violence courts in the US has been conducted. The implications from this research have been stated as follows. Some, but not all, family violence courts are associated with reduced levels of reoffending. Family violence courts are associated with increased rates of conviction and decreased dismissal rates. Victims of family violence rate their satisfaction in specialised courts more highly. Victims of family violence who were aware that there was a family violence court, reported greater willingness to report repeat offending. Family violence courts are associated with more efficient case processing. Finally, family violence courts report higher levels of offender compliance.

32.29 In Canada, over 50 family violence courts are in operation. The first, and most studied, court was established in 1990 in Manitoba. The Manitoba court has specialised staff, special rooms and victim support services dealing with spousal abuse, child abuse and elder abuse. An evaluation of that court found a significant reduction in domestic homicide and recidivism, and earlier and more frequent reporting of violent offenders. The broadest program operates in Ontario, where there is a specialised family violence court in every jurisdiction. In Calgary, the specialised team includes probation officers, police, and court caseworkers. Caseworkers contact the victims shortly after the police lay charges and review each case, checking whether the victims’ wishes have changed, ensuring that victims are aware of the status of the case, as well as conducting risk assessments.\textsuperscript{37} As in the US, the exact models vary greatly between jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{38}

32.30 The UK has 141 family violence courts in operation.\textsuperscript{39} These deal only with criminal matters. While models vary, the UK has a National Resource Manual that lists 12 key components for successful SDVCs, including: a steering group; multi-agency risk assessment conferences; trained and specialised staff; court listing considerations; identification of family violence and data collection; victim and children support services; and a focus on equality and diversity.\textsuperscript{40}

32.31 The first 25 SDVCs were evaluated in 2007–08.\textsuperscript{41} The performance of individual SDVCs varied significantly, which obscured the success of some individual SDVCs.\textsuperscript{42} In more successful SDVCs, there was evidence of high arrests and more successful prosecutions; higher rates of victim support in court; and improved confidence in the criminal justice system by both victims and the community. The review concluded that omission of any of the core components led to less successful outcomes in one or more of the measures. The combination of the overall components was pivotal in delivering success.\textsuperscript{43}

32.32 In New Zealand, two specialised family violence courts have been established in Waitakere and Manukau. The features of these courts include: stakeholder meetings; dedicated lists; specialised staff; duty solicitors; victim advisors; and links with community services. While these courts deal primarily with criminal matters related to family violence, applications for protection orders (which, in the New Zealand legal system, are dealt with by the Family Court of New Zealand) can be made before the specialised criminal court. If those orders are consented to, the family violence court arranges for the application to be processed in the Family Court. If the order is not consented to, the application is referred to the Family Court. The process is facilitated by a ‘Family Court Coordinator’, who is jointly responsible with Victim Advisors for information sharing between the Family Court and the Family Violence Court.\textsuperscript{44} A \textsuperscript{37} See L Tutty, K McNichol and J Christensen, ‘Calgary’s HomeFront Specialized Domestic Violence Court’ What’s Law Got to Do With It? The Law, Specialized Courts and Domestic Violence in Canada (2008) 152.

\textsuperscript{40} Crime Reduction Centre Information Services Team, Specialist Domestic Violence Court Programme Resource Manual (revised ed, 2008).
\textsuperscript{41} Her Majesty’s Courts Services (UK), Home Office (UK) and Crown Prosecution Service (UK), Justice with Safety: Specialist Domestic Violence Courts Review 2007–08 (2008).
\textsuperscript{42} Ibid, 5.
\textsuperscript{43} Ibid, 6.
\textsuperscript{44} Ministry of Justice (NZ), Family Violence Courts National Operating Guidelines (2008).
2008 evaluation indicated that the courts have had some success, ‘in spite of considerable difficulties’, including lack of resources and training.\(^{45}\)

Existing specialised family violence courts in Australia

32.33 As noted above, in Australia there are family violence courts in NSW, Victoria, Queensland, Western Australia, South Australia, and the ACT. All these are part of the local or magistrates court in the relevant jurisdiction. Such a court has recently been recommended for Tasmania.\(^ {46}\) In most of these jurisdictions, the family violence court operates in only one or a couple of locations. In Western Australia, however, specialised family violence courts operate in six locations.\(^{47}\)

Jurisdiction and elements

32.34 One particularly important way in which specialised family violence courts in Australia differ is in the extent to which they exercise jurisdiction. As noted in Chapter 16, although all state and territory local or magistrates courts have broad jurisdiction over a range of matters—including criminal matters, family violence protection orders, and family law (to the extent that this is conferred)—the full extent of this jurisdiction is not necessarily exercised in specialised family violence courts.\(^ {48}\)

32.35 The extent to which jurisdiction is exercised depends largely on the practical and administrative arrangements of the court. For example, many local and magistrates courts in Australia operate a specialised list for protection orders, where matters are listed and heard on a particular day.\(^ {49}\) Family violence courts in NSW, Western Australia and the ACT follow the ‘criminal model’, in that these lists deal exclusively with criminal matters related to family violence. The South Australian specialised family violence court deals with both criminal matters and applications for protection orders.

32.36 In Australia, only the Family Violence Court Division (FVCD) of the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria exercises jurisdiction over protection orders; summary criminal proceedings; committals for indictable offences; civil personal injury claims; compensation and restitution; and (to the extent conferred upon the Magistrates’ Court) jurisdiction over family law and child support.\(^ {50}\) It can also sit as the Victims of Crime

---

\(^{47}\) These are courts in Jundaloo, Fremantle, Rockingham, Midland, Armadale, and Perth.

\(^{48}\) Local and magistrates courts generally have their own legislation, eg, Local Courts Act 2007 (NSW); Magistrates’ Court Act 1989 (Vic); Magistrates Courts Act 1921 (Qld); Magistrates Court Act 2004 (WA); Magistrates Court Act 1991 (SA); Magistrates Court Act 1987 (Tas); Magistrates Court Act 1930 (ACT); Magistrates Act 2009 (NT).

\(^{49}\) For example, in Victoria, each Magistrates’ Court runs a family violence list on one or more days of the week and internal protocols require the listings to be separate from criminal or other lists.

\(^{50}\) Magistrates’ Court Act 1989 (Vic) s 4I.
32. Specialisation

Assistance Tribunal to hear applications for statutory victims’ compensation in family violence cases.

32.37 The following table sets out the elements of each specialised family violence court in Australia. A brief description of the courts in each jurisdiction follows, including any independent evaluations of such courts.

---

52 This is based on published information about the courts available as at January 2010, and in some cases there is insufficient information to establish whether the court includes a particular element.
Table A: Specialised family violence courts in Australia

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Features</th>
<th>ACT</th>
<th>NSW</th>
<th>Qld</th>
<th>SA</th>
<th>VIC</th>
<th>WA</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Locations</td>
<td>Canberra</td>
<td>Campbelltown; Wagga</td>
<td>Rockhampton</td>
<td>Elizabeth; Port Adelaide</td>
<td>Ballarat; Heidelberg</td>
<td>Joondalup; Fremantle; Rockingham; Midland; Armadale; Perth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jurisdiction</td>
<td>Criminal matters pre-trial</td>
<td>Criminal matters pre-trial</td>
<td>Criminal matters</td>
<td>Criminal matters; protection orders</td>
<td>Criminal matters (with some trials) and protection orders</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Specialised personnel</td>
<td>Judicial officers; prosecutors; police</td>
<td>None specified</td>
<td>Prosecutors</td>
<td>Judicial officers</td>
<td>Judicial officers; police prosecutors; defendant lawyers</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Specialised training</td>
<td>Prosecutors and police</td>
<td>None specified</td>
<td>None specified</td>
<td>None specified</td>
<td>All</td>
<td>None specified</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victim support services</td>
<td>Dedicated list; case tracking; practice direction</td>
<td>Case tracking; practice direction</td>
<td>Dedicated list</td>
<td>Dedicated list</td>
<td>Dedicated list</td>
<td>Dedicated list; case management</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Special procedures</td>
<td>Witness assistant; Domestic Violence Crisis Service</td>
<td>Victim advocate; referrals to services</td>
<td>Victim support workers; referrals to services</td>
<td>Support workers for victim, defendant and children; counselling for children and victims’</td>
<td>Victim and defendant support workers; family violence outreach workers; referrals to services</td>
<td>Victim support worker; referrals services</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victim safety arrangements</td>
<td>None specified</td>
<td>‘Safe’ waiting rooms</td>
<td>Remodelling of facilities</td>
<td>None specified</td>
<td>Extra security officers; remote witness rooms</td>
<td>None specified</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Offender programs</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
32. Specialisation

Australian Capital Territory

32.38 The specialised family violence list in the ACT Magistrates Court is one component of the ACT’s integrated response, the Family Violence Intervention Program (FVIP). This deals with criminal charges related to family violence, which are managed pre-trial by a coordinating magistrate. The family violence list does not deal with protection orders. Matters tagged as family violence-related are heard weekly. A practice direction imposes tight time limits and requirements for earlier disclosure of evidence. The court has the benefit of specialised police officers and specialised family violence prosecutors. Victim support services include Police Victim Liaison Officers, a Witness Assistant, and the Domestic Violence Crisis Service, a victim support organisation. The court may refer those convicted of a family violence offence to a family violence offender intervention program run by ACT Corrective Services.

32.39 Independent evaluations of the FVIP indicate that the specialised court has led to earlier finalisation of cases through guilty pleas, with the majority of cases being finalised within 13 weeks. Earlier evaluations also recorded positive responses by the majority of victims to the court process.

New South Wales

32.40 In 2005, two family violence courts were piloted in Wagga Wagga and Campbelltown as part of the Domestic Violence Intervention Court Model (DVICM). These pilots were established by a Memorandum of Understanding between the NSW Attorney General’s Department, NSW Police, the Department of Community Services, the Department of Corrective Services, the Legal Aid Commission of NSW and the Department of Housing.

32.41 The DVICM program focused on improved evidence collection by the police, automated referrals to victim services, and increased information sharing and co-ordination from key agencies through Regional Reference Groups and Senior Officers Groups. The Local Courts implemented a Practice Note requiring early disclosure of evidence. Stakeholder agencies met weekly to update matters before the court. Magistrates could, if deemed appropriate as part of the sentence, place an offender on a perpetrator program run by the Probation and Parole Service in Wagga Wagga and Campbelltown.

---

53 The FVIP is also discussed in Ch 29.
54 Protection orders are dealt with by the Protection Unit of the Magistrates Court.
55 Magistrates Court of the Australian Capital Territory, Practice Direction No 2 of 2009.
56 The ACT ODDP has the longest established family violence prosecution team in the country.
57 The Domestic Violence Crisis Service offers court support, but it notes that it has been forced to reduce the availability of this service significantly, because of inadequate resources: Domestic Violence Crisis Service (ACT), Annual Report 2008 (2008), 45.
58 Urbis Keys Young, Evaluation of the ACT Family Violence Intervention Program Phase II (2001). Another evaluation was conducted in 2009 but has not yet been published.
59 Ibid.
60 Now known as Community Services.
61 Local Courts (NSW), Local Court Practice Note No. 1 of 2006.
An independent evaluation in 2008 indicated that the pilots did not have any significant impact on the finalisation of cases by early pleas, the withdrawal of prosecutions, the time for finalisation, or penalties. The most successful aspect of the pilot was increased access to victim support. While the DVICM has been made permanent in those locations, there are no plans to roll it out elsewhere in NSW. However, practice directions mandating strict time limits have been issued in other local courts.

The Commissions heard in consultation with the DVICM in Wagga that the pilots were achieving continued success in terms of improved victim safety and access to victim support services. It was noted that the structures and links of the DVICM had helped to foster relationships, understanding and confidence between individuals and organisations to the benefit of victims. A number of challenges were highlighted including: the need for more resources, training, high level co-ordination and information sharing.

Queensland

A pilot was developed from 2006 in Rockhampton Magistrates Court, under the leadership of the Chief Magistrate. The pilot included: a specialised police prosecutions team; a dedicated list; domestic violence support officers in court; improved information and referrals to service providers; changes to police procedure; greater communication and liaison through regular stakeholder meetings and co-ordination; and offender programs. While the pilot began without funding, the 2009–10 Queensland family violence strategy indicates that the specialised court program will form part of an integrated response being tested in Rockhampton.

South Australia

South Australia pioneered the first specialised family violence court in Australia at Elizabeth in 1999. Since then, specialised family violence courts have been added to the Adelaide and Port Adelaide Magistrates Court. Unlike the model used in NSW, Queensland and the ACT, these hear both criminal matters and protection order matters. Where both criminal and civil matters arise in a case, these are heard together. While the courts have specially assigned magistrates, there is no specialised training for judicial officers. The specialised family violence courts are monitored by a steering committee comprised of court staff, magistrates, prosecutors, policy officers, offender-treatment workers, and the Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia). 69

63 Ibid, 55.

32.46 The South Australian model also provides support workers for victims, offenders and children; and can refer offenders to offender programs (known as Violence Intervention Programs). 70

Victoria

32.47 In the period leading up to 2002, the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria established internal specialist family violence listing protocols, led by a supervising magistrate appointed by the Chief Magistrate. 71 These protocols, along with a family law and family violence steering committee of magistrates and registrars, helped establish better, more consistent family violence listing practices. The Children’s Court of Victoria was also represented on this Committee. All major magistrates’ courts in Victoria run a dedicated family violence list.

32.48 In 2005, the FVCD of the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria commenced sitting at Ballarat and Heidelberg. The Victorian Government committed $5.2 million over four years to the resourcing of the FVCD, with a separate allocation for the associated offender programs. 72 Funding has been continued for those two sites.

32.49 The FVCD differs from other Australian family violence courts in a number of ways. It is the only court that is expressly established by legislation. 73 It is also the only court that exercises jurisdiction over civil compensation claims, statutory compensation claims, and family law and child support matters as well as criminal matters and protection orders. 74 All judicial officers must be formally appointed to the court. 75 The same judicial officer hears related cases, but each case is heard using the applicable standard of proof and procedure. Judicial officers report satisfaction with managing these processes. 76

32.50 All selected judicial officers and staff received specialised and ongoing training. In addition to specialised magistrates and police prosecutors, the court also has support workers for victims and offenders, family violence outreach support workers, legal aid and community lawyers for victims and defendants, and a specialised registrar. The FVCD is therefore the closest example of a ‘one stop shop’ model for victims of family violence in Australia. As it is a pilot, however, access to the court is available only

---

69 Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
71 Anne Goldsbrough was the first supervising magistrate from 2002–2007.
73 Magistrates’ Court Act 1989 (Vic) s 4H.
74 Ibid s 4I.
75 Ibid s 7(1) provides that the ‘Governor in Council may appoint as many magistrates as are necessary for transacting the business of the Court.’
where victims or offenders are residing in, or the family violence was committed in, postcodes specified by a gazetted notice.

32.51 In addition, there are Specialist Family Violence Service courts operating in Melbourne, Frankston, Sunshine and Werribee. These courts exhibit similar features to the FVCD, with three exceptions: they do not exercise the same combined jurisdiction of the FVCD, specialising instead in hearing family violence protection orders; they do not have power to require a respondent to attend counselling; and they do not have support workers for respondents.

32.52 Victoria also established a Neighbourhood Justice Centre in 2007 as a pilot program. This is a multi-jurisdictional court focused on the neighbourhood of the City of Yarra, which sits as a Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court, Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal (VCAT) and Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal (VOCAT). Its jurisdiction in relation to family violence is the same as that of the FVCD. In addition, it has jurisdiction over guardianship and administration, residential tenancies (sitting as VCAT) and victims’ compensation claims (sitting as VOCAT). It is a ‘one stop shop’ for a range of services, including counselling, legal advice and representation, mediation, housing support, personal and material aid, and employment and training support. It also includes restorative justice processes.

32.53 The Neighbourhood Justice Centre has an on-site officer from the family law courts on some mornings. The officer can provide forms, contact details for referral agencies, advice on Family Court and Federal Magistrates Court processes, advice on what clients can expect in a court room, and confirms listing dates for matters already before the federal family courts.

Western Australia

32.54 Western Australia has developed the most geographically extensive program of specialised family violence courts in Australia, with courts in Joondalup, Fremantle, Rockingham, Midland, Armadale, and Perth. The plan is to roll out similar courts in all metropolitan areas of Western Australia.

32.55 After Victoria, the Western Australian model has the most features of a family violence court in Australia. While there are variations between the individual courts, in

---

77 Magistrates’ Court Act 1989 (Vic) s 4I(4).
78 While there is no legislative support for co-listing of cases in the Specialist Family Violence Service courts, this occurs in practice at the direction of judicial officers.
79 However, the Magistrates’ Court of Melbourne provides Family Violence Applicant Workers who are tasked with providing information, support and referrals to external service providers and community agencies to aggrieved family members and affected children at the court premises.
80 Department of Justice (Vic), Family Violence Court Division—Overview <www.justice.vic.gov.au> at 10 December 2009.
81 The Tribunal has original jurisdiction under Part 6 of the Guardianship and Administration Act 1986 (Vic).
82 Restorative justice processes are discussed in Ch 21.
83 Department of Justice (Vic), Family Violence Court Division—Overview <www.justice.vic.gov.au> at 10 December 2009.
84 Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, Court Intervention Programs, Consultation Paper (2008), 132–133.
general the courts can deal with criminal matters pre-trial, and have some capacity to deal with trials as well as protection orders. There are specialised magistrates and police prosecutors, support workers, a coordinating committee for strategy and policy, and inter-agency case management for operational matters. Offender programs are available and there is some monitoring of progress by judicial officers halfway through the program. There are customised programs for Indigenous persons and members of other cultural groups.

32.56 The Joondalup court was evaluated in 2000–01. The evaluation found that far more charges were laid as a result of a specialised police family violence investigation unit. Only slightly more offenders were referred to offender programs in the pilot court. More breaches of the requirements of the program were detected and recorded in the pilot court, which may have been the result of case management processes. Case management was seen to be beneficial, and overall the court was described as a ‘qualified success’.

Expanding specialised family violence courts in Australia

32.57 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the preliminary view that specialised family violence courts should be more widely established in Australia. There was significant support for this proposal in submissions and consultations, and the Commissions remain of the view that such courts are of value and should be more widely established in Australia. However, a variety of views was expressed on the minimum, desirable features of such courts and the range of matters they should consider.

Jurisdiction of specialised family violence courts

32.58 A preliminary question for the establishment of specialised family violence courts concerns the range of matters that such courts should consider. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory governments should ensure that specialised family violence courts determine matters relating to 85 In 39% of cases as compared to 7.1% in non-specialised districts: Ibid, 131.

---

86 Ibid.
87 Consultation Paper, [20.102].
protection orders and criminal proceedings related to family violence.\textsuperscript{89} It was further proposed that state and territory governments should review whether specialised family violence courts should also be responsible for handling related claims for civil and statutory compensation, child support and family law matters, to the extent such jurisdiction is conferred in the state and territory.\textsuperscript{90} This position closely mirrors the model in the Victorian FVCD.

32.59 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions did not propose that specialised family violence courts should be asked to exercise jurisdiction in relation to child protection matters. The Commissions noted that in all states and territories there are specialised children’s courts that have jurisdiction related to the care and protection of children and young people, and also criminal cases involving young people. In the Tasmania, the ACT and the Northern Territory, the Children’s Court is presided over by a magistrate. In NSW, Victoria, Queensland, Western Australia and South Australia, the head of the court is a specialist judge of the District Court.\textsuperscript{91} Most states have specialist children’s courts operating in capital cities. Outside these areas, the local magistrate can convene a children’s court when necessary.\textsuperscript{92}

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

32.60 There was strong support for the proposal that specialised courts should determine matters relating to family violence protection orders and criminal proceedings related to family violence.\textsuperscript{93} For example, the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse submitted that:

\begin{quote}
Where they do not embrace a multi-jurisdictional capacity, specialist courts do not address the secondary victimisation which victims experience when required to present evidence in multiple court proceedings. The value of specialised courts is predicated on the extent to which they address victim needs and enhance safety of victims, so where they do not address this, they are less effective … It is the ‘one court, one family’ capacity of the Victorian model that ensures it is exemplary in the Australian context. The value of state and territory courts using their 68R Family Law Act power is also noted as facilitative of jurisdictional capacity in this regard.\textsuperscript{94}
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{89} Consultation Paper, Proposal 20-2.
\textsuperscript{90} Ibid, Proposal 20-5.
\textsuperscript{91} C Cunneen, ‘Young People and Juvenile Justice’ in G Monahan and L Young (eds), \textit{Children and the Law in Australia} (2008) 187, [9.11]. The Chief Children’s Court Magistrate in NSW is now a District Court judge, as reflected in the text above.
\textsuperscript{92} Ibid, [9.11].
\textsuperscript{94} Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, \textit{Submission FV 216}, 30 June 2010;
32. Specialisation

32.61 Consultations with one of the magistrates at the Ballarat FVCD in Victoria also indicated that the ‘one stop shop’ model was beneficial for victims, who had the advantage of familiarity with the court throughout related proceedings. Other submissions highlighted that specialisation would diminish inconsistencies in the interpretation and implementation of legislation between different magistrates.

32.62 However, a number of submissions raised concerns about the challenges and practicability of allowing specialised family violence courts to exercise jurisdiction in relation to a wide range of matters. The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service queried whether the FVCD is appropriately situated to attend to other matters such as compensation ... This may decrease the effectiveness of the specialist court such as the Division by: diminishing the acute specialisation in family violence expertise; clouding family violence issues in consideration of other complex matters simultaneously; and diluting the identity and purpose of the Division when changing hats between concerns oriented towards the victim, the perpetrator and the best interest of the child.

32.63 Similarly, the Women’s Legal Service NSW submitted that such a proposal ‘would need careful consideration, as different functions are being carried out, for example, criminal jurisdiction, civil jurisdiction for compensation and federal family law jurisdiction’.

32.64 The Children’s Court of NSW did not support sharing its specialist jurisdiction with a specialised family violence court:

To direct criminal cases involving juveniles and the care and protection cases away from specialist Children’s courts on the basis that a particular case involves issues of domestic violence, would clearly not be the optimum use of the accumulated knowledge and expertise of a specialist Children’s Court ... The Children’s Court is of the view that instead of conferring part of the court’s criminal and care and protection jurisdictions on a specialist domestic violence court, the jurisdiction of the Children’s Court should in certain areas be expanded.

32.65 The Court noted that this may require parties to attend both the Children’s Court and the proposed specialised family violence court. However, this could be managed by:

the provision of community-based support persons to accompany a party to the separate courts and to offer them assistance and support along the whole legal journey. Alternatively, a centralised support service could be established to which referrals could be made by all courts dealing with family violence issues, and the role of which would be to provide assistance, information and support to all the parties.

97 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.
98 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010, 49.
99 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010, 76.
100 Children’s Court of New South Wales, Submission FV 237, 22 July 2010.
101 Ibid.
Commissions’ views

32.66 As noted above, all state and territory local or magistrates courts have broad jurisdiction over a range of matters—including criminal matters, protection orders, and family law (to the extent that this is conferred)—although the full extent of this jurisdiction is not necessarily exercised.\(^{102}\)

32.67 In Chapter 16, the Commissions set out a framework for reform of the jurisdictions of courts that deal with issues of family violence to address the gaps arising as a result of the interaction between different legal systems. The local or magistrates court is the first port of call for many victims of family violence and their families. The Commissions consider that state and territory magistrates courts should be in a position to address, at least on an interim basis, the range of issues that commonly arise in family violence matters. A system in which one court is able to deal with most legal issues—and where it cannot, is able to facilitate the transfer of the matter to another court—will go some way towards reducing the impact of inconsistencies between the legal systems, and better ensure the protection and safety of victims of family violence. The Commissions consider that these benefits are best leveraged in a specialised family violence court.

32.68 In relation to the exercise of family law jurisdiction, state and territory magistrates courts have no power when making or varying a protection order, to make a parenting order.\(^{103}\) The Commissions recommend that, when making or varying a protection order, state and territory courts should also be able to make parenting orders ‘until further order’.\(^{104}\) The exercise of this power would mean that magistrates can deal proactively with family law issues, such as when a parent can spend time with a child, which may otherwise exacerbate a situation involving family violence.

32.69 The Commissions also recommend that state and territory magistrates courts should be required to consider using s 68R of the Family Law Act to amend inconsistent parenting orders to protect victims of family violence. This alleviates the need for a victim of violence to go to a federal family court to seek an amendment to the parenting order as well as a state or territory magistrates court to seek a protection order, and ensures that the issue is considered by judicial officers.\(^{105}\)

32.70 The Commissions received little by way of substantive submissions on whether specialised family violence courts should also consider related claims for civil and statutory compensation, and child support matters, but note the concerns expressed by some stakeholders in relation to asking specialist courts to exercise a wide range of divergent jurisdictions. The Commissions make no recommendations in relation to this

---

102 The reasons why the full extent of jurisdiction is not always exercised—for example, the culture in state and territory magistrates courts of deferring to federal family courts rather than exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)—is discussed in Ch 16.

103 As noted in Ch 16, before 2006, s 68R of the Family Law Act permitted state and territory courts, when making or varying a protection order, to make a parenting order, in addition to their ability to revive, vary, suspend or discharge a parenting order. This aspect of s 68R was repealed by the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parenting) Act 2006 (Cth).

104 Rec 16–3.

105 Rec 16–1.
issue, but note the current review of the FVCD of the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria may provide further feedback.105 State and territory governments may wish to review this matter in establishing or expanding specialised family violence courts, in light of the results of the Victorian review.

32.71 In relation to child protection matters, the Commissions are mindful that such issues are already dealt with in specialised children’s courts in all states and territories. In Chapter 20 the Commissions make recommendations for the expansion of the jurisdiction of state and territory children’s courts to be able to make protection orders.106 In the Commissions’ views, this will help to reduce the gaps in protection and enable families to have a number of issues promptly resolved.

32.72 A further option would be to expand the jurisdiction of specialised family violence courts to enable them to consider child protection matters. The Commissions do not have sufficient information or feedback to make a recommendation on this issue. As noted above, in Chapter 16 the Commissions recommend that state and territory courts making family violence protection orders should be able to make parenting orders “until further order”.108 The Commissions note that allowing specialised family violence courts to make interim child protection orders, until the matter can be considered by a children’s court, may yield similar benefits for victims and their families.

32.73 The Commissions agree with the NSW Children’s Court that specialised family violence courts and children’s courts should establish appropriate referral arrangements and support mechanisms to help victims navigate between the two courts. The role of a dedicated liaison officer appears to be desirable in this regard. The Commissions also emphasise the importance of information sharing arrangements between the courts. For example, the Commissions recommend in Chapter 30 that both family violence protection orders and child protection orders are included in the national database, to ensure that all courts are aware of existing orders made in relation to a particular family.109

Recommendation 32–1  State and territory governments, in consultation with relevant stakeholders, should establish or further develop specialised family violence courts within existing courts in their jurisdictions.

Recommendation 32–2  State and territory governments should ensure that specialised family violence courts are able to exercise powers to determine: family violence protection matters; criminal matters related to family violence; and family law matters to the extent that family law jurisdiction is conferred on state and territory courts.

---

106  This review was not publicly available at the time of writing.
107  Rec 19–4.
108  Rec 16–3.
109  Rec 30–18.
Elements of specialised family violence courts

32.74 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that family violence courts should include a minimum set of features.\footnote{Consultation Paper, Proposal 20–4.} The Commissions did not include specialised prosecutors in the proposed list, as it did not have sufficient information upon which to base a proposal.\footnote{Ibid, [20.38].} The Commissions noted, however, that there may be significant value in specialised prosecutors dealing with family violence issues, including cases of sexual assault.

32.75 For example, the ACT Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ODPP) has for several years had specialised family violence prosecutors assisted by three witness assistants as part of the FVIP.\footnote{The FVIP is discussed in Ch 31. In 2009–2010, the ODPP intend to establish a specialist unit for sexual offences as well: Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT), Annual Report 2008–09, 16.} The ODPP states that:

> Having specialist prosecutors allows for a consistency of approach and for continuity for victims. Specialisation also enhances the relationships with other essential agencies—the police, the Office of Children and Youth and Family Support, the Domestic Violence Crisis Service and Victims Support ACT.\footnote{Ibid, 15.}

32.76 Victoria has established a Specialist Sexual Offence Unit in the Office of Public Prosecutions (OPP), including a regional office in Geelong. The OPP reports that:

> The work of the OPP’s Specialist Sexual Offences Unit … has proven that the co-location of specialist prosecutors and solicitors under the leadership of an experienced Crown Prosecutor can produce significant improvements in the handling of such sensitive and traumatic prosecutions.\footnote{Office of Public Prosecutions and Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), Annual Report 2008–2009, 7. The Victorian OPP also has legal prosecution specialists in other areas, such as organised crime: 17.}

32.77 In the US, specialised family violence prosecutors are more common. The National Institute of Justice has helpfully summarised the research available in the US on the effectiveness of specialised prosecutors. It notes that the research is limited and because of the variation of programs and their co-existence with specialised courts in many cases, it is ‘difficult to pinpoint what works and what does not’.\footnote{A Klein, Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges (2009), National Institute of Justice, Ch 6.} However, ‘in general, the research suggests that these programs work well on a number of levels’.\footnote{Ibid.} There is evidence of increased victim satisfaction; significant increases in prosecution and conviction rates; and more robust outcomes that are better monitored and enforced.\footnote{Ibid.}

32.78 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that specialised family violence courts should, as a minimum, include the following features:

- especially selected judicial officers; specialised and ongoing training on family violence issues for judicial officers, prosecutors, registrars and police;\textsuperscript{118}

- victim support workers;
- arrangements for victim safety; and
- mechanisms for collaboration with other court agencies and non-government organisations.\textsuperscript{119}

32.79 The Commissions also proposed that state and territory governments should, to the extent feasible, make victim support workers and lawyers available at family violence related court proceedings.\textsuperscript{120}

Submissions and consultations

32.80 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria noted in relation to the proposed list of minimum features that:

the experience of the court … in relation to the Family Violence Court Division and Family Violence Specialists Services is that the features identified in this proposal, to the extent that they exist, have worked very effectively in improving all aspects of the courts’ processes.\textsuperscript{121}

32.81 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse supported the proposal on the proviso that such courts have a range of response strategies and support strategies available to them … These supports would include free legal representation as well as victim support services, including access to family law advice and representation in relation to parenting matters …

They need to have support and oversight of a leading judicial officer to ensure consistency between courts and provide advice and support to judicial officers. In addition, judicial officers need to be trained and gazetted.\textsuperscript{122}

32.82 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria also submitted that ‘an essential part of the model is legal representation for victims and offenders and a support worker for offenders’.\textsuperscript{123} Deputy Chief Magistrate Cannon of the South Australian Magistrates Court, submitted that in his view, ‘providing victim support is the single most useful thing that can empower victims, followed by a special list that ensures that they are dealt with respectfully and consistently’.\textsuperscript{124}

32.83 A number of submissions expressed support for the proposal that state and territory governments should, to the extent feasible, make available lawyers at family \textsuperscript{118} Specialised police are discussed separately, below.

\textsuperscript{119} Consultation Paper, Proposal 20–4. Collaboration between courts, non-government organisations and other agencies is discussed in Ch 29.
\textsuperscript{120} Consultation Paper, Proposal 19-2. These issues are dealt with in Ch 29.
\textsuperscript{121} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{122} Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{123} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{124} A Cannon, Submission FV 137, 23 June 2010.
violence related court proceedings. Domestic Violence Victoria and others, in a joint submission noted:

Given the often complex family law issues that can arise out of protection order proceedings, it is essential for victims to have access to legal advice and representation at their first mention date through duty lawyer services. These services not only provide legal advice and assistance around the protection order proceedings, but also connect the client to legal assistance for family law matters.

32.84 A number of submissions expressed the view that it was also important to ensure adequate legal advice and representation for defendants. Other submissions stressed the importance of adequate funding for duty lawyers, through Legal Aid or Community Legal Centres.

32.85 A number of submissions pointed to the value of specialised prosecutors as a minimum and desirable feature of specialised courts. The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW submitted that:

127 The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service, Submission FV 132, 22 June 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service, Submission FV 132, 22 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010.

128 Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Specialised family violence courts which include specially selected judges and specialised prosecutors and other agencies represent best practice and must be considered desirable if these matters are to be dealt with expeditiously, sensitively and professionally.130

32.86 Similarly, the Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian submitted that specialised prosecutors share a common understanding with specialist magistrates, police and victim support workers.131 They play a specific role in—among other things—prosecuting offences at a high level, preparing briefs of evidence, ensuring appropriate charges have been laid, and encourage victim participation and attendance at court.132

32.87 Submissions also highlighted a number of challenges facing specialised courts, including the need for adequate resourcing, and accessibility for those in regional and remote communities.133 The Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence and Advocacy Service submitted that:

considering the resources required—the establishment of nation-wide specialised domestic and family violence courts is not currently an immediate or feasible option and that—at far less cost—existing courts could be immediately developed to deal with domestic violence related protection orders, associated criminal charges, family law matters and child protection matters.134

Commissions’ views

32.88 In the Commissions’ view, specialised family violence courts with certain minimum core features, including specialised prosecutors, would enhance the efficacy and effectiveness of the courts in dealing with family violence. The Commissions’ recommendations envisage, where possible, the creation of specialised family violence courts—being divisions, programs, lists or a specialised court room—within existing state and territory local and magistrates courts with a number of essential support features. The Commissions are not recommending the establishment of a separate stand alone court.

32.89 First, all judicial officers in a family violence court should be especially selected for their roles. The attitude, knowledge and skills of judicial officers are critical to the success of such a court, and it is important that selection be based on such criteria. As noted above, the adoption of specialised lists and specialised practices may attract judicial officers who have experience, and are interested in working in family violence. This is an important step in building a leadership cohort, who can drive reform and promote attitudinal change within the system.

---

132 This was also highlighted in Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service, Submission FV 132, 22 June 2010.

32.90 Secondly, there was strong support for the role of specialised prosecutors as an essential feature of specialised family violence courts. The Commissions agree with the majority of submissions that specialised prosecutors—working in cooperation with magistrates, police and victim support workers—can play an important role in achieving consistent and quality outcomes for victims of family violence.

32.91 Thirdly, the Commissions are of the view that the provision of specialised, free and timely legal advice and representation would enhance the effectiveness of specialised family violence courts. In Chapter 29, the Commissions recommend that federal, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of and access to legal services, for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups.

32.92 Fourthly, specialised and ongoing training on family violence issues is critical to ensuring a shared understanding of family violence within the court. Ideally, this training should be provided to all staff, as was done with the Victorian FVCD. At a minimum, training should be provided to the following key participants: judicial officers, prosecutors, lawyers and registrars.

32.93 Fifthly, victim support workers play a key role in ensuring the success of such courts. Such workers may be employed directly by the court or a community organisation may be funded to provide the service. In Chapter 29, the Commissions recommend that federal, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of, and access to, culturally appropriate victim support services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups.

32.94 Finally, family violence courts should also have special arrangements for victim safety at court, such as separate waiting rooms for victims, separate entrances and exits, remote witness facilities and appropriately trained security staff. The provision of interpreters is also essential.

32.95 The Commissions are also of the view that specialised family violence courts should have arrangements in place to liaise with, and cooperate with, other relevant agencies. Integrated responses to family violence are discussed in Chapter 29.

32.96 The Commissions acknowledge the establishment or further development of specialised family violence courts will be dependent on mechanisms such as funding. programs of action, policy and operational support from inter-agency committees, and political support across those departments affected. The Commissions refer to the relative success achieved by the cross-government approach in Victoria as an illustrative model. The cost of establishing or further developing specialised family violence courts needs to be considered in light of the cost of family violence to the Australian community.138

Offender programs

32.97 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the view that offender programs are resource-intensive and, to date, the evidence of their effectiveness is equivocal.139 A number of submissions suggested that offender programs are largely ineffective in reducing violence, especially when the offender does not attend voluntarily.140 The Commissions also received a number of submissions in favour of offender programs where such programs are specifically designed to address family violence.141

32.98 The Commissions are aware that offender programs currently exist in all Australian jurisdictions. The Commissions note, and endorse, the Australian Government’s response to Time for Action, which proposes to invest $3 million in research on offender treatment programs in consultation with the states and territories and experts in the treatment field.142 The Commissions are of the view that the place of offender programs as an essential feature of specialised family violence courts should be reconsidered in light of the proposed research.

Recommendation 32–3 State and territory governments should ensure that specialised family violence courts have, as a minimum:

(a) specialised judicial officers and prosecutors;
(b) regular training on family violence issues for judicial officers, prosecutors, lawyers and registrars;
(c) victim support, including legal and non-legal services; and
(d) arrangements for victim safety.

---

138 See Ch 1.
139 Consultation Paper, [20.129]–[20.139].
Mainstreaming specialised practices

32.99 As noted above, many stakeholders expressed the view that the establishment of specialised family violence courts in regional and remote communities is not feasible or practical. While the Commissions agree that this is the case, the issue is whether the benefits of specialisation can be mainstreamed into other courts. For example, the Commissions note that many of the specialised practices in the FVCD have been applied to the Specialised Family Violence Services courts. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory governments should review whether, and to what extent, the following features have been adopted in the courts in their jurisdiction dealing with family violence, with a view to adopting them:

- identifying, and listing on the same day, protection order matters and criminal proceedings related to family violence, as well as related family law and child protection matters;
- providing victim and defendant support, including legal advice, on family violence list days;
- assigning selected and trained judicial officers to work on cases related to family violence;
- adopting practice directions for family violence cases;
- ensuring that facilities and practices secure victim safety at court; and
- establishing a forum for and feedback from, and discussion with, other agencies and non-government organisations.¹⁴³

32.100 A large number of submissions supported this proposal.¹⁴⁴ For example, the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse stated that ‘in the absence of a specialist court these would be beneficial measures’.¹⁴⁵ The Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network submitted that:

¹⁴⁵ Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
We believe that listing related matters on the same day will lead to effectiveness and efficiency in outcomes for victims, limit conflicts occurring between protection orders and family violence or family court proceedings, be cost effective and ensure that all parties aren’t required to attend court on numerous occasions for separate matters.

We also believe there needs to be some system for ensuring that in rural and remote regional areas, victims are not unnecessarily disadvantaged by family law court proceedings in terms of access to support services.\(^{146}\)

Commissions’ views

32.101 Given the broad support for this proposal, the Commissions are of the view that, where possible, the measures proposed should be adopted in other courts dealing with family violence as best practice, especially in regional and remote communities.

32.102 It would appear efficient for proceedings relating to family violence protection orders, criminal proceedings related to family violence, and child protection to be listed on the same day, or a part of a day, as the caseload permits. Child protection issues can be included because, as noted above, in many rural and remote communities, the local magistrate can convene a children’s court when necessary. This capacity may be more restricted in metropolitan courts where matters are considered by separately constituted children’s courts. If such listing practices are adopted, this will help to facilitate the presence of support workers and legal services for victims and defendants.

32.103 The Commissions recognise the practical difficulties in assigning selected and trained judicial officers to work on cases related to family violence, given the wide range of matters considered by magistrates in regional and remote communities. As such, the Commissions consider that, where possible, judicial officers should receive ongoing training in relation to family violence. In Chapter 31, the Commissions note the importance of judicial officers understanding the nature and dynamics of family violence. The Commissions recommended Australian, state and territory governments and educational, professional and service delivery bodies should ensure regular and consistent education and training for participants in the family law, family violence and child protection systems, in relation to the nature and dynamics of family violence, including its impact on victims, in particular those from high risk and vulnerable groups.\(^{147}\) As a complement to education and training, the Commissions also recommend the development of a national bench book in relation to family violence, including sexual assault.\(^{148}\) This is likely to improve consistency in decision making and improve the court experience for victims. The Commissions consider that where the caseload and available resources justify it, specialised police and prosecutors could also be assigned.

32.104 Finally, the Commissions consider that courts generally should review existing court practices with a view to improving victim safety at court. For example, the use of separate exits and entrances, separate waiting rooms for victims, and escorts

---

147 Rec 31–1.
148 Rec 31–2.
to and from the courtroom may be ways of improving safety. While modification of facilities may require resources, a review of existing facilities may well identify simple and cost-efficient strategies to achieve these results, including reduced security staff costs and reduced incidents.

Recommendation 32–4 State and territory governments should, where possible, promote the following measures in all courts dealing with family violence matters, including courts in regional and remote communities:

(a) identifying and listing on the same day, protection order matters and criminal proceedings related to family violence, as well as related family law and child protection matters;

(b) training judicial officers in relation to family violence;

(c) providing legal services for victims and defendants;

(d) providing victim support on family violence list days; and

(e) ensuring that facilities and practices secure victim safety at court.

Specialised police

32.105 Police play an important role in responding to, intervening in, and preventing family violence, and are the first point of contact for many victims. Police are responsible for recording incidents, interviewing victims and collecting evidence to support charges and—as discussed in Chapter 9—applying for protection orders in the civil system. It is well recognised that initial positive police response is vital not only to victim safety, but also to whether victims report any further victimisation, or seek engagement with the legal system more generally.149

The roles and advantages of specialised police

32.106 While there are wide variations in the roles and functions of specialised police units, these typically include:

- conducting investigations and collecting evidence;
- developing police strategies and policies concerning family violence;
- developing and participating on inter-agency networks, and coordination and liaison with relevant government and non-government agencies;
- training, education and research on family violence issues;
- providing advice and guidance to other police officers on family violence issues;

---

supervising, monitoring or providing quality assurance in relation to police responses to family violence incidents;

• liaising with courts and prosecutors; and

• providing information and support to victims.

32.107 There is little empirical research available on the effectiveness of specialised police in the family violence context in Australia. In the US, 11% of police departments have specialised family violence units. Research there indicates that specialised units which emphasise repeated victim contact and evidence gathering have been shown to significantly increase the likelihood of prosecution, conviction and sentencing. Specialised domestic violence units are generally associated with more extensive inquiries by police department call takers ... Domestic violence units are also more likely to amass evidence to turn over to prosecutors.150

32.108 Further, the research indicated that specialised responses are associated with victims leaving abusive relationships earlier; reporting repeated incidents more frequently; and being more likely to secure protection orders.151 There is some evidence that they also reduce violence.152

Specialised police in Australia

32.109 In most jurisdictions in Australia, there are specialised police units in the areas of family violence, sexual assault and child protection. The following table sets out the nature of the specialised police roles in each jurisdiction.153

---

150 A. Klein, Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges (2009), National Institute of Justice, Ch 5, section 2.
151 Ibid, Ch 5, section 3.
152 Ibid, Ch 5, section 4.
153 This information is based on the descriptions of roles given in published information, generally from police websites, and may not capture all the activities and functions undertaken by specialised police. Certain functions, such as victim support and liaison with the legal system, may be carried out by different actors in the jurisdictions.
Table: Specialised police in Australia

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Function</th>
<th>ACT</th>
<th>NT</th>
<th>NSW</th>
<th>Qld</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Statewide Unit</td>
<td>Family Violence Program Manager; Family Violence Project Officer; Victim Liaison Officers</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>The Domestic and Family Violence Team – Policy and Programs, Field Operations</td>
<td>State Domestic Violence Coordinator</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Regional Units</td>
<td>Specialist Sexual Assault and Child Abuse Team</td>
<td>Domestic and Personal Violence Protection Units; Child Abuse Teams</td>
<td>Regional Domestic Violence Sponsors and Coordinators</td>
<td>Regional Domestic Violence Coordinators; District DVLOs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local Units</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>DVLOs</td>
<td>Station DVLOs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Strategy and Policy</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Yes (District DVLOs); Yes (Station DVLOs)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Coordination and Liaison with agencies</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes (District DVLOs)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Training</td>
<td>Yes (for all police)</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes (District DVLOs)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Function</th>
<th>SA</th>
<th>Tas</th>
<th>Vic</th>
<th>WA</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Statewide Unit</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Family Violence Unit</td>
<td>Family Violence State Coordination Unit</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Regional Units</td>
<td>Sexual Crimes Investigations Branch</td>
<td>Victim Safety Response Teams</td>
<td>Family Violence Advisers</td>
<td>Family Protection Coordinator; Child Abuse Squads</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local Units</td>
<td>Family Violence Investigation Sections; Child and Family Intervention Officers</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Family Violence Liaison Officers; Child Abuse Investigations Teams</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Strategy and Policy</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Coordination and Liaison with agencies</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Yes (Family Violence Advisers)</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Training</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>Not specified</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

32.110 There are wide variations in the structure and functions of specialised police units in Australia. In jurisdictions such as South Australia and the Northern Territory, the role of DVLOs appears primarily to be as a point of contact for victims. In Tasmania, the Victim Safety Response Teams (VSRTs) also have other responsibilities, including providing case coordination, attending integrated case coordination meetings, assessing applications to vary police family violence orders, and conducting safety audits and preparing safety plans.\textsuperscript{154} The VSRTs form part of the integrated response to family violence in Tasmania under the ‘Safe at Home’ program.\textsuperscript{155}

32.111 There also appears to be an impetus in other jurisdictions towards models integrating specialised police units—especially in sexual assault and child protection—with other government agencies and victim support organisations.\textsuperscript{156} Particular focus is given in these units to more effective investigations and comprehensive victim support in collaboration with other agencies.

32.112 In Victoria, two Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigative Teams (SOCITs) have been established within two pilot Multidisciplinary Centres located in Frankston and Mildura.\textsuperscript{157} The SOCITs are co–located with sexual assault units, child protection and victim support organisations. SOCIT members are specially trained detectives who are able to investigate matters, take victim statements and collect and prepare briefs of evidence. There are currently five SOCIT units in Victoria, with more units in transition as part of an expansion by Victorian police.\textsuperscript{158}

32.113 SOCIT members are required to take a four week course covering video and audio recorded evidence, sexual assault investigation and victim management.\textsuperscript{159} Members also have access to specialist training in interviewing suspects and victims, in particular in the context in which sexual assault occurs.\textsuperscript{160}

32.114 NSW Police have established the Child Wellbeing Unit (CWU), which commenced operation in January 2010.\textsuperscript{161} The role of the CWU is to help police officers identify whether or not a child is at risk of harm and needs to be referred to Community Services (NSW). If not, the CWU advises police on how to help children and their families gain access to the services that they need.\textsuperscript{162}

32.115 In the Northern Territory, the Child Abuse Taskforce, established in 2005-06, is made up of Northern Territory Police, Family and Community Services, and Australian Federal Police officers. The Northern Territory Police handle serious and complex cases of maltreatment, and AFP handles incidents in Indigenous and remote communities.

\textsuperscript{155} The Safe at Home program is discussed in Ch 29.
\textsuperscript{156} For a discussion of integrated responses, see Ch 29.
\textsuperscript{157} The MDCs were established in April 2007, as part of joint initiatives between Victoria Police and the relevant Centres Against Sexual Assault.
\textsuperscript{158} Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{159} This training is provided at the Centre for Investigative Training, through the Detective Training Course.
\textsuperscript{160} Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{162} Ibid.
32.116 In the ACT, the Sexual Assault and Child Abuse Team (SACAT) is responsible for the criminal investigation of serious offences including allegations of sexual or physical assault of children. The team plays a major role in collecting evidence of suspected criminal activity, and placing matters before the courts where sufficient evidence exists. SACAT provides ‘a fully integrated environment for victims of sexual offences’, facilitating interviews, forensic examinations and the provision of support for victims.

32.117 SACAT also retains a Sexual Assault Victim Liaison Officer, whose role is intended to improve the experience of victims in the criminal justice system. This role includes keeping victims informed of the progress of the investigation and any criminal proceedings and responding to their concerns about interactions with police and the criminal justice system.

32.118 The push for a more coordinated, national police response to family violence is recognised in the Australasian Policing Strategy on the Prevention and Reduction of Family Violence, released in November 2008. This strategy includes principles and objectives, as well as a program for action. Relevantly, measures in this program include an audit of training and a review of workforce development; audits of research and the development of an Australasian knowledge base of best practice across jurisdictions; and audits of current legal and policy responses, including confirming the role of specialised responses.

Submissions and consultations

32.119 The Consultation Paper proposed that each state and territory police force should ensure that:

- victims have access to a primary contact person within the police who specialises, and is trained, in family violence issues;
- a police officer is designated as a primary point of contact for government and non-government agencies involved in responding to family violence;
- specially trained police have responsibility for supervising, monitoring, or assuring the quality of police responses and providing training and advice to operational police; and
- there is a central forum or unit responsible for policy and strategy concerning family violence within the police.

163 See Memorandum of Understanding between ACT Policing (Adult Sexual Assault Team and Child Abuse Team), ACT Department of Disability, Housing and Community Services, the Office for Children, Youth and Family Support and Care and Protection Services and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Services.

165 Ibid, 17.

167 Consultation Paper, Proposal 20–1.
32.120 This proposal received broad support. The Commissioner for Victim’s Rights (South Australia) submitted that ‘having dedicated victim liaison officers has proven integral to the police assisting victims to exercise their rights and to access victim assistance’. The Canberra Rape Crisis Centre submitted that the ‘ACT experience of the SACAT is exemplary’, with victims reporting they are supported and believed regardless of whether charges are laid or the prosecution proceeds. Other submissions noted that specialised police were often empathetic, committed and took a personal interest in matters, helping to engender confidence in victims and the public alike. The Commissions heard similar views expressed in consultations.

32.121 In response to the question in the Consultation Paper on the challenges facing police specialising in family violence and sexual assault matters, two key themes emerged.

32.122 First, the majority of submissions emphasised the importance of comprehensive education and training for specialised police, covering the nature and dynamics of family violence. In relation to sexual assault units, submissions argued for development of skills and systems to attend sexual assault incidents, providing information to victims and gathering forensic evidence. Education and training were viewed as particularly important in regional and remote communities, where police are required to be multi-skilled and equipped with a broad knowledge base. A number of submissions expressed the view that there was a need for similar levels of training for... general duties police dealing with family violence to ensure consistency of response in the absence of specialised police.\textsuperscript{178}

32.123 Secondly, many submissions argued that the sustainability—in particular reducing high staff turnover—and success of specialised police units required ongoing resourcing, support and high level leadership within the police organisations.\textsuperscript{179} In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others highlighted that in relation to Family Violence Liaison Officers there was ‘a high turnover through normal rotation of portfolios’, exacerbated by ‘insufficient opportunity for training and professional development in these roles’.\textsuperscript{180} Similar views were expressed that DVLOs in NSW ‘have not been well supported by their own colleagues and the role of the DVLO is not considered prestigious within the NSW Police Force’.\textsuperscript{181} The Commissions heard similar views expressed in consultations with the Tasmanian Victim Safety Response Teams, including that the training provided was insufficient and work schedules differed in the unit.\textsuperscript{182}

Commissions’ views

32.124 Although there is little information or research available on the role and value of specialised police units in Australia, a significant number of stakeholders reported positive experiences with such units. The Commissions have formed the view that there is substantial merit in the use of specialised police in family violence, sexual assault and child protection matters. Liaison officers provide an important early point of contact for victims and assist them in navigating the legal system. Specialised police at all levels provide contact points for inter-agency collaboration, and may form a key element of integrated responses. Further, monitoring and supervision by specialised police is likely to improve consistency in the application of laws in the context of family violence.

32.125 The Commissions are of the view that the effectiveness and consistency of police responses—including from specialised police units—would benefit from regular education and training. The Commissions, therefore, endorse the actions outlined in the Australasian Policing Strategy on the Prevention and Reduction of Family Violence in relation to training and education, aimed at improving knowledge and understanding of all police dealing with family violence. Relevantly, these actions include:

- auditing training to ensure that education and training provided incorporates technical, conceptual and interpersonal skills including appropriate behaviours, cultural awareness and attitudes;

\textsuperscript{181} Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{182} Sergeant Chris Hey (Victim Safety Response Team), Consultation, Hobart, 12 May 2010.
32. Specialisation

- including victim case studies in training programs where appropriate; and
- engaging in joint training between police and other organisations where appropriate to facilitate a shared understanding of roles and responsibilities.\(^{183}\)

32.126 Education and training appear especially important in regional and remote communities where the establishment of specialist units may not be so readily feasible. In those circumstances, access to a primary contact person and a number of operational police officers who have some training in dealing with family violence, and are able to liaise with other agencies, would ensure a measure of accessibility for victims and improve practice amongst all police officers.

32.127 The Commissions recognise that specialised police units operate under different organisational structures, and in different policy and operational contexts. Despite this, the Commissions are of the view that, in the development of policing strategies and policy, specialised police units should be fostered. In particular, the comprehensive integrated model in Victoria, in which specialised police units are co-located with other services, appears promising as a model.

32.128 The Commissions are of the view that an important element of fostering specialised units lies in providing career progression opportunities for specialised officers. The effectiveness of specialised police is enhanced where ongoing relationships with victims and networking with other agencies are maintained. The retention of quality staff is vital to ensuring sustainability of specialised police units.

Recommendation 32–5
State and territory police should ensure, at a minimum, that:

(a) specialised family violence and sexual assault police units are fostered and structured to ensure appropriate career progression for officers and the retention of experienced personnel;

(b) all police—including specialised police units—receive regular education and training consistent with the Australasian Policing Strategy on the Prevention and Reduction of Family Violence;

(c) specially trained police have responsibility for supervising, monitoring or assuring the quality of police responses to family violence incidents, and providing advice and guidance in this regard; and

(d) victims have access to a primary contact person within the police, who specialises, and is trained, in family violence, including sexual assault issues.

Appendix 1. List of Submissions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Submission Number</th>
<th>Date</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria</td>
<td>FV 173</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACON</td>
<td>FV 119</td>
<td>15 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anglicare Australia</td>
<td>FV 115</td>
<td>10 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anonymous</td>
<td>FV 28</td>
<td>25 April 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anonymous</td>
<td>FV 42</td>
<td>22 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anonymous</td>
<td>FV 74</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Apprehended Violence Legal Issues Coordinating Committee</td>
<td>FV 228</td>
<td>12 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Association for Better Care of Children</td>
<td>FV 03</td>
<td>3 August 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 20</td>
<td>9 February 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse</td>
<td>FV 216</td>
<td>30 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department</td>
<td>FV 166</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Australian Institute of Family Studies</td>
<td>FV 222</td>
<td>2 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Benevolent Society</td>
<td>FV 203</td>
<td>28 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P Bennekom</td>
<td>FV 238</td>
<td>22 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Berry Street Inc</td>
<td>FV 163</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Better Care of Children</td>
<td>FV 72</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>M Bourne</td>
<td>FV 159</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Brunacci</td>
<td>FV 97</td>
<td>4 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Name</td>
<td>Document Number</td>
<td>Date</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-----------------</td>
<td>-------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>D Bryant, Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and J Pascoe, Chief Federal Magistrate of the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia</td>
<td>FV 168</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Canberra Rape Crisis Centre</td>
<td>FV 172</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Cannon</td>
<td>FV 137</td>
<td>23 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Carvalho</td>
<td>FV 30</td>
<td>4 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Centacare Safer Families Support Service</td>
<td>FV 118</td>
<td>15 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>G Charlton</td>
<td>FV 240</td>
<td>9 August 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Children’s Court of New South Wales</td>
<td>FV 237</td>
<td>22 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commissioner for Children (Tasmania)</td>
<td>FV 62</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia)</td>
<td>FV 111</td>
<td>9 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions</td>
<td>FV 76</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Community Legal Centres NSW</td>
<td>FV 98</td>
<td>4 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>M Condon</td>
<td>FV 45</td>
<td>18 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential A</td>
<td>FV Confidential</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential B</td>
<td>FV Confidential</td>
<td>4 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential C</td>
<td>FV Confidential</td>
<td>5 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential D</td>
<td>FV Confidential</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential E</td>
<td>FV Confidential</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential F</td>
<td>FV Confidential</td>
<td>6 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 05</td>
<td>31 August 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 13</td>
<td>23 October 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 14</td>
<td>5 November 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-----------</td>
<td>----------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 15</td>
<td>11 November 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 19</td>
<td>27 January 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 31</td>
<td>4 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 32</td>
<td>4 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 34</td>
<td>6 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 43</td>
<td>16 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 48</td>
<td>22 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 49</td>
<td>5 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 52</td>
<td>28 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 58</td>
<td>31 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 59</td>
<td>31 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 65</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 68</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 69</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 71</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 77</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 78</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 81</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 82</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 83</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 85</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 86</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 87</td>
<td>3 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 88</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 89</td>
<td>3 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 91</td>
<td>3 June 2010</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

Confidential FV 92 3 June 2010
Confidential FV 94 3 June 2010
Confidential FV 96 2 June 2010
Confidential FV 105 6 June 2010
Confidential FV 106 6 June 2010
Confidential FV 109 8 June 2010
Confidential FV 125 20 June 2010
Confidential FV 128 22 June 2010
Confidential FV 130 21 June 2010
Confidential FV 152 24 June 2010
Confidential FV 156 24 June 2010
Confidential FV 160 24 June 2010
Confidential FV 162 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 164 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 169 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 171 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 183 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 184 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 187 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 190 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 191 27 June 2010
Confidential FV 198 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 201 25 June 2010
Confidential FV 213 28 June 2010
Confidential FV 235 16 July 2010
Confidential FV 239 23 July 2010
R Copeland FV 114 8 June 2010
Appendix 1. List of Submissions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name and Organization</th>
<th>Submission Code</th>
<th>Date</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>A Cossins</td>
<td>FV 112</td>
<td>9 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc</td>
<td>FV 211</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tasmania)</td>
<td>FV 236</td>
<td>20 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Disability Services Commission</td>
<td>FV 138</td>
<td>23 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Domestic Violence Legal Workers Network</td>
<td>FV 154</td>
<td>28 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT)</td>
<td>FV 124</td>
<td>18 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network</td>
<td>FV 146</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T Dougall</td>
<td>FV 25</td>
<td>26 February 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J Drake</td>
<td>FV 66</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P Easteal</td>
<td>FV 37</td>
<td>12 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 38</td>
<td>13 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 39</td>
<td>14 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 40</td>
<td>14 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P Easteal and Dougall</td>
<td>FV 41</td>
<td>14 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P Easteal and Emerson-Elliott</td>
<td>FV 36</td>
<td>12 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Education Centre Against Violence</td>
<td>FV 90</td>
<td>3 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J Evans</td>
<td>FV 60</td>
<td>31 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fairness In Child Support</td>
<td>FV 100</td>
<td>4 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Family Law Reform Association NSW Inc</td>
<td>FV 142</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Family Relationship Services Australia</td>
<td>FV 231</td>
<td>15 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Family Voice Australia</td>
<td>FV 75</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B Fehlberg</td>
<td>FV 11</td>
<td>14 October 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Name</td>
<td>File No.</td>
<td>Date</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------------------------------------</td>
<td>----------</td>
<td>---------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Fleisher</td>
<td>FV 102</td>
<td>3 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J Fletcher</td>
<td>FV 01</td>
<td>27 July 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frid &amp; Associates Lawyers</td>
<td>FV 157</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Confidential</td>
<td>FV 14</td>
<td>9 August 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>L Gomez</td>
<td>FV 10</td>
<td>13 October 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gosnells Community Legal Centre Inc</td>
<td>FV 56</td>
<td>31 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Government of South Australia</td>
<td>FV 227</td>
<td>9 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Greenaway</td>
<td>FV 234</td>
<td>15 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>K Greenland</td>
<td>FV 161</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>K Hall</td>
<td>FV 113</td>
<td>8 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>F Hardy</td>
<td>FV 126</td>
<td>16 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Harland</td>
<td>FV 80</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B Healey</td>
<td>FV 06</td>
<td>14 September 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>L Healey</td>
<td>FV 64</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>G Hilton-Smith</td>
<td>FV 95</td>
<td>3 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C Humphreys</td>
<td>FV 04</td>
<td>23 August 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 131</td>
<td>21 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hunter Women’s Centre</td>
<td>FV 79</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inner City Legal Centre—Safe Relationships Project</td>
<td>FV 17</td>
<td>13 January 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 192</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jenny’s Place Women and Children Refuge</td>
<td>FV 54</td>
<td>28 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>K Johnstone</td>
<td>FV 107</td>
<td>7 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Julia Farr Association</td>
<td>FV 103</td>
<td>4 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Juries Against Illegal Laws</td>
<td>FV 44</td>
<td>17 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justice for Children</td>
<td>FV 148</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 177</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>L Laing</td>
<td>FV 199</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Appendix 1. List of Submissions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Organization / Individual</th>
<th>File Number</th>
<th>Date</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>A Lamb</td>
<td>FV 121</td>
<td>16 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Law Council of Australia</td>
<td>FV 180</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Law Society of New South Wales</td>
<td>FV 205</td>
<td>30 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legal Aid NSW</td>
<td>FV 219</td>
<td>1 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>M Litt</td>
<td>FV 209</td>
<td>27 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local Court of NSW</td>
<td>FV 101</td>
<td>4 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>H McGlade</td>
<td>FV 84</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>E McGuire</td>
<td>FV 53</td>
<td>28 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T McLean</td>
<td>FV 204</td>
<td>28 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria</td>
<td>FV 220</td>
<td>1 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P Maloney</td>
<td>FV 230</td>
<td>31 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>H Martin</td>
<td>FV 73</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I Matic</td>
<td>FV 93</td>
<td>3 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>D Matthews</td>
<td>FV 67</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J Matysek</td>
<td>FV 27</td>
<td>29 March 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Men’s Rights Agency</td>
<td>FV 214</td>
<td>29 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Michelle O</td>
<td>FV 153</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service</td>
<td>FV 61</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>R Mitchell</td>
<td>FV 208</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>G Molineux</td>
<td>FV 33</td>
<td>5 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murray Mallee Community Legal Service</td>
<td>FV 167</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Abuse Free Contact Campaign</td>
<td>FV 196</td>
<td>26 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence</td>
<td>FV 195</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Organization</td>
<td>Document ID</td>
<td>Date</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
<td>---------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc</td>
<td>FV 144</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Legal Aid</td>
<td>FV 232</td>
<td>15 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Peak Body for Safety and Protection of Parents and Children</td>
<td>FV 18</td>
<td>13 January 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 21</td>
<td>29 January 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 22</td>
<td>17 February 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 47</td>
<td>24 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 155</td>
<td>23 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara</td>
<td>FV 117</td>
<td>15 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C Nichols</td>
<td>FV 02</td>
<td>31 July 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>K Nievins</td>
<td>FV 110</td>
<td>8 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc</td>
<td>FV 136</td>
<td>22 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Non-Custodial Parents Party (Equal Parenting)</td>
<td>FV 12</td>
<td>21 October 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 55</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>N Norris</td>
<td>FV 176</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency</td>
<td>FV 194</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission</td>
<td>FV 122</td>
<td>16 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSW Department of Human Services</td>
<td>FV 181</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSW Women’s Refuge Movement Working Party Inc</td>
<td>FV 188</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NT Office Status of Family</td>
<td>FV 123</td>
<td>18 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of the Child Safety Commissioner</td>
<td>FV 215</td>
<td>30 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW</td>
<td>FV 158</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of the Privacy Commissioner</td>
<td>FV 147</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Appendix 1. List of Submissions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Organization</th>
<th>File No. (FV)</th>
<th>Date Provided</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>One in Three Campaign</td>
<td>FV 35</td>
<td>12 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P Parkinson</td>
<td>FV 104</td>
<td>5 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>M Payne</td>
<td>FV 193</td>
<td>28 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peninsula Community Legal Centre</td>
<td>FV 174</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perinatal Mental Health Service at St George Hospital</td>
<td>FV 165</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Police Association of New South Wales</td>
<td>FV 145</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C Pragnell</td>
<td>FV 70</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Primary Health Care</td>
<td>FV 57</td>
<td>28 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Public Defenders Office NSW</td>
<td>FV 221</td>
<td>2 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian</td>
<td>FV 63</td>
<td>1 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Queensland Government</td>
<td>FV 229</td>
<td>14 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Queensland Law Society</td>
<td>FV 178</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>E Richards</td>
<td>FV 29</td>
<td>3 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>N Ross</td>
<td>FV 129</td>
<td>21 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>O Rundle</td>
<td>FV 50</td>
<td>27 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Same Sex Domestic Violence Interagency</td>
<td>FV 116</td>
<td>10 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J Schramm</td>
<td>FV 218</td>
<td>1 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T Searle</td>
<td>FV 108</td>
<td>2 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shared Parenting Council of Australia</td>
<td>FV 206</td>
<td>28 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shoalcoast Community Legal Centre</td>
<td>FV 141</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>R Smith</td>
<td>FV 135</td>
<td>22 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B Smyth and R Kaspiew</td>
<td>FV 08</td>
<td>13 October 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solomums Australia for Family Equity</td>
<td>FV 200</td>
<td>28 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Organization</td>
<td>FV</td>
<td>Date</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
<td>-------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>South Eastern Sydney and Illawarra Area Health Service</td>
<td>FV 197</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>St Kilda Legal Service</td>
<td>FV 202</td>
<td>28 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C Stoney</td>
<td>FV 134</td>
<td>22 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J Stubbs</td>
<td>FV 186</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sydney Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service</td>
<td>FV 132</td>
<td>22 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Australian Association of Social Workers</td>
<td>FV 224</td>
<td>2 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation</td>
<td>FV 149</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UnitingCare Children Young People and Families</td>
<td>FV 151</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victims of Crime Assistance League Inc NSW</td>
<td>FV 23</td>
<td>23 February 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 24</td>
<td>23 February 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 51</td>
<td>27 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 99</td>
<td>4 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 133</td>
<td>21 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd</td>
<td>FV 179</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victorian Government</td>
<td>FV 120</td>
<td>15 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>S Waddell</td>
<td>FV 127</td>
<td>21 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>R Wallace</td>
<td>FV 07</td>
<td>18 September 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 09</td>
<td>13 October 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>FV 16</td>
<td>9 November 2009</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J Wangmann</td>
<td>FV 170</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Appendix 1. List of Submissions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Organization</th>
<th>FV</th>
<th>Date</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>B Wechner</td>
<td>26</td>
<td>13 March 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>M Wenzel</td>
<td>226</td>
<td>7 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WESNET—The Women’s Services Network</td>
<td>217</td>
<td>30 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc</td>
<td>212</td>
<td>28 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women Everywhere Advocating Violence Elimination</td>
<td>210</td>
<td>29 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women With Disabilities Australia</td>
<td>143</td>
<td>24 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network</td>
<td>46</td>
<td>24 May 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s House Shelta</td>
<td>139</td>
<td>23 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s Legal Centre (ACT &amp; Region) Inc</td>
<td>175</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s Legal Services Australia</td>
<td>225</td>
<td>6 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s Legal Service Brisbane*</td>
<td>223</td>
<td>2 July 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s Legal Services NSW</td>
<td>182</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s Legal Service Victoria</td>
<td>189</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s Legal Service Queensland</td>
<td>185</td>
<td>25 June 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women Working Alongside Women with Intellectual and Learning Disabilities Sexual Violence Prevention Association</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

*The endorsements include Women’s Legal Service (WLS) and Queensland Domestic Violence Services Network which includes the following Regional Domestic Violence Services as well as the State-wide Domestic Violence Services in Queensland:

- Domestic and Family Violence Prevention Service (South West);
- Cairns Regional Domestic Violence Service Inc.;
- Working Against Violence Support Service Inc. (Logan);
- Brisbane Domestic Violence Advocacy Service;
- Domestic Violence Resource Service (Mackay & Region) Inc;
- Safer Families Support Service (Roma);
- Domestic Violence Prevention Centre Gold Coast;
- Domestic Violence Service of Central Queensland (Emerald);
North Queensland Domestic Violence Resource Service (Townsville);
Caboolture Regional Domestic Violence Service Inc;
Ipswich Women’s Centre Against Domestic Violence;
Centacare Domestic and Family Violence Services, (Sunshine Coast/Coolum); dvconnect: Domestic and Family Violence Telephone Service; and Queensland Centre for Domestic and Family Violence Research.
Appendix 2. List of Agencies, Organisations and Individuals Consulted

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Location</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ACT Policing</td>
<td>Canberra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dr S Armstrong</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Professor H Astor</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault</td>
<td>Melbourne</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Australian Institute of Criminology</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Board of Inquiry, Child Protection, NT</td>
<td>Alice Springs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Professor T Brown</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>G Calvert</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit</td>
<td>Alice Springs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Central Australian Aboriginal Legal Aid Service</td>
<td>Alice Springs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Central Australian Women’s Legal Service</td>
<td>Alice Springs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Children’s Court, NSW</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Children’s Court, Victoria</td>
<td>Melbourne</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child Victim and Child Witness Service, Department of the Attorney General, WA</td>
<td>Perth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Professor R Chisholm</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Community Services NSW</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Dr A Cossins
Dr K Cripps
M Davis
Department of Health and Families, NT
Department of Justice and Attorney-General, NSW
Department of Justice, NT
Department of Justice, Tasmania
Justice L Dessau, Family Court of Australia
Domestic Violence Intervention Court Model
Domestic Violence Law Clearinghouse
Domestic Violence Legal Service
Education Centre Against Violence
Judge R Ellis, District Court, NSW
Expert Roundtable
Family Court, Brisbane
Family Court of WA, Information Sharing Protocols Working Group Family Law Council
Family Law Practitioners Association of Queensland
Family Law Practitioners Association of WA
Family Relationships Services Australia
Family Violence Magistrates, South Australia
Family Violence Response Team
Appendix 2. List of Agencies, Organisations and Individuals Consulted

Federal Magistrates                         Sydney
Federal Magistrates Court, NT              Darwin
Judge P Fulton Hora and S King            Adelaide
GLBTI Community Roundtable                Sydney
Magistrate A Goldsbrough                   Melbourne
Professor A Hayes, Australian Institute of Family Studies
                                          Sydney and Melbourne
Dr M Heenan                                Melbourne
Chief Magistrate M Hill                    Tasmania
Magistrate Hogan                           Perth
R Holder, Victims of Crime Coordinator, ACT  Canberra
V Hovane                                   Perth
Hume/Riverina Community Legal Centre      Albury/Wodonga
Professor C Humphreys                      Melbourne
Joondalup Family Violence Court           Joondalup Judicial Officers Roundtable               Melbourne
Dr G Krayem                                Sydney
L Laing                                    Sydney
Law Reform Commission of WA                Perth
Legal Assistance Forum                     Sydney
Legal Aid NSW                               Sydney
Legal Aid Roundtable                       Sydney
Legal Aid WA                                Perth
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Organization</th>
<th>Location</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Legal and Support Services Roundtable</td>
<td>Brisbane</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Magistrates Court of Tasmania</td>
<td>Hobart</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Magistrates, NT</td>
<td>Darwin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Magistrates, NSW</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Magistrates, Victoria</td>
<td>Melbourne</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Acting Chief Justice P Martino, District Court, WA</td>
<td>Perth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>H McGlade</td>
<td>Perth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dr E McInnes</td>
<td>Adelaide</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Men’s Advisory Network</td>
<td>Perth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Men’s Groups Roundtable</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Assistant Commissioner M Murdoch, NSW Police</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Alternative Dispute Resolution Advisory Council (NADRAC) Roundtable</td>
<td>Canberra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Indigenous Family Violence Prevention Forum 2010</td>
<td>Mackay</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankuytjatjara Women’s Council</td>
<td>Alice Springs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>North Australian Aboriginal Family Violence Legal Service</td>
<td>Darwin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency</td>
<td>Darwin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Northern Territory Family Pathways Network</td>
<td>Darwin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission</td>
<td>Alice Springs and Darwin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Northern Territory Police</td>
<td>Darwin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSW Commission for Children and Young People</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSW Human Services Community Services</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Organisation</td>
<td>Location</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSW Legal Assistance Forum</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSW Police, Joint Investigation Response Teams</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSW Rape Crisis Centre</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>S Odgers SC</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ACT)</td>
<td>Canberra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW)</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NT)</td>
<td>Darwin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Qld)</td>
<td>Brisbane</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (WA) Roundtable</td>
<td>Perth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Office of Public Prosecutions (Vic)</td>
<td>Melbourne</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>One in Three Campaign</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>S Page</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Professor P Parkinson</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Premier’s Council on Preventing Violence Against Women, NSW</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Public Forum</td>
<td>Hobart</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Queensland Domestic and Family Violence Review Team</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Rees SC</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Relationships Australia</td>
<td>Canberra and Hobart</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Department of Justice and Community Safety (ACT), Restorative Justice Unit</td>
<td>Canberra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roundtable</td>
<td>Hobart</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sexual Assault Laws Roundtable</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Organization/Individual</td>
<td>Location</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sexual Assault Resource Centre</td>
<td>Subiaco</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sexual Assault Support Service Centre</td>
<td>Hobart</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>S Seymour</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>R Smith, NSW Police</td>
<td>Wagga Wagga</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Professor J Stubbs</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C Thompson, Department of Justice and Attorney General, NSW</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Magistrate N Toohey, Sunshine and Ballarat Magistrates Court</td>
<td>Victoria</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Top End Women’s Legal Service</td>
<td>Darwin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>University of Tasmania, Academics, Faculty of Law</td>
<td>Hobart</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>P Urquhart, Barrister</td>
<td>Perth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victoria Legal Aid</td>
<td>Melbourne</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victorian Law Reform Commission</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Violence Against Women Advisory Group</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WA Family Pathways Network</td>
<td>Perth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J Wells, Senior Prosecutor</td>
<td>Adelaide</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women’s Legal Services NSW</td>
<td>Sydney</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Appendix 3. List of Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Abduction Convention</td>
<td>Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ABS</td>
<td>Australian Bureau of Statistics</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACSSA</td>
<td>Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACT</td>
<td>Australian Capital Territory</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ADR</td>
<td>Alternative dispute resolution</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ADVIP</td>
<td>Armadale Domestic Violence Intervention Project (WA)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ADVOs</td>
<td>Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AFP</td>
<td>Australian Federal Police</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AFVPLS</td>
<td>Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention Legal Service Victoria</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AGD</td>
<td>Attorney-General’s Department</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AGS</td>
<td>Australian Government Solicitor</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AIC</td>
<td>Australian Institute of Criminology</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AIFS</td>
<td>Australian Institute of Family Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AIHW</td>
<td>Australian Institute of Health and Welfare</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ALRC</td>
<td>Australian Law Reform Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Code</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>APVOs</td>
<td>Apprehended Personal Violence Orders (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Best Practice Principles</td>
<td>Family Court of Australia, Best Practice Principles for use in Parenting Disputes when Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CAIT</td>
<td>ChildFirst Assessment and Interview Team (WA)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CALD</td>
<td>Culturally and linguistically diverse</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CARS</td>
<td>Crisis Advocacy Response Services (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CASA</td>
<td>Centres Against Sexual Assault</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CAT</td>
<td>Child Abuse Taskforce (NT)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CCTV</td>
<td>Closed circuit television</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CDPP</td>
<td>Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CEDAW</td>
<td>Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child FIRST</td>
<td>Child and Family Information Referral Support Teams (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CLC</td>
<td>Community Legal Centre</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commissions</td>
<td>ALRC and NSWLRC</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CRIS</td>
<td>Client Relationship Information System (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CROC</td>
<td>Convention on the Rights of the Child</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CWU</td>
<td>Child Wellbeing Unit (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DART</td>
<td>Domestic Assault Response Team (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DCP</td>
<td>Department of Child Protection (WA)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DoCS</td>
<td>Department of Community Services</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DPP</td>
<td>Director of Public Prosecutions</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Duluth Model</td>
<td>Domestic Abuse Intervention Programs, Duluth Model on Public Intervention</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DVCS</td>
<td>Domestic Violence Crisis Service (ACT)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DVICM</td>
<td>Domestic Violence Intervention Court Model (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DVLO</td>
<td>Domestic Violence Liaison Officer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DVO</td>
<td>Domestic violence order</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DVPC</td>
<td>Domestic Violence Prevention Centre Gold Coast (Qld)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DVSS</td>
<td>Domestic Violence Solicitor Scheme (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ECAV</td>
<td>Education Centre Against Violence (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FaHCSIA</td>
<td>Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Family Court</td>
<td>Family Court of Australia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Family Law Act</td>
<td>Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FDR</td>
<td>Family dispute resolution</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FDR Regulations</td>
<td>Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations (2008)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FMC</td>
<td>Federal Magistrates Court</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Form 4</td>
<td>Family Court of Australia, Form 4—Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FRCs</td>
<td>Family Relationship Centres (Cth)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FRSA</td>
<td>Family Relationship Services Australia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FSF</td>
<td>Family Safety Framework (SA)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FVCD</td>
<td>Family Violence Court Division (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FVIP</td>
<td>Family Violence Intervention Program (ACT)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FVSC</td>
<td>Family Violence Self Change Program (ACT)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GCDVIR</td>
<td>Gold Coast Domestic Violence Integrated Response (Qld)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GLBTI</td>
<td>Gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hague Convention</td>
<td>Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HREOC</td>
<td>Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICC</td>
<td>Integrated Case Coordination (Tas)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICCPR</td>
<td>International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IDVAs</td>
<td>Independent Domestic Violence Advisors (UK)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IDVCs</td>
<td>Integrated Domestic Violence Courts (New York, USA)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IPPs</td>
<td>Information Privacy Principles</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IVAWS</td>
<td>International Violence Against Women Survey</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>JIRT</td>
<td>Joint Investigative Response Team, NSW Police</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Appendix 3. List of Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Law Council</td>
<td>Law Council of Australia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Magistrates Court of Western Australia</td>
<td>Magistrates Court of Western Australia constituted by a Family Law Magistrate of Western Australia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MARACs</td>
<td>Multi-Agency Risk Assessment Conferences (UK)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MCCOC</td>
<td>Model Criminal Code Officers Committee</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MCLOC</td>
<td>Model Criminal Law Officers Committee</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MDCs</td>
<td>Multidisciplinary Centres (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MOUs</td>
<td>Memorandums of understanding</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MRG</td>
<td>Mandatory Reporters Guidance</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NAAJA</td>
<td>North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NASASV</td>
<td>National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Council</td>
<td>National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NESB</td>
<td>Non-English speaking backgrounds</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NPPs</td>
<td>National Privacy Principles</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSW</td>
<td>New South Wales</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSWLRC</td>
<td>New South Wales Law Reform Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NT</td>
<td>Northern Territory</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NTER</td>
<td>Northern Territory Emergency Response</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Acronym</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NTLAC</td>
<td>Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NZLC</td>
<td>New Zealand Law Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OCSC</td>
<td>Office of the Child Safety Commissioner (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ODPP</td>
<td>Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OPP</td>
<td>Office of Public Prosecutions (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>QC</td>
<td>Queen's Counsel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>QLRC</td>
<td>Queensland Law Reform Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RLREP</td>
<td>Rape Law Reform Evaluation Project</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SA</td>
<td>South Australia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SACAT</td>
<td>Sexual Assault and Child Abuse Team (ACT)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SACP Pilot</td>
<td>Sexual Assault Communications Pro Bono Referral Pilot Project</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCAG</td>
<td>Standing Committee of Attorneys-General</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCAN</td>
<td>Suspected Child Abuse and Neglect (Qld)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Screening and Assessment Framework</td>
<td>Australian Catholic University and Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, Framework for Screening, Assessment and Referrals in Family Relationship Centres and the Family Relationship Advice Line (2008)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SDVCs</td>
<td>Specialist Domestic Violence Courts (UK)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SOCA</td>
<td>Sexual Offences and Child Abuse units (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SOCIT</td>
<td>Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation Team (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SOCIs</td>
<td>Sexual Offences Courts (South Africa)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SOL</td>
<td>Sexual Offence List (Vic)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Appendix 3. List of Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>TLRI</td>
<td>Tasmania Law Reform Institute</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UDHR</td>
<td>Universal Declaration of Human Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>US</td>
<td>United States</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VALS</td>
<td>Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VATE</td>
<td>video or audio taping of evidence</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VCAT</td>
<td>Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VLRC</td>
<td>Victorian Law Reform Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VOCAT</td>
<td>Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal (Vic)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VPCU</td>
<td>Violence Prevention Coordination Unit (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VSRT</td>
<td>Victim Safety Response Team (Tas)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WA</td>
<td>Western Australia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WDVCAS</td>
<td>Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service (NSW)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WLS NSW</td>
<td>Women’s Legal Services NSW</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Table of Legislation

AUSTRALIA

Commonwealth

Acts Interpretation Act 1901
Aged Care Act 1997
Australian Constitution
Australian Crime Commission Act 2002
Australian Law Reform Commission Act 1996
Child Support (Assessment) Act 1989
Crimes Act 1914
Crimes Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences Against Children) Act 2010
Criminal Code
Criminal Code Act 1995
Customs Administration Act 1985
Evidence Act 1995
Evidence Amendment Act 2008
Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations 1987
Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008
Family Law Act 1975
Family Law Amendment (De Facto Financial Matters and Other Measures) Act 2008
Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Act 2006
Family Law Amendment Rules 2010 (No 1)
Family Law Reform Act 1995
Family Law Regulations 1984
Family Law Rules 2004
Federal Magistrates Act 1999
Federal Magistrates Court Rules 2001
Judiciary Act 1903
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987
Jurisdiction of Courts of Summary Jurisdiction (Children) Proclamation 2006
Marriage Act 1961
Matrimonial Causes Act 1959
Migration Act 1958
Migration Regulations 1994
Privacy Act 1988
Social Security Act 1991
Social Security (Administration) Act 1999

New South Wales

Bail Act 1978
Child Protection Act 1987
Child Protection (Offenders Prohibition Orders) Act 2004
Child Protection (Offenders Registration) Act 2000
Children (Criminal Proceedings) Act 1987
Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998
Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Regulation 2000
Children’s Legislation (Wood Inquiry Recommendations) Act 2009
Commonwealth Powers (Family Law—Children) Act 1986
Community Justice Centres Act 1983
Community Justice Centres Amendment Act 2007
Contracts Review Act 1980
Crimes Act 1900
Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007
Crimes (Homicide) Amendment Act 1982
Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999
Crimes Amendment (Child Neglect) Act 2004
Crimes Amendment (Consent—Sexual Assault Offences) Act 2007
Crimes Amendment (Self-Defence) Act 2001
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Legislation</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Procedure Act 1986</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Procedure Amendment (Evidence) Act 2005</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Procedure Regulation 2005</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Director of Public Prosecutions Act 1986</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Evidence Act 1995</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fines Act 1996</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Firearms Act 1996</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Health Records and Information Privacy Code of Practice Amendment (Domestic Violence Intervention) 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Law Enforcement (Powers and Responsibilities) Act 2002</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local Court Act 2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>New South Wales Law Reform Commission Act 1966</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Privacy Code of Practice (General) Amendment (Domestic Violence Intervention) 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Summary Offences Act 1988</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vexatious Proceedings Act 2008</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victims Rights Act 1996</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Young Offenders Act 1997</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Queensland

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Legislation</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bail Act 1980</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Child Protection Act 1999</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commonwealth Powers (Family Law—Children) Act 1990</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Code</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Code (Abusive Domestic Relationship Defence and Another Matter) Amendment Act 2010</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Code Act 1899</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Offence Victims Act 1995</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Criminal Offence Victims Regulation 1995</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

Education (General Provisions) Act 2006
Evidence Act 1977
Evidence (Protection of Children) Amendment Act 2003
Firearms Act 1990
Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987
Justices Act 1886
Juvenile Justice Act 1992
Magistrates Courts Act 1921
Peace and Good Behaviour Act 1982
Penalties and Sentences Act 1992
Police Powers and Responsibilities Act 2000
Public Health Act 2005
Uniform Civil Procedure Rules 2005
Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009

South Australia
Bail Act 1985
Children’s Protection Act 1993
Commonwealth Powers (Family Law) Act 1986
Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935
Criminal Law Consolidation (Rape and Sexual Offences) Amendment Act 2008
Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988
Domestic Violence Act 1994
Evidence Act 1929
Family Relationships Act 1975
Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009
Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987
Magistrates Court Act 1991
Magistrates Court (Civil) Rules 1992
Problem Gambling Family Protection Orders Act 2004
Statutes Amendment (Victims of Crime) Act 2009
Summary Offences Act 1953
Summary Procedure Act 1921
Victims of Crime Act 2001
Young Offenders Act 1993
Youth Court Act 1993

Tasmania

Alternative Dispute Resolution Act 2001
Bail Act 1994
Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997
Children, Young Persons and Their Families Amendment Act 2009
Commonwealth Powers (Family Law) Act 1987
Criminal Code
Criminal Code Act 1924
Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1996
Evidence Act 2001
Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act 2001
Family Violence Act 2004
Firearms Act 1996
Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987
Justices Act 1959
Justices Rules 2003
Magistrates Court Act 1987
Sentencing Act 1997
Supreme Court Civil Procedure Act 1932
Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1976
Youth Justice Act 1997
Victoria

Bail Act 1977
Children, Youth and Families Act 2005
Commonwealth Powers (Family Law—Children) Act 1986
County Court Act 1958
Courts Legislation (Neighbourhood Justice Centre) Act 2006
Crimes Act 1958
Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005
Criminal Procedure Act 2009
Criminal Procedure Regulations 2009
Evidence Act 2008
Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958
Family Violence Protection Act 2008
Firearms Act 1996
Guardianship and Administration Act 1986
Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987
Magistrates’ Court Act 1989
Magistrates’ Court Civil Procedure Rules 2009
Public Prosecutions Act 1994
Sentencing Act 1991
Stalking Intervention Orders Act 2008
Supreme Court Act 1991
Victims’ Charter Act 2006
Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996
Victims of Crime Assistance (Amendment) Act 2000

Western Australia

Bail Act 1982
Children and Community Services Act 2004
Children’s Court of Western Australia Act 1988
Criminal Code
Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913
Criminal Injuries Compensation Act 1985
Criminal Law Amendment (Homicide) Act 2008
Criminal Procedure Act 2004
Evidence Act 1906
Family Court Act 1975
Family Court Act 1997
Firearms Act 1973
Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987
Magistrates Court Act 2004
Restraining Orders Act 1997
Restraining Orders Regulations 1997
Sentencing Act 1995
Vexatious Proceedings Restriction Act 2002
Victims of Crime Act 1994
Young Offenders Act 1994

Australian Capital Territory
Bail Act 1982
Crimes Act 1900
Children and Young People Act 2008
Crimes (Restorative Justice) Act 2004
Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005
Criminal Code
Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986
Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2001 (Repealed)
Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008
Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Amendment Act 2005
Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Regulation 2009
Evidence Act 1971
Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1993
Magistrates Court Act 1930
Public Advocate Act 2005
Supreme Court Act 1933
Victims of Crime Act 1994
Victims of Crime (Financial Assistance) Act 1983

Northern Territory

Bail Act 1982
Care and Protection of Children Act 2007
Community Welfare Act 1983
Criminal Code
Criminal Code Act 1983
Criminal Reform Amendment Act (No 2) 2006
Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007
Domestic and Family Violence Amendment Act 2009
Evidence Act 1939
Firearms Act 1997
Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987
Justices Act 1928
Magistrates Act 2009
Police Administration Act
Sentencing Act 1995
Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983
Vexatious Proceedings Act 2006
Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2006
Victims of Crime Assistance Regulations
Victims of Crime Rights and Services Act 2006 OVERSEAS

Canada
Criminal Code 1985 RS c C-46

India
Criminal Law (Second Amendment) Act 1983
Indian Penal Code 1860

New Zealand
Care of Children Act 2004
Crimes (Provocation Repeal) Amendment Act 2009
Domestic Violence Act 1995
Domestic Violence Amendment Act 2009
Sentencing Act 2002

United Kingdom
Children Act 2004
Homicide Act 1957

United States
Alabama Code
District Court of Columbia Family Court Act of 2001
Georgia Code
Gun Control Act of 1968 18 USC
Mississippi Code
Missouri Annotated Statutes
Montana Code
Nevada Revised Statutes
Ohio Revised Code
Violence Against Women Act of 1994 18 USC INTERNATIONAL

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW)
Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC)
Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women
Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention)
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR)