This Report reflects the law as at 1 September 2010.

© Commonwealth of Australia 2010

This work is copyright. You may download, display, print and reproduce this material in whole or part, subject to acknowledgement of the source, for your personal, non-commercial use or use within your organisation. Apart from any use as permitted under the Copyright Act 1968 (Cth), all other rights are reserved. Requests for further authorisation should be directed by letter to the Commonwealth Copyright Administration, Copyright Law Branch, Attorney-General’s Department, Robert Garran Offices, National Circuit, Barton ACT 2600 or electronically via www.ag.gov.au/cca.

ISBN 978-0-9807194-4-4

NSW Law Reform Commission Reference: Final Report 128

The Australian Law Reform Commission was established on 1 January 1975 by the Law Reform Commission Act 1973 (Cth) and reconstituted by the Australian Law Reform Commission Act 1996 (Cth). The office of the ALRC is at Level 25, 135 King Street, Sydney, NSW, 2000, Australia.

All ALRC publications can be made available in a range of accessible formats for people with disabilities. If you require assistance, please contact the ALRC.

Telephone: within Australia (02) 8238 6333
            International +61 2 8238 6333

TTY:        (02) 8238 6379

Facsimile: within Australia (02) 8238 6363
             International +61 2 8238 6363

E-mail:     info@alrc.gov.au

Homepage:  www.alrc.gov.au

Printed by Ligare Pty Ltd
The Hon Robert McClelland MP
Attorney-General of Australia
Parliament House
Canberra ACT 2600

8 October 2010

Dear Attorney-General

Review of particular legal frameworks to improve safety of women and their children

On 17 July 2009, you issued Terms of Reference for the Australian Law Reform Commission, in association with the New South Wales Law Reform Commission, to undertake a comprehensive review of specified family violence laws and legal frameworks to improve the safety of women and their children.

On behalf of the Members of the Commission involved in this Inquiry—including Magistrate Anne Goldsbrough and in accordance with the Australian Law Reform Commission Act 1996, I am pleased to present you with the final Report on this reference, Family Violence — A National Legal Response (ALRC 114, 2010). Owing to the enormous breadth and complexity of the subject matter, and the consequent length, this Report is presented in two volumes.

Yours sincerely,

Professor Rosalind Croucher
President
Letter to the Attorney General

To the Hon J Hatzistergos MLC
Attorney General for New South Wales

Dear Attorney

Family Violence – A National Legal Response

We make this report pursuant to the reference to this Commission received 14 July 2009.

The Hon James Wood AO QC
Chairperson
October 2010
Contents

Volume 1

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Terms of Reference</th>
<th>11</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>List of Participants</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>List of Recommendations</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Executive Summary</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Part A – Introduction

1. Introduction to the Inquiry
   - Background
   - Concurrent inquiries and actions
   - Scope of the Inquiry
   - Processes of reform
   - Overview of the Report
   - Stop Press—VLRC Child Protection Report

2. International and Constitutional Settings—The Context for Reform
   - Introduction
   - International instruments
   - Constitutional framework
   - The web of courts in family violence matters
   - Interactions and overlaps

3. Framework for Reform
   - Introduction—the reform challenge
   - Principles of reform
   - Framework of reform recommendations
   - Focus of reform

Part B – Family Violence: A Common Interpretative Framework

4. Purposes of Laws Relevant to Family Violence
   - Introduction
   - Family violence legislation
   - Family law
   - Child protection law
   - Criminal law
   - Victims’ compensation
   - Migration legislation
Contents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>11.</td>
<td>Protection Orders and the Criminal Law</td>
<td>433</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>433</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Concurrent proceedings under family violence laws and the criminal law</td>
<td>433</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Protection order conditions and the criminal law</td>
<td>461</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12.</td>
<td>Breach of Protection Orders</td>
<td>509</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>509</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Aid and abet provisions</td>
<td>509</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Public justice offences</td>
<td>520</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Consent to breaches</td>
<td>526</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Charging for breach of protection order rather than underlying offence</td>
<td>533</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Penalties and sentencing for breach of protection orders</td>
<td>543</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13.</td>
<td>Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing</td>
<td>561</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>561</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Recognising family violence in criminal offences</td>
<td>563</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Recognising family violence in sentencing</td>
<td>594</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14.</td>
<td>Homicide Defences and Family Relationships in Criminal Laws</td>
<td>621</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>621</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Recognising family violence in homicide defences</td>
<td>621</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Recognising family relationships in criminal law responses to family violence</td>
<td>654</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Reducing Violence against Women and their Children

Terms of Reference

At its meeting of 16–17 April 2009, the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General agreed that Australian law reform commissions should work together to consider these issues.

I refer to the Australian Law Reform Commission for inquiry and report pursuant to subsection 20(1) of the Australian Law Reform Commission Act 1996 the issues of:

1) the interaction in practice of State and Territory family/domestic violence and child protection laws with the Family Law Act and relevant Commonwealth, State and Territory criminal laws; and

2) the impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws in cases of sexual assault occurring in a family/domestic violence context, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence.

In relation to both issues I request that the Commission consider what, if any, improvements could be made to relevant legal frameworks to protect the safety of women and their children.

Scope of the reference

In undertaking this reference, the Commission should be careful not to duplicate:

a) the other actions being progressed as part of the Immediate Government Actions announced by the Prime Minister on receiving the National Council’s report in April 2009;

b) the evaluation of the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Act 2006 reforms being undertaken by the Australian Institute of Family Studies; and
c) the work being undertaken through SCAG on the harmonisation of uniform evidence laws, in particular the development of model sexual assault communications immunity provisions and vulnerable witness protections.

Collaboration and consultation

In undertaking this reference, the Commission should:

a) have regard to the National Council’s report and any supporting material in relation to domestic violence and sexual assault laws;

b) work jointly with the New South Wales Law Reform Commission with a view to developing agreed recommendations and consult with other State and Territory law reform bodies as appropriate;

c) work closely with the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department to ensure the solutions identified are practically achievable and consistent with other reforms and initiatives being considered in relation to the development of a National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children or the National Framework for Protecting Australia’s Children, which has been approved by the Council of Australian Governments; and

d) consult with relevant courts, the Australian Government Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs, relevant State and Territory agencies, State and Territory Legal Aid Commissions, the Family Law Council, the Australian Domestic Violence Clearinghouse and similar bodies in each State and Territory.

Timeframe

Considering the scale of violence affecting Australian women and their children and acknowledging the Australian Government’s commitment to developing a National Plan through COAG for release in 2010, the Commission will report no later than 31 July 2010.

Dated: 17 July 2009

Robert McClelland
Attorney-General

* In a letter dated 3 June 2010, the Attorney-General of Australia, the Hon Robert McClelland MP, agreed to extend the reporting date for the Inquiry to 10 September 2010. This date was again amended in a letter dated 13 September 2010, to a new reporting date of 10 October 2010.
List of Participants

Australian Law Reform Commission

Commissioners
Professor Rosalind Croucher, President
Magistrate Anne Goldsbrough, Part-time Commissioner

Special Adviser
George Zdenkowski

Executive Director
Sabina Wynn

Family Violence Team
Isabella Cosenza, Senior Legal Officer, Team Leader
Jared Boorer, Legal Officer (from 6 April 2010)
Dr Joyce Chia, Legal Officer (1 November 2009–15 April 2010)
Anna Dziedzic, Legal Officer (1 March–20 August 2010)
Lisa Eckstein, Legal Officer (1 January–19 March 2010)
Erin Mackay, Legal Officer (1 November 2009–6 January 2010)
Sara Peel, Legal Officer (from 6 April 2010)
Christina Raymond, Legal Officer (from 6 April 2010)

Child Protection Team
Chris Paul, Senior Legal Officer (11 January–24 March 2010)
Althea Gibson, Legal Officer (31 August–1 November 2009)

Sexual Assault Team
Bruce Alston, Senior Legal Officer, Team Leader (from 27 January 2010)
Dr Jane Wangmann, Senior Legal Officer, Team Leader (2 November 2009–29 January 2010)
Amanda Alford, Legal Officer (from 6 April 2010)
Dr Anne Cossins (Consultant from 22 January 2010)
Katy McGree, Legal Officer (from 11 January 2010–30 July 2010)

Overarching Issues Team
Carolyn Adams, Senior Legal Officer, Team Leader (from 1 May 2010)
Isabella Cosenza, Senior Legal Officer, Team Leader (until 30 April 2010)
Maha Melhem, Senior Legal Officer (from 6 April 2010)
Khanh Hoang, Legal Officer (from 6 April 2010)

Research Manager
Jonathan Dobinson (until 14 May 2010)

Librarian
Carolyn Kearney

Project Assistant
Tina O’Brien

Legal Interns
Dorothea Anthony
Aaron Besser
Philip Boncardo
Zhiyan Cao
Mia Hollick
Mariam Jacob
Tracey Kingsbury
Tamara Phillips
Calvin Shaw
James Small
Anna Spies
New South Wales Law Reform Commission

Commissioners
Emeritus Professor Hilary Astor (from 15 March 2010)
His Honour Judge Kevin O’Connor AM, part-time Commissioner
Professor Michael Tilbury (until February 2010)
The Hon James Wood AO QC, Chairman

Executive Director
Paul McKnight

Legal Officers
Nicole Abadee (October–December 2009)
Lisa Alonso Love (March–August 2010)
Francesca Di Benedetto (from February–October 2010)
Fiona Lam, Intern (January–February 2010)
Bridget O’Keefe (May–October 2010)
Robyn Young (January–February 2010)
Part B – Family Violence: A Common Interpretative Framework

Recommendation 5–1 State and territory family violence legislation should provide that family violence is violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour, that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. Such behaviour may include but is not limited to:

(a) physical violence;
(b) sexual assault and other sexually abusive behaviour;
(c) economic abuse;
(d) emotional or psychological abuse;
(e) stalking;
(f) kidnapping or deprivation of liberty;
(g) damage to property, irrespective of whether the victim owns the property;
(h) causing injury or death to an animal irrespective of whether the victim owns the animal; and
(i) behaviour by the person using violence that causes a child to be exposed to the effects of behaviour referred to in (a)–(h) above.

Recommendation 5–2 State and territory family violence legislation should include examples of emotional and psychological abuse or intimidation and harassment that illustrate conduct that would affect—although not necessarily exclusively—certain vulnerable groups including: Indigenous persons; those from a culturally and linguistically diverse background; the aged; those with a disability; and those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities. In each case, state and territory family violence legislation should make it clear that such examples are illustrative and not exhaustive of the prohibited conduct.

Recommendation 5–3 The definition of family violence in state and territory family violence legislation should not require a person to prove emotional or psychological harm in respect of conduct against the person which, by its nature, could be pursued criminally.
Recommendation 5–4  The governments of NSW and the ACT should review the offences categorised as ‘domestic violence offences’ in their respective family violence legislation with a view to:

(a) ensuring that the classification of such offences falls within the proposed definition of family violence in Rec 5–1; and

(b) considering the inclusion of relevant federal offences committed in a family violence context, if they choose to retain such a classification system.

Recommendation 5–5  Incidental to the review of ‘domestic violence offences’ referred to in Rec 5–4, s 44 of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW)—which deals with the failure to provide any wife, apprentice, servant or insane person with necessary food, clothing or lodgings—should be amended to ensure that its underlying philosophy and language are appropriate in a modern context.

6. Other Statutory Definitions of Family Violence

Recommendation 6–1  State and territory criminal legislation—to the extent that it refers to the term ‘family violence’ in the context of homicide defences—should adopt the same definition as recommended to be included in state and territory family violence legislation (Rec 5–1). That is, ‘family violence’ should be defined as violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour, that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. Such behaviour may include but is not limited to:

(a) physical violence;

(b) sexual assault and other sexually abusive behaviour;

(c) economic abuse;

(d) emotional or psychological abuse;

(e) stalking;

(f) kidnapping or deprivation of liberty;

(g) damage to property, irrespective of whether the victim owns the property;

(h) causing injury or death to an animal irrespective of whether the victim owns the animal; and

(i) behaviour by the person using violence that causes a child to be exposed to the effects of behaviour referred to in (a)–(h) above.

Recommendation 6–2  State and territory family violence and criminal legislation should be reviewed to ensure that the interaction of terminology or definitions of conduct constituting family violence would not prevent a person from obtaining a protection order in circumstances where a criminal prosecution could be pursued.
Recommendation 6–3  Where the definition of family violence in state or territory family violence legislation includes concepts recognised in that state or territory criminal legislation—such as stalking, kidnapping and psychological harm—family violence legislation should expressly adopt the criminal law definitions of those concepts.

Recommendation 6–4  The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should adopt the same definition as recommended to be included in state and territory family violence legislation (Rec 5–1). That is, ‘family violence’ should be defined as violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour, that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. Such behaviour may include but is not limited to:

(a) physical violence;
(b) sexual assault and other sexually abusive behaviour;
(c) economic abuse;
(d) emotional or psychological abuse;
(e) stalking;
(f) kidnapping or deprivation of liberty;
(g) damage to property, irrespective of whether the victim owns the property;
(h) causing injury or death to an animal, irrespective of whether the victim owns the animal; and
(i) behaviour by the person using violence that causes a child to be exposed to the effects of behaviour referred to in (a)–(h).

7. Other Aspects of a Common Interpretative Framework

Recommendation 7–1  State and territory family violence legislation should contain guiding principles, which should include express reference to a human rights framework, drawing upon applicable international conventions.

Recommendation 7–2  State and territory family violence legislation should contain a provision that explains the nature, features and dynamics of family violence including: while anyone may be a victim of family violence, or may use family violence, it is predominantly committed by men; it can occur in all sectors of society; it can involve exploitation of power imbalances; its incidence is underreported; and it has a detrimental impact on children. In addition, family violence legislation should refer to the particular impact of family violence on: Indigenous persons; those from a culturally and linguistically diverse background; those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities; older persons; and people with disabilities.

Recommendation 7–3  The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to include a similar provision to that in Rec 7–2 explaining the nature, features and dynamics of family violence.
Recommendation 7–4 State and territory family violence legislation should articulate the following common set of core purposes:

(a) to ensure or maximise the safety and protection of persons who fear or experience family violence;

(b) to prevent or reduce family violence and the exposure of children to family violence; and

(c) to ensure that persons who use family violence are made accountable for their conduct.

Recommendation 7–5 State and territory family violence legislation should adopt the following alternative grounds for obtaining a protection order. That is:

(a) the person seeking protection has reasonable grounds to fear family violence; or

(b) the person he or she is seeking protection from has used family violence and is likely to do so again.

Recommendation 7–6 State and territory family violence legislation should include as the core group of protected persons those who fall within the following categories of relationships:

(a) past or current intimate relationships, including dating, cohabiting, and spousal relationships, irrespective of the gender of the parties and whether the relationship is of a sexual nature;

(b) family members;

(c) relatives;

(d) children of an intimate partner;

(e) those who fall within Indigenous concepts of family; and

(f) those who fall within culturally recognised family groups.

Part C – Family Violence and the Criminal Law

8. Family Violence and the Criminal Law—An Introduction

Recommendation 8–1 The Australian Institute of Criminology (AIC) or another suitable federal agency should gather and report data about federal offences committed in a family violence context. This should include data about:

(a) which of these federal offences are prosecuted and the result;

(b) who conducts the prosecution;

(c) whether the offences are prosecuted jointly with state or territory crimes committed in a family violence context; and

(d) when the offences form the basis of a protection order.
This information should be regularly given to the AIC or relevant agency by either the courts or Commonwealth, state and territory prosecutors—including police and directors of public prosecution.

Recommendation 8–2 Police, prosecutors, lawyers and judicial officers should be given training about potential federal offences committed in a family violence context, including when such offences should be prosecuted or used as a basis for obtaining a family violence protection order.

This training should be incorporated into any existing or proposed training about family violence that is conducted by, among others: state and federal police, legal professional bodies, directors of public prosecution (state and Commonwealth), and judicial education bodies.

9. Police and Family Violence

Recommendation 9–1 State and territory family violence legislation that empowers police to issue protection orders should call these orders ‘safety notices’ or ‘notices’ to distinguish them from court orders.

The legislation should provide that police may only issue safety notices where it is not reasonable or practicable for:

(a) the matter to be immediately heard before a court; or

(b) police to apply to a judicial officer for an order (by telephone or other electronic medium).

The safety notice should act as an application to the court for a protection order and a summons for the person against whom the notice is issued to appear before the court within a short specified time. The notice should expire when the person to whom it is issued appears in court.

Recommendation 9–2 State and territory family violence legislation and/or police codes of practice should impose a duty on police to:

(a) investigate family violence where they believe family violence has been, is being, or is likely to be committed; and

(b) record when they decide not to take further action and their reasons for not taking further action.

Recommendation 9–3 State and territory governments should ensure that support services are in place to assist persons in need of protection to apply for a protection order without involving police. These should include services specifically for:

(a) Indigenous persons; and

(b) persons from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.
Recommendation 9–4 State and territory family violence legislation should empower police officers, only for the purpose of arranging protection orders, to direct a person who has used family violence to remain at, or go to, a specified place or remain in the company of a specified officer.

Recommendation 9–5 Police should be trained to better identify persons who have used family violence and persons who need to be protected from family violence, and to distinguish one from the other. Guidance should also be included in police codes of practice and guidelines.

10. Bail and Family Violence

Recommendation 10–1 State and territory legislation should not contain presumptions against bail on the grounds only that an alleged crime occurred in a family violence context.

Recommendation 10–2 State and territory legislation should provide that, on granting protective bail, judicial officers should be required to consider whether to impose protective bail conditions, issue or vary a family violence protection order, or do both.

Recommendation 10–3 State and territory legislation should impose an obligation on police and prosecutors to inform victims of family violence promptly of:

(a) decisions to grant or refuse bail; and

(b) the conditions of release, where bail is granted.

Victims should also be given or sent a copy of the bail conditions. Where there are bail conditions and a protection order, police and prosecutors should explain how they interact.

Police codes of practice or operating procedures, prosecutorial guidelines or policies, and education and training programs should reflect these obligations. These should also note when it would be appropriate to send bail conditions to family violence legal and service providers with whom a victim is known to have regular contact.

11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law

Recommendation 11–1 State and territory family violence legislation should make it clear that the making, variation or revocation of a protection order, or the refusal to make, vary or revoke such an order, does not affect the civil or criminal liability of a person bound by the order in respect of the family violence the subject of the order.

Recommendation 11–2 State and territory legislation should clarify that in the trial of an accused for an offence arising out of conduct that is the same or substantially similar to that on which a protection order is based, references cannot be made, without the leave of the court, to:

(a) the making, variation and revocation of protection orders in proceedings under family violence legislation—unless the offence the subject of the trial is breach of a protection order, in which case leave of the court is not necessary;
(b) the refusal of a court to make, vary or revoke a protection order in proceedings under family violence legislation; and

(c) the existence of current proceedings for a protection order under family violence legislation against the person the subject of the criminal proceedings.

Evidence given in proceedings under family violence legislation may be admissible by consent of the parties or by leave of the court.

Recommendation 11–3  State and territory family violence legislation should include an express provision conferring on courts a power to make a protection order on their own initiative at any stage of a criminal proceeding. Any such order made prior to a plea or finding of guilt should be interim until there is a plea or finding of guilt.

Recommendation 11–4  State and territory family violence legislation should expressly empower prosecutors to make an application for a protection order where a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence involving family violence.

Recommendation 11–5  State and territory legislation should provide that a court before which a person pleads guilty, or is found guilty of an offence involving family violence, must consider whether any existing protection order obtained under family violence legislation needs to be varied to provide greater protection for the person against whom the offence was committed.

Recommendation 11–6  State and territory family violence legislation should provide expressly that one of the conditions that may be imposed by a court making a protection order is to prohibit the person against whom the order is made from locating or attempting to locate the victim of family violence.

Recommendation 11–7  Application forms for protection orders in each state and territory should clearly set out the types of conditions that a court may attach to a protection order, allowing for the possibility of tailored conditions. The forms should be drafted to enable applicants to indicate the types of conditions that they seek to be imposed.

Recommendation 11–8  State and territory family violence legislation should require judicial officers making protection orders to consider whether or not to make an exclusion order—that is, an order excluding a person against whom a protection order is made from premises shared with the victim, even if the person has a legal or equitable interest in such premises.

Recommendation 11–9  State and territory family violence legislation should provide that a court should only make an exclusion order when it is necessary to ensure the safety of a victim or affected child. Primary factors relevant to the paramount consideration of safety include the vulnerability of the victim and any affected child having regard to their physical, emotional and psychological needs, and any disability. Secondary factors to be considered include the accommodation needs and options available to the parties, particularly in light of any disability that they may have, and the length of time required for any party to secure alternative accommodation.
Recommendation 11–10  State and territory family violence legislation should require a court to give reasons for declining to make an exclusion order where such order has been sought.

Recommendation 11–11  State and territory family violence legislation should provide that:

(a) courts have an express discretion to impose conditions on persons against whom protection orders are made requiring them to attend rehabilitation or counselling programs, where such persons have been independently assessed as being suitable and eligible to participate in such programs;

(b) the relevant considerations in assessing eligibility and suitability to participate in such programs should include: whether the respondent consents to the order; the availability of transport; and the respondent’s work and educational commitments, cultural background and any disability; and

(c) failure to attend assessment or to complete such a program should not attract a sentence of imprisonment, and the maximum penalty should be a fine capped at a lower amount than the applicable maximum penalty for breaching a protection order.

Recommendation 11–12  Where appropriate, state and territory courts should provide persons against whom protection orders are made with information about relevant culturally and gender-appropriate rehabilitation and counselling programs.

Recommendation 11–13  State and territory legislation should provide that a court sentencing an offender for a family-violence related offence should take into account:

(a) any protection order conditions to which the person being sentenced is subject, where those conditions arise out of the same or substantially the same conduct giving rise to the prosecution for the offence; and

(b) the duration of any protection order to which the offender is subject.

12. Breach of Protection Orders

Recommendation 12–1  State and territory legislation should provide that a person protected by a protection order under family violence legislation cannot be charged with or found guilty of an offence of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the breach of a protection order.

Recommendation 12–2  Federal, state and territory police, and directors of public prosecution should train or ensure that police and prosecutors respectively receive training on how the dynamics of family violence might affect the decisions of victims to negate the existence of family violence or to withdraw previous allegations of violence.

Recommendation 12–3  Police codes of practice or operating guidelines, and prosecutorial policies should ensure that any decisions to charge or prosecute victims of family violence with public justice offences—such as conspiracy or attempts to pervert the course of justice, where the conduct alleged to constitute such offences is essentially conduct engaged in by a victim to reduce or mitigate the culpability of an offender—should only be approved at the highest levels within state or territory police services, and by directors of public prosecution, respectively.

Recommendation 12–4 Police should be trained about the appropriate content of ‘statements of no complaint’ in which victims attest to the fact that they do not wish to pursue criminal action. In particular, police should not encourage victims to attest that no family violence occurred when the evidence clearly points to the contrary.

Recommendation 12–5 The national family violence bench book—the subject of Rec 13–1 and Rec 31–2—should contain a section on the sentencing of offenders for breach of protection orders. This section should provide guidance to judicial officers on how to treat the consent of a victim to contact with a respondent that is prohibited by a protection order. In particular, this section should address the following issues:

(a) that it is the responsibility of the respondent to a protection order to obey its conditions;

(b) the dynamics of power and control in family violence relationships and how such dynamics might vitiate a victim’s initiation of, or consent to, contact prohibited by a protection order;

(c) that the weight the court is to give to the fact that a victim initiated or agreed to contact prohibited by a protection order, will depend on the circumstances of each case; and

(d) while a victim of family violence may have genuinely consented to contact with the respondent to a protection order, a victim can never be taken to have consented to any violence committed in breach of a protection order.

Recommendation 12–6 State and territory police guidelines or codes of practice should provide guidance to police about charging an offender with breach of a protection order and any underlying criminal offence constituting the breach. In particular, such guidance should address the issue of perceived duplication of charges and how that issue is properly addressed by a court in sentencing an offender for multiple offences based on the totality principle and principles relating to concurrent and cumulative sentences.

Recommendation 12–7 To the extent that state and territory courts record and maintain statistics about criminal matters lodged or criminal offences proven in their jurisdiction, they should ensure that such statistics capture separately criminal matters or offences that occur in a family-violence related context. In every other case, state and territory governments should ensure the separate capture of statistics of criminal matters and offences in their jurisdictions that occur in a family-violence related context.
Recommendation 12–8 The national family violence bench book (see Recs 13–1 and 31–2) should contain a section guiding courts on how to sentence offenders for breach of protection orders, addressing, for example:

(a) the purposes of sentencing an offender for breach of a protection order;
(b) the potential impact of particular sentencing options, especially fines, on a victim of family violence;
(c) sentencing factors relating to the victim, including the impact of the offence on the victim;
(d) sentencing factors relating to the offender, including the timing of the breach;
(e) factors relevant to determining the severity of sentencing range and the appropriateness of particular sanctions for different levels of severity of breach;
(f) that breaches not involving physical violence can have a significant impact on a victim and should not necessarily be treated as less serious than breaches involving physical violence; and
(g) the benefits of sentencing options that aim to change the behaviour of those who commit violence.

Recommendation 12–9 Police operational guidelines—reinforced by training—should require police, when preparing witness statements in relation to breach of protection order proceedings, to ask victims about the impact of the breach, and advise them that they may wish to make a victim impact statement and about the use that can be made of such a statement.

Recommendation 12–10 State and territory family violence legislation should not impose mandatory minimum penalties or mandatory imprisonment for the offence of breaching a protection order.

13. Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing

Recommendation 13–1 The national family violence bench book (see Rec 31–2) should include a section that:

(a) provides guidance about the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence to criminal offences and defences—for example, evidence of a pre-existing relationship between the parties, including evidence of previous violence; and
(b) addresses sentencing in family violence matters.

Recommendation 13–2 Federal, state and territory police, and Commonwealth, state and territory directors of public prosecution respectively, should ensure that police and prosecutors are encouraged by prosecutorial guidelines, and training and education programs, to use representative charges wherever appropriate in family-violence related criminal matters, where the charged conduct forms part of a course of conduct. Relevant prosecutorial guidelines, training and education programs should also address matters of charge negotiation and negotiation as to agreed statements of facts in the prosecution of family-violence related matters.

Recommendation 13–3 State and territory sentencing legislation should provide that the fact that an offence was committed in the context of a family relationship should not be considered a mitigating factor in sentencing.

14. Homicide Defences and Family Relationships in Criminal Laws

Recommendation 14–1 State and territory criminal legislation should ensure that defences to homicide accommodate the experiences of family violence victims who kill, recognising the dynamics and features of family violence.

Recommendation 14–2 State and territory governments should review their defences to homicide relevant to family violence victims who kill. Such reviews should:

(a) cover defences specific to victims of family violence as well as those of general application that may apply to victims of family violence;

(b) cover both complete and partial defences;

(c) be conducted as soon as practicable after the relevant provisions have been in force for five years;

(d) include investigations of the following matters:

   (i) how the relevant defences are being used—including in charge negotiations—by whom, and with what results; and

   (ii) the impact of rules of evidence and sentencing laws and policies on the operation of defences; and

(e) report publicly on their findings.

Recommendation 14–3 The national family violence bench book (see Rec 31–2) should include a section that provides guidance on the operation of defences to homicide where a victim of family violence kills the person who was violent towards him or her.

Recommendation 14–4 The Model Criminal Law Officers’ Committee of the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General—or another appropriate national body—should investigate strategies to improve the consistency of approaches to recognising the dynamics of family violence in homicide defences in state and territory criminal laws.

Recommendation 14–5 State and territory criminal legislation should provide guidance about the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence in the context of a defence to homicide. Section 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) is an instructive model in this regard.
Volume 2

Part D – Family Violence and Family Law

16. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction and Practice of State and Territory Courts

Recommendation 16–1  Family violence legislation in each state and territory should require judicial officers making or varying a protection order to consider, under s 68R of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), reviving, varying, discharging or suspending an inconsistent parenting order.

Recommendation 16–2  Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should include an option for an applicant to request the court to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order.

Recommendation 16–3  The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to allow state and territory courts, when making or varying a protection order, to make a parenting order until further order.

Recommendation 16–4  Section 60CG of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)—which requires a court to ensure that a parenting order does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence and permits the court to include in the order any safeguards that it considers necessary for the safety of a person affected by the order—should be amended to provide that the court should give primary consideration to the protection of that person over the other factors that are relevant to determining the best interests of the child.

Recommendation 16–5  Section 68T of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to provide that, where a state or territory court, in proceedings to make an interim protection order under state or territory family violence legislation, revives, varies or suspends a parenting order under s 68R, or makes a parenting order in the circumstances set out in Rec 16–3, that parenting order has effect until:

(a) the date specified in the order;
(b) the interim protection order expires; or
(c) further order of the court.

Recommendation 16–6  State and territory family violence legislation should provide that courts not significantly diminish the standard of protection afforded by a protection order for the purpose of facilitating consistency with a parenting order.

Recommendation 16–7  Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should include an option for applicants to indicate their preference that there should be no exception in the protection order for contact required or authorised by a parenting order made under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).
List of Recommendations

Recommendation 16–8 Australian courts and judicial education bodies should provide education and training, and prepare material in bench books, to assist judicial officers in state and territory courts better to understand and exercise their jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). This material should include guidance on resolving inconsistencies between orders under the Family Law Act and protection orders to ensure the safety of victims of family violence.

Recommendation 16–9 Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate to provide training to practitioners involved in protection order proceedings on state and territory courts’ jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

Recommendation 16–10 Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should clearly seek information about property orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) or any pending application for such orders.

Recommendation 16–11 State and territory family violence legislation should require courts, when considering whether to make personal property directions in protection order proceedings, to inquire about and consider any property orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), or pending application for such orders.

Recommendation 16–12 State and territory family violence legislation should provide that personal property directions made in protection order proceedings are subject to orders made by a federal family court or other court responsible for determining property disputes.

Recommendation 16–13 State and territory family violence legislation should provide that personal property directions do not affect ownership rights.

17. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction and Practice of Federal Family Courts

Recommendation 17–1 The ‘additional consideration’ in s 60CC(3)(k) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), which directs courts to consider only final or contested protection orders when determining the best interests of a child, should be amended to provide that a court, when determining the best interests of the child, must consider evidence of family violence given, or findings made, in relevant family violence protection order proceedings.

Recommendation 17–2 The Australian Government should initiate an inquiry into how family violence should be dealt with in property proceedings under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

Recommendation 17–3 The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to provide separate provisions for injunctions for personal protection.

Recommendation 17–4 The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to provide that a breach of an injunction for personal protection is a criminal offence.
Recommendation 17–5  The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to provide that, in proceedings to make or vary a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation, a state or territory court may revive, vary, discharge or suspend a Family Law Act injunction for personal protection of a party to a marriage.

Recommendation 17–6  Section 114(2) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), which permits a court to make an order relieving a party to a marriage from any obligations to perform marital services or render conjugal rights, should be repealed.

18. Evidence of Family Violence

Recommendation 18–1  State and territory courts should ensure that application forms for protection orders include information about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence.

Recommendation 18–2  Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should require that applicants swear or affirm a statement incorporated in, or attached to, the application form, setting out the basis of the application. Where the applicant is a police officer, the application form should require the police officer to certify the form.

Recommendation 18–3  State and territory family violence legislation should prohibit the respondent in protection order proceedings from personally cross-examining any person against whom the respondent is alleged to have used family violence.

Recommendation 18–4  State and territory courts should require that undertakings by a person against whom a protection order is sought should be in writing on a standard form. The form should require each party to sign an acknowledgment that he or she understands that:

(a) breach of an undertaking is not a criminal offence nor can it be otherwise enforced;

(b) the court’s acceptance of an undertaking does not preclude further action by the applicant to address family violence; and

(c) evidence of breach of an undertaking may be used in later proceedings.

Recommendation 18–5  State and territory family violence legislation should provide that:

(a) mutual protection orders should not be made by consent; and

(b) a court may only make mutual protection orders where it is satisfied that there are grounds for making a protection order against each party.
Part E – Child Protection

19. The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws

Recommendation 19–1 Federal, state and territory governments should, as a matter of priority, make arrangements for child protection agencies to provide investigatory and reporting services to family courts in cases involving children’s safety. Where such services are not already provided by agreement, urgent consideration should be given to establishing specialist sections within child protection agencies to provide those services.

Recommendation 19–2 State governments should refer powers to enable the Australian Government to make laws allowing family courts to confer parental rights and duties on a child protection agency in cases where there is no other viable and protective carer. Family courts should have the power to join a child protection agency as a party in this limited class of cases.

Recommendation 19–3 Where a child protection agency investigates child abuse, locates a viable and protective carer and refers that carer to a family court to apply for a parenting order, the agency should, in appropriate cases:

(a) provide written information to a family court about the reasons for the referral;
(b) provide reports and other evidence; or
(c) intervene in the proceedings.

Recommendation 19–4 The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to give children’s courts the same powers as magistrates courts.

Recommendation 19–5 Federal, state and territory governments should ensure the immediate and regular review of protocols between family courts, children’s courts and child protection agencies for the exchange of information to avoid duplication in the hearing of cases, and that a decision is made as early as possible about the appropriate court.

20. Family Violence, Child Protection and the Criminal Law

Recommendation 20–1 State and territory child protection legislation should authorise a person to disclose to a law enforcement agency—including federal, state and territory police—the identity of a reporter, or the contents of a report from which the reporter’s identity may be revealed, where:

(a) the disclosure is in connection with the investigation of a serious offence alleged to have been committed against a child or young person; and

(b) the disclosure is necessary to safeguard or promote the safety, welfare and wellbeing of any child or young person, whether or not the child or young person is the victim of the alleged offence.
The information should only be disclosed where:

(a) the information is requested by a senior law enforcement officer, who has certified in writing beforehand that obtaining the reporter’s consent would prejudice the investigation of the serious offence concerned; or

(b) the agency that discloses the identity of the reporter has certified in writing that it is impractical to obtain the consent.

Where information is disclosed, the person who discloses the identity of the reporter, or the contents of a report from which the identity of a reporter may be revealed, should notify the reporter as soon as practicable of this fact, unless to do so would prejudice the investigation.

Recommendation 20–2 State and territory law enforcement, child protection and other relevant agencies should, where necessary, develop protocols that provide for consultation about law enforcement responses when allegations of abuse or neglect of a child for whom the police have care and protection concerns are being investigated by the police.

Recommendation 20–3 State and territory family violence legislation should confer jurisdiction on children’s courts to hear and determine applications for family violence protection orders where:

(a) the person affected by family violence, sought to be protected, or against whom the order is sought, is a child or young person; and

(b) proceedings related to that child or young person are before the court; and

(c) the court is satisfied that the grounds for making the order are met.

Recommendation 20–4 Where a children’s court has jurisdiction to hear a family violence protection order application (see Rec 20–3), the court should also be able to make a family violence protection order in favour of siblings of the child or young person who is the subject of proceedings, or other children or young people within the same household, who are affected by the same or similar circumstances.

Recommendation 20–5 Where a children’s court has jurisdiction to hear a family violence protection order application (see Rec 20–3), the court should also have jurisdiction to make a family violence protection order for the protection of an adult, where the adult is affected by the same or similar circumstances.

Recommendation 20–6 Where a children’s court has jurisdiction to hear a family violence protection order application (see Rec 20–3), the court should also have power to vary or revoke a family violence protection order on the application of a party to the order, or on its own motion.
Recommendation 20–7
State and territory child protection legislation should:

(a) specify that judicial officers and court staff are mandatory reporters; and

(b) require child protection agencies to provide timely feedback to mandatory reporters, including an acknowledgement that the report was received and information as to the outcome of the child protection agency’s initial investigation.

Part F – Alternative Dispute Resolution

21. Family Dispute Resolution

Recommendation 21–1
The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should continue to collaborate with the family dispute resolution sector to improve standards in identification and appropriate management of family violence by family dispute resolution practitioners.

Recommendation 21–2
The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should:

(a) promote and support high quality screening and risk assessment frameworks and tools for family dispute resolution practitioners;

(b) include these tools and frameworks in training and accreditation of family dispute resolution practitioners;

(c) include these tools and frameworks in the assessment and evaluation of family dispute resolution services and practitioners; and

(d) promote and support collaborative work across sectors to improve standards in the screening and assessment of family violence in family dispute resolution.

Recommendation 21–3
The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, family dispute resolution service providers, and legal education bodies should ensure that lawyers who practise family law are given training and support in screening and assessing risks in relation to family violence and making appropriate referrals to other services.

Recommendation 21–4
The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should continue to provide leadership, support and coordination to improve collaboration and cooperation between family dispute resolution practitioners and lawyers.

Recommendation 21–5
The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should take a comprehensive and strategic approach to support culturally responsive family dispute resolution, including screening and risk assessment processes.
22. Confidentiality and Admissibility

Recommendation 22–1 Sections 10D(4)(b) and 10H(4)(b) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to permit family counsellors and family dispute resolution practitioners to disclose communications made during family counselling or family dispute resolution, where they reasonably believe that disclosure is necessary to prevent or lessen a serious threat to a person’s life, health or safety.

Recommendation 22–2 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department, in consultation with family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors, should develop material to guide family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors in determining the seriousness of a threat to an individual’s life, health or safety, and identifying when a disclosure may be made without consent. Such guidance should also encourage family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors to address the potential impact of disclosure on the immediate safety of those to whom the information relates, and for that purpose:

(a) refer those at risk to appropriate support services; and

(b) develop a safety plan, where appropriate, in conjunction with them.

Recommendation 22–3 Bodies responsible for the education and training of family dispute resolution practitioners and family counsellors should develop programs to ensure that provisions in the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and in state and territory child protection legislation regulating disclosure of information relating to actual or potential abuse, harm or ill-treatment of children are understood and appropriately acted on.

Recommendation 22–4 Sections 10E and 10J of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), which regulate the admissibility of family dispute resolution and family counselling communications, should be amended to state expressly that the application of these provisions extends to state and territory courts not exercising family law jurisdiction.

Recommendation 22–5 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department should coordinate the collaborative development of education and training—including cross-disciplinary training—for family courts’ registry staff, family consultants, judicial officers and lawyers who practise family law, about the need for screening and risk assessment where a certificate has been issued under s 60I of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) indicating a matter is inappropriate for family dispute resolution.

23. Intersections and Inconsistencies

Recommendation 23–1 Where state and territory family violence legislation permits the use of alternative dispute resolution in family violence protection order proceedings, such legislation should provide that violence cannot be negotiated or mediated.
List of Recommendations

Recommendation 23–2
State and territory legislation and policies for alternative dispute resolution in family violence protection order proceedings should provide for comprehensive screening and risk assessment mechanisms.

Recommendation 23–3
State and territory governments, courts, and alternative dispute resolution service providers should ensure that, where alternative dispute resolution is permitted in relation to family violence protection order proceedings, education and training is provided to judicial and court officers and alternative dispute resolution practitioners on:
(a) the nature and dynamics of family violence; and
(b) the conduct of alternative dispute resolution processes in the context of family violence.

Recommendation 23–4
State and territory courts should ensure that the terms of a family violence protection order indicate that participation in family dispute resolution, as ordered or directed by a family court, or provided under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), is not precluded by a family violence protection order.

Recommendation 23–5
State and territory courts should ensure that parties to family violence protection order proceedings are informed that, if involved in proceedings or family dispute resolution under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth):
(a) they may be exempt from requirements to participate in family dispute resolution under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth);
(b) they should inform a family dispute resolution practitioner about any family violence protection orders or proceedings; and
(c) they should inform family courts about any family violence protection orders or proceedings, where family court proceedings are initiated.

Recommendation 23–6
The Australian Government Attorney–General’s Department and state and territory governments should ensure that family violence screening and risk assessment frameworks indicate the importance of including questions in screening and risk assessment tools about:
(a) past or current applications for protection orders;
(b) past or current protection orders; and
(c) any breaches of protection orders.

Recommendation 23–7
Family dispute resolution service providers should ensure that:
(a) tools used for family violence screening and risk assessment include questions about past and current protection orders and applications, and any breaches of protection orders; and
(b) parties are asked for copies of protection orders.
Recommendation 23–8  State and territory legislation and policies for alternative dispute resolution in child protection matters should provide that violence cannot be negotiated or mediated within alternative dispute resolution processes.

Recommendation 23–9  State and territory legislation and policies for alternative dispute resolution in child protection matters should provide for comprehensive screening and risk assessment mechanisms.

Recommendation 23–10  State and territory child protection agencies and alternative dispute resolution service providers should ensure that child protection staff and alternative dispute resolution practitioners undertake training on:

(a) the nature and dynamics of family violence; and

(b) the need for parents, as well as children, who are victims of family violence to have access to appropriate support.

Recommendation 23–11  State and territory governments should take a comprehensive and strategic approach to support culturally responsive alternative dispute resolution—including screening and risk assessment processes—in child protection matters.

Recommendation 23–12  Alternative dispute resolution service providers should ensure that, in intake procedures for child protection matters, parties are asked about relevant:

(a) orders, injunctions and applications under state and territory family violence legislation and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth);

(b) family dispute resolution agreements and processes; and

(c) alternative dispute resolution agreements and processes in family violence matters.

Recommendation 23–13  The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department and state and territory governments should collaborate with Family Relationship Services Australia, legal aid commissions and other alternative dispute resolution service providers, to explore the potential of resolving family law parenting and child protection issues relating to the same family in one integrated process.

Part G – Sexual Assault

25. Sexual Offences

Recommendation 25–1  State and territory sexual assault provisions should include a wide definition of sexual intercourse or penetration, encompassing:

(a) penetration (to any extent) of the genitalia (including surgically constructed genitalia) or anus of a person by the penis or other body part of another person and/or any object manipulated by a person;
List of Recommendations

(b) penetration of the mouth of a person by the penis of a person; and
(c) continuing sexual penetration as defined in paragraph (a) or (b) above.

Recommendation 25–2 Federal, state and territory sexual offence provisions should provide a uniform age of consent for all sexual offences.

Recommendation 25–3 The Australian, state and territory governments should review the utilisation and effectiveness of persistent sexual abuse type offences, with a particular focus on offences committed in a family violence context.

Recommendation 25–4 Federal, state and territory sexual offence provisions should include a statutory definition of consent based on the concept of free and voluntary agreement.

Recommendation 25–5 Federal, state and territory sexual offence provisions should set out a non-exhaustive list of circumstances that may vitiate consent including, at a minimum:

(a) lack of capacity to consent, including because a person is asleep or unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or other drugs as to be unable to consent;
(b) where a person submits because of force, or fear of force, against the complainant or another person;
(c) where a person submits because of fear of harm of any type against the complainant or another person;
(d) unlawful detention;
(e) mistaken identity and mistakes as to the nature of the act (including mistakes generated by the fraud or deceit of the accused);
(f) abuse of a position of authority or trust; and
(g) intimidating or coercive conduct, or other threat, that does not necessarily involve a threat of force, against the complainant or another person.

Recommendation 25–6 Federal, state and territory sexual assault provisions should provide that it is a defence to the charge of ‘rape’ that the accused held an honest and reasonable belief that the complainant was consenting to the sexual penetration.

Recommendation 25–7 State and territory sexual offence provisions should provide that the judge must, if it is relevant to the facts in issue in a sexual offence proceeding, direct the jury:

(a) on the meaning of consent, as defined in the legislation;
(b) on the circumstances where there may be no consent, and the consequence of a finding beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances exists;
(c) that a person is not to be regarded as having consented to a sexual act just because:
the person did not say or do anything to indicate that she or he did not consent; or
(ii) the person did not protest or physically resist; or
(iii) the person did not sustain physical injury; or
(iv) on that, or an earlier, occasion the person consented to engage in a sexual act—whether or not of the same type—with that person or another person.

Where evidence is led, or an assertion is made, that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting to the sexual act, then the judge must direct the jury to consider:

(d) any evidence of that belief;
(e) whether the accused took any steps to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting, and if so, the nature of those steps;
(f) the reasonableness of the accused’s belief in all the circumstances, including the accused’s knowledge or awareness of any circumstance that may vitiate consent; and
(g) any other relevant matter.

Recommendation 25–8 State and territory legislation dealing with sexual offences should state that the objectives of the sexual offence provisions are to:
(a) uphold the fundamental right of every person to make decisions about his or her sexual behaviour and to choose not to engage in sexual activity; and
(b) protect children, young people and persons with a cognitive impairment from sexual exploitation.

Recommendation 25–9 State and territory legislation dealing with sexual offences, criminal procedure or evidence, should contain guiding principles, to which courts should have regard when interpreting provisions relating to sexual offences. At a minimum, these guiding principles should refer to the following:
(a) sexual violence constitutes a form of family violence;
(b) there is a high incidence of sexual violence within society;
(c) sexual offences are significantly under-reported;
(d) a significant number of sexual offences are committed against women, children and other vulnerable persons, including those from Indigenous and culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, and persons with a cognitive impairment;
(e) sexual offenders are commonly known to their victims; and
(f) sexual offences often occur in circumstances where there are unlikely to be any physical signs of an offence having occurred.
26. Reporting, Prosecution and Pre-trial Processes

Recommendation 26–1 The Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, the Australian Institute of Criminology and similar state and territory agencies should prioritise the collection of comprehensive data in relation to sexual assault perpetrated in a family violence context. In particular on:

(a) attrition rates, including reasons for attrition and the attrition point;
(b) case outcomes; and
(c) trends in relation to particular groups including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.

Recommendation 26–2 Commonwealth, state and territory Directors of Public Prosecution should ensure that prosecutorial guidelines and policies:

(a) facilitate the referral of victims and witnesses of sexual assault to culturally appropriate welfare, health, counselling and other support services at the earliest opportunity;
(b) require consultation with victims of sexual assault about key prosecutorial decisions, including whether to prosecute, discontinue a prosecution, or agree to a charge or fact bargain;
(c) require the ongoing provision of information to victims of sexual assault about the status and progress of proceedings;
(d) facilitate the provision of information and assistance to victims and witnesses of sexual assault in understanding the legal and court process;
(e) facilitate the provision of information and assistance to victims and witnesses of sexual assault in relation to the protective provisions available to sexual assault complainants when giving evidence in criminal proceedings;
(f) ensure that family violence protection orders or stalking intervention orders are sought in all relevant circumstances; and
(g) require referral of victims and witnesses of sexual assault to providers of legal advice on related areas, such as family law, victims’ compensation and the sexual assault communications privilege.

Recommendation 26–3 Federal, state and territory governments and relevant educational, professional and service delivery bodies should ensure ongoing and consistent education and training for judicial officers, lawyers, prosecutors, police and victim support services in relation to the substantive law and the nature and dynamics of sexual assault as a form of family violence, including its social and cultural contexts.
Recommendation 26–4 State and territory legislation should prohibit:
(a) any child; and
(b) any adult complainant, unless there are special or prescribed reasons, from being required to attend to give evidence at committal hearings in relation to sexual offences.

Recommendation 26–5 Federal, state and territory legislation should:
(a) establish a presumption that, when two or more charges for sexual offences are joined in the same indictment, those charges are to be tried together; and
(b) state that this presumption is not rebutted merely because evidence on one charge is inadmissible on another charge.

Recommendation 26–6 Federal, state and territory legislation should permit the tendering of pre-recorded evidence of interview between a sexual assault complainant and investigators as the complainant’s evidence-in-chief. Such provisions should apply to all complainants of sexual assault, both adults and children.

Recommendation 26–7 Federal, state and territory legislation should permit child complainants of sexual assault and complainants of sexual assault who are vulnerable as a result of mental or physical impairment, to provide evidence recorded at a pre-trial hearing. This evidence should be able to be replayed at the trial as the witness’ evidence. Adult victims of sexual assault should also be permitted to provide evidence in this way, by leave of the court.

Recommendation 26–8 The Australian, state and territory governments should ensure that relevant participants in the criminal justice system receive comprehensive education about legislation authorising the use of pre-recorded evidence in sexual assault proceedings, and training in relation to interviewing victims of sexual assault and pre-recording evidence.

27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings

Recommendation 27–1 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that complainants of sexual assault must not be cross-examined in relation to, and the court must not admit any evidence of, the sexual reputation of the complainant.

Recommendation 27–2 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that the complainant must not be cross-examined, and the court must not admit any evidence, as to the sexual activities—whether consensual or non-consensual—of the complainant, other than those to which the charge relates, without the leave of the court.

Recommendation 27–3 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that the court must not grant leave under the test proposed in Rec 27–2, unless it is satisfied that the evidence has significant probative value and that it is in the interests of justice to allow the cross-examination or to admit the evidence, after taking into account:
(a) the distress, humiliation and embarrassment that the complainant may experience as a result of the cross-examination or the admission of the evidence, in view of the age of the complainant and the number and nature of the questions that the complainant is likely to be asked;

(b) the risk that the evidence may arouse discriminatory belief or bias, prejudice, sympathy or hostility;

(c) the need to respect the complainant’s personal privacy;

(d) the right of the defendant to fully answer and defend the charge; and

(e) any other relevant matter.

Recommendation 27–4 Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that evidence about the sexual activities—whether consensual or non-consensual—of the complainant, other than those to which the charge relates, is not of significant probative value only because of any inference it may raise as to the general disposition of the complainant.

Recommendation 27–5 Federal, state and territory legislation should require that an application for leave to cross-examine complainants of sexual assault, or to admit any evidence, about the sexual activities of the complainant must be made:

(a) in writing;

(b) if the proceeding is before a jury—in absence of the jury; and

(c) in the absence of a complainant, if a defendant in the proceeding requests.

Recommendation 27–6 Federal, state and territory legislation should require a court to give reasons for its decision whether or not to grant leave to cross-examine complainants of sexual assault, or to admit any evidence, about the sexual activities of the complainant and, if leave is granted, to state the nature of the admissible evidence.

Recommendation 27–7 Australian courts, and judicial education and legal professional bodies should provide education and training about the procedural requirements for admitting and adducing evidence of sexual activity.

Recommendation 27–8 Federal, state and territory legislation and court rules relating to subpoenas and the operation of the sexual assault communications privilege should ensure that the interests of complainants in sexual assault proceedings are better protected, including by requiring:

(a) parties seeking production of sexual assault communications, to provide timely notice in writing to the other party and the sexual assault complainant;

(b) that any such written notice be accompanied by a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege and providing contact details for legal assistance; and

(c) that subpoenas be issued with a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege, also providing contact details for legal assistance.
Recommendation 27–9  The Australian, state and territory governments, in association with relevant non-government organisations, should work together to develop and administer training and education programs for judicial officers, legal practitioners and counsellors about the sexual assault communications privilege and how to respond to a subpoena for confidential counselling communications.

Recommendation 27–10  State and territory evidence legislation should provide that:

(a) the opinion rule does not apply to evidence of an opinion of a person based on that person’s specialised knowledge of child development and child behaviour; and

(b) the credibility rule does not apply to such evidence concerning the credibility of children.

Recommendation 27–11  Federal, state and territory legislation should authorise the giving of jury directions about children’s abilities as witnesses and responses to sexual abuse, including in a family violence context.

Recommendation 27–12  Judges should develop model jury directions, drawing on the expertise of relevant professional and research bodies, about children’s abilities as witnesses and responses to sexual abuse, including in a family violence context.

Recommendation 27–13  Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that, in sexual assault proceedings, tendency or coincidence evidence is not inadmissible only because there is a possibility that the evidence is the result of concoction, collusion or suggestion.

28. Other Trial Processes

Recommendation 28–1  Federal, state and territory legislation should prohibit a judge in any sexual assault proceedings from:

(a) warning a jury, or making any suggestion to a jury, that complainants as a class are unreliable witnesses; and

(b) giving a general warning to a jury of the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of any complainant or witness who is a child.

Recommendation 28–2  Australian courts and judicial education bodies should provide judicial education and training, and prepare material for incorporation in bench books, to assist judges to identify the circumstances in which a warning about the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of a particular complainant or child witness is in the interests of justice.

Recommendation 28–3  State and territory legislation should provide, consistently with s 165B of the uniform Evidence Acts, that:

(a) if the court, on application by the defendant, is satisfied that the defendant has suffered a significant forensic disadvantage because of the consequences of delay, the court must inform the jury of the nature of the disadvantage and the need to take that disadvantage into account when considering the evidence;

(b) the judge need not comply with (a) if there are good reasons for not doing so; and

(c) no particular form of words needs to be used in giving the warning pursuant to (a), but in warning the jury, the judge should not suggest that it is ‘dangerous to convict’ because of any demonstrated forensic disadvantage.

Recommendation 28–4  Federal, state and territory legislation should provide that, in sexual assault proceedings:

(a) the effect of any delay in complaint, or absence of complaint, on the credibility of the complainant should be a matter for argument by counsel and for determination by the jury;

(b) subject to paragraph (c), except for identifying the issue for the jury and the competing contentions of counsel, the judge must not give a direction regarding the effect of delay in complaint, or absence of complaint, on the credibility of the complainant, unless satisfied it is necessary to do so in order to ensure a fair trial; and

(c) if evidence is given, a question is asked, or a comment is made that tends to suggest that the victim either delayed making, or failed to make, a complaint in respect of the offence, the judge must tell the jury that there may be good reasons why a victim of a sexual offence may delay making or fail to make a complaint.

Recommendation 28–5  Federal, state and territory legislation should:

(a) prohibit an unrepresented defendant from personally cross-examining any complainant, child witness or other vulnerable witness in sexual assault proceedings; and

(b) provide that an unrepresented defendant be permitted to cross-examine the complainant through a person appointed by the court to ask questions on behalf of the defendant.

Recommendation 28–6  Federal, state and territory legislation should permit prosecutors to tender a record of the original evidence of the complainant in any re-trial ordered on appeal.

Part H – Overarching Issues

29. Integrated Responses

Recommendation 29–1  The Australian, state and territory governments, in establishing or further developing integrated responses to family violence, should ensure that any such response is based on common principles and objectives, developed in consultation with relevant stakeholders.
Recommendation 29–2 The Australian, state and territory governments, in establishing or further developing integrated responses to family violence, should ensure ongoing and responsive collaboration between agencies and organisations, supported by:

(a) protocols and memorandums of understanding;
(b) information-sharing arrangements;
(c) regular meetings; and
(d) where possible, designated liaison officers.

Recommendation 29–3 The Australian, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of, and access to, culturally appropriate victim support services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups.

Recommendation 29–4 The Australian, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of, and access to, legal services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups.

Recommendation 29–5 State and territory victims’ compensation legislation:

(a) should define an ‘act of violence’ to include family violence and ensure that evidence of a pattern of family violence may be considered;
(b) should not provide that acts are ‘related’ merely because they are committed by the same offender, and should provide that victims have the opportunity to object if claims are to be treated as related; and
(c) should ensure that victims’ compensation claims are not excluded on the basis that the offender might benefit from the claim. (Other measures should be adopted to ensure that offenders do not have access to victims’ compensation award.)

30. Information Sharing

Recommendation 30–1 The Initiating Application (Family Law) and Initiating Application (Family Law) Response forms should clearly seek information about past and current family violence protection and child protection orders obtained under state and territory family violence and child protection legislation and past, pending or current proceedings for such orders.

Recommendation 30–2 The Initiating Application (Family Law) and Initiating Application (Family Law) Response forms should be amended to include a question seeking more general information, for example, ‘Do you have any fears for the safety of you or your child or children that the court should know about?’

Recommendation 30–3 Non-publication provisions in state and territory family violence legislation should expressly allow disclosure of information in relation to protection orders and related proceedings that contains identifying information in appropriate circumstances, including disclosure of family violence protection orders to the federal family courts under s 60CF of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).
List of Recommendations

Recommendation 30–4 State and territory child protection legislation should not prevent child protection agencies from disclosing to federal family courts relevant information about children involved in federal family court proceedings in appropriate circumstances.

Recommendation 30–5 Federal family courts and state and territory child protection agencies should develop protocols for:

(a) dealing with requests for documents and information under s 69ZW of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth); and

(b) responding to subpoenas issued by federal family courts.

Recommendation 30–6 State and territory family violence legislation should require courts exercising jurisdiction under that legislation to inquire about existing parenting orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), or pending proceedings for such orders.

Recommendation 30–7 Application forms for family violence protection orders in all states and territories, including applications for variation of protection orders, should clearly seek information about existing parenting orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), or pending proceedings for such orders.

Recommendation 30–8 Federal family courts should provide state and territory courts dealing with family violence and child protection matters—and others with a proper interest in such matters, including police and child protection agencies—with access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal to ensure that they have reliable and timely access to relevant information about existing federal family court orders and pending proceedings for such orders.

Recommendation 30–9 The Australian, state and territory governments should ensure that privacy principles regulating the handling of personal information in each jurisdiction expressly permit the use or disclosure of information where agencies and organisations reasonably believe it is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual’s life, health or safety.

Recommendation 30–10 The Australian, state and territory governments should consider amending secrecy laws that regulate the disclosure of government information to include an express exception to allow the disclosure of information in the course of a government officer’s functions and duties.

Recommendation 30–11 State and territory family violence legislation should expressly authorise the use or disclosure of personal information for the purpose of ensuring the safety of a victim of family violence or an affected child.

Recommendation 30–12 State and territory child protection legislation should expressly authorise agencies to use or disclose personal information for the purpose of ensuring the safety of a child or young person.
Recommendation 30–13 State and territory family violence legislation and child protection legislation should expressly provide for information sharing among specified agencies in specified circumstances, and should include provision to allow information to be shared with specified private sector organisations.

Recommendation 30–14 The Australian, state and territory governments should develop guidelines to assist agencies and organisations working in the family violence and child protection systems to better understand the rules relating to the sharing of information.

Recommendation 30–15 The Australian, state and territory governments should ensure that, in developing any database to allow the sharing of information between agencies and organisations in the family violence or child protection systems, appropriate privacy safeguards are put in place.

Recommendation 30–16 Federal family courts, state and territory magistrates courts, police, and relevant government agencies should develop protocols for the exchange of information in relation to family violence matters. Parties to such protocols should receive regular training to ensure that the arrangements are effectively implemented.

Recommendation 30–17 Federal family courts and state and territory child protection agencies should develop protocols for the exchange of information in those jurisdictions that do not yet have such arrangements in place. Parties to such protocols should receive regular training to ensure that the arrangements are effectively implemented.

Recommendation 30–18 A national register should be established. At a minimum, information on the register should:

(a) include interim, final and police-issued protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation; child protection orders made under state and territory child protection legislation; and related orders and injunctions made under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth); and

(b) be available to federal, state and territory police, federal family courts, state and territory courts that hear matters related to family violence and child protection, and child protection agencies.

Recommendation 30–19 The national register recommended in Rec 30–18 should be underpinned by a comprehensive privacy framework and a privacy impact assessment should be prepared as part of developing the register.

31. Education and Data Collection

Recommendation 31–1 The Australian, state and territory governments and educational, professional and service delivery bodies should ensure regular and consistent education and training for participants in the family law, family violence and child protection systems, in relation to the nature and dynamics of family violence, including its impact on victims, in particular those from high risk and vulnerable groups.
Recommendation 31–2 The Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate with relevant stakeholders to develop and maintain a national bench book on family violence, including sexual assault, having regard to the Commissions’ recommendations in this Report in relation to the content that should be included in such a book.

Recommendation 31–3 Australian tertiary institutions offering legal qualifications should review their curriculums to ensure that legal issues concerning family violence are appropriately addressed.

Recommendation 31–4 Australian legal professional bodies should review continuing professional development requirements to ensure that legal issues concerning family violence are appropriately addressed.

Recommendation 31–5 The Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate in conducting a national audit of family violence training conducted by government and non-government agencies in order to:

(a) ensure that existing resources are best used;
(b) evaluate whether training meets best practice principles; and
(c) promote the development of best practice in training.

Recommendation 31–6 State and territory governments should undertake systemic and ongoing reviews into deaths resulting from family violence.

32. Specialisation

Recommendation 32–1 State and territory governments, in consultation with relevant stakeholders, should establish or further develop specialised family violence courts within existing courts in their jurisdictions.

Recommendation 32–2 State and territory governments should ensure that specialised family violence courts are able to exercise powers to determine: family violence protection matters; criminal matters related to family violence; and family law matters to the extent that family law jurisdiction is conferred on state and territory courts.

Recommendation 32–3 State and territory governments should ensure that specialised family violence courts have, as a minimum:

(a) specialised judicial officers and prosecutors;
(b) regular training on family violence issues for judicial officers, prosecutors, lawyers and registrars;
(c) victim support, including legal and non-legal services; and
(d) arrangements for victim safety.
Recommendation 32–4  State and territory governments should, where possible, promote the following measures in all courts dealing with family violence matters, including courts in regional and remote communities:

(a) identifying and listing on the same day, protection order matters and criminal proceedings related to family violence, as well as related family law and child protection matters;

(b) training judicial officers in relation to family violence;

(c) providing legal services for victims and defendants;

(d) providing victim support on family violence list days; and

(e) ensuring that facilities and practices secure victim safety at court.

Recommendation 32–5  State and territory police should ensure, at a minimum, that:

(a) specialised family violence and sexual assault police units are fostered and structured to ensure appropriate career progression for officers and the retention of experienced personnel;

(b) all police—including specialised police units—receive regular education and training consistent with the Australasian Policing Strategy on the Prevention and Reduction of Family Violence;

(c) specially trained police have responsibility for supervising, monitoring or assuring the quality of police responses to family violence incidents, and providing advice and guidance in this regard; and

(d) victims have access to a primary contact person within the police, who specialises, and is trained, in family violence, including sexual assault issues.
Executive Summary

Contents

Context 49
  Inquiry in context 50
  The brief 50
  Fragmentation of laws and practice 52
Framework for reform 52
  Development of the reform response 53
  Principles for reform 53
  Summary of key recommendations 54
Improving legal frameworks 54
  Common interpretative framework 55
  Corresponding jurisdictions 57
  Improving evidence of family violence 61
  Improving fairness 63
  Sexual assault laws 65
Improving practice 71
  Specialisation 71
  Education and training 75
  National family violence bench book 75
  Integrated responses 76
  Improving police and prosecutorial practice 78
  Information sharing 78
  National register 81
Net effect of the recommendations 82

Context

This Report contains 187 recommendations for reform spread across eight parts—as summarised in Chapter 1. The recommendations reflect, on the one hand, objectives with respect to the reduction of violence, particularly in relation to women and children, and, on the other hand, a framework of key principles for the Inquiry. The Australian Government has identified a clear goal ‘to reduce all violence in our communities’, recognising that ‘whatever the form violence takes, it has serious and often devastating consequences for victims, their extended families and the Inquiry in context

This Inquiry into family violence by the Australian Law Reform Commission (ALRC) and the New South Wales Law Reform Commission (the Commissions) is one of a number of concurrent inquiries on the subject—reflecting intense and ongoing concern in relation to victims of such violence and the public cost over time.

First, the Australian Government Attorney-General commissioned a review by Professor Richard Chisholm, former Justice of the Family Court of Australia, of the practices, procedures and laws that apply in the federal family law courts in the context of family violence. The review was completed at the end of November 2009, and released on 28 January 2010. Secondly, the Family Law Council provided advice to the Attorney-General on the impact of family violence on children and on parenting, which was released at the same time as the Chisholm’s review. Thirdly, the Australian Institute of Family Studies released its evaluation of the 2006 family law reforms, which provided empirical data about the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). This Inquiry therefore takes place in the context of very active contemporary scrutiny of the legal system and its engagement with families and family violence.

The brief

While the scope of the problem of family violence is extensive, the brief in this Inquiry is necessarily constrained both by: the Terms of Reference—set out at the front of this Report; and by the role and function of the Commissions—set out in their constituting Acts. The Commissions were asked to consider:

1) the interaction in practice of State and Territory family/domestic violence and child protection laws with the Family Law Act and relevant Commonwealth, State and Territory criminal laws; and

2) the impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws in cases of sexual assault occurring in a family/domestic violence context, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence.

In relation to both these issues, the Commissions were asked to consider ‘what, if any, improvements could be made to relevant legal frameworks to protect the safety of women and their children’. The range of legal frameworks the focus of this Inquiry was also not ‘at large’, but limited, in the first Term of Reference, to specified areas of interaction; and, in the second Term of Reference, to the impact of inconsistent interpretation and application of law in relation to sexual assault. Nevertheless, the range of laws to be considered was broad—embracing at least 26 legislative regimes. The canvas, therefore, was a very large one—given the number of laws under consideration; and the issues were very complex—given the focus on interaction and inconsistencies.

---

Each area of law reflects its own distinct purposes, anchored in its own history, considered in Chapter 4. The concurrent inquiries, noted above, were focused on the Family Law Act. When the other legislative regimes are brought into consideration—as they were in this Inquiry—the challenges for the Commissions were increased exponentially. There is a further clustering of regimes in which the State is the principal actor—namely, criminal and child protection laws; and those in which the laws essentially concern litigation between parties—namely, family law and family violence law; and the further hybrid nature of family violence laws, where the police may play a key role in a protective regime under the civil law.

The limits of law

A theme articulated during the Inquiry and also in relation to the more general issue of responding to family violence, is the limits of law, both in terms of services but also in terms of its application. As remarked by one stakeholder, ‘you can have the perfect law, but ...’. The Commissions also recognise that the Inquiry concerns only a narrow slice of the vast range of issues raised by family violence—when women and children encounter the legal system in its various manifestations. A comment made by the Family Law Council in its advice to the Attorney-General of Australia in January 2009, is equally apt with respect to the problems of family violence in a much wider sense. The Council, noting that it was only focusing on family violence ‘when it becomes visible in the Family Law system in Australia’, stated that:

> This visible pattern is only the tip of the iceberg of family violence, alcoholism, drug addiction and mental illness which is apparently entrenched in Australia.2

Gendered nature of terms of reference

The Terms of Reference are clearly gendered—in their focus on women and children; and they have a particular lens—family violence. The National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children acknowledged that while women as well as men can commit—as well as be victims of—family violence or sexual assault, the research shows that ‘the overwhelming majority of violence and abuse is perpetrated by men against women’.3 Put very simply, ‘[t]he biggest risk factor for becoming a victim of sexual assault and/or domestic and family violence is being a woman’.4

The suite of recommendations presented in this Report, however, are directed towards reforming legal frameworks with the aim of improving the safety of all victims of family violence—the effect will be to the benefit of all victims, whether male or female.

---

Fragmentation of laws and practice

A key element of the challenge of this Inquiry is that, in the area of family law, neither the Commonwealth nor the states and territories have exclusive legislative competence. The result is an especially fragmented system with respect to children. Moreover the boundaries between the various parts of the system are not always clear and jurisdictional intersections and overlaps are ‘an inevitable, but unintended, consequence’.5

For example, family violence involving children may arise as a dispute between parents and the state in a children’s court—where care and protection proceedings are initiated with respect to a child or children—or as a dispute between parents in a court with jurisdiction under the Family Law Act. There is also a danger that issues concerning violence may fall into the cracks between the systems. The consequence of the division of powers means that:

neither the Commonwealth nor the States’ jurisdiction provides a family unit with the complete suite of judicial solutions to address all of the legal issues that may impact on a family in respect of their children.6

The fragmentation of the system has also led to a fragmentation of practice. A number of stakeholders in this Inquiry commented that the different parts of the legal framework dealing with issues of family violence operated in ‘silos’ and that this was the key problem in the system. Although the laws utilised within each ‘silo’ might be perceived to operate effectively, or to require minor refinement and change, the problems faced by victims of violence required engagement with several different parts of the system. Consequently, as discussed particularly in Chapter 2 and Part E, these people could be referred from court to court, and agency to agency, with the risk that they may fall into the gaps in the system and not obtain the legal solutions—and the protection—that they require.

Framework for reform

The specific objective of this Inquiry is to improve safety for women and children in the context of family violence through recommendations for reform of legal frameworks. In this context, the idea of ‘frameworks’ extends beyond law in the form of legislative instruments to include education, information sharing and other measures to improve police and prosecutorial practice. The overall touchstones throughout the chapters and recommendations, however, are to improve safety and that ensure that where laws are in place, that they need to work well.

6 L Moloney and others, Allegations of Family Violence and Child Abuse in Family Law Children’s Proceedings: A Pre-reform Exploratory Study (2007), prepared for the Australian Institute of Family Studies, [7.3.2].
Development of the reform response

Commitment to widespread consultation is a hallmark of best practice law reform. In undertaking the Inquiry, and in developing a comprehensive response to the Terms of Reference, the Commissions embarked on a wide consultative process as described in Chapter 1. For this Inquiry, a multi-faceted consultation strategy was required—using a broad mix of face-to-face consultations and roundtable discussions; online communication tools and the release of a Consultation Paper together with a companion Consultation Paper Summary.

Two hundred and thirty-six consultations were conducted nationally to reach key stakeholders around the country, including many groups representing Indigenous clients. Internet communication tools were also integrated into the consultation process, to provide information and obtain comment. A monthly e-newsletter highlighted an ‘issue in focus’ and the comments received provided an important additional input. By the end of the Inquiry there were 965 subscribers to the e-newsletter.

The Consultation Paper was a major publication, running to 1,018 pages. To facilitate stakeholder contributions in the restricted time frame for this Inquiry, the Commissions simultaneously released a Consultation Paper Summary of 243 pages. However, the enduring nature of law reform projects is such that the research and evidence base, on which recommendations are based, must be fully explored and reported—and in a complex and extensive Inquiry such as this, substantial documentation is inevitable.

Principles for reform

The framework for reform in this Inquiry is set out in Chapter 3. In summary, the recommendations in this Report are underpinned by four specific principles or policy aims that relevant legal frameworks in this Inquiry should express: seamlessness, accessibility, fairness and effectiveness:

1. Seamlessness—to ensure that the legal framework is as seamless as possible from the point of view of those who engage with it.
2. Accessibility—to facilitate access to legal and other responses to family violence.
3. Fairness—to ensure that legal responses to family violence are fair and just, holding those who use family violence accountable for their actions and providing protection to victims.
4. Effectiveness—to facilitate effective interventions and support in circumstances of family violence.

The reform principles are reflected in an interlinking suite of recommendations addressing both Terms of Reference, plus a specific set in relation to particular aspects of the second Term of Reference. The principles express, at a policy level, the foundation of the recommendations.
Summary of key recommendations

The recommendations themselves can be viewed from two distinct perspectives—a systems perspective, and a participant perspective. The overarching, or predominant principle is that of seamlessness, and to achieve this both perspectives must be connected, to the greatest extent possible, within the constitutional and practical constraints of a federal system. This seamlessness is expressed in recommendations focused on improving legal frameworks and improving practice.

The improvement of legal frameworks will be achieved through:

- a common interpretative framework, core guiding principles and objects, and a better and shared understanding of the meaning, nature and dynamics of family violence that may permeate through the various laws involved when issues of family violence arise;
- corresponding jurisdictions, so that those who experience family violence may obtain a reasonably full set of responses, at least on an interim basis, at whatever point in the system they enter, within the constraints of the division of power under the Australian Constitution;
- improved quality and use of evidence; and
- better interpretation or application of sexual assault laws.

The improvement of practice will be achieved through:

- specialisation—bringing together, as far as possible, a wide set of jurisdictions to deal with most issues relating to family violence in one place, by specialised magistrates supported by a range of specialised legal and other services;
- education and training;
- the development of a national family violence bench book;
- the development of more integrated responses;
- information sharing and better coordination overall, so that the practice in responding to family violence will become less fragmented; and
- the establishment of a national register of relevant court orders and other information.

Improving legal frameworks

In this Report, the Commissions make recommendations directed towards improving the legal frameworks in the area of family violence. In particular, reforms are directed to developing a common interpretative framework, enhancing corresponding jurisdictions, improving the quality and use of evidence and the interpretation and application of sexual assault laws.
Common interpretative framework

A key plank of the Commissions’ recommendations is the adoption of a common interpretative framework in relation to family violence across state and territory family violence legislation, the Family Law Act and, in limited circumstances, the criminal law. This involves: establishing a shared understanding of what constitutes family violence across these legislative schemes; and of the nature, features and dynamics of family violence. In relation to state and territory family violence legislation, it also involves the adoption of core guiding principles based on a human rights framework, the adoption of core purposes, and striving for equality of treatment of family violence victims by establishing common grounds for obtaining protection orders and a core set of persons to be protected.

The common interpretative framework, discussed in Chapters 5 to 7, is based on the same core definition of family violence, describing the context in which behaviour takes place, as well as a shared common understanding of the types of conduct—both physical and non-physical—that may fall within the definition of family violence in the following legislation:

- state and territory family violence legislation;
- the Family Law Act; and
- the criminal law—in the limited circumstances where ‘family violence’ is defined in the context of defences to homicide.

The Commissions recommend, in Chapters 5 and 6, that each legislative regime should provide that family violence is violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour, that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. Such behaviour may include but is not limited to:

(a) physical violence;
(b) sexual assault and other sexually abusive behaviour;
(c) economic abuse;
(d) emotional or psychological abuse;
(e) stalking;
(f) kidnapping or deprivation of liberty;
(g) damage to property, irrespective of whether the victim owns the property;
(h) causing injury or death to an animal irrespective of whether the victim owns the animal; and
(i) behaviour by the person using violence that causes a child to be exposed to the effects of behaviour referred to in (a)–(h) above.

Adopting consistent definitions of family violence across different legislative schemes allows the courts to send clear messages about what constitutes family violence. The Commissions also recommend, in Chapter 7, that this definition be complemented in family violence legislation by a provision that explains the nature, features and dynamics of family violence, including: while anyone may be a victim of family violence, or may use family violence, it is predominantly committed by men; it can occur in all sectors of society; it can involve exploitation of power imbalances; its incidence is underreported; and it has a detrimental impact on children. In addition, family violence legislation should refer to the particular impact of family violence on:
Indigenous persons; those from a culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) background; those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities; older persons; and people with disabilities. The Commissions recommend the adoption of a similar provision in the Family Law Act.

The Commissions are not advocating that all types of conduct that constitute family violence should be criminalised, nor that family violence should be given the same treatment in the various legal frameworks considered in this Report. In each case, the severity and context of particular family violence may carry varying weight in different legal proceedings, depending on the reasons for advancing evidence of family violence and the purposes of the respective legal frameworks—which are analysed in Chapter 4.
Nor do the Commissions consider that the adoption of a shared understanding of what constitutes family violence in any way compromises the objects and purposes of the legislative schemes that are the subject of this approach. It is imperative that common definitions of family violence reflect a consistent and shared understanding of the concepts that underlie the legislative schemes, reinforced by appropriate and regular training.

The Commissions consider that there is a stronger case for uniformity of the definition of family violence across an individual state or territory’s family violence and criminal laws, in the limited circumstances where family violence is defined in the context of defences to homicide. Uniformity of the definition within an individual state or territory—as opposed to a core definition with a shared understanding of what constitutes family violence—has the advantage of clearly conveying a legislative intention for a consistent interpretation of family violence across criminal and civil jurisdictions. Moreover, this will also facilitate the proper recognition in the criminal law of the broad ambit of family violence, as discussed in Chapter 14, in the context of defences to homicide.

The Commissions consider that significant systemic benefits would flow from the adoption of a common interpretative framework, across different legislative schemes, promoting the foundational policy principles of seamlessness and effectiveness underlying the approach to reform advocated by this Inquiry. Embracing a common understanding of family violence is also likely to have a positive flow-on effect in the gathering of evidence of family violence for use in more than one set of proceedings.
Another significant benefit of adopting a commonly shared understanding of family violence is that it will facilitate the registration and enforcement of family violence protection orders under the proposed national registration of protection orders scheme, considered in Chapter 30, and provide more useful and comparable data upon which policies to address family violence can be based.
Corresponding jurisdictions

A crucial set of recommendations in this Report, in the chapters identified below, is aimed at implementing in law the concept of ‘one court’, through an expansion of jurisdiction of federal, state and territory courts responding to family law, family violence and child protection issues. In particular, while the prospect of a single new specialist court to deal with all legal matters relating to family violence is not practicable, an effective way to achieve the benefits of ‘one court’ is to develop corresponding jurisdictions, in which each of the jurisdictions of courts dealing with family violence correspond to an appropriate degree. Enhancing the ability of courts to deal with matters outside their core jurisdiction will allow victims of family violence to resolve their legal issues relating to family violence in the same court, as far as practicable, consistent with the constitutional division of powers.

State and territory courts

Family law

The Commissions recommend, in Chapter 16, that the Family Law Act should be amended to allow state and territory courts, when making or varying a protection order, to make a parenting order under pt VII of the Family Law Act until any further order—a reinstatement of the jurisdiction that was removed from state and territory courts in 2006.

State and territory magistrates courts are often the first point of contact with the legal system for separating families who have experienced family violence. As such, the Commissions consider that it is important that state and territory magistrates courts can deal with as many issues relating to the protection of victims of family violence as possible. Making an interim parenting order at this time may take the heat out of the situation by regulating how separating parents spend time and communicate with their children. For example, while a protection order may include conditions to protect a person from violence or harassment, a parenting order may prescribe handover arrangements to minimise contact between the parents. In appropriate cases, a judicial officer making a parenting order during protection order proceedings could also make orders to facilitate transfer to a federal family court, for example by making orders about family counselling or appointing an independent children’s lawyer.

One reason for the recommendation to repeal the power of state and territory courts to make parenting orders, was the view that magistrates courts had limited time and resources to perform this role. The Commissions acknowledge the force of the practical concerns reflected in submissions to this Inquiry. The recommendations made in this Report are put forward as part of a package. The goal of ensuring that legal systems that deal with issues of family violence are as accessible and seamless as possible requires that changes to the jurisdiction as well as the practices of state and territory courts to be implemented together.

In particular, the Commissions consider that developing and extending specialised practices in family violence in state and territory courts is an important way to foster the expertise and focus the resources of courts, judicial officers and legal practitioners.
The importance of specialisation in the exercise of family law jurisdiction by state and territory magistrates courts is discussed in Chapter 16, while the benefits of specialised practice across the systems responding to family violence are considered in Chapter 32.

Criminal law

The Commissions have made a number of recommendations to improve the interaction of family violence and criminal laws. In Chapter 10, the Commissions recommend that in granting bail, judicial officers should be required to consider whether to impose protective bail conditions, issue or vary a family violence protection order, or do both.

In Chapter 11, the Commissions recommend that state and territory family violence legislation should include an express provision conferring on courts a power to make a protection order on their own initiative at any stage of a criminal proceeding. Any such order made prior to a plea or finding of guilt should be interim until there is a plea or finding of guilt. The Commissions have also recommended prosecutors be empowered to apply for protection orders where a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence.

Further, a court before which a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence involving family violence should be required to consider whether any existing protection order needs to be varied to provide greater protection for the person against whom the offence was committed.

The combined effect of these recommendations is to increase the likelihood that judicial officers and prosecutors in family violence related criminal proceedings will focus on victim safety and protection and lessen the trauma, stress and time involved in a victim having to apply for a protection order, or the variation of such an order, in separate civil proceedings.

Federal family courts

Personal protection

In Chapter 17, the Commissions consider how to make the federal family courts’ jurisdiction as similar as possible to that of state and territory magistrates courts with respect to the protection it can provide for personal safety. Although federal family courts already have powers directed towards the safety of victims of family violence who come within the jurisdiction of the Family Law Act, the Commissions have heard that solutions available for victims of family violence in federal family courts are largely ineffective. Consequently, the Commissions recommend reforms to make injunctions for personal protection more effective for victims of family violence who are before a federal family court. The Commissions recommend that the existing framework for protection orders in the Family Law Act be amended to provide that a breach of such orders is a criminal offence—so that they operate as closely as possible to the protection provisions available under state and territory legislation.

In making this recommendation, the Commissions do not suggest the development of a protection order practice in federal family courts to replicate exactly the jurisdiction of state and territory courts. The Commissions consider that state and territory courts should remain the primary jurisdiction for obtaining a protection order—particularly given the role of police in proceedings in those courts, the wider range of persons who may be protected by state and territory family violence legislation, and the considerable experience of state and territory magistrates and court staff with respect to family violence protection order proceedings.
Executive Summary

However, the Commissions are of the view that victims of family violence—in particular, those for whom family law proceedings are on foot or anticipated—should be able to obtain effective orders for their protection in federal family courts, if they need them. This allows victims to resolve their legal issues to a greater extent in the one court process—in this instance, in federal family courts. The Commissions consider that fostering the seamlessness of the court process in this way has significant benefits for victims of family violence. This approach also minimises victims’ exposure to multiple proceedings in different jurisdictions, thereby avoiding the personal and financial impacts of repeated proceedings and consequent reiteration of the same facts before different courts.

The Commissions acknowledge the potential resource implications in developing corresponding jurisdictions, notably in the provision of training to judicial officers and police, which is the subject of a specific set of recommendations, drawn together in Chapter 31. Developing the ability of federal family courts to deal with matters of personal protection may also have an effect on legal aid funding. However, the Commissions consider these reforms will lead to long term savings, by reducing replication across different jurisdictions.

Parenting orders and child protection agencies

A clear jurisdictional gap in the power of federal family courts to respond to family violence arises where a case involves allegations of child abuse and the court wishes to make an order giving parental responsibility to the child protection agency because the judge considers that there is no other viable option for that child. This also attracted attention when in 2009 the Family Law Council recommended that:

The Attorney General as a member of SCAG address the referral of powers to federal family courts so that in determining a parenting application federal family courts have concurrent jurisdiction with that of State Courts to deal with all matters in relation to children including where relevant family violence, child protection and parenting orders.7

While the Commissions are disinclined to recommend a general reference of child welfare powers to federal family courts, in Chapter 19 it is recommended that there be a limited referral of powers to enable the Australian Government to make laws allowing family courts to confer parental rights and duties on a child protection agency in cases where there is no other viable and protective carer—but only in this limited class of case.

State and territory children’s courts

Parenting orders

Each state and territory court of summary jurisdiction is vested with jurisdiction under pt VII of the Family Law Act. Magistrates are able to exercise federal family law jurisdiction under s 69J of the Family Law Act, but children’s court magistrates are not always able to do so. Seen and Heard: Priority for Children in the Legal Process (ALRC Report 84) criticised legal processes which required a child’s persistent and multiple engagement with the legal system as being contrary to the child’s best interests. It is also at odds with the goal of seamlessness that the Commissions have identified as a principal aim of this Inquiry.

The Commissions consider that, wherever possible, matters involving children should be dealt with in one court—or as seamlessly as the legal and support frameworks can achieve in any given case. This was also the outcome recommended by the Family Law Council in 2002 in its report on family law and child protection, as part of its ‘one court’ principle—that is, that state and territory courts should have a broad power to make residence and contact orders under the Family Law Act in child protection proceedings so that one court can deal with all substantive matters and ensure the child’s best interests and welfare are addressed.

The Commissions therefore recommend, in Chapter 19, that the Family Law Act should be amended to provide that when a matter is before a children’s court, such courts should have the same powers to make decisions under the Family Law Act as magistrates courts—including the expanded powers recommended in Chapter 16.

Expanding the jurisdiction of children’s courts in this way would have the advantage that where a case commences in a children’s court but raises parenting issues, a court apprised of the child protection concerns and having evidence from a child protection authority would be able to decide if it were more appropriate for a decision to be made under child protection legislation, or under the Family Law Act. It would have jurisdiction to make both types of orders.

Protection orders

A number of state and territory family violence laws already confer jurisdiction on children’s courts to make family violence protection orders, although the powers conferred on some state and territory children’s courts are more limited than others.

The Commissions recommend, in Chapter 20, that all Australian children’s courts should have clear jurisdiction under family violence legislation to hear and determine applications for family violence protection orders where the person affected by the family violence, to be protected, or against whom the order is sought, is under 18 years. However, the jurisdiction should only be enlivened where there are proceedings in the court involving the child or young person, or a member of the child’s or young person’s family.

Expanding the jurisdiction of children’s courts to make family violence protection orders is consistent with the Commissions’ overarching policy objective that, to the maximum extent possible, families who enter the legal system should be able to apply for, and be granted the orders they need to address their safety concerns by the court with which they first engage. Such orders would be a significant adjunct to the orders presently available under child protection legislation to ensure the safety of the child and the child’s non-offending parent.

Jurisdiction to make family violence protection orders also fits squarely within the expertise of children’s court magistrates. Family violence issues are part of the core work of children’s courts. Many children’s courts magistrates are also likely to have experience in exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation in their capacity as magistrates dealing with adults. The benefits of the enhanced jurisdiction are significant. It creates a more seamless system for victims of family violence—including children—to allow them to access as many orders and services as possible in the court in which the family is first involved; removes the need for the child and the family to have to navigate multiple courts; reduces the need for victims of family violence to have to repeat their stories; and consequently reduces the likelihood that people will drop out of the system without the protections they need.

Where a children’s court has jurisdiction to hear a family violence protection order application, the court should also be able to make a family violence protection order in favour of siblings of the child or young person who is the subject of proceedings, or other children or young people within the same household, who are affected by the same or similar circumstances; and to make a family violence protection order for the protection of an adult where the adult is affected by the same or similar circumstances.

Improving evidence of family violence

From the first moment a victim of family violence enters the legal system—most often in a state or territory magistrates court—the aim of the recommendations in this Report is to capture the evidence in a way that reduces the need for repetition—a common complaint. Some recommendations are aimed at improving what information is provided by parties; others focus on what courts are expected to ask of parties; others place attention on ensuring that information about family violence is properly considered.

The Commissions consider that legal and other responses to family violence are improved if information is provided and of better quality from the outset. In Chapter 18, the Commissions recommend that state and territory courts should ensure that application forms for protection orders include information about the kinds of conduct that constitute family violence and should require that applicants swear or affirm a statement incorporated in, or attached to, the application form, setting out the basis of the application. In Chapter 16 a similar recommendation is made with respect to seeking information about property orders under the Family Law Act or any pending application for such orders.

Complementing this encouragement of better information from the parties, the Commissions recommend—in Chapters 30 and 16 respectively—that courts exercising jurisdiction under state and territory family violence legislation should inquire about existing parenting orders under the Family Law Act or pending proceedings for such orders; and when considering whether to make personal property directions in protection order proceedings, to inquire about and consider any property orders under the Family Law Act or pending application for such orders.

As discussed in Chapter 15, in the family law context there are a number of ways that information about family violence may be brought to the attention of the court, including where information is supplied by the parties, or by other professionals working with the parties. Information may also be shared between different courts or between agencies and organisations and the courts—this is considered in Chapter 30. The Commissions are of the view that a range of mechanisms should be used to collect information relevant to parenting proceedings in the family courts.

Currently, the Initiating Application (Family Law) includes one general question seeking information on existing orders and one general question seeking information on ongoing cases about family law, child support, family violence or child welfare. In comparison, some state and territory protection order application forms ask separately for details about, for example, children’s court orders, protection orders, and family court orders. The Commissions support this more detailed approach in which questions are asked, or tick boxes provided, in relation to each different order and each different kind of case.

The Commissions acknowledge that some caution must be exercised in using family violence protection orders as evidence of family violence in the family court system in some circumstances, and this issue is discussed in detail in Chapter 18. However, it is important that the family court system be aware that such orders exist so as to avoid, as far as possible, the making of inconsistent parenting orders.

In relation to family law applications, in Chapter 30, the Commissions recommend amending initiating application forms to clearly seek information about past and current family violence protection and child protection orders obtained under state and territory family violence and child protection legislation and past, pending or current proceedings for such orders. Then, in assessing what parenting order to make in the context of allegations of family violence, the Commissions recommend in Chapter 17 that a court, when determining the best interests of the child, must consider evidence of family violence given, or findings made, in relevant family violence protection order proceedings.

Further, to improve the understanding of victims of family violence concerning their options in the context of family dispute resolution under the Family Law Act, the Commissions recommend in Chapter 23 that participants are advised that: they may be exempt from requirements to participate in family dispute resolution; they should inform a family dispute resolution practitioner about any family violence protection orders or proceedings; and they should inform federal family courts about any family violence protection orders or proceedings, where family court proceedings are initiated.

These recommendations represent a combination of ‘push’ and ‘pull’ factors directed towards better information capture on the most likely first occasion of presentation.
Executive Summary

Improving fairness

A number of recommendations throughout this Report are directed to ensuring fairness—both to victims of family violence and to those who have used it—reflecting a key reform principle in this Inquiry.

To the victim

To improve the experience of victims of family violence in the context of family violence proceedings, the Commissions recommend, in Chapter 18, that state and territory family violence legislation should prohibit the respondent in protection order proceedings from personally cross-examining any person against whom the respondent is alleged to have used family violence. Further, where a decision is made not to grant an exclusion order against the person who has used family violence, even though such order has been sought, the Commissions recommend in Chapter 11 that a court should be required to give reasons for declining to make the order. Transparency of decision-making is an essential ingredient of fairness.

To ensure that victims are fully informed about decisions in relation to family violence offences committed against them, the Commissions recommend, in Chapter 10, that state and territory legislation should impose an obligation on police and prosecutors to inform victims of family violence promptly of decisions to grant or refuse bail and, where bail is granted, the conditions of release. Victims should also be given or sent a copy of the bail conditions, or such conditions should be sent to family violence legal and service providers with whom a victim is known to have regular contact. Where there are bail conditions and a protection order, police and prosecutors—properly trained about such matters—should explain how these interact.

The Commissions also make recommendations in the context of criminal offences that recognise the nature and dynamics of family violence and the impact on victims. For example, such as the recommendation, in Chapter 12, that state and territory legislation should provide that a person protected by a protection order under family violence legislation cannot be charged with or found guilty of an offence of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the breach of a protection order. In addition, the Commissions recommend, in Chapter 14, that state and territory criminal legislation should ensure that defences to homicide accommodate the experiences of family violence victims who kill.

Accountability

A key aspect of fairness is the accountability of those who use family violence. While the imposition of rehabilitation and counselling conditions as part of a protection order raises some challenging issues in application, the Commissions consider that these challenges ought to be met as part of a broad integrated response to family violence. It is important for family violence legislation expressly to allow for courts making protection orders to impose conditions requiring persons to attend rehabilitation or counselling programs in appropriate circumstances. Recommendations to this effect are made in Chapter 11.
Rehabilitation programs are an essential measure for treating the causes rather than the symptoms of family violence. While protection order conditions prohibiting or restricting a respondent’s contact with the victim may assist in reducing or preventing violence against that victim in the short term, successful participation by a respondent in appropriate and relevant rehabilitation and counselling programs has the advantage of targeting the long-term reduction or prevention of family violence—including as against persons other than the victim who is the subject of the protection order.

In addition, where appropriate, state and territory courts should provide persons against whom protection orders are made with information about relevant culturally and gender-appropriate rehabilitation and counselling programs.

To the respondent/accused

The Commissions have made recommendations to ensure fair treatment of those who use family violence—whether in civil family violence proceedings, in a criminal trial, or in sentencing.

In Chapter 9, the Commissions make a recommendation limiting the circumstances in which police can issue protection orders against those who have used family violence. The ALRC is under an obligation under the Australian Law Reform Commission Act 1996 (Cth) to ensure that the laws it reviews do not make the rights and liberties of citizens unduly dependent on administrative rather than judicial decisions.

In Chapter 11, the Commissions recommend that judicial officers making protection orders be required to consider whether or not to make an exclusion order. While the primary factor to consider in making this decision is the necessity of ensuring the safety of a victim or affected child, the Commissions also consider that relevant secondary factors include the accommodation needs and options available to the parties, particularly in light of any disability that they may have.

Fairness to a person accused of a criminal offence is a fundamental principle of justice and, as discussed in Chapter 2, reflective of obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, including the right to a ‘fair and public hearing’ in art 14 with minimum procedural guarantees in the case of criminal charges.

In the context of the trial of an accused for an offence arising out of conduct that is the same or substantially similar to that on which a protection order is based, the Commissions recommend—in Chapter 11—that references cannot be made, without the leave of the court, to:

(a) the making, variation and revocation of protection orders in proceedings under family violence legislation—unless the offence the subject of the trial is breach of a protection order, in which case leave of the court is not necessary;

(b) the refusal of a court to make, vary or revoke a protection order in proceedings under family violence legislation; and
(c) the existence of current proceedings for a protection order under family violence legislation against the person the subject of the criminal proceedings.

To allow references to be made to facts that have not been subject to the criminal standard of proof may be prejudicial to an accused, affecting his or her rights to a fair trial. The risk of prejudice is significantly increased in circumstances where an accused has agreed to a protection order without admission of liability. Evidence about whether protection orders were made, varied or revoked, or whether applications for such orders were rejected, could improperly influence juries in their deliberations. Where the evidence is about the making of a protection order, or a variation to increase the protection provided by such an order, adverse inferences might be drawn by jurors, which may operate unfairly for an accused.

On the other hand, the fact that a protection order was made or that the court refused to vary or revoke an order could, for example, be relevant to tendency or coincidence or motive. Requiring a party to seek the leave of the court to lead evidence of such matters acts as an important safeguard in ensuring that an accused is given a fair trial.

In Chapter 12, the Commissions recommend that state and territory family violence legislation should not impose mandatory minimum penalties or mandatory imprisonment for the offence of breaching a protection order. The maintenance of individualised justice and broad judicial discretion are essential attributes of our criminal justice system, outweighing any potential deterrent effect that mandatory sentencing might have.

One aspect of achieving fairness in sentencing is the Commissions’ recommendation, in the context of family violence related offences, that state and territory legislation should provide that a court sentencing an offender should take into account:

(a) any protection order conditions to which the person being sentenced is subject, where those conditions arise out of the same or substantially the same conduct giving rise to the prosecution for the offence; and

(b) the duration of any protection order to which the offender is subject.

Sexual assault laws

Each Australian jurisdiction has its own set of substantive and procedural criminal laws. The main point of divergence between jurisdictions is whether the criminal law is codified or remains guided by the common law.

Legislative reform is only one of a number of mechanisms available to respond to problems arising from the response of the legal system to sexual assault. Nonetheless, to the extent that reform of the content of sexual offences can help ensure fairness through consistent expectations and treatment of sexual assault matters across jurisdictions, the Commissions support further harmonisation of sexual assault offence provisions.

Jurisdictions also differ as to the adoption of the uniform Evidence Acts. The implementation of the uniform Evidence Acts in all Australian jurisdictions—as recommended in Uniform Evidence Law (ALRC Report 102)—is a critical step towards ensuring consistent application of laws in cases of sexual assault.

The recommendations in this Report focus particularly on those aspects of sexual assault laws that are most likely to arise in a family violence context—that is, for those who have been sexually assaulted by a current or former intimate partner (spouse, de facto, boyfriend/girlfriend) or family member. However, most of the issues apply to all sexual assault proceedings, regardless of the relationship between the complainant and the perpetrator.

Part G highlights ways in which particular laws and procedures operate for victims of sexual assault. In many instances, Australian jurisdictions take different approaches to law and procedure in the areas discussed. As a result, these chapters examine which approaches best recognise the nature of sexual violence and address the negative experience of complainants in the criminal justice system. Where it is possible to identify certain approaches as more promising and progressive than others, the Commissions propose that the Australian, state and territory governments should implement consistent measures of these kinds.

The Commissions make a number of recommendations aimed at consistency of laws concerning sexual assault that arise in a family violence context. The recommendations concern, among other things: objectives and guiding principles in relation to sexual offences; definitions of consent and other elements of offences; and jury directions. Recommendations are also made in relation to a range of procedural and evidentiary issues.

Many areas of law and procedure relating to sexual assault proceedings are not addressed in this Report. Given the timeframe and ambit of the Terms of Reference, the Commissions’ work focused on inconsistencies in the interpretation or application of laws in those areas which have the most direct impact on victims of sexual assault in a family violence context. The Commissions acknowledge that reform in this area has been substantial over the last three decades, resulting in legislative and procedural changes which have improved legal responses to sexual assault committed in a family violence context. However, much remains to be done to address both legislative and practice-based gaps and inconsistencies which have a negative impact on victims of sexual assault.

Guiding principles and objects clauses

Statements of objectives and guiding principles can perform an important symbolic and educative role in the application and interpretation of the law, as well as in the general community. While much more is required to change culture, such statements provide an important opportunity for governments and legal players to articulate their understanding of sexual violence and provide a benchmark against which to assess the implementation of the law and procedure.

Such objectives and principles are intended to provide a contextual framework for the legislative response to sexual assault, rather than any exhaustive list of issues to which judicial officers and jurors should have regard. The Commissions’ recommendations do, however, expand on the Victorian provisions, which are used as a model, to incorporate certain other matters. In particular, the Commissions consider that it is desirable to acknowledge that sexual violence in the family context constitutes family violence, as it is precisely these cases that criminal justice systems deal with least effectively. Further, it is important to recognise the particular vulnerability of certain groups of women and, as a result, specifically recognise the experiences of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, those from CALD backgrounds and women with a cognitive impairment.

The Commissions recommend that legislative statements of objectives should underline the aims of upholding individual sexual autonomy and agency, while ensuring the protection of vulnerable persons from sexual exploitation. In addition, guiding principles should be incorporated in sexual offences, criminal procedure or evidence legislation, to recognise the nature and dynamics of sexual assault.

In particular, the Commissions recommend that state and territory legislation dealing with sexual offences should state that the objectives of the sexual offence provisions are to:

(a) uphold the fundamental right of every person to make decisions about his or her sexual behaviour and to choose not to engage in sexual activity; and

(b) protect children, young people and persons with a cognitive impairment from sexual exploitation.

Complementing such objectives, the Commissions recommend the inclusion of guiding principles in state and territory legislation dealing with sexual offences, criminal procedure or evidence, to which courts should have regard when interpreting provisions relating to sexual offences. At a minimum, these guiding principles should refer to the following, that:

(a) sexual violence constitutes a form of family violence;
(b) there is a high incidence of sexual violence within society;
(c) sexual offences are significantly under-reported;
(d) a significant number of sexual offences are committed against women, children and other vulnerable persons, including those from Indigenous and CALD backgrounds, and persons with a cognitive impairment;
(e) sexual offenders are commonly known to their victims; and
(f) sexual offences often occur in circumstances where there are unlikely to be any physical signs of an offence having occurred.

Sexual offences

In Chapter 25, the Commissions make a number of recommendations with respect to the definition of sexual intercourse or penetration; the age of consent for all sexual offences; consent—based on the concept of free and voluntary agreement—and the circumstances that may vitiate consent.

The Commissions recommend that the definition of sexual intercourse or penetration should be broad and not gender-specific, and should be made more consistent across jurisdictions. The definition is in keeping with the shift away from historically gendered and restrictive definitions of sexual intercourse and is consistent with the definition in the Model Criminal Code.

The Commissions recommend the age of consent for sexual activity should be made more uniform both within and across jurisdictions and that there be no distinction made based on gender, sexuality or any other factor.

In adult sexual assault trials, it is common for the defendant to admit sexual activity but assert a belief that it was consensual. This is a matter for the jury to determine by reference to the defendant’s actual state of mind—and, in some jurisdictions, by reference to whether that state of mind was reasonable—at the time the sexual conduct occurred. In a family violence context, where the complainant and the defendant know each other, the issue of consent is particularly complex.

The Commissions recommend the adoption of a statutory definition of consent across all Australian jurisdictions. The Commissions consider that a definition based on agreement properly reflects the two objectives of sexual offences law: protecting the sexual autonomy and freedom of choice of adults; and reinforcing both positive and communicative understandings of consent through use of the term ‘agreement’.

To the extent that introducing the concept of ‘agreement’ to the definition of consent may give rise to interpretation issues and problems in practice, the Commissions consider that supplementing any legislative provision that defines consent with a provision that includes a list of circumstances where free agreement may not have been given will assist, in practice, to clarify the meaning and expression of ‘agreement’.

Identifying the circumstances where there can be no consent, and where there may be no consent, as determined by the jury, has been a key concern of law reform in this area. The Commissions recommend that, at a minimum, federal, state and territory legislation should recognise certain specified circumstances as ones where consent may be vitiated. The recommendation intentionally leaves it open to the Australian, state and territory parliaments to decide whether particular circumstances should be considered as automatically negating consent. The recommended list of circumstances is non-exhaustive, as is presently the case in all Australian jurisdictions. This allows juries to find, on the evidence, that there was no consent, even if a case does not fall within one of the listed circumstances.

Procedure and evidence

In Chapters 26 to 28, the Commissions examine selected developments aimed at reducing attrition and improving the experiences in the criminal justice system of those who have suffered a sexual assault, and make a range of recommendations concerning criminal procedure and evidence.
Some of these reforms are of particular application to sexual assault cases involving multiple incidents and multiple complainants—a situation that often arises in a family violence context, for example, where a number of siblings allege that a parent has sexually abused them.

In such situations, the prosecution is likely to make a pre-trial application to have the counts against the defendant heard in a joint trial, rather than separate trials. The defence, in contrast, is more likely to apply for separate trials for each offence. The power to order a joint trial is discretionary and is exercised in order to prevent prejudice to the defendant.

When the complainant’s credibility is attacked in a separate trial, evidence that would support his or her credibility may be disallowed and the jury kept in ignorance of the fact that there are multiple allegations of abuse against the defendant. This has the potential to cause unfairness and injustice.

Further, if separate trials are held, children involved may have to give evidence numerous times, a process which can exacerbate the emotional stress experienced by child complainants. Adult victims of sexual offences in a family violence context also face additional trauma, especially as the pattern of offending is often long term, rather than centred on one specific incident.

The Commissions recommend, in Chapter 26, a presumption of joint trial to encourage judges to order joint trials in sexual offence proceedings wherever possible. The main justification for this recommendation is that joint trials tend to reduce trauma for complainants. It would still be open to a court to order separate trials where evidence on one charge is inadmissible on another charge—for example, because its probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant.

Recommendations in Chapter 27 address aspects of evidence law, including in relation to: restrictions on the admission of evidence of a complainant’s sexual experience or activity; the admission of expert evidence on the development and behaviour of children and implications for their credibility as witnesses; and the admission of tendency or coincidence evidence.

Complementing these recommendations are others in Chapter 28 that concern jury directions—specifying what a judge should, or should not, say to a jury in any sexual assault proceedings, in order to ensure a fair trial. These include recommendations intended to: ensure that judges in sexual assault proceedings do not suggest to juries that complainants as a class are unreliable witnesses, or give a general warning about the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of any complainant or witness who is a child; and restricting the circumstances in which directions regarding the effect of delay in complaint, or absence of complaint, on the credibility of the complainant may be given.

Protecting victims of sexual assault

The Commissions make a range of recommendations concerning the protection of victims of sexual assault in relation to the giving of evidence. While these recommendations are principally directed to situations most likely to involve family violence, they are of more general application to sexual assault proceedings.

Committals

In relation to committal hearings, the Commissions recommend, in Chapter 26, that state and territory legislation should prohibit: any child; and any adult complainant, unless there are special or prescribed reasons, from being required to attend to give evidence at committal hearings in relation to sexual offences.

Pre-recorded evidence

Most states and territories have enacted regimes for the comprehensive pre-recording of evidence for child victims of sexual assault (and those who are cognitively or intellectually impaired). The Commissions recommend that similar provisions should be available in relation to the evidence of all adult complainants of sexual assault, to minimise the negative experiences of complainants of sexual assault in the criminal justice system where this can be done without prejudicing defendants’ rights to a fair trial.

In Chapter 26, the Commissions recommend that all Australian jurisdictions should adopt comprehensive provisions dealing with pre-recorded evidence in sexual offence proceedings, permitting the tendering of pre-recorded evidence of interview between investigators and a sexual assault complainant as the complainant’s evidence-in-chief. Such provisions should apply to all complainants of sexual assault (adults and children).

In addition, child complainants of sexual assault, and complainants of sexual assault who are vulnerable as a result of mental or physical impairment, should be permitted to provide evidence recorded at a pre-trial hearing. This evidence should be able to be replayed at the trial as the witness’ evidence. Adult victims of sexual assault should also be permitted to provide evidence in this way, by order of the court.

Sexual assault communications privilege

From the mid-1990s, ongoing reform of sexual assault laws and procedure has included the enactment of legislation to limit the disclosure and use of sexual assault communications—communications made in the course of a confidential relationship between the victim of a sexual assault and a counsellor. The defence may seek access to this material to assist with their preparation for trial and for use during cross-examination of the complainant and other witnesses.

The Commissions concluded that more needs to be done to ensure that existing legislative provisions operate effectively, in practice, to protect counselling communications. The Commissions recommend, in Chapter 27, that federal, state and territory legislation relating to subpoenas and the operation of the sexual assault communications privilege should ensure that the interests of complainants in sexual assault proceedings are better protected, including by requiring:

- parties seeking production of sexual assault communications, to provide timely notice in writing to the other party and the sexual assault complainant; that any such written notice issued be accompanied by a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege and providing contact details for legal assistance; that subpoenas be issued with a pro forma fact sheet on the privilege, also providing contact details for legal assistance.

Improving practice

Improving practice is based upon a number of inter-related elements: specialisation; appropriate and regular education and training; the development of a national family violence bench book; integrated practice; improved police and prosecutorial practice; improved information flow and the establishment of a national register.

Specialisation

In the course of this Inquiry, the Commissions have concluded that the specialisation of key individuals and institutions is crucial to improving the interaction in practice of legal frameworks governing family violence, and sexual assault in the family violence context. Chapter 32 considers ways to foster and improve the effectiveness of specialised family violence courts and specialised police units with the aim of producing safe, fair and just outcomes for victims and their families.

Specialised family violence court

The term ‘specialised court’ can be used to refer to a number of things. For example, the term can be used to refer to separate stand alone courts that deal only with a particular subject matter—such as the Family Court of Australia, which ‘specialises’ in matters under the Family Law Act. Children’s courts, similarly, may be considered as specialised courts dealing with child-related matters. There are, however, no stand alone specialised family violence courts in Australia.

In courts that deal with a range of subject matters, there can be a division or special program embedded within existing court structures that deals with a particular subject matter. For example, in Victoria, there is the Family Violence Division of the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria. In other instances, a court may operate a ‘specialised list’, in which certain categories of cases are heard on certain days of the week, often by dedicated judicial officers. Both these types of ‘specialised courts’ are common in the Australian legal system.

Many specialised courts simply operate as a matter of practice, and their structures are established through administrative mechanisms. However, some specialised courts may be expressly established by legislation.

Specialisation can help to ensure that victims have contact with those in the system—including judicial officers, lawyers, prosecutors, police and family dispute resolution practitioners—who have the best understanding of the nature, features and dynamics of family violence. This knowledge and understanding allows these individuals better to assist victims in navigating the legal, social and health systems by connecting legal frameworks and social services.
Specialisation can also operate to improve the system as a whole. As many stakeholders have emphasised, attitudinal and behavioural change—although highly desirable—can be slow to achieve. Specialisation acts both as a way of attracting those with an interest and aptitude for family violence work, and allows education, training and other resources to be focused upon a smaller group for more immediate results and improved outcomes. Specialists can help to promote attitudinal change if they are given opportunities to share information with, and to contribute to, the education and training of those in the general system.

Specialisation can improve consistency and efficiency in the interpretation and application of laws, as a result of shared understandings and the awareness and experience of a smaller number of decision makers. Specialists can identify and solve problems more quickly and effectively and can develop and promote best practice that can then be mainstreamed to drive change in the system more generally.

In the long run, the efficiency gains through specialisation may produce better outcomes that result in substantial savings elsewhere in the system—for example, earlier and more effective legal intervention may result in fewer cases requiring child protection agencies to intervene, and fewer demands on medical and psychological services. For these reasons, specialists are more likely to be effective in addressing family violence, and in their ability to make the system more efficient as a whole.

The Commissions received significant support for the proposal that specialised family violence courts should be more widely established in Australia. The experiences of Australian and overseas jurisdictions provide evidence of the value of specialised family violence courts in terms of improving the interaction in practice of legal frameworks relevant to this Inquiry. These benefits include:

- greater sensitivity to the context of family violence and the needs of victims through the specialised training and skills of staff;
- greater integration, coordination and efficiency in the management of cases through identification and clustering of cases into a dedicated list, case tracking, inter-agency collaboration, and the referral of victims and offenders to services;
- greater consistency in the handling of family violence cases both within and across legal jurisdictions;
- greater efficiency in court processes;
- development of best practice, through the improvement of procedural measures in response to regular feedback from court users and other agencies; and
- better outcomes in terms of victim satisfaction, improvement in the response of the legal system (for example, better rates of reporting, prosecution, convictions and sentencing in the criminal context), better victim safety, and—potentially—changes in offender behaviour.

In Chapter 16, the Commissions set out a framework for reform of the jurisdictions of courts that deal with issues of family violence to address the gaps arising as a result of the interaction between different legal systems. The local or magistrates court is the first port of call for many victims of family violence and their families. The Commissions consider that state and territory magistrates courts should be in a position to address, at least on an interim basis, the range of issues that commonly arise in family violence matters. A system in which one court is able to deal with most legal issues—and where it cannot, is able to facilitate the transfer of the matter to another court—will go some way towards reducing the impact of inconsistencies between the legal systems, and better ensure the protection and safety of victims of family violence. The Commissions consider that these benefits are best leveraged in a specialised family violence court.

In the Commissions’ view, specialised family violence courts with certain minimum core features, including specialised prosecutors, would enhance the efficacy and effectiveness of the courts in dealing with family violence. The Commissions’ recommendations envisage, where possible, the creation of specialised family violence courts—being divisions, programs, lists or a specialised court room—within existing state and territory local and magistrates courts with a number of essential support features. The Commissions are not recommending the establishment of a separate stand alone court.

First, all judicial officers in a family violence court should be especially selected for their roles. The attitude, knowledge and skills of judicial officers are critical to the success of such a court, and it is important that selection be based on such criteria. The adoption of specialised lists and specialised practices may attract judicial officers who have experience and are interested in working in family violence. This is an important step in building a leadership cohort, who can drive reform and promote attitudinal change within the system.

Secondly, there was strong support for the role of specialised prosecutors as an essential feature of specialised family violence courts. The Commissions agree with the majority of submissions that specialised prosecutors—working in cooperation with magistrates, police and victim support workers—can play an important role in achieving consistent and quality outcomes for victims of family violence.

Thirdly, the Commissions are of the view that the provision of specialised, free and timely legal advice and representation would enhance the effectiveness of specialised family violence courts. In Chapter 29, the Commissions recommend that federal, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of access to legal services, for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk and vulnerable groups.

Fourthly, specialised and ongoing training on family violence issues is critical to ensuring a shared understanding of family violence within the court. Ideally, this training should be provided to all staff, as was done with the Victorian Family Violence Court Division. At a minimum, training should be provided to the following key participants: judicial officers, prosecutors, lawyers and registrars.

Fifthly, victim support workers play a key role in ensuring the success of such courts. Such workers may be employed directly by the court or a community organisation may be funded to provide the service. In Chapter 29, the Commissions recommend that the Australian, state and territory governments should prioritise the provision of, and access to, culturally appropriate victim support services for victims of family violence, including enhanced support for victims in high risk groups.

Lastly, family violence courts should also have special arrangements for victim safety at court, such as separate waiting rooms for victims, separate entrances and exits, remote witness facilities and appropriately trained security staff. The provision of interpreters is also essential.

The Commissions acknowledge the establishment or further development of specialised family violence courts will be dependent on mechanisms such as funding, programs of action, policy and operational support from inter-agency committees, and political support across those departments affected. The Commissions refer to the relative success achieved by the cross-government approach in Victoria as an illustrative model. The cost of establishing or further developing specialised family violence courts needs to be considered in light of the cost of family violence to the Australian community, as noted in Chapter 1.

Specialised police

Police play an important role in responding to, intervening in, and preventing family violence, and are the first point of contact for many victims. Police are responsible for recording incidents, interviewing victims and collecting evidence to support criminal charges and—as discussed in Chapter 9—applying for protection orders in the civil system. It is well recognised that initial positive police response is vital not only to victim safety, but also to whether victims report any further victimisation, or seek engagement with the legal system more generally. In Chapter 32, the Commissions make a number of recommendations about improving police and prosecutorial practice.

Although there is little information or research available on the role and value of specialised police units in Australia, a significant number of stakeholders reported positive experiences with such units. The Commissions concluded that there is substantial merit in the use of specialised police in family violence, sexual assault and child protection matters. Liaison officers provide an important early point of contact for victims and assist them in navigating the legal system. Specialised police at all levels provide contact points for inter-agency collaboration, and may form a key element of integrated responses. Further, monitoring and supervision by specialised police is likely to improve consistency in the application of laws in the context of family violence.

The Commissions recommend that state and territory police should ensure, at a minimum, that:

(a) specialised family violence and sexual assault police units are fostered and structured to ensure appropriate career progression for officers and the retention of experienced personnel;

(b) all police—including specialised police units—receive regular education and training consistent with the Australasian Policing Strategy on the Prevention and Reduction of Family Violence;
(c) specially trained police have responsibility for supervising, monitoring or assuring the quality of police responses to family violence incidents, and providing advice and guidance in this regard; and

(d) victims have access to a primary contact person within the police, who specialises, and is trained, in family violence, including sexual assault issues.

Education and training

A central and critical theme in this Report is the need for effective education and training of individuals—including judicial officers, lawyers, prosecutors, police, family dispute resolution practitioners and victim support services—working in the family law, family violence, criminal justice and child protection systems. A proper appreciation and understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence, and the overlapping legal frameworks is fundamental in practice to ensuring the safety of victims and their families.

A key set of recommendations in this Report focus on education and training for all participants in the various systems dealing with family violence, beginning with law curriculums and extending to judicial officers. The recommendations, interwoven throughout the Report, are drawn together in Chapter 31 of Part H, and form a major plank in the reform recommendations. They express a commitment to embedding an understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence across the various legal systems dealing with this issue. The Commissions recommend that the Australian, state and territory governments and educational, professional and service delivery bodies should ensure regular and consistent education and training for participants in the family law, family violence and child protection systems, in relation to the nature and dynamics of family violence, including its impact on victims, in particular those from high risk and vulnerable groups.

This is reinforced and complemented by further recommendations in Chapter 22 in relation to lawyers who practice family law; in Chapter 29, for government staff and community workers; and in Chapter 30, for parties involved in integrated responses—including judicial officers, legal practitioners, police and staff of relevant agencies.

National family violence bench book

Family violence may engage a range of overlapping frameworks and familiarity with, and competence in, these frameworks by judicial officers and legal professionals is vital to ensuring fair and just outcomes for victims. The Commissions recommend the development of a national bench book—again, complemented by quality education and training—to promote consistency in the interpretation and application of laws across jurisdictions, and offer guidance and promote best practice among judicial officers and legal professionals.

Relevant bench books have been published by judicial institutes and bodies in Australia and these could be built upon and, with adequate resourcing, such bodies could contribute towards the development of a national family violence bench book. The Victorian Department of Justice is currently in the process of securing access to the Canadian family violence bench book, and Victoria and South Australia are exploring a partnership agreement to progress work at a state level in relation to a bench book.

The Commissions consider that there is potential for collaboration between the Australian and state and territory governments to develop a similar bench book in Australia, using the Canadian bench book as a model. The Commissions therefore recommend, in Chapter 31, that the Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate with relevant stakeholders to develop and maintain a national bench book on family violence, including sexual assault, having regard to the Commissions’ recommendations throughout this Report in relation to the content that should be included in such a book.

In particular, the Commissions make a number of recommendations in Chapters 12 and 13 about the guidance that a national family violence bench book should provide on sentencing for family violence matters, including for breach of protection orders. In addition, in Chapter 14, the Commissions recommend that the bench book contain a section that provides guidance on the operation of defences to homicide where a victim of family violence kills the person who was violent towards him or her.

Integrated responses

Integrated responses offer clear benefits for service delivery to victims, including—importantly for this Inquiry—improving the experience of victims involved in multiple proceedings across different legal frameworks. For example, co-location of services facilitates victims’ access to a range of options and referrals. Another benefit is that such responses enable networks to be formed across services and government departments at a local level, fostering collaboration and communication between key players in different legal frameworks, and providing ongoing improvements to practice and understanding.

A number of Australian jurisdictions have either implemented, or are in the process of implementing, various forms of integrated responses. Some of these are quite comprehensive, while others are smaller in scale, including for example, liaison arrangements between police and victim support services.

Features of an integrated response may include:

- common policies and objectives;
- inter-agency collaboration and information sharing, including possibly: coordinated leadership across services and resources; sharing of resources and protocols; and inter-agency tracking and management of family violence incidents;
- involvement of, and recognition of the need for, victim support;
- commitment to ongoing training and education—discussed in Chapter 31;
- ongoing data collection and evaluation, with a view to system review and process improvements discussed in Chapter 31; and
Executive Summary

- specialised family violence courts, lists, and offender programs for those who engage in family violence—discussed in Chapter 32.

While a comprehensive integrated response has all of these features, not all features are required for a project to be considered an integrated response.

In Chapter 29, the Commissions review the range and diversity of integrated responses to family violence in Australia. In Chapter 30, the Commissions express the view that information-sharing protocols and Memorandums of Understanding (MOUs) are important, but cannot stand alone, and are dependent on the knowledge and involvement of officers and staff. Simply putting protocols in place is not sufficient. In the same way, integrated response arrangements are not simply formal arrangements between agencies. They must be given an ongoing profile among court and agency officers; they must form the basis of an ongoing and responsive relationship between the parties, and be supported and implemented in practice. Therefore, the Commissions recommend that integrated responses include a set of common policies and objectives; mechanisms for inter-agency collaboration—including information-sharing protocols, regular inter-agency meetings and liaison officers—and provision for victim support.

Chapter 31 acknowledges the importance of ongoing education and training programs. Where organisations work together to develop and deliver integrated responses to family violence—whether this involves just two organisations or many more—there is value in coming to an agreement about the principles and objectives that are to underpin the response. In Chapters 5 and 6, the Commissions discuss the importance of developing a shared understanding of what amounts to family violence across the different legal frameworks considered in this Report, to help close gaps between the systems. The Commissions are also of the view that developing common principles and objectives when integrating the work of different agencies and organisations in response to family violence will help to ensure that all the parties involved in the integrated response understand what they are working together to achieve.

The Commissions note that the process of developing common principles and objectives should involve all the agencies and organisations that are part of the integrated response, including those working with Indigenous communities, CALD communities and the disability sector. The development process itself is an important point of contact and empowerment for those involved. It may also provide a basis for ongoing and active collaboration between the parties, essential to the success of any integrated response.

The Commissions note that there are a number of ways in which the Australian, state and territory governments may foster the development and dissemination of common principles and objectives to underpin integrated responses to family violence. These include developing strategic plans and creating regional, state and territory or national steering committees. Any such process should, however, involve close consultation with relevant stakeholders to ensure that the principles and objectives of any particular integrated response mechanism accurately reflect and respond to the diversity of local conditions and needs.
Improving police and prosecutorial practice

Police practice

The Commissions make a number of recommendations aimed at improving police practice, ensuring that victims of family violence obtain an effective criminal justice response. In Chapter 9, the Commissions recommend that police should have a duty to investigate family violence where they believe family violence has been, is being, or is likely to be committed; and record when they decide not to take further action and their reasons for not taking further action. Police should also be able to better identify persons who have used family violence and persons who need to be protected from family violence, and to distinguish one from the other. In Chapter 12, the Commissions make recommendations towards improving police decision making about charging an offender with breach of a protection order and any underlying criminal offence constituting the breach; in relation to breach of protection order proceedings, to require police, when preparing witness statements, to ask victims about the impact of the breach, and advise them that they may wish to make a victim impact statement; and as to the appropriate content of ‘statements of no complaint’ in which victims attest to the fact that they do not wish to pursue criminal action.

Chapters 8, 12, 13 and 31, make complementary recommendations focused on the training of police and prosecutors.

Prosecutorial practice

The Commissions make a number of recommendations aimed at improving the exercise of prosecutorial discretion and decision making. These include education and training about: potential federal offences committed in a family violence context; the use of representative charges in family violence related criminal matters, where the charged conduct forms part of a course of conduct; and how the dynamics of family violence might affect the decisions of victims to negate the existence of family violence or to withdraw previous allegations. Importantly, the Commissions have also recommended that any decisions to prosecute victims of family violence with any public justice offences—such as conspiracy or attempts to pervert the course of justice—where the conduct alleged to constitute such offences is essentially conduct engaged in by a victim to reduce or mitigate the culpability of an offender—should only be approved by directors of public prosecution.

Information sharing

Throughout the course of this Inquiry, the Commissions have heard about the problems that arise because of the gaps in information flow between the family law system, the family violence system and the child protection system. In many circumstances, important information is not being shared among courts and agencies and this is having a negative impact on victims, impeding the ‘seamlessness’ of the legal and service responses to family violence. There are many recommendations throughout this Report directed towards improving the flow of information, including: clarifying initiating application forms; amending legislation that regulates the disclosure of information in relation to parenting orders, family violence orders and child protection orders; providing state and territory courts with access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal and establishing information sharing protocols and MOUs between courts, agencies and organisations working in these areas.

Chapter 30 contains recommendations to improve information flow between critical elements of the family violence system, including courts, relevant government agencies and other people and institutions involved in the family violence, family law and child protection systems. These include improving the way information is collected from parties and shared between courts—including the establishment of a national register of relevant court orders—some changes to confidentiality and privacy legislation, and the development of information sharing protocols and MOUs. The intention is to avoid, as far as possible, victims falling into gaps between the various systems due to lack of relevant information.

Information sharing is also one element of an integrated response to family violence, considered in Chapter 29.

Permitted disclosures

The 2009 report of the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Time for Action, identified privacy laws as one of the obstacles to an integrated and effective response to family violence. Many stakeholders consulted in this Inquiry agreed that they encounter difficulties sharing information because of actual or perceived limits imposed by privacy and secrecy laws. Implementation of the model use and disclosure principle set out in For Your Information: Australian Privacy Law and Practice (ALRC Report 108) would address some of the issues identified.

In particular, the Commissions recommend, in Chapter 30, that Australian, state and territory governments should ensure that the privacy principles applicable in each jurisdiction permit the use or disclosure of personal information where agencies and organisations reasonably believe it is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual’s life, health or safety. Given the high level of involvement of private sector service providers in the areas of family violence and child protection, this exception should apply to both government agencies and private sector organisations. The threat should not have to be imminent. Agencies and organisations should be able to share information in order to intervene early in family violence and child protection situations to prevent a serious threat from manifesting.

In Secrecy Laws and Open Government in Australia (ALRC Report 112) the ALRC recommended that secrecy laws should generally include an exception for disclosures in the course of an officer’s functions or duties. The recommendations in ALRC Report 112 were limited to Commonwealth secrecy laws, because that was the extent of the Terms of Reference for that Inquiry. The Commissions consider that the principles underlying the ALRC’s recommendation that Commonwealth secrecy laws should include an express exception for disclosure in the course of an officer’s functions and duties is a principle of wider application.

If this approach were adopted by Australian, state and territory governments, it would ensure that, where an officer disclosed information, for example, in accordance with the provisions of state and territory family violence or child protection legislation, or in accordance with an information-sharing protocol or MOU, the officer would not breach the relevant secrecy law. The Commissions therefore endorse the relevant recommendations in ALRC Report 112 in relation to Commonwealth secrecy laws, and recommend that state and territory governments consider amending secrecy laws that regulate the disclosure of government information to include an express exception to allow the disclosure of information in the course of an officer’s functions and duties.

These recommendations complement the provisions in relation to permitted disclosures by child protection agencies in Chapter 19, and those in Chapter 22, in relation to family counsellors and family dispute resolution practitioners to permit disclosures where reasonably necessary to prevent or lessen a serious threat to a person’s life, health or safety.

The Commissions note that databases in some jurisdictions facilitate the sharing of information between agencies working together, particularly in the area of child protection. Such databases provide a useful mechanism to help ensure that agencies are aware of the fact that other agencies are working with a particular child or family, and to prevent the duplication of services. It would be logical, for example, to establish a shared database where family violence or child protection legislation expressly provides for the disclosure of certain information from one agency to another. The Commissions note, however, that such databases raise significant privacy concerns. The Commissions recommend, therefore, that in developing any such databases, the Australian, state and territory governments should ensure that appropriate privacy safeguards are put in place.

The Commissions’ recommendations in Chapter 30 are intended to ensure that legislative provisions do not prevent the sharing of information in circumstances where there is a risk to an individual’s life, health or safety. In addition, the Commissions recommend that family violence and child protection legislation should clearly set out which agencies and organisations may use and disclose information and in what circumstances. This will provide clarity for individual officers and staff and will ensure that where information is shared it does not breach privacy or secrecy laws.

Protocols and MOUs

Information-sharing protocols and MOUs between the courts and relevant agencies and organisations have a valuable role to play in facilitating communication and information exchange between parties in the family law, family violence and child protection systems.

At present, there are few information-sharing protocols in the context of family violence. In Chapter 30, the Commissions recommend that federal family courts, state and territory magistrates courts, police, and relevant government agencies should develop protocols for the exchange of information in relation to family violence matters. The recommendations in Chapter 30 are complemented by additional recommendations in Chapters 19, 20 and 29. The development of information-sharing protocols in the context of family violence is consistent with the views expressed in Time for Action.
National register

The capacity for family violence protection orders to be enforced across jurisdictions is essential to the safety of victims, especially given that it is common for victims of family violence to seek to move to escape violent relationships. Currently, in most jurisdictions, a protection order that has been obtained in one state or territory is not automatically enforceable in another state or territory. Rather, the victim of family violence or some other person must register the ‘external protection order’ in the second jurisdiction.

The Australian Government has committed to the development of a national scheme for the registration and recognition of family violence protection orders. The Commissions consider that this is an excellent development that should be supported as a constructive step towards improving the protection available for victims of family violence. It will allow victims of family violence to move seamlessly from one jurisdiction to another without the need to take action to register a family violence order in the second jurisdiction. It will also help to ensure that police in the second jurisdiction are aware of the existence of the order.

The Commissions consider that a national register of this kind also provides an opportunity for a formalised exchange of information relevant to proceedings involving family violence more broadly. While the initial proposal is to include information about family violence protection orders, there is scope to extend the ambit of the register to include, for example, child protection orders made under state and territory child protection legislation, and information about parenting orders and family violence related injunctions made under the Family Law Act. The Commissions are also of the view that the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department—as the Central Authority for the Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention)—should give future consideration to including conditions and non-molestation undertakings made in Hague Convention cases on the national register. While registration would not affect the enforceability of undertakings and conditions, it would ensure that police officers, state and territory courts and federal family courts are aware that they exist, and may take them into consideration, where appropriate, in protection order or parenting proceedings.

A related issue is the persons and entities that may access information on the national register. The Commissions’ view is that—at a minimum—access should be available to federal family courts, state and territory courts that deal with matters related to family violence and child protection, child protection agencies and the police.

The Commissions agree with the Office of the Privacy Commissioner that a national register of this kind needs to be accompanied by a comprehensive privacy framework and recommend that a privacy impact assessment be prepared as part of developing the register.
Net effect of the recommendations

The net effect of the recommendations, taken as an overall reform package, will be that:

- the legal framework is as seamless as possible from the point of view of those who engage with it;
- victims have better access to legal and other responses to family violence;
- legal responses to family violence are fair and just, holding those who use family violence accountable for their actions and providing protection to victims, but also ensuring safeguards to accused persons in the criminal justice context; and
- interventions and support in circumstances of family violence are effective.

As noted at the outset, the referral of this Inquiry to the Commissions forms one plank in the Australian Government response towards the goal ‘to reduce all violence in our communities’. To meet the challenges of such a goal requires enormous co-operation, trust, respect, patience, commitment—and leadership. In this Inquiry, the Commissions have undertaken consultations nationwide and received over 240 submissions from a wide range of stakeholders. The expectations of our work—and that of the Australian, state and territory governments in response—are also considerable.
Part A

Introduction
1. Introduction to the Inquiry

Contents

Background 85
The extent of the problem 87
Compounding factors 88
Cost of family violence 89
Concurrent inquiries and actions 90
Immediate Government Actions 91
Australian Institute of Family Studies evaluation 91
Standing Committee of Attorneys-General 94
The Chisholm Review 94
Family Law Council 96
Scope of the Inquiry 98
Terms of Reference 98
The intersecting nature of the Terms of Reference 100
Matters outside the Inquiry 101
The gendered nature of the Terms of Reference 102
Processes of reform 104
Consultation and collaboration processes 104
Community consultations 104
Submissions 107
Overview of the Report 109
Definitions and terminology 109
Structure of the Report 112
Stop Press—VLRC Child Protection Report 114

Background

On 17 July 2009, the Attorney-General of Australia, the Hon Robert McClelland MP, asked the Australian Law Reform Commission (ALRC) to conduct an Inquiry together with the New South Wales Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC) into particular questions in relation to family violence that had arisen out of the 2009 report of the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Time for Action, released in March 2009. At its meeting on 16–17 April 2009, the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) agreed that Australian law reform commissions should work together to consider these issues.

---

1.2 The ALRC was asked to consider the issues of:

1) the interaction in practice of State and Territory family/domestic violence and child protection laws with the Family Law Act and relevant Commonwealth, State and Territory criminal laws; and

2) the impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws in cases of sexual assault occurring in a family/domestic violence context, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence.

1.3 In relation to both these issues, the ALRC was asked to consider ‘what, if any, improvements could be made to relevant legal frameworks to protect the safety of women and their children’.2

1.4 On 14 July 2009, the NSWLRC received terms of reference in parallel terms from the New South Wales Attorney General, the Hon J Hatzistergos.3 A joint project of this nature, involving a state law reform body in conjunction with the ALRC, is a practical way of tackling an inquiry in relation to matters many of which lie at the intersections of—or fall between—-federal and state/territory laws. During the Inquiry the NSWLRC took principal responsibility for Part E, in relation to child protection; the ALRC took principal responsibility for the remainder of the work.

Time for Action

1.5 The National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children (the National Council), established in May 2008, was given the role of drafting a national plan to reduce violence against women and their children.4

1.6 Time for Action identified six core areas for improvement together with strategies and actions to achieve them.5 While the report concentrated on ‘preventative measures that challenge the values and attitudes that support violence in the community’ and the need ‘to develop respectful relationships’,6 it included recommendations that the ALRC be given references on the two specific tasks that are reflected in the Terms of Reference.7 It was accompanied by a background paper providing a fuller discussion of the matters in the report, with more detailed references.8

---

2 The Terms of Reference for this Inquiry are set out at the front of this Report.

5 Ibid, 16–20. The six ‘outcome areas’ listed are that: communities are safe and free from violence; relationships are respectful; services meet the needs of women and their children; responses are just; perpetrators stop their violence; and systems work together effectively. The plan identified 25 outcomes with 117 strategies.

6 Ibid, iv.

7 Ibid, 119: Strategies for Action 4.2.1 and 4.1.2 are the background for the first and second limbs of the Terms of Reference, respectively.

1. Introduction to the Inquiry

The extent of the problem

1.8 Time for Action provided a summary of the extent of the problem of violence against women in the Australian community. It reported the estimate that ‘[a]bout one in three Australian women experience physical violence and almost one in five women experience sexual violence over their lifetime’, and stated that while violence ‘knows no geographical, socio-economic, age, ability, cultural or religious boundaries’, the experience of violence is not evenly spread.

1.9 For example, Indigenous women reported higher levels of physical violence during their lifetime than did non-Indigenous women, and the violence was more likely to include sexual violence. Other groups may also experience violence in a different and/or disproportionate way, for example: women with disability; women who identify themselves as lesbian, bisexual, transgender or intersex; and immigrant women. Such experiences were also strongly echoed in submissions made to this Inquiry.

---

13 Ibid, 17.
14 Ibid, 18.
15 Ibid.
16 Ibid.
The National Council responded to this diversity of experience of violence not by taking a ‘one size fits all approach’, but rather by focusing on helping women in different circumstances and from different backgrounds to live free from violence and the threat of violence. It uses an intersectional analysis to enhance our understanding of the way lifestyle factors affect women. This is because the ways in which women and their children experience violence, the options open to them in dealing with violence, and their access to services that meet their needs in all their diversity, are shaped by the intersection of gender with factors such as disability, English language fluency, ethnicity, geographical location and migration experience.18

Compounding factors

The National Council also pointed to a range of compounding factors in the presentation of violence, especially alcohol,19 and that of geographical and social isolation.20 Moreover, both have been identified as critical issues for Indigenous women and children:

Some groups of women within rural and remote communities experience particularly high rates of domestic violence. For example, the proportion of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians who reported being victims of physical or threatened violence has been found to be similar in remote and non-remote areas. However, the proportion of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people in remote areas who said that they, their family or friends had witnessed violence is three times as high as for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people in non-remote areas. In remote and very remote areas, more than three-quarters of homicide victims in 2005–06 were Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander.21

During this Inquiry the Commissions have heard such matters referred to repeatedly. For example, during one consultation in Alice Springs, Russell Goldflam, a solicitor with the Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission remarked that ‘everything is grog here’.22

Social isolation in an urban setting also affects immigrant and refugee women in particular:

For many immigrant and refugee women, insufficient knowledge of English creates a specific disadvantage in comparison to men in their families. English is often used as

---

21 Ibid, 32.
22 Central Australian Aboriginal Legal Aid Service and Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Consultation, Alice Springs, 2010.
1. Introduction to the Inquiry

a tool of power and control, engendering the total dependence of refugee women on their husbands.23

1.14 In addition, the experience of violence in childhood also has a profound and compounding effect on the incidence of violence in adults:

Witnessing or experiencing violence as a child increases sharply the risk of becoming a perpetrator or victim of violence in later life. Women who experience abuse as a child are one-and-a-half times more likely to experience violence, and twice as likely to experience sexual violence as an adult than those who have not. Women who are physically and sexually abused in childhood also have an increased risk of being sexually abused in adulthood.24

1.15 Not only are there compounding factors causing family violence, there are also compounding consequences, such as: financial difficulty flowing from economic dependence on a violent partner,25 homelessness, where women are seeking to escape violence at home;26 and health issues associated with treating the effects of violence on the victim.27 As noted by the Department of Premier and Cabinet Tasmania, ‘the causes of violence are various, and can manifest differently, but can “drag in” every aspect of the people’s lives’.28

Cost of family violence

1.16 In producing Time for Action, an estimate of the cost of family violence in Australia was updated. A 2004 study by Access Economics had estimated the total annual cost of violence against women by their partners as $8.1 billion.29 This study was repeated by KPMG in January 2009 for the National Council with a forward projection of costs to 2021–22. The study concluded that an estimated 750,000

23 National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Background Paper to Time for Action: The National Council’s Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021 (2009), 33. The Family Law Council also drew attention to the vulnerability of women and children in some communities, contributing factors include, for example, ‘cultural or religious practices that subordinate women and cultural expectations that loyalty to family and community take precedence over personal safety’; Family Law Council, Improving Responses to Family Violence in the Family Law System: An Advice on the Intersection of Family Violence and Family Law Issues (2009), [4.4]. Submissions to this Inquiry reinforced such concerns: Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Brisbane, Submission FV 223, 2 July 2010; Women’s House Shelta, Submission FV 139, 23 June 2010; Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service, Submission FV 61, 1 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 48, 22 May 2010; P Eastal, Submission FV 39, 14 May 2010; National Peak Body for Safety and Protection of Parents and Children, Submission FV 18, 13 January 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 15, 11 November 2009.

25 Ibid, 44.

26 Ibid, 45

27 Ibid, 42.

28 Department of Premier and Cabinet Tasmania, Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

Australian women ‘will experience and report violence in 2021–22, costing the Australian economy an estimated $15.6 billion’.

Concurrent inquiries and actions

1.17 The ALRC and NSWLRC (the Commissions) are not alone in looking at the problem of family violence and seeking appropriate policy responses. Several other inquiries, state and federal, are being conducted at the same time as this Inquiry. A number have also been conducted before. The concurrent and previous work is referred to throughout this Report. In particular, the ALRC has been directed not to duplicate:

a) the other actions being progressed as part of the Immediate Government Actions announced by the Prime Minister on receiving the National Council’s report in April 2009;

b) the evaluation of the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Act 2006 reforms being undertaken by the Australian Institute of Family Studies; and

c) the work being undertaken through SCAG on the harmonisation of uniform evidence laws, in particular the development of model sexual assault communications immunity provisions and vulnerable witness protections.

1.18 In addition to these specific areas of concurrent work, there are two further contributions of significance to this Inquiry. First, the Attorney-General commissioned a review by Professor Richard Chisholm, former Justice of the Family Court of Australia, of the practices, procedures and laws that apply in the federal family law courts in the context of family violence (Chisholm Review). The review was completed at the end of November 2009, and released on 28 January 2010. Secondly, the Family Law Council provided an advice to the Attorney-General on the impact of family violence on children and on parenting, which was also released at the same time as the Chisholm Review. As both these initiatives were commissioned by the Attorney-General, and essentially at the same time as the Terms of Reference for this Inquiry, the Commissions have included them in the ambit of the work not to be duplicated in this Report.

1.19 Each of these is summarised, in turn, below. Their relationship to particular aspects under consideration in this Inquiry is considered at relevant points throughout this Report.

---

32 Ibid.

Immediate Government Actions

1.20 In response to Time for Action the Australian Government announced a package of immediate actions, including investments in a new national domestic violence and sexual assault telephone and online crisis service; in primary prevention activities towards building respectful relationships; and to support research on perpetrator treatment.

1.21 The Government also committed to working with the states and territories through SCAG to: establish a national scheme for the registration of domestic and family violence orders; improve the uptake of relevant coronial recommendations; and identify the most effective methods to investigate and prosecute sexual assault cases.

1.22 Further immediate actions included the development of a multi-disciplinary training package for lawyers, judicial officers, counsellors and other professionals working in the family law system, to improve consistency in the handling of family violence cases, and the establishment of the Violence Against Women Advisory Group to advise on the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women.

1.23 The list of actions also included asking the ALRC to work with state and territory law reform commissions to examine the inter-relationship of federal and state and territory laws that relate to the safety of women and their children. In the list of ‘priority actions’ the Australian Government agreed to:

Make a reference to the Australian Law Reform Commission to examine the integration of domestic violence, child protection and federal family law.

Australian Institute of Family Studies evaluation

1.24 In 2006, the Australian Institute of Family Studies (AIFS) was commissioned by the Attorney-General’s Department and the Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs to undertake an evaluation of the changes introduced by the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Act 2006 (Cth) and the accompanying increased funding for new and expanded family relationships services. The amendments introduced significant procedural and substantive changes to the legal framework for resolving parenting disputes following parental separation—including a presumption in favour of equal parental responsibility; an increased focus on protecting children from harm resulting from abuse, neglect and exposure to family violence; and a more child-focused process for those disputes that do proceed to court.
1.25 The purpose of the evaluation was to assess the extent to which the reform package has been effective in achieving its policy aims. The report, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, was released at the same time as the Chisholm Review, on 28 January 2010. It involved the collection of data from 28,000 people involved in the family law system—including parents, grandparents, family relationship services staff and clients, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers—and the analysis of administrative data and court files.

1.26 Of particular relevance in the context of this Inquiry are the findings in relation to family violence and safety concerns:

- Around two-thirds of separated mothers and just over half of separated fathers indicated that their child’s other parent had emotionally abused them before or during the separation. One in four mothers and around one in six fathers said that the other parent had hurt them physically prior to separation and, among those who report such experiences, most indicated their children had seen or heard some of the abuse or violence. When family court files were examined, over half of the files contained an allegation of family violence on the written file.
- Around one in five parents reported that they held safety concerns associated with ongoing contact with their child’s other parent and over 90% of these parents had been either physically hurt or emotionally abused by the other parent.

1.27 Notwithstanding the high incidence of family violence identified, the evaluation also found that:

- A majority of separated mothers (62%) and fathers (64%) had friendly and cooperative relationships with each other about 15 months after separation. About a fifth had a distant relationship and a little under a fifth had a highly conflicted or fearful relationship.

1.28 Even when there was violence, therefore, a large number of parents separating after July 2006 were able to reach agreement about their parenting arrangements themselves, although as one in five were conflicted or fearful, the quality of some of those agreements may be called into question.

1.29 The study also reported a ‘cultural shift’ from a primary reliance on legal services to one where ‘a greater proportion of post-separation disputes over children are being seen and responded to primarily in relationship terms’.

---

37 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms (2009). There are three components of the AIFS research program for the evaluation: the Legislation and Courts Project; the Service Provision Project; and the Families Project. Each of these components involves a series of studies which will combine to develop a composite picture based on multiple perspectives.

40 Ibid, [3.1.3].

41 Ibid, [3.2.2].
that families are able to reach appropriate services in a timely way was also crucial to the success of this shift:

Pathways through the system need to be more defined and more widely understood. There is still evidence that some families with family violence and/or child abuse issues are on a roundabout between relationship services, lawyers, courts and state-based child protection and family violence systems. While complex issues may take longer to resolve, resolutions that are delayed by unclear pathways or lack of adequate coordination between services, lawyers and courts have adverse implications for the well-being of children and other family members.42

1.30 Screening properly to identify family violence and child abuse was another significant theme. The evaluation provided 'clear evidence' that the family law system had improved in relation to the identification of concerns about family violence and child abuse, although there were still significant problems:

Relevant issues include a lack of understanding of family violence and child abuse in various parts of the system, and perceptions of there being pressure to reach agreements notwithstanding the presence of such concerns. Problems also stem from the intersection of the state and federal systems, and with lawyers (and family relationship sector professionals) finding child protection systems difficult to engage with when there are concerns about risks to children. These issues pre-date the reforms and are longstanding. Further, some professionals believed that some new aspects of the legislative framework have discouraged concerns about family violence and child abuse from being raised. These include an obligation of courts to make costs orders against a party found to have ‘knowingly made a false allegation or statement in proceedings’ [Family Law Act s 117AB] and the requirement for courts to consider the extent to which one parent has facilitated the child having a relationship with the other parent (s 60CC(3)(c)).

While there was widespread concern that family violence and child abuse and neglect are being inadequately responded to, some legal professionals and fathers also claimed that allegations about family violence and child abuse were being used to impede fathers’ claims for a shared parenting role after separation.43

1.31 While ‘systematic attempts to screen such families in the family relationship service sector and in some parts of the legal sector’ have improved the identification of such issues, the expectation that most families will attempt family dispute resolution (FDR) has meant that ‘FDR is occurring in some cases where there are very significant concerns about violence and safety’.44

[There is a] need for professionals across the system to have greater levels of access to finely tuned assessment and screening mechanisms applied by highly trained and experienced professionals. Protocols for working constructively and effectively with state-based systems and services (such as child protection systems) also need further work. At the same time, the progress that continues to be made on improved screening practices will go only part of the way to assisting victims of violence and abuse.45

42 Ibid, 21.
43 Ibid, 15.
44 Ibid, 23.
1.32 Another area of concern identified in the evaluation was the misunderstanding that shared parental responsibility allows for ‘equal’ shared care time:

This confusion has resulted in disillusionment among some fathers who find that the law does not provide for 50–50 ‘custody’. This sometimes can make it challenging to achieve child-focused arrangements in cases in which an equal or shared care-time arrangement is not practical or not appropriate. Legal sector professionals in particular indicated that in their view the legislative changes had promoted a focus on parents’ rights rather than children’s needs, obscuring to some extent the primacy of the best interests principle (s 60CA). Further, they indicated that, in their view, the legislative framework did not adequately facilitate making arrangements that were developmentally appropriate for children.46

1.33 The overall conclusion of the evaluation was that the 2006 reforms to the family law system have had ‘a positive impact in some areas and have a less positive impact in others’. More parents are sorting out their parenting arrangements without an automatic recourse to the court, notwithstanding a high incidence of family violence and child abuse. However, whether FDR is appropriate in such cases and, if so, when, is a matter requiring further consideration:

This is an area where collaboration between relationship service professionals, family law system professionals and courts needs to be facilitated so that shared understandings about what types of matters are not suitable for FDR can be developed and so that other options can be better facilitated.47

Standing Committee of Attorneys-General

1.34 SCAG, through the National Working Group on Evidence, has recently considered harmonisation of sexual assault counselling communications privileges and immunities. At the conclusion of this work, SCAG Ministers agreed on principles to be applied as the minimum standard in Australia.48

1.35 The National Working Group on Evidence is currently considering harmonisation of provisions protecting vulnerable witnesses giving evidence in court proceedings. Vulnerable witnesses in this context may include children, people with disabilities, and traumatised people—such as victims of sexual assault.

The Chisholm Review

1.36 Professor Chisholm was required to ‘assess the appropriateness of the legislation, practices and procedures’ that apply in cases where family violence is an issue and to recommend improvements. In acknowledging the challenges for the family law system of such cases—involving ‘more than half the parenting cases that come to the courts’—Chisholm reiterated in his opening remarks that ‘[v]iolence is bad for everyone, and particularly dangerous for children, whether or not it is specifically directed at them’:

46 Ibid.
48 Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Communiqué, 7 May 2010.
1. Introduction to the Inquiry

These cases present the courts with truly daunting tasks: to provide a setting in which the parties feel safe and confident that they will be treated with respect; to deal with the cases with necessary efficiency but most importantly with justice and fairness; and to ensure as far as possible that arrangements made for children, whether as a result of the parties’ consent or by the court’s adjudication, are suitable for their needs, which will include being safe and having both parents contribute to their developmental needs.49

1.37 Chisholm identified a theme that recurred throughout his review: ‘that family violence must be disclosed, understood, and acted upon’.50 In terms of the family law system, this means that each component of it ‘needs to encourage and facilitate the disclosure of family violence, ensure that it is understood, and act effectively upon that understanding.’51

1.38 With respect to the procedures of the family law courts, Chisholm pointed to the importance of expertise in relation to children’s cases and a goal of achieving the same approach in both the Federal Magistrates Court and the Family Court of Australia. In order to ensure disclosure of family violence, Chisholm targeted the document that is used to alert the court to allegations of violence or abuse, and concluded that ‘this system is not working’.52 He suggested, instead, moving to a system of risk identification and assessment that applies to all parenting cases.53

1.39 Chisholm identified three particular provisions of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) as needing amendment:

In essence, the recommendations are that the ‘friendly parent’ provision [s 60CC(3)(c)] should be amended so it recognises that parents sometimes need to take action to protect children from risk; that the specific and separate costs provision (s 117AB) dealing with knowingly false allegations and statements should be replaced by a simple reference to the giving of knowingly false evidence in the provision that deals with costs (s 177); and that the information that advisers are required to provide should reflect not only the importance of parental involvement but also the importance of safety for children.54

1.40 Key recommendations also focused on the provisions dealing with parental responsibility and the guidelines included in the legislation—primary and additional considerations—for determining what is in the child’s best interests.55 As noted by Chisholm, this is ‘a large and controversial topic’.56 The package of reforms introduced by the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Act, emphasised two main concerns as the primary considerations:

---

50  Ibid, 5.
51  Ibid.
54  Ibid, 7. The ‘friendly parent’ provision is considered in pt 3.2; the obligations on advisers in pt 3.3; and costs orders in pt 3.4.
55  Ibid, pt 3.5. Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC sets out the matters that must be considered in determining what is in a child’s best interests.
56  R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), 120.
(a) the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both of the child’s parents; and

(b) the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence.57

1.41 Although these two matters were principal motivating concerns behind the 2006 amendments, Chisholm considered that ‘the “twin pillars” formula is not an ideal guide to children’s best interests’.58 Chisholm preferred instead guidelines that did not include ‘the artificial distinction ... between “primary” and “additional” considerations’.59

1.42 In addition, a central issue in the lead-up to the 2006 reforms was whether there should be a presumption in favour of ‘equal time’ in relation to parental responsibility.60 The formula, that when making a parenting order in relation to a child, the court must apply a presumption that it is in the best interests of the child for the child’s parents to have ‘equal shared parental responsibility’,61 has created considerable controversy, particularly a confusion between ‘equal responsibility’ and ‘equal time’. Such misunderstandings were also evident in the AIFS evaluation, described above. Chisholm preferred instead a presumption simply of each parent having ‘parental responsibility’.62

1.43 Other recommendations in the Chisholm Review include the provision of additional funding to support the work of contact centres, FDR agencies, legal aid, and family consultants; better education in relation to issues of family violence; and recognition of the importance of experience and knowledge of family violence in making appointments to significant positions in the family law system.63

Family Law Council

1.44 In Improving Responses to Family Violence in the Family Law System: An Advice on the Intersection of Family Violence and Family Law Issues, the Family Law Council makes a number of recommendations about family violence ‘if and when it becomes visible in the Family Law system in Australia’.64 The Council recommended a number of strategies to improve the understanding and identification of family violence, including that:

- the definition of ‘family violence’ in the Family Law Act be widened to include a range of threatening behaviour.65

---

57 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC(2).
59 Ibid, 8; Rec 3.4.
60 Ibid, 121–124.
61 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 61DA(1).
65 Ibid, Rec 1.
1. Introduction to the Inquiry

- a common knowledge base be established to assist all those in the family law system to better understand the patterns and effects of family violence;\(^\text{66}\)
- the Best Practice Guidelines for Lawyers Doing Family Law Work be revised to incorporate detailed information on family violence;\(^\text{67}\) and
- the forms for notifying family law courts about family violence be improved.\(^\text{68}\)

1.45 The Family Law Council was concerned to address ‘certain widespread misunderstandings’ about the Family Law Act through education, in particular:

- Recurrent gossip that notification of family violence may lead to a judicial perception that the notifier is an ‘unfriendly parent’
- Widespread perception that each parent now has a ‘starting right’ to equal time (50/50) with children
- Common belief that a parent will receive both substantial time with a child, and equal shared parental responsibility, (similar to historic ‘guardianship’), despite a history of poor communication and hostility between parents; and despite the long term health and emotional consequences for children as casualties on such parental battlefields.\(^\text{69}\)

1.46 Such misunderstandings were also identified in both the Chisholm Review and the AIFS evaluations, considered above.

1.47 Co-ordination and collaboration between various participants in the system was also seen as being of critical importance, for example:

- between the state and territory child protection agencies, and the federal Family Law Act, including: the transportability of state family violence injunctive orders; the establishment of a national register of family violence orders; and the establishment of a network database which records family violence orders, and a residual family court power to require state Child Protection Agencies to become parties to Family Law Court proceedings about children.\(^\text{70}\)

1.48 A specific aspect of concern was also whether FDR practitioners should have responsibility for providing to federal family law courts any information about family violence or other related issues disclosed during an intervention.\(^\text{71}\)

1.49 A recommendation of structural significance is the possibility of a referral of powers to the Commonwealth and a consequent expansion of jurisdiction of the family courts, so that, in determining a parenting application, federal family courts would have concurrent jurisdiction with that of state courts to deal with all matters relating to children including, where relevant, family violence, child protection and parenting orders.\(^\text{72}\) The context for a consideration of referral of powers, and the constitutional

---

\(^\text{66}\) Ibid, Rec 2.
\(^\text{67}\) Ibid, Rec 3.
\(^\text{68}\) Ibid, Rec 10.
\(^\text{69}\) Ibid, 8; Rec 13.
\(^\text{70}\) Ibid, 7; Rec 12.
\(^\text{71}\) Ibid, Rec 8.
\(^\text{72}\) Ibid, Rec 7.
division of family law matters between the states and territories and the federal sphere are considered in Chapter 2.

Scope of the Inquiry

Terms of Reference

1.50 The Terms of Reference are reproduced at the beginning of this Report. There are two terms of reference, the first focusing on ‘interaction in practice’ of various laws, the second on ‘inconsistency’ in interpretation and application of sexual assault laws.

First Term of Reference

The interaction in practice of State and Territory family/domestic violence and child protection laws with the Family Law Act and relevant Commonwealth, State and Territory criminal laws.

1.51 The Commissions have interpreted this as requiring a consideration of the interaction of:

- state and territory family violence laws with the Family Law Act;
- state and territory child protection laws with the Family Law Act;
- state and territory family violence laws with relevant Commonwealth, state and territory criminal laws;
- state and territory child protection laws with relevant Commonwealth, state and territory criminal laws.

1.52 There are further areas of interaction that the Commissions consider lie within the first Term of Reference, in particular, the interaction of state and territory family violence laws and child protection laws.

Second Term of Reference

The impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws in cases of sexual assault occurring in a family/domestic violence context, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence.

1.53 The second Term of Reference requires the Commissions to focus on two key facets of sexual assault legal responses: (1) inconsistency in the interpretation or application of laws; and (2) a specific focus on sexual assaults perpetrated by a person with whom the complainant is in a domestic or family relationship.

1.54 Inconsistency of laws: Inconsistency in the application and interpretation of sexual assault laws can be considered on multiple levels:
1. Introduction to the Inquiry

- inconsistency of approach between jurisdictions (for example, there are different: offences, definitions of consent, ways in which sexual experience evidence is restricted, judicial directions to the jury, and so on);

- inconsistency between the legal response to victims of sexual assault perpetrated in a family violence context compared to victims of sexual assault perpetrated in other contexts (for example, by a stranger or an acquaintance);

- inconsistency between the legal response to victims of sexual assault perpetrated in a family violence context where those victims come from different backgrounds and have different needs (for example, are Indigenous victims of sexual assault treated in a different way by the legal system compared to other victims of sexual assault within this category?); and

- inconsistency more generally—whether individual cases of sexual assault, regardless of who has perpetrated the sexual assault, are likely to encounter a different response or different result depending upon the police, prosecutors or judicial officers with whom they come in contact.

1.55 In this Inquiry the Commissions are adopting a broad approach to considering the issue of inconsistency.

1.56 While the primary focus of the Inquiry with respect to the second Term of Reference will be on the interpretation and application of laws in the criminal justice system, it is important that this is not seen as the only legal response to sexual assault. Sexual assault occurring in a family violence context may give rise to multiple legal issues (often concurrently)—for example, issues involving family law, civil protection orders, child protection, crimes or victims’ compensation, as well as personal injury law. This multiplicity of legal responses and avenues also directly relates to the first Term of Reference, which is concerned with the interaction between the areas of law that respond to family violence.

1.57 In terms of the response of the criminal justice system, the use of the term ‘laws’ is also to be understood broadly to include not only the laws prescribing certain offences and the common law, but also rules of evidence and criminal procedure. It also necessarily includes the policies, procedures, training and education that apply to the key legal players who implement and interpret those ‘laws’—police, prosecutors and judicial officers. This wider interpretation of law is also important in meeting the continuing criticism about the gap between the law as written and its practice.

1.58 Family violence context: The Commissions have been asked to focus on a particular category of sexual assault—sexual assault committed in a family violence context. This reflects the fact that most sexual assaults are perpetrated by someone known to the victim.

---

1.59 The Personal Violence Survey conducted by the Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) in 2005 found that of those women who had been sexually assaulted in the 12 months prior to the survey, 22% had been assaulted by a stranger in the most recent incident, 21% by a former partner, 39% by a family member or friend, and 32% by another known person. Thus in 60% of cases, women were sexually assaulted by a former partner, family member or friend. A 2004 ABS report on sexual assault noted that ‘all available data sources indicate that over half of perpetrators ... are known to their victims’.77

1.60 The focus on sexual assault in a family violence context provides an important opportunity to focus on the category of sexual assault that comprises the majority of sexual assaults experienced by women and children. It also provides an opportunity to focus more intently not only on the largest category of sexual assaults, but the one that is more likely to remain unreported; and when it is reported is more likely to fall out of the legal system and less likely to result in conviction (a process known as ‘attrition’).78 In this way, intimate and familial sexual assaults remain the most hidden in general—and from the view of the legal system in particular—despite forming the largest category of sexual assaults.

1.61 The Commissions recognise that there are continuing issues with sexual assault laws and procedures for all victims of sexual assault, not only those who are the focus of this Inquiry. In this regard the Commissions anticipate that any recommendations that are made to assist victims of sexual assault in a family context would have benefits for all victims of sexual assault engaging with the legal system.79

The intersecting nature of the Terms of Reference

1.62 There are areas of intersection between the two Terms of Reference, as sexual assault can also constitute family violence. However, given the particular emphasis in Time for Action on sexual assault and the specific strategy of giving the ALRC terms of reference in relation to it, a separate term of reference was warranted.

---

74 Note that the ABS defined a partner as current and former marital or de facto partners: Australian Bureau of Statistics, Personal Safety Survey, Catalogue No 4906.0 (2005), 60.
75 Ibid, 11. Other known person includes an ‘acquaintance, neighbour, counsellor or psychologist or psychiatrist, ex-boyfriend or girlfriend, doctor, teacher, minister, priest or clergy and prison officer’: Australian Bureau of Statistics, Personal Safety Survey, Catalogue No 4906.0 (2005), 33.
76 Note that the ABS included former boyfriends/girlfriends within the definition of ‘other known person’ (although current boyfriend/girlfriend or date was a category on its own reflecting, in some instances, ‘different levels of commitment and involvement’ when compared to a marital or de facto partner), thus the percentage of offenders with a close intimate or familial relationship with the victim would be larger if former boyfriend/girlfriends was included within the definition of ‘partner’. For the detailed explanation of the various relationship categories relied on by the ABS, see Australian Bureau of Statistics, Personal Safety Survey, Catalogue No 4906.0 (2005), 60.
78 Data on reporting and attrition are detailed in Ch 26.
1. Introduction to the Inquiry

1.63 At the intersection of all the areas under consideration, however, sits the issue of sexual assault of children, potentially bringing together all the areas of law under consideration in this Inquiry—child protection, criminal law, the Family Law Act, and family violence laws.

Matters outside the Inquiry

1.64 While the scope of the problem of family violence is extensive, the brief in this Inquiry is necessarily constrained both by the Terms of Reference and by the role and function of a law reform commission. Under the Terms of Reference, the Commissions are required to consider ‘what, if any, improvements could be made to relevant legal frameworks to protect the safety of women and their children’. The range of legal frameworks is also not ‘at large’, but limited, in the first Term of Reference, to specified areas of interaction; and, in the second, to the impact of inconsistent interpretation and application of law in relation to sexual assault.

1.65 The Commissions recognise that the Inquiry concerns only a narrow slice of the vast range of issues raised by the prevalence of family violence—when women and children encounter the legal system in its various manifestations. A comment made by the Family Law Council in its advice to the Commonwealth Attorney-General, referred to above, is equally apt as a comment with respect to the problems of family violence in a much wider sense. The Council, noting that it was only focusing on family violence ‘when it becomes visible in the Family Law system in Australia’, stated that: ‘this visible pattern is only the tip of the iceberg of family violence, alcoholism, drug addiction and mental illness which is apparently entrenched in Australia’.80

1.66 In this Inquiry, the Commissions noted widespread concern about the link between alcohol and family violence, and recognise that any serious attempt to develop preventative measures in the area of family violence must tackle the problem of alcohol abuse in Australian society. This issue is, however, beyond the scope of the Terms of Reference and was not pursued in this Inquiry.

1.67 The limits of law, both in terms of services but also in terms of its application, was a theme articulated during the Inquiry. For example, Penny Taylor, a solicitor with the Top End Women’s Legal Service, commented that ‘you can have the perfect law, but ...’;81 and the Commissioner for Victims’ Rights, South Australia, stated that:

> Law alone is not a satisfactory response to family violence. The law must be augmented by consistent, comprehensive and co-operative agencies, organisations and individuals. Existing law and range of approaches to family violence serve as a baseline from which people concerned about that violence and its effects can reach out to establish better laws and approaches reflecting victims’ needs and respecting their fundamental rights.82

---

81 Top End Women’s Legal Service, Consultation FVC 107, Darwin, 27 May 2010; See also J Drake, Submission FV 66, 1 June 2010 (‘it is the practice, not the law, that is the problem’); Women’s House Shelta, Submission FV 139, 23 June 2010 (‘We need more than better laws’).
82 Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
1.68 The Commissions are also acutely aware that there is a limited range of legal responses to the persistent and endemic problem of family violence. The Commissions note that Time for Action identified many other strategies in areas beyond legal frameworks to achieve outcomes such as relationships that are respectful, and services that meet the needs of women and children.\(^{83}\)

1.69 Family violence is also relevant—or potentially relevant—to other legislative schemes in the Commonwealth arena, including, for example, those regulating workplace relations, immigration, social security and child support. Given the importance of this issue the Commissions considered that the Australian Government should initiate an inquiry into how family violence is treated in this and other federal legislative schemes not falling within the Terms of Reference.\(^{84}\) A number of stakeholders supported the need for a consideration of such areas.\(^{85}\) On 9 July 2010 the Attorney-General of Australia, the Hon Robert McClelland MP, issued new Terms of Reference reflecting the suggestion made in the Consultation Paper.

The gendered nature of the Terms of Reference

1.70 In Time for Action the National Council acknowledged that while women as well as men can commit—as well as be victims of—family violence or sexual assault, the research shows that ‘the overwhelming majority of violence and abuse is perpetrated by men against women’,\(^{86}\) and that ‘[t]he biggest risk factor for becoming a victim of sexual assault and/or domestic and family violence is being a woman’.\(^{87}\) Such findings lie behind the National Council’s strategies that, in turn, led to the Terms of Reference for this Inquiry being focused on the reduction of violence against ‘women and their children’.

Criticism

1.71 Although the Terms of Reference are directed to reforms relating to violence against women and their children, during the Inquiry the gendered nature of the Terms of Reference attracted considerable negative comment, both with respect to the focus on women as victims, and the attachment of the possessive pronoun ‘their’ to the children concerned.\(^{88}\)

---

\(^{84}\) Consultation Paper, [1.74].

\(^{87}\) Ibid, 26.

1. Introduction to the Inquiry

1.72 A common theme from stakeholders critical of the gendered nature of the Terms of Reference, however, was that ‘Australia should be making a stand on violence no matter who is perpetrating [that violence]’ and ‘of course women and children should be protected from violence and abuse BUT so should men and children!’

1.73 Specific criticism from individual men and men’s groups included: complaints of unfair treatment of men by the legal system dealing with family law cases and protection orders; ‘ and what was described as the ideology of ‘solely male blame’.

Focus of recommendations

1.74 Although the Terms of Reference are focused on women and children, the suite of recommendations presented in this Report are ones that are directed towards reforming legal frameworks with the aim of improving the safety of victims of family violence. The effect will be to the benefit of all victims, whether male or female. Given the statistical over-representation of women as victims of family violence, the measures recommended can be seen to be a ‘litmus test’ for how well the legal system is working overall in improving safety for those who suffer family violence. The Commissions acknowledge that family violence occurs against men and in the gay, lesbian, transgender and intersex communities and, as such, family violence in such contexts may be matters which deserve separate consideration by government at an appropriate time.
Processes of reform

Consultation and collaboration processes

1.75 Commitment to widespread consultation is a hallmark of best practice law reform.\(^{93}\) Moreover, under the provisions of the Australian Law Reform Commission Act 1996 (Cth), the ALRC ‘may inform itself in any way it thinks fit’ for the purposes of reviewing or considering anything that is the subject of an inquiry.\(^ {94}\) Similarly, the NSWLRRC may ‘hold and conduct such inquiries as it thinks fit’.\(^ {95}\)

1.76 For this Inquiry, the ALRC was directed to work closely with a number of bodies and to consult particular groups, complementing the multi-faceted consultation strategy adopted for this Inquiry. This strategy used a broad mix of face-to-face consultations and roundtable discussions; online communication tools and the release of a Consultation Paper together with a companion summary.

1.77 This Report is released as a joint document of the ALRC and the NSWLRRC, reflecting the co-operative work in the Inquiry. The use of the term ‘the Commissions’ as appropriate throughout, reflects this joint endeavour. To ensure that the solutions developed in the Inquiry are ‘practically achievable and consistent with other reforms and initiatives being considered’, the ALRC provided regular briefings to key staff in the Attorney-General’s Department.

1.78 The consultation strategy for this Inquiry included consultation with all of the bodies identified expressly in the Terms of Reference and other key stakeholder groups.

1.79 A key aspect of ALRC procedures is to establish an expert Advisory Committee or ‘reference group’ to assist with the development of its inquiries. Because of the complex nature of this Inquiry the Commissions used roundtables of invited experts and advisers to inform the consultative processes at key points during the Inquiry—including, in particular, Magistrate Anne Goldsbrough as a part-time Commissioner and George Zdenkowski as special adviser. Expert readers on specific topics were also enlisted at key points in the development of the Consultation Paper and this Report, including Dr Anne Cossins, Dr Jane Wangmann, Professor Patrick Parkinson, Stephen Odgers SC, Professor Les McCrimmon and Hannah McGlade.

Community consultations

1.80 A multi-pronged strategy of seeking community comments was adopted during the Inquiry. First, internet communication tools—an e-newsletter and an online forum—were used to provide information and obtain comment; secondly, the Consultation Paper with its companion summary were released; and thirdly, a national round of stakeholder consultation meetings, forums and roundtables was conducted. In

---

\(^ {93}\) B Opeskin, ‘Measuring Success’ in B Opeskin and D Weisbrot (eds), The Promise of Law Reform (2005), 202.

\(^ {94}\) Australian Law Reform Commission Act 1996 (Cth) s 38.

\(^ {95}\) New South Wales Law Reform Commission Act 1966 (NSW) s 10(1)(c).
addition, in accordance with a commitment in the ALRC’s Reconciliation Action Plan,96 the Commissions developed an Indigenous consultation strategy.

Online tools

1.81 E-newsletter: Monthly Family Violence Inquiry e-newsletters provided a way to keep stakeholders informed about the Inquiry progress on a regular basis, with a calendar of stakeholder consultations or other key events in the upcoming month, and a summary of consultations and other work in the previous month. Each e-newsletter also highlighted an ‘Issue in Focus’ on which views were sought. Links were provided to give immediate feedback on the relevant issue through the online comment form, as well as to information about how to make formal submissions. In addition, there were links to the other inquiries of immediate relevance, including the Chisholm Review and the AIFS evaluation.

1.82 The comments received in response to the Issues in Focus provided an important additional means of input into the Inquiry. Eight e-newsletters were published during the Inquiry and by the end of the Inquiry there were 965 subscribers to the e-newsletter distribution list.

1.83 Online forum: The Family Violence Online Forum conducted from November 2009 to January 2010 amongst a closed group from the women’s legal services community. The forum was assisted by a grant from the Government 2.0 Taskforce, formed in 2008 against a backdrop of increased interest by governments worldwide in the potential of online engagement. The ALRC received funding from the Taskforce to run an online stakeholder consultation pilot, with the technical and strategic support of social business and development consultancy, Headshift.

1.84 The Family Violence Online Forum facilitated frank and open discussion in a secure online environment about issues relevant to the concerns and experiences of women’s legal services.

1.85 Online submission and blog: An online submission form was designed to enable people to respond in a focused way, addressing the individual questions and proposals set out in the Consultation Paper. Each question or proposal was followed by an area to enter a response, with the option to upload a pre-prepared submission or supporting document. As with other methods of submission, online submissions could be marked ‘confidential’. Sixty-six submissions were completed using the online facility.

1.86 The blog was set up to enable public discussion and debate around questions and proposals contained in the Consultation Paper. The invitation to join this discussion was open to all. Unlike the online submission form, all comments made on this site were public. One hundred and sixty-five blog posts were made during the Inquiry.

1.87 The online submission facility and the blog were ALRC pilot projects in modes of consultation.

---

Consultation Paper and Consultation Paper Summary

1.88 In the past, the ALRC’s standard practice has been to produce an issues paper and a discussion paper, prior to producing a final report. In this Inquiry, in response to the wide-ranging and challenging Terms of Reference, and a tight time frame, the Commissions have had to adopt different practices in relation to consultation documents to provide appropriate opportunities for community engagement withoutoverloading stakeholders.

1.89 First, only one consultation document—a Consultation Paper—was published, released on 29 April 2010, complemented by the monthly e-newsletters. The Consultation Paper posed questions—particularly in highly contested areas—and presented options and proposals for reform. The Consultation Paper was a major publication, running to 1,018 pages. To facilitate stakeholder contributions in the restricted time frame for this Inquiry, the Commissions simultaneously released a Consultation Paper Summary of 243 pages—another new practice introduced in this Inquiry. However, the enduring nature of law reform projects is such that the research and evidence base, on which recommendations are based, must be fully explored and reported.

1.90 In most ALRC inquiries, proposals and recommendations for reform are addressed to those appropriate persons or agencies in the federal sphere best placed to implement them. This reflects the ALRC’s functions under the Australian Law Reform Commission Act.97 The NSWLRC’s functions are similarly set out in its constituting Act, the New South Wales Law Reform Commission Act 1966 (NSW).98

1.91 This Inquiry engages with Commonwealth laws, as well as state and territory laws on many levels—and in both Terms of Reference. The ALRC—as a Commonwealth body—is principally concerned with Commonwealth laws or matters of uniformity and complementarity of Commonwealth laws with state and territory laws; and the NSWLRC—as a state body—is principally concerned with New South Wales laws.

1.92 In this Inquiry, however, both bodies, acting together, have been asked to go further in their respective functions. Given the importance of the Australian Government’s commitment to reducing violence against women and children, the nature of the Terms of Reference, and the compelling and widespread nature of the issues being considered, the implementation of many of the recommendations will be primarily the responsibility of the states and territories. The Commissions recommend that reform in this area be led by the Commonwealth Attorney-General and NSW Attorney General cooperatively and through SCAG.

97 Australian Law Reform Commission Act 1996 (Cth) s 21(1).
98 New South Wales Law Reform Commission Act 1966 (NSW) s 10(1).
1. Introduction to the Inquiry

1.93 During this Inquiry the Commissions conducted 236 consultations, as listed in Appendix 2 of this Report. Consultations were undertaken with individuals, legal services and support agencies, courts, police and non-government organisations. Cross-sectional roundtables and forums were conducted in Sydney, Melbourne, Perth, Hobart and Darwin. They comprised a range of groups involved in aspects of responding to family violence, including child abuse and sexual assault, as well as across the family law system.

1.94 The Commissions’ approach to consultation with Indigenous stakeholders was to take the same approach as taken in relation to victims generally, working principally through legal and other services to identify issues, given the focus of the Terms of Reference on ‘legal frameworks’.

1.95 In addition, rather than separating out issues concerning Indigenous women and children, the Commissions adopted an integrated approach. The same approach was taken with respect to other groups such as women with a disability and women of culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds. However, the mainstreaming of Indigenous issues in this manner caused problems for some stakeholders working with Indigenous groups in identifying the particular issues to address.

Submissions

1.96 The Terms of Reference initially stipulated a reporting date of 31 July 2010. In order to ensure that the views of key stakeholders could be received and considered fully, the ALRC requested, and the Attorney-General granted, an extension until 10 September 2010 and a further extension to 10 October 2010.

1.97 The Commissions received 240 submissions in the Inquiry, a full list of which is included in Appendix 1. Submissions were received from a wide range of people and agencies including individuals; academics; lawyers; community legal centres; law societies; women’s centres and legal services; support services for men, women and children; Indigenous legal and other services; directors of public prosecutions, both Commonwealth and state and territory; state governments; government departments and agencies, both state and federal; victims’ support groups and rape crisis centres; and judicial officers, including heads of jurisdiction. Although submissions closed on 25 June 2010—after the extension of time—significant submissions continued to be contributed after that date, including for example a 191-page submission on 16 July 2010.

1.98 Submissions ranged from very detailed submissions addressing the many questions and proposals in the Consultation Paper to passionate and personal stories of experiences of abuse.

---

99 See Appendix 2 for a list of consultations undertaken during the Inquiry.
100 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010.
disaffection and dismay with the way the legal and welfare systems—principally the Family Court—affected individuals.

1.99 The Commissions acknowledge the considerable amount of work involved in preparing submissions and the impact, particularly in organisations with limited funding, of committing staff resources to this task. It is the invaluable work of participants that has enriched the whole consultative process of this Inquiry and the Commissions record their deep appreciation to all participants.

1.100 The time frame for an inquiry of the magnitude covered by the Terms of Reference did, however, cause concern for many stakeholders. While acknowledging that the Consultation Paper was, for example, ‘a fantastic resource’, 101 ‘extremely comprehensive’, 102 an ‘extraordinarily impressive effort in a limited period of time’, 103 and ‘the level of detail is welcome’, 104 and commending the Commissions for ‘engaging in such a substantial undertaking’, 105 many submissions referred to the fact that a lack of resources in community organisations limited the ability to respond. 106 For example, Women’s Legal Service Brisbane commented that:

Many of the issues raised in this inquiry are so large and so complex and deal with the interaction of federal and state laws and bureaucracies that we see no feasible way forward, other than the establishment of a permanent on-going body to continue the work of the inquiry, focusing on specific aspects of the system. We are also concerned that the large discussion papers published and volume of them, (although a fantastic resource) and the limited time-frames, may have acted as an impediment to an effective response being obtained from some of the most disadvantaged women in our community and the organisations that work with them. 107

1.101 A further compounding factor affecting a number of government stakeholders was the need to secure approval at appropriate levels for submissions and the time required for such processes. 108 In view of all the constraints in the process of this Inquiry—and the importance of the issues involved—many stakeholders expressed a desire for a continued engagement with the issues and process of reform in this area. 109

---

101 Women’s Legal Service Brisbane, Submission FV 223, 2 July 2010.
103 FV Confidential C, Submission FV Confidential C, 5 June 2010.
107 Women’s Legal Service Brisbane, Submission FV 223, 2 July 2010.
109 For example: Government of South Australia, Submission FV 227, 9 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July
Overview of the Report
Definitions and terminology

1.102 This section sets out some of the terminology that will be used in this Report in referring to specific concepts in the family violence sphere.

Culturally and linguistically diverse

1.103 The phrase ‘culturally and linguistically diverse’—and the abbreviation ‘CALD’—are commonly used in referring to people of diverse backgrounds. The Commissions recognise that the discussion in this Report may apply to people who are ‘culturally or linguistically diverse’ as well as those who are ‘culturally and linguistically diverse’. The phrase is used for convenience to embrace both kinds of diversity.

Family

1.104 The definition of ‘family’ or ‘domestic’ relationship varies across the Australian jurisdictions and legislation. In this Report the particular definitions of ‘family’ are considered in the context of the specific legislation under consideration. In the discussion of sexual assault in a family violence context—under the second Term of Reference—emphasis is placed on sexual assault by current or former intimate partners (defined as spouses, de facto, and boyfriend/girlfriend).

Family violence

1.105 The terminology that should be adopted to describe violence within families and intimate relationships has been, and continues to be, the subject of controversy and debate. Invariably there will be difficulties in attaching any one label to describe a complex phenomenon varying in degrees of severity and reflecting the differing experiences of persons from diverse cultural, socio-economic, geographical groups, and those in same-sex relationships or in family structures that do not replicate the nuclear family structure.

1.106 Professors Belinda Fehlberg and Juliet Behrens note that:

The label attached to such violence has been a key issue in feminist struggles to bring it out of the shadow of the private sphere, where historically it remained as a vestige of the era when husbands had the right to use physical force to discipline not only their children but also their wives. According to feminist arguments, the lack of visibility of such violence in public discourse, in policy and in the legal system served to reinforce the gendered imbalances in power that its physical enactment in private relationships perpetuated. Consequently both gender and power have been central to evolving feminist definitions of domestic violence.

---

110 The Terms of Reference require the Commissions to consider violence against ‘women and their children’. The Commissions acknowledge that this may include same-sex relationships where women are the target of family violence.

1.107 State, territory and Commonwealth legislation that refers to violence within families and intimate relationships uses various descriptions—‘family violence’, ‘domestic violence’ and ‘domestic abuse’. The term ‘domestic’ has been criticised on the basis that it ‘qualifies and arguably reduces the term “violence”’. The Macquarie Dictionary notes the colloquial use of the term ‘domestic’ as ‘an argument with one’s spouse or another member of the household’. Thus, from a cultural perspective, the term ‘domestic’ can trivialise the impact of the violence on the victim. However the phrase ‘family violence’ has also been criticised:

The problem with the term ‘family violence’ is not even in its gendered neutrality, but the picture that it paints that violence in the family is something in which all members are complicit, and which is just to do with difficulties in relationships between family members and problems in handling conflict in non ‘violent’ ways. … The term is even less acceptable than the more commonly used ‘domestic violence’. ‘Domestic’ with all its implications of ‘just a domestic’, at least cannot be taken to qualify the violence by reference to the ungendered perpetrator, as ‘family’ can.

1.108 Reports and writing in this area have adopted varying terminology. Some have referred to both ‘family and domestic violence’, or vice versa; others to ‘family violence’, and some to ‘domestic violence’. Fehlberg and Behrens adopt the terminology of ‘violence and abuse in families’. In each case, the differing terminology—in the Australian context—attempts to refer to the same type of conduct, although the boundaries of such conduct have expanded over the years.

1.109 In this Inquiry the Commissions will refer to ‘family violence’, rather than ‘domestic violence’ or ‘domestic abuse’, unless specifically quoting from sources including legislation which use alternative terminology. The Commissions adopt this terminology to reflect the language used in the Terms of Reference, acknowledging that there is a robust debate about the appropriateness of such terminology.

---

112 B Fehlberg and J Behrens, Australian Family Law: The Contemporary Context (2008), 177.
113 Ibid, 178.
114 Anecdotally, the Commissions have heard that the term is used in the context of police being called out to a ‘domestic’.
Family violence legislation

1.110 Each of the states and territories has legislation which provides for the making of court orders to protect victims from future incidents of family violence. In some cases the legislation deals exclusively with the obtaining of protection orders in the family violence context; in other cases the legislation that deals with these protection orders also deals with the obtaining of protection orders in circumstances outside the family violence context. For ease of reference, in this Report the Commissions refer generically to both sets of legislation as family violence legislation.

1.111 At the time of writing this Report, the family violence legislation current in South Australia is the Domestic Violence Act 1994 (SA). This legislation, however, will be repealed once the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)—which was assented to on 10 December 2009—comes into effect. Parliamentary debates indicate that this may be sometime later in 2010. As of 1 September 2010 no proclamation had been made fixing a date of commencement. When the Commissions refer to the South Australian family violence legislation, it is to the Act which is yet to come into effect—unless the text indicates otherwise.

Indigenous peoples/Indigenous women

1.112 In this Report the Commissions use the term ‘Indigenous peoples’ to refer to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Island peoples, consistently with the terminology adopted by the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Social Justice Commissioner in the Social Justice Report 2009:

Aborigines and Torres Strait Islanders are referred to as ‘peoples’. This recognises that Aborigines and Torres Strait Islanders have a collective, rather than purely individual, dimension to their livelihoods. ... The use of the term ‘Indigenous’ has evolved through international law.

1.113 ‘Indigenous women’ and ‘Indigenous children’ also reflect this terminology.

Protection orders

1.114 Protection orders under family violence legislation are variously described as: apprehended violence orders, family violence intervention orders, violence restraining orders, family violence orders, domestic violence orders, and domestic violence restraining orders. For the purposes of this Report the Commissions use the generic term of ‘protection order’, unless we are specifically quoting from legislation or case law which uses the specific terminology adopted by a particular state or territory.

---

120 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT).

122 For example, when reference is made to supporting documents—including application forms for protection orders—the documents under the old legislation are referred to, as they are the forms available online at the time of writing.

Family Violence — A National Response

Structure of the Report

1.115 The Report is arranged by parts, dividing up the subject areas of the Terms of Reference as the lens through which the interaction issues are considered. The arrangement of material in this way is a pragmatic one to make the consideration of the wide ranging area of the Inquiry more manageable through the dissection of issues. The Commissions are of the view, however, that it is essential for a proper understanding of the nature of family violence to see the problems from the perspective of those engaging with the legal framework, rather than through the laws themselves. In order to highlight the issues in the Terms of Reference from the perspective of those engaging with the legal system, a number of case studies, hypotheticals and illustrations have been used, integrated throughout the chapters.

1.116 Part A, Introduction, comprises three chapters: this introductory chapter; Chapter 2, focused on the international and constitutional settings for the Inquiry; and Chapter 3, setting out the framework for reform, including a consideration of the specific principles or policy aims on which the recommendations are based.

1.117 Part B, Family Violence—A Common Interpretative Framework, comprises four chapters. Chapter 4 considers the purposes of the various laws under review in the Inquiry. Chapter 5 then focuses on the definition of family violence in family violence legislation and considers the desirability of attaining a common understanding of what constitutes family violence across family violence legislation. Chapter 6 considers the definition of family violence in other legislative schemes, including the Family Law Act, and in the criminal law—and explores the relationship between the definitions in those schemes and in family violence legislation. Definitions form one limb of a common interpretative framework, complemented for example, by guiding principles and statutory objects, which are discussed in Chapter 7.

1.118 Part C, Family Violence and the Criminal Law, considers the interaction between family violence legislation and criminal laws. Chapters 8–10 consider the interaction between family violence laws and state and territory criminal procedures, with a focus in Chapter 9 on the role of police. Chapters 11–12 focus on family violence protection orders and the criminal law, including the issue of breach. Chapter 13 considers the recognition of family violence in offences and sentencing, and Chapter 14 considers family violence issues in the context of defences to homicide, as well as the issue of recognising family relationships in criminal law responses to family violence.

1.119 Part D, Family Violence and Family Law, focuses on the interaction between state and territory family violence legislation and the Family Law Act. This part comprises four chapters. Following an introductory chapter, Chapter 13, there is a consideration of the family law interactions with, first, the jurisdiction and practice of state and territory courts—in Chapter 14; and, secondly, the jurisdiction and practice of federal family courts—in Chapter 15.

1.120 Part E, Child Protection, considers interactions between child protection laws and a range of other laws. Chapter 19 focuses on the interactions with the federal family law, while Chapter 20 considers intersections between family violence protection orders, child protection and criminal laws.

1.121 Part F, Alternative Dispute Resolution, comprises three chapters. Chapter 21 considers the regulation of FDR by the Family Law Act and the role of FDR in cases of family violence, while Chapter 22 focuses on issues of confidentiality and the admissibility of family dispute resolution and family counselling communications. The final chapter in the part, Chapter 23, focuses on alternative processes in the context of child protection and family violence protection orders.

1.122 Part G, Sexual Assault, focuses on the second Term of Reference and considers sexual assault in a family violence context. This requires the Commissions to focus on the impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws in cases of sexual assault occurring in a family violence context, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence. Chapter 24 outlines key background understandings of sexual assault in a family violence context, its nature and prevalence, and the response of the criminal justice system and other areas of law. Chapter 25 then describes the range of existing sexual offences and identifies inconsistencies in relation to elements of these offences, notably in relation to the issue of consent. It also discusses the role that guiding principles and objects clauses can play in attempting to mitigate the impact of laws on victims of sexual assault in a family violence context. Chapters 26–28 highlight ways in which particular laws and procedures operate for victims of sexual assault. In some cases, where it is possible to identify certain approaches as more promising and progressive than others, the Commissions recommend that the Commonwealth, state and territory governments should implement consistent measures based on the best model. Chapter 26 discusses some of the problems that may lead to attrition of sexual assault cases at the reporting, investigation, prosecution and other pre-trial stages. Chapter 27 focuses on issues that arise at trial, notably in relation to the application of laws of evidence, and Chapter 28 on other trial processes including the giving of jury warnings and the cross-examination of complainants and other witnesses in sexual offence proceedings. Overall, these chapters examine reform aimed at reducing attrition and improving the experiences of those who have suffered a sexual assault.

1.123 The final part of the Report, Part H, Overarching Issues, comprising four chapters, focuses on some of the overarching issues considered throughout the Inquiry. Chapter 29 examines integrated responses across Australia to issues of family violence and child maltreatment including the essential elements of such responses: common policies and objectives; inter-agency collaboration; and the provision of victim support. Information sharing, which underpins effective integrated responses, is discussed in Chapter 30. Chapter 31 focuses on the practices, resources and mechanisms required to provide and maintain quality education and training in the family violence context. The chapter then considers ways in which data collection and analysis can be improved to ensure systemic change and improvement. Specialisation—in particular specialised courts—which may also be a feature of integrated responses, is discussed in Chapter 32. Given that specialised practice is identified by the Commissions as a principal reform objective in this Inquiry, this chapter is the final chapter in this Report.
Stop Press—VLRC Child Protection Report

1.124 On 7 October 2010, as this Report was in press, the Commissions received the report of the Victorian Law Reform Commission, Protection Applications in the Children's Court, Final Report 19, 2010 (VLRC 19). There are many overlaps and synergies between VLRC 19 and this Report. The Commissions note briefly below the intersections between the two reports, identifying the chapter in this Report, followed by comments concerning the VLRC’s proposals.

1.125 Chapter 19—The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws. In Chapter 19, the Commissions consider the practical and legal difficulties arising from the fact that child protection laws are state and territory laws, whereas family laws are federal laws. The desirability of having one court deal with both areas of law and the problems of achieving this are considered. It is recommended, amongst other things, that state and territory children’s courts should have the power to make parenting orders under the Family Law Act in certain circumstances. VLRC 19 also supports the ‘one court’ principle—considered in Chapter 3 of this Report—and proposes that, in child protection cases, the Children’s Court of Victoria should be permitted to make an order granting guardianship and/or custody of the child to one parent to the exclusion of the other, when satisfied that this order is necessary to meet the needs of the child (VLRC 19, Proposal 2.23).

1.126 Chapter 20—Family Violence, Child Protection and the Criminal Law. In Chapter 20, the Commissions recommend the expansion of the powers of children’s courts to enable those courts to make protection orders under family violence legislation in certain circumstances. The VLRC takes the same approach and proposes the amendment of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to permit the Children’s Court of Victoria to make orders when a child, who is the subject of a child protection application, is a child of ‘the affected family member’ or the ‘protected person’ (VLRC 19, Proposal 2.24).

1.127 Chapter 23—Intersections and Inconsistencies. In Chapter 23, the Commissions consider the use of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) in child protection cases and the challenges presented by family violence. The Commissions make recommendations concerning the importance of taking family violence into account in child protection ADR in a number of ways. The VLRC proposes expanding and developing the use of ADR in child protection cases and that, in Victoria, a ‘graduated range of supported, structured and child centred agreement-making processes should become the principal means of determining the outcome of child protection applications’. The VLRC considers, among other things: the design of these processes; the need for risk assessment; management of the power relationships inherent in child protection cases; the availability of legal advice to the parties; participation of children and young people in ADR processes; and training and qualifications of ADR practitioners.
2. International and Constitutional Settings — The Context for Reform

Contents

Introduction 115
International instruments 116
  Universal Declaration of Human Rights 116
  International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 116
  Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women 117
  Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women 119
  Convention on the Rights of the Child 120
  Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction 123
Constitutional framework 125
  Introduction 125
  The federal system 125
  Commonwealth laws 126
  Referral of powers 126
  Western Australia 127
  Cross-vesting 129
  Dual judicial appointments 130
The web of courts in family violence matters 132
  Overview 132
  Magistrates courts 132
  District (County) and Supreme Courts 132
  Children’s courts 133
  Family courts 133
Interactions and overlaps 134
  Children 134
  Family violence 135
  Fragmentation 136

Introduction

2.1 Family violence as a legal issue sits within a complex framework of laws, state and federal, and against the backdrop of international instruments. This chapter begins with a consideration of the international instruments that affect the range of issues in focus in this Inquiry. Following this is an analysis of the division of jurisdiction in relation to family law matters between federal and state and territory laws, together with a brief description of the nature of the jurisdictions of the range of courts in which family violence issues may arise.
International instruments

2.2 Under its constituting legislation, the ALRC is directed to have regard to ‘all of Australia’s international obligations that are relevant to the matter’.1 A number of international conventions are relevant to the legal framework in relation to violence against women and children in the family. In particular, these reflect the acknowledgment that violence against women and children is a violation of human rights.

2.3 Such international instruments do not become part of Australian law until incorporated into domestic law by statute.2 But, as noted by the High Court in Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs v Teoh, a convention can still assist with the interpretation of domestic law:

The provisions of an international convention to which Australia is a party, especially one which declares universal fundamental rights, may be used by the courts as a legitimate guide in developing the common law. But the courts should act in this fashion with due circumspection when the Parliament itself has not seen fit to incorporate the provisions of a convention into our domestic law.3

Universal Declaration of Human Rights

2.4 The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted and proclaimed by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 10 December 1948, in the wake of the Second World War, and as the first international expression of rights to which all human beings are entitled.4 Comprising 30 articles, it provides the backdrop for a number of later instruments which embody and expand upon its provisions.

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

2.5 The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), described as ‘one of the most important human rights conventions of the United Nations era’,5 was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 16 December 1966 and ratified by the Australian Government in 1980. In making any proposals or recommendations the ALRC is directed to ensure that they are consistent, ‘as far as practicable’, with the ICCPR.6

2.6 A number of articles of the ICCPR are of particular relevance in the context of a consideration of family violence. Article 23 provides that ‘[t]he family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State’;7 and art 17 includes protection for the family in stipulating that:

---

1 Australia Law Reform Commission Act 1996 (Cth) s 24(2).
3 Ibid, 288.
5 B Opeskin and D Rothwell (eds), International Law and Australian Federalism (1997), 16.
6 Australia Law Reform Commission Act 1996 (Cth) s 24(1)(b).
7 Reflecting art 16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 10 December 1948, (entered into force generally on 10 December 1948).
No one shall be subjected to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to unlawful attacks on his honour and reputation.8

2.7 With respect to children, art 24 provides that:
Every child shall have, without any discrimination as to race, colour, sex, language, religion, national or social origin, property or birth, the right to such measures of protection as are required by his status as a minor, on the part of his family, society and the State.

2.8 Other key rights are the right to a ‘fair and public hearing’ in art 14 with minimum procedural guarantees in the case of criminal charges;9 and the right in art 26 that ‘all persons are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to the equal protection of the law’.

2.9 In the context of family violence, there are evident tensions in the way that these articles—and the expectations they engender—might operate. The person accused of committing family violence is entitled to a fair hearing (art 14); the family itself, as a fundamental unit of society, is entitled to protection (art 23); and the child is entitled to the expectation of protection by his or her family and the state (art 24). When, for example, a child is the subject of abuse by a family member, each of these articles, and their inherent expectations, may be in apparent conflict. Similarly, where a woman is the subject of family violence, the protection of the family requires the family to be open to some public scrutiny—notwithstanding the right to privacy and the protection of the home (art 17).

Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women

2.10 The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW)10 specifically targets discrimination against women. CEDAW came into force for Australia on 27 August 1983.11

2.11 CEDAW defines discrimination as any distinction, exclusion or restriction which prevents the equal exercise or enjoyment by women of human rights and fundamental freedoms ‘in the political, economic, social, cultural, civil or any other

---

8 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 16 December 1966, [1980] ATS 23, (entered into force generally on 23 March 1976), art 17(1). This article reflects art 12 of the UDHR.
9 This article reflects art 10 of the UDHR.
11 Ibid; and see, eg, E Evatt, ‘Eliminating Discrimination Against Women: The Impact of the UN Convention’ (1991) 18 Melbourne University Law Review 435. In March 2009 Australia became a party to the CEDAW Optional Protocol, which allows individuals to bring a complaint directly to the UN CEDAW Committee, after all domestic remedies have been exhausted.
field’.\textsuperscript{12} It supplements the anti-discrimination provisions in the ICCPR, amongst others.\textsuperscript{13} In particular it builds upon art 26 of the ICCPR, that the law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.\textsuperscript{14}

2.12 The importance of a human rights approach to family violence in this Inquiry and one embracing the human rights of men as well as women was emphasised in some submissions,\textsuperscript{15} while the role of CEDAW in counterbalancing ‘historical discrimination’ was also noted by another:

reference to CEDAW is not to exclude but to redress inherent discrimination and imbalances as they manifest themselves in law as well as the rest of society.\textsuperscript{16}

2.13 CEDAW has been called ‘an international bill of rights for women’\textsuperscript{17} and described as representing ‘a commitment by the international community to equality in the enjoyment of human rights’.\textsuperscript{18}

2.14 In 1993 the ALRC was given Terms of Reference on equality before the law as part of the Australian Government’s ‘New National Agenda for Women’ requiring the ALRC to consider whether laws should be changed or new laws made to remove any unjustifiable discrimination with a view to ensuring women’s full equality before the law. Two reports resulted.\textsuperscript{19} The ALRC noted in particular that:

As a party to [CEDAW], Australia has undertaken to pursue ‘by all appropriate means and without delay a policy of eliminating discrimination against women’.\textsuperscript{20}

2.15 The ALRC also noted that as a party to the ICCPR, considered below, ‘Australia must guarantee the equal protection of human rights to men and women without discrimination and equality before the law’.\textsuperscript{21}

2.16 The ALRC concluded that a significant aspect of gender inequality—and therefore of discrimination in contravention of CEDAW—was ‘women’s experience

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{15} See, eg, R Smith, Submission FV 135, 22 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{16} Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{18} Ibid, 437.
\textsuperscript{20} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{21} Ibid, [1.2].
\end{flushleft}
2. International and Constitutional Settings—The Context for Reform and fear of violence'. 22 This was not a new discovery. As noted by Young and Monahan, while academic commentators had been writing about the dynamic of violence in gender inequality ‘for some years’, 23

The ALRC’s distinctive contribution was to raise the general public and government awareness of the issue and to act as a mouthpiece for the views of women across Australia. 24

2.17 A further aspect of inequality highlighted by the ALRC was the impact that violence has on women’s access to the legal system:

Violence directly impedes women in enforcing their legal rights through its destructive impact on their personal confidence and because they may fear retaliation.25

2.18 Although CEDAW does not expressly mention violence as a form of discrimination, parties are asked to report on the protection of women against the incidence of all kinds of violence, ‘including sexual violence, abuses in the family, sexual harassment at the work place, etc’.26 So, for example, where art 16 calls for the elimination of discrimination in marriage and the family, family violence ‘is clearly a form of discrimination which denies women equality’.27

Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women

2.19 The Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women was adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 20 December 1993, to complement and strengthen CEDAW. The commencing articles of the declaration define violence against women:

Article 1

For the purposes of this Declaration, the term ‘violence against women’ means any act of gender-based violence that results in, or is likely to result in, physical, sexual or psychological harm or suffering to women, including threats of such acts, coercion or arbitrary deprivation of liberty, whether occurring in public or in private life.

Article 2

Violence against women shall be understood to encompass, but not be limited to, the following:

(a) Physical, sexual and psychological violence occurring in the family, including battering, sexual abuse of female children in the household, dowry-related violence, marital rape, female genital mutilation and other traditional practices harmful to women, non-spousal violence and violence related to exploitation;

22 Ibid, [2.30].
23 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [16.2], drawing attention to R Graycar and J Morgan, The Hidden Gender of Law (2nd ed, 2002), ch 10 and the literature cited by them there.
24 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [16.2].
27 Ibid, 441.
(b) Physical, sexual and psychological violence occurring within the general community, including rape, sexual abuse, sexual harassment and intimidation at work, in educational institutions and elsewhere, trafficking in women and forced prostitution;

(c) Physical, sexual and psychological violence perpetrated or condoned by the State, wherever it occurs.

2.20 In 1999, the General Assembly designated 25 November as the International Day for the Elimination of Violence against Women.

Convention on the Rights of the Child

2.21 The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (CROC) has been described as ‘the most comprehensive statement of children’s rights ever drawn up at the international level’. Following ratification by Australia on 17 December 1990, CROC has proved of significance in ‘shaping the first wave of reforms to Pt VII of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) effected under the Family Law Reform Act 1995 (Cth)’.

2.22 CROC sets out the full range of human rights—civil, cultural, economic, political and social rights—pertaining to children under 18 years of age. CROC spells out that children everywhere have the right:

- to survival;
- to develop to the fullest;
- to protection from harmful influences, abuse and exploitation; and
- to participate fully in family, cultural and social life.

2.23 The four core principles of the Convention are non-discrimination; devotion to the best interests of the child; the right to life, survival and development; and respect for the views of the child. In a joint 1997 report, the ALRC and the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission stated that:

CROC recognises that children, as members of the human family, have certain inalienable, fundamental human rights. It emphatically endorses the proposition that the family is the fundamental environment for the growth and well-being of children and states that, for the well-being of society, the family should be afforded protection and assistance so as to fully assume its responsibilities. At the same time, it recognises

---

29 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [7.3].
30 Ibid, [7.5].
33 Ibid, art 6.
34 Ibid, art 19.
that children need special safeguards and care where the family does not or cannot assume these roles.36

2.24 A number of the provisions of CROC are particularly relevant to this Inquiry. First, ‘the best interests of the child’ is a central principle, as set out in art 2:

In all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or legislative bodies, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration.37

2.25 Secondly, the maintenance of contact between a child and his or her parents is affirmed, subject to the ‘best interests’ principle, in art 12:

States Parties shall ensure that a child shall not be separated from his or her parents against their will, except when competent authorities subject to judicial review determine, in accordance with applicable law and procedures, that such separation is necessary for the best interests of the child. Such determination may be necessary in a particular case such as one involving abuse or neglect of the child by the parents, or one where the parents are living separately and a decision must be made as to the child’s place of residence.38

2.26 Of particular note is the rider in the above provision—that separation of a child from a parent may be in the child’s best interests where the child is subject to abuse or neglect by a parent. However, notwithstanding this qualification, it is also stated that:

States Parties shall respect the right of the child who is separated from one or both parents to maintain personal relations and direct contact with both parents on a regular basis, except if it is contrary to the child’s best interests.39

2.27 The risk of violence and abuse to a child is given specific attention in art 19, which requires States Parties to take all appropriate legislative, administrative, social and educational measures to protect the child from all forms of physical or mental violence, injury or abuse, neglect or negligent treatment, maltreatment or exploitation, including sexual abuse, while in the care of parent(s), legal guardian(s) or any other person who has the care of the child.40

2.28 CROC also includes articles concerning protection from sexual exploitation and sexual abuse;41 and promoting physical and psychological recovery from, amongst other things, any form of neglect, exploitation or abuse.42

---

38 Ibid, art 9(1).
39 Ibid, art 9(3).
40 Ibid, art 19(1). ‘Such protective measures should, as appropriate, include effective procedures for the establishment of social programmes to provide necessary support for the child and for those who have the care of the child, as well as for other forms of prevention and for identification, reporting, referral, investigation, treatment and follow-up instances of child maltreatment described heretofore, and, as appropriate, for judicial involvement’: art 19(2).
41 Ibid, art 34.
42 Ibid, art 39.
2.29 The child’s right to be heard in proceedings involving him or her is also addressed:

States Parties shall assure to the child who is capable of forming his or her own views the right to express those views freely in all matters affecting the child, the views of the child being given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child.43

2.30 The right to express his or her own views may be satisfied by being given an opportunity to be heard in any judicial or administrative proceedings affecting the child, either directly, or through a representative or an appropriate body, in a manner consistent with the procedural rules of applicable national law.44

2.31 These articles provide the base guidelines for children’s interactions with legal processes. Some aspects of CROC, however, may need further consideration—particularly in relation to the Family Law Act—such as art 12, dealing with the child’s right to be heard in proceedings affecting it, either directly, or indirectly through a representative or appropriate body.45 One stakeholder referred to the arguable tension between the rights:

That tension arises if a paternalistic approach is taken, namely that children are innately harmed by exposure to the fact or the detail of litigation between adults they love or respect. There is no evidence that this is the case, and the autonomous or rights-based view of children says that (like adults) each child understands as much as they are capable of understanding and what they don’t know won’t hurt them: it is the fact of the aggression between adults or the violence or neglect in the home that causes the harm. Giving effect to both these two rights means that [Separate Representatives] have not one, but two jobs:

1. To provide the actual opportunity for the child to be ‘heard’ regardless of the age and maturity of the child and that their views are given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child; and

2. To ensure that other evidence is adduced to help the tribunal reach a decision in the [best interests of the child].46

2.32 In B and B: Family Law Reform Act 1995, the Full Court of the Family Court expressed the view that CROC must be given special significance because it is an almost universally accepted human rights instrument and thus has much greater significance for the purposes of domestic law than does an ordinary bilateral or multilateral treaty not directed at such ends.47

2.33 The relationship between CROC and the Family Law Act has been considered by the High Court in the context of mandatory detention of children in immigration detention centres when proceedings for the release of two boys were brought under

---

43 Ibid, art 12(1).
44 Ibid, art 12(2).
45 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [7.5].
46 Commissioner for Children (Tas), Submission FV 62, 1 June 2010. Other stakeholders commented about the ‘failure’ by the Family Court, Independent Children’s Lawyers and Family Reports to take into account children’s views: C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
pt VII of the Family Law Act.\(^{48}\) The High Court held that the welfare power was constrained by the constitutional head of power under which it was enacted and, accordingly, that the Family Court had no jurisdiction either to order the release of the children from detention or to make general orders concerning the welfare of detained children.

Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction

2.34 The 1980 Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention), to which Australia became a signatory on 1 January 1988,\(^{49}\) sought to provide for the return of children under the age of 16 years who have been wrongfully removed from, or retained outside, their country of habitual residence.\(^{50}\)

2.35 The Convention sets up a Central Authority in each country to deal with requests for the return of children taken to or from each country. Signatories commit to the prompt return of children to the country in which they habitually reside so that issues of parental responsibility can be resolved by the courts in that country.

2.36 The Convention was implemented in Australia through s 111B of the Family Law Act and the Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations 1986 (Cth). The Secretary of the Attorney-General’s Department is designated as the Commonwealth Central Authority under the Convention with responsibility for coordinating incoming and outgoing requests to and from overseas Central Authorities and liaising with the relevant state or territory Central Authority in Australia to perform Australia’s obligations under the Convention.\(^{51}\)

2.37 Article 1 sets out the objects of the Convention:

a) to secure the prompt return of children wrongfully removed to or retained in any Contracting State; and
b) to ensure that rights of custody and of access under the law of one Contracting State are effectively respected in the other Contracting States.

2.38 There are a number of exceptions to the requirement to return the child set out in art 13, in particular where:

a) the person, institution or other body having the care of the person of the child was not actually exercising the custody rights at the time of removal or retention, or had consented to or subsequently acquiesced in the removal or retention;
b) there is a grave risk that his or her return would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation.

---

The judicial or administrative authority may also refuse to order the return of the child if it finds that the child objects to being returned and has attained an age and degree of maturity at which it is appropriate to take account of its views.

2.39 While these provide some qualification to the ‘prompt return’ principle, the overall emphasis in the Hague Convention is not on ‘the best interests of the child’—language used, for example, in CROC—but rather on the ‘rights of custody and access’—namely, rights of the parents. In a study on Hague Convention cases in Australia, Deborah Fry remarked of this different emphasis that:

While the Convention is generally praised for providing hope and redress for many parents in providing the prompt return of abducted children, it is also criticised for failing to adequately balance the needs and interests of particular children against the needs and interests of all children everywhere. The Hague Convention does not rest upon consideration of the principle of the ‘best interests of the child’ but rather purports to uphold the best interests of children collectively by deterring international abduction. It is Utilitarian at its philosophical base, aimed at enforcing the greatest good for the greatest number.52

2.40 The Full Court of the Family Court summarised the effect of the Hague Convention and regulations in In the Marriage of Emmett and Perry:

The Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations impose upon the court a primary obligation to promptly return children wrongfully removed or retained. Matters coming before this court are not to be treated as competing claims for interim custody. Proceedings under the regulations are to be heard in a prompt and summary way and it is only in exceptional circumstances that a court would give consideration to refusing the application of the Central Authority for the return of the children. Regulation 16 does vest in the court a discretion to refuse to return children if certain conditions are established. The onus of establishing those preconditions rests upon the party resisting the order for return of the children and that onus must necessarily be a heavy one.53

2.41 Hague Convention matters may sit at the intersection of Family Law Act, child protection and family violence laws. For example, where there has been violence to the mother of the child by her partner, and the child has witnessed the violence, how might this be considered in relation to a Hague Convention application for the recovery of the child? How difficult is it for a mother who seeks to escape violence by leaving her partner to argue that the exposure of the child to the violence on her ‘would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation’? Aspects of these questions relevant to this Inquiry are considered in Chapter 17.

Constitutional framework

Introduction

2.42 The constitutional framework provides the critical backdrop in this Inquiry, underpinning some of the potential for gaps in the system and contributing to problems in providing safety for those experiencing family violence. This section describes the division of power between the Commonwealth and the states and territories with respect to relevant areas of law. It then considers the range of courts potentially involved in the various issues under the banner of ‘family violence’.

The federal system

2.43 Australia has a federal system of government in which legislative power is divided between the Commonwealth and the states and territories. In the area of family law, neither the Commonwealth nor the states and territories have exclusive legislative competence.\(^54\) It has been remarked that ‘[i]f family law is viewed as an integral and homogeneous subject area on which it is appropriate to legislate, containing within it subject matters requiring a uniform approach, the conferral of legislative power has been incomplete.\(^55\)

2.44 The \textit{Australian Constitution} gives the Commonwealth the power to make laws with respect to: ‘marriage’;\(^56\) and ‘divorce and matrimonial causes; and in relation thereto, parental rights, and the custody and guardianship of infants’.\(^57\) It also has the power to legislate with respect to ‘matters incidental to the execution of any power vested by this Constitution in the Parliament’.\(^58\)

2.45 The power of the states to legislate in relation to family law is not limited in the same way, but where a state law is inconsistent with a Commonwealth law, the Commonwealth law prevails to the extent of the inconsistency.\(^59\)

2.46 Federal Magistrate Geoff Monahan and Associate Professor Lisa Young comment—with respect to this division between the Commonwealth and the states—that ‘as a general principle, private rights were regarded as more appropriately a matter for the states than for the Commonwealth’. However, questions of status—marriage and divorce—needed uniformity across Australia and hence were more appropriate for allocation to federal power.\(^60\)

---

\(^{55}\) L Young and G Monahan, \textit{Family Law in Australia} (7th ed, 2009), [3.3].

\(^{56}\) \textit{Australian Constitution} s 51(xxi).

\(^{57}\) Ibid s 51(xxii).

\(^{58}\) Ibid s 51(xxxix).

\(^{59}\) Section 109 of the \textit{Australian Constitution} provides that: ‘when a law of a State is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth, the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid’. This provision may operate in two ways: it may directly invalidate state law where it is impossible to obey both the state law and the federal law; or it may indirectly invalidate state law where the Australian Parliament’s legislative intent is to ‘cover the field’ in relation to a particular matter.

\(^{60}\) L Young and G Monahan, \textit{Family Law in Australia} (7th ed, 2009), [3.6].
what was chiefly in the minds of the framers of the Constitution was the need to ensure the recognition of such a basic institution as marriage in the different parts of the new Commonwealth and beyond its borders, throughout what was then known as the British Empire. Legislation for marriage necessarily also implied legislation for its dissolution, since the recognition of a person’s status as a divorced person was a necessary precondition to the capacity to remarry.61

Commonwealth laws

2.47 The Commonwealth Parliament did not race into the field of family law. The first Commonwealth legislation was the Matrimonial Causes Act 1959 (Cth), followed two years later by the Marriage Act 1961 (Cth). These laws superseded the laws of the states and provided a uniform Commonwealth law on marriage and divorce.

2.48 The Family Law Act and the establishment of the Family Court of Australia ushered in the current framework of federal family law. The new regime reflected the intention ‘to exercise as plenary a power as the Constitution permitted the Commonwealth to take’, and was subject to a series of constitutional challenges.62

2.49 The federal framework was later expanded by the referral of legislative power from the states to the Commonwealth.63 Section 51(xxxvii) of the Constitution gives the Commonwealth Parliament power to make laws with respect to:

matters referred to the Parliament of the Commonwealth by the Parliament or Parliaments of any State or States, but so that the law shall extend only to States by whose Parliaments the matter is referred, or which afterwards adopt the law.

Referral of powers

2.50 Dr Anthony Dickey has noted that the referral of powers has been ‘the practical way in which problems resulting from the division of State and Commonwealth powers have most often been overcome’.64

2.51 A major addition to federal power was the referral to the Commonwealth of the power to make laws with respect to the children of unmarried parents—‘ex-nuptial children’.65 Between 1986 and 1990, all states (with the exception of Western Australia) referred state powers with respect to ‘guardianship, custody, maintenance

---

61 Ibid, [3.7]. Dickey notes that it would appear that members of the Constitutional Convention of 1897–1898 were averse to repeating the United States experience where the law of divorce varies with the law of the different states: A Dickey, Family Law (5th ed, 2007), 13–14. Sir Garfield Barwick suggested another reason—Queen Victoria, who proved reluctant to assent to colonial Bills which liberalised divorce, her approval being necessary for such Bills: G Barwick, ‘Some Aspects of the New Matrimonial Causes Act’ (1961) 3 Sydney Law Review 409, 410.

62 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [3.30] ff discusses the various constitutional challenges.

63 A referral of power to the Commonwealth is not required from the ACT, the Northern Territory and Norfolk Island because s 122 of the Australian Constitution assigns to the Commonwealth plenary power to ‘make laws for the government’ of the territories.

64 A Dickey, Family Law (5th ed, 2007), 40.

65 There was an attempt in 1983 to extend the categories of children covered by the Family Law Act but this was held to be constitutionally invalid, necessitating the referral of power: Ibid, 32. In Re Cormick (1984) 156 CLR 170 it was held that the marriage power could not extend to a child who is neither a natural child of both the husband and wife, nor a child adopted by them.
and access’ in relation to ex-nuptial children to the Commonwealth. 66 The states did not, however, refer to the Commonwealth their power to legislate with respect to child protection and adoption. 67 As a consequence, in 1996, the Family Law Act was amended to include a ‘welfare power’ in relation to children. 68 although this was narrower than ‘child welfare’ as reflected in state child welfare legislation.

2.52 A further referral of power led to the Family Law Amendment (De Facto Financial Matters and Other Measures) Act 2008 (Cth). This was necessary to fill a remaining gap in relation to federal power. After the 1996 extension of the Family Law Act to ex-nuptial children, but prior to the referral that lay behind the 2008 Act, unmarried couples had to seek the resolution of issues arising from the breakdown of their relationship in two different courts: the state system, for property and partner maintenance disputes; and the federal system for parenting disputes and child support issues. 69 The remaining relationship gaps concern same-sex couples and other non-marital domestic relationships.

2.53 The effect of these referrals is that the federal parliament has jurisdiction over marriage, divorce, parenting and family property on separation. The states retain jurisdiction over adoption and child welfare. Of particular relevance is that the states have power to legislate in relation to criminal law. Further, as a matter of practical reality, many of the family law disputes that are litigated—as opposed to resolved without a court hearing—involve child welfare concerns, including involvement of state child welfare agencies and sometimes children’s courts. These interactions and overlaps are discussed below.

Western Australia

2.54 Western Australia took a different approach from the other states by availing itself of the opportunity provided in the Family Law Act for the creation of a state family court exercising both federal and state jurisdiction. 70 The reasons for doing so were explained in the Second Reading Speech to the Family Court Act 1975 (WA):

(1) to provide a single court of unified jurisdiction, administering matters of family law, both federal and state;

(2) to enable the state to continue to exercise jurisdiction in family law matters which would otherwise have been removed into the Family Court of Australia, 67 Commonwealth Powers (Family Law—Children) Act 1986 (NSW) s 3(2); Commonwealth Powers (Family Law—Children) Act 1986 (Vic) s 3(2); Commonwealth Powers (Family Law—Children) Act 1990 (Qld) s 3(2); Commonwealth Powers (Family Law) Act 1986 (SA) s 3(2); Commonwealth Powers (Family Law) Act 1987 (Tas) s 3(2).

69 For a summary see B Fehlberg and J Behrens, Australian Family Law: The Contemporary Context (2008), 34–35.

70 Family Court Act 1975 (WA), replaced by Family Court Act 1997 (WA).
with the opportunity of retaining complementary action with other responsibilities in the areas of welfare and counselling services;

(3) in the public interest to keep the administration of justice as close as possible to the people it is designed to serve;

(4) to obviate the creation of a further Commonwealth court in the state.71

2.55 When the states referred power in relation to parenting disputes involving parents who are not married to each other, Western Australia again enacted similar laws at a state level, in the Family Court Act 1997 (WA). That Act reaffirmed the separate state Family Court in Western Australia and its expanded jurisdiction on the basis that the Western Australian Family Court allows us in Western Australia—the tyranny of distance is always a problem with legislation—to be responsive to local demands and needs for the benefit of people using the Family Court.72

2.56 The court also has power to exercise jurisdiction under the Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) and so, unlike the federal family courts, it may issue care or protection orders in relation to children.

2.57 The effect of the establishment and expansion of the Family Court of Western Australia has been described as follows:

As it happens, however, Western Australia has followed the federal law closely and its Family Court has administered the [Family Law Act] in conformity with guidelines set out by the Full Court of the Federal Court and by the High Court. There has been full interchange of judges between that court and the Family Court and, to all intents and purposes, the existence of a separate Family Court has not affected the administration of the law under the federal Act.73

2.58 Given that Western Australia has kept family law matters within the state, it provides, in some respects, a ‘control jurisdiction’ for a consideration of some of the issues generated by the fragmentation between state and federal jurisdiction in the other states and territories. As remarked by the Family Law Council,

Western Australia is uniquely placed, as the only State Family Court in Australia with a single court for family law matters, to be the first State in Australia to develop and implement a unified Family Law/Child Protection Court to manage all cases involving the welfare of children with the same judicial officers able to determine both public [child protection] and private [parental responsibility and the care arrangements for children] family law matters.74

71 Western Australia, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 21 October 1975, 3606 (D O’Neill—Minister for Works).
72 Western Australia, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 25 November 1997, 8534 (J van de Klashorst—Parliamentary Secretary).
73 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [3.86].
Cross-vesting

One of the most creative and effective schemes for addressing some of the unsatisfactory issues arising out of the constitutional limitations of power between the Commonwealth and the states was the cross-vesting scheme.75

2.59 The scheme for cross-vesting was introduced in 1987 by uniform legislation enacted by the Commonwealth together with all the states and territories.76 The purpose of the uniform scheme—"as ingenious as it was simple"77—was evident in the preamble to the Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-vesting) Act 1987 (Cth):

WHEREAS inconvenience and expense have occasionally been caused to litigants by jurisdictional limitations in federal, State and Territory courts, and whereas it is desirable—

(a) to establish a system of cross-vesting of jurisdiction between those courts, without detracting from the existing jurisdiction of any court;

(b) to structure the system in such a way as to ensure as far as practicable that proceedings concerning matters which, apart from this Act and any law of a State relating to cross-vesting of jurisdiction, would be entirely or substantially within the jurisdiction (other than any accrued jurisdiction) of the Federal Court or the Family Court or the jurisdiction of a Supreme Court of a State or Territory are instituted and determined in that court, whilst providing for the determination by one court of federal and State matters in appropriate cases; and

(c) if a proceeding is instituted in a court that is not the appropriate court, to provide a system under which the proceeding will be transferred to the appropriate court.

2.60 The Explanatory Memorandum accompanying the federal Bill articulated the hope ‘that no action will fail in a court through lack of jurisdiction, and that as far as possible no court will have to determine the boundaries between federal, state and territory jurisdiction’.78 State and territory Supreme Courts were vested with federal jurisdiction; federal courts were vested with the full jurisdiction of state and territory Supreme Courts; and from 1988–1999, the scheme ‘overcame constitutional deadlocks that used to bedevil the Family Court’s jurisdiction’.79

2.61 The scheme was ‘revolutionary (yet ultimately flawed)’,80 and did not withstand constitutional challenge—at least in the direction of the attempt to vest state jurisdiction in federal courts. In Re Wakim; Ex parte McNally, the High Court held that Ch III of the Australian Constitution exhaustively defined the ‘matters’ that may be the subject of the judicial power of the Commonwealth—and this did not include

75 T Altobelli, Family Law in Australia: Principles and Practice (2003), 56.
77 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [3.96].
78 Explanatory Memorandum, Jurisdiction of Courts (Cross-Vesting) Bill 1987 (Cth).
79 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [3.96].
80 Ibid, [3.87].
exercising the jurisdiction of the states. That part of the scheme that enabled federal courts to hear state matters—such as the Family Court determining a claim under state based de facto relationships legislation or family provision legislation—was unconstitutional.

2.62 Re Wakim struck down the cross-vesting scheme in one direction, but not the other. While it held invalid the purported vesting in federal courts of state judicial power, cross-vesting remains valid from the Commonwealth to the states, pursuant to s 77(iii) of the Australian Constitution. In addition, a vesting of jurisdiction between the Commonwealth and the territories is still permissible. Young and Monahan describe the impact of the failure of the cross-vesting scheme:

In addition to its impact on corporate law … the partial demise of the cross-vesting scheme had an immediate effect on Australian family law. While the former was swiftly remedied by a reference of powers by the states to the Commonwealth, the latter has proved more difficult to solve. Many family law matters now needed to be resolved in both a federal and state court. Of immediate relevance was the reality that cross-vesting had allowed de facto families to seek orders in the Family Court to resolve both parenting disputes (federal jurisdiction) and property disputes (state jurisdiction). This problem was, of course, resolved by a state reference of powers over de facto relationships that resulted in amendments to the [Family Law Act] (by the Family Law Amendment (De Facto Financial Matters and Other Measures) Act 2008 (Cth) … Nevertheless, many other procedural benefits that cross-vesting provided to family law litigants have now been lost.

2.63 In consequence, any expansion of Commonwealth power not already covered in the heads of power in the Constitution has to be achieved through the mechanism of referral of power pursuant to s 51(xxxvii). In this case the Australian Government may make laws—as federal laws—within the additional heads of power. It does not give the Australian Government, or federal courts, authority to act under state laws—that was the flaw in the cross-vesting scheme.

Dual judicial appointments

2.64 Because of the challenges posed by the constitutional division of power between the Commonwealth and the states, another strategy has been mooted—in the form of dual commissions—with a judicial officer holding, simultaneously, state and federal judicial appointments. On 23 October 2009, the Australian Government Attorney-General, the Hon Robert McClelland MP and the Victorian Attorney-General, Rob Hulls MP, in a joint press release announced their intention to make the first judicial federal-state appointment. The Hon Justice Julie Dodds-Streeton was appointed to the Federal Court and it was proposed that she be offered reappointment to the Victorian State Supreme Court. As remarked by Attorney-General McClelland:

---

81 Re Wakim; Ex parte McNally (1999) 198 CLR 511.
83 I. Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [3.100].
84 R McClelland (Federal Attorney-General) and R Hulls (Victorian Attorney-General), ‘Sharing Expertise in the Judiciary’ (Press Release, 23 October 2009).
The appointment follows initiatives being pursued through the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) to create a national judiciary to promote greater consistency and uniformity in the provision of judicial services in Australia.85

2.65 Attorney-General Hulls considered that such an arrangement ‘would allow both the Commonwealth and Victoria to jointly utilise the experience and expertise of appointees across jurisdictions’.86 New South Wales Attorney-General, the Hon John Hatzistergos MLC, also indicated his intention to facilitate similar appointments in that state by legislative amendment.87

2.66 At a judges’ conference on 25 January 2010, the Attorney-General reiterated the aspiration expressed on the appointment of Dodds-Streeton J to the Federal Court, in saying that the initiative of dual commissions ‘is another means of promoting nationally consistent standards of judicial decision-making’, complementing ‘the work SCAG has been doing on judicial exchange’:

> These initiatives provide greater scope for the sharing of expertise across jurisdictions, will encourage a dynamic judiciary, and will provide for greater uniformity and consistency in the application of laws that have national significance.88

2.67 While the Attorney-General was ‘enthusiastic about the opportunity ... for progressing dual commissions’, he acknowledged that there are ‘a number of practical challenges’ before a dual commission could be implemented:

> no judge can be forced to accept a commission from another jurisdiction. Similarly, no Government can be forced to appoint a judicial officer from another jurisdiction. I expect that, once appointed, working arrangements for the holders of a dual commission would be the subject of discussion and arrangement between heads of jurisdictions.89

2.68 The Commissions acknowledge the potential of dual commissions to meet some of the problems created by the division of power, in that holders of such commissions would be able to exercise, as a Federal Court judge, jurisdiction under federal laws, and, as a state Supreme Court judge, jurisdiction under state laws. However, at the time of writing this Report, no such dual appointment has been made and the constitutional validity of such appointments also remains untested. Moreover, in the context of recommendations for reform of legal frameworks to improve safety for victims of family violence, a concurrent appointment of a judge to a federal court, namely a federal family court, and a state Supreme Court, would not necessarily overcome the particular problems of division of power, as the principal judicial work in relation to family violence—as considered in the next section of this chapter—takes place in state and territory magistrates courts, and dual appointments to a federal court and a magistrates court has not yet been proposed.

85 Ibid.
86 Ibid.
87 Ibid.
89 Ibid.
The web of courts in family violence matters

Overview

2.69 Family violence issues not only straddle the constitutional division of power described above, they may also arise in a number of judicial settings:90

- magistrates courts;
- District (County) and Supreme Courts;
- children’s courts; and
- family courts—including the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Magistrates Court and the Family Court of Western Australia.

2.70 Children’s courts and family courts can be described as ‘specialist’ courts, with specific jurisdiction in relation to particular matters. The other courts listed are ones of general jurisdiction, although aspects of specialisation may be present in the form, for example, of specialist lists, such as a family violence list.91 The jurisdiction of each court will be described briefly, leading into a consideration of where family violence matters may arise in the context of such jurisdiction.

Magistrates courts

2.71 Many family violence matters are likely to arise first in a local court of a state or territory, before a magistrate. Such matters may include proceedings for protection orders and summary criminal offences—such as common assault, property damage, stalking, and breach of a protection order. Committal proceedings for serious criminal offences—for example, sexual assault—may also be heard in such courts.92

Magistrates courts also exercise some limited jurisdiction in matters under the Family Law Act.93

District (County) and Supreme Courts

2.72 State and territory District (County) and Supreme Courts exercise jurisdiction in relation to state and territory law, in particular as to more serious criminal offences. Appeals regarding protection orders may go to the District (County) Court.94

2.73 Although s 39 of the Family Law Act originally vested the Supreme Courts of the states and territories with jurisdiction in relation to matrimonial causes, this vesting arrangement was terminated by Proclamation in 1976, except in relation to the Northern Territory. However, the Supreme Courts may exercise the jurisdiction of the 90 The particular name of the court in each jurisdiction may vary.

---

91 Specialised courts are considered in detail in Ch 32.
92 Various lower courts generally have their own legislation, eg Local Court Act 2007 (NSW); Magistrates Court Act 1989 (Vic).
94 For example, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 84.
Family Court of Australia by virtue of the cross-vesting of jurisdiction legislation discussed above, under s 77(iii) of the Australian Constitution.\(^95\)

Children’s courts

2.74 In all states and territories there are specialised children’s courts that have jurisdiction related to the care and protection of children and young people, and also criminal cases concerning children and young people.\(^96\)

2.75 The proceedings are conducted with as little formality and legal technicality as the case permits. Proceedings in the care and protection jurisdiction are not conducted in a strictly adversarial manner. Children’s courts take all measures practicable to ensure that a child or young person has every opportunity to be heard and participate in proceedings, and that the proceedings, decisions or rulings are understood by the child or young person.

2.76 In Tasmania, the ACT and the Northern Territory, the Children’s Court is presided over by a magistrate. In New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, Western and South Australia, the head of the court is a specialist judge from the District Court.\(^97\) Most states have specialist children’s courts operating in the capital cities. Outside these areas, the local magistrate can convene a children’s court when necessary.\(^98\)

Family courts

2.77 The Family Court of Australia, the Federal Magistrates Court and the Family Court of Western Australia all exercise jurisdiction under the Family Law Act to hear family law matters. The Family Court of Australia was established by the Family Law Act as a superior court of record. Appeals from a judge of the Family Court go to the Full Court of the Family Court with a further appeal to the High Court of Australia where the court grants special leave.

2.78 The Federal Magistrates Court was established under the Federal Magistrates Act 1999 (Cth) and commenced operation on 23 June 2000. As set out in s 3, it is intended that the court: operate as informally as possible; use streamlined procedures; and encourage the use of dispute resolution procedures.\(^99\) The Federal Magistrates Court exercises limited jurisdiction under the Family Law Act including in relation to matrimonial causes, and matters arising under Part VII (Children).

---

\(^95\) The Supreme Court of the Northern Territory still exercises original jurisdiction under the Family Law Act, together with the Family Court of Australia: see A Dickey, Family Law (5th ed, 2007), 108.

\(^96\) For example, the NSW Children’s Court has jurisdiction to hearing protection order matters where the defendant is less than 18 years of age: Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 91(1)(b). South Australia and the Northern Territory have a Youth Court and a Family Matters Court with jurisdiction over child welfare.

\(^97\) C Cunneen, ‘Young People and Juvenile Justice’ in G Monahan and L Young (eds), Children and the Law in Australia (2008) 187, [9.11]—note that since this publication, the Chief Children’s Magistrate in NSW is a District Court Judge, as reflected in the text above.

\(^98\) Ibid, [9.11].

\(^99\) Federal Magistrates Act 1999 (Cth) s 3(2).
2.79 A very high proportion of the work in the Federal Magistrates Court concerns family law—in 2007–08, it was 91.7% of the work.\(^{100}\) The majority of family law matters overall are heard in the Federal Magistrates Court. For example, in the period 2007–08, over 79% of first instance family law applications were filed in the Federal Magistrates Court.\(^ {101}\) Appeals in family law matters go to the Family Court.

2.80 The Family Law Council described the differences in the work of the two courts as follows:

In the family law context, the Family Court of Australia deals with the most intractable disputes and in particular with those parenting applications where there are extremely serious allegations of child abuse or physical abuse which often involve allegations of substance abuse and mental health issues. However, issues of child abuse, substance abuse, mental health and family violence are also highly prevalent issues in parenting applications dealt with by the Federal Magistrates Court.\(^ {102}\)

2.81 As discussed above, the Family Court of Western Australia is a state family court, exercising both federal and state jurisdiction. It is vested with jurisdiction in relation to most original proceedings arising under the Family Law Act, including matrimonial causes, and to hear appeals under the Act from the Magistrates Court of Western Australia, other than appeals against decisions made by a family law magistrate.

Interactions and overlaps

Children

2.82 Protection issues concerning children are mainly the domain of the state and territory children’s courts as the Commonwealth has only limited legislative power with respect to children, principally reflected in the Family Court’s power to make parenting orders.

For example, a parent in a Family Court proceeding may allege that the other parent has been violent towards the child. Conversely, in exercising their power to make protection orders, State and Territory children’s courts sometimes make orders on issues that could also be the subject of parenting orders made by the Family Court. For example, in making a protective order, a children’s court may make orders regarding access and custody.\(^ {103}\)

2.83 Section 69ZK of the Family Law Act provides that state and territory child welfare laws and orders made under those laws take precedence over Family Court

---

101 Ibid, 28.
orders. In contrast, in the area of family violence, ‘live with’ and ‘reside with’ orders made under the Family Law Act can be used to defeat state and territory family violence protection orders.

2.84 In general terms, the Family Law Act governs the resolution of private disputes about the parenting of all children in Australia, while state and territory ‘child protection laws’—that is, laws that aim to protect children from abuse and neglect—govern the resolution of public disputes between state or territory governments and individuals about the care and protection of their children.

2.85 The contrasting nature of the different proceedings was described by the Family Law Council:

> [T]he applicant in family proceedings in State and Territory children's courts is always the State and Territory child protection authority. Hence, children’s court disputes are public law disputes with the State acting as applicant. This is in contrast to disputes under the Commonwealth [Family Law Act] where both the applicant and respondent are usually a parent or family member, and the dispute is thus a private one. There can, however, be a private element to child protection disputes and a public element to Family Court disputes. For example, in a matter before the Family Court an allegation of abuse may be made requiring child protection authorities to become involved. At the State and Territory level, once the public law threshold for intervention has been met, a children’s court may make custody and access orders in favour of individuals in the context of exercising their protective jurisdiction (although the ambit of this power depends on the order made), thus creating a private law dimension in such disputes.

2.86 The Council also observed that despite the differences between the jurisdictions and the ‘distinct divide between private and public law’, the orders available under the state and territory family violence and child protection legislation ‘cover much of the same ground’ as the Family Law Act.

Family violence

2.87 The primary mechanism exercised at state and territory level in relation to family violence is that of protection orders in magistrates courts—and these may interact with the Family Law Act:

> There is often interplay between State Protection orders which provide for the protection of a parent and their children by prohibiting the alleged perpetrator (the other parent) from coming within a defined distance of the parent and child, and federal family court orders that provide for the child to spend time with that parent.\textsuperscript{109}

---

106 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld); Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT); Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT).

2.88 Division 11 of the \textit{Family Law Act} was introduced with the objective of resolving inconsistencies between state and territory family violence orders and \textit{Family Law Act} contact orders, as they were known at the time.\textsuperscript{110} However ‘the possibility of inconsistent orders still exists where one court orders contact while another court prohibits it’:\textsuperscript{111}

\begin{quote}
While the [\textit{Family Law Act}] contains quite detailed procedures for the Court to follow when the possibility of inconsistent orders arises, the written law is not necessarily the same as the law in practice.\textsuperscript{112}
\end{quote}

\section*{Fragmentation}

\textit{Fragmented jurisdiction}

2.89 The net effect of the complexities of the division of power between the Commonwealth and the states and territories is a system which is fragmented. As Federal Magistrate Dr Tom Altobelli remarked:

\begin{quote}
The chaos and complexity of jurisdiction in Australian family law is mainly attributable to Australia’s federal system of government and the distribution of powers under s 51 of the Constitution. Under the Constitution, neither the Commonwealth nor the states have exclusive legislative competence in the area of family law. This has meant that a complex and fragmented system for determining family law issues has developed and been exacerbated by attempts to interpret constitutional powers in various ways.\textsuperscript{113}
\end{quote}

2.90 Moreover, the boundaries between the various parts of the system are not always clear and jurisdictional intersections and overlaps are ‘an inevitable, but unintended, consequence’.\textsuperscript{114}

2.91 The fragmentation of the system has a particular impact in relation to child protection issues. As noted by the Family Law Council, cases in which children are allegedly being abused may be dealt with on the initiative of a child protection agency in a children’s court. However, such cases are increasingly being litigated in family courts—as a private law matter—where a parent must take responsibility for proving the abuse. Family courts have limited capacity to generate independent evidence of allegations of child abuse.\textsuperscript{115} The levels of complexity increase for ‘blended’ families, where the parents have had children with different partners:

\begin{enumerate}
\item[] 109 Ibid, 54.
\item[] 110 Since 2006 the language has changed from ‘contact’ to, eg, ‘spend time with’: \textit{Family Law Act 1975 (Ch)} ss 63C(2)(b), 64B(2)(b).
\item[] 112 Ibid, [3.5].
\item[] 113 T Altobelli, \textit{Family Law in Australia: Principles and Practice} (2003), 46.
\end{enumerate}
For example, one child may be the subject of a State child protection order (public law) and the arrangements in respect of the other child(ren) are determined under private law (federal family courts). There is also the concern in respect of those children who are the subject of temporary child protection orders in the State courts but the orders are not pursued by the child welfare authority in the State or Territory courts on the basis that the ‘relative’ is to apply to the federal family courts for parenting orders.116

2.92 Family violence issues also have to encounter the ‘bifurcated institutional framework’117 generated by the federal/state divide:

Fragmentation of the law on jurisdictional lines results in the possibility of differences of approach to similar problems. It may result in an unevenness in the development of facilities created for dealing with similar problems. It may lead to manoeuvring and the use of subterfuge as parties attempt to get themselves within a particular jurisdiction not otherwise open to them.

These effects may seem pretty unsatisfactory to anyone who is concerned that the best legal solutions and facilities should be available for dealing with problems which so closely affect the happiness of so many families and, particularly, the children.118

2.93 There is a danger, moreover, that issues concerning violence may fall into the cracks between the systems. As noted by the Family Law Council in December 2009:

more than one court may be involved in a particular family breakdown. Disputes cannot be neatly divided into private and public areas of law and parties will often have to institute or be engaged in proceedings in various legal forums to have all of their issues determined. ... The overlapping jurisdictions cause significant angst for the parties involved and considerable difficulties for the courts.119

2.94 The consequence of the division of powers means that ‘neither the Commonwealth nor the States’ jurisdiction provides a family unit with the complete suite of judicial solutions to address all of the legal issues that may impact on a family in respect of their children’.120

2.95 Throughout this Inquiry the Commissions heard about the fact of, and problems arising from, the fragmentation of jurisdiction. As a result, the effective protection of those who experience family violence is compromised by gaps arising as a result of the interaction between the jurisdictions.

118 L Young and G Monahan, Family Law in Australia (7th ed, 2009), [3.77].
120 L Moloney and others, Allegations of Family Violence and Child Abuse in Family Law Children’s Proceedings: A Pre-reform Exploratory Study (2007), prepared for the Australian Institute of Family Studies, [7.3.2].
The fragmentation of the system has also led to a fragmentation of practice. A number of stakeholders in this Inquiry commented that the different parts of the legal framework dealing with issues of family violence operated in ‘silos’ and that this was the key problem in the system.\footnote{For example: Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Victims of Crime Assistance League Inc NSW, Submission FV 23, 23 February 2010.} Although the laws utilised within each ‘silo’ might be perceived to operate effectively, or to require minor refinement and change, the problems faced by victims of violence required engagement with several different parts of the system. Consequently these people could be referred from court to court, agency to agency, with the risk that they may fall between the gaps in the system and not obtain the legal solutions—and the protection—that they require.\footnote{The system was described as like being on a ‘roundabout’: Australian Institute of Family Studies, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms: Summary Report (2009), [4], 21.}

The next chapter considers the framework for reform developed in this Inquiry to meet the problems of fragmentation considered in this chapter.
3. Framework for Reform

Contents

Introduction—the reform challenge 139
Principles of reform 140
  Seamlessness 141
  Accessibility 142
  Fairness 142
  Effectiveness 143
Framework of reform recommendations 143
  Background 143
  Reform response 144
  One court to deal with family violence? 144
  Expansion of federal jurisdiction to include child protection 146
  Corresponding jurisdictions 148
Focus of reform 150

Introduction—the reform challenge

3.1 This Inquiry focuses on areas of intersection and interaction between a wide number of laws, operating in different ways and in different spheres. There are federal as well as state and territory laws; criminal as well as civil laws. Some concern private law matters—between individuals; some concern public law matters—between individuals and the state. As noted in Chapter 2, where people who are experiencing family violence encounter the legal systems across the state and federal division of powers—and even within the state and territory systems alone—there are particular challenges.

3.2 For example, one family in which there is serious, ongoing controlling violence may need to go to three different courts in order to deal with that violence. The family is likely to commence proceedings in a magistrates court for a protection order. The conduct that led to the need for protection may constitute a criminal offence; and there may be a prosecution, often also in the magistrates court—but in more serious cases in the District (County) or Supreme Court. The violence may have alerted family, neighbours or the police to notify a child protection agency, which may commence care proceedings in a children’s court. At the same time, one of the parents may wish to see the children and commence proceedings in a family court for parenting orders governing the children’s living arrangements.
3.3 The impact on children may be especially severe, as reflected through the eyes of a nine-year old child speaking of the uncertainty of ongoing Family Court proceedings:

I felt worried that mum was going to go back and forth and back and forth and it wasn’t going to stop ... [I felt] freaked out, I couldn’t get to sleep I had nightmares, I was crying a lot ... [It was just all] horrible and frightening.1

3.4 The sense of being ‘bounced’ between systems was described by one contributor to this Inquiry as feeling ‘like a ball on a pool table’.2 It is further compounded by gaps in law and gaps in practice. The laws often operate in what has been described as ‘silos’, with people potentially being bounced around and falling between the gaps between these various laws.3 One women’s legal centre attributed the dropping away of complaints of family violence to such gaps:

The small numbers of women who do build the courage to report [family violence] then have to battle their way through the legal and court systems. In [our centre’s] experience, these systems have inherent gaps which ultimately fail to protect women. They fall through the cracks and are left feeling vulnerable and re-traumatised; the reason so many women give up.4

3.5 From the perspective of those dealing with family violence, such experiences may have a significant detrimental impact on safety. The object of this Inquiry is, therefore, to determine ‘what, if any, improvements could be made to relevant legal frameworks to protect the safety of women and children’.

3.6 This Report contains 187 recommendations for reform. The recommendations reflect, on the one hand, the Government’s objectives with respect to the reduction of violence, particularly in relation to women and children, and, on the other hand, a framework of key principles for the Inquiry.

3.7 This chapter provides an outline of the key principles embodied in the recommendations for reform, followed by a summary of the overall framework of the recommendations in the light of the problems and challenges of the fragmentation of jurisdiction described in Chapter 2.

Principles of reform

3.8 The Australian Government has identified a clear goal ‘to reduce all violence in our communities’, recognising that ‘whatever the form violence takes, it has serious and often devastating consequences for victims, their extended families and the

---

2 Confidential, Submission FV 49, 5 May 2010.

3 Or on a ‘roundabout’ as described in the AIFS evaluation: Australian Institute of Family Studies, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms: Summary Report (2009), [4], 21. This separation of practice or ‘silos’ was reflected, for example, in one submission to this Inquiry, where different committees of the one Law Society came to strongly divergent conclusions with respect to a number of matters raised in the Consultation Paper: Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.

4 Hunter Women’s Centre, Submission FV 79, 1 June 2010.
3. Framework for Reform

3.9 The objective of this Inquiry reflects the Government’s objective—through recommendations for reform of legal frameworks—to improve safety for women and children in the context of family violence. In this context, the idea of ‘frameworks’ extends beyond law in the form of legislative instruments and includes education, information sharing and other matters. The overall touchstone throughout the chapters and recommendations, however, is one of improving safety.

3.10 The recommendations in this Report are underpinned by four specific principles or policy aims that relevant legal frameworks in this Inquiry should express: seamlessness, accessibility, fairness and effectiveness, as summarised below.

1. Seamlessness—to ensure that the legal framework is as seamless as possible from the point of view of those who engage with it.

2. Accessibility—to facilitate access to legal and other responses to family violence.

3. Fairness—to ensure that legal responses to family violence are fair and just, holding those who use family violence accountable for their actions and providing protection to victims.

4. Effectiveness—to facilitate effective interventions and support in circumstances of family violence.

Seamlessness

3.11 The idea of ‘seamlessness’ is expressed in a number of ways in various reviews and discussions about responding to family violence. Time for Action identified, as one key ‘outcome’ area, that ‘systems work together effectively’, which combines ‘seamlessness’ as an interaction of systems as well as ‘effectiveness’.

3.12 At times, ‘seamlessness’ is expressed as an aspiration of having one court deal with the wide range of matters that can arise in relation to a family, where women and children are affected by family violence and child abuse. The approach to the idea expressed as ‘one court’ is considered further below in the framework for reform.
3.13 At other times the idea of seamlessness may be seen, for example, in terms of:

- recommendations for consistency of definitions;\(^8\)
- recommendations for greater sharing of information and facilitation of pathways between the various services, agencies and courts that are involved in family violence matters;\(^9\)
- training programs, knowledge bases and professional development for all those in the various systems that deal with issues of family violence and child abuse;\(^10\)
- coordination or integration of responses to family violence matters.\(^11\)

3.14 From the point of view of those engaging with the legal frameworks in which issues of family violence and child abuse arise, the Commissions consider that the key focus for this Inquiry must be upon the experience of those participants—to see the system through their eyes. ‘Seamlessness’ in practice may involve a combination of each and every one of the elements identified so far, and to be considered throughout this Inquiry. It is a foundational policy principle driving the recommendations for reform contained in this Report.

Accessibility

3.15 In the report, A Strategic Framework for Access to Justice in the Federal Civil Justice System (the Access to Justice Framework), the Access to Justice Taskforce of the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department identifies ‘accessibility’ as a key principle: ‘Justice initiatives should reduce the net complexity of the justice system’.\(^12\) It also includes the principle of ‘efficiency’, that ‘the justice system should deliver outcomes in the most efficient way possible, noting that the greatest efficiency can often be achieved without resorting to a formal dispute resolution process, including through preventing disputes’.\(^13\)

Fairness

3.16 Time for Action identified as one key ‘outcome’ area, that ‘responses are just’.\(^14\) The Access to Justice Framework identifies two ‘access to justice principles’: ‘appropriateness’ and ‘equity’.\(^15\) These are similar to the idea of ‘fairness’ and

---

\(^9\) For example, Ibid, Recs 4, 12. See also Ch 30.

\(^10\) For example, Ibid, Recs 2, 3. See also Ch 31.

\(^11\) See Ch 29 for a discussion of integrated responses generally.

\(^13\) Ibid, 63.

3. Framework for Reform

‘accessibility’. The ideas of being ‘fair and just’ and ‘providing protection’ should also include the idea of ‘respect’, which is also a key outcome in Time for Action.16

3.17 Fairness also reflects human rights principles—in particular, Australia’s obligations under international conventions, considered in Chapter 2. A key obligation concerns the right to minimum procedural guarantees in the case of criminal charges, especially relevant in the context of Part G of this Report, concerning sexual assault.

Effectiveness

3.18 The Access to Justice Framework includes ‘effectiveness’ as one of its key principles:

> The interaction of the various elements of the justice system should be designed to deliver the best outcomes for users. Justice initiatives should be considered from a system-wide perspective rather than on an institutional basis. All elements of the justice system should be directed towards the prevention and resolution of disputes, delivering fair and appropriate outcomes, and maintaining and supporting the rule of law.17

3.19 Time for Action included as a specific outcome that ‘systems work together effectively’.18

Framework of reform recommendations

Background

3.20 The consequence of the division of powers discussed in Chapter 2 means that ‘neither the Commonwealth nor the States’ jurisdiction provides a family unit with the complete suite of judicial solutions to address all of the legal issues that may impact on a family in respect of their children’.19

3.21 This fragmentation of jurisdiction sits clearly within the Terms of Reference for this Inquiry. Put at its simplest:

> more than one court may be involved in a particular family breakdown. Disputes cannot be neatly divided into private and public areas of law and parties will often have to institute or be engaged in proceedings in various legal forums to have all of their issues determined. ... The overlapping jurisdictions cause significant angst for the parties involved and considerable difficulties for the courts.20

---

Throughout this Inquiry the Commissions have continued to hear about the fact of, and problems arising from, the fragmentation of jurisdiction—not only from those who work within the current system but also those who seek its protection. As a result, the effective protection of those who experience family violence is compromised by gaps arising as a result of the interaction between the jurisdictions. In consultations and submissions the Commissions have also heard that the problems involve not only a fragmentation of laws, but also a fragmentation of practice.

Reform response

The challenge in this Inquiry is to suggest a practical way of achieving all of the goals articulated in the policy framework outlined above. That is, within the overall primary concern with safety, relevant legal frameworks should express seamlessness, accessibility, fairness and effectiveness. In this section the Commissions consider the options for reform and the proposition of ‘one court’, concluding that ‘one court’—as a concept rather than as a new or separate institution—embodies all of the policy goals identified for improving the interaction between the systems in practice in the interests of protecting the safety of those who experience family violence. In the section that follows, the concept of one court that informs the recommendations in this Report is explained.

One court to deal with family violence?

Would it be feasible to establish one court with a full range of jurisdiction to deal with the wide range matters arising in situations of family violence—a fully integrated court with the ability to deal with protection orders, child protection, family law, perhaps even criminal issues? Some jurisdictions have chosen this route.

An international example is the Specialist Domestic Violence Unit in the District of Columbia that includes:

a fully integrated court that handles civil, criminal, and family law matters in relation to disputes ‘where the parties are related by blood, legal custody, marriage, cohabitation, a child in common, or a romantic relationship’. The court hears protection order hearings and all misdemeanor criminal charges and, once a case has been brought to it, any family law matters involving the same parties.21

It might be argued that such a model would potentially have distinct benefits, including, for example:

• parties would not be shuttled from court to court;
• fewer court appearances;
• less cost;
• less repetition of evidence;

quicker resolution of issues—if properly resourced;

those experiencing family violence would be less likely to drop out of the system without the remedies they need for achieving safety; confidence in the ability of the legal system to respond to family violence would build;

specialised judges, as well as specialised court staff, lawyers, prosecutors and specialised practice; premises with safety protection; and colocation of services—including legal and family violence support services.

In summary, it might be argued that this would, overall, satisfy clearly all of the guiding principles identified by the Commissions as the framework for reform in this Inquiry.

However, there are a number of very significant challenges to be met in practice with creating one court of the model suggested above:

in the Australian context there is the constitutional division of power between the Commonwealth and the states described in Chapter 2; and the cost and practical challenges of establishing a completely new specialist family violence court would be very significant.

If these difficulties were overcome and the Australian Government created one federal family violence court, the states and territories would still provide many of the services relevant to safety—especially police and child protection services—and there would be questions as to how the new court would work with the existing specialist jurisdiction of the federal family courts.

Conversely, if the ‘one court’ were to be a state court, the consequences would also be significant. Even though the states have jurisdiction in relation to family violence protection orders, crime and child protection, if all family violence matters were to go to state courts, would the Australian Government then vacate the field of family law, leaving it to the states? It would hardly be sensible for family violence cases to be dealt with in a state court and family disputes not involving violence to be dealt with in a federal court. Such a move would create another gap in the system. Further, the expense of such a move for the states would be considerable and the specialist expertise in federal family courts in relation to violence could be lost.

The following section considers how to implement a ‘one court’ concept within the context of such limitations, reviewing two main options—the expansion of federal jurisdiction to include child protection; and the development of corresponding jurisdictions.
Expansion of federal jurisdiction to include child protection

3.32 The option of expanding the jurisdiction of family courts to include certain child protection responsibilities reflects the fact that both systems share a primary focus on the best interests of the child. As noted by the Family Law Council in 2002, the ‘duplication of effort between state and federal systems’ is a matter of continuing concern. At that time the Council recommended that, to avoid such duplication, a decision should be taken as early as possible whether a matter should proceed under the Family Law Act or under child welfare law with the consequence that there should be only one court dealing with the matter.²²

3.33 The Family Law Council described this approach as the ‘One Court principle’, although this idea of one court is more limited than that discussed above, involving a choice of jurisdiction rather than an amalgamation or expansion of jurisdiction. In 2009 the Council went further, recommending that:

The Attorney-General as a member of SCAG address the referral of powers to federal family courts so that in determining a parenting application federal family courts have concurrent jurisdiction with that of State Courts to deal with all matters in relation to children including where relevant family violence, child protection and parenting orders.²⁴

3.34 The essence of this proposal is to expand the ability of federal family courts, allowing them to make child protection decisions. Due to the constitutional constraints discussed in Chapter 2, any expansion of federal jurisdiction would require: first, the referral of power to the Commonwealth; and secondly, the enactment of federal legislation pursuant to such referral. Child protection matters were not included in the referral of power that led to the introduction in 1995 of provisions in the Family Law Act applicable to ex-nuptial children as well as to children of marriages.²⁵ To be given jurisdiction in relation to child protection decisions would require a further referral, followed by the amendment of the Family Law Act.

3.35 Such a proposal also raises issues of the extent of the powers that should be given to family courts under such federal legislation. Would they replace state children’s courts and deal with all child protection matters, or would there be only a limited reference of powers allowing a family court to give parental rights to a child protection agency in cases where there was no other suitable carer? The Family Law Council suggested ‘concurrent jurisdiction’, but the matter is a complicated one. What cannot be achieved is the specific goal of the flawed cross-vesting scheme—namely to give federal courts jurisdiction under state laws.

---

²³ Ibid.
3.36 The benefits of a consolidation of jurisdiction, depending on the extent of any referral of powers, may be that:

- cases that involve both child protection issues and parenting issues could be dealt with in one court, perhaps accompanied by protection orders under federal law;
- for those families presenting in family courts, there would be greater seamlessness and accessibility—and safety.

3.37 Such a consolidation of jurisdiction would, however, have to meet a number of challenges, including that:

- family courts are federal and most services—including child protection and police—are at state level, with existing intersecting legislation and established processes between state law and state agencies;
- family courts would be making orders that affect the workload of state agencies—such as child protection agencies and the police;
- family courts and child protection agencies have different objectives and different focuses, and there may be a lack of trust as a consequence: the Commissions were told in consultations that child protection agencies, and other services providers, may not have full confidence in family courts to make decisions that they consider safe for children;
- there would still be a gap in the system, requiring some families to go to a family court for child protection and parenting issues and to magistrates courts for family violence protection orders and criminal prosecutions.

3.38 During this Inquiry the Commissions have heard of the difficulties that any referral of power would involve. As remarked by one Family Court judge during a cross-jurisdictional roundtable of judicial officers:

> In an ideal world, the whole child protection and family violence jurisdiction should be national, under national legislation. Federal family courts would be the obvious courts to do this. However, this will not happen— it needs major constitutional change, a Commonwealth takeover of services and more resources.

3.39 However, the theoretical attractiveness of a ‘one court’ approach, at least with respect to family law and child protection, was endorsed by the Chief Justice of the Family Court, Diana Bryant, and the Chief Federal Magistrate, John Pascoe in their submission to this Inquiry:

---

26 Described in Ch 19 as ‘different planets’ and by one stakeholder as ‘parallel universes’: Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.

27 At present, family courts can make protective orders—injunctions—although there are difficulties in practice of state police enforcing these orders. To meet such concerns, the Commissions include recommendations for improving the effectiveness of injunctions for personal protection: see Ch 17.

One matter that requires detailed consideration is the feasibility of a unified family law and child protection system, whereby responsibility for private and public family law disputes lies with the federal government. It is appreciated that there are fundamental questions (including constitutional issues) associated with the adoption of such a system and a specific inquiry into unification would be warranted.29

3.40 Western Australia took a different approach from the other states by availing itself of the opportunity provided in the Family Law Act for the creation of a state family court exercising both federal and state jurisdiction.30 In a submission to this Inquiry, National Legal Aid suggested that the pilot scheme proposed in Western Australia to integrate family law and child protection cases in the state family court could be used as a pilot for the extension of the jurisdiction of the children’s courts in other states.31

Corresponding jurisdictions

3.41 A further option, and the approach adopted in this Report, is to enable each existing court to provide as many solutions as possible, within the limits of practical reality and the constitutional division of powers. The underlying premise of this option is to work with the jurisdictions that presently exist and to make them more effective mirrors of the other. From the perspective of those who use the legal system, this approach maximises the likelihood that they can get all—or most—of the legal protections and services they need from the court they first approach, at least on an interim basis. The Commissions consider that this option is the most practical, and achievable, option for reforming legal frameworks to improve safety for those experiencing family violence, and is most likely to comply with the guiding principles identified above—provided that it is supported by the range of strategies included in the recommendations for reform throughout this Report.

State and territory courts

3.42 State and territory magistrates courts already deal with family violence orders, criminal matters and, in children’s courts, with child protection. They also have limited jurisdiction under the Family Law Act,32 including to revive, vary, discharge or suspend an existing parenting order or injunction, where it affects the time spent with a child.33 As noted in Chapter 2, such jurisdiction is conferred under s 77(iii) of the Australian Constitution and is a valid exercise of cross-vesting of jurisdiction from the Commonwealth. There is considerable experience and expertise, therefore, in dealing with a range of issues concerning family violence within the jurisdictional competence of state and territory magistrates courts.

3.43 It may therefore be that magistrates courts hold the best promise of providing ‘one court’ in practice, being able to deal with many legal issues raised for those

---

30 Family Court Act 1975 (WA), replaced by Family Court Act 1997 (WA).
31 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
33 Ibid s 68R.
experiencing family violence. Indeed, key recommendations in this Report suggest that specialist family violence divisions or lists should be established or developed in magistrates courts with the aim of providing as close to a ‘one stop shop’ as possible. Magistrates courts in some states already have such specialist lists or divisions and thus the recommendations of the Commission build on established practice. These issues are considered in detail in Chapter 32.

3.44 There are, however, many practical and legal problems that arise in making magistrates courts a ‘one stop shop’. For example, while magistrates courts presently have the ability to vary a parenting order, they do not have jurisdiction to make an order, unless by consent.\(^{34}\) While there is no constitutional barrier to vesting state courts with federal jurisdiction, there are many practical issues.

3.45 During the course of this Inquiry, the Commissions have heard that many magistrates are reluctant to use the family law powers they presently have, unless they have a practice background in family law.\(^{35}\) The width of matters that magistrates must deal with already is very extensive, and adding family law to their workload adds to an already considerable burden. These issues are canvassed further in Chapter 17. The workload of magistrates courts is such that expanding the federal matters considered will not be manageable without increased resources and access to services. Increasing education, training and specialisation within magistrates courts, such as family violence lists and specialist magistrates, may address some concerns. Magistrates courts have the strongest geographical coverage of any court, but providing specialised services in rural and remote areas is a challenge. These issues are considered in detail in Chapter 32.

3.46 If the practical issues are overcome—and these are considerable—the Commissions consider that expanding the jurisdiction of state and territory magistrates by permitting them to make parenting orders on an interim basis may go a long way to defusing one of the key issues in dispute—namely parenting—at the same time as responding to immediate concerns, as well as easing the way to the family court to deal with more long term issues. However the Commissions acknowledge that the case for making such a recommendation needs to be carefully put, given the work in this area by the Family Law Council in 2004,\(^{36}\) which led to the removal of the power to make ‘contact’ orders as they were then known in the context of family violence proceedings.\(^{37}\) This is considered in Chapter 17.

3.47 An associated issue is whether the jurisdiction of state and territory children’s courts should also be expanded. Unless children’s courts are courts of summary jurisdiction, they are not currently within the reach of the conferred Family Law Act jurisdiction.\(^{38}\) Would giving them such jurisdiction facilitate the idea of ‘one court’

\(^{34}\) Ibid s 69N.
\(^{35}\) For example: Family Court Brisbane, Consultation FVC 97, Brisbane, 20 April 2010.
\(^{38}\) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 69J(1)
proposed in this Report? In Chapter 19 the Commissions consider that giving children’s courts power to hear parenting disputes may divert the courts’ resources away from their core business in the care side of their jurisdiction—determining the protection needs of children—to the detriment of their work. From this practical perspective it follows that the conferral of family law jurisdiction on children’s courts ought to be limited to situations where the jurisdiction of the children’s courts is otherwise invoked. Even in such cases it might be argued that the specialisation of children’s courts would be diluted by such additional jurisdiction. A further issue is how such expanded jurisdiction would articulate with the recommended specialist family violence lists or divisions in magistrates courts.

3.48 A further question concerns the exercise of criminal jurisdiction. This is not so much a matter of corresponding jurisdiction but one of improving interactions within existing state and territory frameworks and also supporting the use of specialised family violence lists in magistrates courts.

Family courts

3.49 What needs to be done in relation to family courts to improve the mirroring of jurisdiction anticipated in this option for reform? Given screening for family violence is ‘core business’ for federal family courts, one obvious area for reform is in relation to the ability of family courts to provide protection in response to safety concerns through appropriate family violence protection mechanisms in the Family Law Act.

3.50 State and territory courts would still consider most of the urgent protection order matters, as they are more accessible and cheaper than family courts and have established experience and expertise in relation to protection orders. However the Commissions consider that, where family court proceedings are on foot and family violence is disclosed or becomes an issue, the family courts ought to have the ability to provide protection as close as possible to that available in state and territory courts. To this end the Commissions recommend that the existing framework for protection orders in the Family Law Act be amended so that breach of such orders is a criminal offence—parallel to a breach of a state and territory family violence protection order. While the Commissions have heard that these are underutilised provisions, the mirror principle embodied in this option for reform requires that they operate as closely as possible to the protection provisions available under state and territory legislation.

Focus of reform

3.51 The recommendations in this Report can be viewed from two distinct perspectives—a systems perspective, and a participant perspective. The overarching, or predominant principle is that of seamlessness and to achieve this, both perspectives must be connected, to the greatest extent possible, within the constitutional and practical constraints of a federal system. This seamlessness is expressed in recommendations focused on improving legal frameworks and improving practice.

---

3. Framework for Reform

3.52 The improvement of legal frameworks will be achieved through:

- a common interpretative framework, core guiding principles and objects, and a better and shared understanding of the meaning, nature and dynamics of family violence that may permeate through the various laws involved when issues of family violence arise;
- corresponding jurisdictions, so that those who experience family violence may obtain a reasonably full set of responses, at least on an interim basis, at whatever point in the system they enter, within the constraints of the division of power under the Australian Constitution;
- improved quality and use of evidence; and
- better interpretation or application of sexual assault laws.

3.53 The improvement of practice will be achieved through:

- specialisation—bringing together, as far as possible, a wide set of jurisdictions to deal with most issues relating to family violence in one place, by specialised magistrates supported by a range of specialised legal and other services;
- education and training;
- the development of a national family violence bench book;
- the development of more integrated responses;
- information sharing and better coordination overall, so that the practice in responding to family violence will become less fragmented; and
- the establishment of a national register of relevant court orders and other information.

3.54 The Commissions reiterate that the range of recommendations in this Report are presented as a whole and that—they are limited to recommendations about improving legal frameworks—they can only go a small part of the way to responding to family violence. The recommendations are of application across the state, territory and federal spheres and implementation will depend not only on the willingness and support of all relevant governments, but also on the development of integrated, supportive and specialist law and practice.
Part B

Family Violence: A Common Interpretative Framework
4. Purposes of Laws Relevant to Family Violence

Contents

Introduction 155
Family violence legislation 157
  Background 157
  Purpose of family violence legislation 157
  Achievement of objects 161
  Guiding principles 161
  Purpose of family violence protection orders 163
Family law 163
  Historical policy underlying the Family Law Act 164
  Policy behind the Family Law Act as amended since inception 168
Child protection law 170
  Historical development of child protection law 170
  The family and the state 171
  Types of child protection orders 172
  Purpose of child protection orders 173
Criminal law 174
  Retribution 176
  Deterrence 176
  Rehabilitation 178
  Incapacitation 179
  Denunciation 180
  Restoration 181
Victims’ compensation 182
  Victims’ compensation schemes 182
  Restitution orders 184
  Compensation for tort claims 184
Migration legislation 185

Introduction

4.1 In this Inquiry the Commissions have been asked to consider how family violence laws interact in practice with the criminal laws of the Commonwealth, states and territories, and with the Family Law Act (1975) (Cth). The interactions cross geographical jurisdictions, various areas of substantive law—family law, family violence law, criminal law and criminal procedure—and span criminal and civil jurisdictions, as well as private and public law.
4.2 This chapter discusses the underlying policy justifications for various laws relevant to family violence, including those specifically referred to in the Terms of Reference—namely family violence laws, family law, child protection laws and the criminal law—as well as victims’ compensation schemes and migration law. Victims’ compensation schemes are included in the analysis in this chapter because of their particular interaction with the criminal law, and because victims’ compensation is inextricably connected with an assessment of how legal frameworks can be improved to assist victims of family violence to navigate various jurisdictions. While, as noted in Chapter 1, there is a range of federal laws that intersect with family violence laws and other laws the subject of the Terms of Reference, the Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth) are considered because their operation impacts on a group of women who are particularly vulnerable to family violence, due to the threat of deportation.¹

4.3 An analysis of these policy considerations reveals that, while policy justifications differ, in some cases different statutory regimes share common aims. This discussion is a necessary prelude to consideration of the desirability of pursuing a common interpretative framework for what constitutes family violence across the different legislative schemes under consideration—an issue which is canvassed in Chapters 5 to 7. A key theme explored in this Part of the Report is balancing the need for statutory definitions of family violence to reflect the underlying purposes of various civil and criminal legislative schemes relevant to family violence, with the benefits that could flow from the adoption of a common interpretative framework.

4.4 A discussion of the underlying policy objectives of the various legislative schemes also serves as a general background to the discussion of specific interaction issues between family violence laws and the criminal law, and between family violence laws and the Family Law Act, which are considered in the following chapters in this Part.² Chapters 8 to 14 discuss interaction issues between family violence laws and criminal procedures and criminal laws, as well as the recognition of family violence in the criminal law. Chapters 15 to 18 discuss interaction issues between family violence laws and the Family Law Act, including various orders under the Family Law Act, such as parenting orders, property orders and injunctive relief.

4.5 The organisation of the chapters in this Part—addressing issues of interaction between specified legislative schemes—has been decided upon for convenience in writing, and to address the specific interactions of legal frameworks referred to in the Terms of Reference. As stated in Chapter 2, the Commissions recognise that, in practice, issues may not present themselves in such a siloed manner. Matters may involve interactions between multiple legal frameworks, and there may be different permutations of interactions between legal frameworks—such as interactions between family violence and child protection laws.

² International conventions relevant to the legal framework governing family violence are discussed in Ch 2.
Family violence legislation

Background

4.6 Family violence legislation was enacted in most states and territories in the 1980s and 1990s as a response to growing recognition that existing legal mechanisms failed to protect victims—predominantly women—from family violence. Feminist critiques in the 1970s and 1980s, for example, highlighted the inability of the criminal justice system to protect women from future violence, as well as systemic institutional failure to tackle family violence.3

4.7 The discussion below considers first the purpose and objects of family violence legislation, followed by an analysis of the specific purpose of family violence protection orders.

Purpose of family violence legislation

4.8 The purpose of family violence legislation may be found, for example, in the objects clauses of state and territory family violence legislation—though the degree of articulation and specificity of purposes varies.4 Some family violence legislation also contain preambles or articulate specific principles that assist in identifying the policy underpinning the legislative scheme. The objects and principles set out in family violence legislation—and identified in second reading speeches—are addressed in turn below.

4.9 Objects that are expressly stipulated in family violence legislation—in varying language—include:

- ensuring, facilitating or maximising the safety and protection of persons, including children, who fear or experience family violence or are exposed to it;5
- reducing or preventing family violence and the exposure of children to the effects of family violence;6
- ensuring that people who use family violence accept responsibility for their conduct,7 or promoting the accountability of those who use family violence for their actions;8

3 B Fehlberg and J Behrens, Australian Family Law: The Contemporary Context (2008), 198 (citations omitted).
4 For example, the Queensland legislation sets out one main purpose, whereas some other jurisdictions specify several purposes. Objects clauses are also discussed in Ch 7 and the Commissions make recommendations in this regard.
5 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(1)(a); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 1(a); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 3A(1); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 6(b); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 3(1)(a).
6 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(1)(b); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 1(b); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 5(a); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 6(a); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 3(1)(c).
7 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 3(1)(b).
8 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 1(c). This purpose concerning accountability is similar to those expressed in the sentencing legislation of NSW and Victoria, which is discussed below. See also...
• enacting provisions that are consistent with certain principles underlying the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women and with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child;9

• providing special police powers of arrest, detention and search in connection with issuing, serving and enforcing protection orders;10 and

• further protecting persons suffering or witnessing family violence in the giving of evidence and the protection of identity.11

4.10 The Tasmanian legislation cites in its objects clause ‘the safety, psychological well-being and interests of people affected by family violence’ as paramount considerations in the administration of the Act.12

4.11 The family violence legislation of Western Australia does not have an objects clause, but instead sets out certain matters to be considered in relation to a protection order, from which certain objects can be implied.13 As stated in the Second Reading Speech:

> The first three [matters] are the primary considerations: that is, to protect the applicant from personal violence; secondly to prevent behaviour that could reasonably be expected to cause fear that the applicant will suffer personal violence … the third prime consideration is … the welfare of children.14

Protection as the primary concern

4.12 Significantly, some legislation and second reading speeches state an intention to prioritise the protection of victims of family violence as the main objective. For example, the Queensland family violence legislation provides that the main purpose of the Act is to provide safety and protection for victims of family violence, and it does not nominate any additional purposes.15 In the Second Reading Speech for the Northern Territory family violence legislation, the Attorney-General stated that:

> The primary objective of the bill is to ensure the safety of all people, including children, who experience domestic and family violence, and the second objective, to ensure that those who commit violence in their relationships must accept responsibility for their behaviour.16

---

9. Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(1)(c), (d). These conventions are described in Ch 2.

10. Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(1)(d) which states that intervention should be designed to encourage defendants to accept responsibility and take steps to avoid committing family violence.

11. Ibid s 5(c).

12. Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 3.

13. Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 12. Section 12 was amended in 2004 to insert a further paragraph (ba)—‘the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence’.

15. Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 3A(1).

4. Purposes of Laws Relevant to Family Violence

4.13 The Second Reading Speech for the Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Bill 2008 (ACT) also emphasised the object of protection:

The purpose of this act is to provide enforceable court orders to protect people who experience domestic violence and other people who have good reason to fear violence.

… People who experience violence require and deserve the assistance of our justice system to aid their protection. …

It is well recognised from the significant body of research that has been undertaken in this field that many people who are subjected to this form of violence never report the offence to police. Recognising this, it is essential that the protection afforded to those in need under this act be readily available and accessible.17

4.14 Similarly, the Second Reading Speech for the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Bill 2009 (SA) stresses the priority of protection:

In enacting these reforms, Parliament will be sending a clear message that it will not tolerate the use of violence to control or intimidate another person, particularly in a domestic setting; that it recognises and abhors the lasting psychological and emotional damage to children from exposure to such violence; that it expects perpetrators to accept full responsibility for their violent behaviour; and that the paramount consideration is always the protection and future safety of the victims of abuse and the children who are exposed to it.18

Other objectives revealed in second reading speeches

4.15 A number of other objectives are also revealed in second reading speeches. For example, in the Second Reading Speech for the Northern Territory legislation, the Attorney-General stated that:

Another central objective of the legislation is to ensure minimal disruption to the lives of families affected by violence. There will be a new presumption when making orders in favour of an applicant with children in their care remaining in the family home.19

4.16 In the Second Reading Speech for the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Bill 2009 (SA) the Attorney-General stated that the legislation will also be offering perpetrators of domestic or personal abuse the means to deal with associated problems of substance abuse, mental health, problem gambling and anger control, in the expectation that they will then be able to reflect upon and appreciate 17 Australian Capital Territory, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 7 August 2005, 3005 (S Corbell—Attorney-General, Minister for Police and Emergency Services), 3005–3006.

18 South Australia, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 10 September 2009, 3937 (M Atkinson—Attorney-General), 3944 (emphasis added).
19 Northern Territory, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 17 October 2007, 4846 (S Stirling—Attorney-General), 4848. A similar intention is expressed in South Australia, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 10 September 2009, 3937 (M Atkinson—Attorney-General), 3943. The Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(1)(d) also expresses the principle that intervention should be designed to minimise disruption to protected persons and the children living with them.
the effects of their abusive behaviour on others, take responsibility for it and learn to treat other people, particularly those close to them, with respect and care.

4.17 In the Second Reading Speech for the Family Violence Protection Bill 2008
(Vic), Ms Kirstie Marshall MP stated that:

This bill seeks to address two main issues: the attitude that family violence is a domestic matter and therefore not a crime worthy of response; and the need to ensure that the justice system itself does not inadvertently compound the devastating effects of family violence.

Overlap with family law policy

4.18 The policy behind some aspects of family violence legislation is to give paramount consideration to the best interests of the child—an approach that is consistent with that taken in family law in the context of parenting disputes. This is specifically referred to in the Second Reading Speech for the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Bill 2007 (NSW) in a discussion of the provisions requiring the inclusion of children in protection orders. It is also referred to in the Second Reading Speech for the Domestic and Family Violence Bill 2007 (NT) in the context of reforms which aim to ensure that children are protected from family violence and that their long-term development is not damaged by the experience of, or exposure to, family violence. It is stated that such reforms are ‘consistent with the principle of the best interests of the child contained in the Convention on the Rights of the Child’.

4.19 Another—perhaps less obvious—area of overlap between the policy objectives in family violence legislation and family law is revealed in the Second Reading Speech of the Domestic Violence (Family Protection) Bill 1989 (Qld), in which the Minister for Family Services emphasised the importance of the role of family in society, and the institution of marriage—echoing the language of art 23 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights:

No one should doubt that the family is the natural and fundamental unit in our society
… The widest possible protection and assistance needs to be given to the family unit and the institution of marriage …

The Queensland Government is committed to doing all in its power to promote the family unit and strengthen and support its role …

20 South Australia, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 10 September 2009, 3937 (M Atkinson—Attorney-General), 3944.
22 Family law policy is discussed separately below.
23 New South Wales, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Council, 29 November 2007, 4652 (T Kelly—Minister for Lands, Minister for Rural Affairs, Minister for Regional Development, and Vice-President of the Executive Council), 4652.
24 Northern Territory, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 17 October 2007, 4846 (S Stirling—Attorney-General), 4846.
Many victims of domestic violence have indicated that they do not wish to end their marriages. They just want the violence to stop. The proposed legislation may allow this to occur in those cases without the disintegration of the family unit.26

Achievement of objects

4.20 Most family violence Acts state the manner in which they intend to achieve their specific objects, including statements about providing for the following:

- the making of protection orders by the court—or police where they are empowered to do so—to protect people from family violence or further family violence,27 and to encourage those committing family violence to change their behaviour;28
- the registration of orders made in other jurisdictions;29
- the enforcement of protection orders;30
- an effective and accessible system of family violence protection orders—including those that are issued by police31—and access to courts that is as safe, speedy, inexpensive and simple as is consistent with justice;32
- the creation of offences for the contravention of family violence orders;33
- the issuing of associated orders relating to problem gambling and tenancy agreements;34
- special arrangements for witnesses in family violence protection proceedings;35
- and
- limitations on publishing reports about proceedings or orders under family violence legislation.36

Guiding principles

4.21 Family violence legislation in NSW and Victoria sets out guiding principles and features of family violence, providing a contextual framework for the legislative response. The NSW legislation does so in its objects clause; and the Victorian

---

27 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s (2); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 3(2); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 5(a); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 3(2)(a).
28 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 3(2)(a).
29 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 5(a); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 3(2)(b).
30 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 5(a); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 3(2)(c).
31 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 2(a).
32 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(2)(b).
33 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 2(b).
34 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 5(a).
35 Ibid s 5(c).
36 Ibid.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

legislation does so in its preamble. The family violence legislation of South Australia also contains principles which must be taken into account in determining both whether it is appropriate to issue a protection order and the terms of such an order. In particular, the family violence legislation of those states highlights the following principles and features of family violence:

- it is unacceptable behaviour in all its forms, and in any community or culture;
- it is a fundamental violation of human rights;
- that in responding to it, the justice system should treat the views of victims of family violence with respect;
- it is predominantly committed by men against women and children;
- it affects the entire community, and occurs in all sectors of the community;
- it extends beyond physical violence;
- it may involve the overt or subtle exploitation of power imbalances and may consist of patterns of abuse over many years or of isolated incidents;
- it occurs in traditional and non-traditional settings;
- children who are exposed to family violence—as victims or witnesses—are particularly vulnerable, and can suffer detrimental effects on their current and future physical, psychological and emotional wellbeing; and
- it is best addressed through a coordinated legal and social response of assistance and prevention.

37 Ibid s 10.
38 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(3).
39 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble.
40 Ibid.
41 Ibid.
42 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(3).
43 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble.
44 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(3); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(1)(a).
45 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(3); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble.
46 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(3); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(1)(b).
48 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(3).
49 Ibid s 9(3); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble. See also Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(c) which states that it is of primary importance to prevent family violence and to prevent children from being exposed to it.
50 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(3).
4.22 The family violence legislation of the ACT states that family violence is ‘a particular form of interpersonal violence that needs a greater level of protection’.\(^{51}\)

Purpose of family violence protection orders

4.23 The purpose of family violence protection orders is to protect victims from future violence—typically by the imposition of conditions regulating the behaviour and movements of persons who have committed family violence. The focus on restraining future behaviour is similar to the granting of injunctive relief. The emphasis is on the immediate protection of victims, often as a response to a crisis situation, facilitated by legislative provisions for emergency orders or interim orders.

4.24 These objectives are evidenced in second reading speeches, as well as in family violence legislation. For example, the Second Reading Speech for the Restraining Orders Bill 1997 (WA) states that protection orders ‘play a central role in the legal response to domestic violence by affording what is intended to be ready access to legal protection for victims’.\(^{52}\)

4.25 The family violence legislation of the ACT provides that, in deciding an application for a protection order, the paramount consideration is ‘the need to ensure that the aggrieved person, and any child at risk of exposure to domestic violence, is protected from domestic violence’.\(^{53}\)

4.26 The ACT legislation, however, also provides that if a protection order is to be made it is one that must be the least restrictive of the personal rights and liberties of the respondent as possible that still achieves the objects of the Act and gives effect to [the paramount consideration to ensure protection].\(^{54}\)

4.27 In the Second Reading Speech for the South Australian legislation, the Attorney-General emphasised the policy underlying new police powers to issue interim protection orders:

> This new police power, combined with improved powers to hold a defendant pending preparation and service of process and while making arrangements for the security of the victim, is designed to give victims and their children immediate protection from abuse without first needing to go to court, in circumstances where the alleged perpetrator can be served on the spot and is therefore instantly bound by the order.\(^{55}\)

Family law

4.28 The Family Law Act sets out the rights, duties, powers and liabilities of spouses and children, and provides for enforcement of those rights and liabilities as well as the

---

51 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 6(a).
52 Western Australia, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Council, 12 March 1997, 156 (P Foss—Attorney-General), 157.
53 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 7(1)(a).
54 Ibid s 7(2).
55 South Australia, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 10 September 2009, 3937 (M Atkinson—Attorney-General), 3940. Police powers to issue protection orders are discussed in Ch 9.
dissolution of marriage.\textsuperscript{56} The discussion below canvasses the historical policy behind the \textit{Family Law Act} as first introduced, as well as the policy underlying the Act as amended since inception.

\textbf{Historical policy underlying the \textit{Family Law Act}}

4.29 There are several policy strands underpinning the \textit{Family Law Act}. These include a philosophy of no fault; promoting the best interests of the child; preserving the institution of marriage; promoting reconciliation; and protecting the notion of the family.

\textit{No fault philosophy}

4.30 One of the main ideological foundations for the introduction of the \textit{Family Law Act} was the removal of the previous requirement of fault for divorce and a move towards a ‘no-fault’ system for the dissolution of marriage.\textsuperscript{57} As consultation conducted by the Senate Standing Committee on Constitutional and Legal Affairs in the early 1970s revealed, the community considered that the previous provisions were costly and protracted, and also involved indignity and humiliation to the parties because of the court’s inquiry into the breakdown of marriage.\textsuperscript{58} Consequently, all inquiries as to fault were removed from the legislation.

4.31 The original \textit{Family Law Act} did not expressly mention family violence, or the need to protect women and children from harm. In the Second Reading Speech of the Family Law Bill 1973 (Cth), the then Attorney-General, Lionel Murphy, said:

\begin{quote}
I have given a great deal of thought to whether there should be another ground to meet the cases such as where the husband repeatedly comes home drunk and beats up his wife and terrifies the children, if not beating them as well. The marriage may become intolerable for the wife, and yet she cannot physically separate from her husband because there is nowhere she can go ... however [an intolerable conduct] ground would of necessity contain an element of fault, and there would have to be an inquiry to satisfy the court that the respondent’s conduct was intolerable. This is what we are trying to avoid.\textsuperscript{59}
\end{quote}

4.32 Moreover, it appears that the government considered that there would be no need for an ‘intolerable conduct’ ground to address family violence because ‘the petitioner will be able to obtain the relief she wants in other ways’ through an application for an injunction.\textsuperscript{60} The conduct that could potentially form the basis for an injunction was said to include molesting or ‘using insulting, indecent or humiliating language’ to or in front of the victim.\textsuperscript{61}

\textsuperscript{56} A Dickey, \textit{Family Law} (5th ed, 2007), 43.
\textsuperscript{57} L Young and G Monahan, \textit{Family Law in Australia} (7th ed, 2009), 29.
\textsuperscript{58} Commonwealth, \textit{Parliamentary Debates}, Senate, 3 April 1974, 640 (L Murphy—Attorney-General), 641.
\textsuperscript{60} Commonwealth, \textit{Parliamentary Debates}, Senate, 13 December 1973, 2827 (L Murphy—Attorney-General), 2829.
\textsuperscript{61} Commonwealth, \textit{Parliamentary Debates}, Senate, 3 April 1974, 640 (L Murphy—Attorney-General), 641.
4.33 While the removal of fault considerations related to the grounds for dissolution of marriage, the ‘no-fault’ ideology influenced other provisions of the Act, the reasoning of the Family Court in its early days, and its reluctance to entertain an evaluation of conduct during marriage. The Family Law Act in its earliest form did not therefore deal specifically with family violence, except as a ground for an injunction. The Family Court, at its outset, was therefore not conceptually set up as a court that would deal with issues of family violence.

Interests of the children

4.34 From the beginning, the importance of the interests of children has been evident in the Family Law Act. In the Second Reading Speech for the Family Law Bill the then Attorney-General stated that:

> In custody matters the court is required by the Bill—as it is by the present Act—to regard the interests of the children as the paramount consideration.

4.35 The original Family Law Act contained a provision that in custodial proceedings, the court was to regard the welfare of the child as the paramount consideration. As outlined below, this policy has since evolved to one that advocates a consideration of the ‘best interests’ of children, reflecting the language of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, ratified by Australia on 17 December 1990.

4.36 In addition, one of the principles that the Family Court has had to take into account since the inception of the Act is ‘the need to protect the rights of children and to promote their welfare’.

Preserving the institution of marriage

4.37 Another principle that courts exercising family law jurisdiction have been required to consider in decision making since the inception of the Act is ‘the need to preserve and protect the institution of marriage as the union of a man and a woman to the exclusion of all others voluntarily entered into for life’.

4.38 As stated by Dr Anthony Dickey:

> The Family Law Act has a variety of functions, many of which are designed to support marriage and family life rather than put an end to them.

---

62 Ibid, 642.
63 Ibid.
64 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) as made in 1975 s 64(1)(a).
4.39 After a consideration of Canadian and United Kingdom divorce legislation, the then Attorney-General stated in the Second Reading Speech for the Family Law Bill that:

whilst none of these laws was an entirely suitable precedent to be followed here, I am in agreement with the two criteria adopted by the English Law Commission for a good divorce law: that it should buttress, rather than undermine, the stability of marriage and, when a marriage has irretrievably broken down, it should enable the empty legal shell to be destroyed with the maximum fairness and the minimum bitterness, distress and humiliation.69

4.40 However, as Professor Rosemary Hunter has noted, the policy of preserving the marital relationship presents some conceptual difficulties when the court is dealing with an issue such as family violence.70

Reconciliation

4.41 Closely connected to the goal of preserving the marital relationship is the aim of encouraging parties to reconcile. In the Second Reading Speech for the Family Law Bill, the Attorney–General stated that ‘the Bill recognises the desirability of reconciliation being kept in mind at all stages until the marriage is dissolved’, 71 but decided against a compulsory reconciliation conference because it would be ‘unacceptable to the Australian people’.72 Since the commencement of the Family Law Act, courts exercising family law jurisdiction have been directed to consider ‘the means available for assisting parties to a marriage to consider reconciliation or the improvement of their relationship to each other and to their children’.73

Protection of the notion of family

4.42 One of the fundamental rights codified in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is that ‘the family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State’.74 It was noted in the Second Reading Speech of the Family Law Bill that this statement underlies the provisions of the Family Law Act.75 Section 43 of the Act provides that one of the overarching principles to be applied by the courts in their deliberations is the need to give the widest possible protection and assistance to the family as the natural and fundamental group unit of society, particularly while it is responsible for the care and education of dependent children.76

69 Commonwealth, Parliamentary Debates, Senate, 13 December 1973, 2827 (L. Murphy—Attorney-General), 2828.
71 Commonwealth, Parliamentary Debates, Senate, 13 December 1973, 2827 (L. Murphy—Attorney-General), 2829.
72 Ibid.
73 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 43(1)(d).
75 Commonwealth, Parliamentary Debates, Senate, 3 April 1974, 640 (L. Murphy—Attorney-General), 641. Australia did not, however, ratify the ICCPR until 1980.
76 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 43(1)(b).
4. Purposes of Laws Relevant to Family Violence

4.43 While the term ‘family’ is seldom used explicitly in Australian law, it is apparent that the notion of the nuclear family—comprising a mother, father and their children—still underlies the Family Law Act. This focus on the nuclear family may be, in part, due to the heads of Commonwealth legislative power under the Constitution in relation to marriage; divorce and matrimonial causes; and in relation thereto, parental rights, custody and guardianship of infants. However, a growing number of families do not fit that pattern—including some Indigenous families and same-sex couples.

The public/private divide

4.44 The Family Law Act has some ideological foundations in the well established principle of non-intervention in the private sphere of family life. Professor Stephen Parker remarked that:

The idea that we should distinguish between public and private spheres of life has been a central one in liberal political philosophy since the seventeenth century, although the roots of the idea can be traced back to Aristotle. In classical liberalism, the notion of a private sphere was a crucial part of the belief in limited government. There were certain parts of civil society in which the state had no business. And at the epicentre of the private sphere was the family; more specifically, the patriarchal family.

4.45 The idea that the family is a ‘private’ space is a continuing theme in law—and especially family law. As noted by Parker, the principle of non-intrusion into family life has its origins as far back as ancient Greek philosophy and the liberal philosophers developed the concept of a ‘private sphere’ in the 17th century. Family law disputes are ‘private’ in the sense that they are disputes between two parties, and the state generally has no role in these disputes—apart from enacting the legislation that establishes the framework pursuant to which the disputes are to be resolved.

4.46 This idea of family law as private is evident when the first Family Law Bill was introduced by the then Attorney-General:

It does not seem right to me that divorce itself should be an occasion for judicial intrusion. It may be different in custody, maintenance and property disputes, but even in those the parties should be encouraged to resolve their differences themselves.

77 B Fehlberg and J Behrens, Australian Family Law: The Contemporary Context (2008), 145.
78 Australian Constitution s 51(xxi), (xxii). The constitutional framework is discussed in Ch 2.
83 Commonwealth of Australia, Parliamentary Debates, Senate, 1 August 1974, 758 (L Murphy—Attorney General), 760.
Policy behind the Family Law Act as amended since inception

4.47 Despite a changing social context, many of the historical policies underpinning the Family Law Act still influence how it is applied. The principles in s 43 of the Act—noted above—still apply. In addition, a new principle was introduced by the Family Law Reform Act 1995 (Cth) requiring consideration of the need to ensure safety from family violence, reflecting a growing understanding of the detrimental impact of violence which found expression in the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women and the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women.85

4.48 The Family Law Act does not have an objects clause specifying its overarching objects. Instead, particular provisions set out specific objects and principles in relation to: obligations to inform people about family services based outside the courts and about the court’s processes and services;86 the court’s powers in relation to family services both in and outside of court;87 children;88 family violence;89 orders and injunctions;90 and superannuation interests.91

4.49 Of particular importance is the objects and principles provision in relation to children.92 The paramount principle in children’s matters is that of the best interests of the child.93 To facilitate this, the following objects were introduced in 2006:

(a) ensuring that children have the benefit of both parents having a meaningful involvement in their lives; and

(b) protecting children from physical or psychological harm or being subjected to, or exposed to abuse, neglect or family violence.94

4.50 Importantly, the objects provision stresses ‘meaningful’ relationships, suggesting that the quality of time parents spend with their children is a significant factor.95

4.51 The primary considerations listed in pt VII reflect these objects.96 In determining what is in a child’s best interests, the court must have regard to the following primary considerations:

---

84 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 43(1)(ca).
86 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 12A.
87 Ibid s 13A.
88 Ibid s 60B.
89 Ibid s 68N.
90 Ibid s 90A.
91 Ibid s 90MA. The Family Law Act does not codify the objects and principles behind the provisions relating to property and spousal maintenance.
92 Ibid s 60B.
93 Ibid s 60CA.
94 Ibid s 60B.
4. Purposes of Laws Relevant to Family Violence

(a) the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both of the child’s parents; and

(b) the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm or from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence.

4.52 These objects reflect, on the one hand, the increased emphasis since 1996 on protecting families from violence and, on the other, the move towards shared parenting in 2006. The shared parenting amendments were introduced following the 2003 Every Picture Tells A Story inquiry and the Report from the House of Representatives Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

4.53 The 2006 reforms sought to reflect the changing patterns of parenting, the transition of traditional roles and the fragmentation of family structures. The amendments were supported by research from psychologists indicating that children benefit from a meaningful relationship with both parents.

4.54 There has been considerable controversy and debate over the issue of shared parenting. As noted in Chapter 1, in 2009, the Australian Institute of Family Studies completed an evaluation of the reforms introduced by the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Act 2006 (Cth). The review by Professor Richard Chisholm, former Justice of the Family Court of Australia, of the practices, procedures and laws that apply in the federal family law courts in the context of family violence, also considered the impact of these reforms. A number of submissions in this Inquiry were also critical of the reforms.

4.55 Another significant change to principles introduced by the 2006 reforms was recognition of the importance of cultural heritage, and indicating what this means for Indigenous children. For example, s 60B(3) of the Family Law Act provides that the right of an ‘Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander’ child to enjoy culture includes the right to maintain connection with that culture and to have the support and opportunity to explore and develop a positive appreciation of that culture.

---

96 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), s 60CC.
97 Ibid s 60CC(2)(a), (b).
98 Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Bill 2005 (Cth).
100 Ibid.
103 For example: Confidential, Submission FV 52, 28 May 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 156, 24 June 2010.
104 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60B(2)(c).
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

Child protection law

Historical development of child protection law

4.56 The Supreme Court of each state and territory has a very wide power to make orders to protect the welfare of children, known as the parens patriae (‘parent of the country’) jurisdiction, the underlying premise of which is that the children in question have no other, or no other suitable, guardian. When the jurisdiction of the English Court of Chancery became vested in the Supreme Courts of the states and territories, the parens patriae jurisdiction was included as part of the inherent jurisdiction of the court.105

4.57 In addition to this inherent jurisdiction of the courts, from the mid-19th century, all state and territory governments legislated to secure the welfare of children by defining the circumstances in which children needed to be protected from neglect or abuse, and the ways in which young people might be treated as criminals.106 By the end of the 19th century an ‘increasingly pervasive protective attitude to children’ was evident.107

4.58 The ‘child rescue movement’ initially took the form of charitable and philanthropic endeavours,108 leading to the introduction of child protection legislation and the establishment of children’s courts,109 representing a large shift in the approach to children.

These developments were often motivated by revelations of severe cases of abuse or neglect, which spurred child welfare activists in the late 1800s and early 1900s to form rights and advocacy bodies including societies for the prevention of cruelty to children.110

4.59 Children’s courts had two principal functions: child care and protection; and exclusive jurisdiction with respect to child offenders. By the 1970s all states and territories had introduced legislation to protect children.111

---

106 G Monahan and L Young (eds), Children and the Law in Australia (2008), [1.11] trace the ten principal Acts passed in Victoria over 90 years, from 1864 to 1933.
110 B Mathews, ‘Protecting Children from Abuse and Neglect’ in G Monahan and L Young (eds), Children and the Law in Australia (2008) 204, [10.5].
111 The current legislation is: Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld); Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT); Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT).
The family and the state

4.60 The state, as parens patriae, and the family intersect in the arena of child protection. Child protection ‘intervention’ may place a parent in opposition to the state, expressed in terms of a parent ‘losing’ his or her children. As the state, through child protection agencies, is a principal ‘actor’, child protection law can be characterised as ‘public’ law, in contrast to the ‘private’ law of family law, considered above.

4.61 In the report, Seen and Heard: Priority for Children in the Legal Process, the ALRC and the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (now the Australian Human Rights Commission) considered the various theories about how the family and the state ought to relate with respect to children.112

4.62 The perspectives of intervention range from minimalist to interventionist, and include ideas about the role of the biological family. The minimalist position is reflective of the period of ‘father-right’,113 and ideas of the ‘private sphere’ of the family.114 Historically, children were considered essentially as the property of their father, a construction which lingers in the use of the pronoun ‘it’ often used to refer to a child.115 For example, in the late 19th century case, Re Agar-Ellis, Bowen LJ remarked that:

> To neglect the natural jurisdiction of the father over the child until the age of twenty-one would be really to set aside the whole course and order of nature, and it seems to me it would disturb the very foundation of family life.116

4.63 The interventionist approach seeks to ensure that ‘all children are provided with a right to caring adults who meet their needs’.117 It reflects a stronger notion of children’s rights:

In this model, the state makes the decisions as to whom those adults should be. While the focus of this model is the child rather than the adults in the family, this model of intervention may overlook the strength of bonds between parent and child, even when the parent may be considered unsatisfactory. It also places too much faith in the value of state intervention, assuming that the agents of the state, such as social workers and

---

115 This renders the child even without gender. See, eg, the following discussion of the position of the child in Roman Law: J Tobin, ‘The Development of Children’s Rights’ in G Monahan and L Young (eds), Children and the Law in Australia (2008) 23, [2.2].
116 Re Agar-Ellis [1883] 24 Ch D, 336. judges, are capable of making sound and appropriate judgments that provide better outcomes for children.\footnote{118}{Ibid.}

4.64 The importance of maintaining the biological family wherever possible is a third perspective:

State intervention is reserved for responding to problems within families, attempting to redress these so that the child can remain at home or at least in close contact with the family. Critics argue that this view may place too much emphasis on biological ties and that it does not differentiate between the interests, feelings and welfare of children and those of parents.\footnote{119}{Ibid, [3.8].}

4.65 Each of these perspectives is evident in different ways in the multiple facets of interaction between families and the state—articulated expressly or impliedly as ‘father-right’, ‘parents’ rights’, or ‘children’s rights’, which may be in conflict with each other:

There are basic personal interests at stake here, which may sometimes conflict, such as the interest of parents to have guardianship and custody of their children, and the interests of children to be safe and protected from certain types of harm. These conflicts raise difficult questions for child protection professionals, legislators, policymakers and courts. Within the broader questions are finer ones such as the unequal and possibly unfair application of certain provisions and outcomes to specific population groups, such as single parents, and parents with an intellectual disability or mental illness. As well, compounding these contentious problems are practical problems such as one of the most daunting issues facing all jurisdictions: the adequate supply and funding of service providers.\footnote{120}{B Mathews, ‘Protecting Children from Abuse and Neglect’ in G Monahan and L Young (eds), Children and the Law in Australia (2008) 204, [10.32].}

4.66 The competing dynamics of child protection involve not only the question of parental responsibility as between parents, but also the question of when it is appropriate for the state to intervene into the historically ‘private’ space of the family—when children need to be rescued even from their own parents through the intervention of the state.

types of child protection orders

4.67 The kinds of orders in the child protection system are described by the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, which undertakes a comprehensive annual review of state and territory child protection and support services:

Guardianship orders are sought through the court. They involve the transfer of legal guardianship to an authorised department or to an individual. By their nature, these orders involve considerable intervention in the child’s life and that of the child’s family, and are sought only as a last resort. Guardianship orders convey to the guardian responsibility for the welfare for the child (for example, regarding the child’s education, health, religion, accommodation and financial matters).

Custody orders generally refer to care and protection orders that place children in the custody of a third party. These orders usually involve child protection staff (or the person who has been granted custody) being responsible for the day-to-day requirements of the child while the parent retains guardianship.\(^{121}\)

4.68 Guardianship or custody orders in the context of child protection are different from the range of orders under the Family Law Act, which now uses the language of ‘parental responsibility’ and ‘the time a child is to spend with another person’.\(^{122}\)

Purpose of child protection orders

4.69 The central dynamic in both child protection under state and territory law, and parenting orders under the Family Law Act is that the best interests of the child are paramount.\(^{123}\) However state and territory child protection legislation also provides that, subject to this principle, the legislation is to be administered so that where intervention is ordered it must be the least intrusive possible, including keeping the child with his or her family whenever possible.\(^{124}\) The overall purpose of child protection intervention is therefore, through the action of the state, to provide measures to assist and support children and young people who are in need of protection.

4.70 A central and recurring theme is when it is appropriate for the state to intervene, and, further, what is the role of child protection services:

> Child protection was originally set up to provide a crisis response to cases of severe abuse in which the state needed to intervene to protect the child. However, the crisis response is not appropriate for the majority of families who are referred to child protection departments as they are typically in need rather than in crisis. There will always be a role for a ‘forensic’ tertiary response in cases where there are serious protective concerns. However, the challenge facing the sector is to devise service responses that are better suited to addressing family support needs. Recognition of this fact is slowly bringing about change to the delivery of child protection and child and family welfare services both nationally and internationally.\(^{125}\)

4.71 A child protection intervention is authorised where a court believes, on the balance of probabilities, that a child or young person\(^{126}\) is in ‘need of care,’ ‘in need of protection,’ ‘in need of care and protection,’ ‘at risk,’ or ‘at risk of harm’ as variously described in the legislation of the states and territories. Assistance and support for these

---

122 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) pt VII div 2 and div 5 respectively. See Ch 15.
123 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 9(a); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 10(1); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 5(1); Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 7; Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) s 4(1)–3; Tas s 8(2)(a); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 11; Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 9.
124 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 9(d); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 10(3)(a); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) s 5(2)(e); Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 9(f); Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) s 4(4); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 8(2)(b); Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 12(1)(d); Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 9(3).
126 Some child protection laws distinguish between a child and a young person. For example, in the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 3, a child is a person under 16 years and a young person is one between 16 and 18 years. In the ACT, a child is a person under 12 years and a young person is a person between 12 and 18 years: Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ss 11–12.
children and young people may be offered on an informal basis, by way of agreement with families, or by means of care proceedings initiated by the relevant child protection agency in children’s courts. The legislative grounds for a child protection response are prescribed in the child protection statutes of each of the states and territories. They are broadly similar across all the jurisdictions, and include circumstances where the child or young person has been or is at risk of being abused or neglected.127

4.72 A child or young person who is exposed to family violence may be considered to be ‘at risk’ or in ‘need of care and protection’ justifying an intervention by the child protection agency. New South Wales and Tasmania prescribe ‘domestic violence’ as an express ground for intervention.128 In other jurisdictions, intervention on the basis of family or domestic violence is permitted where the child or young person is at risk of being, psychologically or emotionally abused as a result of his or her exposure to the violence.129

Criminal law

4.73 Where family law disputes are regarded as ‘private’ disputes, involving litigation between individual litigants, criminal law—like child protection law—is ‘public’ in the sense that the state has a clear role to play in the investigation and prosecution of offences. It has been said that the criminal law is designed to maintain the social order and to stipulate the fundamental requirements for a person’s treatment of others.130 It is difficult to identify a single underlying philosophy of the criminal law although central to the concept of criminality are the notion of individual culpability and the criminal intention for one’s action.131 As some criminal law academics have contended:

What we choose to call criminal law in fact comprises a number of different practices with a variety of rationales rather than a single principled response to diverse social behaviour. We have criminal laws rather than criminal law.132

4.74 Professor Andrew Ashworth has described the construction of the criminal law as ‘unprincipled and chaotic’ and not the product of any principled inquiry or consistent application of certain criteria, but largely dependent on the fortunes of successive governments, on campaigns in the mass media, on the activities of various pressure groups, and so forth.133

127 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) s 23(1)(c); Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 162(1)(c)–(f); Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) ss 9–10; Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) s 28(2)(c); Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) s 6(2); Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 4; Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) ss 14–16, 20; Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ss 151, 156.

128 Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) ss 23(1)(d), 71(1)(e); Children and Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) s 4(ba).

129 See, eg, Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) s 4(3)(b).

4. Purposes of Laws Relevant to Family Violence

Nonetheless, the following discussion describes some functions of the criminal law, particularly in the context of sentencing. Chapter 10 discusses the policy basis of a specific aspect of criminal procedure, namely bail.

Judicial pronouncements and legislative provisions have emphasised the protective role of the criminal law, particularly in seeking to protect innocent members of the community who are unable to protect themselves. The South Australian sentencing legislation, for example, states that the primary objectives of the criminal law include protecting the safety of the community—in particular, children—from sexual predators by ensuring that, in any sentence for an offence involving sexual exploitation of a child, paramount consideration is given to the need for deterrence.

Punishment for past criminal conduct is an essential component of any criminal justice system. There is a significant amount of academic literature on the underlying justification for punishment, largely dominated by two theories. The utilitarian theory of punishment justifies punishment on the basis that its benefits outweigh its detrimental effects. Proponents of this theory consider that punishment has the potential to reduce crime. On the other hand, the retributive theory of punishment justifies punishment as an appropriate moral response to the voluntary commission of an offence, regardless of its effects.

To the extent that the criminal justice system integrates and considers restoration and rehabilitation—either at the sentencing stage or as a diversionary practice—the orientation is forward-looking, with an emphasis on prevention of further offending via treatment and healing.

Understanding the various purposes of sentencing is integral to a consideration of the policy basis of criminal laws. When a person is sentenced for a family violence offence or for a breach of a protection order that sentence will be imposed in furtherance of specific objects.

Many state and territory sentencing acts expressly set out the purposes of sentencing. The commonly cited purposes of sentencing are retribution, deterrence, rehabilitation, incapacitation, denunciation, and in more recent times, restoration. The sentencing acts of NSW and the ACT also specify that a purpose of sentencing is to make the offender accountable for his or her actions.

Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 10(1b).
Ibid s 10(4).
Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A; Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 5; Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 9; Sentencing Act 1997 (Tas) s 3; Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 7; Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 5.
Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A(e); Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 7(1)(e).
4.81 The main purposes of sentencing are considered below. The purposes of sentencing may sometimes conflict, but some purposes—such as retribution and deterrence—can be pursued simultaneously.

Retribution

4.82 Retribution—often referred to as ‘punishment’ in legislation and case law—is derived from the retributive theory of punishment. It is the oldest theory of punishment based on concepts of vengeance and responsibility. It is advocated in the ‘eye for eye’ principle in the Book of Leviticus in the Old Testament.

4.83 Proponents of the retribution theory disagree about why offenders deserve to be punished. Some argue that it is to eliminate the unfair advantage the offender gained over other law abiding citizens by committing the offence; while others say that it is to satisfy a debt to society. Those who advocate for ‘just deserts’ consider that offenders deserve to be punished but that the punishment should be proportionate to the gravity of the offence.

4.84 A number of state and territory sentencing acts set out retribution as a sentencing purpose in varying language:

- to ensure that the offender is adequately punished for the offence;
- to punish the offender to an extent or in a way that is just in all the circumstances; or
- to ensure that the offender is adequately punished for the offence in a way that is just and appropriate.

Deterrence

4.85 Deterrence is derived from the utilitarian theory of punishment. There is widespread support for the proposition that the mere existence of a criminal justice system has the effect of deterring persons from committing criminal offences. This systemic effect is commonly referred to as ‘absolute deterrence’. Other forms of deterrence arise specifically in the context of sentencing, and describe the deterrent

---

143 See Leviticus, 25: 17–22.
146 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A(a).
147 Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 9(1)(a); Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 5(1)(a). See also Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 5(1)(a) which is expressed in similar terms.
148 Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 7(1)(a). effect of the sentence both on the future behaviour of other people and of the offender. These types of deterrence are known respectively as general deterrence and specific deterrence.

General deterrence

4.86 General deterrence assumes that offenders are rational and will therefore refrain from engaging in criminal conduct if the consequences of their actions are perceived to be sufficiently harsh. The assumption that offenders are rational—when some do not in fact undertake a rational analysis of their actions prior to committing an offence—is one basis upon which the effectiveness of general deterrence has been challenged.

4.87 In its 1988 report, Sentencing, the ALRC objected to general deterrence on the basis that it was unfair to punish one person by reference to the hypothetical crime of another. However, in its report, Same Time Same Crime: Sentencing of Federal Offenders, the ALRC agreed that general deterrence is an established and legitimate purpose of sentencing, having regard to judicial pronouncements on the importance of general deterrence, and the purposes of sentencing articulated in other jurisdictions.

4.88 A number of state and territory sentencing acts set out general deterrence as a purpose of sentencing. This is usually done in language to the effect that a purpose of sentencing is to prevent crime by deterring or discouraging other persons from committing the same or similar offences. The South Australian sentencing legislation specifies the deterrent effect any sentence under consideration may have on other persons as a matter to which a court is to have regard in determining sentence, to the extent that it is relevant and known to the court.

4.89 In sentencing for family violence offences the importance placed upon general deterrence will depend on the circumstances of particular cases. For example, in R v Collins: Ex parte Attorney-General, the Crown appealed against the inadequacy of sentence imposed on a 17 year old father for causing grievous bodily harm to his three and a half month old son. In dismissing the appeal, the court made the following observations about general deterrence:

So far as general deterrence is concerned, this crime was not one of calculation but a spur of the moment explosion of anger and frustration. It is important here to keep steadily in mind that the respondent was little more than a child himself at the time of the offence. How the respondent came to find himself at the age of 17 years in the position of father to a three and half month old baby without the assistance of adult supervision and care was not satisfactorily explained. ... The social structure which should have been in place to prevent the appalling situation in which the care of the child was left to the respondent and the child’s 16 year old mother were, lamentably, absent. …

---

153 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A(b); Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 5(1)(b); Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 9(1)(c); Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 7(1)(b); Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 5(1)(c). See also Sentencing Act 1997 (Tas) s 3(c)(i).
155 R v Collins: Ex parte Attorney-General (Qld) [2009] QCA.

In relation to general deterrence, I consider that the suggestion that juvenile fathers, similarly situated to the respondent, will be deterred by reflecting upon a custodial element in the sentence imposed on the respondent when they are minded to act violently towards an infant in their care out of tiredness, frustration and personal inadequacy is not so compelling as to persuade me that this consideration affords a ‘reason of substance’ to conclude that this Court should impose a sentence which includes a period of custody. 156

4.90 Officers of the ALRC observed that in a particular case of family violence at Burwood Local Court, Sydney, general deterrence was said not to be a factor in sentencing because the family violence was said to be at the ‘lower end’ of the scale of seriousness and it was unlikely that the offender would re-offend. 157

Specific deterrence

4.91 Specific deterrence seeks to prevent offenders from engaging in further criminal conduct by demonstrating to them the adverse consequences of their offending. Specific deterrence may be afforded greater emphasis when sentencing a repeat offender because there is an assumption that the previous sentence was ineffective in its deterrent effect. 158 Specific deterrence may not be as significant in circumstances where an offender is considered unlikely to reoffend, such as where an offender has demonstrated significant remorse. 159

4.92 A number of state and territory sentencing acts set out specific deterrence as a sentencing purpose, usually in language to the effect that a purpose of sentencing is to prevent crime by deterring or discouraging the offender from committing the same or similar offence. 160 The South Australian sentencing legislation specifies the deterrent effect any sentence under consideration may have on the defendant as a matter that the court must have regard to in determining sentence, to the extent that it is relevant and known. 161

Rehabilitation

4.93 Rehabilitation looks to identify and address the underlying causes of criminal conduct, by changing an offender’s personality, attitudes, habits, beliefs, outlooks or

---

156 Ibid, [34], [36].
157 Court Observation: Burwood Local Court: Apprehended Violence Order/All Charges and Summons/Defended Hearings List, 18 December 2009.
159 Ibid, 33.
160 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A(b); Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 5(1)(b); Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 9(1)(c); Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 7(1)(b); Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 5(1)(c). See also Sentencing Act 1997 (Tas) s 3(c)(i).
161 Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 10(1)(i).
skills to stop them from re-offending. It is derived from the utilitarian theory of punishment. Susette Talarico comments:

While retribution, deterrence and incapacitation are based on assumptions of free will, rationality and simple confinement, rehabilitation looks to the offender in a rather innovative and distinctly contemporary perspective. Assuming that criminal behaviour can be explained and predicted, rehabilitation focuses on a treatment approach to crime control.

4.94 A number of state and territory sentencing acts set out rehabilitation as a purpose of sentencing in the following terms:

- to promote the rehabilitation of the offender;
- to establish conditions within which it is considered by the court that the rehabilitation of the offender may be facilitated.

4.95 The Tasmanian sentencing legislation states that a purpose of the Act—as opposed to a purpose of sentencing—is to help prevent crime and promote respect for the law by allowing courts to impose sentences aimed at the rehabilitation of offenders. The South Australian sentencing legislation specifies the rehabilitation of the offender as a matter that the court must have regard to in determining sentence, to the extent that it is relevant and known to the court.

4.96 In sentencing for family violence offenders, courts have remarked on the offenders’ prospects of rehabilitation, and have suspended sentences on the basis that offenders will—among other things—undergo treatment.

Incapacitation

4.97 Incapacitation aims to restrain an offender in order to render him or her incapable of re-offending. Imprisonment is one form of incapacitation. Other

---

165 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A(d); Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 7(1)(d).
166 Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 5(1)(c). See also Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 9(1)(b); Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 5(1)(b) which are expressed in similar terms.
167 Sentencing Act 1997 (Tas) s 3(e)(ii).
168 Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 10(1)(m).
169 For example, in R v Rindjarra (2008) 191 A Crim R 171, [79], the trial judge commented that the offender’s prospects were poor.
170 For example, in R v Taylor (No 2) [2008] ACTSC, [28] the offender’s 12 month sentence of imprisonment for breach of a protection order was suspended on condition that he present himself for assessment for and, if found suitable, complete, the ACT Corrective Service Family Violence Program as well as any program deemed to be necessary for his rehabilitation by ACT Corrective Services.
sentencing options that curtail an offender’s liberty—such as the use of electronic surveillance to track an offender’s movements—are also forms of incapacitation.

4.98 Collective incapacitation is the strategy of seeking to reduce crime by incapacitating more offenders, or incapacitating them for longer periods of time. Selective incapacitation is the strategy of trying to identify, and then incapacitate, certain offenders who are likely to re-offend. This strategy relies on predictions of future criminality—which have been criticised by some as inherently unreliable and often erroneous.

4.99 Provisions in sentencing legislation of a number of states and territories include the selective incapacitation of certain offenders. In addition, a number of state and territory sentencing acts state that a purpose of sentencing is to protect the community from the offender. The Western Australian sentencing legislation provides that a court must not impose a sentence of imprisonment unless it decides—among other things—that it is required to protect the community.

Denunciation

4.100 Denunciation is premised on the theory that a sentence can serve the purpose of communicating to the offender and the community the message that the law should not be flouted. In this regard, denunciation performs an educative role. Further, a sentence that denounces the conduct of an offender represents a symbolic, collective statement of society’s censure of the criminal conduct. The public opinion to be taken into account is ‘informed public opinion’, as opposed to actual public opinion. In Inkson v the Queen, Underwood J stated that:

> The community delegates to the Court the task of identifying, assessing and weighing the outrage and revulsion that an informed and responsible public would have to criminal conduct.

---

173 Ibid, 125.
176 See, eg, Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) ss 18A, 18B (indefinite sentence for offender convicted of serious offences where there is a high probability that offender is a serious danger to the community); Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 163 (indefinite sentence for violent offender who poses a serious danger to the community); Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) s 98 (indefinite sentences where a superior court is satisfied on balance of probabilities that offender, if released, would be a danger to society).
177 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A(c); Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 5(1)(e); Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 9(1)(e); Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2003 (ACT) s 7(1)(e); Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 5(1)(e).
181 Inkson v The Queen (1996) 6 Tas R 1, 2.
182 Ibid, 16.
4. Purposes of Laws Relevant to Family Violence

4.101 A consideration of informed public opinion cannot, however, lead to the imposition of a sentence that is contrary to law.\textsuperscript{183}

4.102 A number of state and territory sentencing acts set out denunciation as a purpose of sentencing in the following terms:

- to denounce the conduct of the offender;\textsuperscript{184}
- to manifest the denunciation by the court of the type of conduct in which the offender engaged;\textsuperscript{185} and
- to make it clear that the community, acting through the court, denounces the sort of conduct in which the offender was involved.\textsuperscript{186}

4.103 In sentencing offenders for family violence offences, courts have specifically referred to the need for denunciation.\textsuperscript{187}

Restoration

4.104 While there is no universally accepted definition of restorative justice, it is essentially an approach to crime that is principally concerned with repairing the harm caused by criminal conduct and addressing the underlying causes of criminality. In this regard, restoration integrates elements of rehabilitation.

4.105 Restorative justice initiatives in Australia are diverse and employed at different stages of the criminal justice process, including sentencing. Examples of such initiatives are victim-offender mediation, conferencing and circle sentencing. Restorative justice is considered in Chapter 23.

4.106 The sentencing legislation of some states and territories refers either to restorative aims or restorative initiatives. For example, the sentencing legislation of NSW and the ACT states that a purpose of sentencing is ‘to recognise the harm done to the victim of the crime and the community’.\textsuperscript{188} The South Australian sentencing legislation mandates conferencing prior to the sentencing of Indigenous offenders. Victims of crime may choose to be present at such conferences.\textsuperscript{189}

\textsuperscript{183} R v Nemer (2003) 87 SASR 168, 171.
\textsuperscript{184} Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A(f); Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 7(1)(f).
\textsuperscript{185} Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 5(1)(d).
\textsuperscript{186} Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 9(1)(d). See also Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 5(1)(d).
\textsuperscript{187} For example, see R v Gazdovic [2002] VSC, [28], [30] in relation to the sentencing for incitement to murder the offender’s wife and sister and incitement to intentionally cause serious injury to the offender’s brother-in-law.
\textsuperscript{188} Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 3A(g); Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 7(1)(g).
\textsuperscript{189} Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 9C.
Victims’ compensation

4.107 The avenues of redress for compensation for victims of crime are not exclusively based on legislation. 190 Victims of crime—including victims of family violence—may be financially compensated in three ways: through an award of compensation in the civil courts, typically through a claim that a tort has been committed; through an order that an offender pay restitution or reparation to the victim, as part of the offender’s sentence; and through a claim to a statutory compensation scheme in which awards are assessed and paid by the government.

4.108 Compensating victims of crime has been part of a wider social and legislative trend towards greater recognition of the importance of the interests of the victims of crime in the criminal process. The general philosophy underlying victims’ compensation is expressed in the preamble to the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1985, as a recognition that victims of crime and frequently their families, witnesses and others who aid them, are unjustly subjected to loss, damage or injury and that they may, in addition, suffer hardship when assisting in the prosecution of offenders. 191

4.109 The Declaration includes basic principles of restitution—that is, that offenders should pay for the costs of their crimes—and state compensation—that is, where such costs are not recoverable from offenders or elsewhere, states should endeavour to provide financial compensation to such victims and their families. 192 The principle of restitution underlies the power to sentence an offender by ordering restitution or reparation, as well as damages for tort, while the development of statutory compensation schemes has been driven by the principle of compensation. Although the different avenues for compensation share the general philosophy of recognition of the injustice that a victim should bear the losses of a crime, there are some distinctions between the purposes of those forms of compensation. These purposes are considered below.

Victims’ compensation schemes

4.110 All Australian states and territories have legislation establishing victims’ compensation schemes. In some jurisdictions, such as Queensland and South Australia, these schemes are established in broader legislation that also encompasses other measures to support victims, such as the inclusion of fundamental principles of justice underlying the treatment of victims or the establishment of a levy upon offenders for the purposes of compensating victims. 193 In other jurisdictions, such as Victoria, the legislation is concerned primarily with the establishment of a compensation scheme. 194

---

190 Victims’ compensation is discussed more fully in Ch 29.
192 Ibid cls 8–9, 12.
193 Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld); Victims of Crime Act 2001 (SA).
4. Purposes of Laws Relevant to Family Violence

4.111 The legislation of NSW, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia and the Northern Territory includes provisions setting out statutory purposes and objects. Apart from the aim of establishing a compensation scheme (and other mechanisms under the legislation),¹⁹⁵ these objects clauses include the following purposes and objects (variously expressed):

- to provide assistance (or support and rehabilitation) to victims of crime;¹⁹⁶
- to assist victims of crime to recover from the crime (and, in South Australia, ‘to advance their welfare in other ways’);¹⁹⁷ and
- to give statutory recognition to victims of crime and the harm that they suffer from criminal offending.¹⁹⁸

4.112 The objects clauses also make clear that the awards under the compensation scheme are not intended to reflect the level of compensation to which victims of acts of violence may be entitled at common law or otherwise.¹⁹⁹ In addition to these common provisions, the Victorian and Queensland acts include the further objective of adding to, or complementing, other victims’ services and, in Victoria, the objective of ‘allow[ing] victims of crime to have recourse to financial assistance under this Act where compensation for the injury cannot be obtained from the offender or other sources’.²⁰⁰

4.113 As well as these statutory objectives, victims’ compensation schemes are seen as enhancing the efficacy of criminal justice systems by encouraging victims of crime to come forward and prosecute perpetrators.²⁰¹ Like restitution orders, victims’ compensation schemes provide a more informal and efficient forum than civil litigation.²⁰² They are also more effective in that victims have access to a pool of dedicated funds, whereas restitution from an offender depends upon the offender’s capacity to pay.

¹⁹⁵ The objects clauses, for example, commonly provide that it is an object or purpose of the Act to establish a victims’ compensation scheme and other associated schemes under the legislation. For example, in Queensland and South Australia, another ‘object’ is to set out principles of justice underlying the treatment of victims. These instrumental objects are not included in this summary.

¹⁹⁶ Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 1(1). See also Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW) s 3(a); Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2006 (NT) s 3(a).

¹⁹⁷ Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 1(2)(a). See also Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 3(2)(a); Victims of Crime Act 2001 (SA) s 3(c).

¹⁹⁸ Victims of Crime Act 2001 (SA) s 3(c). See also Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 1(2)(b); Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 3(2)(b); (c).

¹⁹⁹ Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 3(3). See also Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 1(3); Victims of Crime Act 2001 (SA) s 3(d) (‘limited’ compensation).

²⁰⁰ Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 (Vic) s 1(2)(c), (4); Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 3(2)(d).

²⁰² Ibid, 198–199.
Restitution orders

4.114 In all Australian jurisdictions, except Western Australia, there is power to order—as a sentencing option—that an offender pay compensation for loss, injury or damage as a consequence of an offence.203 In Western Australia, the power to order compensation is restricted to property damage or property offences.204

4.115 The ‘fundamental purpose’ of such powers is to give victims ‘easy access to civil justice’:205 As Bell J has explained:

When an offender has been dealt with by the courts, the judge can be in a good position to consider the issue of compensating the victim. The factual circumstances relevant to compensation may have been fully or at least sufficiently established by the evidence led or the admissions made by the offender. It can be clear that the offender’s crime has caused loss or damage to the victim. Once the court receives evidence of the extent and value of such loss or damage, it can then expeditiously determine whether and what compensation to order. This saves the victim the time, expense, inconvenience and possible additional trauma of having to institute a civil proceeding. Not doing so may deprive the victim of ready access to just compensation, leaving them with an understandable sense of grievance.206

4.116 The making of restitution orders shares some philosophical underpinnings with the sentencing aim of restoration.

Compensation for tort claims

4.117 The basic function of an award of damages in tort is:

to compensate the plaintiff for loss suffered as a result of the tort; the plaintiff is entitled to restitutio in integrum, that is, to be put in the position they would have been in had the tort not been committed.207

4.118 If a tort has been committed, victims of family violence, including sexual assault, may be able to seek damages from an offender. Such claims are largely governed by the common law and are pursued in the civil courts.

4.119 Along with this general purpose of restitution, individual torts may serve different purposes. Family violence most commonly gives rise to a claim in assault or battery. A battery is committed when a person directly and intentionally causes contact with the body of the victim without the latter’s consent.208 An assault is committed when a person directly and intentionally threatens the victim in such a way that the victim reasonably apprehends imminent contact with his or her body by the person, or

---

203 Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW) ss 71, 77B; Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 85B; Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 35; Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 53; Sentencing Act 1997 (Tas) s 58; Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 18, ch 7; Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 88.

204 See s 116 of the Sentencing Act 1995 (WA), which defines ‘victim’ as a person who or which has suffered loss of or damage to his, her or its property as a direct or indirect result of the offence.

206 Ibid.

208 Ibid, 27.
something within the person’s control. 209 Assault and battery are also criminal offences. 210 The fundamental principle underlying these torts is that every person’s body is inviolable—that is, these torts protect the physical integrity of a person. 211

4.120 Negligence, on the other hand, is directed to ensuring that persons do not behave carelessly or negligently, in such a way as to harm others. Negligence may arise in the context of family violence where, for example, a third party such as a parent fails to take reasonable care to ensure that a child is not subject to violence.

4.121 Compensation claims by way of tort are not easy methods of redress for victims of family violence, for a number of reasons. 212 This has been partly addressed through the power to order restitution and the development of statutory victims’ compensation schemes.

Migration legislation

4.122 The object of the Migration Act 1958 (Cth) is expressed broadly as being to ‘regulate in the national interest, the coming into, and presence in Australia, of non-citizens’. 213 Certain provisions of the Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth) relate to family violence. These provisions permit certain persons applying for permanent residence in Australia to proceed with their application after the breakdown of their marriage or de facto relationship if they, or a member of their family, have experienced family violence at the hands of their partner. 214

4.123 The family violence provisions were introduced in response to community concerns that some partners might feel compelled to remain in abusive relationships rather than end the relationship and be forced to leave Australia. 215

4.124 The Queensland Centre for Domestic and Family Violence Research reports that the vast majority of persons intended to be protected by these provisions are women, 216 and that the provisions were intended to respond to

---

209 Ibid, 42.
210 In some jurisdictions, a summary conviction for an offence acts as a bar to any subsequent civil proceedings for the offence, and civil proceedings taken against a person for an offence act as a bar to subsequent criminal proceedings for the same offence: see, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 556.
211 Collins v Wilcock [1984] 1 WLR, 1177. See also Secretary, Department of Health and Community Services v JWB and SMB (Marion’s Case) (1992) 175 CLR 218, 253.
213 Migration Act 1958 (Cth) s 4(1).
216 It is reported that the Department of Immigration and Citizenship’s policy is that if the applicant is a male it is considered reasonable to refer a non-judicially determined claim of family violence unless there is ‘strong evidence’ that the claim is genuine: Immigration Advice and Rights Centre Inc, IARC Client...
the incidence of abuse occurring in relationships where one partner was being sponsored for residence in Australia. Anecdotal and statistical evidence at the time revealed significant levels of verbal, emotional, social, racial, physical, sexual and financial abuse in spousal relationships occurring in this context.217

4.125 The National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children stated that:

Women who are sponsored by Australian citizens and residents are particularly vulnerable to abuse due to the threat of deportation. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, domestic violence practitioners became concerned about the number of repeat or serial sponsors who abused the women and then triggered their deportation. Predominantly, the concern related to the abuse of Filipino women by serial sponsors, although more recently concerns have increased about women sponsored from other countries such as Russia, Thailand, Indonesia and Fiji.218

4.126 Under the Migration Regulations, a person whose relationship ends after the person has applied for permanent residence will still be able to be considered for permanent residence if he or she can provide evidence of family violence that is acceptable under the Regulations.219 The Regulations provide for both judicially and non-judicially determined claims of family violence.220 In July 2010, the Australian Law Reform Commission received Terms of Reference for an Inquiry—following on from the current Inquiry—into the treatment of family violence in Commonwealth laws, including immigration laws. The issues arising under the Migration Regulations will be considered further in the context of that Inquiry.

---

219 Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth) pt 1, div 1.5.
220 Ibid pt 1, div 1.5.

Contents

Introduction 187
Concepts of family violence 188
Current definitions in family violence legislation 189
Linkage of definitions of family violence to criminal law 193
Types of conduct recognised as family violence 196
Submissions and consultations 201
A common definition or shared understanding of family violence? 201
Family violence as coercing or controlling behaviour 207
Need for a definition of family violence in NSW family violence legislation 210
Types of potentially relevant conduct 211
Linkage of definitions of family violence to criminal law 231
Commissions’ views 234
Gender neutrality in definition 234
Core definition to describe context of family violence 234
Shared understanding of potentially relevant types of conduct 235
Need for a definition of family violence in NSW family violence legislation 236
Types of potentially relevant conduct 237
Linkage of definitions of family violence to criminal law 244

Introduction

5.1 The Terms of Reference require the Commissions to consider reforms to legal frameworks which will improve the safety of victims of family violence. The definitions, and understanding, of family violence are key starting points.

5.2 This and the following chapter explore the meaning of family violence across different legislative schemes. Understanding what constitutes family violence—or domestic violence or domestic abuse as it is referred to in some jurisdictions—is integral to a consideration of interaction issues. Definitions of family violence in Australia vary widely across family violence legislation,¹ the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), the criminal law, and other types of legislation such as victims’ compensation legislation and migration regulations. In addition, disciplines other than law—for example, the social sciences, health and welfare service providers—may conceptualise family violence differently.

---

¹ An explanation of the Commissions’ use of the terms ‘family violence’ and ‘family violence legislation’ is set out in Ch 1.

5.3 This chapter focuses on the definition of family violence in family violence legislation and considers the desirability of attaining a common understanding of what constitutes family violence across family violence legislation. Definitions form one limb of a common interpretative framework, complemented for example, by guiding principles and statutory objects, which are discussed in Chapter 7.

5.4 Chapter 6 considers the definition of family violence in other legislative schemes, including the Family Law Act, and in the criminal law—and, in particular, the relationship between the definitions in those schemes and in family violence legislation.

5.5 This and the following chapter consider whether it is appropriate or desirable to aim for a common understanding of what constitutes family violence across the different legislative schemes under consideration. This is considered in light of the underlying policy justifications for each of the legislative schemes, which are discussed in the preceding chapter.

Concepts of family violence

5.6 There is no single nationally or internationally agreed definition of family violence. As noted in Chapter 2, the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women defines violence against women as ‘any act of gender-based violence that results in, or is likely to result in, physical, sexual or psychological harm or suffering to women, including threats of such acts, coercion or arbitrary deprivation of liberty, whether occurring in public or private life’.2

5.7 As the Australian Bureau of Statistics has noted, definitions of what constitutes family violence are inherently likely to differ across the legal sector, researchers and service providers. These definitions do not always necessarily align with community understandings, or victim and offender perspectives, of what constitutes family violence.3

5.8 Partnerships Against Domestic Violence—an Australian intergovernmental taskforce on family violence—adopted the following definition of family violence in 2003:

> Domestic violence is an abuse of power perpetrated mainly (but not only) by men against women in a relationship or after separation. It occurs when one partner attempts physically or psychologically to dominate and control the other. Domestic violence takes many forms. The most commonly acknowledged forms are physical and sexual violence, threats and intimidation, emotional and social abuse and economic deprivation. Many forms of domestic violence are against the law.

---

For many indigenous people the term family violence is preferred as it encompasses all forms of violence in intimate, family and other relationships of mutual obligation and support.\

5.9 Conduct constituting family violence can encompass varying degrees of severity and take many forms—physical abuse, sexual abuse, damage to property, emotional abuse, social abuse, economic abuse, psychological abuse, and spiritual abuse. Whatever form family violence takes, a central feature is that it involves a person exercising control and power over the victim by inducing fear, for example by using threatening behaviour. Definitions of family violence usually recognise that violence can constitute more than single ‘incidents’. It can involve ‘a continuum of controlling behaviour and violence, which can occur over a number of years’.

5.10 While the definition of family violence may not appear to be a practically important issue, it is necessary to understand precisely what constitutes family violence in each of the state and territory jurisdictions in order to consider whether family violence laws interact with the Family Law Act or with the criminal law in any particular matter and, if they do, the nature of that interaction. The scope of the various definitions of family violence in family violence legislation may, in a particular case, mean that there will be no interaction with the Family Law Act or with the criminal law. For example, certain definitions cover conduct that may justify a protection order but the conduct does not amount to a criminal offence. Conversely, some definitions of family violence in family violence legislation are linked expressly to the criminal law, and result in an interaction between family violence and criminal legislative regimes at some level.

5.11 Critically assessing definitional issues is relevant to the important question of when it is appropriate for the law to intervene to provide protection or other forms of redress to victims. On the one hand, excessively narrow definitions of family violence might cause gaps in protection to victims. On the other, excessively broad definitions may detract from the significance of family violence or devalue the experience of its victims or—as noted by one stakeholder—promote the abuse of the protection order system.

5.12 The discussion below focuses on the definition of family violence in family violence legislation.

Current definitions in family violence legislation

5.13 Table A below provides a snapshot of variations in the definitions of family violence across the states and territories. The following discussion addresses various aspects of the state and territory definitions. Key differences include the extent to which definitions:

- are linked to criminal offences;
- capture non-physical violence;
- turn on the impact on the victim or the intent of the person committing family violence;8 and
- capture abuse experienced by certain groups in the community—such as those from a culturally and linguistically diverse background,9 the aged, persons with a disability and persons in same-sex relationships.

8 The Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) focuses on both impact and intent: s 8.
9 An explanation of the Commissions’ use of the phrase ‘culturally and linguistically diverse’ is set out in Ch 1.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Assault</th>
<th>Sexual assault</th>
<th>Kidnap/deprive of liberty</th>
<th>Property damage</th>
<th>Harm animal</th>
<th>Economic abuse</th>
<th>Emotional/psych abuse *</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>NSW</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vic</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qld</td>
<td>Wilful injury</td>
<td>Indecent behaviour without consent</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td>Eg of wilful property damage</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WA</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>Eg of property damage</td>
<td>✓</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SA</td>
<td>Physical injury–result or intent</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>Eg of emotional or psych abuse</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>Eg of emotional or psych abuse</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>Eg of emotional or psych abuse</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tas</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td>✓</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACT</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NT</td>
<td>Eg of conduct causing harm</td>
<td>Eg of conduct causing harm</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td>✓</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

* Psych = Psychological

In addition to the conduct captured in Table A, some types of threats constitute family violence in all jurisdictions; and specific criminal offences in NSW and the ACT also constitute family violence.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Stalk</th>
<th>Intimidate/coerce</th>
<th>Harass</th>
<th>Expose child to violence</th>
<th>Breach protection order</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>NSW</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td>✓</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vic</td>
<td>Eg of emotional abuse</td>
<td>Eg of emotional abuse</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qld</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WA</td>
<td>Pursuing with intent to intimidate</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SA</td>
<td>Captured in examples of emotional or psych* abuse</td>
<td>Captured in examples of emotional/psych abuse plus denial of social/personal autonomy</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tas</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>✓</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACT</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td></td>
<td>✓ or offensive conduct</td>
<td></td>
<td>✓</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NT</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>Eg of intimidation</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

* Psych = Psychological
5. Definitions in Family Violence Legislation

Linkage of definitions of family violence to criminal law

5.14 A key difference between definitions of family violence in family violence legislation is the extent to which those definitions are directly linked to specific criminal law offences. When family violence is defined by reference to criminal offences, the behaviour that constitutes family violence can form the basis for a protection order as well as a prosecution for a criminal offence, although the latter will require proof beyond reasonable doubt, instead of on the balance of probabilities.10

5.15 NSW family violence legislation does not define family violence. Rather it defines ‘domestic violence offence’ by referring specifically to 55 ‘personal violence’ offences in the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) where those offences are committed by persons in defined domestic relationships against other persons.11 The offences include, for example, murder, manslaughter, wounding or causing grievous bodily harm with intent, assault, sexual assault, kidnapping, child abduction and destroying or damaging property. The list also includes narrower offences such as discharging a firearm with intent, causing bodily injury by gunpowder, not providing a wife with food, and setting traps.

5.16 Some of the ‘personal violence’ offences included in the definition of ‘domestic violence offence’ in the NSW family violence legislation have been repealed.12 These historical offences are retained in the definition because such offences can be recorded on a person’s criminal record as ‘domestic violence offences’13 and this has a number of important consequences.14

5.17 The NSW family violence legislation also provides that stalking, intimidation with intent to cause fear of physical or mental harm, and attempts to commit any specified offence can amount to ‘domestic violence’.15

5.18 The ACT family violence legislation sets out a general definition of ‘domestic violence’ which covers, for example, any conduct that causes physical or personal injury to a relevant person, or is harassing or offensive. The definition also provides that a ‘domestic violence offence’ is an offence against scheduled legislative provisions.16 The scheduled offences cover a broad range of conduct. They include offences traditionally recognised as including forms of family violence, such as assault

10 Ch 8 discusses some differences between civil and criminal responses to family violence, and Ch 11 discusses the interaction between protection orders obtained under family violence laws and the criminal law.
12 Including Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) ss 61B–E, 665A, 562ZG.
13 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 12.
14 Ibid s 12. The note to s 12 states, for example, that an indication in the charge for an offence that a person has committed a domestic violence offence will be relevant in bail proceedings. Further, the recording on a person’s criminal record that an offence is a ‘domestic violence offence’ is relevant to determining whether a person’s behaviour amounts to stalking or intimidation as previous behaviour constituting ‘domestic violence’ is taken into account.
15 Ibid s 4. ‘Intimidation’ is separately defined, and captures, for example, harassment or molestation.
and wounding, as well as offences that are less obviously related to family violence—such as causing bushfires, arson, trespass on government premises, and refusing or neglecting to leave government premises when directed. Some of the scheduled offences recognised in the ACT as constituting family violence are not recognised as family violence offences in NSW.

5.19 Other state and territory definitions of family violence pick up selected definitions of criminal law offences. For example, the Victorian family violence legislation provides that the definition of ‘assault’ is the same as the definition of assault in s 31 of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic). Similarly, the Western Australian family violence legislation provides that various definitions, including those of ‘assault’, ‘intimidate’, ‘kidnapping or depriving the person of his or her liberty’ and ‘pursue’ are the same as the equivalent definitions in the Criminal Code (WA).

5.20 In contrast to the approach of the NSW family violence legislation, other state and territory definitions largely describe conduct that constitutes family violence without linking that conduct to specific criminal offences or, where that conduct could constitute an offence, without defining the conduct or attempting to align the definitions with those used in the criminal law. While in these cases there may be an overlap between conduct constituting family violence for the purpose of obtaining a protection order and the conduct forming the basis for a criminal prosecution, the scope of the definition for the purposes of the protection order may be somewhat unclear. Specific examples of non-alignment of definitions or terminology across family violence legislation and the criminal law are discussed in Chapter 6.

5.21 In other cases, the conduct described as falling within the definition of family violence may not amount to a criminal offence—for example, emotional abuse—but may provide grounds for the making of a civil family violence protection order. The Victorian legislation, for example, explicitly provides that ‘to remove doubt it is declared that behaviour may constitute family violence even if behaviour would not constitute a criminal offence’.

Linkage to federal criminal law

5.22 To the extent that family violence legislation links the definition of family violence to specific state or territory criminal offences—in the absence of a broader

---

17 Ibid sch 1. One stakeholder informed the Commissions that it did not think that the offences of causing bushfires, engaging in unreasonable obstruction in relation to the use of government premises; behaving in an offensive or disorderly manner while in or on government premises; and refusing or neglecting to leave government premises when directed had been used as the basis for obtaining a protection order: Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.

18 For example, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 4 does not categorise the offences of negligent driving and causing bushfires as family violence offences where those offences are committed by defined persons, whereas the Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) does.

19 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 4.

20 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6.

21 As noted below, economic abuse is defined as a form of family violence in some jurisdictions without being a criminal offence, whereas in Tasmania it is a criminal offence.

22 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5(3).
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

definition of family violence, as is the case in NSW—it leaves no scope for the definition to capture conduct potentially falling within the ambit of federal offences.

5.23 There are, however, a number of federal offences which could potentially fall within the ambit of family violence and give rise to a protection order. For example, conduct such as threatening behaviour or harassment that can form the basis for a protection order can also fall within the ambit of the following federal offences:

- using a carriage service to make a threat;\(^{23}\)
- using a carriage service to menace, harass or cause offence;\(^{24}\)
- using a postal or similar service to make a threat;\(^{25}\) and
- using a postal or similar service to menace, harass or cause offence.\(^{26}\)

5.24 The Local Court of NSW has stated that state and federal laws probably most frequently overlap where a protection order is sought in respect of conduct that amounts to the abovementioned federal offences of using a carriage service to make a threat, or to menace, harass or cause offence.\(^{27}\)

5.25 Another area of potential overlap is in relation to conduct constituting economic abuse. For example, coercing a family member to claim a social security payment is recognised as economic abuse amounting to family violence in some jurisdictions.\(^{28}\) Such behaviour could also constitute offences under social security legislation as well as the Criminal Code Act 1995 (Cth) relating to fraudulent conduct—such as obtaining a financial advantage by deception or making false or misleading statements in applications. In a submission to this Inquiry, National Legal Aid noted that:

Anecdotally, it is common for victims of family violence to disclose that they have been encouraged by the perpetrator to defraud Centrelink, and that, having done so, the perpetrator subsequently uses the fact of the offence to control them. In other cases, the financial abuse that is suffered by the victim causes them to commit offences of this kind to obtain money to feed the family.\(^{29}\)

5.26 A less likely but nonetheless potentially relevant area where a federal offence could occur in a family violence context is sexual servitude, where the person committing the offence is in a defined family relationship with the victim.\(^{30}\)

---

23 Criminal Code (Cth) s 474.15.
24 Ibid s 474.17.
25 Ibid s 471.11.
26 Ibid s 471.12.
28 See, eg, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 6. Such behaviour could also constitute harassment and intimidation.
30 Criminal Code (Cth) ch 8 div 270. For example, a person whose conduct causes another person to enter into or remain in sexual servitude is guilty of an offence. Sexual servitude is the condition of a person who provides sexual services and who, because of the use of force or threats—including a threat to cause a person’s deportation—is not free, for example, to cease providing sexual services. See generally R v Tang (2008) 237 CLR 1; B McSherry, ‘Trafficking in Persons: A Critical Analysis of the New Criminal Code Offences’ (2006) 18 Current Issues in Criminal Justice 385.
Types of conduct recognised as family violence

5.27 The discussion below gives a snapshot of the various types of conduct that may comprise family violence across the state and territory jurisdictions.31

Sexual assault

5.28 Significantly, not every jurisdiction expressly refers to sexual assault in the definition of family violence—nor did the 1999 Model Domestic Violence Laws.32 The Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) recommended that the definition of family violence should include specific references to sexual forms of family violence.33 The National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children also stated that ‘it is important that legislation explicitly acknowledges sexual offences as constituting domestic and family violence’.34

5.29 Where the definition of family violence recognises sexual assault as a form of family violence, the prominence it is given in the definition varies. For example, the general definition of ‘domestic violence’ in s 13 of the Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) does not refer to sexual assault, although various sexual assault offences are included in sch 1, which lists all ‘domestic violence offences’. In the Northern Territory, sexual assault is cited in the definition as an example of conduct causing harm,35 whereas in Tasmania it is cited as a category of conduct in its own right.36 In Victoria behaviour that is sexually abusive is captured by the definition of family violence37 and, in Queensland, the definition of family violence captures ‘indecent behaviour to the other person without consent’.38

5.30 Part G of this Report deals with sexual assault, and the ‘invisibility’ of sexual assault in family violence cases is discussed in Chapter 24.

Economic abuse

5.31 Only some jurisdictions include ‘economic abuse’ in their definition of family violence—namely Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania and the Northern Territory.

5.32 There are some differences in the precise formulations of economic abuse. It may include, for example:

---

32 Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group, Model Domestic Violence Laws (1999), s 3(1). The Model Domestic Violence Laws project is discussed further in Ch 7.
35 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 5(a).
36 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 7(a)(i).
37 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5(1)(a)(i).
38 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11(1)(d).
• unreasonable controlling behaviour without consent that denies a person financial autonomy;
• withholding financial support reasonably necessary for the maintenance of a partner;
• coercing a partner to relinquish control over assets;
• unreasonably preventing a person from taking part in decisions over household expenditure or the disposition of joint property;
• coercing the person to claim social security payments; and
• preventing the person from seeking or keeping employment.

5.33 There are differences in the extent to which the provisions require a particular intention on the part of the person engaging in economic abuse. Only the Tasmanian provision criminalises economic abuse, requiring that the person committing it has the intention unreasonably to control or intimidate his or her spouse or partner or cause mental harm, apprehension or fear in committing certain acts of economic abuse.

5.34 Economic abuse is a particular form of violence that has been identified as used against older women. The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse has highlighted the problem of abuse of older women being ‘lost in the cracks’ between the family violence and elder abuse services systems. It notes the serious under-reporting of violence against older women, noting a greater reluctance of older women to disclose personal matters. Older women living alone may be more vulnerable to economic abuse by an adult child following the death of a partner.

Emotional or psychological abuse

5.35 Only some state legislation expressly refers to emotional or psychological abuse as a form of family violence. There are differences in the way these terms are defined—if they are defined at all. More significantly, only the Tasmanian legislation makes emotional abuse (and intimidation) a criminal offence. Professors Belinda Fehlberg and Juliet Behrens state that the Tasmanian provisions:

39 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 6; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 8(5); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) ss 7, 8; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 5. See also Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 4 which provides a more limited offence of wilfully and without lawful excuse failing to provide a wife with necessary food, clothing or lodging so that her life is endangered or her health seriously injured.
40 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 8. The Commissions are not aware of any prosecution for economic abuse under the Tasmanian provision. The offence of economic abuse is discussed further in Ch 13.
42 Ibid, 2 (citations omitted).
43 Ibid, 3.
44 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 5, 7; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 8(4); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 7.
45 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 9.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

bring criminal law in line with the civil definition by creating new offences that fill the gap between the legal definitions of criminal conduct constituting offences such as assault and the non-physical, control based types of violence. This creation of special domestic violence offences is unique in Australia and was not, for example, proposed in the Model Domestic Violence Laws, nor by the Victorian Law Reform Commission, which focused instead on the grounds for obtaining a civil protection order.46

5.36 A 2008 review of the Tasmanian family violence legislation noted that, as at that time, no charge had been brought for emotional abuse and intimidation but that the ground had been used in support of applications for protection orders.47

5.37 Both the Victorian and South Australian family violence legislation defines emotional or psychological abuse as well as giving examples of such abuse. The Victorian family violence legislation defines emotional or psychological abuse as behaviour that ‘torments, intimidates, harasses or is offensive’.48 Examples of such behaviour include racial taunts, threatening to disclose a person’s sexual orientation or to commit suicide, preventing a person from keeping family and cultural connections, and threatening to withhold a person’s medication.49 The South Australian family violence legislation defines emotional or psychological harm as including mental illness, nervous shock, and distress, anxiety or fear that is more than trivial.50 Examples of such conduct include threatening to institutionalise the person and threatening to withdraw care on which the person is dependent.51

5.38 In contrast, Western Australian family violence legislation includes ‘emotionally abusive conduct’, but neither defines nor gives examples of such conduct.52

5.39 Emotional abuse or intimidation under the Tasmanian legislation is defined as the pursuit of ‘a course of conduct that he or she knows, or ought to know, is likely to have the effect of unreasonably controlling or intimidating, or causing mental harm, apprehension or fear, in his or her spouse’.53

5.40 Other legislation refers to conduct that is intimidating,54 harassing,55 or offensive.56 Intimidation is defined variously to include conduct that: causes reasonable 47 Urbis, Review of the Family Violence Act 2004 (2008), prepared for the Department of Justice (Tas), 12.

The offence of emotional abuse is discussed in Ch 13.
48 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 7.
49 Ibid s 8(3).
50 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 8(4).
51 Ibid s 8(4).
52 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6(1)(d).
53 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 9.
54 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) ss 6, 7; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6. Restraining Orders Act 1997
(WA) s 6 provides that the definition of intimidation is the same as that in the Criminal Code (WA) s 333D.
55 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 13.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

apprehension or fear; a reasonable apprehension of injury or violence to the person or the person’s property; has the effect of unreasonably controlling the person or causing mental harm; prevents the person from doing any act that the person is lawfully entitled to do or compels the person to do an act that the person is legally entitled to abstain from, and conduct that amounts to harassment or molestation. Intimidation is usually included either as a subcategory of emotional abuse or as a ground of family violence in its own right. Similarly, in some cases harassment and offensive behaviour are treated as subcategories of emotional abuse or of intimidation, while in other cases they form an aspect of family violence in their own right.

Kidnapping or deprivation of liberty

Most jurisdictions expressly include kidnapping or deprivation of liberty as a form of family violence. The South Australian family violence legislation includes it as an example of abuse that results in emotional or psychological damage.

The family violence legislation of Queensland and the Northern Territory does not include kidnapping or deprivation of liberty in their definitions of family violence. The Australian Government Solicitor (AGS) has expressed the view that kidnapping could constitute intimidation under those legislative schemes.

Damage to property

All of the states and territories, except Tasmania, specify damage to property as constituting family violence. The 2008 review of the Tasmanian family violence legislation stated:

Stakeholders did note the absence of property damage within s 7(a) [the definition of family violence]; which was reported to be a common feature of family violence incidents, and at present cannot be pursued under this Act.

The Queensland family violence legislation provides that the damage to property must be ‘wilful’. The Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group remarked that the inclusion of the element of ‘wilfulness’ in the Queensland provision ‘is more appropriate to criminal behaviour and unnecessarily complicates what is required to be proved’.69

Injury to animals

5.45 Most jurisdictions provide that injuring or killing an animal constitutes family violence. In Queensland, Western Australia and the Northern Territory, harm to an animal is included as a type of property damage.70 The ACT legislation separates damage to property from conduct directed to a pet, and makes the latter family violence where it constitutes a defined animal violence offence.71 The Victorian legislation, however, includes conduct that threatens or causes the death or injury of an animal, irrespective of whether the animal belongs to the relevant family member, where such conduct is aimed at dominating or coercing the family member.72

5.46 The other jurisdictions are silent on whether harm to animals constitutes family violence. Harm to animals may fall within the broader category of damage to property, but the Tasmanian legislation does not include damage to property in its definition of family violence. Harm to an animal may in some cases be covered by more general provisions such as emotional abuse.73

Stalking

5.47 Four jurisdictions expressly include stalking as conduct that constitutes family violence,74 with three of those jurisdictions linking the conduct to the criminal offence of stalking.75 The situation in the Northern Territory warrants special mention because of the disjunction between the civil and criminal definitions of stalking. This is discussed in Chapter 6.

5.48 Other jurisdictions do not expressly refer to stalking as conduct that may constitute family violence, but their definitions, to varying degrees, may encompass conduct that includes certain stalking behaviour.76

70  Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 5.
71  Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 13(1)(b), (f); 13(3).
72  Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5. This approach is consistent with that proposed by the Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group, Model Domestic Violence Laws (1999), s 3(1).
73  Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [3.1.31].
74  Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 13; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 7(a)(iv); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 13, sch 1; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) ss 5, 7.
75  Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) ss 4(b), 13; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 7(a)(iv), linking to Criminal Code (Tas) s 192; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 13, sch 1, linking to Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 35.
76  Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [3.1.24]. For example, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11(c) gives examples of stalking behaviour to describe intimidation or harassment. Less explicit is the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 5, 7 which generally refer to conduct that is threatening, tormenting, harassing or intimidating.
Exposure of children to violence

5.49 Victoria is the only Australian jurisdiction where causing a child to witness or otherwise be exposed to the effects of family violence itself constitutes family violence.\(^77\) The legislation in Western Australia, South Australia and the Northern Territory does not treat exposure of a child to family violence as constituting family violence but expressly allows for the making of protection orders to protect children from such exposure.\(^78\)

5.50 The legislation in NSW provides that a child must be included in a protection order if the child is in a domestic relationship with the person subject to the order.\(^79\)

5.51 Where jurisdictions have definitions that include emotional or psychological abuse, these may encompass the exposure of a child to family violence.\(^80\)

Threats to commit acts of family violence

5.52 In most jurisdictions the threat to commit certain acts of family violence also constitutes family violence.\(^81\) In some jurisdictions threats to commit assault, cause physical injury, or damage property are included, but threats to intimidate or be emotionally abusive or engage in conduct amounting to stalking are not.\(^82\) In other jurisdictions, however, threatening to commit non-physical violence—such as intimidation, stalking and economic abuse—are specifically included.\(^83\)

Breach of protection orders

5.53 In NSW, Tasmania and the ACT a breach of a protection order is included in the definition of family violence.\(^84\)

Submissions and consultations

A common definition or shared understanding of family violence?

5.54 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions put forward two alternative proposals concerning the definition of family violence across family violence legislation. One was that state and territory family violence legislation should contain

---

77 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5. See also Domestic Violence Act 1995 (NZ) s 3(3).
78 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 11B; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 7(1)(b); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 18(2).
79 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 38. The court has discretion to vary such an order.
80 Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [3.1.12].
81 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 4(c); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 5(1)(a)(iv), 5(2); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11(1)(e); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6(1)(f); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 7(a)(v); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 13(1)(d), (g); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 5(f). Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 8(4) treats certain threatening behaviour as emotional or psychological abuse.
82 See, eg, Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6(f).
83 See, eg, Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 5(f).
84 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 4(c); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 7; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 13(2).
the same definition of family violence covering specified physical and non-physical violence, with the definition of family violence in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) being used as a model. The other was that the definitions of family violence in state and territory family violence legislation should recognise the same types of physical and non-physical violence, including sexual assault, economic abuse, emotional or psychological abuse, kidnapping and deprivation of liberty, damage to property, harm or injury to an animal irrespective of whether the animal is technically the property of the victim, and exposure of children to violence.85

Support for proposal and for Victorian definition to be used as a model

5.55 There was overwhelming support for this proposal, although many stakeholders did not specify which of the two alternatives they preferred.86 Specifically, there was strong support for the definition in the Victorian legislation to be used as a model.87 For example, the Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) submitted that its support for either of the two proposals is strongly linked to the definition in the [Victorian legislation] being used as a model.

Without this model as the aim, the states and territories with more progressive legislation could be at a disadvantage regarding the outcome of negotiations.88

5.56 The Victorian Government noted that the Victorian Department of Justice had received positive feedback on the definition contained in its legislation, when undertaking a six month review of the legislation, to June 2009. For example, the review found that:

- the expanded definitions of family violence to include the non-physical forms of violence are being used in support of applications for [protection] orders where other types of abuse have also been a feature of the violence; … and

---

85 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence: Improving Legal Frameworks, ALRC Consultation Paper 1, NSWLRC Consultation Paper 9 (2010), Proposal 4–1(a), (b). Each of the separate components of the definition was the subject of a discrete proposal, and is addressed separately below.

86 For example, Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.

88 Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

- the changes to the definition within the Act are being utilised in Men’s Behaviour Change Programs, as an opportunity to talk about the impact of family violence, such as the impact of controlling behaviours.99

5.57 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria submitted that the definition of family violence in the Victorian family violence legislation had proved itself to be workable.

The introduction of the [Act] and, including this definition, has resulted in a significant increase (approximately 10 per cent) in the number of applications to the Courts for family violence [protection] orders. The definition encourages magistrates to broaden their thinking about the risks associated with the history and dynamics of the relationship between the applicant and the respondent.90

5.58 Family Relationship Services Australia noted that individuals seeking support from family and relationship services are often ambivalent about recognising and naming violence within their relationships, and that perhaps one of the reasons for this is ‘because violence is seen as part of the family dynamic and not clearly identified as unacceptable behaviour’.91

The development of a model definition would … be instructive for service systems and professionals working with families who are sometimes confronted with diverse community expectations and debate over what constitutes family violence. … A clear definition would help professionals in their role of educating people and explaining service system responses.92

5.59 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse expressed a preference for the definition in the South Australian family violence legislation to be adopted—because of its focus on harm, but stated that its alternative preference was the Victorian definition because it expanded the availability of orders ‘to a wider range of abusive behaviours than does a purely conduct based definition’.93

5.60 Of those submissions that expressed a preference for one of the two alternative proposals, opinions were divided as to whether the definition should be the same or should be based on a common understanding.

Support for same definition

5.61 Some stakeholders, including Indigenous legal service providers,94 advocacy organisations,95 legal aid;96 service providers;97 crisis accommodation services;98

90 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
91 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
92 Ibid.
93 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
95 For example, National Peak Body for Safety and Protection of Parents and Children, Submission FV 47, 24 May 2010.
96 For example, Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
97 For example, UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010.
98 For example, Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010.
individuals associated with advocacy organisations;\textsuperscript{99} and other individuals,\textsuperscript{100} expressed a preference for a common definition. For example, the Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service submitted:

The Service works across NT, SA and WA and so works within three different sets of legislation. If there was a consistent definition in the state and territory family violence legislation this would make it easier for the Service, especially where caseworkers work with clients from a state or territory that is not their primary area.

Aboriginal people in central Australia are very mobile, and move freely between communities in WA, SA and the NT. A consistent definition would mean that what constitutes family violence is the same in whatever community the violence occurs.\textsuperscript{101}

5.62 Other reasons given in support of the same definition include that it would:

• assist ‘families’ experiences of procedural fairness, particularly if those experiences are complicated … by relocation across state boundaries;\textsuperscript{102}
• address difficulties faced by victims when attempting to register a protection order in another state or territory;\textsuperscript{103}
• give greater clarity. The alternative of allowing for recognition of the same types of conduct that may constitute family violence ‘would make the interpretation of these concepts open to broad interpretation’,\textsuperscript{104} and
• assist in enabling marginalised women to have enhanced access to legal protection—if the uniform definition to be applied were also broad.\textsuperscript{105}

5.63 Support was sometimes expressed, however, with two broad qualifications: that the common definition should not be achieved by adopting the lowest common denominator;\textsuperscript{106} and that it is not pursued simply for the sake of uniformity.\textsuperscript{107}

\textit{Opposition to same definition}

5.64 The Queensland Law Society specifically opposed a common definition on the basis that it could hamper innovative approaches to family violence.

Domestic and family violence is a topic that governments will keep wishing to legislate in response to. But it is a healthy part of the Australian Federation that \textsuperscript{99} For example, C Pragnell, \textit{Submission FV 70}, 2 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{100} For example, K Johnstone, \textit{Submission FV 107}, 7 June 2010; A Harland, \textit{Submission FV 80}, 2 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{102} UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, \textit{Submission FV 151}, 24 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{103} Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, \textit{Submission FV 175}, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{104} Legal Aid NSW, \textit{Submission FV 219}, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{105} The Australian Association of Social Workers, \textit{Submission FV 224}, 2 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{106} Northern Territory Police, \textit{Consultation}, Darwin, 26 May 2010. See also The Australian Association of Social Workers, \textit{Submission FV 224}, 2 July 2010, in which the view was expressed that any definition adopted should not ‘undermine the integrity’ of a broad model definition; and Women’s Legal Service Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 189}, 25 June 2010, in which the view was expressed that the definition must also be ‘comprehensive’.
different states and territories are able to respond to domestic and family violence in an experimental way to see what works and what does not work, with the benefit that states and territories are able to learn from each other and improve legislation to ensure that this violence is adequately tackled. This process of innovation should not be removed by adopting a uniform definition.\textsuperscript{108}

Support for common shared understanding without the same definition

5.65 Other stakeholders, however, including one state government;\textsuperscript{109} National Legal Aid;\textsuperscript{110} academics;\textsuperscript{111} women’s legal service providers;\textsuperscript{112} general legal service providers;\textsuperscript{113} rape crisis centres;\textsuperscript{114} peak family violence bodies;\textsuperscript{115} representative bodies of specialist domestic violence services;\textsuperscript{116} advocacy coalitions;\textsuperscript{117} councils for single mothers;\textsuperscript{118} police bodies;\textsuperscript{119} education providers;\textsuperscript{120} those working with women with disabilities;\textsuperscript{121} and individuals\textsuperscript{122} expressed a preference for a definition based on a common understanding rather than a common definition. Reasons advanced included that:

- it would go some way to towards ensuring harmonisation of state and territory and Commonwealth laws;\textsuperscript{123}
- developing a shared understanding of what constitutes domestic and family violence within and across jurisdictions is an important component for the development of integrated systems and responses;\textsuperscript{124}
- it is more achievable\textsuperscript{125}—attaining the same definition may be particularly difficult to realise in practice given that many jurisdictions have reviewed their family violence legislation in recent years;\textsuperscript{126}

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.
\item Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
\item National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\item For example, J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010.
\item For example, Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
\item For example, Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
\item Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.
\item For example, Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.
\item For example, National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010.
\item National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.
\item Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010.
\item Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010.
\item For example, Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010.
\item Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
\item N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010.
\item Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
the political effort required to achieve a uniform definition may not be warranted, especially in light of the failure of the model laws proposed in the Model Domestic Violence Laws Report; 127 drafting a uniform definition acceptable to all state and territories would be a significant task and would risk limiting protection for victims of violence to the lowest common denominator; 128

there is merit in leaving room for states and territories to adapt definitions to meet local concerns, provided that there is agreement that the same types of physical and non-physical conduct are recognised; 129

a consistent approach across all jurisdictions would be useful, and recognition of protection orders between jurisdictions would provide better protection for women and children; 130 and it is more likely to capture the nuanced differences experienced by victims of family violence with a disability. 131

National Legal Aid emphasised that such a common understanding should reflect contemporary understandings of family violence and include all behaviours that evidence-based research have found to be damaging. 132

One stakeholder, while acknowledging that a uniform definition could support ‘consistency in implementation’ submitted that:

there are some varying circumstances in different states—for example, issues and nuances specific to … Indigenous population[s] … A core uniform definition with additional provisions as individual states and territories see fit would allow for geography/demographic specific issues. Alternatively, we would support [a definition based on a common understanding] to allow for jurisdiction specific examples in definitions. 133

Opposition to proposal

Professor Patrick Parkinson expressed strong opposition to a common definition or shared understanding of family violence based on the Victorian definition for a variety of reasons, including:

- It takes characteristics of coercive controlling violence which represent interrelated aspects of women’s experience of control and treats them as 130 National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010.

133 Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.
independent forms of ‘violence’ with applications outside of the context of coercion and control.

- An expansion of the definition of family violence could have very substantial net-widening effects, with the consequence that the courts may be distracted by the sheer numbers of allegations of violence from focusing both attention and resources on the areas where careful assessment and decisive intervention is most necessary.
- Any expansion of the definitions may have significant resource implications for state and territory magistrates’ courts.
- An expansion of the grounds for family violence orders may undermine efforts at reducing conflict between parents after separation without doing much to improve safety.
- There is a risk that certain forms of abuse will be extremely hard to define, being very reliant on personal opinion and subjective perception.134

5.69 Parkinson recommended an alternative formulation of family violence, which is considered separately below in the context of the discussion of family violence as coercing or controlling behaviour.

Family violence as coercing or controlling behaviour

5.70 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether the definition of family violence in state and territory family violence legislation, in addition to setting out the types of conduct that constitute family violence, should provide that family violence is violent, threatening behaviour or any other form of behaviour that coerces, controls or dominates a family member or causes that family member to be fearful.135

5.71 There was overwhelming support for this approach from a wide spectrum of stakeholders, including Indigenous legal and advocacy services; non-government organisations involved in the disability sector; legal service providers; courts; legal aid; victims’ groups; academics; crisis accommodation services; and individuals.136 Various reasons were advanced in support including that:

---

134 P Parkinson, Submission FV 104, 5 June 2010.
135 Consultation Paper, Question 4–1.
‘it is essential that the definition used is consistent with understanding the coercive control elements of family violence and shifts beyond the limited incident based approach commonly used in legal settings’;137

it would assist women living in remote communities who are particularly vulnerable to controlling behaviour and find it difficult to break free from that control;138

the inclusion of these matters is important to ensure that all aspects of an abusive relationship are caught by the legislation,139 and assists in recognising the complexity of family violence;140 understanding the dynamics of the use of power and control is critical to understanding family violence,141 and such a definition would perform an educative role;142

it allows new forms of behaviour to be included, provided that they meet this definition;143

having a definition based on the dynamics and impact of family violence avoids the technicalities of definitions becoming an obstacle to protection, especially given that a common form of family violence is the use of strategies of intimidation and symbolic actions which have specific meaning for the victim but appear relatively harmless to others;144

it acknowledges how family violence can result from situations where a person is increasingly dependent on support from family or others, and is therefore relevant to people living with a disability who can be particularly vulnerable to family violence;145 and 141  Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010. See also Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

143  Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010 also submitted that it was appropriate to take a non-exhaustive approach to defining family violence.
144  Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.
145  Julia Farr Association, Submission FV 103, 4 June 2010.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

- this approach is consistent with the definition in the Victorian family violence legislation, which has been reviewed and found to be working well in practice.146

5.72 It was also submitted that the definition should not capture the normal disciplinary actions of parents.147

5.73 On the precise wording of the definition, a partner violence counsellor submitted that:

Use of the term ‘dominate’ is superfluous when the words ‘coerces’ and ‘controls’ are also used. The range of meanings of the word ‘dominate’ is broad and it can constitute behaviour which is not necessarily harmful to another person, but which because it is conflated with coerces and controls, can be subject to misuse. It is more appropriate in the context of relationship dynamics and relationship counselling rather than in the context of family violence law.148

5.74 Two academics submitted that family violence should be defined more or less along these lines—that is, providing the overarching context for other aspects of the definition—rather than being an additional category in itself. Dr Jane Wangmann suggested that the definition of family violence in civil protection order legislation should, in addition to setting out a non-exhaustive list of the types of behaviour falling under the purview of the legislation, explain the context of those acts by providing that ‘family violence is violent or threatening behaviour or any other form of behaviour that coerces, controls or dominates a family member or causes that family member to be fearful’ …

For the civil protection order system to better respond to family violence—it needs to do more than simply respond to incidents of violence/abuse perpetrated by a person in a familial relationship. To remain focused on incidents creates the risk that civil protection order schemes: replicate the limitations of the criminal law; fail to acknowledge the way in which acts and behaviours are inextricably related; and fail to appreciate the way in which otherwise ‘minor’ events are in fact of critical concern to many women.

The context in which acts and behaviour take place takes on a heightened importance as legislative definitions are progressively broadened to include a range of non-physical and non-visible forms of abuse (for example, emotional abuse, verbal abuse, or economic abuse).149

5.75 Parkinson opposed a definition that would create ‘discrete categories of violence provable by reference to specific incidents or behaviours outside of a context of coercive, controlling violence or behaviour that causes someone to fear for their safety’, noting the significant net-widening effects of such an approach. He submitted that family violence should be defined as

---

147 For example, Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010.
violent or threatening behaviour or any other form of behaviour, including sexual, economic or psychological abuse, which has the purpose of coercing, controlling or subjugating a family member or causing that family member to be fearful, or which is reasonable likely to have these consequences.

5.76 The importance of context was also emphasised by Professor Patricia Easteal, who noted that:

Any one ‘incident’ is in actuality just a small part of a complex pattern of control and cannot be adequately understood nor its gravity measured in isolation from that background. At the centre is disempowerment and degradation.

Need for a definition of family violence in NSW family violence legislation

5.77 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) should be amended to include a definition of ‘domestic violence’ in addition to the current definition of ‘domestic violence offence’. This proposal received widespread support.

5.78 For example, Legal Aid NSW submitted that:

A single definition of domestic violence should be included in the Act. There are currently numerous definitions of domestic or family violence in various pieces of legislation in NSW but no comprehensive definition in the core legislative framework for domestic violence, the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW).

5.79 The Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network Inc (WDVCAS Network) also expressed the view that there was a need for a ‘single definition of domestic and family violence [to] form a core part of the legislative framework for addressing family violence’. Both Legal Aid NSW and WDVCAS Network also supported a definition that recognises the gendered nature of family violence.

150 P Parkinson, Submission FV 104, 5 June 2010
151 P Easteal, Submission FV 37, 12 May 2010.
152 Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–2.
153 For example, Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; NSW Women’s Refuge Movement Working Party Inc, Submission FV 188, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 177, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 92, 3 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010 C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 68, 1 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
154 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
156 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

5.80 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service, in supporting the proposal, stated:

The current framing of family violence/personal violence in the NSW legislation is unwieldy to use in terms of being best placed to advise and define domestic violence and family violence. Reference only to offences can create a view in policing that domestic violence and family violence is only actionable where there is likely to be a police charge and it does not create a clear context for victims to be able to rely on police/court assistance in cases of threatening/coercive/controlling behaviour in the absence of assaults. A definition of domestic violence/family violence in the Act would assist this to change.157

5.81 A few stakeholders submitted that the NSW definition should use the terminology of ‘family violence’, for example, to be consistent with the terminology of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).158

5.82 One stakeholder—the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse—thought the proposal was unnecessary ‘given that the NSW test for orders does not require a definition’.159

Types of potentially relevant conduct

5.83 The discussion below canvasses stakeholder views on whether a range of behaviours is appropriate to include in the definition of family violence.

Sexual assault

5.84 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence laws should expressly recognise sexual assault in the definition of family violence.160

5.85 This proposal received overwhelming support,161 with stakeholders submitting that:

---

158 For example, A Harland, Submission FV 80, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
159 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
• a large proportion of women experiencing family violence experience sexual assault as part of that violence, yet casework experience suggests that many sexual assaults in intimate relationships go unreported, even where other forms of family violence are reported;

• there appears to be a lot of unreported sexual assault that occurs in remote communities;

• many victims do not recognise sexual assault by partners in the context of a domestic relationship as criminal or family violence, nor do police;

• because sexual behaviour in an intimate relationship is ‘normal’, it may reduce the likelihood that third parties, including police officers and judicial officers, question the appropriateness of the behaviour;

• sexual control and domination provides a veil of secrecy because the victim may not want to speak openly and freely about the parties’ sexual behaviour;

• such a provision would assist in ‘shifting unhelpful social attitudes and myths around intimate partner sexual assault’ as ‘[u]nwillig submission to sexual demands in marriage is still viewed in many parts of society as part and parcel of a marriage relationship’; and

• expressly recognising sexual assault as family violence may encourage reporting and lead to an increase, for example, in specific sexual assault support for victims.

5.86 In particular:

• the Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian expressly supported the proposition that the Queensland family violence legislation be amended to recognise sexual assault, and

162 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
163 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010. See also Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
166 Gosnells Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 56, 31 May 2010.
167 Ibid. See also Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

- Gosnells Community Legal Centre Inc expressly supported the proposition that the Western Australian family violence legislation be amended to recognise sexual assault to avoid any ambiguity for police officers, the judiciary and legal practitioners; and
- The Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) agreed that the ACT family violence legislation should include specific reference to sexual assault in the definition of family violence.

5.87 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) supported the proposal but noted that:

unless there are practical systems in place to back up the legislation, the legislation itself is not going to improve results for victims of sexual assault.

5.88 One stakeholder submitted that it was unnecessary to include sexual assault in the definition because it has long been recognised as a violent act by the courts.

5.89 Some stakeholders submitted that the definition also needs to recognise sexual grooming behaviour.

Economic abuse

5.90 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should expressly recognise economic abuse in the definition of family violence. This proposal received overwhelming support—including from groups representing the interests of Indigenous persons and those with a disability—although a few stakeholders expressed dissent. Stakeholders who expressed support submitted, for example, that economic abuse:

172  Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FY 124, 18 June 2010.
173  Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FY 236, 20 July 2010.
175  T Searle, Submission FY 108, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 96, 2 June 2010.
176  Consultation Paper, Proposal 4-4.
177  For example, Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FY 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FY 232, 15 July 2010; Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FY 221, 15 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FY 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FY 212, 28 June 2010; Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FY 211, 25 June 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FY 196, 26 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FY 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FY 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FY 182, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FY 173, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FY 172, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FY 146, 24 June 2010; Disability Services Commission (WA), Submission FY 138, 23 June 2010; Victorian Government, Submission FY 120, 15 June 2010; Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FY 111, 9 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 92, 3 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FY 90, 3 June 2010; A Harland, Submission FY 80, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FY 70, 2 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FY 63, 1 June 2010; Gosnells Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission FY 56, 31 May 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FY 46, 24 May 2010; M Condon, Submission FY 45, 18 May 2010.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

is commonly used as a method of power and control within a family violence context, and has very serious impacts, including social isolation; 178 makes it very difficult for victims to leave abusive relationships because they are not able to access the funds needed to do so; 179 is often part of other abuse—such as sexual assault, where sexual services are demanded in return for household money; 180 is a common indicator of elder abuse; 181

may have an increased impact on people with a disability who may be vulnerable to economic exploitation, intimidation and abuse from carers, partners and other family members, 182 due to their dependence, having impaired decision-making capacity, and their not being afforded sufficient control of their finances by family members, proxies, or service systems; 183 is not adequately addressed in the family violence legislation of Western Australia, which fails to protect victims of such abuse, although in that state it is accepted amongst family violence case workers and service providers that economic abuse constitutes family violence, reflected in publications and information provided to victims; 184 should be included in the definition of family violence on the proviso that repeated, ongoing or persistent behaviour is required to be proved because ‘economic harm is unlikely to occur as a result of a single or occasional event’; 185 and may be difficult to prove—for example, one point in issue from the Tasmanian experience is the extent to which it is reasonable to control a family member in certain ways, such as circumstances where one party takes control of the finances because the other party is a problem gambler or suffers from a mental illness or disability. 186

5.91 A particular example of economic abuse in Indigenous communities in the Northern Territory was brought to the Commissions’ attention, namely ‘humbugging’—the practice of demanding money from relatives, often by the use of standover tactics. For example, one Indigenous family violence service submitted:

178 For example, Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
179 Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010. A similar view was expressed by a victim of family violence: Confidential, Submission FV 34, 6 May 2010.
183 Julia Farr Association, Submission FV 103, 4 June 2010.
184 Gosnells Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 36, 31 May 2010.
185 T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010.
186 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. Potential difficulties in enforcement were also noted in Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010.
The Service receives many reports of women being made to give their money to their partners and other family members to buy alcohol and/or drugs (marijuana), and often with violence against the woman resulting from the consumption of the alcohol and/or drugs.

Economic abuse has also resulted in many of the ‘failure to thrive’ cases for children living in remote communities, which can then lead to children being removed by child protection authorities. ¹⁸⁷

5.92 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria noted that, in their experience, it is rare for applicants for protection orders to rely on economic abuse alone—it is more often referred to in applications in association with other forms of controlling and coercive behaviour.¹⁸⁸ Those courts were unaware of any charges relating to breach of a protection order based on economic abuse alone.¹⁸⁹

5.93 Women’s Legal Service Victoria noted the following case which involved economic abuse together with other forms of abuse:

In one instance, the inclusion of economic abuse was extremely relevant because the verbal, emotional and psychological abuse was heightened by the economic abuse. The protected persons were a mother and her disabled son, who were living in absolute squalor while the respondent father used all the family’s Centrelink payments for his ongoing addiction to drugs and alcohol. Having legislation that expressly recognised economic abuse, assisted the Magistrate to address the economic abuse. A notation was made in the order indicating that the respondent agreed to open a bank account for the protected person and to deposit a fortnightly specified amount for food and the maintenance of the home.¹⁹⁰

5.94 The Commissions heard that protection orders have been obtained in the Northern Territory based on ‘humbugging’.¹⁹¹ Further, the Queensland Law Society submitted that, although the family violence legislation of Queensland does not refer expressly to economic abuse in its definition of family violence, it is possible to obtain protection orders for economic abuse on the basis that such conduct constitutes ‘harassment’ or ‘intimidation’. It expressed the view, however, that in the reference to ‘harassment’ and ‘intimidation’ it would be useful to have an example which includes economic abuse so that it highlights specifically for police and magistrates that economic abuse is and can be an example of harassment or intimidation.¹⁹²

¹⁸⁸ Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. A similar statement was expressed in Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010.
¹⁸⁹ Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
A few stakeholders opposed the proposal on the basis that it would:

- ‘increase the criminalisation of Aboriginal people and would not serve the fundamental objective of addressing family violence’; and
- broaden the scope for protection orders to be obtained for conduct not known or proscribed by the criminal law.

The Law Society of NSW also opposed the proposal on the basis that it would be difficult to prove:

especially where the parties simply have different spending habits and attitudes towards saving and lifestyle. Economic abuse could be covered by intimidation if it can be proved to be used in an unacceptable controlling way. Otherwise the legislation is taking on the task of scrutinising and possibly criminalising the frugality of one party to a relationship.

Parkinson opposed the inclusion of economic abuse as a discrete category of family violence outside of a context of coercive, controlling behaviour or behaviour that causes someone to fear for his or her safety.

Emotional or psychological abuse

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that emotional or psychological abuse or intimidation or harassment should be recognised in the definition of family violence. As outlined above, the Commissions’ general proposal about attaining a common understanding of the definition of family violence including specified non-physical violence received overwhelming support.

Use of examples

In addition, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should include specific examples of emotional or psychological abuse or intimidation or harassment that illustrate acts of violence against certain vulnerable groups including: Indigenous persons; those from a culturally and linguistically diverse background; the aged; and those from gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities. The Consultation Paper noted that instructive models of such examples were included in the family violence legislation of Victoria and South Australia.

---

196 P Parkinson, Submission FV 104, 5 June 2010.
197 Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–1, referring to conduct the subject of Proposal 4–5.
5.100 This proposal received strong support,¹⁹⁹ although a few stakeholders expressed dissent.²⁰⁰

Support for the proposal

5.101 Stakeholders that supported the proposal submitted, for example, that the inclusion of specific examples:

- could possibly assist in achieving more consistent responses from the justice system in relation to family violence;²⁰¹
- provides clarity²⁰² and ‘an opportunity to expand the applicability of laws to disadvantaged groups whose experiences would otherwise be outside the realm of understanding of judicial officers’;²⁰³
- raises awareness of violence against disadvantaged groups and serves an important educative function;²⁰⁴
- would give police confidence that protection orders are appropriate in circumstances where there is not a physical altercation;²⁰⁵ and
- allows for ‘sensitivity and accommodation of the specific circumstances of women in Indigenous communities and from other social groups’.²⁰⁶ In particular, some stakeholders noted that threats to commit suicide are used by Indigenous persons who use violence as a form of coercion and control to stop victims from taking action against them.²⁰⁷

---

²⁰¹ For example, Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.

²⁰² For example, Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.

5.102 The educative role of such examples was also considered important. The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria stated that the inclusion of specific examples has been very useful to magistrates in explaining to parties the range of behaviours that may constitute family violence. It has also been helpful to those interpreting legislation such as police, lawyers and court staff.208

5.103 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others submitted that:

In our experience it has been especially important to spell out in the legislation examples of family violence that impact particularly on victims from Indigenous, CALD and/or LGBTI communities, as well as on those who are aged or live with a disability, because despite the fact that these groups often suffer higher rates of violence than the rest of the population, violence that takes an emotional or psychological form is not commonly understood to fall under the legal definition of family violence, and therefore victims of such violence are under-served in policy and practice …

Embedding acknowledgment of social context in legislation and policy has also assisted the development of a risk assessment framework used by service agencies. For example, in the two-week March 2009 period, police identified harm, … threats or attempts by the perpetrator to commit suicide in 27 incidents (3%).209

5.104 ACON strongly supported the proposal, noting the unique aspects of same-sex violence, such as the ‘use of societal homophobia as a tool of control’ and the barriers of access to health and legal services due to fears of homophobia and breaches of confidentiality.

Recognising these unique aspects in legislation … would enable a more socially inclusive sector so that clients who are from same-sex couple families can access the same services and legal protections that the broader community has access to.210

5.105 The Inner City Legal Centre submitted that issues concerning intersex communities should also be addressed. It agreed that listing specific examples of abuse would serve an educative function but cautioned that it could also limit the understanding of family violence for victims and service providers by excluding behaviours that ‘are less understood or less overt’. It urged that any examples to be included be developed in consultation with key stakeholders in the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities.211

208  Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. See also Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010.

210  ACON, Submission FV 119, 15 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.

211  Inner City Legal Centre and The Safe Relationships Project, Submission FV 192, 25 June 2010. National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010 also stated that members of vulnerable groups referred to should be consulted in relation to the appropriateness of the examples selected.
5.106 The Disability Services Commission (Western Australia) submitted that it would support the inclusion of examples of abuse particularly relevant to people with disability:212

It is the view of the Disability Services Commission that the definition of emotional or psychological abuse in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) does not recognise the particular forms of emotional abuse commonly experienced by people with disability and that the examples given in the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) are too limited.

The Disability Services Commission supports the inclusion of the examples given in the consultation summary document as relevant to aged people or people with disability: ‘threatening to: institutionalise a person; withdraw care on which the person is dependent; withhold medication or prevent the person accessing medical equipment or treatment’. However, the term ‘prevent the person accessing medical equipment’ is not sufficiently inclusive to take account of the abuses commonly experienced by victims with disability. In addition to these examples the Disability Services Commission suggests including ‘prevent the person accessing aids and equipment used in the person’s daily life’.213 the evidence is incontrovertible that male victims of family violence face unique problems, just like other vulnerable groups. If specific vulnerable groups are to be detailed in legislation, male victims of family violence must surely be added as one of these groups.214

5.107 The One in Three Campaign noted the experience of men in its submission:

5.108 The Queensland Law Society submitted that there was no question that ‘harassment’ and ‘intimidation’ in the Queensland family violence legislation already included emotional or psychological abuse.215

Opposition to the proposal

5.109 Stakeholders that opposed the proposal expressed the view that:

- the legislation should apply to everyone and that specific groups should not be identified;216
- specific examples ‘give little guidance to magistrates and judges dealing with the vast majority of intimate relationships in which allegations of psychological abuse may occur which do not involve indigenous families, closet gay partners, mixed race partners who are subject to racial taunts, elderly couples, where one is dependent on the other to provide medication, or others covered by these examples’;217

212 A similar view was expressed in Julia Farr Association, Submission FV 103, 4 June 2010.
216 Confidential, Submission FV 68, 1 June 2010.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- including ‘offensive’ behaviour within the definition of family violence, as is the case in Victoria and the ACT, is problematic;\textsuperscript{218}
- the examples given did not constitute family violence—for example, the Law Society of NSW submitted that examples of repeated derogatory taunts, including racial taunts essentially amounted to ‘bad manners’, not family violence; and that threatening to disclose a person’s sexual orientation against the person’s wishes is not family violence, although it may possibly amount to defamatory conduct if the disclosure is untrue.\textsuperscript{219}

5.110 A concern was expressed that the risk in including specific examples of emotional and psychological abuse in the legislation is that it will be used as defining ‘violence’ and as a criterion to be proved in order to obtain a protection order.\textsuperscript{220} For example, the Queensland Government noted that some of the feedback received in the review of the Queensland family violence legislation ‘has suggested that the use of examples in legislation can operate to restrict the application and interpretation of the broader definition’.\textsuperscript{221} Other stakeholders submitted however that this was not an issue of which they were aware. For example, the Queensland Law Society said that ‘it has not come to the attention of the [Society] that examples included in legislation are being used as anything other than as examples’.\textsuperscript{222}

5.111 Many stakeholders supported the proposal on the basis that legislation made it clear that such examples are illustrative, not exhaustive.\textsuperscript{223} Another stakeholder submitted that:

Care must be taken in providing illustrative examples of acts of violence against certain vulnerable groups. Such examples must be provided in general terms and not reference back to that particular disadvantaged group so as to avoid the risk of stereotyping. For example, coercing a person to claim social security payments may occur more so in a particular vulnerable group, however such an example must be made in general terms without reference back to that vulnerable group.\textsuperscript{224}

5.112 One stakeholder supported the proposal on the basis that the inclusion of persons from vulnerable groups includes both males and females.\textsuperscript{225}

\textsuperscript{218} Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; P Parkinson, Submission FV 104, 5 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{219} Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{220} Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010. A similar concern was expressed in Women’s Legal Service Brisbane, Submission FV 223, 2 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{221} Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{222} Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010. See also Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010, which stated that it did not have any examples of judicial officers and lawyers treating examples as exhaustive; and Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{223} For example, FV 232, Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010; Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{224} Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{225} T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

5.113 While not commenting specifically on this proposal, the Australian Society of Social Workers submitted that a definition of family violence should include consideration of digital abuse or digital harassment, which it said was an extension of verbal and/or emotional abuse transmitted via emails, instant messaging, mobile phone, voicemails, texts, ‘sexts’, [nude or sexually suggestive pictures sent via mobile phone or online] or social networking websites.226

5.114 It submitted that such ‘abuse by technology’ was particularly common among young people in relationships.227

Appropriate use of emotional or psychological abuse category

5.115 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the definition of family violence in state and territory family violence legislation should not require a person to prove emotional or psychological harm in respect of conduct, which by its nature could be pursued criminally—such as sexual assault.228

5.116 This proposal received very strong support.229 In addition to supporting the reasons set out in the Consultation Paper,230 other reasons advanced included: the difficulty in providing evidence of emotional or psychological abuse;231 that requiring this to be proved in the circumstances amounted to ‘systemic abuse’;232 that it was unnecessary;233 illogical;234 and that sexual assault constituted the most intimate abuse of an individual’s dignity, having an indisputable traumatic effect that should not have to be proved.235

226  The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010.
227  Ibid.
228  Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–6.
231  Confidential, Submission FV 68, 1 June 2010.
232  Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010.
234  Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
5.117 Submissions and consultations also noted the cultural and linguistic problems which arise in discussing emotional and psychological injury with Indigenous persons.236 One Indigenous family violence service, for example, submitted that:

It is the Service’s experience that Aboriginal women in remote communities do not seek or have access to psychologists/counsellors after a sexual assault. Further, Aboriginal women can have different coping mechanisms when dealing with sexual assault and may not want to speak to a psychologist/counsellor about what has happened to them.

Sexual assault is often not reported straight after it happens, especially for women living remotely, making it harder to link emotional harm to that incident.

Often our clients are in relationships perpetuated by constant violence and assault, so that it may be the case that a particular incidence of sexual assault may not result in provable emotional or psychological harm; however, this should not mean that the sexual assault is not abuse or that it is a less serious assault.237

5.118 The Queensland Law Society also submitted that:

for a person deprived of his or her liberty to have to prove emotional or psychological harm would appear to be burdensome, unnecessary, and might deter those from seeking protection when they might otherwise be entitled to it.238

5.119 In its submission, National Legal Aid expressed the opinion that the family violence legislation of South Australia is not likely to make it difficult for victims of sexual assault to obtain protection orders.239

Kidnapping or deprivation of liberty

5.120 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the family violence legislation of Queensland and the Northern Territory should be amended to recognise kidnapping or deprivation of liberty expressly as a form of family violence.240

5.121 This proposal received widespread support, including from victims who recounted personal stories of having been kidnapped by their partners or of being detained for hours while being physically and emotionally abused and having the telephone removed from them.241 One Indigenous family violence service submitted that it

---

236 For example, Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit and Central Australian Women’s Legal Service, Consultation, Alice Springs, 28 May 2010.

239 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. As noted above, Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 8(4)(a) includes sexual assault as an example of conduct that could result in emotional or psychological harm.

receives reports from women saying that they are unable to leave the house or reports that a woman has been forced to travel to another community by her current or ex-partner and it needs to be clear that this is a form of family violence with serious consequences.

5.122 Both the Queensland Law Society and National Legal Aid submitted that, while not referring specifically to kidnapping or deprivation of liberty, the definition of family violence in the Queensland family violence legislation already captured conduct of this kind by including conduct that constituted harassment or intimidation. However, the Queensland Law Society submitted that it would support the Commissions’ view that the definition of ‘domestic violence’ in the Queensland Act should specifically refer to kidnapping and deprivation of liberty.

5.123 Women’s Legal Service Queensland and the Queensland Government also expressed the view that the existing definition was broad enough to capture kidnapping. However, Women’s Legal Service Queensland did not disagree with the Commissions’ proposal, and the Queensland Government noted that the proposal will be considered in the review of the Queensland family violence legislation.

5.124 National Legal Aid expressed the view that kidnapping or deprivation of liberty would be considered to be family violence under ss 5 and 6 of the Northern Territory family violence legislation, but that ‘the proposed amendment would provide clarification and was supported’.

5.125 Other stakeholders that supported the proposal submitted that:

- depriving a victim of liberty was an integral form of control;
- there is a high incidence of unlawful imprisonment of partners and children by the use of threats and intimidation; and
- many women are kept prisoners in their homes during prolonged incidences of family violence and some women are not allowed out of the house to shop, work or interact with others.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

5.126 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the family violence legislation of Tasmania should be amended to recognise damage to property and threats to commit such damage as a form of family violence. 250

5.127 This proposal was supported by the great majority of stakeholders that addressed it, 251 including a number of legal service providers; 252 services providing accommodation for family violence victims; 253 and victims who recounted personal stories about extensive damage to property, including damage committed in front of children, as well as damage occasioned to their cars—such as the cutting of tyre valves. 254

5.128 For example, stakeholders stated that damage to property is an example of violent coercive behaviour; 255 that it is harmful behaviour that is used to inflict fear; 256 and is used as a standover tactic. 257 The Queensland Law Society supported the inclusion of damage to property in the definition of family violence:

- That recognition has been in the Queensland legislation since its inception. It is recognition of the use of violence towards property in relationships where one party might, for example:
  - punch or kick a hole in the wall;
  - throw a phone smashing it, preventing the other party from telephoning the police for safety;
  - hit a car;
  - poison plants;
  - smash a windscreen;
  - kick the family pet. 258

5.129 However, the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that:

In relation to damage to property and threats to damage property, the reason why this is not included in the definition of family violence in the Tasmanian legislation is that

---

251 For example, National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; J Stubb, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 37, 12 May 2010.
252 For example, Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 92, 3 June 2010.
253 For example, Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 89, 3 June 2010.
254 For example, Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010.
255 Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010
256 F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010.
257 Confidential, Submission FV 89, 3 June 2010.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

it is adequately covered by the inclusion of threats in [s] 7(a)(ii) and emotional abuse or intimidation in [s] 7(b)(ii).

Emotional abuse or intimidation, defined in [s] 9, includes a course of conduct that a person knows is likely to have the effect of unreasonably controlling or intimidating or causing mental harm, apprehension or fear in his or her spouse or partner. Obviously, damaging property, including jointly-owned property and property that belongs to someone other than the victim, is sufficient to fall within this definition.

It is noted that this definition circumvents the common problem identified with other jurisdictions, in that children, pets and property to which the victim may be attached yet doesn’t own, may not be covered by that legislation.259

5.130 One stakeholder submitted that the definition should not capture damage to property inflicted by the owner of that property.260

Injury to animals

5.131 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the family violence legislation of NSW, Queensland, Western Australia, and Northern Territory should be amended to ensure that their definitions of family violence capture harm or injury to an animal, irrespective of whether that animal is technically the property of the victim.261

5.132 This proposal was supported by the great majority of stakeholders, including victims of family violence who recounted personal stories of having pets threatened, stolen and tortured; and legal service providers who reported cases of violence against pets as a form of violence against their clients.262 For example, one legal service provider recounted an incident of a dog having its throat slit in front of a victim after she refused to have sex with her partner;263 and another stated that victims have wanted to withdraw applications for protection orders because of the fear that pets would be harmed.264

259 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
260 Confidential, Submission FV 152, 24 June 2010.
263 Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.
5.133 Stakeholders submitted that:

- animal abuse is closely linked to family violence;\(^{265}\)
- threats against animals is a very common form of violence,\(^{266}\) a powerful way to maintain control over victims\(^{267}\) and, in particular, causes fear in victims that they or their children will be treated in a similar way;\(^{268}\)
- threats to harm pets and the infliction of injury to pets is a form of violent, coercive and abusive behaviour irrespective of who owns the pets, as anyone in the family can become attached to pets;\(^{269}\) and
- research connected with the RSPCA’s Safe Beds for Pets Program has indicated that a significant number of victims of family violence do not report the violence or are lured back home for fear that their animals will be harmed.\(^{270}\)

5.134 Toni McLean, a partner violence counsellor, submitted that:

> It is appropriate to include harm to an animal in family violence legislation when the animal belongs to any member of the family or has a close association with the family, eg a wild bird which does not belong to the family but is sometimes fed by the family; or if any animal is harmed with the intent of frightening family members or conveying a threat to family members.\(^{271}\)

Such behaviour demonstrates the ability and willingness of a person to carry that act out to cause fear in family members that the act will be carried out on the animal or the family member.\(^{271}\)

5.135 In relation to the definition of family violence in the Queensland family violence legislation, the Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian submitted that:

> The definition relating to ‘wilful damage to the other person’s property’ would not capture situations where a respondent harms or kills a pet or animal which does not belong to the aggrieved, but is intended to frighten or intimidate him/her. For example, if an animal is not owned by the aggrieved, but the respondent knows that harming the animal (a stray dog or the respondent’s own pet, for example) would intimidate or cause fear in the applicant.

To ensure these types of acts are captured under the Queensland legislation, the Commission recommends that the definition be extended to include instances where a

---

\(^{265}\) Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

\(^{268}\) Confidential, Submission FV 34, 6 May 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 32, 4 May 2010.

\(^{269}\) Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010. See also T Searle, Submission FV 108, 2 June 2010.

\(^{271}\) T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework

respondent commits any act of harm or damage with an intention to intimidate or cause fear in the applicant.272

5.136 The Queensland Government stated that the issue of ownership of property in general will be considered in the review of the Queensland family violence legislation.273

5.137 However, a few stakeholders opposed the proposal on the basis that:

- animal cruelty should be dealt with by animal cruelty laws;274 and

- there are already criminal sanctions available for offences such as cruelty to animals—for example s 530 of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW)—and that there should not be a separate offence for cruelty to animals committed in the context of a domestic relationship.275

5.138 Parkinson opposed injury to animals as a discrete category of violence outside of a context of coercive, controlling violence or behaviour that causes someone to fear for their safety.276

Exposure of children to violence

5.139 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should include in the definition of family violence exposure of children to family violence as a category of violence in its own right.277

5.140 Stakeholder views on this proposal were divided between those who supported278 or ‘strongly’ supported the proposal;279 and those who expressed strong

---

274 Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010.
275 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
276 P Parkinson, Submission FV 104, 5 June 2010.
279 For example, National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010; Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission concerns or dissent— principally because of the unintended consequences which might result if it were implemented.

5.141 Reasons given in support included:

- this would ‘draw an important link to matters before the Family Court where an offender is seeking unsupervised access to children’;

- too often a violent spouse is not seen as a violent parent;

- first-hand accounts of victims of violence of the detrimental impact on their children of having been exposed to violence;

- there is evidence that children who experience and are exposed to family violence are far more likely to use violence or become victims in the future;

- exposing children to violence amounts to emotional abuse;

- the inclusion of exposure of children to violence in the definition of family violence in Victoria ‘assists the court to focus on the safety of children in violent relationships both in terms of their physical safety but also their psychological well-being’ and the examples in the Act are useful in addressing the misconception that children are not affected by violence if they are not physically present on each occasion when it occurs; and

- there is a ‘significant chance that some parents will reconsider their behaviour once they understand how it impacts on their children’.

5.142 The use of the terminology of ‘being exposed to’ violence, as opposed to ‘witnessing’ violence was also specifically supported.

5.143 The Queensland Law Society stated in its submission that:

Regrettably, some magistrates have been reluctant to include children on protection orders even when, for example, the father punched the mother in the face whilst she was holding the baby.

Children are the most vulnerable members of society and there ought to be the most stringent measures put in place to ensure their protection.

---

281 Canberra Rape Crisis Centre, Submission FV 172, 25 June 2010. A similar view was expressed in Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 92, 3 June 2010.

283 Confidential, Submission FV 160, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010.

284 Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010. The issue of intergenerational violence was also raised in Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010.

285 Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.

286 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

288 For example, Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
There are [two] views though as to whether provisions that require the Magistrate, where it has been found that there has been family violence and a protection order is to be made, to automatically include a standard order requiring the perpetrator of violence not to commit acts of domestic violence to the children and to be of good behaviour towards them, would achieve these ends or whether there would be even greater resistance to the making of violence orders in the first place. There does appear to be a need to better educate Magistrates and Family Law Court Judicial Officers as to how violence within the household impacts on children and why orders might contain some better safeguards for children.289

5.144 The Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia) generally agreed with the proposal and also submitted that children should have the right to fair representation in appropriate cases.290

5.145 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed an interest in hearing views about whether such a proposal would have negative effects for mothers who are victims of family violence and are held accountable for not protecting children from violence at a time when they are under intense pressure.291 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service, in supporting the proposal, noted the negative consequences for women in a child protection context:

The adoption of this clause in Victoria has led to a very significant shift in the way Courts view family violence with respect to children. In our experience it has made it significantly more common for Courts to make protection orders to protect children from abusive parents and create a safer environment within which to start family law proceedings/negotiations. However, it has also raised issues … where women who are victims of family violence have been then required to prove to child protection authorities that their victimisation does not harm their children.

… For many Koori women the results have been that they are held accountable for violent action of their partners and experience negative consequences via child protection involvement and child removal despite having taken all legal measures to ensure safety (e.g. called police, got an intervention order, separated from partner). It is critical that culturally appropriate services such as the FVPLS program are available to assist where child protection investigation follows … FVPLS Victoria is also urging a review of the manner in which DHS child protection approaches family violence—the punitive as opposed to supportive attitude toward victim parents (generally mothers) is extremely problematic and results in outcomes not in the child’s best interests. Detailed family violence training for DHS child protection workers is needed.292

5.146 Many stakeholders expressed support on the proviso that persons who use violence are made accountable for their violence and not the parent victims, on the basis of their failing to keep the children safe. For example, Women’s Legal Service Queensland submitted that ‘best practice guidelines [should be] developed and implemented to ensure priority is on protection of all victims and risk of mother blaming is minimised’. Family Relationship Services Australia, while strongly endorsing the Commissions’ preliminary views on this issue, submitted that ‘provisions need to avoid any implication that a parent who is the victim of violence could be held responsible for failing to protect children from the violence of the other parent’.

290 Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
291 Consultation Paper, [4.83].
292 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010. Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 26 June 2010 supported the proposal in principle but also expressed similar concerns, citing statistics from Community Services NSW (now part of the Department of Human Services) that show that 30% of children in out-of-home care were identified as Aboriginal.

5.147 Other stakeholders expressed reservations or opposition to the proposal principally because of current child protection practices in focusing on mothers to protect their children from violence or face their actual or threatened removal. For example, the National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, while supporting the intent of the proposal, expressed concern that an unintended consequence could be the ‘criminalising of women for failing to protect their children ‘although there is systemic failure to protect and support women’.

5.148 The Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, while acknowledging the importance of courts dealing with exposure of children to family violence, expressed the following reservations about this being a category of violence in its own right:

- there would be no additional benefit from listing it as a separate category of violence as the act of family violence that a child is exposed to would itself be grounds to apply for a protection order and would have to be established in any event to determine whether or not a child was exposed to it;
- it puts specific focus on children being harmed as a result of a parent being unable to protect them from exposure to such harm, which may increase the reluctance of women from reporting family violence for fear of child protection intervention; and
- it may put undue pressure on children and young people and draw them into the court proceedings, particularly if this ground is solely relied upon by an applicant when seeking a protection order.

5.149 The Queensland Commission expressed the view that children being exposed to family violence should be an express legislative factor the courts must take into account when deciding what protection orders and conditions to make. Wangmann suggested that the negative impact of violence on children could be recognised in other 293 For example, Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.

295 Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010.
296 For example, National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; J Wangmann, Submission FV 170, 25 June 2010.
299 Ibid.
5. A Common Interpretative Framework ways—such as a preamble—rather than providing for orders to be made in such circumstances:

This does not mean that there may not be appropriate circumstances when such orders should be made—and thus perhaps we should look at the ways in which a primary victim’s protection order can be extended to cover other people (children or other relatives) in appropriate circumstances.300

5.150 An Indigenous family violence service noted concern about the potential for the proposal to further victimise Indigenous women living in remote communities and subject them to blame for exposing their children to violence.301

5.151 In opposing the proposal, Professor Stubbs referred to research conducted by Bragg that concluded that the majority of family violence victims are not bad, ineffective or abusive parents, although family violence is one of a multitude of stressors that can negatively influence parenting. The research stated that many victims are supportive, nurturing parents who are able to mediate the impact of their children’s exposure to violence. In light of this, Stubbs submitted:

It is inappropriate to treat children who have been exposed to family violence as a single category. It is better to have some mechanism that encourages children to be listed as a protected party on a protection order where needed.302

5.152 Parkinson raised a drafting issue with Proposal 4–10 of the Consultation Paper, stating that it confused exposure to violence with violence itself, creating a definition which did not make sense.303

Linkage of definitions of family violence to criminal law

Linkage to state or territory criminal law

5.153 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that where state or territory family violence legislation sets out specific criminal offences that form conduct constituting family violence, there should be a policy reason for the categorisation of each such offence as a family violence offence. To this end, the Commissions proposed that the governments of NSW and the ACT should review the offences categorised as ‘domestic violence offences’ in their respective family violence legislation with a view to (a) ensuring that such categorisations are justified and appropriate; and (b) ascertaining whether or not additional offences ought to be included.304

5.154 The Commissions also proposed that, incidental to such review, s 44 of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW)—which deals with the failure to provide any wife, apprentice servant or insane person with necessary food, clothing or lodgings—should be 303 P Parkinson, Submission FV 104, 5 June 2010.

304 Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–11.
amended to ensure that its underlying philosophy and language are appropriate in a modern context.\textsuperscript{305}

5.155 There was widespread support among stakeholders for both the general and specific proposals.\textsuperscript{306} Reasons for supporting the general proposal included concern that perceptions of serious criminal offences such as murder, attempted murder and sexual assault are not linked to the family violence context in which they occur. Having such offences outlined in family violence legislation highlights that they occur in the family violence context.\textsuperscript{307}

5.156 Legal Aid NSW also submitted that ‘policy reasons need to be broadly stated to ensure that they are not used in court proceedings or as part of legislative interpretation to argue that a specific act of violence does not constitute a family violence offence’.\textsuperscript{308}

5.157 The specific proposal about amending s 44 of the \textit{Crimes Act 1900} (NSW) was supported on the basis that ‘contemporary straightforward language assists all those who deal with issues in the legislation’,\textsuperscript{309} and that the current language was ‘inherently offensive’,\textsuperscript{310} and should be gender neutral.\textsuperscript{311} In addition, the National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence submitted:

\begin{quote}
Sexual violence is rooted in concepts of patriarchy. The endorsement or retention of patriarchal attitudes in any form in legislation is unhelpful to the transformation of society away from its patriarchal traditions and assists with greater understanding and applicability in a modern context.\textsuperscript{312}
\end{quote}

5.158 The Commissions understand that the Apprehended Violence Legal Issues Coordinating Committee (NSW) is considering a request by the NSW police for an expansion of the list of offences covered by s 4 of the \textit{Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007} (NSW) to incorporate other offences which may be committed in... the context of family violence—such as break, enter and commit serious indictable offence.313

Linkage to federal criminal law

5.159 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the definition of family violence in state and territory family violence legislation should be broad enough to capture the subject of potentially relevant federal offences in the family violence context—such as sexual servitude.314

5.160 Most submissions endorsed this proposal.315 Stubbs said this proposal would mean a protection order could be made in relevant circumstances.316

5.161 The Local Court of NSW supported this proposal because, in NSW, ‘domestic violence offence’ is defined largely by reference to state criminal laws. A person’s criminal record is marked with ‘domestic violence offences’, and this has certain outcomes. Therefore:

In the interests of consistency, in the Court’s view it is important that a Commonwealth offence committed in the context of a family relationship should be clearly identifiable on a person’s criminal record as a ‘domestic violence offence’.317

5.162 The Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions (CDPP) submitted that while it was ‘conceivable that Commonwealth offences may be committed in a family violence context’, state and territory offences were more relevant. It submitted that Commonwealth grooming and procuring offences and sexual servitude offences are unlikely to be committed by an intimate partner or family member.318 But the CDPP recognised that federal offences relating to using a carriage service to make a threat or to menace, or to harass or cause offence, could be committed in the context of family violence.319 The Queensland Law Society stated that, in its view, in light of the daily experience of police and the courts, that the current legislation in Queensland adequately captures relevant federal offences in the family violence context.320

---

314 Consultation Paper, Proposal 5–1.
319 Ibid.
Commissions’ views

Gender neutrality in definition

5.163 Definitions of family violence should be gender-neutral. As any person can be a victim of family violence or use family violence, family violence legislation must be capable of operating to protect all victims of violence—whether female or male—and to prevent further commission of violence by anyone—whether female or male. However, as discussed in Chapter 7, it is appropriate and important for state and territory family violence legislation to contain a provision that explains the features and dynamics of family violence, including that while anyone can be a victim of family violence or use family violence it is predominantly committed by men.

Core definition to describe context of family violence

5.164 The Commissions note the conclusion of the AGS in Domestic Violence Laws in Australia that the family violence legislation of states and territories does not appear to be ‘substantially different’ across the jurisdictions in respect of crucial matters such as … the types of conduct that may constitute domestic violence.321

5.165 Nonetheless, the Commissions consider that there are some key differences that ought to be addressed. The Commissions agree with the following recommendation made by the United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs Division for the Advancement of Women:

*Legislation should include a comprehensive definition of domestic violence, including physical, sexual, psychological and economic violence.*322

5.166 However, the Commissions are persuaded by arguments that the definition of family violence needs to describe the context in which acts take place—rather than merely listing specific incidents of violence or abuse. The imperative to provide a contextual background in the definition of family violence is heightened by the recommended broadening of the definition to include non-physical forms of violence, particularly emotional and economic abuse.

5.167 The Commissions are of the view that family violence should be defined in state and territory family violence legislation as violent or threatening behaviour or any other form of behaviour that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful—the approach recommended by the Victorian Law Reform Commission in its 2006 Report.323 As discussed further below, the definition should then set out a non-exhaustive list of types of physical and non-physical behaviour that may fall within this definition. The Commissions note that there was strong support among stakeholders for the definition of family violence in the Victorian family

---

321 Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [1.16].
322 United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs Division for the Advancement of Women, Handbook for Legislation on Violence Against Women (2009), [3.4.2.1].
5. A Common Interpretative Framework violence legislation—which includes both physical and non-physical violence—to be used as a model.

5.168 Emphasising the coercive, controlling nature of family violence and how it engenders fear serves an important educative function, as well as a dual pragmatic function. First, it allows new behaviours—including seemingly ‘minor’ events which may have a particular significance to victims—to be included, provided that they meet this definition. As stated by one stakeholder, having a definition based on the dynamics and impact of family violence avoids the technicalities of definitions becoming obstacles to protection, especially give that a common form of family violence is the use of strategies of intimidation and symbolic actions which have specific meaning for the victims, but may appear relatively harmless to others.

5.169 Secondly, it can filter out instances of abuse committed outside the context of controlling or coercive behaviour—for example, by excluding verbal abuse committed by men or women in the course of an intimate relationship or acts of violent resistance by victims, where such abuse or resistance does not engender fear or does not form part of a pattern of controlling or coercive behaviour. To focus only on discrete incidents of violence devoid of context risks the civil protection order scheme replicating the limitations of the criminal law in responding to family violence. It further risks trivialising the meaning of family violence and having the definition being co-opted and misused in contexts to which it was never intended to apply.

Shared understanding of potentially relevant types of conduct

5.170 The Commissions note varying stakeholder views about whether the definition of family violence should be the same across state and territory family violence legislation, or merely share a common understanding of what constitutes family violence. The Commissions have taken a hybrid approach to this issue. The Commissions consider that it is desirable for the contextual core of the definition of family violence—as described above—to be consistent across state and territory jurisdictions. However, insofar as the definition should include a non-exhaustive list of examples of specific types of physical and non-physical types of conduct that may fall within the concept of family violence, the Commissions consider that it may be more pragmatic and feasible for each state and territory family violence statute to reflect a common understanding of such conduct. Examples of such conduct need not necessarily be drafted in precisely the same terms. As illustrated by the discussion of the purposes of family violence legislation and protection orders in Chapter 4, the underlying purposes of family violence legislation across the states and territories are substantially similar, so the adoption of a shared understanding of what may constitute family violence is uncontroversial.

5.171 The Commissions acknowledge that drafting a uniform definition acceptable to all states and territories may be a significant task, and that the model definition proposed in the Model Domestic Violence Laws Report was not adopted.\textsuperscript{326} The protection of victims of violence should not be compromised by achieving a consistent definition, if consistency represents the lowest common denominator. However, the Commissions consider that it is more achievable for the states and territories to agree to a consistent core definition together with a shared understanding of conduct that may meet that definition, than it is for the states and territories to agree on an entirely uniform definition. For example, in illustrating particular types of conduct that may constitute family violence, states and territories should have the flexibility to incorporate specific types of examples that accommodate local or demographic-specific issues.

---

324 See Ch 13.
325 Though the extent to which such purposes are articulated in objects clauses differ, and this is the subject of Rec 7–4.

5.172 Advocating a standard core definition, together with a shared understanding of particular conduct that may comprise family violence, across states and territories has a number of advantages. These include: playing a significant educative role in communicating with clarity what family violence is to those within the legal system, as well as the broader community; forming an important component for the development of integrated systems and responses and thereby improving seamlessness—including for service providers who assist mobile Indigenous people who move freely across communities in Western Australia, South Australia and the Northern Territory—and assisting in the recognition of protection orders across state and territory borders.

5.173 Importantly, it will also facilitate equality of treatment of victims of family violence—by ensuring that they are able to access protection order schemes to protect them from similar types of violence—irrespective of which state or territory they reside in or may flee to. It will address the unsatisfactory situation that victims of violence can only presently seek protection for certain types of violence if they live in a particular jurisdiction that recognises that violence as family violence.\textsuperscript{327}

5.174 The Commissions express views on particular family violence legislative schemes, and certain elements of the definition of family violence, below.

Need for a definition of family violence in NSW family violence legislation

5.175 The NSW family violence legislation is notable in its omission to define ‘domestic violence’—although it defines a ‘domestic violence offence’. The Commissions reiterate the view, previously expressed by the NSW Law Reform Commission, that there should be a definition of ‘domestic violence’ in the NSW family violence legislation which should include reference to psychological harm.\textsuperscript{328} It is important for the definition to capture conduct which, of itself, may not amount to a criminal offence, expanding the circumstances in which victims of violence may seek protection.

\textsuperscript{327} In Ch 6, the Commissions set out further benefits of promoting a common understanding of family violence across family violence legislation and other legislative schemes.

5.176 The Commissions note that there was considerable support for the proposal that the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 should be amended to include a definition of ‘domestic violence’ in addition to the current definition of ‘domestic violence offence’. However, the Commissions make no separate recommendation about the NSW family violence legislation in this regard. The need for that state’s legislation to contain a particular definition of family violence is now contained within the ambit of Recommendation 5–1, set out below—which sets out how all state and territory family violence legislation should define family violence, and the types of conduct that may constitute family violence.

Types of potentially relevant conduct

Sexual assault and other sexually abusive behaviour

5.177 In the Commissions’ view, sexual assault should be expressly recognised in the definitions of family violence in the family violence legislation of each state and territory. Specifically including sexual assault in the definitions may go some way to addressing the general ‘invisibility’ of sexual assault as a form of family violence, and may encourage increased reporting of sexual violence within a family violence context. It may also assist in addressing unhelpful social attitudes surrounding sexual assault in intimate partner relationships.329

5.178 The Commissions agree with the conclusions of the VLRC in this regard that:

Including sexual forms of family violence in the definition serves two main purposes. First, it makes it clear to family violence victims that they do not have to endure sexual assault, that it is not considered acceptable in our society and that legal protection is available. Secondly, it educates the community about sexual violence within family relationships and that it is unacceptable.330

5.179 In addition, the definition of family violence should include other sexually abusive behaviour—which may fall short of an assault. Including other sexually abusive behaviour has the advantage of capturing other potentially relevant behaviour—including conduct the subject of federal offences, such as sexual grooming or sexual servitude.

5.180 The definition of family violence in the family violence legislation of Western Australia should be amended as it does not expressly recognise sexual assault or other sexually abusive behaviour. The general definition of ‘domestic violence’ in s 13 of the ACT family violence legislation should also be amended to include express reference to sexual assault and sexually abusive behaviour, even though various offences of sexual assault are included in sch 1 as ‘domestic violence’ offences. Finally, the Queensland Government may wish to consider whether the current reference to ‘indecent behaviour without consent’ adequately captures sexual assault and all forms of sexually abusive behaviour—including those that may be the subject of state and federal offences.

---

329  The ‘invisibility’ of sexual assault in family violence cases is discussed in Ch 24.
Economic abuse

5.181 Economic abuse should be expressly recognised in the definitions of family violence in the family violence legislation of each state and territory. This will necessitate amendment to the family violence legislation of NSW, Queensland, and Western Australia.

5.182 The Commissions consider that particular stakeholder concerns about extending the definition to recognise economic abuse are met by the Commissions’ recommendation to place economic abuse in the context of coercive or controlling behaviour or behaviour which causes fear.

5.183 Economic abuse has particular impacts on older persons, those with a disability and Indigenous persons—particularly through the practice of ‘humbugging’. Ideally, legislation should set out examples of economic abuse. Such examples help to educate judicial officers, lawyers and those engaging with the legal system. The family violence legislation of Victoria, South Australia and the Northern Territory provide instructive models in this regard. Examples given may be tailored to meet the exigencies of local jurisdictions.

5.184 The Commissions also recommend that s 44 of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW)—a ‘domestic violence offence’ dealing with failure to provide any wife, apprentice, servant or insane person with necessary food, clothing or lodgings—should be amended to ensure that its underlying philosophy and language are appropriate in a modern context. The Commissions consider that the proposed inclusion of economic abuse in the family violence legislation of NSW may be more appropriate.

Emotional and psychological harm/abuse

5.185 The Commissions note the various formulations of emotional or psychological abuse—or conduct that ‘intimidates’ or ‘harasses’—referred to in the family violence legislation of the states and territories. While specific descriptions of this type of behaviour might vary, the Commissions consider that, at the least, the emphasis should be on a shared understanding that emotional and psychological abuse may fall within the broader proposed definition of family violence. Placing such behaviour in the context of behaviour that is threatening, coercive, controlling or engenders fear will ensure that this category of violence is not open to misuse. In particular, it will address concerns expressed by stakeholders that the inclusion of offensive conduct in the absence of such context is problematic.

5.186 While stalking can be an example of emotional or psychological abuse, the Commissions consider that, for the sake of clarity, stalking should be identified separately as behaviour which may constitute family violence. This is, in any event, consistent with the approach taken in four jurisdictions.

5.187 Use of legislative examples. The Commissions endorse the recommendation made by the VLRC that the definition of family violence ‘should be broad enough to include abuses specific to certain groups in the community'. The category of violence covering emotional or psychological abuse or intimidation is one that, in particular, is likely to have differing impacts on various groups in the community. It is therefore desirable that the family violence legislation of each state and territory include examples of such conduct that would affect diverse groups in the community. Such examples should be developed in consultation with these groups.

---

331 See Rec 5–5 below. For example, the archaic reference to ‘insane persons’ is inappropriate.

5.188 Examples of such conduct, as they affect various groups, may include:

- threatening to: institutionalise a person; withdraw care on which the person is dependent; withhold medication or prevent the person accessing necessary treatment or aids and equipment used in the person’s daily life—potentially relevant to aged persons and those with a disability or illness;

- racial taunts; and preventing a person from making or keeping connections with the person’s family, friends or culture, including cultural or spiritual ceremonies or practices—potentially relevant to migrants, Indigenous people and persons from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds; and

- threatening to disclose a person’s sexual orientation against the person’s wishes—relevant to those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities.

5.189 Highlighting such examples in legislation will serve an important educative function, and may assist in achieving more consistent responses from the justice system in response to family violence. However, the Commissions agree with the views expressed by Women’s Legal Service Victoria that, to the greatest extent possible, such examples must be provided in general terms and without reference to specified groups. For example, while threatening to withhold medication or care may occur more often in family relationships involving aged persons or those with a disability, it can also occur in any other family relationship where one person in that relationship falls ill and is dependent on the other for a period of time. Similarly, while the Commissions have heard that threats to commit suicide—as a means of coercion and control as opposed to a genuine cry for help—occur in the context of Indigenous family relationships, they can also occur more broadly.

5.190 In addition, although the Commissions make no formal recommendation in this regard, they consider that there is merit in legislation providing examples of emotional abuse committed via technological means, such as harassment in the forms of constant texting, cyber-bullying, and ‘sexting’. The South Australian family violence legislation provides potentially useful examples in this regard, including publishing or transmitting offensive material by means of the internet in such a way that the offensive material will be found by, or brought to the attention of, the person.

5.191 Family violence legislation should make it clear that examples of conduct which may constitute emotional or psychological abuse are illustrative and not exhaustive.

---

333 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 8(4)(i). See also s 8(4)(j).
Failure by judicial officers to interpret such express legislative intent is appropriately addressed by judicial and legal education.

5.192 Appropriate use of emotional or psychological abuse category. In some circumstances it will be appropriate for a person to have to establish that certain conduct constituted emotional or psychological harm. However, the definition of family violence in state and territory family violence legislation should not require a person to prove emotional or psychological harm in respect of conduct against the person which, by its nature, could be pursued criminally.

5.193 For example, the definition of ‘abuse’ in the South Australian family violence legislation focuses on either the impact of harm to a victim or the intention of the person engaging in family violence. Sexual assault is included as an example of conduct that could result in emotional or psychological harm.\(^{334}\)

5.194 The Commissions are concerned that requiring a person to prove emotional or psychological harm as the result of sexual assault adds a further evidentiary burden. In particular, cultural and linguistic problems may arise in discussing emotional and psychological injury with Indigenous persons. Proof of emotional harm following sexual assault is not necessary for a criminal prosecution—nor ought it to be to obtain a protection order. The very fact of sexual assault should fall within conduct constituting family violence, without the need to prove that such conduct had a certain effect on the victim.

5.195 The same arguments apply to depriving a person of his or her liberty, which is also cited as an example of conduct that could cause emotional or psychological harm in the South Australian legislation.\(^{335}\)

Kidnapping or deprivation of liberty

5.196 The Commissions consider that state and territory family violence legislation should include kidnapping and deprivation of liberty as examples of conduct which may constitute family violence. Depriving a person of liberty is an integral form of control. Persons may be deprived of their liberty in circumstances where they have not been kidnapped. For the sake of clarity, the definition of family violence in the family violence legislation of Queensland and the Northern Territory, in particular, should include kidnapping and deprivation of liberty.

Damage to property

5.197 In the Commissions’ view, damage to property should be expressly included as a type of conduct which may meet the broader definition of family violence. As stated in the review of the Tasmanian family violence legislation, property damage is a common feature of family violence incidents. Damage to property may be an example of violent threatening behaviour or of conduct which is used to inflict fear—but equally

\(^{334}\) Ibid s 8(4)(a).
\(^{335}\) Ibid s 8(4)(b).
there may be one-off instances of damage to property which do not fall within the broader definition of family violence because of an absence of context.

5.198 Specifically, the Commissions consider that damage to property should be included as a potential example irrespective of whether the victim owns or jointly owns the property that is damaged. For example, if a person violently smashes a chair against a wall in the presence of a spouse or child, and that conduct causes fear, it is irrelevant that the person who smashed the chair owns the chair. The South Australian family violence legislation provides a useful model in this regard, making it clear that property covers not only property that is owned by the victim but also property in his or her possession or otherwise used or enjoyed.336

5.199 The Commissions note that property damage is recognised in most Australian jurisdictions—including the Commonwealth337—as a potential form of family violence and that the Commissions’ recommendation will necessitate amendment to the family violence legislation of Tasmania.

Injury to animals

5.200 State and territory family violence legislation should include causing injury or death to an animal, such as a family pet—irrespective of whether the animal is the property of the victim—as an example of conduct which may constitute family violence. The Commissions consider that there is merit in distinguishing harm to animals from damage to property, particularly in light of research which indicates the particular impacts on victims’ behaviours arising from fear of an animal being harmed.

5.201 Causing injury or harm to an animal can either be included as an example of conduct, in itself, capable of falling within the broader definition of family violence—the Commissions’ preferred approach—or it can be included as an example of conduct which is emotionally abusive.

5.202 It appears that the family violence legislation of the following jurisdictions will need to be amended to capture harm to animals which may not technically be the property of the victim:

- NSW—its legislation does not refer to such harm, nor does it contain the category of emotional or psychological abuse, nor an expanded definition of property either in s 7—which refers to intimidation—or insofar as it picks up property offences in the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 195, which refers to property ‘belonging to another’.
- Queensland—its legislation only specifically refers to wilful damage to the other person’s property—including his or her pet—and does not contain a category of emotional or psychological abuse.338

336 Ibid s 8(2)(d).
337 Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth) reg 1.21(1). See Ch 6.
338 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11.
• Western Australia—its legislation links harm to an animal to property belonging to the victim, and although it contains a category covering emotional abuse, it requires such abuse to be ‘ongoing’.\textsuperscript{339} One or two instances of killing or injuring a family pet may not qualify as ‘ongoing’.

• Northern Territory—its legislation allows for injury or death of an animal either on the basis that it damages the victim’s property or intimidates the victim by causing reasonable apprehension of harm to his or her property.\textsuperscript{340}

5.203 The Commissions note that some stakeholders opposed the proposal in the Consultation Paper on the basis that animal cruelty should be dealt with by animal cruelty laws or that there should not be a separate offence for cruelty to animals committed in the context of a domestic relationship. However, the issue of punishing someone for cruelty to an animal is separate from that of defining the type of conduct which may constitute family violence for the purpose of obtaining a protection order to protect the person against future violence.

\textit{Exposure of children to violence}

5.204 The Commissions are of the view that family violence legislation should acknowledge the detrimental impact of family violence on children. In Chapter 7 the Commissions recommend that family violence legislation should expressly acknowledge these effects in a provision setting out the nature, features and dynamics of family violence.\textsuperscript{341}

5.205 The Commissions note that stakeholders were divided on the issue of whether exposing children to violence should be included in the definition of family violence. In particular, there was a concern about the potential negative effects of making victims of violence accountable for not protecting their children from violence.

5.206 On balance, the Commissions consider that the definition of family violence in family violence legislation should expressly acknowledge that exposing a child to the effects of family violence by using violence is itself a form of family violence and that other steps should be taken to address concerns about implementation. Practices of child protection authorities—which may focus on a punitive, as opposed to supportive approach to victim parents of family violence—should not compromise the fundamental objective to protect vulnerable children from the damaging effects of family violence.\textsuperscript{342} Rather, such concerns need to be addressed by practical measures designed to bring about cultural change in the way child protection workers deal with family violence—including detailed family violence training and changes in policies, practices and procedures. Moreover, family violence legislation should make it clear that a child is exposed to the effects of family violence by the behaviour of the person using violence and not the failure of a victim parent to protect that child from such exposure.

\textsuperscript{339} Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6.
\textsuperscript{340} Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 5(b), 6(1)(b)(ii).
\textsuperscript{341} Rec 7–2.
\textsuperscript{342} The interaction between child protection laws and family violence laws is discussed in Ch 19.
Exposure of children to family violence encompasses more than just witnessing family violence. Indeed the terminology of ‘witnessing’ may be problematic in the sense that it may have a tendency to downplay the fact that children are living with the reality of family violence. The Victorian family violence legislation provides instructive examples of behaviour that causes a child to hear or witness or otherwise be exposed to family violence, which judicial officers have stated have been useful in addressing the misconception that children are not affected by violence if they are not physically present when it occurs. These include the child comforting or providing assistance to a family member who has been physically abused by another family member, and being present when police officers attend an incident involving physical abuse of a family member by another family member.

Including this category of conduct in the definition of family violence will play an important educative role not only for judicial officers and lawyers but, as one submission suggested, for family members who care for children who may be prompted to re-evaluate their behaviour once they understand how it impacts on children. In Victoria the inclusion of this category in the definition of family violence has assisted the court to focus on the physical safety and psychological wellbeing of children. In many cases exposing children to the effects of violence will also amount to emotional and psychological abuse.

In making this recommendation, the Commissions have been persuaded by the considerable amount of research documenting the fact that exposure of children to family violence causes long-term emotional, psychological, physical and behavioural issues. The National Council’s report, Time for Action, noted that:

Children and young people exposed to sexual assault and domestic and family violence experience anger, sadness, shame, guilt, confusion, helplessness and despair. Children do not need to be physically present when violence occurs to suffer negative consequences. Living in an environment where violence occurs is extremely damaging to children and there is little difference in outcomes for children whether they see the violence or not.

Living with domestic and family violence can directly affect infants, causing negative developmental, social, emotional and behavioural consequences. At a time of rapid neurological growth, an infant’s development may be compromised by exposure to ongoing violence, whether or not they are the target of the violence. Infants may have symptoms typical of post-traumatic stress.

---

343 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5.
5.210 The research of Emma Bevan and Dr Daryl Higgins, for example, concluded that:

Physical abuse and witnessing family violence significantly predicted psychological spouse abuse and trauma symptomatology, with witnessing family violence individually predicting the two outcomes. 345

5.211 Family law judgments have also referred to the dangers of children being exposed to violence. For example, in M v M, Mullane J referred to the risk of injury and fear, as well as the risk that children will learn from the abusive behaviour and ultimately treat it as acceptable. 346 In T v N, Moore J referred to the ‘abundance of research from social scientists about the highly detrimental effect upon young children of exposure to violence and the serious consequences such experiences have for their personality formation’ and went on to catalogue such effects. 347

5.212 In addition, the Commissions note that Maurine Pyke QC’s review of South Australian domestic violence laws in 2007 identified, as an option for reform, amending the definition of family violence to include causing or allowing a child to see or hear family violence, or putting or allowing the child to be put at real risk of such exposure. 348

Linkage of definitions of family violence to criminal law

5.213 The Commissions note that family violence legislation in both NSW and the ACT sets out certain offences which are ‘domestic violence offences’. These jurisdictions will need to review the categorisation of these offences in light of the Commissions’ proposed definition of family violence. If offences are to be categorised as family violence offences, they must fall within the definition of family violence. It appears to the Commissions that there are two categories of offences in this regard—those that will always be family violence offences when committed against a family member; and those that may or may not amount to family violence, depending on the circumstances.

5.214 Many offences against the person—such as assault, sexual assault, inflicting actual bodily harm—are inherently violent and would meet the broader definition of family violence that has been proposed. Other offences against the person—including kidnapping, forcible confinement and stalking—invariably involve behaviour that is either threatening, coercive or controlling or would engender fear—and would also meet the broader definition of family violence that has been proposed.

5.215 However, there are many offences categorised as ‘domestic violence offences’ which are not essentially offences against a person and, in respect of which, it is difficult to conclude unequivocally that all commissions of such an offence ‘directed’ at a family member will amount to family violence. For example, the ACT legislation includes ‘trespass on government premises’ as a ‘domestic violence offence’. A person may trespass on government premises with a view to seeing or contacting a family member. However, it is conceivable that a person could do this outside of the context of threatening, controlling behaviour. Similarly, a person may behave in an offensive or disorderly manner while in or on government premises—a ‘domestic violence offence’ in the ACT—in circumstances where that behaviour is ‘directed’ to a family member on those premises. However, it is conceivable that the person’s behaviour—perhaps due to drunkenness or stupidity—is devoid of any elements of coercion or control.

---

5.216 A final example is the offence of negligent driving, which is a ‘domestic violence offence’ in the ACT. A person may engage in negligent driving as a way of exercising control over a family member and cause that family member to be fearful—although such behaviour if it is driven by this intent is more likely to be more than mere negligence. However, it is equally possible that a person may drive negligently while there is another family member in the car due to lapse of concentration, poor judgment, fatigue or inebriation, in the absence of threatening or coercive behaviour—and it is possible, that the passenger is not afraid because he or she is drunk or not indisposed to thrill-seeking behaviour. Equally, the passenger may be afraid of the person’s driving skills without being, in any way, afraid of the person.

5.217 For the above reasons, the Commissions consider that it is problematic to describe criminal offences that are not inherently offences against a person—such as the examples described above—as family violence offences on the somewhat contrived basis that they were committed against, or directed to, a person in a defined relationship.

5.218 Where states and territories adopt the approach of designating certain offences as family violence offences, they should also give consideration to including relevant federal offences. However, the Commissions consider that apart from specified offences against a person, it is problematic to attempt to catalogue each and every state, territory and federal offence which could potentially arise in a family violence context. Perhaps an easier way would be for family violence legislation to specify that when an offence, other than an offence against a person, is committed in a family violence context—with specific reference to the definition of family violence—then a judicial officer can classify that offence as a family violence offence.

5.219 The Commissions remain of the view expressed in the Consultation Paper that, in reviewing designated state and territory offences, state and territory governments should ascertain whether any offences require updating or amending. In particular, the language and philosophy of s 44 of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) concerning legal liability and failure to provide ‘any wife, apprentice, or servant or any insane person with necessary food, clothing, or lodging’ is archaic and should be amended.

5.220 Finally, the Commissions consider that, in light of their proposed definition of family violence which places potential behaviours in context, there is no need to make a separate recommendation that the definition of family violence in state and territory family violence legislation should be broad enough to capture conduct the subject of potentially relevant federal criminal behaviour. If such behaviour is violent or threatening, coercive or controlling or causes fear, it will fall within the definition. As noted above, the specific inclusion of sexually abusive behaviour as a category of behaviour falling within the broader definition will capture potentially relevant federal sexual offences such as sexual servitude or those relating to grooming and procuring.

Recommendation 5–1  State and territory family violence legislation should provide that family violence is violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour, that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. Such behaviour may include but is not limited to:

(a) physical violence;
(b) sexual assault and other sexually abusive behaviour;
(c) economic abuse;
(d) emotional or psychological abuse;
(e) stalking;
(f) kidnapping or deprivation of liberty;
(g) damage to property, irrespective of whether the victim owns the property;
(h) causing injury or death to an animal irrespective of whether the victim owns the animal; and
(i) behaviour by the person using violence that causes a child to be exposed to the effects of behaviour referred to in (a)–(h) above.

Recommendation 5–2  State and territory family violence legislation should include examples of emotional and psychological abuse or intimidation and harassment that illustrate conduct that would affect—although not necessarily exclusively—certain vulnerable groups including: Indigenous persons; those from a culturally and linguistically diverse background; the aged; those with a disability; and those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities. In each case, state and territory family violence legislation should make it clear that such examples are illustrative and not exhaustive of the prohibited conduct.

Recommendation 5–3  The definition of family violence in state and territory family violence legislation should not require a person to prove emotional or psychological harm in respect of conduct against the person which, by its nature, could be pursued criminally.

Recommendation 5–4  The governments of NSW and the ACT should review the offences categorised as ‘domestic violence offences’ in their respective family violence legislation with a view to:
(a) ensuring that the classification of such offences falls within the proposed definition of family violence in Rec 5–1; and

(b) considering the inclusion of relevant federal offences committed in a family violence context, if they choose to retain such a classification system.

Recommendation 5–5 Incidental to the review of ‘domestic violence offences’ referred to in Rec 5–4, s 44 of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW)—which deals with the failure to provide any wife, apprentice, servant or insane person with necessary food, clothing or lodgings—should be amended to ensure that its underlying philosophy and language are appropriate in a modern context.
6. Other Statutory Definitions of Family Violence

Contents

Introduction 249
Criminal law 250
Interaction of definitions: family violence laws and criminal laws 250
Definitions of specific acts that may constitute family violence 257
Family law 265
Definition of family violence in the Family Law Act 265
Interaction of definitions: family violence laws and the Family Law Act 267
Typologies of violence 280
Victims’ compensation 284
Migration legislation 286
Summary and effect of Commissions’ overall approach 289

Introduction

6.1 This chapter considers the meaning of family violence in legislative schemes other than family violence laws, namely the criminal law, the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), victims’ compensation legislation and migration legislation. In particular, it considers whether it is appropriate or desirable to aim for a common understanding of what constitutes family violence across the different legislative schemes under consideration in light of the underlying policy justification for each of the legislative schemes, which are discussed in Chapter 4.

6.2 An analysis of these policy considerations reveals that while policy justifications differ, in some cases different statutory regimes share common aims. A key theme is therefore balancing the need for synergies between the definition of family violence in a particular legislative scheme and the purposes of that scheme, with the benefits that could flow from the adoption of a common interpretative framework across different legislative schemes.

6.3 The appropriateness or desirability of a commonly shared understanding of family violence across various legislative schemes is also discussed in the context of the relationship between, and interactions of, definitions of family violence in family violence legislation, the criminal law, and the Family Law Act.
Criminal law

6.4 Chapter 5 discusses the extent of linkage between current definitions of family violence in family violence laws and the criminal law. The following discussion addresses interaction issues between the definitions or terminology in family violence laws and criminal laws:

- in the limited circumstances where criminal laws define ‘family violence’; and
- where each law defines a particular type of conduct that may constitute family violence, such as stalking or assault.

Interaction of definitions: family violence laws and criminal laws

6.5 There are limited examples of definitions of ‘family violence’ or ‘domestic violence’ in the criminal laws of Australia. One area where the criminal law has defined ‘family violence’ is in the context of defences to homicide. 1 This is the case under the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) and the Criminal Code (Qld). 2 A consideration of this legislation raises the broader question of how family violence should be defined where it is referred to expressly in criminal law provisions.

Victorian criminal legislation

6.6 Section 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) confirms the potential relevance of evidence of family violence to cases of murder, 3 defensive homicide 4 and manslaughter. 5 It does not operate as a separate defence in itself, but provides that evidence of family violence may be relevant in the context of homicide defences—including self-defence and duress. 6 The section provides guidance about particular facts in issue to which evidence of family violence may be relevant, and the types of evidence that may be relevant. 7

6.7 ‘Violence’ is defined more narrowly in s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 than it is under the family violence legislation. In the Crimes Act, it is defined to include physical abuse, sexual abuse, psychological abuse—including intimidation, harassment, damage to property, and certain threats—and causing a child to see or hear certain types of abuse, or putting a child at real risk of seeing or hearing that abuse. It is narrower than the definition of violence in the family violence legislation, as it does not include economic abuse or the more general category of behaviour that in any other

---

1 The issue of whether family violence should be a defence to homicide is discussed in Ch 14.
2 Both Acts provide that a number of acts of violence may meet the threshold of the relevant definition even though some or all of those acts when viewed in isolation may appear to be minor or trivial: Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 9AH(5); Criminal Code (Qld) s 304B(4).
3 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 9AC.
4 Ibid s 9AD.
5 Ibid s 9AE.
6 Ibid s 9AE(2).
7 Section 9AH is discussed in detail in Ch 14.
way controls or dominates the person and causes the person to feel fear for his or her or a family member’s safety or wellbeing.\(^8\)

6.8 The definition of family violence adopted in the Crimes Act 1958 in 2005 is the same as that in New Zealand. It was introduced in response to a recommendation made by the Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) in its report on defences to homicide in 2004.\(^9\) In a later report in 2006, the VLRC recommended that the definition should include economic abuse.\(^10\) This led to the inclusion of a broad definition of family violence in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), following amendments to the Crimes Act 1958. Therefore, while the definition in the Crimes Act is narrower, this is a result of timing rather than a deliberate intention to introduce a definition of family violence that is more limited than that in Victoria’s family violence legislation.\(^11\)

Queensland criminal legislation

6.9 During the course of this Inquiry, Queensland introduced the Criminal Code (Abusive Domestic Relationship Defence and Another Matter) Amendment Act 2010 (Qld), which commenced on 16 February 2010. The Act amends the Criminal Code (Qld) to insert a new partial defence to murder—‘killing in an abusive domestic relationship’.\(^12\)

6.10 The provision is discussed in detail in Chapter 14. For present purposes, it is sufficient to note that the defence applies where the deceased had committed ‘serious acts of domestic violence’ against the accused person in the course of an ‘abusive domestic relationship’. As the term ‘domestic violence’ is defined by reference to the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld),\(^13\) the term has the same meaning under civil and criminal legislation.\(^14\)

6.11 The distinguishing factor in the criminal legislation is the requirement for the relevant acts of ‘domestic violence’ to be ‘serious’ in order for the defence to apply. The Queensland Attorney-General, the Hon Cameron Dick, stated in the Second

---

8 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5.
11 At the time, Victoria’s family violence legislation was the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987, which did not contain a definition of family violence. The VLRC in its report on defences to homicide stated that it had chosen to adopt as a model for the definition of family violence the definition used in the Domestic Violence Act 1995 (NZ), which had received some support in consultations on its inquiry into family violence: Victorian Law Reform Commission, Defences to Homicide: Final Report (2004), 334–335.
12 Criminal Code (Qld) s 304B.
13 Criminal Code (Qld) s 304B(2)(b).
14 As noted in Ch 5, ‘domestic violence’ is defined in the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11 as any of the following acts committed against another person, if a domestic relationship exists between the two persons: wilful injury; wilful damage to the other person’s property; intimidation or harassment; indecent behaviour towards the other person without consent; and threatening to commit any of these acts.
Reading Speech that the term ‘serious’ has been left deliberately undefined as a matter for the jury to determine in the circumstances of individual cases.15

Submissions and consultations

6.12 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the definitions of family violence in state or territory family violence and criminal legislation—in the context of defences to homicide—should align, irrespective of whether the criminal legislation limits the availability of defences to homicide in a family violence context to cases involving ‘serious’ family violence.16

6.13 The Commissions made a second proposal in respect of definitional alignment between the Victorian criminal and family violence legislation: that the definition of family violence in s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) should be replaced with the definition of family violence in s 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). In the alternative, the Commissions proposed that the definition of family violence in s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) should be amended to include economic abuse.17

6.14 Overall, stakeholders strongly supported alignment of the definitions of family violence in civil and criminal legislation, in respect of defences to homicide. In the Victorian context, most stakeholders who commented on the form of alignment favoured the uniform application of the definition of family violence in s 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to both civil and criminal laws.

The principle of definitional alignment

6.15 The majority of stakeholders who considered the proposal supported alignment of the definitions of family violence in civil and criminal legislation, in the context of homicide defences.18 Most did not advance reasons for their positions. However,

15 Queensland, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 26 November 2009, 3669 (C Dick—Attorney-General and Minister for Industrial Relations), 3670.
several broad themes emerged from those submissions providing reasons. These stakeholders submitted that definitional alignment between civil and criminal legislation within individual states and territories would:

- facilitate a consistent understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence between civil and criminal jurisdictions and, consequently, promote a consistent legal response;\(^{19}\)
- avoid confusion where there are overlapping civil and criminal processes arising from the same conduct;\(^{20}\) and
- facilitate a nationally consistent approach to defining family violence across criminal and civil jurisdictions in all states and territories.\(^{21}\)

6.16 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, however, opposed the principle of definitional alignment, on the basis that civil and criminal laws perform different functions and are underpinned by different policy objectives which ought to be reflected in separate definitions of family violence.\(^{22}\) Two other stakeholders opposed the principle of definitional alignment without explanation.\(^{23}\)

6.17 In responding to the Commissions’ proposal for alignment of the definitions of family violence in civil and criminal legislation in the context of homicide defences—irrespective of whether the latter limits the availability of relevant homicide defences to cases involving ‘serious’ family violence—some stakeholders commented on the interpretation of the term ‘serious’. Several stakeholders emphasised that an assessment of the severity of family violence requires a thorough understanding of the dynamics of family violence and, in particular, patterns of abuse comprising both criminal and non-criminal conduct.\(^{24}\)

Definitional alignment in Victorian legislation

6.18 The majority of stakeholders commenting on the issue of definitional alignment in the Victorian context supported alignment of the definitions of family violence in the criminal and family violence legislation.\(^ {25}\) However, most submissions did not comment expressly on the preferable form of alignment—that is, whether the definition of family violence in s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) should be replaced by the definition in s 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), or whether the existing definition in the criminal legislation should be amended to incorporate economic abuse.

6.19 Of those submissions commenting on the form of alignment, the majority supported the replacement of the definition in the criminal legislation with that of the family violence legislation.26 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others commented that adding economic abuse to the Crimes Act definition would not address other inconsistencies between the definitions, including the broader definition of ‘family member’ in the family violence legislation.27 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria commented that the definition in the family violence legislation provides ‘a comprehensive and workable model’.28

Commissions’ views

Homicide defences—definitional consistency ‘in-principle’

6.20 The Commissions consider that there are two key reforms to be achieved in relation to the definition of family violence for the purposes of homicide defences. First, the Commissions consider that there is considerable merit in a jurisdiction’s family violence legislation and criminal legislation adopting a core definition of family violence, together with a shared understanding of particular conduct that may comprise family violence.29 The Commissions consider that such an approach would promote a consistent understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence between civil and criminal jurisdictions and, in turn, a consistent legal response.

6.21 Secondly, the Commissions maintain their view expressed in the Consultation Paper that, where state or territory criminal legislation recognises family violence as

---

26 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; R Smith, Submission FV 133, 22 June 2010; Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 125, 20 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 68, 1 June 2010; P Easteal and A Hopkins, Submission FV 36, 12 May 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 34, 6 May 2010.

28 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

29 The Commissions’ approach to defining family violence for the purposes of family violence legislation is the subject of Rec 5–1.
relevant to a defence to homicide, family violence should be defined in the same way that it is defined in family violence legislation.\textsuperscript{30} Taken together, these reforms achieve alignment of a revised definition of family violence in civil and criminal contexts within a jurisdiction. These matters are the subject of Recommendation 6–1 below.

6.22 The Commissions acknowledge the preference of some stakeholders for a nationally consistent approach to defining family violence across criminal and civil jurisdictions in all states and territories. As mentioned in Chapter 5, the Commissions have emphasised the need for a consistent core definition together with a shared understanding of what constitutes family violence across civil and criminal jurisdictions in all states and territories, rather than national uniformity of definitions.\textsuperscript{31} The Commissions consider, however, that there is a stronger case for uniformity of the definition of family violence across an individual state or territory’s family violence and criminal laws, than is the case across all states and territories. That is, criminal and family violence legislation should adopt—in the same terms—the core definition and common understanding of conduct that may constitute family violence outlined in Recommendation 5–1. One particular advantage of such definitional uniformity within an individual state or territory is that it would clearly convey a legislative intention for a consistent interpretation of family violence across criminal and civil jurisdictions.

6.23 In arriving at this view, the Commissions have considered whether the differing policy objectives of protection order regimes in civil laws and homicide defences in criminal laws warrant a more restrictive definition of family violence in the context of homicide defences. On balance, the Commissions consider that the different policy objectives of the relevant laws are not compromised by the adoption of a common understanding of family violence. Rather, the different policy objectives of the relevant laws may be addressed by placing emphasis, where necessary, on the seriousness of family violence in individual cases, rather than excluding categorically certain types of violence.

6.24 In the Commissions’ view, it is appropriate that the degree of severity of family violence capable of being relied upon as a defence to homicide is higher than that which may be required to obtain a protection order. For example, the partial defence of killing in an abusive domestic relationship in the \textit{Criminal Code} (Qld) s 304B makes express provision for this approach in limiting the availability of the defence to cases involving ‘serious’ family violence. Similarly, where evidence of family violence is relevant to a defence of general application, the issue of severity of violence will most likely be a matter for the trier of fact to assess in individual cases. For instance, in the context of self-defence, the issue of severity will be one of the factors considered by the jury in determining whether the accused had reasonable grounds for believing that his or her conduct was necessary for self-preservation.

\textsuperscript{31} Rec 5–1.
6.25 In this respect, the Commissions acknowledge stakeholder comments on the interpretation of the severity of family violence in individual cases. The Commissions agree that an assessment of the severity of family violence in the context of homicide defences requires an appreciation of the nature and dynamics of family violence on the part of judicial officers, juries and legal representatives. This matter is considered further in Chapter 14 on homicide defences, and in Chapter 31 on education and training.

Homicide defences—definitional consistency in Victoria

6.26 In the Commissions’ view, the Victorian family violence and criminal legislation would benefit from a consistent definitional approach to family violence—in accordance with the core definition of family violence and the inclusive list of behaviours in Recommendation 5–1. The fact that the Victorian criminal legislation has a narrower definition in its family violence legislation appears a matter of the timing of particular legislative amendments and not a deliberate policy choice for a narrower definition in the criminal law.

6.27 The Commissions consider that definitional consistency would enhance the effectiveness of the legislative guidance about the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence in s 9AH of the Crimes Act. In particular, it would expressly draw attention to the wider range of behaviours recognised in contemporary understandings of family violence. Accordingly, the Commissions consider that the definition of family violence in s 9AH of the Crimes Act should be replaced with the consistent core definition and the inclusive list of behaviours in Recommendation 5–1. That is, family violence should be defined as violent or threatening behaviour or any other form of behaviour that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. Such behaviour may include, but is not limited to, the list of behaviours contained in Recommendation 5–1(a)–(i). This matter is addressed in Recommendation 6–1 below. The combined effect of Recommendations 5–1 and 6–1 is, therefore, that s 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act should be amended to incorporate the definitional approach outlined in Recommendation 5–1, and that s 9AH of the Crimes Act should be amended to mirror s 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act as amended.

6.28 Given that the core definition of family violence in Recommendation 5–1 emphasises the context in which family violence should be defined—and the Victorian family violence legislation does not currently do so—the Commissions consider that adding ‘economic abuse’ to the current definition of s 9AH of the Crimes Act would not achieve the desired outcome. The Commissions also acknowledge stakeholder comments that adding ‘economic abuse’ to the current definition of family violence in s 9AH of the Crimes Act may not resolve inconsistencies between the definitions of ‘family member’ in family violence and criminal legislation. The Commissions address this matter separately in Chapter 14.
6. Other Statutory Definitions of Family Violence

---

Definitional consistency between family violence and criminal legislation beyond the context of homicide defences?

6.29 Homicide defences are one instance in which existing criminal laws have made express reference to family violence. The Commissions acknowledge that states and territories may, in future, enact family-violence specific provisions in their criminal legislation—for example, new offences or sentencing factors that refer expressly to family violence.

6.30 The Commissions consider the policy underlying the potential creation of new family-violence specific offences and sentencing factors in Chapter 13. In light of the Commissions’ views on the substantive policy issues articulated in that chapter, no recommendations are made in respect of future definitional consistency issues beyond the context of homicide defences. The Commissions consider that offences and sentencing may raise distinct issues about the boundaries of criminal law that may require consideration in further detail, should jurisdictions choose to pursue these options. For example, in creating a sentencing factor in respect of the commission of an offence as part of a broader course of family-violence related conduct, it would be necessary to consider whether the definition of family violence should encompass uncharged or non-criminal conduct in addition to other charged conduct. These matters are discussed further in Chapter 13.

Definitions of specific acts that may constitute family violence

6.31 As mentioned in Chapter 5, some state and territory family violence legislation incorporates certain criminal offences in their definitions of family violence. For example, the Victorian legislation provides that the definition of ‘assault’ for the purposes of family violence is the same as the definition of assault in s 31 of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic).\(^{33}\) Similarly, the Western Australian legislation provides that various definitions, including those of ‘assault’, ‘intimidate’, ‘kidnapping or depriving the person of his or her liberty’, and ‘pursue’, are the same as the equivalent definitions in the Criminal Code (WA).\(^{34}\)

6.32 In some instances, acts constituting family violence are defined differently in family violence and criminal legislation. In some cases, differences in definitions are attributable to the particular objectives of the civil protection order regime and the criminal law. In other cases, however, the justification for differences in definitions is not immediately apparent. In these instances, such differences may produce anomalous outcomes or cause confusion to family violence victims or their legal representatives. Some specific examples are outlined below, as are the Commissions’ recommendations to address such anomalies and improve clarity.

---

\(^{33}\) Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 4.

\(^{34}\) Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 6.
‘Domestic violence’—Queensland

‘Wilful injury’

6.33 The definition of ‘domestic violence’ in s 11 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) includes ‘wilful injury’. This raises issues of the interaction of this provision with that of common assault in s 245 of the Criminal Code (Qld). The definition in the latter provision includes striking, touching, moving or otherwise applying force of any kind to another person. It does not specifically require an injury. Accordingly, the civil law definition of ‘wilful injury’ appears to be more restrictive than the criminal law definition of assault.

Indecent behaviour without consent

6.34 The definition of ‘domestic violence’ in s 11 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) also includes ‘indecent behaviour to the other person without consent’. However, there are some sexual offences in the Criminal Code (Qld) to which consent is not a defence—for example, sexual offences against children or other persons who lack legal capacity to consent to sexual conduct. The scope of the definition of ‘domestic violence’ in the family violence legislation means that a person may not be able to obtain a protection order—for example, on behalf of a child—in circumstances where criminal redress may be available. However, one Queensland stakeholder disagreed with this analysis and suggested that:

Magistrates in Queensland are well aware that those under 16 (or 18 in respect of anal sex) are not, as a matter of law, able to consent, so that consent is not an issue in dealing with sexual offences against children in domestic violence proceedings.

Stalking—Northern Territory

6.35 ‘Stalking’ is defined differently—and in some respects more narrowly—under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) than it is for the purpose of delineating conduct constituting a criminal offence under the Criminal Code (NT). As mentioned in Chapter 5, the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) defines stalking as engaging in any of the following forms of conduct on at least two separate occasions with the intention of causing harm to the person, or causing him or her to fear harm:

- intentionally following the person; or
- intentionally watching, or loitering in the vicinity of, or intentionally approaching, the place where the person lives, works or regularly goes for a social or leisure activity.

6.36 Under the s 189 of the Criminal Code (NT), relevant stalking behaviour extends to a broader range of conduct—for example, telephoning or sending electronic 35  The definition of ‘domestic violence’ also relevantly includes wilful damage to the other person’s property: Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11(1)(b).

37  Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 7. messages to the victim, interfering with property in the victim’s possession and giving offensive material to the victim. As these behaviours are not included in the definition of stalking in the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT), a victim seeking a protection order to restrain such conduct must rely upon the operation of a number of different sections of the Act which identify and define conduct constituting ‘domestic violence’.

6.37 For example, ‘intimidation’ is listed as a type of conduct constituting ‘domestic violence’ in s 5 of the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT). It is defined in s 6 as ‘harassment’, or any conduct that causes a reasonable apprehension of violence to the person or damage to his or her property, or any conduct that has the effect of unreasonably controlling the person or causes him or her mental harm. ‘Harassment’ is not a defined term, however examples provided in s 6 include the regular and unwanted contacting of the person—including by mail, phone, text messages, fax, the internet or another form of electronic communication. Section 6 further provides that a relevant consideration in determining whether a person’s conduct amounts to intimidation is the existence of a pattern of conduct, especially domestic violence.

6.38 A further difference in the civil and criminal definitions of ‘stalking’ is that the Criminal Code (NT) allows for a combination of behaviours to constitute stalking, in addition to repeated instances of the same conduct. Under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT), a victim would have to identify other forms of domestic violence in s 5 in order to achieve recognition of a combination of abusive behaviours.

6.39 These differences mean that, in the Northern Territory, to obtain a protection order in respect of conduct that is, or is capable of being, the subject of a criminal prosecution for stalking, such conduct must be capable of falling within other—and potentially multiple—forms of conduct recognised as ‘domestic violence’ under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT).

Emotional or psychological harm, mental harm—South Australia

6.40 In the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) one of the categories of abuse is that which causes, or is intended to cause, ‘emotional or psychological harm’. Such harm is defined as including:

- mental illness;
- nervous shock; and
- distress, anxiety or fear, that is more than trivial.

38 As mentioned in Ch 5, s 5 of the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) defines ‘domestic violence’ by reference to types of conduct, including causing harm, property damage, intimidation, stalking, economic abuse and attempts to engage in such conduct.

39 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 8(3). A list of examples of acts that may constitute emotional or psychological harm is provided in s 8(4).
However, the distinction between emotional and psychological harm is not readily apparent on the face of the family violence legislation. The inclusive list of ‘emotional or psychological harm’ in s 8 does not distinguish between the two types of harm, nor does the provision expressly refer to, or adopt, any corresponding criminal law concepts, which are discussed below.

The Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) uses the term ‘mental harm’ for the purposes of offences relating to causing harm or serious harm, or creating a risk thereof. It defines ‘harm’ as meaning ‘physical or mental harm (whether temporary or permanent)’. ‘Mental harm’ is, in turn, defined as ‘psychological harm and does not include emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger unless they result in psychological harm’. The term ‘psychological harm’ is undefined.

Notwithstanding that the family violence legislation is silent on issues of consistency of terminology with the criminal legislation, it appears that ‘emotional harm’ is intended to include harm that falls short of ‘psychological harm’ for the purposes of the criminal legislation. However, in conflating psychological and emotional harm in the illustrative lists in s 8, the family violence legislation does not provide practical guidance on distinguishing between the two forms of harm.

For example, it is unclear whether proof of ‘mental illness’ or ‘nervous shock’—for the purposes of obtaining a protection order—would qualify as proof of ‘mental harm’ for the purposes of a criminal prosecution for an offence in the nature of causing harm—assuming that proof is established beyond reasonable doubt. Similarly, it is open to argument as to whether ‘distress, anxiety or fear that is more than trivial’ under the family violence legislation could result in ‘psychological harm’ and thus fall within the definition of ‘mental harm’ under criminal legislation. The absence of a statutory definition of ‘psychological harm’ in the criminal legislation means that—even if an intention to align terminology or concepts between family violence and criminal legislation may be inferred from the family violence legislation—the criminal law terminology does not offer a straightforward means of distinguishing between forms of harm.

As the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) had not commenced at the time of writing, it remains to be seen whether the interaction between definitions proves to be problematic in practice for victims and their legal representatives involved in both civil family violence and criminal proceedings.

---

40 Ibid s 24.
41 Ibid s 23.
42 Ibid s 29.
44 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 21.
45 Government of South Australia, Submission FV 227, 9 July 2010.
Consultation Paper

6.46 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory governments should review their family violence and criminal legislation to ensure that the interaction of terminology would not prevent a person obtaining a protection order in circumstances where a criminal prosecution could be pursued.footnote{Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–15.}

6.47 The Commissions also made specific proposals for the review or amendment of aspects of the family violence and criminal legislation of Queensland, South Australia and the Northern Territory, namely that:

- the definition of stalking in the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 7 should be amended to include all stalking behaviour referred to in the Criminal Code (NT) s 189;footnote{Ibid, Proposal 4–15(a).}

- the Queensland government should review the inclusion of the concepts of ‘wilful injury’ and ‘indecent behaviour without consent’ in the definition of ‘domestic violence’ in s 11 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) in light of how these concepts might interact with the Criminal Code (Qld);footnote{Ibid, Proposal 4–15(b).}

- the South Australian government should review whether the interaction of the definition of ‘emotional or psychological harm’ in the definition of ‘abuse’ in s 8 of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) and ‘mental harm’ in s 21 of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) is likely to confuse victims and their legal representatives involved in both civil family violence and criminal proceedings.footnote{Ibid, Proposal 4–16.}

Submissions and consultations

6.48 Most stakeholders supported the general principle that a victim of family violence should not be precluded from obtaining a protection order in circumstances where a criminal prosecution is open, without commenting as to detail.footnote{Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; K Greenland, Submission FV 161, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; A Brunacci, Submission FV 97, 4 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 89, 3 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 88, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 79, 2 June 2010; A Brunacci, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.} As outlined below, however, there was a divergence of views about the operation of specific provisions in the Queensland, Northern Territory and South Australian criminal and family violence legislation.

‘Domestic violence’—Queensland

6.49 There was general consensus among stakeholders that the references in the Queensland family violence legislation to ‘wilful injury’ and ‘indecent behaviour ... without consent’ are or may be problematic. The Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian commented that the term ‘wilful injury’ is ‘too restrictive’ in that it does not capture the broader types of behaviours under the definition of common assault in the Criminal Code (Qld). The Commission submitted that ‘wilful injury’ should be replaced with a term consistent with common assault in the Criminal Code (Qld).

6.50 Similarly, the Queensland Government commented on the importance of ensuring that current definitions do not lend themselves to a restrictive interpretation of behaviours which would otherwise be regarded as acts constituting domestic violence. In particular, the requirement to demonstrate willfulness or lack of consent may in some cases place a heavy burden on victims.

6.51 The Queensland Government stated that it would consider the approaches taken in the family violence legislation of other jurisdictions—together with input from consultations undertaken as part of its current review of the Domestic and Family Violence Prevention Act 1989 (Qld)—‘with a view to capturing all of the behaviours that are considered to reflect the current understanding of domestic and family violence’.

6.52 However, as noted above, the Queensland Law Society submitted that the reference to ‘indecent behaviour ... without consent’ may not necessarily require amendment, on the basis that consent is not an issue when dealing with persons who, as a matter of law, are unable to give consent.

Stalking—Northern Territory

6.53 Stakeholders who addressed the issue unanimously supported the Commissions’ proposal that the definition of stalking in the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) should be amended to include all stalking behaviour referred to in the Criminal Code (NT). Two stakeholders observed that—while the family violence legislation is...
6. Other Statutory Definitions of Family Violence

6.54 Two South Australian stakeholders considered that the interaction of the definition of ‘emotional or psychological harm’ in the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) and ‘mental harm’ in s 21 of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) would be unlikely to confuse victims and their legal representatives involved in both civil family violence and criminal proceedings. In addition, the Government of South Australia submitted that:

As a matter of policy it is appropriate that the civil intervention order provisions cover a wider ambit of conduct—ie, causing ‘emotional harm’—and that the criminal provisions are more confined—to effects that can be more objectively proven with medical/psychiatric evidence. Whilst the interaction between the definitions may prove to be problematic in practice, it appears clear that the civil legislation encompasses emotional harm that does not amount to psychological harm, while the criminal legislation specifically excludes it.

Commissions’ views

Interaction of terminology between family violence and criminal legislation

6.55 In terms of policy, it is not justifiable to have a definition of family violence in family violence legislation that may preclude or potentially make it more difficult for a victim to obtain a protection order than for a prosecution to be commenced, in circumstances which warrant prosecution. Family-violence related conduct that is sufficiently serious as to warrant a criminal law response should be recognised under civil protection order schemes in clear and straightforward terms.

6.56 In the Commissions’ view, the best way of ensuring such recognition is the express alignment of corresponding terminology or concepts across family violence and criminal legislation. In particular, where the definition of family violence in a state or territory’s family violence legislation includes concepts recognised in that jurisdiction’s criminal legislation—such as stalking or kidnapping—the family violence legislation should expressly adopt the criminal law definitions of those concepts.

6.57 For example, a preferable approach to recognising stalking behaviours in the Northern Territory family violence legislation may be to define the term ‘stalking’ in 58 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010 citing the comments of the Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.

59 Government of South Australia, Submission FV 227, 9 July 2010.
60 See, eg, the concepts of ‘wilful injury’ and ‘indecent behaviour ... without consent’ as part of the definition of ‘domestic violence’ under the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11, and the definitions of ‘stalking’ and ‘intimidation’ under the Domestic and Family Violence Act (NT) ss 6, 7. See also, Rec 6–2.
61 See Rec 6–3.
s 7 by reference to, or consistently with, the definition of stalking in the Criminal Code. This approach would obviate the need to characterise stalking-related behaviours under multiple provisions in the family violence legislation. In addition, it would simplify the application process for self-represented victims.

6.58 Similarly, in Queensland, those aspects of the definition of ‘domestic violence’ in the Domestic and Family Violence Prevention Act 1989 (Qld) referring to ‘wilful injury’ and ‘indecent behaviour without consent’ should be amended to reflect the broader behaviours captured by the criminal law definition of assault, and relevant criminal offences in respect of indecent behaviours that do not involve an element of consent. The Commissions note the intention of the Queensland Government to consider this issue as part of its current review of the family violence legislation.

6.59 The Commissions acknowledge, however, that there may be occasion for family violence legislation to recognise broader categories of conduct than those recognised at criminal law, given the different objectives of the criminal laws and the civil protection order regimes. For example, it is appropriate—as a matter of policy—for definitions of family violence in family violence legislation to recognise ‘emotional harm’ as conduct falling short of the criminal law concept of ‘psychological harm’.

6.60 However, this approach should be made clear in family violence legislation. In particular, where family violence legislation refers to ‘emotional and psychological harm’ as a form of family violence, it should expressly identify that ‘psychological harm’ takes its criminal law meaning, and that ‘emotional harm’ captures conduct that is less than ‘psychological harm’.

Recommendation 6–1 State and territory criminal legislation—to the extent that it refers to the term ‘family violence’ in the context of homicide defences—should adopt the same definition as recommended to be included in state and territory family violence legislation (Rec 5–1). That is, ‘family violence’ should be defined as violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour, that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. Such behaviour may include but is not limited to:

(a) physical violence;
(b) sexual assault and other sexually abusive behaviour;
(c) economic abuse;
(d) emotional or psychological abuse;
(e) stalking;
(f) kidnapping or deprivation of liberty;
(g) damage to property, irrespective of whether the victim owns the property;

(h) causing injury or death to an animal irrespective of whether the victim owns the animal; and

(i) behaviour by the person using violence that causes a child to be exposed to the effects of behaviour referred to in (a)–(h) above.

Recommendation 6–2 State and territory family violence and criminal legislation should be reviewed to ensure that the interaction of terminology or definitions of conduct constituting family violence would not prevent a person from obtaining a protection order in circumstances where a criminal prosecution could be pursued.

Recommendation 6–3 Where the definition of family violence in state or territory family violence legislation includes concepts recognised in that state or territory criminal legislation—such as stalking, kidnapping and psychological harm—family violence legislation should expressly adopt the criminal law definitions of those concepts.

---

Family law

Definition of family violence in the Family Law Act

6.61 The Family Law Act distinguishes between ‘family violence’ and abuse of a child. The same conduct in relation to a child, however, may constitute both family violence and child abuse. Family violence is defined to mean conduct, whether actual or threatened, by a person towards, or towards the property of, a member of the person’s family that causes that or any other member of the person’s family reasonably to fear for, or reasonably to be apprehensive about, his or her personal wellbeing or safety.

Note: A person reasonably fears for, or reasonably is apprehensive about, his or her personal wellbeing or safety in particular circumstances if a reasonable person in those circumstances would fear for, or be apprehensive about, his or her personal wellbeing or safety.

6.62 This definition of ‘family violence’ is a semi-objective definition, as it requires reasonableness—an objective element—but also requires the decision maker to place themselves in the position of the potential victim—a subjective element. This is stricter than the purely subjective test for family violence which previously existed under s 60D of the Family Law Act. The definition is also narrower in some respects than the definitions in state and territory family violence legislation.

---

63 Child protection is discussed in Part E.

64 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 4(1).

66 Ibid, 215. Section 60D previously defined family violence as ‘conduct, whether actual or threatened, by a person towards, or towards the property of, a member of the person’s family that causes that or any other member of the person’s family to fear for, or to be reasonably apprehensive about, his or her personal wellbeing or safety’.
6.63 Objective definitions of family violence have been criticised on the basis that ‘it is essentially a contradiction in terms to apply the notion of reasonableness to the experience of fear, and to do so fails to understand the psychological impact of violence, particularly in situations where there has been a history of control’.\(^\text{67}\) Conduct that causes a victim to fear for his or her safety may seem benign to an outsider. Dr Elspeth McInnes of the National Council of Single Mothers and their Children gave the following example to the Senate Legal and Constitutional Legislation Committee:

> We had a case where a mother detailed how her ex partner had brutally murdered the family pet, a cat, in front of the child and the mother. It was in an episode of high agitation and aggression and he had threatened that this would happen to other family members who defied him. He used to like to send kitten cards to the child and the mother when she was attending court. Everybody would look at that on the outside and say ‘Isn’t that nice, he’s sending a lovely card with a kitten’. But the message was ‘remember the cat’.\(^\text{68}\)

6.64 Women’s Legal Services Australia submitted to the Family Courts Violence Review (Chisholm Review) that the definition of ‘family violence’ in the Family Law Act should be broadened to reflect better the nature and dynamics of family violence as a pattern of behaviour, including by removing the objective element of the reasonableness test.\(^\text{69}\)

> There is a tendency to see family violence as a series of incidents, when in fact it is a pattern of behaviour that involves the use of violence as a tool of power and control. Victims of family violence learn to ‘read’ the perpetrator of violence and know what is coming next. It may appear to an outsider that a specific incident should not ‘reasonably’ cause the victim to fear for their safety, but her experience tells her otherwise.\(^\text{70}\)

6.65 A number of other stakeholders also submitted to the Chisholm Review that the definition of ‘family violence’ in the Family Law Act was too narrow, including National Legal Aid, which submitted that ‘an expanded and more prescriptive definition’, similar to the one in the Victorian family violence legislation, should be adopted.\(^\text{71}\)

6.66 The Family Law Council in its December 2009 advice to the Australian Government Attorney-General recommended that the Family Law Act define ‘family violence’ in the same way that it has been defined under the Victorian family violence legislation,\(^\text{72}\) noting that this approach would remove the objective element contained in the definition.\(^\text{73}\)

\(^{67}\) Ibid, 215.
\(^{69}\) Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.
\(^{70}\) Ibid.
\(^{71}\) R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), 143.
\(^{73}\) Ibid, 26.
6.67 Abuse in relation to a child in the Family Law Act is defined to mean:

(a) an assault, including a sexual assault, of the child which is an offence under a law, written or unwritten, in force in the State or Territory in which the act constituting the assault occurs; or

(b) a person involving the child in a sexual activity with that person or another person in which the child is used, directly or indirectly, as a sexual object by the first-mentioned person or the other person, and where there is unequal power in the relationship between the child and the first-mentioned person.74

6.68 Significantly, the Family Violence Strategy of the Family Court of Australia acknowledges that the definition of ‘family violence’ in the Family Law Act is too narrow to meet the objectives of the Strategy, which are to ensure that effective measures are identified, implemented and monitored in the management of matters involving family violence and the protection from harm of the Court’s clients, their children and staff.75 As a result, the Family Violence Committee—which was established in early 2002 to review and reformulate the Family Court’s policy framework on family violence76—adopted ‘a more comprehensive definition of the elements of violence’:

Family violence covers a broad range of controlling behaviours, commonly of a physical, sexual, and/or psychological nature, which typically involve fear, harm, intimidation and emotional deprivation. It occurs within a variety of close interpersonal relationships, such as between spouses, partners, parents and children, siblings, and in other relationships where significant others are not part of the physical household but are part of the family and/or are fulfilling the function of family.77

6.69 Dr Rae Kaspiew notes that differences in legislative definitions and practice-based definitions risk potentially inconsistent approaches in legal and family dispute resolution processes.78 In particular, ‘they may militate against the development of a coherent understanding of violence being applied across different practice contexts’.79

Interaction of definitions: family violence laws and the *Family Law Act

6.70 As discussed in Chapter 4, the Family Law Act requires courts exercising jurisdiction under the Act to have regard to a number of principles, one of which is the

---

75 Family Court of Australia, Family Violence Strategy (2004–2005), 1. The Strategy addresses five key areas: information and communication, safety, training, resolving the dispute, and making the decision.
76 Ibid, 1.
77 Ibid, 3 (citation omitted). The Commissions were informed in consultation that, in practice, the Strategy is adopted by both the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates Court: Federal Magistrates Court, Consultation, Sydney, 3 February 2010.
79 Ibid, 287.
need to ensure safety from family violence, as defined in the Act. 80 There are a number of other provisions which require family courts to consider family violence. Insofar as family courts have to decide what is in a child’s best interests, a ‘primary’ consideration is the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence. 81 An ‘additional’ consideration is any family violence involving the child or a member of the child’s family. 82 On its face, this means that family courts are potentially considering family violence in much narrower terms than the generally broader conceptualisations under state and territory family violence legislation.

6.71 However, while the definition of ‘family violence’ in the Family Law Act is comparatively narrow, the definition of ‘family violence order’ captures orders—including interim orders—made under prescribed laws of a state or territory to protect a person from family violence. 83 This is important because family courts are bound to consider family violence orders that apply to a child or a member of the child’s family in ascertaining what is in a child’s best interests, but only if they are final or contested. 84 In addition, in making parenting orders, family courts have to ensure that the order is consistent with any family violence order and does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence. 85

6.72 The prescribed laws under sch 8 of the Family Law Regulations 1984 (Cth) 86 cover: state and territory family violence legislation; other Acts that confer jurisdiction on courts to make family violence orders and; at least in one case, 87 an Act that confers jurisdiction on courts to make restraint orders outside the boundaries of the family violence context as defined in that state’s family violence legislation. 88

6.73 This means that family courts have to take family violence orders ‘as they are’, that is, orders based on the particular definitions and the grounds for obtaining those orders in the particular state or territory jurisdiction. In other words, in practice, family courts may be required to consider a conceptualisation of family violence that is broader than that envisaged under the Family Law Act. In cases where a person appearing before a family court has an existing final or contested protection order, the differences in definitions between the state or territory and federal scheme may have little effect. Further, in ascertaining what is in a child’s best interests, a family court has broad discretion to consider any other fact or circumstance that the court thinks is 80 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 43(1)(ca). In this chapter, the term ‘family courts’ is used to refer to courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act, including the Family Court, Federal Magistrates Court, and state and territory courts exercising family law jurisdiction.

81 Ibid s 60CC(2)(b).
82 Ibid s 60CC(3)(j). There is some debate about the significance of the 2006 amendments to the Family Law Act which introduced ‘primary’ and ‘secondary’ considerations. See Ch 16 for discussion of how the Family Courts Violence Review, undertaken by Professor Richard Chisholm (the Chisholm Review), recommended this distinction be dealt with.
83 Ibid s 4.
84 Ibid s 60CC(3)(k).
85 Ibid s 60CG.
86 Family Law Regulations 1984 (Cth) sch 8.
87 Justices Act 1959 (Tas).
88 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 4 (definition of ‘family relationship’).
6. Other Statutory Definitions of Family Violence

However, it appears to the Commissions that there may be unjustified anomalies in the treatment of family violence issues, which turn on whether a party to family law proceedings who is a victim of family violence has, in fact, obtained a state or territory protection order. Consider the following hypothetical:

Hypothetical

A is from Victoria and is involved in family law proceedings concerning the determination of parenting orders. A has obtained a final family violence protection order under the Victorian family violence legislation on the grounds of a pattern of economic abuse. In making a parenting decision under the Family Law Act, a family court is bound to consider that final order.

B is from Victoria and is also involved in family law proceedings concerning the determination of parenting orders. B never applied for, and therefore never obtained a protection order under Victorian family violence legislation, even though B has suffered family violence, including economic abuse. In making a parenting decision under the Family Law Act, the Family Court is bound to consider family violence—and given the absence of a state protection order, B—unlike A—will need to satisfy the semi-objective test in s 4 of the Family Law Act. If B does not satisfy that test, the Family Court may not be bound to consider the family violence suffered by B—although it may do so in its broad discretion if it considers the conduct constituting the claim to be a relevant fact or circumstance that it should take into account.

C is from New South Wales and is involved in family law proceedings concerning the determination of parenting orders. Under New South Wales family violence legislation C was not able to obtain a family violence protection order on the basis of suffering economic abuse, even though she suffered such abuse over a period of years. In order for C’s claim of family violence to be considered by the Family Court, C—unlike her counterpart A in Victoria—will need to satisfy the semi-objective test in s 4 of the Family Law Act. If C fails to satisfy this test, the Family Court is not bound to consider the family violence suffered by C, although it may do so in its broad discretion if it considers the conduct constituting the claim to be a relevant fact or circumstance that it should take into account.

---

89 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC(3)(m).

90 The role of protection orders in making parenting orders is discussed in Ch 16.
Submissions and consultations

Interactions in practice

6.75 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked what effect in practice the different definitions between family violence in the Family Law Act and in state and territory family violence legislation have in matters before federal family courts:

(a) where a victim who has suffered family violence has (i) obtained a state or territory protection order or (ii) has not obtained such an order; and

(b) on the disclosure of evidence or information about family violence.\(^91\)

6.76 The Commissions also asked whether the broad discretion given to courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act and the approach taken in the Family Court of Australia’s Family Violence Strategy overcome, in practice, the potential constraints posed by the definition of ‘family violence’ in the Family Law Act.\(^92\)

6.77 Many submissions which addressed these questions focused on broader concerns about how federal family courts deal with evidence of family violence. It was submitted that:

- ‘disclosure of family violence is most likely to be met with disbelief, [and] a minimisation of any harm caused’;\(^93\)
- ‘the existence of current protection orders, or attempts to obtain one, is largely ignored’;\(^94\) as is other evidence of family violence—such as police reports and witness testimony;\(^95\)
- federal family courts have not recognised protection orders, particularly in cases where no charges and convictions were laid or where the respondent to a protection order had consented to the protection order without admissions;\(^96\) and
- ‘when there are no protection orders, it can be even more difficult for victims of family violence to demonstrate what they have experienced’ as the federal family courts ‘take little notice of descriptions of family violence in … affidavits or … applications for protection orders’.\(^97\)

---

\(^91\) Consultation Paper, Question 4–4.
\(^93\) Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.
\(^94\) T Searle, Submission FV 108, 2 June 2010. See also Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010, which expressed the view that protection orders are ‘routinely ignored/devalued/downplayed’.
\(^95\) C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
\(^96\) Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
\(^97\) Ibid.
6. Other Statutory Definitions of Family Violence

6.78 Women’s Legal Service Queensland stated that ‘the issue is much bigger than definitions’:

Domestic violence, how victims and perpetrators may present and the relevance of domestic violence is not well understood in the family law system. Consistent definitions would help, but also training, guidance in the Family Law Act on domestic violence and evidence that may be produced and use of domestic violence experts/reports.

6.79 Justice for Children submitted that family courts seem to prefer evidence of physical violence over emotional or psychological violence. A similar point was made by the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service, which submitted that the definition of family violence in the Victorian family violence legislation was better than that in the Family Law Act because it focused beyond physical and sexual violence.

In the Family Court unless alleging physical and sexual violence, the family violence generally is not taken seriously—verbal abuse in particular. Often both parties will allege the other is verbally abusive. In a recent family report—the ATSI mother was unable to talk to the report writer about the physical violence she had experienced—(which is a separate issue)—but when she spoke about the verbal abuse the report writer was dismissive of it. This would have further impeded the ability of the mother to expand on the physical violence. (She had given evidence of physical violence in a detailed affidavit).

6.80 Other submissions also reported that the differences in definition did have an impact. For example, one legal service provider submitted:

In cases where there is actually third party evidence about family violence, the weight that different judicial officers place on certain evidence based on how certain information falls under the different definitions of family violence actually can be quite different. Therefore, consistency in terms of the definition of ‘family violence’ would be beneficial to all proceedings.

6.81 Peninsula Community Legal Centre submitted that, in practice, the differences in definition cause a number of problems:

In PCLC’s experience, in practice, the difference between the definition of family violence in the Victorian legislation and the definition of family violence within the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) causes several problems. In situations where an order has been obtained, often [by] consent without admission, the federal family courts review only the final order and not whether there has been any finding of the alleged violence or risk. This creates potential problems, where the existence of a protective order may serve to unfairly restrict contact between children and a parent or alternatively, may expose a child to risk by way of unsuitable living arrangements. …

---

101 For example, Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010.
Where no protective order has been obtained and violence is alleged, such allegations can be dismissed by the federal family courts, as lacking validity for want of evidence.103

6.82 In contrast, the Queensland Law Society, which agreed that the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act is too narrow to meet the objectives of the Family Court’s Family Violence Strategy, submitted that the differences in definition between the Queensland and federal legislative schemes have little effect.

In practice, if a survivor of violence asserts in Family Law Act proceedings that he or she has been the subject of violence, then in properly prepared material he or she will not merely rely upon the existence of a protection order but will set out what violence has occurred so that it can be properly taken to account as evidence before the Federal Magistrates or Family Court.104

6.83 However, most stakeholders who addressed the issue considered that the broad discretion given to courts exercising family law jurisdiction and the approach taken in the Family Court’s Family Violence Strategy did not, in practice, overcome the potential constraints posed by the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act,105 and some of these stressed the need for common definitions across the legislative schemes.106 For example, women’s legal services submitted that:

- ‘no strategy will influence all members of the Court … and the only way to ensure proper exercise of discretion is to enshrine it in legislation’; 107 and

- ‘the legislation is a means of educating the community about the law and these benefits of including a definition should not be overlooked’.108

6.84 Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, in expressing the view that the identified constraints were not overcome in practice, submitted that the exercise of discretion is ‘usually conservative’ and ‘economic abuse, psychological abuse and threats are routinely ignored’.109

6.85 A small number of stakeholders considered that the broad discretion given to courts exercising family law jurisdiction and the approach taken in the Family Court’s

Family Violence Strategy did, in practice, overcome the potential constraints posed by the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act; while others said that this was the case ‘sometimes.’

6.86 An extension of the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act has consequences for the current legislative scheme. Under s 61DA(2), the presumption of equal shared responsibility does not apply where there is family violence. Federal Magistrate Dr Altobelli argues that the fact that any family violence falling within the definition in s 4 of the Act rebuts the presumption is both a strength and a weakness. The strength is signalling the unacceptability of any family violence; the weakness is fettering the judiciary’s ability to craft appropriate parenting orders in the best interests of children. He stated that:

>[t]o fail to differentiate family violence can be as harmful to victims of violence, and their children, as it could be to children who are denied otherwise safe and meaningful relationships with parents who have perpetrated certain types of violence.

6.87 This is linked to a consideration of the typologies of violence, discussed below.

Expanding definition

6.88 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the view that the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act is too narrow, and proposed that it should be expanded to include specific reference to certain physical and non-physical violence, including: sexual assault, economic abuse, emotional or psychological abuse, kidnapping or deprivation of liberty, damage to property, harm or injury to an animal irrespective of whether the victim owns the animal, and exposure of children to family violence. The Commissions cited the definition in the Victorian family violence legislation as a model. In effect, the Commissions proposed that there be a shared understanding of what constitutes family violence across family violence legislation and the Family Law Act.

6.89 The majority of stakeholders who addressed this issue supported the proposal. Reasons given include that it would ‘reflect established social research’ and assist in...

110 Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010.
111 Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010. A similar view was expressed in K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010.
113 Ibid, 43.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

educating parties about what constitutes family violence.\textsuperscript{116} In particular, stakeholders expressed support for consistent definitions of family violence in legislation.\textsuperscript{117} For example, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria submitted:

\begin{quote}
We believe that more consistent definitions of family violence would assist in the prevention of family violence because they avoid confusion about what does and does not constitute behaviour that is, at a minimum, unacceptable. Consistency allows courts to send clearer messages about what constitutes prohibited behaviour.\textsuperscript{118}
\end{quote}

6.90 A community legal service expressed the view that consistent definitions should go some way to alleviate particular problems identified in the Consultation Paper arising from the interaction between family violence legislation and the \textit{Family Law Act}, which could affect the treatment of victims depending on whether or not they had obtained a state or territory protection order.\textsuperscript{119}

6.91 Stakeholders also specifically supported the inclusion of non-physical violence,\textsuperscript{120} and for the Victorian definition to be used as a model—\textsuperscript{121}—for example, on the basis that it has proved ‘workable and successful’.\textsuperscript{122} Professor Patricia Easteal supported the proposal and submitted that the ‘more examples and detail [to be included in the definition] the better’.\textsuperscript{123} Also in support, one legal service provider noted that ‘there are safety catches in place to prevent abuse of broad definitions by perpetrators’.\textsuperscript{124}

6.92 Professor Patrick Parkinson opposed the proposal. As discussed in Chapter 5, Parkinson expressed concerns about the expansion of the definition of family violence to the extent that it would create ‘discrete categories of violence provable by reference to specific incidents or behaviours outside of a context of coercive, controlling violence or behaviour that causes someone to fear for their safety’, noting the significant net-widening effects of such an approach. He submitted that family violence should be defined as

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{116} The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, \textit{Submission FV 149}, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{118} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 220}, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{119} Confidential, \textit{Submission FV 171}, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{120} For example, NSW Women’s Refuge Movement Working Party Inc, \textit{Submission FV 188}, 25 June 2010; Confidential, \textit{Submission FV 77}, 2 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{122} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 220}, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{123} P Easteal, \textit{Submission FV 40}, 14 May 2010.
\end{flushleft}
violent or threatening behaviour or any other form of behaviour, including sexual, economic or psychological abuse, which has the purpose of coercing, controlling or subjugating a family member or causing that family member to be fearful, or which is reasonably likely to have these consequences.\textsuperscript{125}

6.93 Toni McLean—a partner violence counsellor—also appears to oppose the proposal, insofar as its aim is to include in the Family Law Act a definition that is as consistent as possible with that in family violence legislation.

The understanding of family violence for the purposes of the Family Court must be different from and more nuanced than the definition of family violence for the purposes of family violence and/or criminal legislation. The latter is focused on maintaining the safety of real or perceived victims of a particular kind of harmful behaviour in a ‘snapshot’ moment when the menace has occurred or is reasonably expected to be about to occur; and police officers could not be reasonably expected to conduct a lengthy investigation before taking further action. That is, police officers are responding to a ‘snapshot’ of a situation. The Family Court, however, is not making decisions about individual events, but rather about long term situations, consistent with viewing a whole ‘film’ rather than a single snapshot.\textsuperscript{126}

Removal of reasonableness test

6.94 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act should be amended by removing the semi-objective test of reasonableness.\textsuperscript{127}

6.95 The overwhelming majority of stakeholders who addressed this issue, including a number of legal service providers, advocacy organisations and family violence related service providers who made confidential submissions, supported the proposal.\textsuperscript{128} Support was principally expressed because of the unsatisfactory way the reasonableness test could operate.

\textsuperscript{125} P Parkinson, Submission FV 104, 5 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{126} T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{127} Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–18. The Commissions noted that a consultation with some federal magistrates suggests that the reasonableness requirement has little practical impact.
In addition to expressing support for the views expressed in the Consultation Paper, stakeholders also submitted that:

- ‘reasonable’ in the family law is open to discretion at times to the detriment of women and children’s safety;

- the test of ‘reasonableness’ is flawed because, in most cases, a male judge will be deciding the ‘reasonableness’ of a female’s fear and what is ‘reasonable’ to fear is a ‘culturally loaded measure, that when poorly applied can minimise women’s experience of fear’;

- the concept of reasonableness is vague and ‘leaves litigants confused and unsure as to what the Court requires, also leaving [it] open to broad interpretation by [judicial officers] and legal representatives’; and

- the note at the end of the definition of ‘reasonableness’ is ‘unclear’. A community legal service asked:

  Does this mean for example, that a person with [post-traumatic stress disorder (PSTD)] caused by family violence needs to experience his or her fear as the reasonable person would, or the way a reasonable PSTD sufferer would?

In addition, in a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others expressed support in the interests of victim protection, consistency and reducing complexity for victims and other non-perpetrator parties pursuing Family Court matters.

Women’s Legal Services submitted that it supports a review of the definition of family violence that includes consideration of the removal of the test of reasonableness:

The test was introduced as part of the 2006 reforms in the absence of any identified need to amend the definition in this way. We believe that the objective test was included in the definition to respond to apparent concerns about the making of ‘false allegations’ of family violence and was, at the time, a highly inappropriate policy response to this issue which has no empirical basis.
6.99 However, the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that:

Anecdotally, the objective test of reasonableness is not drastically affecting outcomes because the objective test does tend to be applied as if the objective person has been through the experiences of the victim (which is only sensible).\textsuperscript{137}

6.100 The One in Three Campaign submitted that it concurred with the views expressed in the Chisholm Review that: the correct interpretation of the requirement of reasonableness would take the context into account; the inclusion of the concept of reasonableness has merit; and the question is whether it has been in fact interpreted in ways that is unfair to victims.\textsuperscript{138}

6.101 Another stakeholder expressed neither support nor opposition for the proposal, but suggested:

If the test of reasonableness remains, it should be used such that it considers the context and history of the behaviour that is under question, and should be used to test the validity or otherwise of the fears of the victim with regard to his/her safety and that of the children. If it is limited to a ‘snapshot’ of an event, and does not include consideration of the whole ‘film’, then it is not a reasonable test.\textsuperscript{139}

\textit{Commissions’ views}

\textbf{Expanding definition}

6.102 It is unacceptable that differences in definitions across family violence legislation and the Family Law Act may result in different treatment of persons suffering similar types of family violence.

6.103 The Commissions maintain the view expressed in the Consultation Paper that the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act is too narrow. In particular, the Commissions consider that it is important that the definition expressly recognise that certain types of non-physical conduct—including economic abuse and psychological abuse—may fall within the wider definition of family violence. In this regard, the Commissions note the views of some stakeholders that federal family courts may favour evidence of physical violence over non-physical violence.

6.104 The Commissions are strongly of the view that there should be a consistent understanding of what constitutes family violence across federal family law, and state and territory family violence legislation. In this regard, the Commissions note stakeholder opinions that current definitional constraints in the Family Law Act are not always—or best—overcome by the exercise of discretion, or with regard to the Family Court of Australia’s Family Violence Strategy.

6.105 To this end, the Commissions recommend that the same core definition of family violence that is recommended for family violence legislation should also be adopted in the Family Law Act. That is, family violence should be given a definition that describes the context in which acts take place. Family violence should be defined as violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful—the approach recommended by the VLRC in its 2006 Report.\textsuperscript{140} The definition should then set out non-exhaustive types of physical and non-physical behaviour that may fall within this definition, as outlined in Recommendation 6–4 below, mirroring the same types of conduct—including sexual assault, economic abuse and emotional abuse—that the Commissions have recommended be addressed in family violence legislation.\textsuperscript{141} A summary of the key benefits of having a common core definition of family violence together with a shared understanding of what may fall within that definition across family law and family violence legislation is set out at the end of this chapter.

\textsuperscript{137} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{138} One in Three Campaign, Submission FV 35, 12 May 2010.

\textsuperscript{139} T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010.

6.106 The Commissions consider that the definition that is recommended will assist in educating those engaged in the family law system about the complexities and nuances of family violence.

Removal of reasonableness test

6.107 The Commissions remain of the view expressed in the Consultation Paper that the semi-objective test of reasonableness should be removed from the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act on the basis that it is inappropriate to apply a test of reasonableness to the experience of fear in determining whether conduct is violent. To do so ignores the psychological impact of family violence, especially within the context of a controlling relationship.\textsuperscript{142}

6.108 The Commissions’ approach is consistent with that taken by the Family Law Council in its December 2009 advice to the Australian Government Attorney-General.\textsuperscript{143} As above, the Council recommended that the Family Law Act define ‘family violence’ in the same way that it has been defined under the Victorian family violence legislation,\textsuperscript{144} noting that this approach would remove the objective element contained in the definition.\textsuperscript{145}

6.109 The Chisholm Review recommended that, if the Australian Government did not adopt its recommendations about reforming the shared parenting provisions, then it should strengthen the provisions of the Act relating to family violence, including more detail about the nature and consequences of family violence, and that it consider in this connection adapting some of the provisions of the Victorian or other state and territory legislation relating to family violence.\textsuperscript{146}

\textsuperscript{141} Rec 5–1.
\textsuperscript{142} This view is expressed in the context of defining family violence. However, as discussed in Ch 7, it is appropriate to adopt a reasonableness test in ascertaining whether there are grounds for obtaining a protection order—given the preventative focus of issuing such an order.
\textsuperscript{144} Ibid, 25, Rec 1.
\textsuperscript{145} Ibid, 26.
6.10 The Commissions note, however, that the Chisholm Review took a different stance on the removal of the reasonableness requirement, expressing the view that the correct interpretation of the requirement of reasonableness would take the context into account, and ask whether a person in the victim’s position, having experienced the history of violence, and knowing the meaning [for example, of a particular gesture] would have a reasonable fear … [and that] the inclusion of the concept of reasonableness has merit, and the question is whether it has in fact been interpreted in ways that are unfair to victims.147

6.11 The Chisholm Review stated that the information available before it did not indicate that the definition had in fact malfunctioned in that way, and did not recommend removal of the ‘reasonableness’ requirement. The Review did, however, state that ‘further consideration should be given to this issue if more relevant information comes to light about the operation of the definition in practice’.148

6.12 As discussed above, the Commissions consider that the definitions of family violence in family violence legislation and the Family Law Act should be consistent. The Commissions, therefore, do not make a separate recommendation about the removal of the reasonableness test from the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act—given that the definition that they have recommended does not include the test of reasonableness.

Cultural change

6.13 Changes in definition cannot in themselves bring about cultural change in attitudes towards violence. One stakeholder has expressed concern about the extent to which family violence is referred to as ‘conflict’ or ‘entrenched conflict’ in the family law system, including in the case law.149 There is room for improvements in judicial and legal education in this regard. The Commissions endorse the recommendation made by the Chisholm Review that:

The Government, the family law courts and other agencies and bodies forming part of the family law system consider ways in which those working in the family law system might be better educated in relation to issues of family violence.150

147  Ibid, 147.
148  Ibid.
149  Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers. See also Eddy v Weaver [2009] FMC/Afam, [4], [122], [123].
150  R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), Rec 4.3. Training and education are addressed generally in Ch 31.
Recommendation 6–4  The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should adopt the same definition as recommended to be included in state and territory family violence legislation (Rec 5–1). That is, ‘family violence’ should be defined as violent or threatening behaviour, or any other form of behaviour, that coerces or controls a family member or causes that family member to be fearful. Such behaviour may include but is not limited to:

(a) physical violence;
(b) sexual assault and other sexually abusive behaviour;
(c) economic abuse;
(d) emotional or psychological abuse;
(e) stalking;
(f) kidnapping or deprivation of liberty;
(g) damage to property, irrespective of whether the victim owns the property;
(h) causing injury or death to an animal, irrespective of whether the victim owns the animal; and
(i) behaviour by the person using violence that causes a child to be exposed to the effects of behaviour referred to in (a)–(h).

Typologies of violence

6.114 An issue that arises in considering the parameters of the legislative definition of family violence in the Family Law Act is whether it is feasible for the Act to differentiate between types of family violence.

6.115 Since the 1980s social scientists—including the American sociologist Dr Michael Johnson—have developed various theories to describe different types of family violence.151 The typologies generally reflect the proposition that family violence committed by men, and that committed by women, have different meanings and impacts. These typologies have been the subject of extensive debate. The following five typologies have been identified:

- coercive controlling violence—also referred to as intimate or patriarchal terrorism;
- common couple violence—also referred to as situational couple violence;
- violent resistance;

---

151 Others who have written in this area include Kathleen Ferraro, Peter Jaffe and Nancy der Steegh. See, eg, N Ver Steegh and C Dalton, ‘Report from the Wingspread Conference on Domestic Violence and Family Courts’ (2008) 46 Family Court Review 454.
6. Other Statutory Definitions of Family Violence

- separation-instigated violence; and
- mutual violent control.

6.116 The typologies do not purport to deal with other types of violence, such as violence against children, or family violence within Indigenous communities.\textsuperscript{152}

Coercive controlling violence

6.117 Coercive controlling violence has control at its core. Johnson describes it as ‘a product of patriarchal traditions of men’s rights to control ‘their’ women’ and as a form of terroristic control of wives by their husbands that involves the systematic use of not only violence but economic subordination, threats, isolation and other control tactics.\textsuperscript{153}

6.118 Johnson claims that ‘patriarchal terrorism’ is almost exclusively committed by men against women\textsuperscript{154}—an assertion which the One In Three Campaign has disputed in a submission to this Inquiry.\textsuperscript{155}

6.119 Other features of this category of violence are that the violence usually escalates and that the victim rarely fights back or stops fighting back after initial attempts to do so.\textsuperscript{156} Dr Joan Kelly and Johnson comment that it is not atypical for victims of this category of violence to report that the psychological effect of their experience is worse than the physical impact.\textsuperscript{157}

Common couple/situational violence

6.120 Common couple/situational violence is not characterised by the dynamics of power and control. It arises from specific situations or arguments. It usually involves less serious forms of violence compared to coercive controlling violence. Kelly and Johnson state that this form of violence is used by both men and women. It is less likely to escalate over time, and is more likely to cease after separation.\textsuperscript{158}

Violent resistance

6.121 Violent resistance describes the situation where a spouse uses violence—but not control—in response to coercive controlling violence. This type of violence is said to be almost entirely engaged in by women.\textsuperscript{159}

\textsuperscript{152} B Fehlberg and J Behrens, Australian Family Law: The Contemporary Context (2008), 196.

\textsuperscript{155} One in Three Campaign, Submission FV 35, 12 May 2010.

\textsuperscript{156} B Fehlberg and J Behrens, Australian Family Law: The Contemporary Context (2008), 195 (citation omitted).

\textsuperscript{158} Ibid, 485–488.

\textsuperscript{159} Ibid, 484–485.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

6.122 Separation-instigated violence is violence instigated by the separation of an intimate couple where there was no prior history of violence in the relationship or in other settings. Kelly and Johnson comment that this type of violence represents an ‘atypical and serious loss of psychological control’; that it is unlikely to occur again; and that those who use it ‘are more likely to acknowledge their violence rather than use denial’.

6.123 A 2009 study by Parkinson and others found that of 181 parents in Australia who had been involved in parenting disputes after separation:

While there were certainly some histories of severe pre-separation violence, for a majority of respondents, the basis for the family violence order was post-separation conflict, without any reported history of violence in the course of their cohabitation.

6.124 Mutual violent control refers to situations where both partners use violence to control the other. Johnson and Professor Kathleen Ferraro note that this type of violence is rare and that not much is known about its dynamics.

6.125 There are issues about whether such typologies have any role to play in legal frameworks and, if they do, what that role should be. Altobelli advocates the use of typologies of family violence espoused by social scientists such as Johnson, Kelly and Dr Peter Jaffe to enable more nuanced judicial responses to family violence in crafting parenting arrangements which are not only child-focused but also protect victims and children. He stresses the importance of considering the context of violence, noting that the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act focuses on conduct having a certain effect, irrespective of context. Altobelli relies, in part, on Professor Nancy Ver Steegh’s following hypothetical to support the case for differentiation:

Consider a situation where partner A slaps partner B. First imagine that when the incident takes place there is no prior history of physical violence or of other abusive behaviours between A and B. Then imagine that, although this incident is the first instance of physical violence, A has previously undermined B’s efforts to seek employment, denigrated B’s parenting in front of the children, and isolated B from her 162 P Parkinson, J Cashmore and J Single, Post-Separation Conflict and The Use of Family Violence Orders (2009) 1, 10.

---

165 Ibid, 13, 42.
family and friends. Then imagine a situation where A broke B’s nose the week before and A is threatening to kill B and harm their children. The act of slapping is the same in each situation but the outcome and consequences are very different.\footnote{N Ver Steegh and C Dalton, ‘Report from the Wingspread Conference on Domestic Violence and Family Courts’ (2008) 46 Family Court Review 454.}

6.126 Altobelli notes the dangers in the differentiation process:

The consequences of inaccurate differentiation are potentially serious. At one end of the spectrum there is the risk of endangering victims and their children. At the other end there is the danger of unnecessarily restricting parental contact with children.\footnote{T Altobelli, ‘Family Violence and Parenting: Future Directions in Practice’ (Paper presented at Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration Family Violence Conference, Brisbane, 2 October 2009), 19.}

6.127 These typologies have been the subject of criticism and debate. For example, Fehlberg and Behrens, while acknowledging that the typologies provide useful ways of thinking about violence, also caution that they may tend to oversimplify a complex problem, particularly if they are applied in a legal setting.

There are potential dangers with taking it further. Its use in actual legal application could justify the adoption of an unhelpful set of dichotomies, in which violence is classified as ‘common couple’ violence and therefore not harmful, or ‘patriarchal terrorism’ and therefore harmful.\footnote{B Fehlberg and J Behrens, Australian Family Law: The Contemporary Context (2008), 196.}

6.128 Dr Jane Wangmann also cautions against the incorporation of the typologies into the legal system, including on the basis that the categories ‘may inadvertently reinforce current myths about [family] violence’.\footnote{J Wangmann, “She Said …” “He said …”: Cross Applications in NSW Apprehended Domestic Violence Order Proceedings’, Thesis, University of Sydney, 2009, 48.}

Submissions and consultations

6.129 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the view that while the typologies developed by social scientists may have a role to play in enhancing understanding about the potential dynamics of different types of family violence, it is inappropriate for such typologies to be translated into legislative frameworks.\footnote{Consultation Paper, [4.160].}

6.130 Two stakeholders expressed diverse views on this issue. Wangmann submitted that:

at present, the use of such typologies is premature at any stage in the legal process—whether as a screening tool for primary dispute resolution, to guide legal practitioners, or in judicial education. These are also important stages of the legal process—particularly given the very small number of family law cases that reach a final determination—and as such, questions about the appropriateness of applying typologies extends well beyond whether they are to be incorporated in legislation.

We need to be cautious about the advocacy for the use of typologies at these pre-court stages—such typologies are still not well understood, they are open to considerable misunderstanding and misapplication, and thus have the potential to greatly impact on how cases are perceived and dealt with by lawyers, family relationship centres and judicial officers. It is worth noting that even Michael Johnson notes that the development and application of these typologies are in their ‘infancy’.171

6.131 Conversely, the One in Three Campaign submitted that such typologies should be reflected in legislative frameworks:

Without typologies embedded into legislative frameworks, we would rely simply upon judicial education processes to capture critical distinctions between different types, contexts and severities of violence. It is simply inappropriate for all ‘family violence’ to be lumped together when the effects, dynamics and outcomes for victims and children from different types, contexts and severities of violence differ so widely.172

Commissions’ views

6.132 The Commissions welcome further research on the typologies of violence that captures the depth and range of experiences of family violence—particularly in light of concerns that have been expressed about their relative under-development and potential for misunderstanding. The Commissions consider that, in time, the typologies may have a role to play in enhancing understanding about the potential dynamics of different types of family violence.

6.133 However, it is inappropriate for such typologies to be translated into legislative frameworks. First, the task of defining the typologies with any degree of certainty and precision appropriate for legislative application is fraught with difficulties. Secondly, legislative inclusion of the typologies could lead to a rigid and artificial hierarchy and, as noted by one stakeholder, could lead to misapplication. The Commissions remain of the view that the definition of family violence in the Family Law Act should not distinguish family violence on the basis of typologies. Judicial officers should retain a broad discretion to deal with matters on their facts in the best interests of children.173
However, there is no reason why, in appropriate cases, expert evidence should not be received about typologies of violence which may assist the exercise of judicial discretion.

Victims’ compensation

Definition of family violence in victims’ compensation legislation is generally triggered by a nexus to a criminal act and a consequent injury or death.174

The victims’ compensation schemes in NSW and the Northern Territory, however, expressly define or refer to family violence, as set out below.

6.135 The Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW) expressly recognises ‘domestic violence’ as a compensable ‘act of violence’. It also recognises ‘domestic

---

171 J Wangmann, Submission FV 170, 25 June 2010 (citations omitted).
172 One in Three Campaign, Submission FV 35, 12 May 2010.
173 As discussed in Ch 7, to assist in the development of a common interpretative framework, the Family Law Act and each of the family violence Acts of the states and territories should contain a section setting out the features and dynamics of family violence.
174 Victims’ compensation schemes are discussed in Ch 29.
violence injuries’ as compensable injuries, as well as injuries arising from the intimidation and stalking of a person within the meaning of the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) in apparent contravention of a protection order.

6.136 The Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act defines a ‘domestic violence offence’ as a personal violence offence within the meaning of the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act against persons in defined relationships. The definition of ‘domestic violence’ is therefore linked to that in the family violence legislation of NSW. The definition does not include, for example, economic or emotional abuse, as these are not recognised under the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act.

6.137 The Victims of Crime Assistance Regulations (NT) defines when a victim suffers ‘domestic violence injuries’ in the following way:

(1) A victim suffers domestic violence injuries if:

(a) the victim suffers 1 or more injuries as a direct result of:

(i) a violent act involving a pattern of abuse, committed by an offender with whom the victim is in a domestic relationship; or

(ii) a violent act of unlawful stalking under section 189 of the Criminal Code in contravention, or apparent contravention, of a domestic violence order; or

(iii) a combination of violent acts mentioned in subparagraphs (i) and (ii) if committed by the same offender; and

(b) the injuries are more than transient or trifling, though they need not be serious.

6.138 The Regulations also define a ‘pattern of abuse’ and link the definitions of ‘domestic relationship’ and ‘domestic violence order’ to the definitions of those terms in the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT).

Commissions’ views

6.139 As discussed in Chapter 4, the purpose of victims’ compensation schemes include providing assistance to victims of crime, supporting them in recovering from crime, and giving statutory recognition to the harm that they suffer from criminal offending.

6.140 It would therefore be inappropriate for legislation establishing victims’ compensation schemes to adopt definitions of family violence used in family violence legislation to the extent that those definitions include conduct that does not constitute a criminal offence—such as emotional abuse or economic abuse. The adoption of a definition that captures non-criminal conduct would clearly be in direct conflict with the purposes of such schemes, as they are currently framed.

175 Victims Support and Rehabilitation Act 1996 (NSW) sch, cl 7A.
176 Victims of Crime Assistance Regulations (NT) reg 5.
177 These are offences in Tasmania.
6.141 The Commissions note that they have recommended that the NSW family violence legislation should be amended to include a wider definition of family violence, which may capture conduct that is not necessarily a criminal offence.\textsuperscript{178} The Commissions do not propose, however, that this extended definition of family violence be applied in the context of the NSW victims’ compensation legislation, which awards victims for injuries resulting from a criminal act.

6.142 However, there are other ways that legislation governing victims’ compensation schemes can be amended to allow victims of family violence to be better compensated for their injuries. These options are discussed in Chapter 29.

\textbf{Migration legislation}

6.143 Under the \textit{Migration Regulations 1994} (Cth), ‘relevant family violence’ is defined as conduct, whether actual or threatened towards:

(a) the alleged victim; or
(b) a member of the family unit of the alleged victim; or
(c) a member of the family unit of the alleged perpetrator; or
(d) the property of a member of the family unit of the alleged victim; or
(e) the property of a member of the family unit of the alleged perpetrator that causes the alleged victim to reasonably fear for, or to be reasonably apprehensive about, his or her own wellbeing or safety.\textsuperscript{179}

6.144 The focus of the definition is therefore not on categorising certain types of conduct—such as physical or emotional abuse—but rather on the effect of conduct on the victim. In this regard, the definition has a similar approach to that of ‘family violence’ adopted in the \textit{Family Law Act}.

6.145 For emotional abuse to qualify as family violence under the \textit{Migration Regulations}, it must be considered to have been serious enough to cause fear or apprehension for the person’s wellbeing or safety. Acts that only have the ‘effect of causing diminution of a person’s feeling of well being’ will not suffice.\textsuperscript{180}

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

6.146 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how the application of the definition of ‘relevant family violence’ in the \textit{Migration Regulations 1994} (Cth) is working in practice.\textsuperscript{181} The Commissions foreshadowed that information received in

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{178} Rec 5–1.
\item \textsuperscript{179} \textit{Migration Regulations 1994} (Cth) reg 1.21(1). The purpose of these regulations is discussed in Ch 4.
\item \textsuperscript{180} Helmesi [2002] MRTA 5231; Malik \textit{v} Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs (2000) 98 FCR 291; P Easta, ‘Violence Against Women in the Home: Kaleidoscopes on a Collision Course?’ (2003) 3 \textit{Queensland University of Technology Law and Justice Journal} 1, 18. Compare Wright [2001] MRTA 6123 where emotional and financial deprivation, and manipulation were considered because they caused fear or apprehension, and not just reduced wellbeing.
\item \textsuperscript{181} Consultation Paper, Question 4–6.
\end{itemize}
answer to this issue may be used in any further inquiry by the ALRC into the treatment of family violence in federal legislative schemes.

6.147 Stakeholders stressed the particular vulnerability to coercion and control of victims whose migration status is uncertain due to factors such as: isolation; language barriers; lack of family or other support; unfamiliarity with the legal process; systemic barriers in accessing information and legal support; cultural values which might emphasise keeping quiet about spousal abuse; fear or mistrust of police; and concerns about potential racism and prejudice. In particular, they noted that women who have temporary visa status ‘have no access to income, medical or housing benefits’, and are often threatened with deportation or withdrawal of sponsorship.

6.148 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria submitted that it had ‘little insight’ into how the definition is working in practice, but noted that:

allegations are regularly made in family violence protection applications of threats to revoke visas or migration support, to ‘send a person home’ and respondents regularly suggest applicants have ‘made up’ allegations of family violence to circumvent migration regulations.

6.149 Some stakeholders submitted that the definition was not working well in practice, with one stakeholder stating that this was ‘partly because of the attitudes of [judicial officers] that victims are only seeking permanent residence’. National Legal Aid, for example, raised the following concerns about the application of the definition in practice:

The Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth) establish a procedure for non-judicially determined claims of family violence which involves referral to an ‘independent expert’ if the decision maker is not satisfied that an applicant has suffered relevant family violence. The independent expert’s opinion about whether the applicant has suffered relevant family violence, if lawfully made, is then binding on the decision maker. In Legal Aid NSW experience, there have been some cases in which independent experts have formed the opinion based on their notion of what constitutes family violence rather than applying the definition of ‘relevant family violence’ set out in the Regulations.

---

182 Ibid, [4.177].
183 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. See also Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
184 Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service, Submission FV 61, 1 June 2010.
185 P Easteal, Submission FV 39, 14 May 2010. See also Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service, Submission FV 61, 1 June 2010.
187 Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
188 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
189 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
6.150 Stakeholders also noted the difficulties that victims face in meeting the evidentiary requirements of the Migration Regulations to prove family violence. The Victorian Government, for example, submitted:

> Whilst noting that the review of the migration legislation is outside the terms of reference of this Inquiry, Victoria supports the issues highlighted by the Commission in the report and considerations for reform to this legislation … A particular issue that has been raised by Victorian stakeholders is that of ensuring access to the family violence provisions of the Migration Regulations 1994 …

For instance, the evidence requirements to prove domestic and family violence for the purposes of the [regulations] can be difficult for some women experiencing such abuse. Evidence can be judicial or non-judicial. Judicial evidence usually requires a final civil law protection order.

Research points to a high level of under-reporting of domestic and family violence, especially among immigrant and refugee women, and few proceed right through the court process. This would suggest that many immigrant and refugee women would have difficulty meeting the judicial evidence requirement of the regulations.

6.151 Other stakeholders addressed the content of the definition itself, submitting that the current definition:

- ‘is too narrow and should be broadened to reflect current understandings of family violence including having the reasonableness test removed;’
- should reflect the broader definition used in the Victorian family violence legislation, or align more generally with the definition in the Family Law Act and all state and territory definitions of family violence; and
- is problematic in its inclusion of the term ‘relevant’, as this is out of step with other state, territory and federal definitions of family violence, and appears to suggest that ‘relevance’ of violence is determined according to culture.

6.152 One stakeholder expressly agreed with the view expressed by the Commissions in the Consultation Paper that the family violence provisions would be better placed in the Migration Act rather than the regulations.

Commissions’ views

6.153 The Commissions note the concerns expressed by stakeholders in relation to both the content and application of the definition of family violence in the Migration Regulations. The Commissions’ tend to the view that the definition of family violence in the Migration Regulations is too narrow and should align with the definition the Commissions recommend be adopted in family violence legislation, the Family Law Act and the criminal law.

---

6.154 The Government may wish to reconsider the appropriateness of locating the family violence provisions—which affect the lives and safety of a particularly vulnerable group in our society—in regulations, where they are currently housed, as opposed to primary legislation. Such provisions may be more appropriately placed in the Migration Act 1958 (Cth).

6.155 However, the Commissions make no formal recommendations in this regard, noting that reform of migration legislation is outside the Commissions’ Terms of Reference. In the Consultation Paper the Commissions expressed the view that the Australian Government should initiate an inquiry into how family violence is treated in federal legislative schemes not falling within the present Terms of Reference.\(^{201}\) In July 2010, the Australian Government announced that it would ask the ALRC to review the impact of Commonwealth laws—including migration laws—on victims of family violence.\(^{202}\) The material received by the Commissions in this Inquiry concerning the family violence provisions of the Migration Regulations, including the definition of family violence, will therefore be considered more fully by the ALRC in its follow-on inquiry on family violence.

Summary and effect of Commissions’ overall approach

6.156 The Commissions note the substantial stakeholder support for consistent definitions across different legislative frameworks. The overall effect of the Commissions’ approach, reflected in Recommendations 5–1 to 5–5 and 6–1 to 6–4, is that there should be the same core definition of family violence which describes the context in which behaviour takes place, as well as a shared common understanding of the types of conduct—both physical and non-physical—that may fall within the definition of family violence in the following legislation:

- state and territory family violence legislation;
- the Family Law Act;
- the criminal law—in the limited circumstances where ‘family violence’ is defined in the context of defences to homicide; and
- potentially, the Migration Regulations.

6.157 The Commissions remain of the view that conduct is either family violence or it is not. That is not to say that all types of conduct that constitute family violence should be criminalised, nor that family violence should be given the same treatment in the various legal frameworks under consideration. In each case, the severity and context of particular family violence may carry varying weight in different legal proceedings, depending on the reasons for advancing evidence of family violence and the purposes of the respective legal frameworks.

---

\(^{201}\) Consultation Paper, [1.73]–[1.74].

6.158 The Commissions do not consider that the adoption of the same core definition of family violence, together with a shared common understanding of the types of conduct that may constitute family violence—including, as proposed in Chapter 7, a common understanding of the features and dynamics of family violence—in any way compromises the objects and purposes of the legislative schemes that are the subject of this approach.203 It is imperative that common definitions of family violence are supported by a consistent and shared understanding of the concepts that underlie them.

6.159 The Commissions consider that significant systemic benefits would flow from the adoption of a common interpretative framework, across different legislative schemes, promoting the foundational policy principles of seamlessness and effectiveness underlying the approach to reform advocated by this Inquiry.204 It would also deliver benefits to victims. Currently, a victim of family violence involved in multiple proceedings has to contend with the fact that conduct recognised in one jurisdiction as family violence may not necessarily be recognised as such in another. One stakeholder noted that this may not only cause confusion but may ‘even feel like systemic abuse’.205

6.160 The adoption of a common understanding of family violence is likely to have a positive flow-on effect in the gathering of evidence of family violence for use in more than one set of proceedings. This is likely to be of practical importance given the frequency, for example, of family violence allegations in the federal family courts,206 and the frequent overlap of family law proceedings and protection order proceedings.

6.161 Such adoption is also likely to overcome the potential for family violence to be treated differently in family law proceedings depending on whether or not a party to those proceedings—who is a victim of family violence—has, in fact, obtained a state or territory protection order.

6.162 Another significant benefit of adopting a commonly shared understanding of family violence is that it will facilitate the registration and enforcement of protection orders under the proposed national registration of family violence orders scheme.207

6.163 In addition, it will facilitate the capture of statistics about family violence based on a commonly shared understanding of family violence, thereby providing more

---

203  The purposes of the various legislative schemes relevant to family violence are discussed in Ch 4. As noted above, the Commissions do not propose to apply this approach to legislation establishing victims’ compensation schemes.

204  See Ch 3.

205  Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.

207  This scheme is discussed in Ch 30.
useful and comparable data upon which policies to address family violence can be advanced.208

6.164 The Commissions also consider that the adoption of a commonly shared understanding of what constitutes family violence will complement the recommendations made by the Family Law Council to establish a common knowledge base regarding family violence.209

6.165 The Commissions agree with the views expressed by the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria that adopting consistent definitions of family violence across different legislative schemes allows the courts to send clear messages about what constitutes family violence.

6.166 In particular, the Commissions consider that their approach of recommending a core definition of family violence which emphasises the context in which family violence occurs—as opposed to focusing on discrete incidents of violence devoid of a context—should play a significant role in minimising the risk of litigation abuse—especially in the vexatious use of cross applications for protection orders.

6.167 Finally, the Commissions consider that there is stronger case for uniformity of the definition of family violence across an individual state or territory’s family violence and criminal laws, in the limited circumstances where family violence is defined in the context of defences to homicide. Uniformity of the definition within an individual state or territory—as opposed to a core definition with a shared understanding of what constitutes family violence—has the advantage of clearly conveying a legislative intention for a consistent interpretation of family violence across criminal and civil jurisdictions. Moreover, this will also facilitate the proper recognition in the criminal law of the broad ambit of family violence, as discussed in Chapter 14, in the context of defences to homicide.

7. Other Aspects of a Common Interpretative Framework

Contents

Introduction 293
Model provisions reflecting best practice 294
Guiding principles and a human rights framework 295
   Principles 295
   Features of family violence 300
Purposes 308
Grounds for obtaining a protection order 318
   Acts-based tests 318
   Effect on the victim 319
   Act and effect 320
   Options for reform 320
Persons protected 330
   Indigenous concepts of family 336
   Carers 337

Introduction

7.1 There are two levels of establishing a common interpretative framework to address family violence in state and territory family violence legislation and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). One level sets up a shared understanding across family violence legislation and the Family Law Act of what constitutes family violence—as discussed in Chapter 5 and 6—as well as a shared understanding of the nature, features, and dynamics of family violence across these schemes. The other level—and the principal focus of this chapter—is to foster a common interpretative framework across state and territory family violence legislation through the enactment of provisions which complements consistent definitions of family violence. These provisions are those which address: guiding principles containing express reference to a human rights framework, features of family violence, purposes of family violence legislation and grounds for a protection order.

7.2 This two-pronged approach in establishing a common interpretative framework is likely to lead to considerable systemic benefits and improved outcomes for victims of family violence, including those who are involved in multiple sets of proceedings under family violence legislation and the Family Law Act 1975. It may also benefit judicial officers, with improved ease and effectiveness of decision making and interpretation of laws.
7.3 This chapter also addresses equality of treatment for victims of family violence across jurisdictions in relation to the practical application of family violence legislation, including grounds for obtaining protection orders, and persons eligible for protection orders. While equality of treatment is important in itself, fostering consistency regarding the circumstances in which persons are covered by family violence legislation also complements a common understanding of family violence.

Model provisions reflecting best practice

7.4 As the Terms of Reference require the Commissions to consider interaction of laws, pursuing model family violence laws as a specific task is beyond the scope of this Inquiry. It is not feasible to seek consistency on all aspects of family violence legislation—nor is consistency across the board on all issues necessarily desirable, especially if consistency were achieved by implementing provisions which represent the lowest common denominator. However, the Commissions consider that there are key areas of family violence laws which are relevant to the establishment of a common interpretative framework. Guiding principles, objects, grounds for obtaining a protection order, and persons protected are inextricably linked to the achievement of a consistent response by using a common interpretative framework, and are considered in this chapter. The effect of targeting these discrete areas is to establish an irreducible core of best practice in family violence laws.

7.5 Not all states and territories have dedicated family violence legislation—in the sense that some legislation that deals with family violence also deals with obtaining protection orders for other forms of personal violence. Where there is dedicated family violence legislation across the jurisdictions, it varies substantially in its detail and scope. For example, the Victorian and ACT legislation comprises 272 and 217 provisions respectively, while the South Australian and Tasmanian legislation comprises 42 and 44 provisions respectively. In addition, there is variation in family violence legislation as to:

- the range of persons who are able to avail themselves of the protection of such orders;
- the extent to which guiding objects and principles are set out in the legislation;
- the extent to which police are obliged by legislation to take action where family violence is suspected;
- the grounds for making an order;
- whether or not police have the power to issue orders themselves;

---

1 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT).
2 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas).
3 Objects and principles are discussed in Ch 4 and below.
4 Grounds for obtaining an order are discussed below.
the power to make family violence notices or protection orders in criminal proceedings;
• the penalties that attach to a breach of an order; and
• the types of conditions that may be included in protection orders concerning counselling and rehabilitation programs for those who use violence.5

7.6 In 1999, the Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group—comprising Commonwealth, state and territory officials—published the Model Domestic Violence Laws Report, which contained model laws dealing with protection orders.6 The model laws project was not pursued, and was subject to some criticism by Professor Rosemary Hunter and Professor Julie Stubbs on the ground that it appeared to focus simply on resolving inconsistencies.7 There is also a concern that model laws should not impose standards that are of the lowest common denominator.

7.7 By way of comparison, the United States has a Model Code on Domestic and Family Violence that was not designed to provide a uniform code that would create consistency between the states.8 Its purpose was to provide a model that states could use and consider when contemplating reforms to their domestic and family violence laws. The Code is described as a ‘public policy statement’ and a ‘framework’ and the Code’s drafters note each chapter and section ‘can be independently assessed and accepted or modified’.9

Guiding principles and a human rights framework

7.8 Definitions form only one limb of an interpretative framework—principles form another.10 The Model Domestic Violence Laws Discussion Paper was criticised by Hunter and Stubbs for failing to include a set of guiding principles.11 Most family violence legislation does not set out guiding principles or address the specific features of family violence. This section discusses principles and features in turn.

Principles

7.9 There is some precedent in family violence legislation—and criminal laws12—for the articulation of principles to guide legislative interpretation and to educate those

---

5 See Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [2.1.34], Ch 3. Police powers to issue orders are discussed in Ch 9 and the making of protection orders in criminal proceedings, and conditions attached to protection orders are discussed in Ch 11.
10 Definitions are discussed in Ch 5.
12 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 37B. See also Ch 25.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

applying or engaging with the law. As discussed in Chapter 4, the family violence legislation of Victoria sets out in its preamble a number of principles, including that:

- non-violence is a fundamental social value that must be promoted;
- family violence is a fundamental violation of human rights and is unacceptable in any form; and
- family violence is not acceptable in any community or culture.\(^{13}\)

7.10 While the NSW family violence legislation does not expressly state that family violence is a fundamental violation of human rights, it clearly places protection from family violence in a human rights framework by stating that its objects are to enact provisions consistent with certain principles underlying the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.\(^{14}\)

7.11 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the family violence legislation of each state and territory should contain guiding principles, which should include express reference to a human rights framework. The Commissions noted that the preamble to the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) provides an instructive model. The Commissions proposed that the principles should refer expressly to relevant international conventions such as the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women, and the Convention on the Rights of the Child.\(^{15}\)

Submissions and consultations

7.12 The majority of stakeholders who addressed the issue agreed with this proposal.\(^{16}\) Stakeholders identified a number of benefits of incorporating principles, including fostering a common approach to family violence\textsuperscript{17} and the educative function of guiding principles.\textsuperscript{18} The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria described the inclusion of guiding principles in the Victorian legislation as a ‘helpful development’, which courts can use as a guide to interpreting legislation.\textsuperscript{19}

---

\(^{13}\) Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble.

7.13 The Queensland Government—which conducted consultations in its 2010 review of the Queensland family violence legislation—referred to the benefit of principles in assisting judicial officers and practitioners to interpret legislation. It further stated that principles articulate key policy directions. However, the Government cautioned against excessively prescriptive principles, ‘as this could have an unintended consequence of limiting the interpretation of the legislation by the courts’.\textsuperscript{20}

7.14 A number of stakeholders emphasised the importance of guiding principles in highlighting family violence as a human rights issue.\textsuperscript{21} For example, the Australian Association of Social Workers stated that a human rights perspective provides a consistent framework to conceptualise and address family violence.\textsuperscript{22} The Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service argued that:

\begin{quote}
It is important that guiding principles in family violence legislation be linked to a human rights framework, so it is clear that human rights are the fundamental rights
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{17} UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{18} Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{19} Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{20} The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010; Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, Submission FV 117, 15 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{21} The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010.
that underpin the legislation and that violence against Aboriginal women cannot and should not be minimised by cultural arguments.

7.15 Some stakeholders expressed a preference for principles incorporated within the body of the legislation, rather than within the preamble, on the basis that the latter would have greater directive status.

7.16 A number of stakeholders identified other international human rights instruments that should be included in the principles. These were the:

- Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women;
- Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples;
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights;
- Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power;
- Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities;
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights;
- Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power;
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights;
- Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities;
- Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power;
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights;
- Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power;
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

---

27 Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, UN GAOR, 40th sess, 96th plen mtg, UN Doc A/RES/47/1: Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.

7. Other Aspects of a Common Interpretative Framework

- International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination,\(^{31}\) and
- Universal Declaration of Human Rights.\(^{32}\)

7.17 A few submissions opposed incorporating reference to the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women in guiding principles on the basis that this would promote assumptions that, in cases of family violence, men are offenders and women are victims.\(^{33}\)

7.18 The Queensland Law Society—while supporting the proposal—also submitted that principles should be inclusive of all victims of family violence. It noted that a feature of family violence is that victims underreport its incidence, and stated that > the preamble should be written in an inclusive way so that those who have been subject to domestic and family violence are not discouraged from seeking protection.\(^{34}\)

Commissions’ views

7.19 The Commissions consider that the family violence legislation of each state and territory should contain guiding principles, which should include express reference to a human rights framework. The preamble to the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) provides an instructive model. The Commissions consider that the principles contained in the preamble to the Victorian legislation are informative and inclusive, without being over-prescriptive—although the principles should also be placed in a human rights framework.

7.20 The adoption of guiding principles across family violence legislation will serve an educative function, and aid the interpretation of the legislation. Guiding principles will also complement the recommended adoption of a consistent core definition of family violence and a shared understanding of the types of behaviour that may constitute family violence.

7.21 The Commissions do not have a preference for whether guiding principles should be located in a preamble or elsewhere in family violence legislation. A preamble may be taken into account and given the same weight as sections when interpreting legislation.\(^{35}\) The Commissions take a non-prescriptive approach in this regard, and consider drafting of such provisions to be a matter for states and territories.

---

7.22 The principles should refer to or draw upon all applicable international human rights instruments. The endorsement of a human rights framework is particularly relevant, for example, for Indigenous peoples and for those from culturally diverse backgrounds, by reinforcing that customary laws or cultural practices do not override the rights of family members to be safe and live free from violence—and indeed, free from fear, a freedom which has been referred to as the ‘forgotten freedom’.36

7.23 The Commissions consider that reference to a human rights framework is also particularly relevant to women. It is important that family violence legislation explicitly acknowledges women’s right to live free from family violence, particularly in the context of government acceptance of statistics which indicate that victims of family violence are predominantly—although not exclusively—female. This issue is discussed further in the next section of this chapter.

Features of family violence

7.24 As discussed in Chapter 4, the family violence Acts in NSW, South Australia and Victoria, to varying degrees, set out some of the features and dynamics of family violence, including:

- its gendered nature—that is, that it is predominantly committed by men against women, children and other vulnerable persons;
- the detrimental impact it has on children;
- the fact that it occurs in all areas of society—irrespective of location, socio-economic status, age, culture, gender, sexual identity, ethnicity or religion; and
- that it may involve overt or subtle exploitation of power imbalances and may consist of isolated incidents or patterns of behaviour.37

7.25 However, apart from recognising the damaging effects of violence on children, and the fact that it occurs in all areas of society, the legislation in these jurisdictions does not mention that family violence also has a particularly damaging impact on other groups in society, such as: Indigenous persons; those from a culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) background; gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex persons; older people; and people with disabilities.38

7.26 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the family violence legislation of each state and territory should contain a provision that explains the nature, features and dynamics of family violence—including its gendered nature, detrimental impact on children, and the fact that it can involve exploitation of power

37 See Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(3); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(a)(a)–(c).
imbalance, and occur in all sectors of society. The Victorian and NSW family violence legislation were cited as instructive models. 39.

7.27 In addition, the Commissions proposed that, just as the NSW and Victorian family violence legislation highlights the particularly damaging impact on children of exposure to family violence, family violence legislation should also acknowledge the particularly damaging impact of family violence on other groups in society including: Indigenous persons; those from a CALD background; those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender community; older people; and people with disabilities. 40.

Some persons may fall within multiple categories.

7.28 The Family Law Act refers many times to family violence, but apart from the definition, there are no provisions which further explain the nature of family violence. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the Family Law Act should include a section detailing the features, dynamics and nature of family violence. 41.

Submissions and consultations

7.29 The majority of stakeholders who responded to this proposal supported including a provision about the features of family violence in family violence legislation. 42 A number of stakeholders emphasised the importance of consulting with 41 Ibid, Proposal 4–23.

42 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Family Relationship Services Australia, Submission FV 231, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; WESNET—The Women’s Services Network, Submission FV 217, 30 June 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; Women With Disabilities Australia, Submission FV 143, 24 June 2010; Disability Services Commission (WA), Submission FV 138, 23 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 125, 20 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010; Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010; ACON, Submission FV 119, 15 June 2010; Ngaanyatjarra Pijrigatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, Submission FV 117, 15 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Julia Farr Association, Submission FV 103, 4 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 68, 1 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People
the relevant groups regarding the inclusion and the drafting of provisions, particularly to ensure that categories of vulnerable groups are not inadvertently omitted. National Legal Aid did not support the proposal on the basis that these were matters more appropriate for education and training rather than legislative provisions.

7.30 Stakeholders expressed a range of views with respect to the particular features of family violence suggested for inclusion. These are considered in turn.

Gendered nature of family violence

7.31 Stakeholders expressed differing views in response to the Commissions’ proposal that the gendered nature of family violence should be included in the description of the nature of family violence. While some stakeholders specifically referred to the importance of an explicit statement regarding the gendered nature of family violence, others opposed the incorporation of such a provision.

7.32 Some stakeholders argued that family violence is not a gendered issue, because a significant proportion of family violence involves male victims and female offenders. They cited numerous reports and statistics to support this position. Further, a few stakeholders expressed concern that legislative provisions describing family violence as gendered may operate to the disadvantage of male victims. The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas)—while supporting the proposal—also considered that ‘there is a risk of further marginalising male victims of family violence and inadvertently reducing the already low probability that they will come forward’.

7.33 Some stakeholders argued that incorporating such a provision would amount to ‘gender profiling’, and would create a presumption that men as a class are more likely to use family violence, and women are more likely to suffer family violence.
Groups particularly affected by family violence

7.34 Two stakeholders expressly stated their support for including in the principles an acknowledgment of groups that may be particularly affected by family violence.\textsuperscript{52} For example, ACON stated that introducing illustrative examples of same-sex family violence into legislation is important, as it has unique aspects that set it apart from other forms of domestic violence. These unique aspects include using societal homophobia as a tool of control (including the threat of ‘ outing’) and the barriers of access to services such as health and justice services due to fears of homophobia and breaches of confidentiality.\textsuperscript{53}

7.35 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others noted that the Commissions should include the intersex community among the groups for whom family violence may have a particular impact.\textsuperscript{54}

Family Law Act

7.36 Stakeholders also overwhelmingly supported the proposal that the Family Law Act should include a provision detailing the features, dynamics and nature of family violence.\textsuperscript{55} Stakeholders considered that it would provide guidance to courts, and \textsuperscript{53} ACON, Submission FV 119, 15 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{54} They also commented that it is more appropriate to use the plural ‘communities’ in referring to gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities, rather than the singular ‘community’. Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.

others involved in family law matters,\textsuperscript{56} and perform an important educative function.\textsuperscript{57} Moreover, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria stated that ‘it is preferable for legislative provisions of this nature to be as consistent as possible across jurisdictions’\textsuperscript{58}— a view endorsed by several other stakeholders.\textsuperscript{59}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

7.37 In the Commissions’ view, state and territory family violence legislation should contain provisions setting out the nature, features and dynamics of family violence, including that: it can occur in all sectors of society; it can involve exploitation of power imbalances; its incidence is underreported, and it has a detrimental impact on children. The provision should also address the gendered nature of family violence, discussed below. The preamble to the \textit{Family Violence Protection Act 2008} (Vic) and s 9(3) of the \textit{Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007} (NSW) provide instructive models in this regard.

7.38 Coupled with guiding principles, provisions setting out the nature, feature and dynamics of family violence provide a contextual framework for judicial decision-making. Such provisions also serve an important educative function, and should complement the training and education of judicial officers, lawyers and the police. However, the incorporation of a provision explaining the features of family violence should not be considered a substitute for education and training, but should be part of what is considered in judicial education. The Commissions’ recommendation regarding this provision is part of a package of recommendations to facilitate a common understanding of family violence across the community, victims of family violence and the legal sector.\textsuperscript{60}
Gendered nature of family violence

7.39 The Commissions note the extensive research and statistics on family violence. While Time for Action acknowledges that men can be victims of intimate partner violence, it states that ‘overwhelmingly sexual assault and domestic and family violence is perpetrated by men against women’.

Where state and territory governments accept statistics indicating that family violence is predominantly used by men against women, this should be reflected in the principles of family violence legislation.

7.40 Anyone may be a victim of violence, and family violence is unacceptable in any circumstances. It is important that family violence legislation does not operate to marginalise male victims. The Commissions consider that state and territory family violence legislation should contain a provision that explains the nature, features and dynamics of family violence including that: while anyone may be a victim of family violence, or may use family violence, it is predominantly committed by men.

7.41 The Commissions consider it is appropriate to address the predominantly gendered nature of family violence in provisions detailing its nature, features and dynamics—and in guiding principles generally. By contrast, definitions should be gender-neutral, because the law should apply equally to both sexes, and should provide a mechanism for protection or redress regardless of the sex of the victim or the person using violence.

Groups particularly affected by family violence

7.42 The Commissions further recommend that family violence legislation should refer to the particular impact of family violence on: Indigenous persons; those from a CALD background; those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities; older persons; and people with disabilities. Highlighting the impact of violence on these groups complements the Commissions’ recommendation that family violence legislation include examples of emotional or psychological abuse that would affect diverse groups in the community.

The combined effect of these recommendations may assist in the challenging task of ensuring that experiences of family violence of such groups are properly recognised across the legal system.

7.43 The Commissions do not formulate precisely how the legislative provisions might refer to the impacts of family violence on diverse groups. These should be developed in consultation with the groups affected. The formulation may also be informed by the processes recommended by the Family Law Council to establish a common knowledge base about family violence.

---

62 See Rec 1–2.
7.44 By way of illustration, some of the issues that may be referred to by family violence legislation include the following:

- the fact that there is a disproportionate level of family violence among Indigenous communities, and the particular dynamics of Indigenous family violence such as violence within extended kinship networks;\(^{64}\)
- the barriers faced by victims from CALD backgrounds, including communication and language difficulties, and cultural barriers such as beliefs about traditional gender roles and the importance of the family;\(^{65}\)
- the features of elder abuse—that it commonly consists of economic abuse, as well as the withholding of medication, involuntary social isolation, and neglect;\(^{66}\)
- the particular problems faced by victims with disabilities because of their dependence on others for support, the compounding effect of their disability on their lack of power and control in a relationship, and the fact that their disability is exploited by their abusers;\(^{67}\) and
- the problems faced by those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities—including the fear of homophobia, transphobia, intersexphobia, the fear of being ‘outed’ and the fear of discrimination from the legal system due to their gender or sexual orientation.\(^{68}\)

Family Law Act

7.45 In the Commissions’ view, the Family Law Act should also be amended to include a provision detailing the nature, features and dynamics of family violence. This would complement the recommended approach of adopting a standard core definition of family violence across the family law and family violence legislative schemes. As family violence is a critical factor in many cases before federal family courts, it is essential that judicial officers, lawyers and parties share a common understanding of its nature, features and dynamics. Further, a common understanding facilitates a seamless approach across jurisdictions.

7.46 The Commissions note that this position is consistent with an alternative recommendation made by the family courts violence review undertaken by Professor Richard Chisholm (the Chisholm Review) for the provisions in the Family Law Act

---

referring to family violence to be strengthened by including more detail about the nature and consequences of family violence.\(^69\)

7.47 The Commissions recognise that—unlike state and territory family violence legislation—the prevention of family violence is not the primary focus of the Family Law Act, although it is a significant concern in parenting disputes.\(^70\) The Act is principally concerned with the rights, duties, powers and liabilities between spouses and children, and provides for enforcement of those rights and liabilities and the dissolution of marriage.\(^71\) Moreover, the broad range of persons who may avail themselves of protection under family violence legislation may never have cause to be a party to family law proceedings.

7.48 Therefore, the focus of the provisions recommended by the Commissions reflects the different purposes of the legislative schemes. The Commissions consider it essential that both state and territory courts and federal family courts have a thorough understanding of the nature of family violence, and therefore it is desirable that the provisions setting out the nature, features and dynamics of family violence in the Family Law Act should mirror the provisions of state and family legislation as far as possible.

7.49 In federal family courts, judicial understanding of family violence is informed by the Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (Best Practice Principles).\(^72\) The Best Practice Principles incorporate some detail regarding the features of family violence, and the effect that family violence may have on children. The Commissions note that the Chisholm Review commented on the material included in the Best Practice Principles, and suggested various changes.\(^73\) The Commissions consider that, in any forthcoming review of the Best Practice Principles, the federal family courts should have regard to the principles, nature, features and dynamics of family violence as expressed in Recommendations 7–1 and 7–2.

Recommendation 7–1 State and territory family violence legislation should contain guiding principles, which should include express reference to a human rights framework, drawing upon applicable international conventions.

---

\(^70\) See Ch 15.

\(^72\) Family Court of Australia, Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (2009). For further discussion of the Best Practice Principles, see Chs 15 and 17.

\(^73\) R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009). Chapter 1 sets out the background to the Chisholm Review.
Recommendation 7–2  State and territory family violence legislation should contain a provision that explains the nature, features and dynamics of family violence including: while anyone may be a victim of family violence, or may use family violence, it is predominantly committed by men; it can occur in all sectors of society; it can involve exploitation of power imbalances; its incidence is underreported; and it has a detrimental impact on children. In addition, family violence legislation should refer to the particular impact of family violence on: Indigenous persons; those from a culturally and linguistically diverse background; those from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities; older persons; and people with disabilities.

Recommendation 7–3  The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to include a similar provision to that in Rec 7–2 explaining the nature, features and dynamics of family violence.

Purposes

7.50  Objects clauses which set out the purposes of family violence legislation are another important limb in achieving a common interpretative framework across the states and territories.

7.51  The various purposes of family violence legislation and the extent to which they are addressed in objects clauses are discussed in Chapter 4. Most family violence legislation contains object clauses. While the Western Australian legislation does not include an objects clause, it has a provision which sets out certain matters to be considered by the court when deciding whether to make a protection order, from which certain objects can be implied. 74

7.52  Of those Acts that have objects clauses, the degree of articulation and specificity of identified objects differs. While most objects clauses set out the various purposes of family violence legislation, the Queensland legislation only sets out the purpose of ensuring the safety and protection of persons in particular relationships. The objects clause in the Tasmanian legislation is also relatively brief, in contrast with the family violence legislation of other states and territories. The Act highlights that ‘in the administration of [the] Act, the safety, psychological wellbeing and interests of people affected by family violence are the paramount considerations’. 75

7.53  The objects clauses in most family violence legislation do not currently include a purpose aimed at increasing responsibility or accountability for those who use family violence. In contrast, most jurisdictions—apart from Queensland, Western Australia and Tasmania—express a purpose of reducing or preventing family violence and the exposure of children to such violence.

74  Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 12. Section 12 was amended in 2004 to insert a further paragraph (ba): ‘the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence’.

75  Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 3.

7.54 A potential purpose of family violence legislation is to ensure minimal disruption to the lives of families affected by violence. The expression of such a purpose is linked to the making of exclusion orders—that is, orders that exclude a person who has used family violence from a residence shared with the victim. Courts have power to make exclusion orders in a number of state and territory jurisdictions. Research indicates that ‘there is a low utilisation of exclusion conditions in protection orders’ and that this may be attributed partly to ‘judicial unease’ in using them because of concern for the hardship of those who use family violence.

7.55 A purpose about minimal disruption does not appear in the objects clause of family violence legislation of any state or territory. However, in the Second Reading Speech for the Domestic and Family Violence Bill 2007 (NT), the Attorney-General stated that:

Another central objective of the legislation is to ensure minimal disruption to the lives of families affected by violence. There will be a new presumption when making orders in favour of an applicant with children in their care remaining in the family home.

7.56 While the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) does not expressly refer to minimal disruption, it includes a presumption that the protection of a victim and children living with a victim is best achieved by them continuing to live in their home.

7.57 In Victoria, courts are required to consider the desirability of minimal disruption, although this consideration is not identified as an express purpose of the legislation. The court is required to consider making an exclusion order when making a protection order. In doing so, the court must have regard to a number of factors, including the desirability of ensuring minimal disruption to the victim and any child living with the victim.

---

76 Provisions of this kind are included in Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 3(1)(b); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 1(c). See also Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(1)(d), which states that intervention should be designed to encourage defendants to accept responsibility and take steps to avoid engaging in family violence.

78 Northern Territory, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 17 October 2007, 4846 (S Stirling—Attorney-General), 4848. A similar intention is expressed in the South Australia, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 10 September 2009, 3937 (N Atkinson—Attorney-General), 3943 and the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(1)(d) also expresses the principle that intervention should be designed to minimise disruption to protected persons and the children living with them.

79 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 20.

80 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 82(1).

81 Ibid s 82(2)(a).
7.58 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should articulate core purposes, including the following aims:

(a) to ensure or maximise the safety and protection of persons who fear or experience family violence;

(b) to ensure that persons who use family violence accept responsibility—or are made accountable—for their conduct; and

(c) to reduce or prevent family violence and the exposure of children to family violence.\(^83\)

7.59 The Commissions asked whether there are any other ‘core’ purposes that should be expressly recognised in family violence legislation of each of the states and territories. In particular, the Commissions asked whether family violence legislation should articulate a purpose about ensuring minimal disruption to the lives of families affected by violence.\(^84\)

Submissions and consultations

Objects clauses in family violence legislation

7.60 The majority of stakeholders supported the proposal for family violence legislation to specify core purposes, as well as the proposed core purposes.\(^85\)
Stakeholders outlined the benefits of implementing core common purposes in enhancing consistency in decision-making,\textsuperscript{86} consistency across jurisdictions and the facilitation of a national approach to family violence.\textsuperscript{87} The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria stated that the articulation of core purposes has been useful in the Victorian legislation.\textsuperscript{88}

7.61 No stakeholders opposed the inclusion of core purposes in family violence legislation. Almost all stakeholders who supported the inclusion of core common purposes also supported the specific purposes proposed by the Commissions.

7.62 Stakeholders expressed a range of views about various aspects of the proposed clauses in general and with respect to the specific state and territory provisions. These are considered below.

\textbf{Wording of core purposes}

7.63 Some stakeholders expressed concerns about the wording of the proposed purposes. For example, the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) expressed concern with the drafting of (a): ‘to ensure or maximise the safety and protection of persons who fear or experience family violence’. It noted that anybody could fear family violence, and suggested the alternative wording: ‘to ensure or maximise the safety and protection of persons who are at risk of or experience family violence’.\textsuperscript{89}

7.64 The Commissioner for Children (Tas) stated that difficulties arise with the wording of (b): ‘to ensure that persons who use family violence accept responsibility—or are made accountable—for their conduct’. The Commissioner stated that taking responsibility for family violence is a matter for an individual, and is not something that can be enforced by courts.\textsuperscript{90}

\textbf{Minimal disruption}

7.65 Stakeholders expressed a variety of viewpoints on whether a purpose about minimal disruption should be included in family violence legislation. A number of stakeholders supported the inclusion of such a purpose.\textsuperscript{91} For example, the Disability

\textsuperscript{87} Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), \textit{Submission} FV 124, 18 June 2010; Ngaanyatjarra Pitiyjarntjarara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, \textit{Submission} FV 117, 15 June 2010; Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), \textit{Submission} FV 111, 9 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{88} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission} FV 220, 1 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{89} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), \textit{Submission} FV 236, 20 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{90} Commissioner for Children (Tas), \textit{Submission} FV 62, 1 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{91} National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission} FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, \textit{Submission} FV 219, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, \textit{Submission} FV 212, 28 June 2010; Confidential, \textit{Submission} FV 184, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Services Commission (Western Australia) referred to the barriers facing victims of family violence who have a disability—or whose children have a disability—in leaving the family home:

laws that support victims to remain safely in the home may be more viable for people with disability, and including a purpose about ensuring minimal disruption to victims will go some way to furthering this. 92

7.66 Several stakeholders submitted that a purpose about minimal disruption should clearly relate to the lives of the victims of family violence, rather than to the lives of those who use family violence. 93 Some stakeholders also expressed concern that a principle of minimal disruption should not operate to compromise the safety of victims and their children. 94

7.67 Some stakeholders opposed or expressed reservations about including a principle about ensuring minimal disruption. 95 The Victorian Government, for example, pointed out that action may be in the best interests of women and children but may have a large impact on their lives, both due to referral to refuge and through their participation in the criminal and civil justice system. The inclusion of the term ‘minimal disruption’ may be interpreted to mean ‘minimal action’. 96

7.68 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others referred to the provisions regarding minimal disruption in Victorian family violence legislation. While Victorian courts are to take the desirability of minimising disruption into account in making exclusion orders, they are also required to have regard to a number of other specified factors and—more generally—all circumstances of the case. 97 The stakeholders argued that this approach is more appropriate, as it does not pre-empt Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Disability Services Commission (WA), Submission FV 138, 23 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 37, 12 May 2010.

92 Disability Services Commission (WA), Submission FV 138, 23 June 2010.
93 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Warringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
97 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 82(2).
consideration of the circumstances of individual cases with a core purpose favouring exclusion.\textsuperscript{98}

\textbf{Other core purposes}

7.69 Some stakeholders proposed other objectives to be considered as core common purposes. The Law Society of NSW, for example, stated that a principle articulating the right to a fair trial should be included as a purpose of family violence legislation.\textsuperscript{99} Similarly, National Legal Aid and Legal Aid NSW stated that the core purposes must ‘operate in the context of the fundamental right of a defendant to a fair trial’.\textsuperscript{100}

7.70 Some stakeholders suggested purposes about supporting and encouraging the agency and independence of victims of family violence,\textsuperscript{101} and treating their views with respect,\textsuperscript{102} should be included.

7.71 Several stakeholders submitted that the protection of children should be included as a core purpose.\textsuperscript{103} The Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian suggested a purpose of “enabling persons who experience or fear family violence to protect their children from experiencing or being exposed to family violence”.\textsuperscript{104} It commented that the articulation of such a purpose would assist parents who experience family violence to protect their children and, in doing so, avoid the future involvement of child protection agencies.

7.72 Other stakeholders suggested restraint in the specification of further core purposes. Women’s Legal Services NSW argued that it is important that protection order legislation does not become too complex to be applied in practice. In our experience, in busy courtrooms magistrates may not follow all aspects of the legislation.\textsuperscript{105}

7.73 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse and National Legal Aid cautioned against making legislative provisions too complex.\textsuperscript{106} In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others stated that there is probably no need for further core purposes, while the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria described the core purposes in Victoria as ‘succinct and sufficient’.

\textsuperscript{100} National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV 232}, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, \textit{Submission FV 219}, 1 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{101} National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV 232}, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, \textit{Submission FV 219}, 1 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{105} Women’s Legal Services NSW, \textit{Submission FV 182}, 25 June 2010.

Objects clause in Western Australian family violence legislation

7.74 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) should be amended to include an objects clause. The majority of stakeholders who commented on this proposal expressed their support. For example, the Gosnells Community Legal Centre stated that including an objects clause would guide interpretation of the legislation and foster consistency in decision making. Two further submissions—while not wishing to comment on the laws of Western Australia—stated ‘in principle’ agreement to the inclusion of objects clauses.

Objects clause in Queensland family violence legislation

7.75 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the objects clause in the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) should be amended to specify core purposes, other than the existing main purpose of providing for the safety and protection of persons in particular relationships.

7.76 Stakeholders who commented on this proposal overwhelmingly were in support. The Queensland Government noted that, while an objects clause is not specifically referred to in the Queensland consultation paper on the review of the

---

108 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
110 Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 93, 3 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Gosnells Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 56, 31 May 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.
112 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld), its consultation on legislative principles involves a consideration of other provisions which could make reference to the purposes and objectives of the legislation.\textsuperscript{115}

Objects clause in Tasmanian family violence legislation

7.77 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the objects clause in the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) should be amended to specify more clearly the core purposes of the Act.\textsuperscript{116} All stakeholders who commented on this proposal were in support.\textsuperscript{117} The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) considered that amending the objects clause may assist judicial officers in applying objectives to specific cases.\textsuperscript{118}

Commissions’ views

Objects clauses in family violence legislation

7.78 The articulation of core common purposes across state and territory family violence legislation is a critical pillar of a common interpretative framework complementing the inclusion of guiding principles—as well as a shared understanding of family violence—across jurisdictions. Objects clauses serve an important educative function, and enhance consistency in decision making. It is essential that they are given some prominence in family violence legislation.

7.79 The Commissions consider that there should be a cluster of core purposes that are commonly acknowledged and articulated across each of the states and territories. The Commissions recommend that these purposes address the following aims:

(a) to ensure or maximise the safety and protection of persons who fear or experience family violence;

(b) to prevent or reduce family violence and the exposure of children to family violence; and

(c) to ensure that persons who use family violence are made accountable for their conduct.

\textsuperscript{115} Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{116} Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–26(b).
\textsuperscript{117} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 149, 24 June 2010; Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010 Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 68, 1 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; P Eastal, Submission FV 37, 12 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{118} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
Wording of core purposes

7.80 It is not necessary for objects clauses in family violence legislation to express purposes using precisely the same wording, nor is there a need for every purpose in one jurisdiction to be replicated in the others. In expressing the core purposes, the Commissions do not intend to set out a prescriptive formulation. The detailed drafting of core purposes is a matter for state and territory governments.

7.81 The Commissions note the submission of the Commissioner for Children (Tas), who expressed concerns about the wording of the following proposed core purpose:

to ensure that persons who use family violence accept responsibility—or are made accountable—for their conduct.119

7.82 The Commissions agree that family violence legislation can make persons who use family violence accountable for their behaviour, but it cannot ensure that they accept responsibility for their conduct, although judicial officers exercising their powers under the legislation may attempt to do so.

Minimal disruption as a core purpose

7.83 The Commissions note the concerns of some stakeholders in relation to the inclusion of a purpose regarding minimal disruption in family violence legislation. Appropriate steps to ensure the safety and wellbeing of victims of family violence may require action which leads to disruption and upheaval of their lives. In some cases, it may be safer for victims of family violence to leave the home than to remain.120 A legislative purpose favouring minimal disruption therefore may not operate to the benefit of victims in all circumstances. The Commissions are concerned that, as submitted by the Victorian Government, including the term ‘minimal disruption’ may be interpreted to mean ‘minimal action’.121 There are more appropriate ways to encourage judicial officers to consider making exclusion orders than including a purpose about minimal disruption in family violence legislation, including the measures recommended in Chapter 11.

Other core purposes

7.84 The Commissions do not wish to be overly prescriptive of the purposes that should be included in state and territory family violence for two reasons. First, the Commissions note the concerns expressed by some stakeholders regarding the complexity that may result from including numerous purposes. Secondly, the Commissions consider that states and territories should have flexibility to articulate additional purposes in addition to core ones. For example, one purpose that may be considered by states and territories is a purpose relating to treating the views of victims

119 Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–25(b).
120 See also Ch 11.
of family violence with respect. Alternatively, this could be located in the principles of the legislation, as in Victorian family violence legislation.\textsuperscript{122}

7.85 The Commissions do not consider that it is necessary to recommend that a core purpose of family violence legislation is to ensure the right of an accused person to a fair trial. The primary purpose of family violence legislation is to provide protection from future violence, including in situations where the conduct constituting family violence is not criminal. The right of an accused to a fair trial is a crucial component of the rule of law, and is a principle which underpins the Australian legal system. However, it is unnecessary to articulate the right in family violence legislation which is primarily aimed at protecting persons from future family violence as a civil law matter.

7.86 The Commissions note that some stakeholders suggested that a core purpose should include the protection of children. This purpose is accommodated by recommending that a core purpose of family violence legislation is to reduce or prevent family violence and the exposure of children to family violence. In addition, the other two recommended core purposes—dealing with maximising the safety and protection of persons who fear or experience family violence and ensuring the accountability of those who use family violence—will have considerable direct and indirect benefits in protecting children from violence. Further, the Commissions also recommend that definitions of family violence in family violence legislation include the exposure of children to the effects of family violence.\textsuperscript{123}

\textbf{Objects clauses in family violence legislation: Western Australia, Queensland and Tasmania}

7.87 The Commissions’ general recommendation regarding objects clauses applies to all state and territory family violence legislation. The Commissions, therefore, do not make separate recommendations regarding the family violence legislation of Western Australia, Queensland and Tasmania. However, the Commissions consider the following amendments should be made:

- the \textit{Restraining Orders Act 1997} (WA) should be amended to include an objects clause;
- the objects clause in the \textit{Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989} (Qld) should be amended to specify core purposes, other than the existing main purpose of providing for the safety and protection of persons in particular relationships; and
- the objects clause in the \textit{Family Violence Act 2004} (Tas) should be amended to specify more clearly the core purposes of the Act.

7.88 The objects clauses in the Queensland, Tasmanian and Western Australian family violence legislation should include core purposes recommended by the Commissions.

\textsuperscript{122} Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) preamble (d).
\textsuperscript{123} Rec 5–1(i).
Recommendation 7–4 State and territory family violence legislation should articulate the following common set of core purposes:

(a) to ensure or maximise the safety and protection of persons who fear or experience family violence;

(b) to prevent or reduce family violence and the exposure of children to family violence; and

(c) to ensure that persons who use family violence are made accountable for their conduct.

Grounds for obtaining a protection order

7.89 While the grounds for obtaining protection orders differ across state and territory family violence legislation, there are two broad approaches to setting a threshold for obtaining a protection order, which are considered below. In all jurisdictions, the court has discretion not to make a protection order, even if the grounds for the order have been met.

Acts-based tests

7.90 One approach is to focus on the commission of past family violence. Victoria and Queensland take this approach, but also require proof that the person who used family violence is likely to do so again.

7.91 Tasmania takes a similar approach of focusing both on past and future conduct, except rather than using the terminology of the person using violence being ‘likely to commit’ family violence again, it uses the terminology that the person ‘may again commit’ family violence. ‘May’, on its face, suggests a less stringent test than ‘likely’, implying possibility rather than probability. The Second Reading Speeches for the Tasmanian family violence legislation do not indicate why the terminology of ‘may’ was preferred to ‘likely’—or indeed if it was an intentional choice. The Commissions are not aware of any cases that have judicially considered this aspect of the provision.

7.92 Hunter and Stubbs have criticised the approach of requiring a victim to prove likelihood of further family violence:

This represents a significant hurdle for complainants, particularly those who, in order to ensure their safety, have separated from their violent partner. Some magistrates 124 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 74. This issues is considered in Victorian Law Reform Commission, Review of Family Violence Laws: Report (2006), 112–113. Rec 19 focused solely on expanding the existing grounds to accommodate the proposed expanded definition of family violence.

125 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 20.

126 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 16(1).
have difficulty understanding why women remain fearful after separation, when as they see it, the parties are unlikely to have any future contact with each other.

7.93 The ACT also relies on an acts-based test, however it alone allows for a protection order to be made on the basis that the person against whom it is sought has used family violence.

Effect on the victim

7.94 The second broad approach focuses on the effect on the victim. In NSW, a person must have reasonable grounds to fear, and must in fact fear, the commission of a personal violence offence. Thus, both an objective and subjective test are applied. The subjective test of fear is not, however, required to be met in certain cases. These include if the protected person is a child or of below average intelligence. Importantly, another exception is where the victim has been subjected to past family violence by the person against whom the order is sought, and there is a likelihood that the person using violence will do so again, and the court is satisfied that the making of the order is necessary in the circumstances. The Northern Territory legislation only requires an objective standard of fear.

7.95 Hunter and Stubbs have expressed the view that a test requiring reasonable apprehension of fear has some advantages over a test focusing on past conduct and likelihood of repetition:

This approach is preferable in that it does not require waiting for a violent act to occur before an order can be made, and is in line with the preventive function of the protection order.

7.96 Chief Justice James Spigelman of the NSW Supreme Court, writing extra-curially, notes that the concept of freedom from fear has disappeared from legal discourse:

This is regrettable because the most significant impact on personal freedom occurs through the mechanism of fear, rather than through actual direct interference with such freedom. …

The most effective, indeed the most common, form of interference with freedom arises from the self-imposed restraint on behaviour because of the threat of adverse consequences if the behaviour is engaged in. Furthermore, the restraint on the behaviour is greater, indeed almost always much greater, than would occur on the basis of calculation of the probability of those consequences actually occurring. …

Once it is accepted that protection of human rights requires not only the prevention of direct interference, but also a response to the threat of interference, then freedom from fear can be seen to inhere in most of the human rights protected by international

---

128 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 46(1).
129 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 16.
130 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 18.
instruments and domestic provisions. Such freedom is not, itself, a freestanding right. It should, however, be recognised as a critical dimension of other rights.\textsuperscript{132}

7.97 The South Australian family violence legislation articulates the test as reasonable grounds to ‘suspect’—rather than ‘fear’—that the relevant person will commit an act of abuse, and that making an order is appropriate in all the circumstances.\textsuperscript{133}

7.98 In no state or territory does family violence legislation rely on grounds for the making of protection orders which consist of a subjective test alone—for example, a subjective test of fear.

\textbf{Act and effect}

7.99 Western Australia, in effect, adopts both approaches in the alternative. That is, a court can make a protection order either because there has been past violence and there is the likelihood of future violence, or because the victim has reasonable grounds to fear violence. In each case, the court has to be satisfied that the granting of the order is appropriate in the circumstances.\textsuperscript{134} The approach of adopting both tests in the alternative is in accordance with the approach ultimately recommended by the Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group in drafting Model Domestic Violence Laws.\textsuperscript{135}

\textbf{Options for reform}

7.100 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should adopt the same grounds for obtaining a protection order.\textsuperscript{136} The Commissions also proposed that grounds for obtaining a protection order should not require proof of likelihood of repetition of family violence, unless such proof is an alternative to a ground that focuses on the impact of the violence on the person seeking protection.\textsuperscript{137}

7.101 The Commissions presented four options for consistent grounds for obtaining a protection order. The options reflected the Commissions’ preference for grounds that focus on the effect on the victim, and the exclusion of grounds that rely solely on proof of likelihood of repetition of violence. The Commissions asked stakeholders for their views on which of the following grounds should be adopted by the states and territories:

- a test similar to that in NSW—which includes an objective test of fear, and a subjective test with the latter capable of being excluded in certain circumstances;

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 6.
\item Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 11A.
\item Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group, Model Domestic Violence Laws (1999), s 14(1).
\item Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–27.
\item Ibid, Proposal 4–28.
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
• a test similar to that in the Northern Territory, which imposes only an objective test of fear;
• a test similar to that adopted in South Australia, which imposes an objective test of suspicion that the relevant person will use violence plus a requirement that the court is satisfied that making the order is appropriate in all the circumstances; or
• an approach similar to that in Western Australia and advocated in the Model Domestic Violence Laws—that is, adopting as alternatives a test that focuses on past conduct and likelihood of repetition, and the objective test of fear.138

Submissions and consultations
Consistent grounds for protection orders

7.102 The majority of stakeholders supported the proposal that state and territory family violence legislation should adopt consistent grounds for obtaining a protection order.139 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria and Legal Aid NSW considered that this would address cross-jurisdictional issues when victims of family violence move interstate.140 The Queensland Government submitted that harmonising the grounds for protection orders across state and territory jurisdictions is particularly relevant in the context of the proposed national scheme to register protection orders across all states and territories.141

139 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; WESNET—The Women’s Services Network, Submission FV 217, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; K Greenland, Submission FV 161, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010 Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 125, 20 June 2010; Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, Submission FV 117, 15 June 2010; T Searle, Submission FV 108, 2 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 92, 3 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 87, 9 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 76, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 68, 1 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 37, 12 May 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 34, 6 May 2010.
140 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
7.103 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria and Legal Aid NSW pointed to the benefit of consistency across jurisdictions in interpretation and enforcement of legislation. The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria submitted that:

there is very little case law in family violence and it would be helpful to have a body of common law across the country that assisted judicial officers in interpreting and applying this and other aspects of family violence legislation.\(^\text{142}\)

7.104 A number of stakeholders—while supporting the proposal—expressed concern that harmonising the grounds in state and territory family violence legislation should not be achieved by retreating to the lowest common denominator, resulting in diminished protection for victims.\(^\text{143}\)

Likelihood of repetition test

7.105 Most stakeholders who commented agreed with the proposal that the grounds for obtaining a protection order should not require proof of likelihood of repetition of family violence, unless such proof is an alternative to a ground that focuses on the impact on the violence on the person seeking protection.\(^\text{144}\) One stakeholder considered that the test is inappropriate, given the nature of family violence, in particular that it occurs in the context of a relationship and is generally ongoing.\(^\text{145}\) Another submission stated that a single instance of family violence may be sufficient to prompt reasonable fear of further violence.\(^\text{146}\)

---

\(^\text{142}\) Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

\(^\text{143}\) Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.

\(^\text{144}\) Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Crossroads Community Care Centre Inc, Submission FV 211, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; K Greenland, Submission FV 161, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 160, 24 June 2010; UnitingCare Children Young People and Families, Submission FV 151, 24 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; F Hardy, Submission FV 126, 16 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 125, 20 June 2010; K Johnston, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Education Centre Against Violence, Submission FV 90, 3 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 49, 3 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 68, 1 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.

\(^\text{146}\) Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010.
7.106 Some stakeholders referred to the difficulties of proving likelihood of repetition.\textsuperscript{147} The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (AFVPLS) and the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria argued that it may be particularly difficult to prove in circumstances where there has been serious family violence in the past, but no violence during the term of a previous protection order or for a considerable period.\textsuperscript{148}

7.107 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria commented that proving likelihood of repetition may be problematic when parties have separated, despite a history of violence and the victim being in fear. The courts—which currently apply a likelihood of repetition test—agreed it would be assisted by the inclusion of an additional ground for obtaining a protection order, that is, a ground that focuses on the impact of the violence on the person seeking protection.\textsuperscript{149}

7.108 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) and National Legal Aid submitted that there are circumstances in which it may be reasonable for a person to fear family violence, despite family violence toward that person not having previously occurred.\textsuperscript{150} The Queensland Government noted that, in the review of Queensland family violence legislation, some stakeholders suggested that the requirement to prove repetition of family violence should be removed from the Act.\textsuperscript{151}

7.109 The Queensland Law Society did not support the proposal, arguing that the likelihood of repetition test in the Queensland legislation should be retained. It submitted that the test is not onerous, and provides an appropriate balance between protecting victims and properly scrutinising applications for protection orders. The Law Society submitted that the likelihood of repetition test provides a safeguard against spurious applications, including cross applications by respondents who have used family violence:

> If the ‘fear’ test proposed by the Commissions were to be adopted in Queensland, then it is likely that orders which are currently not capable of being made in Queensland due to the safeguard of the ‘likely’ test will be made resulting in more orders being made in cross applications brought by violent husbands.\textsuperscript{152}

\textit{Preferred grounds for protection orders}

7.110 Stakeholders were divided over which grounds for obtaining a protection order should become standard across the states and territories, with all options presented by the Commissions receiving some support.
Two stakeholders—Legal Aid NSW and the Law Society of NSW—preferred a test that includes both objective and subjective elements. However, other stakeholders expressed concern about the inclusion of a subjective test of fear. The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) and the Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania stated that such a test could prevent police from applying for a protection order where victims state they are not fearful of a person who has used family violence, but where police have good reason to expect violent conduct may occur. This may be of particular concern where children may be exposed to family violence. The Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania pointed out that ‘this could also have implications for the involvement of child protection authorities in ensuring the safety of affected children’.

The Queensland Law Society also criticised grounds based on a subjective test, referring to applications for protection orders where a person genuinely held fears, but the fears were misplaced. It provided an example in which a woman sought an application against her husband. The wife’s fear of her husband was ‘genuine, albeit misplaced, due to her psychiatric condition’. It argued that on the basis of a subjective test of fear, an order may have been made against the husband in these circumstances.

Other stakeholders opposed grounds based on fear, as they considered that due to sex-role conditioning, men are less likely to admit that they are fearful. The One in Three Campaign further stated that fear ‘is a subjective term which is easily misused by persons with malicious intent’ and expressed a preference for the South Australian grounds, which avoid reference to fear.

Many stakeholders considered that the broad grounds provided by the Western Australian family violence legislation most appropriate. AFVPLS preferred these grounds on the basis that one of the alternative tests within these grounds did not refer to an objective standard of reasonableness.160

7.115 Professor Patricia Easteal also commented that including the term ‘reasonable’ in the grounds is problematic.161 In contrast, one stakeholder noted that incorporating an objective test of fear—that is, one that invokes a reasonableness test—may restrict abuse of process and can ‘knock down vexatious applications’.162

Commissions’ views

Consistent grounds for protection orders

7.116 The Commissions consider that each state and territory should have consistent grounds for making a protection order. In furthering the improvement of safety through legal frameworks, it is unacceptable that victims suffering similar experiences of abuse in different jurisdictions may have varying chances of obtaining a protection order based on the legislative threshold for the granting of orders in their jurisdiction.

7.117 Consistent grounds in state and territory legislation also complement the Commissions’ recommended approach for a common interpretative framework, comprising core definitions of family violence, as well as a consistent approach with regard to guiding principles and a common understanding of the nature and feature of family violence. Just as there should be a common understanding of what constitutes family violence, so should there be a common understanding of when the law should step in to provide protection.

7.118 Adopting consistent grounds across states and territories is also important in the context of the Australian Government’s commitment to the establishment of a scheme for the national registration of protection orders. Such a scheme would allow protection orders to be enforced across state and territory borders.163 It is incongruous if thresholds for obtaining protection orders are variable across jurisdictions, where the orders themselves are enforceable in each state and territory. A scheme for the national registration for protection orders is discussed in more detail in Chapter 30.

7.119 A disparity in the grounds for obtaining a protection order across the states and territories is also relevant to the issue of whether family violence laws are capable of interacting with the Family Law Act. Consider the following hypothetical:

---

Victim A resides in the ACT. She was physically assaulted by her partner. She applies for a protection order and has to prove that her partner assaulted her. She has photographic evidence of the injuries sustained in the assault, as well as the corroborating evidence of a neighbour. The court grants the application. The order is later made final. Victim A is also involved in family law proceedings seeking custody of her children. The Family Court has to consider the protection order made in her favour.

Victim B resides in Queensland. She also was physically assaulted by her partner. She applies for a protection order and has to prove that her partner assaulted her and that he is likely to do so again. She has photographic evidence of the injuries sustained in the assault, as well as the corroborating evidence of a friend.

She gives evidence that her partner is likely to assault her again, based on her knowledge that when he is under considerable stress at work he ‘takes it out on her’. She leads evidence that similar types of assault occurred two years before, when her partner was also under considerable financial and work stress. Her partner contests the application, expressing remorse and providing evidence that he has enrolled in an anger management course. The court does not grant the application. Victim B is also involved in family law proceedings seeking custody of her child. Unlike the case of Victim A, there is no protection order to which the Family Court must have regard.

7.120 In Chapter 17, the Commissions recommend that, in determining the best interests of the child in making a parenting order in family law proceedings, the court should consider any family violence involving the child or a member of the child’s family, including evidence given or findings made in any protection order proceedings. This recommendation is aimed at amending the existing provision, which requires courts to take into account final or contested protection orders only. If implemented, it should help to address some concerns and problems that arise for victims of family violence from the interaction of the Family Law Act and family violence legislation.

7.121 However, the Commissions also consider that the existence of a protection order should act as a flag to federal family courts that family violence is an issue in the proceedings before the court. Consequently, even if the Commissions’ abovementioned recommendation is implemented, the existence of inconsistent grounds for obtaining protection orders across the states and territories may result in inequality of treatment of parties before federal family courts. That is, some victims may not have been able to obtain a protection order which may act as such a ‘flag’ to the existence of family violence, in circumstances where victims in other jurisdictions have this advantage.

164 Rec 17–1.
Likelihood of repetition test

7.122 The Commissions have concerns about an approach that requires proof of likelihood of repetition, due to the evidentiary hurdle that this may present to victims.

7.123 The likelihood of repetition should not be the sole ground for obtaining a protection order in family violence legislation. The purpose of a protection order should be anticipatory and preventative—capable of protecting persons before an act of family violence occurs. Further, the Commissions note concerns that proving likelihood of repetition may be difficult for victims in some circumstances, particularly if some time has elapsed since the latest incident of family violence due to, for example, persons who used family violence spending time in prison, or the existence of previous protection orders.

7.124 In the Commissions’ view, the requirement to prove that a person is ‘likely to commit’ or ‘may commit’ family violence imposes a further burden on the victim which is not imposed on victims who must establish reasonable fear or reasonable suspicion. As noted by Hunter and Stubbs, proving likelihood of repetition may be difficult for victims, particularly those who have separated from their partner. Further, acts-based tests require victims to wait for an act of family violence to occur, and do not facilitate the preventative nature of family violence legislation.165

7.125 The Commissions therefore consider that the grounds for obtaining a protection order under state and territory legislation should not require proof of likelihood of repetition of family violence. However, there is a place for a likelihood of repetition test as an alternative ground in family violence legislation, as discussed below.

Rejection of acts-based tests

7.126 While there was widespread support for the proposal that family violence legislation should not specify grounds for obtaining a protection order that requires a proof of likelihood test, the Commissions do not consider it necessary to make a separate recommendation in this regard. Recommendation 7–5 sets out the grounds to obtain a protection order which should be adopted by state and territory family violence legislation. The Commissions consider that the ambit of this Recommendation reflects that state and territory family violence legislation should not require a proof of likelihood test to be met as grounds to obtain a protection order.

Rejection of acts-based tests

7.127 The commission of past violence test in the ACT family violence legislation does not constitute a suitable ground for obtaining a protection order for two reasons. First, this test is not adequately preventative or anticipatory, as it requires an act of family violence to occur before a person meets the requirements to obtain a protection order. Secondly, this test does not attempt to consider whether or not a person is actually in need of future protection, which is the primary function of family violence legislation. To frame the grounds so widely is to allow, for example, the indiscriminate granting of protection orders against victims in cross applications where a victim may have resisted violently, but where the primary aggressor does not need protection.\textsuperscript{166}

\textbf{Rejection of subjective fear test}

7.128 Reliance on a subjective test of fear was not suggested by the Commissions as a potential option for consistent grounds in the Consultation Paper. The purposes of family violence legislation do not include protecting persons from an unfounded fear of family violence. Family violence legislation must include a mechanism to test applications and ensure that an order is appropriate for a person’s protection. This mechanism is not provided by a subjective test as it includes no criteria to assess subjective fears, such as whether fears are reasonably held, or if future family violence is likely.

7.129 The Commissions have concerns about grounds that incorporate a subjective test in addition to an objective test. The Commissions consider that the requirement that a person in fact fears family violence may lead to gaps in protection in some circumstances. A person who is at risk of family violence, but does not have or express fear, may not be adequately protected by legislation. Some victims may not express fear due to concerns about retaliation. Some stakeholders noted that the requirements of the subjective test may particularly affect male victims, who may be reluctant to admit to fear.

7.130 The Commissions do not consider that the exceptions in the NSW legislation to the application of the subjective test are sufficient to protect victims of family violence. In cases where a victim has previously experienced family violence—but does not have or express fear—the court applies a proof of likelihood of repetition test, in addition to a further test that the order is necessary in the circumstances. These two elements combine to form an unduly onerous test. Further, the exceptions to proving the subjective test of fear do not capture persons at risk of violence where family violence has not previously occurred.

7.131 This gap in protection may extend to children who have been—or are at risk of being—exposed to the effects of family violence. Further, victims who do not fear family violence may find themselves unable to comply with the advice of child protection agencies to obtain protection orders. Ineligibility for a protection order may leave such families vulnerable to more intrusive intervention by child protection agencies.

7.132 Consequently, in the Commissions’ view, the objective test of fear is appropriate without the requirement that the person, in fact, fears family violence. Eliminating the subjective test of fear provides greater protection to persons at risk of family violence who may not fear or may not express their fear of future violence.

7.133 Further, the Commissions prefer an objective test of fear to an objective test of suspicion. Grounds based on fear—including an objective test of fear—are focused primarily on the impact on the victim. The test evaluates the potential behaviour of the person who may use family violence through the effect on the victim. In contrast, the test of reasonable suspicion does not focus exclusively on the impact on the victim. To illustrate, anyone may suspect certain future behaviour given certain factors. To fear future conduct is a more personal and emotive response.

\textsuperscript{166} See Ch 9 for discussion on identifying the primary aggressor.

7.134 Freedom from fear is a central human rights component of family violence legislation, complementing the right to personal security. Chief Justice Spigelman has identified legislation relating to protection orders as ‘the most important mechanism directed to the dimension of fear in express terms’. In applying for a protection order a victim is, in effect, seeking not only protection from violence but also freedom from fear. The Commissions consider that a test based on reasonable fear should form one of the alternative grounds for obtaining a protection order.

7.135 The Commissions note the concerns of some stakeholders about the inclusion of the term ‘reasonable’ in grounds for a protection order. The Commissions acknowledge that including an objective test in the definition of family violence is not appropriate, as discussed in Chapter 6. However, the Commissions consider that objective grounds as a legislative threshold for a protection order provides the necessary mechanism to test applications, while also providing accessible protection for victims of violence. This mechanism is necessary to deal effectively with applications that are not genuine, as well as applications by persons who fear violence without due cause.

7.136 The Commissions consider that broad grounds should be available to persons who have experienced or are at risk of family violence. The objective test of fear should be complemented by an alternative ground that focuses on past conduct and likelihood of repetition. Persons who have experienced family violence retain the option of satisfying the future likelihood of repetition test where there is no evidentiary hurdle to doing so. Where meeting this test may cause difficulties, persons should have the option of relying on the objective test of fear. A test with appropriate alternative grounds provides broad coverage for the protection of persons who have experienced or are at risk of family violence, and preserves those persons’ access to the Commissions’ preferred test—the objective test of fear.

Recommendation 7–5 State and territory family violence legislation should adopt the following alternative grounds for obtaining a protection order.

That is:

(a) the person seeking protection has reasonable grounds to fear family violence; or

(b) the person he or she is seeking protection from has used family violence and is likely to do so again.

168 Ibid, 379.
Persons protected

7.137 In order for a person to obtain a protection order under family violence legislation, that person needs to be in a defined relationship with the person engaging in violence. This section discusses the relationships covered by family violence legislation across the states and territories, and considers whether there should be greater consistency in response to persons protected generally, and in relation to certain categories of relationships—Indigenous concepts of family, members of culturally recognised family groups, and carers.

7.138 The United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs Division for the Advancement of Women has recommended that family violence legislation should apply at a minimum to:

- individuals who are or have been in an intimate relationship, including marital, non-marital, same sex and non-cohabiting relationships;
- individuals with family relationships to one another; and
- members of the same household.169

7.139 Relationships covered by family violence legislation across the jurisdictions differ in some key respects. Table A below sets out a summary of the relationships that are covered across the jurisdictions.

---

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Spouse</th>
<th>Partner (not married) (incl same sex)</th>
<th>Intimate personal relationship</th>
<th>Child</th>
<th>Relative</th>
<th>Indigenous</th>
<th>Carer</th>
<th>Other relationships</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>NSW</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓ live in same household; long-term residents in same residential facility at same time</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vic</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓ any person regarded as family member</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qld</td>
<td>✓ includes either biological parent</td>
<td>✓ engaged also whether or not sexual if dated and lives enmeshed.</td>
<td>✓ included in definition of relative</td>
<td>✓ by blood or marriage (non-exhaustive examples)</td>
<td>✓ referred to as an example of people who may have a wider concept of relative</td>
<td>✓ informal care relationships-defined</td>
<td>✓ definition of relative includes person whom relevant person regards as a relative or vice versa eg members of certain communities with NESB and people with particular religious beliefs</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WA</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓ (de facto)</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>'related' is defined to consider cultural, religious and social background</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓ personal relationship of a domestic nature where lives interrelated and actions affect the other</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SA</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>domestic partners</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓ unpaid care relationships</td>
<td>✓</td>
<td>✓ members of some other culturally recognised family group</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Table A continued

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Spouse</th>
<th>Partner (not married) (incl same sex)</th>
<th>Intimate personal relationship</th>
<th>Child</th>
<th>Relative</th>
<th>Indigenous</th>
<th>Carer</th>
<th>Other relationships</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Tas</td>
<td>✔</td>
<td>✔significant relationships as defined</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACT</td>
<td>✔domestic partner</td>
<td>✔domestic partner</td>
<td>✔intimate relation other than domestic partnership—not linked to living in same household</td>
<td>✔child of domestic partner or former domestic partner—no other restriction on this</td>
<td>✔sets out defined categories plus anyone else who could reasonably be considered to be a relative</td>
<td>✔included as example of anyone else who could reasonably be considered to be a relative</td>
<td></td>
<td>✔definition of relative includes anyone else who could reasonably be considered to be a relative</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NT</td>
<td>✔</td>
<td>✔de facto</td>
<td>✔whether or not sexual if dating or if engaged</td>
<td>covered by reference to relative</td>
<td>✔examples of relatives given. Non exhaustive list</td>
<td>✔included in definition of relative</td>
<td></td>
<td>✔any person who has or had custody or guardianship or right of access to another person. Ordinarily or regularly lives or has lived with other person or someone else who is in family relationship with other person or is or has been in family relation with a child of other person</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
7. Other Aspects of a Common Interpretative Framework

7.140 Family violence legislation in the Northern Territory expressly includes dating relationships, as does the Queensland legislation where the lives of the parties are or have been enmeshed. While same sex relationships are not expressly included in most family violence legislation, the language of the Acts does not exclude same sex couples.

7.141 Most state and territory family violence legislation includes relatives within their ambit—although the class of persons is variously defined. Some jurisdictions recognise violence between persons who live together in the same household (that is, without being in a relationship) as family violence. Other jurisdictions recognise meaningful personal relationships between people outside conventional definitions. In Victoria, a family member can include any person whom the relevant person regarded as being like a family member having regard to the circumstances of the relationship. In Western Australia, a ‘personal relationship of a domestic nature in which the lives of the persons are, or were, interrelated and the actions of one person affects or affected, the other person’ is within the scope of the family violence legislation.

7.142 The Tasmanian Family Violence Act 2004 covers the narrowest range of relationships, in that it applies only to spouses and unmarried couples. The legislation does not cover relations between parents and children, persons and ancestors, or siblings. Persons in these types of relationships and other relatives can seek restraining orders under the Justices Act 1959 (Tas), but the grounds for obtaining a restraining order under this Act are more limited than those under the family violence legislation. In addition, the penalties for breaching restraining orders under the Justices Act are significantly lower than those that attach to breaches of an order under the family violence legislation. In effect, this means that people in certain family relationships are given less protection from violence by the law than others.

7.143 The 2008 Review of the Family Violence Act 2004 referred to criticisms by some stakeholders that the definition was too narrow to capture the range of relationships which should attract the protection of the Act; and that the definition of family relationship should be sufficiently broad to cover all intimate 171 Section 9(2) of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) provides that the gender of persons is irrelevant for the purpose of determining whether those persons are domestic partners. Section 15 of the Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) refers to s 169 of the Legislation Act 2001 (ACT), which provides that persons may be in a domestic partnership whether they are ‘of a different or same sex’.

172 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 5(d); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) 9(d). See also Domestic Violence Act 1995 (NZ) s 4(1)(c).

173 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 8(3).

174 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 4(2).

175 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) ss 4, 7; referring to the Relationships Act 2003 (Tas) s 4.

176 See Justices Act 1959 (Tas) s 106B—for example, economic abuse and emotional abuse are not covered.

177 Compare ibid s 106I (10 penalty units, imprisonment for six months) with Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 35 (tiered penalties depending on number of offences—imprisonment for up to five years).
personal relationships … people who are ordinarily members of the household and family relationships which reflect the extent of kinship within Indigenous and culturally and linguistically diverse communities.\textsuperscript{178}

7.144 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the Tasmanian Government should review the operation of the \textit{Family Violence Act 2004} (Tas) and the \textit{Justices Act 1959} (Tas) pt XA to establish equality of treatment of family members who are victims of family violence.\textsuperscript{179}

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

7.145 Most stakeholders who commented on the proposal supported it.\textsuperscript{180} One stakeholder stated that ‘equality of treatment is vital for all family members who are victims of family violence’.\textsuperscript{181}

7.146 The Commissioner for Children (Tas) expressed the view that the \textit{Family Violence Act 2004} (Tas) provides inadequate protection for children, and that violence against children by parents and their partners should be included within the definition of family violence.\textsuperscript{182}

7.147 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) objected to the proposal. It expressed the view that ‘family violence legislation should only relate to individuals sharing an intimate relationship and should not be used to cover other types of family relationships’.\textsuperscript{183} It considered that family violence legislation may not be the most appropriate response to violence within broader categories of relationships, and submitted that alternative responses should be explored. The Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania also expressed this view.\textsuperscript{184} Both stakeholders cited concerns that including a broader range of relationships in family violence legislation may dilute the message about inter-spousal violence.

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

7.148 The Commissions’ view remains that persons in family relationships should have an equal level of protection both within and across jurisdictions. This position attracted widespread stakeholder support. One way of addressing this concern is to \textsuperscript{178} Urbis, \textit{Review of the Family Violence Act 2004} (2008), prepared for the Department of Justice (Tas), 12.

\textsuperscript{179} Consultation Paper, Proposal 4–19.
\textsuperscript{181} M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{182} Commissioner for Children (Tas), Submission FV 62, 1 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{183} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{184} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
specify a core set of relationships that state and territory family violence legislation should cover.

7.149 The Commissions favour a modern, inclusive approach to the definition of family. Therefore, the categories recommended by the Commissions below constitute an essential core, to which states and territories may add consistently with the objective of ensuring equality of protection within the jurisdiction.

7.150 The Commissions consider that state and territory family violence legislation should cover, as the core group of persons protected, the following categories of relationships:

- past or current intimate relationships, including dating, cohabiting, and spousal relationships, irrespective of the gender of the parties and whether the relationship is of a sexual nature;
- family members;
- relatives;
- children of an intimate partner;
- those who fall within Indigenous concepts of family; and
- members of other culturally recognised family groups.

7.151 This core group reflects the recommendation of the United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs Division for the Advancement of Women, with the exception of persons living in the same household. In NSW, where members of the same household are covered by family violence legislation, police have expressed the view that the operation of such a broad definition is problematic.185 The Commissions consider that whether to include persons living in the same household in family violence legislation is a matter for the states and territories to achieve consistency in the level of protection in the particular jurisdiction. To this end, where such persons are not covered by family violence legislation, they should have access to protection orders through other legislation.

7.152 The Commissions have concerns about the limited range of relationships covered by family violence legislation in Tasmania. In particular, the Commissions are concerned that certain family relationships—such as between parents and children and between siblings—are afforded less legal protection and redress on breach of a ‘restraint’ order than spouses and couples.

7.153 The Commissions do not make a separate recommendation regarding Tasmanian family violence legislation, as the general recommendation regarding a core group of protected persons applies to all state and territory family violence legislation. However, the Commissions consider that the Tasmanian Government should review the Family Violence Act 2004 to ensure that, at least, the core categories of relationships the subject of Recommendation 7–6 are covered by the Act.

---

Indigenous concepts of family

7.154 Indigenous women suffer a disproportionately high level of family violence.\(^{186}\) As noted in the Time for Action report, Indigenous women report higher levels of physical violence during their lifetime than non-Indigenous women, and they are much more likely to experience sexual violence and to sustain injury.\(^ {187}\) Indigenous women may experience family violence within families, extended families, kinship networks and communities.

7.155 Family violence legislation in six jurisdictions expressly recognises an extended concept of relative among Indigenous peoples. Western Australian family violence legislation applies to persons who are related ‘taking into consideration [their] cultural, social or religious backgrounds’, which may cover persons who fall within Indigenous concepts of family.\(^ {188}\) Tasmanian family violence legislation does not cover persons who fall within Indigenous concepts of family. Family violence legislation in Queensland, South Australia, Victoria and Western Australia covers members of other culturally recognised family groups.

7.156 The 2008 review of the Tasmanian family violence legislation stated that it had not tested the extent to which stakeholder views favouring a broadening of the definition to include Indigenous and other kin relationships had ‘thought through’ the implications of a criminal justice response. The Review stated ‘that if a broader definition were to be explored by the Tasmanian government, the implication of a criminal justice response is a critical point to test with stakeholders’.\(^ {189}\)

7.157 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should include as protected persons those who fall within Indigenous concepts of family, as well as those who are members of some other culturally recognised family group.\(^ {190}\)

7.158 There was strong widespread support for the proposal among stakeholders.\(^ {191}\) Two stakeholders indicated that it was important that the communities affected should be consulted regarding changes to legislation.\(^ {192}\)

---

191 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc,
Commissions’ views

7.159 The Commissions consider that persons protected by family violence legislation of each state and territory should include as protected persons those who fall within Indigenous concepts of family. This is particularly important given the high levels of family violence experienced by Indigenous family members, including women and children. The Commissions consider that the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) should be amended to capture such persons.

7.160 The Commissions acknowledge that family violence legislation in Western Australia is applicable to those who fall within Indigenous concepts of family. However, the Commissions consider that there is merit in making specific reference to Indigenous concepts of family in light of the disproportionately high rates of family violence in that community. The Commissions consider that the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) should make specific reference to Indigenous concepts of family in provisions regarding persons protected.

7.161 Family violence legislation should also include as protected persons those who belong to culturally recognised family groups. The Commissions consider it important that the nature and details of such amendments are informed by consultation with Indigenous and CALD communities.

Carers

7.162 Family violence legislation in NSW and the Northern Territory protects persons in carer relationships, including paid carers. In Queensland, South Australia and the ACT, legislation provides that relationships with paid carers or a carer acting on behalf

---

192 The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.

193 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 5(f), Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 9(g).
338

Family Violence — A National Legal Response

of another person or organisation are not included as a protected category.\(^{194}\) In Victoria, relationships with paid and unpaid carers are expressly covered where that relationship is family-like.\(^{195}\) Family violence legislation in Tasmania and Western Australia does not address relationships with carers.

7.163 In jurisdictions that exclude paid carers, or do not include carers in the legislation, it is possible that individual relationships may be captured by some other recognised category of relationship.

7.164 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether relationships with carers—including those who are paid—should be included in the relationships covered by family violence legislation.\(^{196}\)

Submissions and consultations

7.165 Stakeholders expressed a range of views. Some submissions supported the inclusion of paid and unpaid carers in family violence legislation.\(^{197}\) For example, in a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others emphasised that violence in relationships with carers has the same dynamics or characteristics as family violence:

These essential dynamics are an intimate environment and a relationship of ‘power over’ brought about by the dependency of the person in relation to requiring intimate personal care and assistance with basic survival and daily living.\(^{198}\)

7.166 Some stakeholders cited concerns about a gap in protection for the most vulnerable people in society—for example, people with disabilities, older persons, children and young people—if relationships with paid carers are not captured by family violence legislation.\(^{199}\) Family violence legislation was considered an effective way of

---

194 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 12C(4); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) 8(8)(k); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 15(4)(b).

195 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 8(3)(h).

199 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, providing protection that could be obtained urgently, while potentially maintaining the relationship between the parties.

7.167 Several stakeholders opposed relationships with any carers—paid or unpaid—being included as a separate category of persons protected.200 The Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia) supported the inclusion of relationships with carers in family violence legislation only where the carer is in a family relationship with the person he or she is caring for.201

7.168 The Victorian Government distinguished relationships with carers that were family-like from other relationships involving the provision of care. The Victorian Government supported the inclusion of carers—both paid and unpaid—in circumstances where the carers are in a family-like relationship with the victim.202 Its submission referred to the Victorian family violence legislation as a model. This was also the model preferred by Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc.203

7.169 However, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria expressed concern with the Victorian approach. It noted that dealing with relationships with carers under different legislation, depending on whether or not the carer has a family-like relationship with the victim, leads to complexity. The court submitted that ‘it may be preferable if all carer relationships could be dealt with under the one Act’.204

7.170 Other stakeholders distinguished between relationships with carers who are paid, and relationships with carers who are unpaid. These submissions supported the inclusion of relationships with carers in family violence legislation only where the carers are unpaid, or the relationship is an informal care relationship.205

7.171 The Queensland Government expressed concern that including informal carers in the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) would significantly increase the ambit of the legislation, and suggested that consideration be given to other approaches to deal with abuse in the context of formal care.206 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) also stated that in Tasmania, violence in carer relationships may be dealt with by other legislative schemes.207

7.172 Two stakeholders outlined problems regarding the operation of the NSW family violence legislation, which includes relationships with paid carers.208 Legal Aid NSW

---

201  Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
204  Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
205  The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010 Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
207  Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
208  National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Apprehended Violence Legal Issues Coordinating Committee, Submission FV 228, 12 July 2010.
commented that, in some circumstances, the person using violence may be the person requiring care, and the use of family violence orders by paid carers against the person for whom they are caring may operate to disadvantage vulnerable people.209

7.173 A number of stakeholders who opposed the application of family violence legislation to relationships with paid carers stated that these relationships are of a different nature from the domestic, family or personal relationships which may involve the provision of unpaid care.210 For example, Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia) stated that, in broadening the definition of family violence to include relationships with unrelated paid carers, the concept of family violence is altered.211

Commisions’ views

7.174 Persons in relationships involving the provision of paid or unpaid care are entitled to protection from abuse. Family violence legislation may provide such protection to the most vulnerable in our communities—persons living with disabilities, older persons, children and young people—in an accessible and efficient way.

7.175 However, the Commissions note the difficulties identified by some stakeholders in the operation of family violence legislation which includes paid carers. The Commissions have concerns that including relationships with paid carers in family violence legislation may in some instances operate to further disadvantage persons requiring care.

7.176 In many cases, relationships with carers fall within other recognised categories of family relationships. The Commissions do not consider it essential that relationships with carers which do not fall within those categories should be included in family violence legislation in all states and territories. Legislation other than family violence legislation should provide persons in such relationships with access to protection orders. Therefore the Commissions do not make a recommendation that state and territory family violence legislation should cover relationships with carers.

Recommendation 7–6  State and territory family violence legislation should include as the core group of protected persons those who fall within the following categories of relationships:

(a) past or current intimate relationships, including dating, cohabiting, and spousal relationships, irrespective of the gender of the parties and whether the relationship is of a sexual nature;
(b) family members;
(c) relatives;

209 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
211 Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
(d) children of an intimate partner;
(e) those who fall within Indigenous concepts of family; and
(f) those who fall within culturally recognised family groups.
Part C

Family Violence and the Criminal Law
8. Family Violence and the Criminal Law
—An Introduction

Contents

Introduction 345
Prosecuting federal offences in a family violence context 346
    Research and education about federal offences 347
Civil and criminal proceedings 351
    Choice of proceedings 352
Mandatory reporting 359

Introduction

8.1 The Terms of Reference direct the Commissions to consider the interaction in practice of family violence laws with the criminal laws of the Commonwealth, states and territories. This and the following six chapters are dedicated to this issue.

8.2 Family violence laws interact with the criminal law in a number of ways. They most often interact with state or territory criminal law, but may also interact with federal criminal law. A person who uses family violence may be subject to a protection order or to criminal prosecution—or to both. In practice, decision makers, such as police, may choose to pursue one avenue over another. This chapter considers how and why those decisions are made—and whether the decisions are always made appropriately and in the best interests of victims. It also briefly considers whether any persons, such as neighbours and health professionals, should be required to report family violence to police.

8.3 Chapter 9 considers the role of police in investigating family violence, issuing protection orders and applying for protection orders. It also considers the use of police powers of entry, search, seizure, arrest, direction and detention to investigate family violence and to protect victims.

8.4 Chapter 10 considers how family violence protection orders can interact with bail decisions made by police and the courts. Issues considered include: whether there should be a presumption regarding bail for crimes committed in a family violence context; whether bail conditions conflict with family violence protection order conditions; and whether victims of family violence are appropriately and promptly informed about bail decisions.

8.5 Chapter 11 discusses a number of issues arising from the interaction between family violence protection orders and the criminal law, including: the use of evidence of protection orders in criminal proceedings; the making of protection orders during criminal proceedings; and the interaction between protection order conditions and the criminal law.

8.6 Chapter 12 considers issues that arise when protection orders are breached. Breaching a protection order is a criminal offence and can therefore result in the parties to protection order proceedings entering into the criminal justice system. The chapter considers issues concerning the aiding and abetting of breaches; how police and prosecutors decide whether to charge a person for breaching a protection order or for the underlying offence; the maximum penalties for breach; and sentences imposed for breaching protection orders.

8.7 Chapters 13 and 14 consider whether there should be an expanded role for the criminal law in recognising family violence. Chapter 13 considers how family violence is recognised in criminal offences and sentencing. Chapter 14 considers family violence in the context of defences to homicide and how—if at all—a family relationship should be defined where it is prescribed as an element of an offence, defence or as a sentencing factor.

Prosecuting federal offences in a family violence context

8.8 The Commissions have been asked to consider the interaction of federal criminal laws with state and territory family violence laws. In Chapter 4, the Commissions consider federal offences committed in a family violence context, and the importance of capturing these offences in definitions of family violence. One point at which federal criminal laws and state and territory family violence laws interact is where federal offences committed in a family context are prosecuted—perhaps after or alongside the obtaining of a civil protection order or with state and territory offences also committed in a family violence context. Federal offences committed in a family violence context may be prosecuted by the Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions (CDPP), or by state and territory prosecutors—with or without the consent of the CDPP. Later in this chapter, the Commissions consider more broadly how decision makers decide whether to prosecute family violence crimes.

Submissions and consultations

8.9 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how matters were dealt with in practice that involve:

(a) an overlap between state or territory family violence legislation and federal criminal law; and

(b) a joint prosecution of state or territory and federal offences arising in a family violence context.
The Commissions also asked whether state and territory prosecutors sought the consent of the CDPP to prosecute federal offences arising in a family violence context, and whether they informed the CDPP of the outcome of any such prosecutions.1

8.10 Only a few submissions addressed this question. Persons are charged with federal offences relating to the use of carriage and postal services to, among other things, make threats and harass.2 For example, a person may be charged with a carriage service offence for sending abusive text messages.3

8.11 State and territory prosecutors typically have carriage of these matters, and it seems the CDPP is not involved or notified of the outcome.4 Regularly such charges are withdrawn on a plea to substantive charges under state law. Part of the reason for this is the complexity of imposing a state sentence and a Commonwealth sentence in the same case.5

8.12 South Australian state prosecutors do not appear to consider breaches of Commonwealth legislation.6 The Queensland Law Society submitted that any prosecutions for the improper use of mail, which appear to be rare, are undertaken by the Australian Federal Police and prosecutions for carriage service offences are undertaken by Queensland Police.7 In New South Wales (NSW) such federal offences are sometimes prosecuted in tandem with protection order proceedings.8 The CDPP advised that arrangements for joint trials involving state or territory and federal offences arising in a family violence context are working well in practice.9

Research and education about federal offences

8.13 In the absence of centralised statistics, it is not clear how often federal offences are committed or prosecuted in a family violence context. Such offences could be prosecuted on their own or in conjunction with state or territory offences. The prosecution of the federal offences could also stem from, or prompt, family violence protection order proceedings.

8.14 In a 2010 brief on ‘Factors which influence the sentencing of domestic violence offences’, the NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research looked at domestic violence related offences finalised in NSW Local and District Courts between January

---

2 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.
3 G Zdenkowski, Consultation, Sydney, 6 November 2009.
4 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Correspondence, 8 January 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
5 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
8 G Zdenkowski, Consultation, Sydney, 6 November 2009.
9 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Correspondence, 8 January 2010.
2008 and June 2009. The only federal offence identified was using a carriage service to menace, harass or offend,\(^{10}\) of which it found 127 cases.\(^{11}\)

Submissions and consultations

8.15 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the CDPP—either by itself or in conjunction with other relevant bodies—establish and maintain a centralised database of statistics that records federal offences prosecuted in a family violence context.\(^{12}\) The Commissions also proposed that state and territory prosecutors provide the CDPP with specified information to facilitate the establishment and maintenance of this database.\(^{13}\)

8.16 These proposals were generally supported.\(^{14}\) However, the Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department submitted that the Consultation Paper had not identified a practical need for the database and had not sufficiently justified the significant resources the database would demand.\(^{15}\) Similarly, National Legal Aid suggested that ‘limited resources would be best directed elsewhere’, even though it submitted that ‘Commonwealth provisions in relation to using carriage services to make threats, menace, harass or cause offence are not prosecuted as frequently as they occur’.\(^{16}\)

8.17 The CDPP said it had a database that recorded the prosecutions it conducted, but that this database does not delineate ‘the small number of offences committed in a family violence context’ and would not be suitable. The CDPP suggested the Australian Institute of Criminology or the Australian Institute of Family Studies might be better suited to maintaining any new database of federal offences prosecuted in a family violence context.\(^{17}\)

8.18 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions also asked whether there was a need for lawyers involved in family violence matters to receive education and training about the potential role of federal offences in protection order proceedings and how this could best be achieved.\(^{18}\)

---

10 Criminal Code Act 1995 (Cth) s 474.17(1).
12 Consultation Paper, Proposal 5–2.
17 Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions, Submission FV 76, 2 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Correspondence, 8 January 2010.
18 Consultation Paper, Question 5–3.
8.19 Most submissions supported this proposal. Some of those who supported the proposal said training on all matters of family violence and its dynamics was important. Two stakeholders submitted that police and directors of public prosecution (DPPs) should also be trained to actively prosecute these offences; another said the magistracy and judiciary should also be trained.

8.20 A number of submissions suggested how this training might be delivered: through the usual Community Legal Education channels, in particular the Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia, for example, or through state law societies, or it could be included in a program of accreditation for family violence and sexual assault specialists that some are now considering.

8.21 One submission, however, said training was not necessary because ‘it happens in a relatively small minority of cases’.

Commissions’ views

8.22 The Time for Action report stressed the importance of collecting reliable data about family violence—of ‘building the evidence base’:

Data relating to violence against women and their children in Australia is poor. Data on services sought by, and provided to, victims are not readily available, and the way in which information is reported is generally inconsistent and does not allow for a comprehensive understanding of violence against women.

8.23 In the Commissions’ view, it is also important to capture data about the prosecution of federal offences committed in a family violence context. Without adequate statistics and research, it is difficult to assess how often these offences are committed in the context of family violence, and how often they are prosecuted. Capturing the data should highlight the extent of the problem and could be used to develop principled policy. The information might highlight differences between how rigorously each jurisdiction prosecutes certain federal offences and suggest the need for education and training in certain jurisdictions and areas.

19 For example, Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010.
22 Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
24 Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010. See also Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010.
25 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
26 Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010.
8.24 Capturing information about when these offences are raised in proceedings related to family violence, rather than simply when the offences are actually successfully prosecuted, might also provide a more useful picture of the role this conduct plays in family violence.

8.25 The Commissions recognise that capturing this information might be difficult and therefore do not prescribe any particular method. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions suggested the CDPP could establish and maintain a database and that state and territory prosecutors could send relevant information to the CDPP. However, the information could be captured in other ways. The Australian Institute of Criminology might be a more appropriate agency to collect this data, given its stated functions and aims:

The Australian Institute of Criminology is Australia’s national research and knowledge centre on crime and justice. We seek to promote justice and reduce crime by undertaking and communicating evidence-based research to inform policy and practice.28

8.26 If specialist family violence lists were adopted, as the Commissions discuss in Chapter 32, then courts might be able to mark and identify files with information about any federal crimes prosecuted or alleged to have been committed in a family violence context.

8.27 Federal offences committed in a family violence context should also be more widely recognised and understood amongst lawyers, police, prosecutors and the judiciary. Arguably, they should also be more widely prosecuted, assuming the criteria for instituting federal prosecutions are met. The Commissions discuss below how decision makers decide whether to prosecute state and territory offences, such as assault, committed in a family violence context. Where a person might have committed multiple crimes, decision makers will also decide which particular crime or crimes to prosecute—and in doing so, should ensure that the charges they decide upon properly reflect the nature and seriousness of the criminal conduct for which they have evidence.

8.28 A proper and informed decision about whether to prosecute should include at least a consideration of federal offences that might have occurred. The fact that these offences do not seem to be widely prosecuted when they are committed in a family violence context, might not itself suggest widespread ignorance of the offences. Decision makers might choose to focus on state or territory crimes for good reason. But if decision makers choose not to prosecute an available federal offence, it should be a deliberate decision, made by applying a test such as the two-stage test that must be satisfied under the CDPP’s prosecution policy:

there must be sufficient evidence to prosecute the case; and it must be evident from the facts of the case, and all the surrounding circumstances, that the prosecution would be in the public interest.29

8.29 Accordingly, in the Commissions’ view, existing training of police, prosecutors, lawyers and the judiciary in understanding family violence, should include training on potential federal offences committed in this context. This training should include when and how such offences should be prosecuted in line with prosecutorial guidelines, and when such offences might play a role in protection order proceedings under family violence legislation.

Recommendation 8–1

The Australian Institute of Criminology (AIC) or another suitable federal agency should gather and report data about federal offences committed in a family violence context. This should include data about:

(a) which of these federal offences are prosecuted and the result;

(b) who conducts the prosecution;

(c) whether the offences are prosecuted jointly with state or territory crimes committed in a family violence context; and

(d) when the offences form the basis of a protection order.

This information should be regularly given to the AIC or relevant agency by either the courts or Commonwealth, state and territory prosecutors—including police and directors of public prosecution.

Recommendation 8–2 Police, prosecutors, lawyers and judicial officers should be given training about potential federal offences committed in a family violence context, including when such offences should be prosecuted or used as a basis for obtaining a family violence protection order.

This training should be incorporated into any existing or proposed training about family violence that is conducted by, among others: state and federal police, legal professional bodies, directors of public prosecution (state and Commonwealth), and judicial education bodies.

Civil and criminal proceedings

8.30 Conduct constituting family violence may form the basis of a protection order as well as grounds for a criminal prosecution. In these cases, civil family violence laws can interact with criminal law. Physical and sexual assault are clear examples; they are family violence—for the purpose of obtaining a protection order—and they are crimes in all jurisdictions. Not all family violence under state and territory family violence legislation is criminal, but as discussed in Chapter 9, criminal law procedures—such as police powers of arrest and detention—can also interact with civil law protection orders.

---

8.31 There are some key differences in the civil and criminal responses to family violence. Some of these are summarised in the following table:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Civil protection order</th>
<th>Criminal proceedings</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Purpose (see discussion in Chapter 4)</td>
<td>Protect victim from future violence.</td>
<td>Punish offender for past criminal conduct. Other sentencing purposes include: deterrence, rehabilitation, incapacitation, denunciation and restoration.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Standard of proof</td>
<td>Balance of probabilities.</td>
<td>Beyond reasonable doubt.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Who initiates</td>
<td>Victim, authorised person, police, and possibly—but less frequently—the DPP. In certain cases and in some jurisdictions, courts can also initiate making of protection order.</td>
<td>Police lay charges and prosecute less serious offences. State/territory DPPs prosecute more serious offences.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Outcome</td>
<td>Conditions or restrictions placed on person against whom order is made (eg, not to harass, be of good behaviour, not to approach victim).</td>
<td>On finding of guilt or conviction, offender is sentenced.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Choice of proceedings

8.32 There may be legitimate reasons that police and prosecutors, when they encounter family violence, might seek a protection order for the victim, but not pursue criminal charges. Some family violence will not amount to a criminal offence; protection orders generally offer a speedier response to violence and therefore speedier protection; and there is a lower standard of proof in civil protection order proceedings. But are decision makers sometimes wrongly choosing to pursue one remedy at the expense of the other?

8.33 As noted by Amnesty International, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women, its Causes and Consequences, has raised concerns about the

---

30 As discussed in Ch 5. Whether all family violence should be criminalised is discussed in Ch 13.
use of protection orders under family violence legislation in Australia instead of, rather than as well as, a criminal response. Amnesty International has stated:

Civil protection orders are an essential part of the state’s responsibility to protect survivors of violence, but should complement, not replace, a criminal response.

Commentators have noted, however, that where there is an overlap between criminal and civil responses, the balance is a delicate one, between providing a legal mechanism for protecting people who experience domestic violence, but not downplaying its significance by applying what is essentially a private law remedy.

In 1990, Dr Jocelynne Scutt argued that family violence laws effectively ‘decriminalise’ family violence:

The emphasis is on treating assault not as criminal, but to be dealt with by a civil law ‘solution’. The man is not penalised for assaulting his wife; he is penalised if at all, for breaking an order of the court.

In 2008, Dr Heather Douglas wrote that in Queensland, family violence continues to be dealt with mainly through protection orders, rather than the criminal law:

The development of protection order legislation grew, to some extent, out of frustration with the failure of the criminal justice system. Some of the key obstacles in criminal prosecution and conviction of domestic violence offences are the high standard of proof of ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ and the fact that many of the standard criminal offences fail to encapsulate certain violent behaviours … These protection order schemes have been embraced by both women and by police. As one magistrate has noted, we have seen a ‘rise and rise’ in the use of protection orders.

The Magistrates Court of Queensland reported that, in the year 2007–08, it made a total of 32,081 protection orders and dismissed 5,376 applications for such orders. New South Wales Criminal Courts statistics also indicate high usage of the protection order system. Statistics for 2008 reveal that 22,684 protection orders were granted in proceedings under NSW family violence legislation—excluding interim orders.

The 2008 review of the family violence legislation of Western Australia (WA) notes a concern that, despite police policy stating that protection orders ‘are to be seen

32  Ibid, 45 (citation omitted).
35  Ibid, 459. Issues that arise on breach of a protection order are discussed in Ch 12.
36  H Douglas, ‘The Criminal Law’s Response to Domestic Violence: What’s Going On?’ (2008) 30 Sydney Law Review 439, 444. However, in some cases, if civil redress were not available, a victim would be left without any protection.
37  Magistrates Court of Queensland, Annual Report 2007–08, Appendix 11, Table 9. The figure of 32,081 includes final and interim protection orders, as well as variation and revocation of protection orders. The total number of final protection orders made in the same reporting period was 15,632.
as an additional safeguard and are not regarded as an alternative to the laying of charges’, the introduction of police-issued protection orders has become, in some instances, an alternative to a criminal justice response.\(^{39}\) The WA review stated that:

The question is whether police are issuing police orders, not only in appropriate circumstances, but also in circumstances where they should be preferring charges …

Responses from the policy survey indicate that, in some instances, issuing a police order may be preferred to laying charges because issuing a police order requires less police time.\(^{40}\)

8.39 The WA review expressed concern that some police were potentially trivialising what, to a victim, was a serious offence.\(^{41}\)

8.40 In contrast, the Commissions heard anecdotally in one consultation with magistrates in Adelaide that, in that jurisdiction, police prefer laying a charge to taking out a protection order because the latter involves preparing an affidavit and is more time-consuming.\(^ {42}\)

8.41 While one concern is that civil redress downplays the significance of family violence, concerns have also been raised that applying the criminal law to family violence may inflict further harm to women.\(^{43}\) Douglas has stated that:

It is argued by some that involving the criminal justice system in domestic violence matters may create distress, disadvantages and disillusionment for women that override any hope or protection and safety gained through the criminal justice process. … In Australia, there is research available that shows that indigenous women in some communities may be reluctant to call on police to protect them from violence where arrest and prosecution focused strategies are in place.\(^ {44}\)

8.42 Since the 1970s, some commentators emphasised that there are important reasons for treating family violence as criminal and not civil or private. Douglas suggested that this has encouraged public condemnation of the violence and police accountability for the protection of women.\(^ {45}\) However, Scutt argued that criminal assault in a family violence context is effectively decriminalised by the failure of police and courts to treat it as criminal, the ‘solution’ is seen as passing legislation to grant women a right to an … ‘intervention order’.\(^ {46}\)

8.43 Whether a civil and/or a criminal response is pursued may also depend in practice on the victims’ wishes. Whether victims choose to pursue a civil remedy or

\(^{40}\) Ibid, 22–23.

\(^{41}\) Ibid, 22.

\(^{44}\) Ibid, 442–443 (citations omitted).

\(^{45}\) Ibid, 443 (citations omitted).

assist in a criminal prosecution may be influenced by a number of factors, including their experiences of the legal system; their access to support services; and the nature of their relationship with the persons who have been violent to them. As Douglas has noted:

Both individual judges and research have also recognised that the cyclical and complicated nature of family violence relationships often leads victims to seek to withdraw charges or understate the harm of particular conduct during periods of calm in their relationship.

8.44 In cases of family violence involving allegations of sexual assault, there are parallel levels of attrition at various stages of the criminal process, which are considered in Part G of this report.

Submissions and consultations

8.45 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether police or other participants in the legal system were treating the obtaining of protection orders under family violence legislation and a criminal justice response to family violence as alternatives rather than potentially co-existing avenues of redress. In other words, were they choosing one remedy over the other, when perhaps they should have sought both? If they were, the Commissions asked, what are the practices or trends and how can this best be addressed?

8.46 Stakeholders submitted that the research on this question was limited and that practices vary between jurisdictions.

8.47 While noting that it was to their credit that Queensland Police have taken strong and positive action to counter family violence, the Queensland Law Society submitted that the most typical reaction by police in attending domestic situations is to take action and if necessary apply for a protection order and if necessary remove the perpetrator from the scene, taking him or her into custody for a number of hours, but not to charge the perpetrator with any offence.

8.48 The Victorian Government stated that Victoria Police does not use one response over the other, and that since the introduction of the Code of Practice in August 2004, there have been substantial increases in both the number of intervention orders applied for by police and the number of charges laid arising from family violence incidents.

---

48 Consultation Paper, Question 5–4.
50 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
8.49 However, some Victorian Magistrates have said that ‘Victoria Police do treat the obtaining of a protection order as an alternative to proceeding with criminal process. Others disagree’.

National Legal Aid submitted that:

In Victoria both intervention orders and criminal charges are used. Since the introduction of Family Violence Safety Notices allowing the police to remove alleged perpetrators from the home, criminal charges seem to be used only for the most serious cases. Family Violence Safety Notices should be used to ensure the safety of the victim and not as an alternative to criminal charges in appropriate circumstances.

8.50 National Legal Aid submitted that in NSW local courts, ‘protection orders and criminal charges are often treated as co-existing avenues of redress’. However, Women’s Legal Services NSW stated:

For many of our clients it is common for police not to charge offenders when charges would have been indicated as appropriate by police policy and the legislation ... In some cases where the victim and perpetrator are in a relationship, the police do not charge with criminal offences until there have been a number of incidents.

8.51 Police in WA, it was submitted, in some cases tell victims to get a protection order rather than investigate and prosecute a crime.

8.52 Tasmania’s Safe at Home program encouraged police to bring both criminal and protection order proceedings, National Legal Aid submitted, and this is ‘embedded in police and there are appropriate reviews to ensure that it happens consistently’.

8.53 In the ACT, National Legal Aid, submitted:

it is not the police who apply for domestic violence orders, except very rarely in emergency telephone order situations. There is a Family Violence Intervention Program which involves [lawyers], police, magistrates and services. All criminal matters that involve family violence are marked ‘Family Violence’—they go into the ‘Family Violence List’—this takes them before a magistrate who is on the Intervention Program committee. It is still treated the same way in terms of criminal law but by a judicial officer who has an awareness of the significance of family violence. There is no option for police bail if a person is arrested for a family violence offence. Protection orders are applied for by individuals.

Reasons for not prosecuting

8.54 Various explanations were given for why police might choose to obtain a protection order, rather than prosecute a crime, when they could do both. The Queensland Law Society submitted that police claim it can be very difficult to prosecute these offences because:

(a) The victim often recants and therefore police are reluctant to commence the prosecution; and (b) It can be hard to prove matters beyond reasonable doubt.

53 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
54 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
55 Ibid.
56 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
57 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
58 Ibid.
59 Ibid.
Furthermore, Queensland Police in their operational police manual … have their attention drawn to obtaining protection orders but not necessarily to also charging perpetrators of violence with offences arising out of the same conduct.60

8.55 Sometimes individuals are not charged, it is said, because prosecuting a crime means more work, and police might not have the time and resources to investigate these more difficult matters.61 One legal centre also suggested ‘an attitude problem, especially towards Aboriginal women’, stating that ‘we often find that police are indifferent to Aboriginal women because there is a perception that Aboriginal women are unreliable.’ 62

8.56 Some victims of family violence reportedly do not want the offender to be charged with a criminal offence—they just want the violence to stop.63 This might partly be out of fear of retribution,64 but for some Indigenous victims of family violence, ‘by putting in place a DVO [a protection order] but not pressing aggravated assault charges, the police are in fact respecting the wishes of these women.’ 65 Professor Julie Stubbs submitted that victims may choose to use different options at different times in response to their changing needs, concerns and capacities; an effective response to family violence should not preclude some capacity for victim choice.66

8.57 The idea of choice was also noted by the Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), who cautioned against ‘a blanket approach that requires the police to always apply for a protection order and charge the substantive criminal offence’, because ‘it is important that victims know the choices, the implications and are engaged in the decision-making’.67

8.58 Stakeholders suggested that police need ongoing and comprehensive training, including about family violence and its complexities, especially in the context of Aboriginal communities, and about Aboriginal culture.68 Police also need a ‘clear and cohesive framework’.69 Standard operating procedures should guide police in deciding when to lay criminal charges.70 Stakeholders also submitted that police responses to family violence should be monitored, scrutinised, and tracked.71

64 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
67 Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
68 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
70 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
8.59 One Victorian community service and advocacy organisation noted that criminal charges rely on a police assessment of the strength of the evidence. Accordingly, it submitted, police should be encouraged to collect evidence and to work with family violence service providers to encourage women to make statements.72

There also needs to be support for specialist children’s support services, both to address the impact of violence and enable children to make statements to SOCA [Sexual Offences and Child Abuse police units]. Whole of service system support for victims is needed to encourage them to pursue criminal proceedings.73

8.60 While most submissions approached these questions by addressing whether police are not prosecuting family violence criminal offences when they should, one stakeholder addressed the question of whether protection orders were appropriately being put in place during or after criminal proceedings.74

Commission’s views

8.61 In the Commissions’ view, police and prosecutors should only choose not to prosecute crimes committed in a family violence context with good reason. Civil and criminal responses to family violence can serve common purposes, such as the protection of a victim of family violence—but, as discussed more fully in Chapter 4, they can also serve different purposes. It is important that neither remedy is inappropriately neglected.

8.62 The question of whether to prosecute criminal family violence more actively inevitably raises the difficult matter of whether the state should prosecute despite the contrary wishes of the victim. This chapter does not explore this debate in detail, but notes that pro-arrest, pro-prosecution and other mandatory policies have their critics, some of whom maintain that the policies not only disempower victims, robbing them of their autonomy, but that they can even compromise victim safety.75

8.63 In practice, the reasons police do not prosecute crimes committed in a family context sometimes seem to be inappropriate, and sometimes do not clearly relate to the wishes or safety of victims. Not prosecuting because the task is difficult, or takes too much time, or because an officer thinks violence against a family member is less serious than other crimes are poor reasons not to prosecute a crime. As with decisions about whether to prosecute federal offences committed in a family violence context, discussed above, decisions about whether to prosecute other criminal offences committed in a family violence context should be made in accordance with prosecution policies. These policies consider such matters as the strength of the evidence and 73 Ibid. Integrated responses and specialisation are discussed further in Chs 29 and 32 respectively.

74 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. The making of protection orders in criminal proceedings is discussed in Ch 11. The interaction between protection orders and bail conditions is discussed in Ch 10.
75 For example, L Goodmark, ‘Autonomy Feminism: An Anti-Essentialist Critique of Mandatory Interventions In Domestic Violence Cases’ (2009) 37 Florida State University Law Review 1. This debate is discussed further below.
whether prosecuting is in the public interest. Determining this public interest will no doubt include carefully considering the needs and safety of victims.

8.64 Police should be trained and equipped to decide properly when to pursue civil and criminal responses to family violence—and when to pursue both.76 In jurisdictions in which police now rarely play a role in issuing or applying for protection orders, it should be clear who is responsible and accountable for deciding whether to do so. The decisions police make in relation to when they issue or apply for a protection order and when they choose to prosecute a criminal offence should be monitored by senior police officers.

8.65 Failures to prosecute criminal family violence do not necessarily need to be addressed through mandatory-arrest or mandatory-prosecution policies. These are arguably blunt instruments. But a duty to investigate family violence, and to record when and why further action was not taken, should go some way to ensuring that police are alert to the importance of their role in combating family violence and treating it seriously. The Commissions discuss this duty to investigate in the following chapter. Chapter 11 also addresses the question of when it is appropriate for a court to issue a protection order during criminal proceedings—thereby accommodating a dual civil and criminal response to family violence.

Mandatory reporting

Existing mandatory reporting laws

8.66 The police have a duty to investigate family violence; whether this duty should be in legislation or police codes of practice is discussed in Chapter 9. One way that police can be alerted to family violence is through reports from neighbours, health professionals, and others. The making of such reports can be mandated; persons can be fined for not reporting violence when they should.

8.67 Such a policy has been adopted in the Northern Territory (NT), where a duty to report some types of family violence is imposed on all adults.77 Police must take reasonable steps to ensure reports are investigated.78 Failure to make a report is a criminal offence,79 and can therefore result in a wide range of persons—including professionals and family members who have not themselves committed family violence—entering into the criminal justice system. As at 15 June 2010, there had been no prosecutions or formal investigations for this offence.80 Tasmanian family violence

---

76 The Commissions make recommendations about police training and education in family violence in Ch 31, and about the use of specialised police in Ch 32.
77 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 124A.
78 Ibid s 124A (4).
79 The maximum penalty is $22,000: Ibid s 124A(1).
80 Northern Territory, Estimates Committee, Legislative Assembly, 22 September 2010, Question Taken on Notice 3.8. legislation also contains a mandatory reporting provision, but the relevant section has not commenced.\(^{81}\)

8.68 Section 124A of the NT family violence legislation, inserted in 2009,\(^{82}\) provides that an adult commits an offence if he or she fails to report to a police officer his or her belief, based on reasonable grounds, that:

- another person has caused, or is likely to cause, harm to someone else with whom the other person is in a domestic relationship; and/or
- the life or safety of another person is under serious or imminent threat because domestic violence has been, is being, or is about to be committed.\(^{83}\)

8.69 Harm means ‘physical harm that is serious harm’\(^{84}\) and serious harm is defined in the Criminal Code (NT) to mean any harm (including the cumulative effect of more than one harm):

(a) that endangers, or is likely to endanger, a person’s life; or
(b) that is or is likely to be significant and longstanding.\(^{85}\)

8.70 There are defences in the NT legislation for ‘reasonable excuse’. Reasonable excuses for not reporting the violence include that the person reasonably believed someone else had reported the violence; the person was planning for the removal of the victim and intended to make his or her report soon after the removal; or that if the person reported the violence as soon as practicable, the report would have resulted in a serious or imminent threat to the life or safety of any person.\(^{86}\)

8.71 The Tasmanian provision, unlike the NT provision, only applies to ‘prescribed persons’. Prescribed persons include registered medical practitioners, nurses, dentists, psychologists, and school teachers. These persons must inform a police officer as soon as practicable if they believe, or suspect, on reasonable grounds, or know, ‘that family violence involving the use of a weapon, sexual violence or physical violence, or where a child is affected, has occurred or is likely to occur’.\(^{87}\) There is a defence for those who honestly and reasonably believe that a police officer has already been informed. The offence is punishable by a fine.

8.72 There are several key points about the reporting laws that are currently operating in the NT and that are proposed for Tasmania. First, under the NT provision, the 81 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 38 has not been proclaimed to commence since the act received Royal Assent in 2004.

---

82 Domestic and Family Violence Amendment Act 2009 (NT).
83 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 124A.
84 ibid s 124A.
85 Criminal Code (NT) s 1. Physical harm is defined in s 1A to include ‘unconsciousness, pain, disfigurement, infection with a disease and any physical contact with a person that a person might reasonably object to in the circumstances, whether or not the person was aware of it at the time.’ The NT Government Department of Health and Families has published a toolkit: Mandatory Reporting of Domestic and Family Violence: A Toolkit to Help Service Providers Meet the New Reporting Obligations, September 2009, <www.health.nt.gov.au>.
86 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 125.
87 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 38(2) (uncommenced).
obligation to report is not limited to prescribed persons, such as health or welfare workers, but rather extends to all adults. A broader range of persons is therefore required to report this violence in the NT than is required, outside the NT, to report concerns for the safety or welfare of children under child protection laws and provisions.

8.73 Secondly, the violence that must be reported in the NT is not as broad as the violence that may form the basis of obtaining a protection order under the NT family violence legislation.88 As noted above, s 124A requires reporting only where ‘the life or safety of another person is under serious or imminent threat’ or where there is serious physical harm. The Tasmanian provision also limits the types of violence that would have to be reported.

8.74 The NT family violence legislation also provides that a person acting in good faith is not civilly or criminally liable, or in breach of any professional code of conduct, for making a report or for disclosing any information in the report.90

The community’s responsibility for family violence

8.75 Supporters of mandatory reporting of family violence argue that family violence is a responsibility of the entire community. Introducing the NT provision, the Attorney-General said it reflects a ‘strong commitment to tackling domestic violence’ and ‘enables a community response to a community problem’.91 It is the responsibility of every member of our community to help break the cycle of domestic and family violence, and protect women and children from violence. The mandatory reporting law reflects this important responsibility.92

8.76 Viewed in this way, mandatory reporting is ‘not about peering over your neighbour’s fence or dobbing people in to the police’, but is about no longer ignoring violence and abuse. Mandatory reporting is sending a message to the community, to our friends and neighbours, that abuse will no longer be ignored; that we, the community, will no longer remain silent.93

88 Duties to report concerns for the safety or welfare of children generally apply to people who work in organisations that provide health, welfare, education, law enforcement, child care or residential services to children. Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) ss 23, 27; Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 162, 184; Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld); Public Health Act 2005 (Qld) ss 158, 191; Education (General Provisions) Act 2006 (Qld) ss 365–366; Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) ss 3, 124B; Children’s Protection Act 1993 (SA) ss 6, 10–11; Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 (Tas) ss 3–4, 14; Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) ss 342, 356. In the NT, there is a duty to report some types of harm to children that applies to all persons, though there is a further duty that applies to health practitioners and other prescribed persons: Care and Protection of Children Act 2007 (NT) ss 13–16, 26. See also Ch 20 for a discussion of mandatory reporting of children’s exposure to family violence.

89 See Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) ss 5, 18 for definition of domestic violence and for when domestic violence orders may be made.

90 Ibid s 125.

91 Northern Territory, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 26 November 2008 (C Burns—Justice and Attorney-General).

92 Ibid.

93 Ibid.
8.77 The Tasmanian Attorney-General also stressed that mandatory reporting reflects the community’s responsibility for tackling family violence and that ‘professionals, such as doctors, psychologists and police have an ethical responsibility to report the violence’.94

8.78 Enabling the state to intervene in a violent relationship at the earliest possible point has, in the United States (US), been an argument used for some time by supporters of laws for mandatory reporting by medical personnel.95

8.79 Given the community’s responsibility for improving the safety of victims of family violence, it was argued during debate on the NT provision that the obligation to report should not be limited to ‘serious harm’. Such a limitation was particularly dangerous in the NT, and might leave victims who do not need hospitalisation in a very dangerous position:

Violence is acculturated and engendered across many communities in the Territory. It has become normalised, and children grow up learning to accept violence, and that violence is a normal and acceptable response. Within this environment, in particular, it is very dangerous to restrict mandatory reporting to serious harm and to leave other forms of violence to the discretion of individuals, family members, community members, and professionals to report. By prescribing only serious harm as the type of violence to be reported, it requires bystanders to make a judgment about the seriousness or otherwise of the violence that occurs. ... [It] provides the ultimate out for perpetrators: ‘I did not hit her hard. She was not bleeding. It was not harm that caused or will cause serious harm that endangered her life and it was not significant or long-standing’.96

8.80 Mandatory reporting, however, has many critics. For example, the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse expressed its ‘strong’ opposition to mandatory reporting of domestic and family violence by health professionals on grounds including the following:

- there is no evidence that it improves safety for victims;
- a significant number of victims are opposed to it;
- victims might be deterred or prevented from seeking medical treatment; and
- police do not have the capacity or willingness to investigate all reported cases.97

8.81 In introducing the family violence mandatory reporting provision, the NT Attorney-General noted the following concerns of opponents of mandatory reporting of

---

94 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 18 November 2004, 97 (J Jackson—Attorney General and Minister for Justice and Industrial Relations), 102.
96 Northern Territory, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 18 February 2009 (J Carney).
8. Family Violence and the Criminal Law — An Introduction

8.82 Another criticism of mandatory reporting laws, also commonly directed to other mandatory legal responses to family violence, is that it can undermine the autonomy of victims. Some victims of family violence may consider that their safety and welfare is best secured by not seeking a protection order and by not seeking the prosecution of a criminal act of family violence. When the law for mandatory reporting of family violence in the NT was proposed, the National President of the Australian Association of Social Workers, Professor Bob Lonne, said that the Association’s members know that a victim of family violence doesn’t always want the police to come round, as it doesn’t always lead to a resolution and can sometimes make the problem worse. Removing the power of the victim to decide when the police are notified makes the victim even more powerless in what is already a powerless family situation.

8.83 Whether—and if so, under what circumstances—the state should defer to the wishes of victims and not investigate or act upon family violence remains a topic of debate. Professor Leigh Goodmark, a US scholar and advocate of ‘autonomy feminism’, has said that whether and to what extent it is appropriate for the state to substitute its judgment for that of victims is a ‘hotly debated’ issue. Goodmark argues for family violence law and policy that respect[s] the rights of individual women to choose whether and how to use the criminal and civil legal systems. Such a shift would be consistent both with anti-essentialist feminist theory and with the focus on autonomy and agency that characterized the early battered women’s movement.

Agency is, among other things, Goodmark argues, the power to see a physician to have injuries treated but choose to have that physician maintain confidentiality about the cause of those injuries.

8.84 Professor Cheryl Hanna has said that it is debated in feminist legal scholarship whether ‘autonomy and the right to make one’s own decisions offer more liberation for women, or are false notions masking subordination’:

100 Australian Association of Social Workers, ‘Mandatory Reporting of Family Violence in the NT Won’t Always Help Victims’ (Press Release, 7 October 2008).
101 Parallel arguments are made in the context of allegations of sexual assault. See Ch 26.
104 Ibid, 48.
In practice, most victims want the violence in their relationship to stop and to that extent will cooperate with the state. Many women, however, will resist outcomes that involve criminal records, jail, fines, or other punitive measures.105

8.85 Prosecutors and judges, Hanna states, must often ‘navigate the tricky waters between a victim’s personal autonomy and concerns for public safety and justice’.106 This debate has not been settled; and these waters must be navigated not only by prosecutors and judges, but also by all persons who encounter family violence—including family, friends, neighbours, police, and health and welfare professionals.

Submissions and consultations

8.86 Following the release of the Consultation Paper, some stakeholders raised the issue of mandatory reporting of family violence against adults, particularly with reference to the NT law. There were particular concerns expressed that the mandatory reporting of some family violence could, in fact, discourage women from accessing counselling and legal services.107 One legal service provider said it had heard anecdotally that there had been a decline in counselling numbers, but that it was too early to tell whether the new mandatory reporting laws in the NT are having an impact.108 Another said that mandatory reporting often does not benefit victims and, in any event, reports are not properly acted upon by police: often by the time police attend the scene, if they attend at all, the violence will have ceased.109

8.87 Concerns were also expressed about the effect of the law on the empowerment of women experiencing family violence and that the NT provision covers harm that has already happened, and therefore may operate even where further harm is not likely to occur in the future:

Women who are not likely to face imminent harm should be allowed to tell their friends, family, service providers of their past experiences etc without fear that it will be reported to police, if they don’t want it to be.110

8.88 The Commissioner for Children (Tas) also expressed opposition to the proposed Tasmanian mandatory reporting provision. The Commissioner was ‘not aware of any evidence that such a process would make the lives of family violence victims any safer’:

If police turn up at a doorstep on the report of a mandatory notifier, but not in the heat of the moment in dealing with an immediate family violence offence, there is a serious risk that a victim’s private plans to escape or end the violence will be disrupted. Further, the perpetrator who may at that time be in a calm phase of the well-documented ‘cycle of violence’, could become destabilised and work retribution

106 Ibid, 1556.
107 Confidential, Consultation, Darwin, 27 May 2010; Confidential, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010.
109 Confidential, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010.
110 Confidential, Consultation, Darwin, 27 May 2010.
on the victim as a result of the visit itself. ... Adding another mandatory reporting regime could be the straw that breaks the back of the Child Protection camel.111

Commissions’ views

8.89 The Commissions share some of the concerns noted above about mandatory reporting of family violence committed against adults—in particular, the potential for such laws to isolate victims of family violence by acting as a disincentive for victims to seek assistance, guidance, and medical care. Such laws might disempower victims, and take from them some of the tools with which, in their judgment, they are best able to use to combat or escape from violence.

8.90 Children are generally more vulnerable and less capable of judging how to respond to, and escape from, family violence—hence, the community has a greater responsibility to report concerns for the safety or welfare of children. Furthermore, as noted in Chapter 2, under the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, States Parties are required to take all appropriate measures to protect children from all forms of physical or mental violence, injury or abuse, neglect or negligent treatment, maltreatment or exploitation, including sexual abuse.112

8.91 One US academic has said that the ‘distinction between reporting domestic violence and reporting child abuse must be underscored’: The latter involves minors who are, in most legal contexts, dependent on adults. While battered women may be dependent on their abusers, they should in most cases be viewed in light of the strength and agency they often exhibit.113

8.92 In the Commissions’ view, this distinction shows why it might be appropriate in some circumstances for certain persons to be required to report violence against children—with the threat of criminal sanction for failing to do so—but not necessarily violence committed against adult men and women.

8.93 While in many circumstances, individuals will have an ethical duty to report family violence to the police—and as discussed in the following chapter, it should be incumbent on the police to investigate such violence—the Commissions have some reservations about placing a broad legal duty upon adults, and even only upon certain professionals, to report family violence. This is of particular concern if, by reporting the violence, these persons will be required to breach professional, personal and familial confidences and trust. This can have potentially damaging consequences to relationships. Such confidences and trust may be breached, or appear to victims to have been breached, despite legislation that provides that a person is not civilly or criminally liable or in breach of any professional code of conduct for reporting violence.114 It may be unreasonable, for example, to criminalise someone’s failure to report to the police...

---

111 Commissioner for Children (Tas), Submission FV 62, 1 June 2010.
114 See Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 125.
violence committed by his or her father, mother, sibling, or even adult child. Criminalising this ‘behaviour’—a failure to report albeit serious violence—may be an overreach of the criminal law. Arguing that the community should take more responsibility for family violence does not necessarily require charging individuals with a criminal offence for not taking adequate personal responsibility for reporting the violence.

8.94 It would also be unfortunate if, to prove beyond reasonable doubt a person’s failure to report violence, a prosecutor were to call upon the victim of the violence to give evidence, perhaps against the victim’s wishes, of the violence itself and/or the accused’s knowledge of the violence or threat of violence.

8.95 In Chapter 9, the Commissions recommend that police should have a duty to investigate family violence where they believe family violence has been, is being, or is likely to be committed. It could be argued that mandatory reporting of family violence is consistent with this recommendation. If police should investigate family violence, some might argue, then laws should also try to increase the number of referrals made to police of potential or actual family violence. However, in the Commissions’ view, the value of an increase in the number of referrals to police and the number of subsequent investigations would need to be weighed against the potential harm done to victims who choose not to access services or seek help for fear the violence will be reported to police.

8.96 The Commissions share the concerns discussed above about the potential negative consequences of mandatory reporting of family violence against adults, and accordingly suggest that the effect of the NT laws be monitored and evaluated. The following matters, among others, might be worth consideration:

- variations in the number of reports made to police;
- how many of these reports are then properly investigated;
- victims’ responses (in the short and longer-terms) to the fact that the report was made and to the subsequent police investigation; and
- any variation in the number of persons accessing services, including family violence, medical and counselling services, that could reasonably be attributed to mandatory reporting laws.

8.97 The results of this evaluation should be carefully reviewed by Tasmania, should it consider proclaiming the commencement of its mandatory reporting provision.

---

115 The purposes of the criminal law are discussed in Ch 4.
116 The Commissions understand from consultations conducted in the NT that the mandatory reporting laws are being evaluated. See, eg, Confidential, Consultation, Darwin, 27 May 2010.
9. Police and Family Violence

Contents

Introduction 367
Police-issued protection orders 367
Police duties to investigate and to apply for orders 379
   Indigenous-specific support for protection order applications 389
Police powers in dealing with family violence 393
   Powers of entry 394
   Powers of search and seizure 396
   Powers of arrest, direction and detention 396
Identifying the ‘primary aggressor’ 404

Introduction

9.1 Police play a key role in responding to family violence. They may attend a scene of family violence and may issue or apply for a protection order for the victim; they may need to decide whether someone needs protection even though the person declines it; they may find two persons who both seem angry, injured, fearful and distraught and have to decide whether one was the aggressor and the other needs protection; and, as discussed in the previous chapter, police may discover potential criminal behaviour and have to decide whether to prosecute. In responding to family violence and in obtaining civil protection orders, police may use powers and procedures mainly designed to enforce criminal laws—powers of entry, search, seizure, arrest, direction and detention. This chapter considers these interactions between family violence laws and state and territory criminal procedures.1

Police-issued protection orders

9.2 A person may be made subject to a protection order under family violence legislation in a number of ways: a victim might apply to a court directly for an order; a court may make an order on its own motion; police—and potentially directors of public prosecution (DPPs)—might apply to a court for an order; or police might issue an order themselves, without the approval of a judicial officer. This section considers this final type of order, police-issued protection orders. It considers whether it is appropriate for

---

1 The enforcement of injunctions under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) is discussed in Ch 17.
police to issue these orders—and if so, in what circumstances. It also discusses whether police-issued protection orders protect victims in practice.2

9.3 In Victoria, Western Australia (WA), South Australia (SA), Tasmania and the Northern Territory (NT), police can issue protection orders or ‘police safety notices’ to persons who have used family violence. When police issue such notices they may generally attach certain conditions to the order, including conditions that exclude someone from his or her home.3

9.4 The duration of police-issued protection orders varies significantly across jurisdictions. In WA, police-issued protection orders can either last for 24 hours (without the consent of the victim, parent, guardian, or child welfare officer, as relevant), or for 72 hours (with consent).4 The duration of a police-issued protection order cannot be extended or renewed and another police order cannot be made in relation to the same facts.5 In Tasmania, such orders may last for 12 months, unless revoked, varied or extended sooner.6

9.5 The NT family violence legislation does not specify the duration of a police-issued protection order. Instead, it provides that first, the police must provide the person against whom the order is made with a copy of the order and secondly, that this copy serves as a summons for the person to appear before the court to show cause why the protection order should not be confirmed by the court.7 The legislation further requires that ‘the time for the return of the [protection order] must be as soon as practicable after it is made’.8

9.6 In Victoria, a ‘family violence safety notice’ issued by the police acts as an application by a police officer for a protection order in favour of the victim, as well as a summons for the person against whom it is issued to appear in court at the first mention date for the application, which is to be within 72 hours of the police order being issued.9 The ‘family violence safety notice’ ends on the earlier of: the court refusing to make a protection order; or, if the court makes a protection order, when the order is served.10

9.7 In SA, the issuing of an interim protection order by a police officer is taken to be an application for a protection order to the court, as well as a summons to the person

---

2 The chapter will later discuss the role of police in applying to courts for protection orders on behalf of victims, and whether some victims might need assistance to apply to courts themselves for protection orders. Ch 11 considers the making of protection orders during criminal proceedings.
3 See, eg, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 29(1); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 14(3). Types of protection order conditions and exclusion orders are discussed in Ch 11. Exclusion orders essentially prohibit a person who has used violence from entering or remaining in a residence shared with the victim, including where that person has an equitable or legal interest in the relevant premises.
4 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) ss 30F, 30G.
5 Ibid s 30F.
7 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) ss 43, 44.
8 Ibid s 42.
9 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 31. The period of 72 hours can be extended where the first mention date would otherwise fall on a public holiday.
10 Ibid s 30.
Police and Family Violence

9. The circumstances in which police officers can issue police orders also vary significantly across the jurisdictions. In Tasmania, for example, a police officer is empowered to issue such a notice if satisfied that the person has committed or is likely to commit a family violence offence. Similarly, in SA, a police officer may issue an order if it appears that there are grounds for doing so and the person is present before the police officer.

9.8 Other jurisdictions impose more stringent requirements. For example, in the NT an authorised police officer can issue a protection order only if, among other things, he or she is satisfied that because of urgent circumstances it is not practicable to obtain a protection order from the court. In Victoria, police may apply to another police officer of the rank of Sergeant or higher for a ‘family violence safety notice’. They may only apply before 9am or after 5pm on a weekday or on the weekend or a public holiday, that is, essentially outside court hours. Among other things, they must believe on reasonable grounds that, until an application for a protection order can be decided by the court, a notice is necessary to ensure safety, protect a child, or preserve property.

9.10 A 2008 review of the WA family violence legislation (the WA Review) found that police orders have been widely adopted by police and well received by victims and service providers:

Between December 2004 and December 2006, 12,296 police orders were issued. By way of comparison, in the 12 months prior to the introduction of police orders there were 7 telephone violence restraining orders throughout the state ...

There was universal agreement amongst those consulted during the review that police orders should be retained. Critically, police orders were thought to increase victim safety ...

Support for police orders was consistent across professional boundaries. Submissions from magistrates, police officers, workers in the domestic violence field, social workers and Aboriginal organisations all supported the initiative and deemed it successful. It is also noteworthy that support was strong across urban, rural and remote regions. Police orders appear to have sufficient flexibility to meet the needs of victims irrespective of locality.

---

11 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 18.
12 Ibid.
13 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 14(1).
14 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 18.
15 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 41.
16 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 24.
9.11 The WA review concluded that the orders should be retained, but recommended that the requirement for the consent of the victim or other relevant person for 72 hour orders be removed, thereby replacing the 24 and 72 hour orders with a single order lasting up to 72 hours. In making this recommendation, the WA review acknowledged the arguments for and against removing the consent requirement from the 72 hour order.

9.12 Arguments for removing consent include that victims in a crisis situation may find it difficult to assess how dangerous a situation is, or may be fearful of giving consent. Arguments in favour of retaining consent include: that victims should not be stripped of their ability to make decisions about their lives; and that orders made without consent increase the likelihood of consensual breaches of the order, creating enforcement challenges for the police.

9.13 In particular, the WA review noted, in relation to its recommendation to allow for 72 hour police orders without consent of the victim or other relevant person:

Submissions from Aboriginal groups in remote and regional areas of the state clearly do not support this. The specific concern for these groups is the lack of appropriate places a perpetrator may stay, away from the primary residence for this extended period of time. Where there is no housing alternative there is a real risk that a breach of the order may occur leading to further contact with the criminal justice system.

9.14 The rationale for the 72 hour police orders with consent of the victim was explained in the Second Reading Speech of the WA family violence legislation in the following way:

The 72 hour orders are an innovation that were sought specifically by Aboriginal women who were part of the consultation process for the writing and drafting of this legislation and also as we consulted the communities to put in place our domestic violence action plan. Many women said specifically that they did not want their men to be incarcerated, although they wanted to be protected from violent behaviour. Therefore, the 72 hour order allows for a cooling-off period. It will allow for immediate support for these women and that can be followed up with an application for a longer term order if the threatened or actual violence has not been resolved or reconciliation has not occurred.

9.15 The 2008 review of the Tasmanian family violence legislation (the Tasmanian Review) noted varying stakeholder perspectives on police powers under the legislation. Some stakeholders argued that, in the context of pro-arrest and pro-prosecution policies, police powers needed to be limited in order to ensure a ‘balance’ between victims and those who use violence against them. Some argued that police powers to make protection orders should be restricted to interim orders only, and that final or further interim orders should require police to apply to the court. The Tasmanian
Review noted that the fact that parties could apply for variation of police orders had two advantages:

The first is that interim Orders place a burden on the Court with each matter needing to be reviewed and this is avoided in Tasmania, and secondly, the avenue is open to both parties to make application to vary or revoke Orders.25

9.16 In a 2009 report investigating responses to Indigenous family violence in Queensland, Professor Chris Cunneen recommended that the Queensland Police Service and the Department of Communities investigate the extension of police powers to provide for short-term emergency family violence orders issued by police. The recommendation also stated that any change to police powers in this regard must be accompanied by increased services and programs in the community for those who are violent towards family members.26 Cunneen’s report states that:

While Indigenous people have higher rates of domestic violence order use than non-Indigenous people, they are much less likely to be the person applying for the order. This raises questions about engagement with and confidence in the legal process, as well as the availability of services to assist with private applications. …

Police indicated that one barrier to the use of domestic violence protection orders was the reluctance of some police to apply for orders because of the paperwork involved in the application.

The possibility of police-issued domestic violence orders was raised by police as a way of increasing the number of protection orders in remote and rural communities.27

9.17 In March 2010, the Queensland Department of Communities asked in its Consultation Paper on the review of Queensland’s family violence legislation whether police in Queensland should have the capacity to issue protection orders and, if so, under what circumstances.28 It noted, for example, that police-issued orders could provide immediate protection to victims, but that their introduction also brought ‘a risk that a sharp increase in orders may result, including cross-orders, with the consequential risk of entry into the criminal justice system’.29

Submissions and consultations

9.18 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether, in practice, where police have powers to issue protection orders under family violence legislation, the exercise of such powers has increased victim safety and protection.30

26 C Cunneen, Alternative and Improved Responses to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland Indigenous Communities (2009), Rec 1.
27 Ibid, 12.
28 Department of Communities (Qld), Review of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989: Consultation Paper (2010), Questions 3.3.1, 3.3.2.
Evidence of whether these orders, where they can be made, have in fact increased victim safety appears to be limited. Some stakeholders thought the police orders did make victims safer, at least in the short term or in particularly dangerous situations, while others said they did not make victims safer. Legal Aid WA believes that police orders have improved victim safety in WA. It is not clear from these submissions whether or not police-issued protection orders have in fact increased victim safety in all jurisdictions that have such orders.

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation that empowers police to issue protection orders should provide that:

(a) police are only able to impose protection orders to intervene in emergency or crisis situations in circumstances where it is not reasonably practicable or possible for the matter to be dealt with at that time by a court; and

(b) police-issued protection orders are to act as an application to the court for a protection order as well as a summons for the person against whom it is issued to appear before the court within a short specified time period.

The Commissions also proposed that s 14(6) of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas)—which allows police-issued protection orders to last for 12 months—should be repealed.

A number of stakeholders supported this proposal, though a range of views were expressed about the benefits and dangers of police-issued orders.

Concerns with police orders

Many submissions expressed concerns about police having powers to issue protection orders—even interim and provisional protection orders. Some expressed concerns about the extent and nature of police powers, and thought executive and judicial powers might be confused where police issue protection orders, in view of ‘the danger of the police failing to understand their role as ‘law enforcers’ as opposed to

---

31 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010. An independent evaluation of Victoria’s family violence safety notices was scheduled to be completed in July 2010: Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
34 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
9. Police and Family Violence

‘law appliers and makers’.38 One group even found lurking in these powers the ‘spectre of a police state’.39

9.23 Other stakeholders stressed that issuing protection orders was a judicial function40 and that judicial officers ‘should determine whether an order should be made according to law’.41 The court’s role in issuing protection orders was important to stakeholders for a number of reasons. A court advocacy service submitted that both parties need to have an opportunity to present their views and evidence:42

Defendants in particular need to clearly understand the order, its conditions, and the consequences of breaching the order. We believe that this can only be achieved through due process at court.43

9.24 Dr Jane Wangmann, who expressed ‘great concerns’ about police-issued protection orders, also stressed the importance of having to go to court, where victims often come into contact with lawyers and various services; where the victim’s story can be heard and believed; and where offenders can be told that the community does not tolerate violence.44 Wangmann was concerned that orders issued without a judicial process of assessing evidence might further trivialise protection orders, already seen by some as ‘just a piece of paper’.45

9.25 The North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency (NAAJA) had a number of concerns. Referring to the NT police orders, NAAJA said police sometimes issue these orders as a ‘first resort’ or as a means of ‘covering themselves’ in case the violence later escalates; full non-contact orders issued against the wishes of both parties brought a ‘grave danger of inadvertent breach’; police often do not fully explain the orders or explain how they can be varied; and partly because of the ‘tick a box’ forms, the conditions are ‘rarely tailored to the particular circumstances of each case, and often, neither the protected person nor the defendant is asked [for] their input on the workability of that order’.46 Moreover, if multiple factors are present, NAAJA argued, there is an ‘immense’ potential to set people up to breach orders. Full non-contact orders in remote communities, for example, ‘will invariably prove almost impossible to comply with’.47 Orders must therefore be ‘realistic and reflect individual wishes if they are to be at all effective’.48

38 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. See also A Cannon, Submission FV 137, 23 June 2010.
41 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
45 Ibid.
47 Ibid.
48 Ibid.
Some stakeholders were concerned that police might be less able or equipped than a court to properly identify ‘primary aggressors’.49 One submission suggested that a policy on ‘primary aggressors’ should be adopted before police powers were extended.50 One legal centre was concerned about ‘entrenched systematic racism in relation to Aboriginal women and children and abuse of police power in this context’.51 It was also submitted that police might sometimes issue these orders inappropriately, such as where there is no real danger and the apparent victim does not even want an order.52

Benefits of police orders

In contrast to the above, a range of views were expressed about the benefits of police-issued orders. The Queensland Government, for example, noted that police orders can relieve victims of the stress and pressure of appearing in court.53 National Legal Aid submitted that police orders allow ‘a wider range of people to be protected, at an earlier stage’ and they ‘can be made at the time of the incident or soon afterwards’.54 This appears to be the stage at which victims are most likely to want to press charges and receive protection orders, before the process of second-guessing and considering priorities other than safety begins. It is also the stage at which a victim is most likely to want to leave the relationship.55

As noted above, in the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that police only impose protection orders ‘to intervene in emergency or crisis situations in circumstances where it is not reasonably practicable or possible for the matter to be dealt with at that time by a court’.56 A number of submissions noted the value of police-issued orders in these crisis situations and when the courts are closed,57 as well as in remote communities where courts might only sit every few months.58 However, the Victorian Government thought that ‘emergency’ and ‘crisis’ were subjective terms

50 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
51 T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010. This partner violence counsellor said that commonly a malicious neighbour will hear an argument and call the police and the police will feel obliged to make an order; the offender might then blame his or her partner.
55 Ibid.
56 Consultation Paper, Proposal 5–4(a).
57 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010. and open to a range of interpretations, suggesting instead that ‘police concern for the safety of the individual is a more appropriate measure’.59

9.29 The Commissions also proposed that police-issued protection orders should act as an application to the court for a protection order and as a summons. However, in contrast, one submission highlighted some of the benefits of police-issued orders that do not act as an application to the court or as a summons. It submitted that the short-term police orders in WA had been particularly useful in Indigenous communities and rural and remote areas. The orders provided temporary protection for victims ‘not ready to leave the relationship’. It submitted that police should only apply for court orders ‘in line with the wishes of the victim’ and that summoning offenders may sometimes endanger victims and their children.60

Duration

9.30 The duration of police-issued orders attracted considerable comment. Many stakeholders submitted that police-issued orders should only last a short time. One stakeholder submitted that police orders issued in emergency situations should not last for more than 28 days.61 Another submitted that the respondent should be summonsed to the court within 14 days—at the most.62 The Queensland Law Society supported the police being able to make orders for a period of up to 72 hours, so the matter can then come quickly before a court.63 One legal service submitted that part-time rural courts should also be considered and that orders should be for: ‘perhaps 72 hours or [until] the next Court sitting day whichever is the earlier—with a maximum period prescribed’.64

9.31 Twelve month police orders were criticised by a number of stakeholders.65 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria said the orders should be limited in duration and that twelve months is excessive.

Most family violence safety notices include an exclusion condition and we believe a restriction of this nature requires timely review. For many protected persons it provides an immediate response when the family violence intervention occurs but, in their view, ceases to be necessary once the crisis has passed.66

9.32 The NAAJA was also concerned about the duration of orders in the NT:

These orders can last for 12 months if not varied in court by both parties. And in our experience, this is often what occurs due to the significant potential for inappropriate, unworkable orders to be simply left in place in remote Aboriginal communities.
Aboriginal people in remote communities do not have ready access to legal advice on how to vary an order. They may also lack the functional English literacy skills to

60 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.
62 Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010.
65 J Schramm, Submission FV 218, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010. Such orders can be made in Tasmania.
66 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
complete an application to vary an order. Similarly, because bush courts only sit infrequently in remote communities, they also lack opportunity to bring applications to vary an order when court is sitting.67

9.33 The Police Association of New South Wales, however, would like police to be given the power to issue protection orders ‘which are enforceable immediately and only referred to a court for amendment or revocation by either party’. The Association submitted that, with the consent of both parties, the order should remain in force for twelve months. It said more victims will come forward if they do not need to go to court and the Tasmanian system should be rolled out in other jurisdictions.68

Police applications to a remote judicial officer

9.34 There was some support for police applying to judicial officers for interim orders, usually by telephone, as they do in New South Wales (NSW).69 Under such a system, the order is not made by the police, but by a judicial officer.

9.35 The Local Court of NSW supported the NSW ‘After Hours’ model, under which the decision about whether to make a protection order is made independently from the outset. This was ‘a preferable alternative to enabling police to make emergency protection orders.’70 The Court stressed the importance of having independent decision makers in circumstances where legislation imposes a duty on police to apply for a protection order. It was also important to avoid a conflict of interest where a police officer has used family violence and must be made the subject of a protection order. The Court also warned against the danger of ‘net widening’—police making exclusion orders ‘as a matter of course’.

Whilst it is imperative that protection be afforded to those who require it, it is also implicit within the Act that the making of an order unnecessarily can be detrimental to the defendant.71

9.36 Queensland police can also apply to a magistrate to make an order over the telephone late at night or to take a respondent into custody in a more serious case, but the Queensland Law Society submitted that these applications are apparently ‘rarely brought in part due to the natural desire of magistrates not to be called at 2.00am ... except where absolutely necessary’.72

9.37 The value of protection orders was said to depend on the willingness of police to follow up on breaches, which, it was said, the police often fail to do.73

70 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
71 Ibid.
Commissions’ views

A judicial decision

9.38 In the Commissions’ view, family violence protection orders should, wherever possible, be made or authorised by a judicial officer. The ALRC is required to ensure that the laws it reviews do not make the rights and liberties of citizens unduly dependent on administrative rather than judicial decisions. If a person’s rights and liberty need to be curtailed by a protection order, the decision should ideally be made by a judicial officer.

9.39 There are many benefits to judicial officers issuing or authorising protection orders, even remotely, such as by phone. The orders should ideally have the benefit of a judicial officer’s training and understanding of family violence legislation, its principles, and the known dynamics of family violence in practice. A judicial officer should also have a better understanding of the scope of the powers under family violence legislation and be able to tailor the order appropriately. Judicial officers are also independent of the police, and therefore serve as a check on police power.

9.40 There are further advantages when the decision is made in a court: the parties have a greater opportunity to be heard; they can use lawyers; they can use translators, Indigenous-specific support services and other court services; the court may have greater access to any family court orders or other protection orders that have been made in the past; the judicial officer can impress upon offenders the fact that society will not tolerate family violence; and the court can refer victims and persons who have used violence to appropriate services and programs.

9.41 There may be practical barriers that make it difficult for police to apply to judicial officers for protection orders. Police may be reluctant to disturb judicial officers outside court hours and they may be averse to completing the necessary paperwork associated with an application. These were the practical matters that prompted WA to adopt police-issued protection orders. In the Commissions’ view, however, these barriers do not justify removing judicial oversight of protection order matters. The barriers should be overcome through training, better forms, more efficient procedures, and perhaps specialist judicial officers trained in family violence and—where there is sufficient need—with time dedicated to considering remote applications for protection orders.

9.42 The Commissions recognise that some victims may not want a long-term protection order, and may therefore prefer a short-term order issued by the police. A victim may also not want to go to court—to explain either why he or she needs or does not need an order—and may not even want the person who has used family violence to have to go to court. The victim may only have wanted police protection while the aggressor ‘cooled off’.

9.43 The Commissions appreciate the importance of respecting the wishes of victims, but when violence has come to the attention of the state, it is incumbent on the state to consider properly and carefully the safety of victims and any children. This consideration is best undertaken by a judicial officer, preferably in a court. The judicial officer can then decide—having heard from the aggressor and, if the victim wishes, from the victim—whether the victim wants or needs further protection. Furthermore, police will only apply for a protection order where there is family violence, and the serious nature of family violence suggests that a person who has used it should at least be required to appear before a court to explain his or her behaviour and why the victim does not need protection.

Limited circumstances justifying police orders

9.44 While the Commissions would prefer all protection orders to be made by judicial officers, the Commissions are somewhat reluctant to recommend the removal of police-issued orders entirely, particularly in WA where submissions suggest they are working well and where the telephone application procedure was ineffective. In some circumstances and in some jurisdictions—particularly in remote and rural areas—it might not be possible for a court or a remote judicial officer to consider every application in a timely way. The Commissions recognise that where a victim of family violence needs immediate protection, a police-issued order will be better than no order at all.

9.45 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that where police have the power to issue orders, they should only be able to do so 'in emergency or crisis situations in circumstances where it is not reasonably practicable or possible for the matter to be dealt with at that time by a court'.\(^{75}\) As noted above, the Victorian Government submitted that this test was subjective and suggested that ‘police concern for the safety of the individual is a more appropriate measure’. Police concern is also a subjective test, but the Commissions agree that the circumstances in which it might be appropriate for the police to issue an order might be wider than crisis or emergency situations. The Commissions therefore recommend that police should only have powers to issue orders where it is not reasonable or practicable: for the matter to be immediately heard before a court; or for police to apply to a judicial officer for an order (by telephone or other electronic medium).

Duration, application to court, and summons

9.46 The greater a person’s rights and liberties are affected, the greater the need for judicial control or oversight. This is why the Commissions are particularly concerned about the Tasmanian model, which allows police to impose orders that may last 12 months, and effectively places an onus on the person against whom the order is made to apply for a variation or revocation. The Tasmanian provision should be amended to provide that police family violence orders last only for a short specified time—perhaps 72 hours, as in Western Australia.

9.47 The Commissions also recommend that, where police have the power to issue protection orders, the orders should act as an application to the court for a protection order as well as a summons to the person against whom the order is made to appear in court within a short specified time. This will mean that, even where it is necessary for police to issue an order, the matter will be more fully considered by a court and the parties will have the attendant benefits noted above.

\(^{75}\) Consultation Paper, Proposal 5–4(a).

9.48 Finally, to distinguish police-issued protection orders from judicial orders, the Commissions recommend that the police orders be called ‘safety notices’ or just ‘notices’—or something other than ‘orders’.

Recommendation 9–1 State and territory family violence legislation that empowers police to issue protection orders should call these orders ‘safety notices’ or ‘notices’ to distinguish them from court orders.

The legislation should provide that police may only issue safety notices where it is not reasonable or practicable for:

(a) the matter to be immediately heard before a court; or

(b) police to apply to a judicial officer for an order (by telephone or other electronic medium).

The safety notice should act as an application to the court for a protection order and a summons for the person against whom the notice is issued to appear before the court within a short specified time. The notice should expire when the person to whom it is issued appears in court.

Police duties to investigate and to apply for orders

9.49 In some jurisdictions police play an active role in applying to judicial officers for protection orders on behalf of victims. In most jurisdictions, police are empowered to apply for a protection order, or to help a victim make an application.

9.50 There are, however, significant differences across family violence legislation in respect of the obligations placed on police to take action where family violence is suspected. In NSW, Queensland, and WA, family violence legislation places express obligations on police to investigate family violence. New South Wales and WA have the strongest legislative directions in relation to ‘pro-protection policing’.

9.51 In NSW, a police officer investigating a family violence matter is obliged to make an application for a protection order under family violence legislation if he or she suspects that a family violence offence or child-abuse related offence has been, is being, or is likely to be committed, against the person for whose protection the order would be made. The legislation sets out the circumstances in which a police officer need not apply for an order, including where the victim intends to make the application. In such cases, a police officer must make a written record of his or her reasons for not making an application.

---

77 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 18(2).

9.52 Similarly, in WA a police officer is required to investigate whether an act of family violence is being, has been, or is likely to be committed if the police officer reasonably suspects that the act is a criminal offence or has put the safety of a person at risk. After such investigation a police officer is required to make an application for a protection order, or a police order, or a written record of why neither of those actions was taken.

9.53 In Queensland, if a police officer reasonably suspects that a person is one for whose protection a protection order under family violence legislation could be made, he or she is required to investigate, or cause to be investigated, the complaint or circumstance on which the reasonable suspicion is based until the officer is satisfied the suspicion is unfounded. Following the investigation, a police officer is empowered, but not obliged, to apply for a protection order or take other action if the officer reasonably believes that the person needs protection and there is sufficient reason for the officer to take action. The obligation to respond to domestic violence is also set out in the Queensland Police Operational Procedures Manual.

9.54 In Victoria, the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence, issued by Victoria Police, requires police to apply for a protection order wherever the safety, welfare or property of a family member appears to be endangered by another, or a criminal offence is involved.

9.55 In contrast, for example, in the ACT, police are not obliged to investigate on the basis of reasonable suspicion or to apply for protection orders. ACT police are empowered to apply for emergency orders, and are required in certain circumstances to make a written record of reasons for not applying for emergency orders. ACT Policing has advised that it makes little use of emergency orders, but that this is not necessarily a negative position if there is a charge to proceed with. ACT Policing’s pro-

---

79 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 49.
80 Ibid.
81 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 62A.
82 Ibid s 62C.
83 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 67(1).
84 Ibid s 67(2).
88 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 68.
89 Ibid s 83.
arrest policy may mean that there is less reason for an emergency order to be made.\textsuperscript{90} Other reasons are noted:

[Emergency orders] can also be difficult to obtain because the risk has to be imminent. There is narrow scope allowing for the application for an [emergency order]. While the use of [such orders] is low, it may be the fact that the situations in which police attend [do] not fit the criteria for an [emergency order].\textsuperscript{91}

9.56 The Model Domestic Violence Laws contain a provision that requires a police officer to investigate whether an act of family violence has been, is being, or is likely to be, committed where that police officer believes or suspects such circumstances exist. The provision does not require a police officer to apply for a protection order following such investigation but requires a written record of the reasons for not doing so.\textsuperscript{92} The proposal attracted criticism—from Karen Wilcox, for example:

Although tightening of police … responsibilities … was canvassed during the Model Laws development stage … states and territories have been slow to adopt provisions which require ‘pro-protection’ action on the part of police … Given the current emphasis on violence prevention in national and state/territory domestic violence public policy, this oversight is anomalous.\textsuperscript{93}

\textbf{Submissions and consultations}

9.57 The Consultation Paper considered both police duties to investigate family violence and police duties to apply for protection orders. The duties are related: a duty to apply for an order will often presuppose some investigation; and the outcome of an investigation can be that police will apply for a protection order.

\textbf{Duty to investigate}

9.58 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should:

\begin{enumerate}[label=(\alph*)]
\item impose a duty on police to investigate family violence where they have reason to suspect or believe that family violence has been, is being, or is likely to be committed; and \item require police to make a record of their reasons for not taking any action—such as applying for a protection order—if after investigating they decide not to take action.\textsuperscript{94}
\end{enumerate}

9.59 This was broadly endorsed by almost all submissions that addressed the proposal. Many submitted that police should be obliged to investigate family violence.\textsuperscript{95} National Legal Aid said that placing a duty on police takes the onus off

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{90} ACT Policing, \textit{Correspondence}, 15 March 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{91} Ibid. The ACT police’s role in the ACT’s Family Violence Intervention Program—a coordinated criminal justice response to family violence—is discussed in Ch 29.
\item \textsuperscript{92} Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group, \textit{Model Domestic Violence Laws} (1999), s 8.
\item \textsuperscript{93} K Wilcox, \textit{Recent Innovations in Australian Protection Order Law: A Comparative Discussion} (2010), prepared for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 12.
\item \textsuperscript{94} Consultation Paper, Proposal 5–5.
\item \textsuperscript{95} National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV 232}, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, \textit{Submission FV 225}, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV 220}, 1 July victims to apply for orders. Western Australia adopted a similar proposal in 2004, it said, and this ‘has played a significant role in improving police response to family violence’.
\end{itemize}

9.60 The Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) was concerned about police having a duty to investigate where family violence was simply ‘likely’ to be committed—that this might be too broad. Instead, police should have an obligation to investigate ‘where they suspect or believe that a family violence offence is being committed’.

9.61 Some stakeholders emphasised that police must receive family violence and cultural awareness training. They need to ‘understand the dynamics of the relationships and difficulties for women to take action against their partner without close support’.

9.62 There was also support for the proposal that police be required to record their reasons for not taking further action. It was submitted that this would increase police

---

97 Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
100 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010;
9. Police and Family Violence

accountability. The records could also be used in future investigations or applications for protection orders, and they would provide useful data for reporting and trend analysis. The Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) submitted that the record should extend to documentation of reasons as to why an arrest wasn’t made (if appropriate) and why criminal charges were not pursued. This may include noting whether there are concerns for the safety and welfare of the person reporting an incident and how safety and welfare concerns have been addressed.

9.63 One submission supported the proposal because it would make it more onerous for police not to take action; another—a partner violence counsellor—disagreed, and thought it was important that officers not think that taking further action is the easier or safer option.

9.64 This counsellor also suggested that if a perceived victim does not want the police to take any further action, they could be asked to sign a document to that effect, away from any potential controlling influence. Another stakeholder submitted that, to the contrary, the victim’s refusal to take further action should not be an acceptable reason not to take action.

9.65 There were some concerns about whether police had adequate resources to always investigate family violence properly, and some said it was important to minimise any administrative burden on police.

104 Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.

107 Ibid.

108 C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.

109 Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010.

Duty to apply for a protection order

9.66 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked in what circumstances police should be required to apply for protection orders on behalf of victims.111

9.67 Police applying for protection orders was said to be a ‘useful strategy’.112 National Legal Aid submitted that it could help to shift the responsibility away from the victim and to a target less subject to pressure, while sending a message to the community that family violence will not be tolerated and victims will be supported.113 Others suggested that the duty should be supported by education, training and resources,114 and that there should be a ‘comprehensive and proactive system of supervision’.115 Monitoring was said to be important because sometimes police still fail to take action.116

9.68 A number of different circumstances were suggested for when police should be required to apply for an order. Some identified the types of victims for whom police should apply for orders:

• children—either in direct danger or at risk of exposure to violence;117

• people with an intellectual disability or ‘complex needs such as drug and alcohol or mental illness’;118

• older persons;119 and

• people ‘traumatised or psychologically damaged by exposure to abuse, especially victims of repeat assaults’.120

9.69 Other submissions identified various circumstances in which police should apply for orders:

• when necessary to protect the safety of the victim;121

• to preserve the victim’s property;122

---

111 Consultation Paper, Question 5–7.
113 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
115 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
117 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010.
118 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
119 Ibid.
120 Ibid.
121 Ibid.
122 Ibid.
9. Police and Family Violence

- where a domestic violence offence has occurred;\textsuperscript{123}
- where a person expresses reasonable fear of another person;\textsuperscript{124}
- where it is likely that the violence will occur in the future;\textsuperscript{125}
- where the victim is fearful of applying for the order themselves;\textsuperscript{126}
- where the victim ‘appears unable to do so for him or herself because, for example, he or she is under the influence of alcohol or other drugs or obvious mental disorder,’\textsuperscript{127} and
- where someone appears to be ‘menacingly coercing or otherwise influencing the victim to not make a complaint’.\textsuperscript{128}

9.70 The Queensland Law Society thought the ‘statutory balance’ under the Queensland Act was appropriate.\textsuperscript{129} The Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre supported the NSW model.\textsuperscript{130}

9.71 Differing views were expressed in relation to victim consent—some saying consent was necessary, others that it was not. There were concerns about issuing protection orders for people who say they do not need protection. Courts ‘should be informed if the protected person does not agree’, one stakeholder submitted.\textsuperscript{131} Others went further, and submitted that police must have the consent of the victim to institute any proceedings, because

\begin{quote}
...to pursue such an order without the victim’s consent will be futile and will once again place the victim under the control of another rather than giving them the power to make their own decisions.\textsuperscript{132}
\end{quote}

9.72 One stakeholder, who identified herself as a survivor of family violence, did not support this proposal because ‘at times the victim knows instinctively that the serving of a protection order would be like ‘a red rag to a bull’’.\textsuperscript{133}

9.73 One stakeholder suggested the police should have to apply for an order ‘with the consent of the victim, and without the consent of the victim where the victim’s life or safety is at risk’.\textsuperscript{134}

\textsuperscript{123} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{124} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{125} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{126} K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{127} T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{128} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{129} Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010. The Queensland test is described above.
\textsuperscript{130} Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{131} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{132} Gosnells Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 36, 31 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{133} M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010. See also Confidential, Submission FV 89, 3 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{134} The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010.
9.74 Some submitted that police must have some discretion; there should be some room to manoeuvre. Others emphasised the importance of victims being able to apply to the court directly for an order, without involving the police. As noted below, this might be particularly important for Indigenous women:

In business hours where women prefer to access an [Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander] or mainstream legal service for assistance, and where this assistance is available, the women should be able to exercise this option.

Location of duties

9.75 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that a duty to investigate family violence should be set out in state and territory family violence legislation. Those who supported the proposal presumably agreed that it should be in legislation. Women’s Legal Services (NSW) specifically submitted that the duty to investigate should be set out in legislation, rather than just in policy.

9.76 The Victorian Government, however, submitted that a duty for police to investigate belongs in codes of practice, rather than in legislation. Victoria Police submitted that a legal duty to investigate family violence would be ‘inconsistent with the overall response to investigate all other offences where a legal duty is not imposed’.

9.77 The Commissions also asked whether a requirement to apply for protection orders on behalf of victims should be imposed by state and territory family violence legislation or by police codes of practice. Some stakeholders said the requirement should have a legislative basis; codes of practice are ‘difficult to monitor and enforce—legislation is preferable’; and not all police consistently follow codes of practices. One legal service provider said the requirement should be in legislation for the sake of ‘transparency, enforceability, clarity and consistency’. Another emphasized that, by putting the duty in legislation and making it law, police are more likely to actively pursue their obligation and take notice of the requirement ... Having statutory force could also reassure the police that they will not be subject to adverse consequences.

9.78 Most stakeholders who said the requirement should be in legislation, said it should also be in codes of practice. ‘It may be preferable to include broad principles in legislation with a requirement for a code of practice to support the application of those principles that is subject to regular review’.147

9.79 The Victorian Government, on the other hand, did not support the introduction in legislation of a set of circumstances in which police should apply for an order, as this was the role of codes of practice, police training and policy:148

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence outlines the circumstances in which police are required to apply for a family violence intervention order on behalf of victims, which is based on a comprehensive family violence risk assessment.149

Commissions’ views

Duty to investigate

9.80 Police should be required to investigate family violence where they have reason to believe or suspect family violence has been, is being, or is likely to be committed, as suggested in the Model Domestic Violence Laws. This duty should be imposed either in family violence legislation or in police codes of practice and should be supported by training and education.

9.81 A duty to investigate relieves victims of some of the pressure of dealing with family violence; they are no longer solely responsible for securing their protection and the protection of their children. A duty to investigate accomplishes this without taking from victims all control over their situation, and allows police to consider properly the needs and wishes of victims before taking further action.

9.82 The Commissions maintain that the duty should include a duty to investigate where family violence is even simply ‘likely’ to be committed, as well as where it has been or is being committed. According to the most frequently cited exposition of the word, ‘likely’ can, in some contexts, mean ‘probably’ ... that is to say, more likely than not or more than a 50 per cent chance. It can also, in an appropriate context, refer to a real or not remote chance or possibility, regardless of whether it is less or more than 50 per cent.150

9.83 The lower standard seems appropriate where police assess a risk of family violence—particularly if the family violence includes physical or sexual assault or danger to children. If a police officer believes there is a real or not remote chance or possibility of family violence, the officer should investigate. This duty only becomes

---

147 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. See also Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010.

150 Deane J in Tillmans Butcheries Pty Ltd v Australian Meat Industry Employees’ Union (1979) 27 ALR 367.
clearer and more pressing if the officer believes there is a greater than 50% chance of family violence. It is important for police to try to prevent family violence, not simply respond after it has happened.

9.84 However, if the definition of family violence were expanded, and more relationships were captured by the definition of family, there might be more incidents of family violence to investigate. Another consequence of a duty to investigate wherever police suspect any family violence—that is, behaviour that causes fear, or that coerces or controls a family member, including economic and emotional abuse—is likely to occur, might be an increase in the potential number of investigations. For police to accommodate such responsibilities, a significant increase in resources is desirable. However, police codes of practice and training should also equip police to assess efficiently and responsibly a person’s need for protection, and to respond accordingly.

9.85 If police choose not to take action when they find family violence, or a likelihood of family violence, they should record their reasons for not taking action—for example, their reasons for not issuing or applying for a protection order and for not charging or arresting a person who has committed a family violence crime. This is the approach advocated in the Model Domestic Violence Laws and that has been adopted by a small number of jurisdictions. Such records might be valuable in future investigations; they could be used by more senior officers to assess whether police are making appropriate decisions about when to take further action; and the records might also be a good source of data for higher-level analysis. To ensure police officers may perform their duties efficiently, the process for recording reasons should not be made administratively burdensome.

Duty to apply for a protection order

9.86 The Commissions also suggest that, in appropriate circumstances, police have a duty to apply to a court or a judicial officer for a protection order. Many of the advantages of police being required to investigate family violence, as identified by stakeholders, were also cited as advantages of police being required to apply for protection orders in some circumstances. When a police officer applies for an order, it relieves a victim of the need to do so. It might also mean the aggressor will be more likely to (wrongly) blame the police for the order, rather than (wrongly) blame the victim.

9.87 Submissions did not reveal a clear picture of precisely when the police should be required to apply for a protection order. There may be some circumstances in which it is quite clear that they should: the most straightforward are where the victim asks the police to apply for an order or where the victim is in clear and imminent danger of physical or sexual assault.

9.88 The need for protection will also be more pressing where the violence is criminal. The Commissions recommend in Chapter 11 that judicial officers should be able to issue a protection order at any stage of a criminal proceeding that relates to family violence—including prior to a plea or finding of guilt. To some extent, this recommendation may alleviate the need to require police always to apply for a protection order for victims of criminal family violence.

---

151 See Chs 5, 7.

9.89 However, the Commissions are not convinced that there should be a very broad, fixed set of circumstances in which police must always apply for a protection order. It does not seem appropriate to require police to apply routinely for an order whenever there has been an incident of family violence or whenever there is some likelihood of future family violence—particularly if the victim, without apparent coercion or intimidation, has made it clear that he or she does not need protection in this way. The Commissions therefore do not prescribe a list of particularly vulnerable victims for whom police must always apply for an order. Similarly, the Commissions do not prescribe a set of circumstances in which police must always apply for an order. However, police codes of practice, education and training should give police guidance on this matter.

9.90 This is not to say police should not investigate the matter. The circumstances in which police have a duty to investigate family violence are broader than those in which they should apply for a protection order. Investigations of family violence—during which officers pay close attention to the victim; listen to his or her needs; assess danger—will often best reveal whether the police should apply for a protection order or take any other action.

Recommendation 9–2 State and territory family violence legislation and/or police codes of practice should impose a duty on police to:

(a) investigate family violence where they believe family violence has been, is being, or is likely to be committed; and

(b) record when they decide not to take further action and their reasons for not taking further action.

Indigenous-specific support for protection order applications

9.91 Arguments for and against a more active police role in applying for protection orders were canvassed by the Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) in its report, Review of Family Violence Laws. One disadvantage identified in a submission to that review is that Indigenous peoples may be reluctant to seek assistance for family violence if most applications are brought by police.

9.92 The VLRC expressed the view that ‘if the system is going to be flexible and responsive to victims’ needs, it is essential that victims can apply for a [protection order] without involving the police. In particular, it recommended increased Indigenous-specific support services in court to enable Indigenous people to apply for a protection order without police involvement.

---

153 Ibid, [5.89] (citation omitted).

Submissions and consultations

9.93 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether all state and territory governments should ensure that there are Indigenous-specific support services in courts to enable Indigenous people to apply for protection orders without police involvement. In response, nearly all submissions answered the question in the affirmative, with one saying that Indigenous people should be consulted about what is needed. A range of views was evident in submissions.

9.94 Some said that Indigenous women were often reluctant to engage with police and ‘to avail themselves of protection orders’. They need ‘a great deal of support around applying for a protection order’. It was submitted that this might be due to:

- the ‘historical relationship between police and Aboriginal people’;
- a ‘distrust of police’;
- fear of authorities;
- ‘fear of community reprisals’; and
- fear of children being removed from their families.

9.95 One Indigenous legal service said that applying for protection orders is time-consuming and complicated and therefore restricts access to justice. Some of the barriers to reporting sexual assault, discussed in Chapter 26, might also partly explain why some Indigenous women may be reluctant to approach the police.

9.96 Not all submissions agreed that Indigenous women were reluctant to engage with the police. Stubbs supported the proposal, but said it should not be used as an

---

154 Ibid, [5.91].
155 Ibid, [5.92].
156 Consultation Paper, Question 5–8.
157 For example, Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010.
159 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
160 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
161 Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
9. Police and Family Violence

excuse to neglect Indigenous victims. Indigenous people have criticised police, Stubbs said, for too often ‘being unresponsive to the needs of Indigenous victims’.

9.97 Most of the Indigenous women that speak to the Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre want the police to be involved, the Centre submitted. The women want to be relieved of the responsibility for making a decision about the order—and of the pressure exerted by ‘the offender, his family or community’. But the police response ‘must be appropriate, responsive, respectful and culturally sensitive’.

9.98 The Victorian Government submitted that it supports initiatives that provide additional assistance to groups over-represented in the justice system. It referred to the Koori Family Violence Court Support Project, a pilot project now under development that aims to improve the capacity of the Magistrates’ Court to provide a culturally appropriate response for family violence cases in the Koori community by developing partnerships with local Indigenous services, providing access to support for both Indigenous victims and offenders of family violence, and implementing training in Koori-specific family violence issues in the courts.

9.99 The Queensland Government said it would consider the issues raised by this question in the context of the Queensland Government Strategy and recommendations made by Professor Chris Cunneen. It also said that it ‘currently funds a number of services which provide court support to women affected by domestic and family violence’:

Some of these services are able to provide assistance to applicants in completing applications for domestic violence orders. The Australian Government funds Family Violence Prevention Centres which offer assistance to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander victims of domestic and family violence in regional and remote areas in Central, North and Far North Queensland. Legal advice and assistance is also provided by Legal Aid Queensland, the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Legal Service and Community Legal Centres.

9.100 Though Indigenous specific support services should be available, it was submitted, Indigenous persons should not have to use them if they do not want to—victims might be related to Indigenous court workers or they might be concerned about confidentiality, particularly in remote areas.

Aboriginal women want to be able to access mainstream services that are sensitive to their needs and culturally appropriate as well as have the option of using Indigenous specific services. The choice should be the women’s choice.

165 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
167 Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010. See also C Cunneen, Alternative and Improved Responses to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland Indigenous Communities (2009).
169 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010.
170 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
Many submissions stressed that Indigenous victims of family violence need more than Indigenous-specific court services to help them apply for protection orders. They also need support well before they go to court. Indigenous women may not access the Aboriginal Legal Service, it was submitted, because the service is seen to act for perpetrators. Hence, various services need to be established, expanded or given more funding—particularly in areas of greatest need. These services include:

- advocacy and court services for Indigenous victims of family violence, such as the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Services;
- Indigenous women’s programs;
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander family violence prevention legal centres;
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women’s legal services;
- outreach support services for remote courts;
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander court liaison officers in local courts; and
- Indigenous support services in police stations.

Commissions’ views

All victims of family violence should be able to apply for protection orders without necessarily involving the police. Victims who fear, distrust or simply dislike the police—with or without good reason, and even for fear of being arrested themselves—should still be able to obtain a family violence protection order. The process should be as simple and straightforward as possible; services should be put in place to help victims apply for orders. There is a particular need for Indigenous-specific support services in courts. Some victims from particular cultural and linguistic backgrounds might also need extra assistance to apply to a court for an order themselves. As Dr Heather Douglas notes, in a related context:

women from non-English speaking backgrounds may experience linguistic and cultural issues in their dealings with police. Uncertain immigration status may also impact on a victim’s willingness to involve police.

The Commissions agree, however, that victims should not be automatically referred to culturally-specific services. They may feel they do not need extra help, or

171 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
172 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
174 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
175 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
176 Ibid; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
177 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
178 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
180 Ibid.
they may simply prefer to use ‘mainstream’ services for other reasons. However, special services should be available and should be offered to those who might need them.

9.104 As stakeholders have pointed out in other contexts, the power of a protection order often depends on the willingness of police to enforce its conditions; victims who will not call police to have their orders enforced might therefore compromise their own safety. But some victims who prefer not to ask police to apply for an order may nevertheless be prepared to call upon the police to enforce the order. In any event, a protection order can protect victims even if police are not called upon to enforce it. Victims may threaten to call the police if the order is breached. The subject of the order might obey it anyway. Further, as outlined above, there are many benefits of victims and aggressors attending court for an order: for example, parties can have their say; aggressors can be censured; and parties can be referred to services and counselling programs.

9.105 If relations between police and Indigenous people are poor in some areas—as submissions suggest they are—then concerted efforts should be made by police and Indigenous communities to repair those relations and build trust. But even where relations are strong and positive, particular victims of family violence might prefer to apply for a protection order without involving police. This choice should be respected and fostered with practical assistance.

Recommendation 9–3

State and territory governments should ensure that support services are in place to assist persons in need of protection to apply for a protection order without involving police. These should include services specifically for:

(a) Indigenous persons; and

(b) persons from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.

Police powers in dealing with family violence

9.106 Although protection orders are a civil remedy, and the standard of proof to obtain them is the civil standard of the balance of probabilities, the procedures followed are those usually associated with criminal matters.

9.107 There have been numerous investigations into policing practices in the context of family violence in Australia since 2001. These have focused on issues such as police attitudes to family violence; training of police; evidence-gathering; inter-agency liaison and communication; pro-arrest and pro-charging policies; and the role of police in applying for, issuing, and enforcing protection orders.\textsuperscript{183}

---

9.108 The following section discusses the special police powers that exist in most jurisdictions in the context of family violence, including police powers of entry, search and seizure, arrest, direction and detention.

Powers of entry

9.109 At common law, the police may enter a home without a warrant in the following circumstances: by invitation; in order to carry out an arrest; on reasonable suspicion that an offence is being committed; or on reasonable suspicion that a breach of the peace is occurring or is about to occur.\textsuperscript{184}

9.110 In addition, in most Australian jurisdictions, the police have specific legislative powers to enter premises without warrants in cases of family violence. These provisions are designed to overcome

\[\text{[t]he difficulty police face in domestic violence cases, where the need to gain entry may be of vital importance for the victim’s safety, … that if all appears quiet and the only evidence available about possible violence is, eg a neighbour’s telephone call, the police are at risk of making an illegal entry if they enter without permission. They may face a civil action or possibly disciplinary proceedings.} \textsuperscript{185}\]

9.111 The scope of these powers varies between jurisdictions. Such powers may be conferred by family violence legislation, or by legislation governing criminal procedure.

Powers of entry under family violence legislation

9.112 The family violence Acts of Victoria, WA, Tasmania and the NT each confer powers of entry on police.

9.113 In Victoria, a police officer is authorised to enter premises using reasonable force and without warrant if, for example, the officer reasonably believes that a person: has assaulted or threatened to assault a family member; is on the premises in contravention of a protection order; or is refusing or failing to comply with a direction by police to remain in a place, go to and remain at a place, or remain in the company of a designated person.\textsuperscript{186}

\textsuperscript{184} Thomson Reuters, The Laws of Australia, vol 17 Family Law, 17.5, [13].

\textsuperscript{185} Ibid.

\textsuperscript{186} Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 157.
9.114 In WA, a police officer may enter premises without warrant if the officer reasonably suspects that a person is committing an act of family violence or that such an act was committed before the officer’s arrival. The police officer may remain on the premises for as long as he or she considers necessary to: investigate the matter; ensure that there is no imminent danger of family violence being committed on the premises; or give or arrange for reasonable assistance.\(^{187}\)

9.115 In Tasmania, a police officer is authorised to enter and remain on premises without warrant and use such force as is necessary to prevent family violence at the request of the person who apparently resides on the premises; or if the officer reasonably suspects that family violence is being, has been, or is likely to be committed on those premises.\(^{188}\)

9.116 In the NT, a police officer is authorised to enter premises if the officer reasonably believes that grounds exist for making a protection order, and it is necessary to remove a person from the premises to prevent an imminent risk of harm to another person or damage to property.\(^{189}\)

9.117 South Australian family violence legislation confers a comparatively narrower power of entry on police. If a protection order requires a person to surrender specified weapons and articles, then police may enter and search any premises or vehicle where such a weapon or article is reasonably suspected to be.\(^{190}\)

Powers of entry under other legislation

9.118 In other jurisdictions, powers of entry are conferred on police under legislation other than family violence legislation. In NSW, law enforcement legislation confers a power of entry to investigate or prevent the commission of family violence offences on a police officer if the police officer is invited onto the premises by an apparent resident, or pursuant to a warrant.\(^{191}\) In Queensland, legislation setting out police powers and responsibilities confers on police powers of entry where an officer reasonably suspects that family violence is occurring or has occurred prior to the officer’s arrival.\(^{192}\) The NT legislation governing police administration also confers on police an express power to enter premises where there is a reasonable belief that a contravention of a protection order has occurred, is occurring or is likely to occur.\(^{193}\)

---

187 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 62B.
188 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 10.
189 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 84(1), (2)(a).
191 See Law Enforcement (Powers and Responsibilities) Act 2002 (NSW) ss 82, 83, 85. A police officer is also entitled to request a person whose identity is unknown to the officer to disclose his or her identity if the officer reasonably suspects that a protection order has been made against the person: s 13A.
192 Police Powers and Responsibilities Act 2000 (Qld) s 609.
193 Police Administration Act (NT) s 126(2A)(b).
9.119 The Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) confers powers of entry where an officer reasonably believes that: an offence or breach of the peace is being committed; a person has suffered physical injury or there is imminent danger of injury to a person or damage to property, and it is necessary to enter the premises immediately for preventative purposes.\(^{194}\) The relevant provision does not refer expressly to family violence.

9.120 The Summary Offences Act 1953 (SA) empowers the SA Commissioner of Police to issue general search warrants to such police officers as the Commissioner thinks fit. The warrants generally remain in force for six months, and give the officer power to, among other things, ‘enter into, break open and search any house, building, premises or place where he or she has reasonable cause to suspect that an offence has been recently committed, or is about to be committed’.\(^{195}\)

Powers of search and seizure

9.121 In most jurisdictions, family violence legislation or other legislation governing criminal procedure confers on police powers to:

- search premises;\(^{196}\)
- search for and seize firearms either with or without warrant;\(^{197}\)
- search a person and any ‘vehicle, package or thing in the person’s possession’ if the officer reasonably suspects that the person has any object that may cause injury or damage or may be used to escape;\(^{198}\) or
- search and seize other articles used, or that may be used, to commit family violence.\(^{199}\)

Powers of arrest, direction and detention

9.122 Usually, the police only exercise the power of arrest if they intend to charge the person with an offence. This requires some evidence and a judgment as to whether prosecution will be successful. The law of arrest is also framed to favour requiring a person to appear in court by way of summons, rather than by arrest, because of the greater coercive effect of powers of arrest. However, since in family violence cases arrest ‘provides a measure of safety’, the law of arrest has been modified in some

---

194 Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 190. See also Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 188.
195 Summary Offences Act 1953 (SA) s 67.
196 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 157; Police Powers and Responsibilities Act 2000 (Qld) s 609; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 62B.
197 Law Enforcement (Powers and Responsibilities) Act 2002 (NSW) s 86; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 159; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 62B; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 37; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 10(5); Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 191; Police Administration Act (NT) s 126.
198 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 16.
jurisdictions to provide greater powers of arrest and detention in family violence cases.\textsuperscript{200} These powers may be conferred either by family violence legislation or by other legislation governing criminal procedure.

\textit{Arrest}

9.123 In Tasmania and the ACT, a police officer may arrest without warrant if the officer suspects on reasonable grounds that a person has committed or is committing a family violence offence.\textsuperscript{201} Tasmanian family violence legislation specifies that, in deciding whether to arrest a person for family violence, a police officer is to give priority to the safety, wellbeing and interests of any affected person or affected child.\textsuperscript{202}

9.124 Three jurisdictions also make specific legislative provision enabling arrest without warrant upon breach of a protection order.\textsuperscript{203} In other jurisdictions, for each of the above cases, there would be powers to arrest without warrant on the basis that an offence has been committed.\textsuperscript{204}

9.125 There are other, less common, special powers of arrest. In NSW, an authorised officer may issue a warrant for arrest if an application for a final protection order has been made, even though the person is not alleged to have committed an offence.\textsuperscript{205} In Victoria, a magistrate or registrar may issue a warrant for arrest on an application for a protection order on the basis of a reasonable belief that it is necessary to achieve certain objects, including: ensuring the safety of the victim and the protection of child victims; preserving the property of a victim; or ensuring a person’s attendance at court for a mention.\textsuperscript{206}

\textit{Direction and detention}

9.126 In the majority of Australian jurisdictions, there are powers to enable police to detain people who have used family violence, principally but not exclusively for purposes associated with issuing, serving or applying for protection orders. The precise form of these powers differs. In Queensland, the ACT, and the NT, police are empowered to remove and detain persons who have used family violence.\textsuperscript{207} In NSW,

\begin{itemize}
\item[\textsuperscript{200}] Thomson Reuters, \textit{The Laws of Australia}, vol 17 Family Law, 17.5, [21] (as at 7 January 2009).
\item[\textsuperscript{201}] Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 212(2); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 11. The definition of a ‘domestic violence offence’ in the Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 212 is linked to the definition of ‘domestic violence’ in the Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT). See also Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 34(1) which provides a power of arrest in circumstances connected to the service of an interim protection order.
\item[\textsuperscript{202}] Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 11.
\item[\textsuperscript{203}] Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 38 (safety notice), 50 (intervention order); Police Powers and Responsibilities Act 2000 (Qld) s 365(1)(j); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 36.
\item[\textsuperscript{204}] See, eg, Law Enforcement (Powers and Responsibilities) Act 2002 (NSW) s 99.
\item[\textsuperscript{205}] Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 88. The officer must issue such a warrant if it appears that the personal safety of the victim will be put at risk unless the defendant is arrested for the purpose of being brought before the court.
\item[\textsuperscript{206}] Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 50.
\item[\textsuperscript{207}] Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 69; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 75; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 84 (removal permitted if necessary to prevent imminent risk of harm to a person or damage to property).
\end{itemize}
Victoria, WA and SA, these powers take the form of a power to direct or require a person to remain in a designated place, in default of which the person may be arrested.\(^{208}\)

9.127 In NSW, for example, if a police officer makes or is about to make an application for a provisional order, he or she has a power to direct a person to remain at the scene of the incident or, in a case where the person has left the scene, at another place where the police officer locates the person. If a person refuses to remain at the specified place, the police officer may arrest and detain the person at the scene of the incident or other place, or arrest and take the person to a police station and detain the person there until a provisional protection order is made and served.\(^{209}\) There is no maximum limit on the time of this detention.

9.128 The Commissions heard in consultations that there are problems in the practical application of the police power in NSW to direct a person to remain at the scene of the incident, particularly in remote areas. For example, police may need to travel in excess of an hour to attend an incident, including those that occur in remote Indigenous communities. Directing a person who has used violence to remain at the scene of the incident, when the victim is there, is problematic—especially if the incident is only attended by one police officer who needs to leave the scene to arrange for a provisional protection order. If there is more than one police officer attending the incident, one of those officers has to remain at the scene while the other goes to arrange the provisional order.

9.129 The maximum time limit of these ‘holding’ powers varies, with SA limiting the time of detention after arrest at two hours, with an extension allowing an aggregate of eight hours by court order;\(^{210}\) Queensland, the ACT and the NT allowing four hours;\(^{211}\) and Victoria providing for up to six hours on the authority of the police and a maximum of ten hours by order of a court.\(^{212}\)

9.130 In Tasmania, a police officer may, without warrant, arrest a person they reasonably suspect has committed family violence. The person may then be detained ‘for a period reasonably required’ to determine charges; carry out a risk screening or safety audit; implement measures identified by a safety audit; make a police-issued protection order or apply to the court for a protection order.\(^{213}\) A person taken into custody must also be brought before a court ‘as soon as practicable’ and s 4 of the Criminal Law Detention and Interrogation Act 1995 (Tas) applies.\(^{214}\)

\(^{208}\) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 89; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 13–15; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 62F; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 34(1), (2). The Victorian Act also allows the police to direct the person to remain in the company of a designated person.

\(^{209}\) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 89.

\(^{210}\) Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 34.

\(^{211}\) Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 69; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 75; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 84.

\(^{212}\) Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 18.

\(^{213}\) Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 11(4).

\(^{214}\) Ibid s 11.
9.131 Special provision is also made in Victoria and Queensland to enable detention for the purposes of arranging for victim safety or services once the purpose of applying for a protection order has been fulfilled.215

Submissions and consultations

Entry, search and seizure powers

9.132 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether any issues arise in relation to the availability, scope and exercise in practice of police powers in connection with family violence to: (a) enter premises; (b) search for and seize firearms or other articles; and (c) arrest and detain persons. The Commissions also asked whether there is a need for legislative redress.216

9.133 Stakeholders that addressed this question seemed largely satisfied with the scope of these police powers: the powers were sufficient217 and should be maintained.218 It was suggested that the powers might not be used as often as they should be,219 but also that powers should not be expanded just because the existing ones were not being utilised effectively.220

9.134 Victoria Police were consulted on the development of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and advised that they ‘have not had any issues with the listed powers’.221 The Queensland Law Society said these powers were regularly used and it ‘supports police being able to attend at a domestic and be able to take direct action to ensure the safety of those present’.222

9.135 Some stakeholders, however, expressed concerns with these police powers. The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria said police often do not know where to send respondents when they exclude them from a property. The service did not advocate the increased incarceration of Indigenous men, but submitted that where Indigenous men are detained > it is critical that high level duty of care is exercised and appropriate legal and medical arrangements are made. In addition to improved services for [Indigenous] women victims, resourcing for appropriate services for [Indigenous] men perpetrators is also required.223

---

215 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 18(3); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 69(3).
216 Consultation Paper, Question 5–10.
9.136 The NT Legal Aid Commission noted that the fact that NT police powers were conferred by a broad range of legislation was ‘confusing’. The laws should be consolidated into a single item of legislation, which more clearly, systematically and consistently sets out the scope and nature of police powers of entry, search, apprehension, detention and so on.224

9.137 With respect to the scope of police powers, the Commissions expressed a particular interest in whether limited express legislative powers of entry for family violence in some jurisdictions, particularly SA, were causing difficulties.

9.138 The South Australian Government submitted that SA powers of entry and search were comparatively unlimited. It said the option developed by Maurine Pyke QC, cited above, did not seem to account for the existing power of entry and search in s 67 of the Summary Offences Act 1953 (SA), which was ‘deemed sufficient for forced entry’.225 The Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (SA) also noted that this section might be sufficient, but said:

Notwithstanding, it seems to me that the High Court has over time indicated that Parliament should state police authorities in statute law, rather than those authorities be assumed.226

9.139 Stakeholders did not address two further issues identified in the Consultation Paper about: whether there is a concern that police proceed by way of summons rather than arrest in some family violence cases; and the varied maximum duration of holding powers.227

Direction power

9.140 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory legislation which confers on police powers to detain persons who have used family violence should empower police to remove such persons from the scene of the family violence or direct them to leave the scene and remain at another specified place for the purpose of the police arranging for a protection order.228

9.141 Nearly all submissions that addressed this proposal, supported it.229 The Victorian Government submitted that police holding powers were introduced in 2006, that no complaints have been made, and the powers have helped to protect victims.230 The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative supported the Victorian practice... of removing alleged offenders from the scene of the violence.\textsuperscript{231} The Police Association of NSW criticised the ‘limited’ power in NSW and submitted that persons ‘can only be directed to remain at the location as specified by a police officer and there is no penalty attached for breaching that direction’.\textsuperscript{232}

9.142 Remote communities present particular difficulties in practice with respect to direction powers. The Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service submitted that there may be few other places in a small community for someone to go, and if detained, they might need to be taken to a remand centre or prison many hundreds of kilometres away.

Detention power to secure safety

9.143 The Commissions also asked whether state and territory legislation that confers on police a power to detain persons who have used family violence, should also empower police to detain such persons for a reasonably short period for the purpose of making arrangements to secure the safety of victims and affected children to the extent that it does not already do so.\textsuperscript{234}

9.144 Most submissions that addressed this question, answered it in the affirmative.\textsuperscript{235} One person, for example, submitted that this would give victims the chance to remove their personal belongings and pets without the danger of further assault.\textsuperscript{236} National Legal Aid drew attention to the immediate safety needs of victims:

> In some circumstances it is impossible to make the former residence sufficiently safe for a victim and/or children, and in those circumstances it is necessary to use the time that a person is in detention to put arrangements in place for the victim to flee. In other cases the victim actively wants to leave the house with the children rather than remain usually for reasons of safety, protection and secrecy.\textsuperscript{237}

9.145 The Victorian Government supported the idea and suggested that the Victorian legislation, which provides police with this detention power, should be the model:

> It empowers police to either direct or detain a person for a short period of time, allowing victims (and their children, if any) either time to go to a refuge or alternative accommodation if required, or some time away from the perpetrator to seek support from a family violence worker. It also empowers police to direct or detain an offender for the purposes of applying for an intervention order on the victim’s behalf and serving it on the perpetrator at the time without the perpetrator avoiding service.\textsuperscript{238}

\textsuperscript{231} Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service Co-operative Ltd, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{232} Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{234} Consultation Paper, Question 5–11.

\textsuperscript{235} For example, Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Police Association of New South Wales, Submission FV 145, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

\textsuperscript{236} Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{237} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{238} Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
9.146 However, there were some concerns about using this power in response to non-criminal behaviour. The Law Society of NSW, for example, submitted that:

   Interfering with the liberty of another person should only be exercised in those circumstances where the police are exercising statutory powers of arrest and bail determination. This power should not be extended to circumstances which may not involve the commission of a criminal offence.239

9.147 Similarly, Legal Aid NSW submitted that only ‘in very limited circumstances and for a very short period of time’ should a person be able to be detained for something ‘not linked to an offence’.240 Some criminal lawyers also believed the time for detention should be fixed, so that ‘arguments as to what is reasonably practicable do not arise’.241

9.148 Submissions from Queensland and Tasmania suggested that there were appropriate safeguards in these jurisdictions. The Queensland Law Society said there were ‘adequate means’ under the Queensland legislation:

   The requirement under section 69 of the Queensland Act currently is very wide ... If police believe that there is a danger of personal injury or damage to property then that is an adequate ground to take a respondent into custody.242

9.149 The Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania considers that the Tasmanian legislation protects victims, ‘without having a greater-than-necessary impact upon alleged offenders’.243

9.150 Notwithstanding broad support for a limited power of detention, some stakeholders drew attention to the practical difficulties of implementing this in remote communities. To detain a person in a remote community, for example, might mean having to take them to a remand centre or prison hundreds of kilometres away.244 It was also submitted that particular care should be taken when detaining Indigenous offenders.245

Commissions’ views

Entry, search and seizure

9.151 Police powers of entry, search and seizure in relation to family violence appear to be satisfactory. Stakeholders have not expressed any great concerns with the overall scope of these powers. In addition, the Commissions note the submission of the South Australian Government that police powers of entry are accounted for in s 67 of the Summary Offences Act 1953 (SA). Accordingly, the Commissions make no recommendations about powers of entry, search and seizure.

---

239 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
240 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
9. Police and Family Violence

9.152 The Commissions note the NT Legal Aid Commission’s submission that NT police powers should be consolidated into one Act and clarified. The Commissions agree that laws should be simplified and consolidated where possible, but consolidating police powers—including powers unrelated to family violence—is beyond the terms of reference for this Inquiry.

Direction power

9.153 In the Commissions’ view, a police officer must be able to protect persons who appear to be victims of family violence in the short period it should take the officer to apply for a protection order. Victims should not be left exposed when they may feel most at threat—for example at the height of someone’s aggressiveness. The presence of police may make some persons more aggressive; victims should not fear that when the police are called, their safety will be jeopardised. Short term protection can be provided by directing the apparent aggressor to leave premises and remain at a specified place. To be effective, such a power would need to be enforceable, should someone refuse to comply. The Commissions consider that this power will not unduly encroach on the liberty of the person thought to have used family violence. The response seems commensurate with the risk.

9.154 While in the Consultation Paper the Commissions proposed the direction power should allow for a period long enough to enable police to arrange for a protection order, arguably, a person should be subject to police direction until the police are satisfied that the victim is safe. If arrangements need to be made for the victim’s safety, then an aggressor might need to be subject to a direction order for a short period even after a protection order is put in place. This is the case in Victoria, where the direction order can remain in force if ‘a police officer believes on reasonable grounds that it is necessary … to continue to enable further measures to be taken for the protection of the affected family member’—though usually not for longer than six hours.

9.155 The Commissions note the concerns expressed about the practical implications of the provision in the NSW family violence legislation empowering police in certain circumstances to direct a person who has used violence to remain at the scene of an incident, particularly where the incident occurs in a remote area.246 There may be serious implications for a victim’s safety and wellbeing if the victim is in close proximity to the person who has used violence, particularly in an emotionally charged atmosphere in the aftermath of violence. A victim should be able to remain where he or she is while the police, if necessary, remove the person who has used violence from the scene, or direct that person to leave the scene and remain in another designated place, for the purpose of the police applying for a protection order or issuing a safety notice.

Detention power to secure safety

9.156 Detaining a person is a greater encroachment on liberty than directing a person to go and stay at a specified place. It is a power appropriately used for family violence that is criminal. Detaining someone who has committed a crime in a family violence

---

246 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 89.
context while arrangements are made to secure the safety of victims is justified. In such cases, police will have existing powers of arrest and detention.

9.157 However, some existing definitions of family violence, and the definition of family violence that the Commissions have recommended, capture non-criminal activity. The Commissions are reluctant to recommend that police powers of detention be extended to deal with non-criminal family violence, even if the person is only to be detained in the short time it might take to secure the safety of victims and their children. Some types of family violence—economic abuse, for example—might not justify police detaining someone or asking someone to leave his or her home immediately. In any event, the types of family violence from which victims might need urgent and immediate short-term protection are likely to involve criminal behaviour. It seems improbable that an aggressor who had used economic abuse, for example, and not physical abuse, would need to be detained while arrangements were made for the victim’s safety. The Commissions share the concerns of the Law Society of NSW that detaining persons in these circumstances might not be justified.

Recommendation 9–4  State and territory family violence legislation should empower police officers, only for the purpose of arranging protection orders, to direct a person who has used family violence to remain at, or go to, a specified place or remain in the company of a specified officer.

Identifying the ‘primary aggressor’

9.158 The Commissions heard concerns throughout the Inquiry that police may sometimes fail to identify the ‘primary aggressor’ and the ‘primary victim’ when attending a scene of family violence. This may mean that victims are wrongly charged with family-violence related offences and inappropriately having protection orders taken out against them.247 Accurate and comparable data about dual arrests for family violence are not available in Australia, but the number of dual arrests has reportedly increased in the United States (US) since the 1980s.248

9.159 Primary aggressor policies arose in the US after mandatory or pro-arrest statutes began to be implemented and police, applying the law strictly, chose to arrest both parties.249 Mandatory arrest laws in the US, it has been said:

may lead officers to adopt a legalistic orientation. Considering it inappropriate to use discretion, they apply the law in a mechanistic style. Thus, when faced with a 247  NSW Ombudsman, Domestic Violence Community Stakeholders Forum, 9 December 2009. See also National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Time for Action: The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021 (2009), 114 which raises the issue of ‘dual arrests’ of a victim and an offender, following police intervention, and how such action re-victimises victims of family violence.

248  R Braaf, Arresting Policies: Implications of Pro and Mandatory Arrest Policies for Victims of Domestic

249  T Erwin, When is Arrest Not an Option? The Dilemmas of Predominant Physical Aggressor Language situation that appears to involve two mutual combatants, they opt to arrest both, leaving it to the prosecutor, and perhaps the court, to determine culpability.\textsuperscript{250}

9.160 Primary aggressor policies, as Wangmann has argued, require police to look beyond the incident they are presented with and consider ‘a wider contextual framework’—including:

- whether there is a history of violence perpetrated by one party against the other;
- the nature of the injuries sustained by both parties;
- the likelihood of violence in the future; and
- whether one person was acting in self-defence.\textsuperscript{251}

The policy is not just about ‘always arresting the guy’, it has been said, but asks police to consider that ‘violence has different meanings in different contexts’.\textsuperscript{252}

9.161 In March 2010, the Queensland Department of Communities in its Consultation Paper on the review of Queensland’s family violence legislation, noted problems in identifying the primary aggressor. It asked whether legislation should help identify the primary aggressor or protect the party at risk, noting that some states in the US:\textsuperscript{253} have primary aggressor laws which are designed to reduce the rate of dual arrests by requiring police officers to consider a number of factors such as history of domestic violence, the comparative extent of injuries (where both parties exhibit injuries) and the existence of self-defence.\textsuperscript{254}

9.162 In Ohio, for example, to determine who is the ‘primary physical aggressor’, officers are required to consider, in addition to any other relevant circumstances:

(i) Any history of domestic violence or of any other violent acts by either person...;
(ii) If violence is alleged, whether the alleged violence was caused by a person acting in self-defense;
(iii) Each person’s fear of physical harm, if any, resulting from the other person’s threatened use of force against any person or resulting from the other person’s use or history of the use of force against any person, and the reasonableness of that fear;
(iv) The comparative severity of any injuries suffered by the persons involved in the alleged offense.\textsuperscript{255}

\textsuperscript{251} J Wangmann, “‘She Said …” “He said …” : Cross Applications in NSW Apprehended Domestic Violence Order Proceedings’, Thesis, University of Sydney, 2009 (citations omitted).
\textsuperscript{253} Department of Communities (Qld), Review of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989: Consultation Paper (2010), 17–18, Question 2.2.1.
\textsuperscript{254} Ibid, 17.
\textsuperscript{255} Ohio Revised Code § 2935.032(A)(1)(a)(ii), 2935.03(B)(3)(d).
9.163 The WA Review of family violence legislation also noted concerns about police issuing orders to both parties, and not always correctly identifying the primary aggressor and the primary victim.\(^{256}\)

The view put forward by the Western Australia Police is that, although understanding the nature of domestic violence is crucial to ensuring an effective response, ultimately members are only able to respond to the circumstances before them. In ambiguous circumstances, an understanding of who is likely to be the primary aggressor will be a useful guide. However, if the female is the one who clearly appears to be threatening to commit an act of family and domestic violence, the police are obliged to respond to the circumstance before them. According to police, this means that, just as it is not the role of police to take into consideration circumstances that may amount to a defence when considering whether to arrest for the commission of an offence, police are obliged to issue an order against the woman notwithstanding that she may have been subjected to acts of domestic violence many times in the past.\(^{257}\)

9.164 The WA Review stated that it is evident that police continue to have difficulty in responding to family and domestic violence incidents:

> Given the highly charged and emotional atmosphere in these situations that is not surprising. In the ACT service providers attend domestic violence incidents with the police. If the complexity of domestic violence investigation requires the assistance of skilled counsellors, then such a change to police investigation procedures in Western Australia needs to be considered.\(^{258}\)

9.165 Evidence concerning the impact of primary aggressor policies varies in the United States; fewer women are being arrested in some jurisdictions; in other jurisdictions the arrest rate has continued to rise.\(^{259}\) One recent study from the US concluded that the impact of primary aggressor legislation on the decision to arrest merited further examination, but found that ‘the passage of a primary aggressor law clearly does not negate the relationship between mandatory arrest laws and higher dual arrest rates’.\(^{260}\)

Submissions and consultations

9.166 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether there was a need for legislative amendments to provide guidance in identifying the primary aggressor in family violence cases.\(^{261}\) Most submissions agreed that it was important for police to identify properly the primary aggressors. It was said to be ‘imperative’\(^{262}\) and that it was ‘critical that police have an understanding of the complex nature of domestic

---

258 Ibid, 22.
259 J Wangmann, ‘“She Said ...” “He said ...” : Cross Applications in NSW Apprehended Domestic Violence Order Proceedings’, Thesis, University of Sydney, 2009 (citations omitted).
261 Consultation Paper, Question 5–12.
violence and the manipulation and power dynamics that are involved’. Women’s Legal Service Victoria submitted, for example, that police need to know who is at greater risk and who should be excluded from the home. Sometimes the aggressor gets to the police first; sometimes the victim is not a strong communicator. A female victim might be upset and ‘take it out on an attending officer’ and thus seem to be the aggressor when, in fact, she is not.

9.167 Centacare Safer Families Support Service submitted that identifying a ‘predominant aggressor’ charges officers with the responsibility of determining who has the most potential for doing the most harm, and what actions were done in self-defence. It encourages officers to desist from ‘equalizing’ the violence or seeing domestic violence as mutual combat. Factors to consider include the history of domestic violence between the people involved, the threats and fear level of each person, and whether either person acted in self defence.

9.168 National Legal Aid submitted that there were ‘a number of incidents’ in NSW ‘where if a proper investigation of the incident had taken place, charges against the victim should not have been laid’. It also submitted that it had anecdotal evidence that in WA ‘there are numerous cases where women have been issued with police orders and evicted from their homes despite a history of family violence towards them’. The Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre was also aware, anecdotally, of a number of incidents where Aboriginal women have been charged for family violence offences, when in fact she has been the primary victim of family violence for a long period of time.

9.169 Wangmann referred to the work of Trish Erwin, who noted that in the US, the language of ‘primary’ aggressor led police to focus on ‘who started it’. So many states and local police departments in the US adopted one the following phrases: ‘predominant physical aggressor’, ‘principal physical aggressor’ or ‘dominant aggressor’. However, these changes in terminology have not necessarily brought about the changes sought, Erwin argued:

Predominant physical aggressor language is, in some ways, trying to make the law do what it does not want to do: it is designed to remedy power differentials in the use of violence within intimate relationships, but it is at odds with the goal of the law in providing a neutral standard upon which to determine a legal action, eg probable cause.

263 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
266 Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010.
269 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
There was some support for giving guidance in determining the primary aggressor in legislation.\textsuperscript{271} Reasons included that it might reduce the number of cross-applications\textsuperscript{272} and that without legislated practice, police might ‘not pay enough attention to the assessment issues ... in cases where men persuasively present themselves as the primary victim’.\textsuperscript{273} The Queensland Law Society considered that it would focus the minds of judges, police and lawyers as to whether or not it is appropriate for an order to be made and, if so, what the conditions of that order ought to be and/or what punishment there ought to be for a breach of the order. In addition to any other benefit, this may be of benefit in any Family Law Act proceedings between the parties.\textsuperscript{274}

However, many submissions thought that the problem should be addressed through education, training, and police codes of practice,\textsuperscript{275} and not in legislation,\textsuperscript{276} although it was recognised that this would not be easy because ‘this is a very complex area and training should be comprehensive’.\textsuperscript{277}

Submissions also stressed the value of counsellors and other family violence workers helping to identify primary aggressors.\textsuperscript{278} The Victorian Government also suggested that ‘social context information for judicial officers’ could be provided in a model bench book.\textsuperscript{279}

One group that campaigns for the recognition of men as victims of family violence submitted that police should be given discretion, and should not always have to identify the primary aggressor, because ‘mutual or reciprocal violence is more common than one-sided or unilateral violence, and often there simply is no primary

\begin{itemize}
\item See, eg. Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
\item Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
\item No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, Submission FV 136, 22 June 2010.
\item Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.
\item National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; J Wangmann, Submission FV 170, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
\item Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
\item Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
\item Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.
\item Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
\end{itemize}
aggressor’—although in other cases, ‘the definition is entirely appropriate’. The Christian group Family Voice Australia was also concerned about gender bias:

Given the widespread misconception that women are the sole victims of domestic violence any insistence that a primary aggressor be identified in every case of cross-applications is likely to lead to further injustice against male victims.

9.174 The Inner City Legal Centre and The Safe Relationships Project submitted that it may be even more difficult to identify the ‘primary aggressor’ where there is violence between same-sex couples. In such cases, it seems it will always be difficult to identify who is the primary aggressor. That said, if police question both parties separately, asking domestic violence screening questions and questions about the history of the relationship, we think that would be beneficial in working out who is the primary aggressor.

9.175 If police are given additional obligations, there may be resource implications, noted the Queensland Government.

Requiring police to utilise evidence kits, take photographs and video recordings and obtain statements from independent witnesses would increase the time and cost associated with attending domestic violence incidents. Clearly, this needs to be measured against the benefit that identification of the primary aggressor may bring.

Commissions’ views

9.176 The Commissions note the concerns of some stakeholders that police might sometimes fail to identify primary aggressors and primary victims, and that this can result in victims being inappropriately charged with crimes or having protection orders made against them. The Commissions consider that this problem can best be avoided through improved police education and training about the dynamics of family violence.

9.177 The Commissions consider that guidance to police about identifying primary aggressors need not be in legislation. The task of identifying ‘primary aggressors’ and ‘primary victims’ can be difficult and nuanced and better addressed through education, training, and police codes of practice.

9.178 The phrase ‘primary aggressor’, however, may imply that there must be a secondary aggressor, that is, that both parties might at least partly have been aggressive. Though this will sometimes be the case, it will not always be so. As a matter of semantics, it might not even be possible to have a primary and secondary aggressor, where there are only two parties to a dispute, because the term ‘aggressor’

281 Family Voice Australia, Submission FV 75, 2 June 2010.
284 Chs 31 and 32 consider broader questions of police education and training, and the benefits that may flow from having police officers or police units that specialise in family violence.
means ‘someone who attacks first; someone who begins hostilities; an assailant or invader’;\textsuperscript{285} ‘a person who attacks without provocation’.\textsuperscript{286}

9.179 Accordingly, the Commissions recommend that police be trained to identify persons who have used family violence and persons who need to be protected from family violence. This formulation reflects the importance of identifying those who are most in need of protection.

9.180 The Commissions also endorse the suggestion made by the WA Review of family violence legislation that consideration should be given to having skilled counsellors attend family violence incidents together with police.

\textbf{Recommendation 9–5} Police should be trained to better identify persons who have used family violence and persons who need to be protected from family violence, and to distinguish one from the other. Guidance should also be included in police codes of practice and guidelines.

\begin{itemize}
\end{itemize}
10. Bail and Family Violence

Contents
Introduction 411
Description and purpose of bail 411
Criteria for determining bail 412
Bail presumptions 413
Bail conditions and protection order conditions 420
Protection through bail conditions or a protection order 422
Informing victims about bail decisions 425

Introduction

10.1 Persons subject to a protection order will sometimes be charged with a criminal offence and a decision will be made about whether they should be released on bail, and if so, what conditions they should be subject to while on bail. The criminal offence they are charged with may have been an incident of family violence that prompted the protection order, another incident of criminal family violence, or a crime unrelated to family violence.

10.2 After briefly describing bail and its purposes, including bail in the context of family violence, this chapter considers three important ways in which bail and family violence laws interact. The first concerns the question of whether there should be a presumption for or against the granting of bail for crimes committed in a family violence context. The second concerns bail conditions and whether they can conflict with family violence protection order conditions.¹ Such conflicts and ambiguity may cause confusion and compromise the safety of protected persons. Finally, the chapter considers whether victims of family violence are properly informed about bail decisions and understand what the conditions of bail mean and how they might interact with a protection order.

Description and purpose of bail

10.3 Bail is a decision on the liberty or otherwise of the accused, between the time of arrest and verdict.² Bail is, in theory, ‘process-oriented’, aiming to ensure that the accused re-appears in court either to face charges or be sentenced.³ A decision to grant

---

¹ The types of conditions that can be imposed pursuant to a protection order are discussed in Ch 11.
² M Findlay, S Odgers and S Yeo, Australian Criminal Justice (2005), 117.
³ D Chappell and P Wilson, Australian Crime and Criminal Justice (2005), 147.
bail is made by either the police or the courts, and certain conditions or requirements may be attached to the grant.4

10.4 The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), to which Australia is a signatory, states that:

it shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial.5

10.5 The purpose of refusing bail is to protect the community and to reduce the likelihood of further offending,6 and should not be used to punish or coerce the accused into a course of action.7 A person who is on bail before trial has not been convicted of an offence, and this accords with the principle of the presumption of innocence.8

Criteria for determining bail

10.6 While the criteria for granting bail are generally prescribed by statute, they have their foundations in the common law. The primary factor in determining bail is the likelihood of the accused failing to appear.9 In determining whether a person is likely to appear, certain matters must generally be taken into account, such as any previous failure to answer bail and the person’s background and family ties.10 Other considerations include the:

- seriousness of the offence;
- protection of the victim;
- protection of the community from further offending;
- strength of the prosecution’s case;
- severity of the possible sentence;
- probability of conviction;
- prior criminal history of the accused;
- potential interference with witnesses;
- court delay;

---

4 The bail legislation of the states and territories specifies what conditions may be attached. Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) s 8 provides that the bail laws of each state and territory apply to federal offences tried in that particular state or territory.

7 See R v Greenham [1940] VLR, 239; R v Mahoney-Smith [1967] 2 NSWR, 158.

9 See Re Robinson (1854) 23 LJQB 286; R v Appleby (1966) 83 WN 300; R v Mahoney-Smith [1967] 2 NSWR, 158; Burton v The Queen (1974) 3 ACTR 77, 78.

10 See, eg, Bail Act 1978 (NSW) s 32(1).
10. Bail and Family Violence

- requirements for preparing a defence; and
- view of the police and prosecution.11

10.7 Legislative provisions governing bail may also require officers to consider specified factors in making bail decisions, such as:

- the safety or physical protection of a victim or other person, or a victim’s concerns about the need for protection;12
- the likelihood of contravening a protection order;13
- the likelihood of injury being caused to, or threats made against, a victim;14
- any available rehabilitation program assessment;15
- the interests of the accused, having regard to matters such as whether the accused is injured or has special needs arising from an intellectual disability or mental illness;16
- the person’s demeanour;17 and
- the availability of suitable accommodation for the victim and any affected child.18

Bail presumptions

10.8 A person arrested for an offence related to family violence may be released on bail, either by the police or the court. This could be dangerous for a victim of family violence. Special bail laws have been enacted that might ‘tend to counteract the prevalent civil libertarian bias and reverse the onus in general bail legislation towards releasing an arrested person on bail’.19

10.9 There are three broad ways a bail presumption can operate: there can be a presumption for bail; a presumption against bail; or no presumption either way. Because there is generally a pre-existing general presumption for bail, one option is often referred to as ‘removing the presumption in favour of bail’—but this has the same outcome as the no presumption option.

11 See, eg, M Findlay, S Odgers and S Yeo, Australian Criminal Justice (2005), 117.
12 Bail Act 1985 (SA) s 10(4); Justices Act 1959 (Tas) ss 34(2), 35(2), 106F(1A); Bail Act 1992 (ACT) ss 9F, 23A; Bail Act 1982 (NT) s 24(3)–(6). Prosecutorial guidelines for family violence offences in NSW also require the prosecutor to put before the bail authority a victim’s need or perceived need for protection: Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), ODPP Prosecution Guidelines <www.odpp.nsw.gov.au/guidelines/guidelines.html> at 12 March 2010, Appendix E.
13 Bail Act 1982 (NT) s 24(1)(d), as amended by Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) sch 1, cl 2.
14 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 12.
15 Family Violence Act 2004 (NSW) s 32(1)(b).
16 Ibid.
17 Ibid.
18 Ibid.
10.10 Presumptions in favour of bail are displaced in New South Wales (NSW) for family violence offences and breach of protection orders in circumstances where the accused has a history of violence; has previously been violent to the victim of the alleged offence in the past or has failed to comply with a protective bail condition. Presumptions in favour of bail are also displaced in certain family violence circumstances in Victoria, the ACT, and the Northern Territory (NT).

10.11 For police bail, in the ACT, there is a presumption against granting bail for family violence offences. The Bail Act 1992 (ACT) provides that police must not grant bail to a person accused of a domestic violence offence unless satisfied that the person ‘poses no danger to a protected person while released on bail’.

10.12 The South Australian family violence legislation amends the Bail Act 1985 (SA) s 10A to include a presumption against bail for certain family violence offences involving physical violence or the threat of violence.

10.13 The family violence legislation of Tasmania provides that a person is not to be granted bail unless a court, judge or police officer is satisfied that the release of the person on bail would not be likely to adversely affect the safety, wellbeing and interests of an affected person or affected child. The 2008 review of Tasmanian family violence legislation noted that a number of stakeholders expressed concern that ‘the Act weighs against the rights of the accused’. The most criticism was levelled at the bail provision s 12(1), and that the onus of proof to grant bail is effectively reversed by the operation of the Act. It should be noted, however, that there is a presumption against the granting of bail where there is a history or threat of domestic violence in most Australian jurisdictions.

10.14 The review noted that s 12 has attracted criticism in the Supreme Court of Tasmania—criticism illustrated by Justice Underwood, who has written:
10. Bail and Family Violence

It is one thing to take into account the safety, wellbeing and interests of an affected person or an affected child, it is quite another to refuse liberty unless the defendant discharges the onus of proof cast on him (or her but it is invariably him) by s 12(1).29

10.15 There are no provisions in the Bail Act 1980 (Qld) that cater specifically for family violence cases.30 The Bail Act 1982 (WA) restricts the jurisdiction to grant bail in respect of breaches of protection orders in urban areas.31

Submissions and consultations

10.16 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether in practice the application of provisions that contain a presumption against bail, or displace the presumption in favour of bail, in family violence cases, struck the right balance between ensuring the safety and wellbeing of victims, and safeguarding the rights of accused persons.32 The Commissions also asked about the presumption against bail in the Tasmanian family violence legislation.

10.17 Some submissions said the balance was right, without expressing a preference for either a presumption against bail or for no presumption.33 Others provided specific comments in relation to these options. Some stressed that bail should be a matter of judicial discretion.34

No presumption

10.18 Some stakeholders submitted that the balance was best struck by removing the presumption in favour of bail—that is, by having no presumption either way.35 Professor Julie Stubbs considered that this ‘should draw the attention of the bail decision makers to the need to give this due consideration without unduly limiting their discretion’.36 The Local Court of NSW submitted that this would ‘strike the right balance’, because:

The onus is placed upon the accused person to show why a grant of bail is appropriate, and the Court is often able to craft conditions around the need for the 31 Bail Act 1982 (WA) s 16A(3). See also sch 1, pt C, cls 3A, 3B (presumption against bail where serious offence committed while accused on bail for another serious offence unless exceptional circumstances; in deciding whether there are exceptional circumstances in cases of breach of a protection order, there is an obligation on the judicial officer to give the person for whose protection the order was made an opportunity to give evidence on matters relating to the protection order).

34 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
protection of the victim. Bail conditions will often be reflective of the conditions of a protection order.37

10.19 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria submitted it was not aware of any cases that suggest the balance was not right in the Bail Act 1977 (Vic) (in which the presumption in favour of bail is displaced for stalking and contraventions of protection orders involving violence or threats of violence). However, the courts submitted, legislation may provide better protection for victims if provisions of this nature were not limited to contraventions of intervention orders and included a set of principles to be applied in deciding all bail applications arising from family violence offences.38

Presumptions against

10.20 Some stakeholders said they supported a presumption against bail for family violence offences.39 For example, the Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT) considered that this provided better protection for victims:

There are too many circumstances where the rights of the accused person have been favoured above those of the victims and the safety of the victims has been compromised. There are many examples of this nationally, some of which have resulted in the murder or murder/suicide of families. We have found in the ACT that the operation of the presumption against bail has effectively worked to protect victims without unnecessarily prejudicing the accused.40

10.21 Women’s Legal Service Victoria commented that safety concerns were especially important in a family violence context. It supported a presumption against bail, in light of the risk of offenders returning home and using more violence ‘at a time where the risk of violence is higher as noted by various post separation articles and studies’.41

10.22 The Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre also supported a presumption against bail and commented in particular on the implications for Indigenous women:

While there is a justifiable concern in the Aboriginal community about the numbers of Aboriginal people in custody, we speak to many Aboriginal women who are upset about offenders of family violence being given bail.42

10.23 For other stakeholders, however, a presumption against bail had various dangers. Criminal law lawyers at National Legal Aid said it would unduly compromise the rights of accused persons.43 Further, a number of submissions stressed that a

37 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
38 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
39 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
40 Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
41 Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010.
42 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
43 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
presumption against bail might act as a disincentive for victims to report offences.\(^{44}\) One women’s legal service said that except in extreme cases and repeat offences, ‘it would usually be in the best interests of the whole family for the accused to remain in their employment’.\(^{45}\)

10.24 The North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency (NAAJA) submitted that if there were a presumption against bail, first-time offenders and persons who have committed ‘relatively trivial family violence matters, such as contacting the protected person by email or text message’ would be refused bail.\(^{46}\) The agency suggested that the criteria in sections 24 and 26 of the \emph{Bail Act 1982} (NT), coupled with appropriate bail conditions, strike the right balance and it ‘would not support any further tightening of bail provisions in relation to breaches of domestic violence orders’.\(^{47}\) NAAJA was particularly concerned about any proposal to introduce a presumption against bail whenever someone is charged with breaching a protection order, and noted the practical difficulties that could ensue:

\begin{quote}
\begin{itemize}
  \item it is impossible to determine at the bail stage of proceedings the circumstances of the offence including its nature and seriousness and the strength of the prosecution case. Given that most family violence matters are decided on ‘oath on oath’ evidence, the strength of the case generally falls on the performance of the witnesses at hearing. The needs of the person to be free to prepare for his appearance in court, obtain legal representation, and be free for any other lawful purpose is a serious consideration for the court.\(^{48}\)
\end{itemize}
\end{quote}

10.25 NAAJA also warned of the ‘extreme injustices that can arise from overly punitive bail provisions’, for example in the cases of:

\begin{itemize}
  \item (a) those pleading not guilty to breach domestic violence order charges who may feel compelled to plead guilty to avoid lengthy remands in custody following refusals of bail, or \item (b) those who assert their innocence and are refused bail and spend several months remanded in custody pending hearing (when they may subsequently be acquitted or not sentenced to a term of imprisonment that equates to the time they spent on remand).\(^{49}\)
\end{itemize}

10.26 Regarding the prohibition in the ACT on police granting bail for domestic violence offences ‘unless satisfied that the person poses no danger to a protected person while released on bail’, National Legal Aid submitted that this:

\begin{quote}
can sometimes lead to injustice because it seems police are reluctant to make a decision in relation to bail preferring to leave it to the Court to decide. This has resulted in children who exhibit challenging behaviours being refused bail by police.\(^{50}\)
\end{quote}

---

\(^{44}\) J Stubbs, \emph{Submission FV 186}, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, \emph{Submission FV 148}, 24 June 2010; A Cannon, \emph{Submission FV 137}, 23 June 2010; Confidential, \emph{Submission FV 109}, 8 June 2010.

\(^{45}\) Women’s Legal Service Queensland, \emph{Submission FV 185}, 25 June 2010.

\(^{47}\) Ibid.

\(^{48}\) Ibid.

\(^{49}\) Ibid.

\(^{50}\) National Legal Aid, \emph{Submission FV 232}, 15 July 2010.
Presumption for 10.27 The Law Society of NSW was opposed to the erosion of the presumptions in favour of bail, which it said ‘usually follows an horrific case and is often more a politically charged reaction to public opinion than a carefully considered response’.

10.28 In Queensland, the presumption in favour of bail is not removed for family violence offences. The Queensland Government submitted that the:

- legislative framework of the Bail Act 1980 provides protection to victims as well as upholding the presumption of innocence for people charged with offences.

10.29 The Queensland Law Society also did not think the Queensland test needed to be changed. These alleged offenders usually comply with bail conditions, it submitted, because, unlike many acts of family violence, a breach of a bail condition will almost certainly result in imprisonment.

The Tasmanian legislation

10.30 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed an interest in hearing about whether the presumption against bail in Tasmania should be modified or narrowed. National Legal Aid submitted that ‘in practice the presumption does not actually reverse the onus of bail, it requires the courts to be satisfied about the victim’s safety and where this is the case the offender will be bailed’. This approach, it said, ‘adequately reflects the complexities of family violence, and the degree of risk to which a victim can be potentially exposed’. National Legal Aid also discussed the experience in practice of the application of the presumption, noting that though s 12 of the Tasmanian family violence legislation initially led to a large number of offenders being remanded in custody where they otherwise would not have been, this is no longer the case.

The factors, which a court is able to take account of, are not limited, and allow for the exercise of discretion by the court. Tasmanian Supreme Court decisions and continuing application of the section by the Magistrates has continued to guide court decisions in relation to bail. This has led to a considerable change in the court’s approach to bail decisions and a decrease in offenders being detained without good cause. Courts are requiring reliable material on which to base their decisions, and flexibility to respond to the circumstances of the case ...

In the north of Tasmania it appears that such factors as the willingness of the victim to take part in proceedings, the seriousness of the offending, and the history of the violence between the parties for example are properly being examined in the application of s 12. The effect of this is that it is rare for offenders to be locked up in situations where victims are, for example, unwilling to give evidence in relation to the criminal charges.

---

54 Consultation Paper, 263.
56 Ibid.
57 Ibid.
Commissions’ views

10.31 Crimes related to family violence are unlike many other crimes. For one thing, they are more likely to have a history—perhaps a long history—of fear, coercion and control. Where a crime is committed in the context of family violence, the accused will know the victim; he or she might often want to return to the victim; the victim and the accused may have had children together; the victim and the accused might live in the same home. All these factors suggest that a person who has committed a crime in the context of family violence might, if granted bail, be more likely to see the victim—and so endanger the victim—than a person accused of a crime against a stranger. When granting bail, judicial officers must therefore be alert to the importance of providing for the safety of victims and related children.

10.32 The Commissions do not, however, consider that the safety of women and children is best secured by creating a presumption against bail for all crimes committed in a family violence context. If, as some have submitted, a presumption against bail acts as a disincentive to victims to report family violence crimes, then the presumption might sometimes indirectly undermine the safety of victims. Some victims will also not want alleged offenders incarcerated—this appears to be of particular concern to some Indigenous persons. Furthermore, a presumption against bail for all family violence offences appears to deny unfairly the accused the presumption of innocence.

10.33 A presumption against bail also seems inappropriate for some crimes in a family violence context. Without diminishing the seriousness of any type of breach of a protection order, it would seem that a breach of a contact condition of a protection order that does not involve any family violence, particularly where the protected person invited the contact uncoerced, might not justify a presumption against bail.

10.34 For these reasons, the Commissions do not support presumptions against bail for all crimes committed in a family violence context. This is not to say that there should not be a presumption against bail for some family violence crimes, such as murder.

10.35 The Commissions note National Legal Aid’s submission that the Tasmanian courts’ approach to s 12 of the Tasmanian legislation has changed and that fewer alleged offenders are now being detained without good cause. However, in the Commissions’ view, and for the reasons outlined above, the Tasmanian legislation does not seem to strike the right balance between protecting victims and giving an accused the presumption of innocence, particularly as it might create a presumption against bail for economic and emotional abuse. The Commissions therefore recommend that it be amended.

10.36 In the Commissions’ view, the balance is best struck by generally maintaining a presumption in favour of bail—consistent with the presumption of the accused’s innocence—but removing the presumption in favour in certain specific circumstances. The Commissions make no specific recommendation about what those circumstances should be, but suggest that they would include, for example, where an accused has been violent against the victim in the past—as is the case in NSW.
10.37 The Commissions are also somewhat concerned with the ACT provision that provides that police must refuse bail for domestic violence offences ‘unless satisfied that the person poses no danger to a protected person while released on bail’—particularly if police do not try to ascertain whether the victim will be in danger, but simply leave the decision to the court. Persons might then be incarcerated unnecessarily in the period between arrest and when the court hears the matter.

Recommendation 10–1

State and territory legislation should not contain presumptions against bail on the grounds only that an alleged crime occurred in a family violence context.

Bail conditions and protection order conditions

10.38 Bail conditions may be imposed that provide for the protection of victims of crime and others. These conditions may be the same as, or similar to, conditions attached to an existing family violence protection order. For example, the Bail Act 1992 (ACT) provides that a person charged with a family violence offence and released on bail may not, among other things:

- contact, harass, threaten or intimidate or cause someone else to engage in such behaviour against a stated person;
- be on premises where a stated person lives or works;
- be within a specified distance of the stated person; and
- enter or remain at home if the person is under the influence of alcohol or other drug and lives at that home with another person.\(^{58}\)

10.39 The Bail Act 1978 (NSW) provides that an accused person may be required to enter into an agreement to observe specified requirements as to his or her conduct while at liberty on bail.\(^{59}\)

10.40 The conditions of bail may also be the same as those imposed by a protection order under family violence legislation.\(^{60}\) For example, the Bail Act 1994 (Tas) expressly provides that bail conditions may include any condition of a protection order or police-issued ‘family violence order’.\(^{61}\)

10.41 In practice, bail conditions can be imposed in parallel to conditions imposed by a protection order. Alternatively, a bail condition can be imposed that requires an accused to comply with the conditions of a protection order, with the consequence that a breach of the protection order also amounts to a breach of bail.

\(^{58}\) Bail Act 1992 (ACT) s 25(4)(f).
\(^{59}\) Bail Act 1978 (NSW) s 36(2)(a).
\(^{60}\) The types of conditions that can be imposed pursuant to a protection order are discussed in Ch 11.
\(^{61}\) Bail Act 1994 (Tas) s 5(3A) (ba).
Submissions and consultations

10.42 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how often inconsistent bail requirements and protection order conditions were imposed on persons accused of family violence offences. It is unclear from submissions how often these inconsistencies arise. There was some evidence—mostly anecdotal—that inconsistencies occur often. Others stakeholders said the conditions were usually consistent. It was submitted the question was important, but might need further research. On balance, the submissions suggest that inconsistencies occur, but not all that commonly.

10.43 National Legal Aid, for example, suggested that inconsistencies do occur, but usually where bail conditions have been imposed prior to the conditions of the protection order being determined at the first mention. If the prosecutor or legal practitioner does not raise the inconsistency or apply for a change in bail conditions, inconsistent conditions might continue.

10.44 One submission blamed inconsistencies on ‘poor record keeping or information systems not properly communicating with each other’.

10.45 The Local Court of NSW and the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria identified particular circumstances in which inconsistencies were likely to occur. The Local Court of NSW said inconsistencies were more likely to occur where police, rather than the court, grant bail. The Court ‘frequently deals with matters that involve both a criminal prosecution and an application for a protection order, and in such instances will seek to ensure that the matters travel together and/or will enquire as to the status of one when dealing with the other’.

10.46 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria said inconsistencies happen ‘from time to time’, and are more likely to occur when criminal proceedings and protection order proceedings are heard separately. This was an ‘argument for integrated lists involving both family violence criminal offences and family violence protection orders’.

62 Consultation Paper, Question 5–15.
64 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
68 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
69 Ibid.
70 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Commissions’ views

10.47 Bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent. Where they are inconsistent and victims and accused persons do not understand how they work and interact, then conditions can be inadvertently breached and ambiguities can be deliberately exploited. This can compromise the safety of victims. This may also have serious consequences for accused persons—breaching a protection order is a criminal offence; breaching a bail condition might bring the accused back before court, where the accused may be refused bail and incarcerated.

10.48 Bail conditions that require an accused to abide by the conditions contained in an existing protection order will often avoid inconsistencies. But this simple formula for consistency should not be adopted at the expense of protecting victims.

10.49 Inconsistencies could be avoided, in the Commissions’ view, if decision makers—including police and courts—had access to and used a national protection order database when imposing bail conditions. This database could be consulted whenever bail was granted by a court or by police.

10.50 Courts, police and prosecutors that specialise in family violence are also more likely to be alert to the importance of ensuring bail conditions are consistent with protection order conditions. Conditions are also more likely to be consistent if a specific criminal and civil family violence matter were dealt with by the one court. These are further arguments in favour of integrated court lists and specialisation, discussed in chapters 29 and 32.

10.51 Consistency is one question; adequacy is another. A protection order may have been imposed well before the criminal incident allegedly occurred, and the alleged crime may highlight a need for greater protection. A protection order may need to be amended, or the bail conditions might need to add further conditions. There may also be no protection order in place. The next section of this chapter considers these matters and how they might be best resolved.

Protection through bail conditions or a protection order

10.52 Bail conditions can provide for, among other things, the protection of an alleged victim of crime. However, such protective bail conditions might not serve the same purpose as a protection order, and might not protect a victim adequately. Arguably, therefore, upon granting bail, judicial officers should consider whether to also issue a protection order.

10.53 In NSW, when a person is charged with a family violence offence, the court must make an interim court order for the protection of the person against whom the offence appears to have been committed, unless the court is satisfied that it is not required, ‘for example, because an apprehended violence order has already been made’.

71 The establishment of this database is discussed in Ch 30.
72 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 40. The making of protection orders during criminal proceedings is discussed in Ch 11.
10.54 The Bail Act 1982 (WA) provides that, before imposing bail conditions for certain purposes (including for the purpose of ensuring the accused ‘does not endanger the safety, welfare or property of any person’), a judicial officer must consider whether ‘that purpose would be better served’ by the making of a protection order under family violence legislation.73

10.55 The Law Reform Commission of Western Australia (WA) addressed the interaction between bail legislation and family violence legislation in its 2009 report on Court Intervention Programs, noting that:

It is common for both protective bail conditions and [protection] orders to be imposed in family violence matters. … In some ways protective bail conditions provide greater protection for victims; unlike [protection] orders bail conditions cannot be withdrawn by the victim. … However, [protection] orders have some advantages over protective bail conditions; for example it has been suggested that it is difficult to get the police to act on a breach of bail—they are more likely to act on a breach of a [protection] order.74

10.56 The Law Reform Commission of WA expressed the view that magistrates should be able to impose either, or both, protective bail conditions and protection orders when an offender first comes before the court. It therefore recommended that the Bail Act 1982 (WA) should be amended to provide that, on imposing a requirement on the grant of bail for the purpose of ensuring that an offender does not commit an offence while on bail, or endanger the safety, welfare or property of any person, a judicial officer should consider whether that purpose might be served or assisted by a protection order, protective bail conditions or both.75

Submissions and consultations

10.57 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that judicial officers should be allowed, on a grant of bail, to consider whether the purpose of ensuring that the offender does not commit an offence while on bail or endanger the safety, welfare or property of any person might be better served or assisted by a protection order, protective bail conditions or both, as recommended by the Law Reform Commission of WA in relation to the Bail Act 1982 (WA).76

---

73 Bail Act 1982 (WA) sch 1, pt D, cl 2(2)(a).
74 Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, Court Intervention Programs: Final Report Project No 96 (2009), 97 (citations omitted).
75 Ibid, 98, Rec 28. It also recommended that WA family violence legislation be amended to enable a judicial officer hearing a bail application to make an interim protection order.
76 Consultation Paper, Proposal 5–6.
10.58 The proposal was widely supported. It was submitted that this would avoid multiple court attendances, which can be very demanding for victims. Stubbs submitted that protection orders can sometimes better secure a victim’s safety than bail conditions:

Unlike the [breach of a] protection order, the breach of bail is not in itself a criminal offence and it may be more difficult to get police to respond to breaches of bail that do not constitute an offence. Victims do not always know about bail agreements and bail conditions whereas they should always have a copy of the protection order.

10.59 It was also argued that victims can be left feeling vulnerable when an accused is acquitted, particularly if the victim has testified against the accused, so the court should consider whether the victim needs ongoing protection.

In addition, an ‘own motion power’ to make an interim family violence protection order would assist in these circumstances. Where evidence is before the court, an interim order can be made or a final order if the alleged offender agrees.

10.60 The Local Court of NSW supported the position in NSW and submitted that it did not support the practice of imposing bail conditions in place of interim protection orders, when it would be appropriate to make an interim protection order.

Commissions’ views

10.61 The Commissions consider that where conduct constituting family violence gives rise to concurrent protection order and criminal proceedings, judicial officers should be able to impose either or both protective bail conditions and protection orders. The Commissions endorse the recommendation made by the Law Reform Commission of WA to amend the Bail Act 1982 (WA) to allow a judicial officer on grant of bail to consider whether specific purposes of bail might be served or assisted by a protection order, protective bail conditions, or both. However the Commissions would go further, and suggest that judicial officers must consider both options.

10.62 Issuing or varying a protection order when granting bail serves a number of important functions. It might save the victim the trouble, expense and stress of having

---

81 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. The issue of courts making protection orders on own motion is considered in Ch 11.

83 See also Rec 11–3.
to return to court to apply for a protection order or to have an order varied. The victim may be given a copy of the protection order and told what it means and how it interacts with the bail conditions. And when considered together, bail and protection order conditions are more likely to be clear and consistent. It should be made clear to the accused and alleged victims how bail conditions and protection order conditions interact, and that a bail condition never implies the accused may breach a protection order condition—and vice versa.

Recommendation 10–2 State and territory legislation should provide that, on granting bail, judicial officers should be required to consider whether to impose protective bail conditions, issue or vary a family violence protection order, or do both.

Informing victims about bail decisions

10.63 Victims of family violence have an obvious interest in knowing when a person who has used family violence against them is released on bail, and in understanding the conditions of bail and how those conditions might interact with any relevant protection order.

10.64 This interest has been recognised as a right in most state and territory victim-focused legislation, though the obligation to provide information only arises if the victim requests the information.

10.65 The charter of rights for victims of crime in section 6 of the Victims Rights Act 1996 (NSW) provides:

> A victim should be informed about any special bail conditions imposed on the accused that are designed to protect the victim or the victim’s family.

10.66 Under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld), if asked by a victim, an investigatory agency must, so far as is reasonably practicable, advise the victim of the outcome of an application for bail and—if the charged person is released on bail or otherwise before the proceeding on the charge is finished—the arrangements made for the release, including any condition and any application for variation of the condition that may affect the victim’s safety or welfare.\(^{84}\)

10.67 The Victims’ Charter Act 2006 (Vic) provides that a prosecuting agency, on request by a victim, is to ensure that the victim is informed of bail decisions and, if bail is granted, any conditions imposed to protect the victim or family members of the victim.\(^{85}\)

---

\(^{84}\) Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2009 (Qld) s 11.

\(^{85}\) Victims’ Charter Act 2006 (Vic) s 10.
10.68 The ‘Guidelines as to how victims should be treated’ in the Victims of Crime Act 1994 (WA) provides that a ‘victim who has so requested should be kept informed about’ among other things, ‘any bail application made by the offender’.86

10.69 The Victims of Crime Act 2001 (SA) provides that victims should be informed, on request, about the outcome of a bail application made by the alleged offender.87 Also, if a police officer or a person representing the Crown in bail proceedings is made aware that the victim feels a need for protection from the alleged offender, ‘reasonable efforts must be made to notify the victim of the outcome of the bail proceedings and, in particular, any condition imposed to protect the victim from the alleged offender (unless the victim indicates that he or she does not wish to be so informed)’.88

10.70 The Northern Territory Charter for Victims of Crime provides that at the victim’s request, the police and/or the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions ‘can’ tell the victim about, among other things, ‘whether or not bail has been granted and any bail conditions relating to protecting [the victim] from the accused’.89

10.71 Tasmania does not appear to have a charter of victims’ rights. There is a Victims Register—an automated database that enables Victims Support Services to provide information to victims of crime about the offender—but it is not clear whether information is provided about bail decisions and variations to bail conditions.90

10.72 Although the Victims of Crime Act 1994 (ACT) does not specifically mention bail, it provides that one of the principles that should govern the treatment of victims is that ‘a victim who is known to have expressed concern about the need for protection from an offender should be told about the offender’s impending release from custody’.91 The Bail Act 1992 (ACT), however, provides specifically for victims of domestic violence. If bail is granted to someone accused of a domestic violence offence, ‘the officer must take reasonable steps to tell each protected person, as soon as practicable, about the decision and, if the accused person is granted bail subject to a bail condition, about the condition’. Protected persons must also be told about decisions not to grant bail.92

10.73 A participant in the ALRC’s Family Violence Online Forum expressed concerns that bail decisions were not, in practice, always communicated.

In [the ACT] the police are not involved in the application for a protection order so the victim is conducting that proceeding herself. Often she is not aware of the status of the bail conditions and whether, for example, they are different, even contradictory, to the provisions of the protection order. It is often up to the victim to contact the police to find out what is happening with the criminal proceedings. She may not be

---

87 Victims of Crime Act 2001 (SA) s 8.
88 Ibid s 7.
92 Bail Act 1992 (ACT) ss 16(5), (6). See also s 47A.
aware that bail conditions have been changed, for example, or have any information about the timeline of the criminal matter.93

10.74 In Victoria, in addition to the obligation imposed by the Victims’ Charter Act 2006, where the respondent to an application for a family violence intervention order is arrested under a warrant (as a person may be in some circumstances if a magistrate or registrar believes it is necessary), the affected family members must be advised of the outcome of the application for bail and, if bail is granted, of any conditions imposed that are intended to protect the family member.94 The family member must also be given a copy of the undertaking of bail.95 But this does not apply to victims of crimes that occurred in a family violence context where the offender is not a respondent to an application for a family violence intervention order.

Submissions and consultations

10.75 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how often victims of family violence involved in protection order proceedings were not informed about a decision to release the offender on bail and the conditions of release.96

10.76 Stakeholder responses to this question varied, perhaps because, as some submitted, practices vary—they vary ‘among police and between courts’97 and ‘from state to state’.98 Some said victims were often or commonly not told;99 another stakeholder said uninformed victims were ‘a significant group’.100 One agency submitted that victims were ‘quite often’ not informed and the whole protection order process was ‘quite shambolic’.101 Integrated systems, such as that in Tasmania, another stakeholder said, address this problem more effectively.102

10.77 It was submitted that in NSW victims were informed ‘more often than not’103 and that only a ‘minority’ were not informed.104 Women’s Legal Service NSW noted, however, that most victims know the offender has been released, but do not understand

---

93  Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.
94  Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 50, 52.
95  Ibid s 52(2).
96  Consultation Paper, Question 5–14.
98  Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
99  Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010. See also Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
100  Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010. See also Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, Submission FV 117, 15 June 2010.
101  Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
102  Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
the conditions. It was also submitted that victims commonly do not have a copy of the bail conditions, and so find it difficult to get police to act on breaches of bail.

10.78 The Victorian Government suggested that its legislation covered this proposal and was supported by police operational procedures and codes of practice. It noted, however, that bail notification, and communication between criminal justice agencies about bail outcomes and conditions, could be enhanced. The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria also submitted that police communication with victims is generally poor and women complain they cannot reach particular police officers. It is also often difficult for offenders to find out about the progress of their applications for a protection order.

10.79 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria also suggested that perhaps police or courts should be required to notify victims of family violence and sexual assault of every bail decision that affects their personal safety—whether arising from criminal charges, the contravention of protection orders, or from family violence protection application warrants—rather than only in the circumstances set out in s 52 of the Victorian family violence legislation.

10.80 One NT solicitor was told she could not have a copy of the bail conditions for her client, but she could have them read to her over the phone. Another person submitted that ‘Corrections have privacy regulations whereby they cannot even inform the solicitor for the protected person about the release of the prisoner’. The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW (NSW ODPP) submitted that its officers are instructed to inform victims about bail conditions as soon as practicable after the bail application, but their efforts are often frustrated by practical impediments, such as not having the contact details of the victim and being unable to contact the police informant to contact the victim, little or no prior notice about the bail application and having one prosecutor in court who is unable to leave the bar table to make a phone call.

---

108 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010. See also Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
110 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
114 Ibid.
10.82 Courts should therefore allow sufficient time for the prosecution to make contact with the victim, the NSW ODPP submitted. Women’s Legal Services Australia pointed out another practical impediment:

> Whilst there are various victim registries that seek to inform victims about details such as parole board hearings and offender release dates, often there are certain requirements and/or forms that need to be completed.

10.83 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions also proposed the following:

> State and territory legislation, to the extent that it does not already do so, should impose an obligation on the police and prosecution to inform the victim of a family violence offence of: (a) decisions to grant or refuse bail to the offender; and (b) where bail is granted, the conditions of release. The Bail Act 1992 (ACT) provides an instructive model in this regard. Police codes of practice or operating procedures and prosecutorial guidelines or policies as well as appropriate education and training programs should also address the obligation to inform victims of family violence of bail decisions.

10.84 This proposal was widely supported: legislation should provide that victims are informed and this should be supported in police and prosecutorial codes and policies, guidelines, education and training. Victims should also be told when bail conditions are varied.

10.85 The importance of informing victims of family violence of bail decisions was widely recognised. As the Victorian Government noted, ‘when a victim of family violence is confronted by a perpetrator she believes to be in jail, this can be a traumatic and dangerous experience’. Victims need to know about bail decisions as soon as possible so they can plan to secure their safety and the safety of their children.123 When they do not know, ‘they feel there is no reason to be vigilant’.124

10.86 The Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia) submitted that ‘copies of the bail agreement should be readily and freely available to the victim, school staff and so on. This should be an exception from any human rights or privacy provision’.125

10.87 Some stakeholders considered how victims might be informed. One stakeholder submitted that domestic violence liaison officers who have developed a rapport with the victims should contact the victim directly.126 An Indigenous women’s domestic and family violence service noted that some victims ‘are very mobile and often do not have access to phones’ and therefore:

Any arrangements should allow that where the victim is a client of an organisation, such as NPY Women’s Council, that service should be informed so that they can pass the information onto the client.127

10.88 This service also submitted that police in some jurisdictions will provide them with relevant bail conditions under memorandums of understanding, but often the caseworker will need to know the accused has applied for bail.128

Commissions’ views

10.89 Victims of family violence must be informed of decisions about bail. Knowing about and understanding bail decisions might be vital to their safety and peace of mind. The Commissions recommend that this legislative obligation to notify victims be extended to Tasmania and the NT.

10.90 As noted above, there is a legislative obligation to notify victims of crime—which would include victims of family violence crimes—about bail decisions in most state and territory victims of crime legislation. The Commissions recognise the importance of informing all victims of crime about bail decisions, if they choose to be informed, and the Commissions see no reason to distinguish between victims here. Crimes that do not occur in a family violence context are outside the terms of reference for this report, but the Commissions note that one way of implementing this recommendation would be for Tasmania and the NT to adopt victims of crime legislation that contains a duty to inform all victims about bail decisions. But the Commissions do not wish to be prescriptive, and these jurisdictions might prefer to place this obligation elsewhere, such as in family violence legislation.

10.91 Victims of crime legislation usually gives victims the right to information about bail decisions only when they ask for the information. This assumes victims will know to ask—and they might not, particularly victims from marginalised groups. In the

---

123 Domestic Violence Prevention Council (ACT), Submission FV 124, 18 June 2010.
124 Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010.
125 Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
128 Ibid.
Commissions’ view, therefore, state and territory legislation should provide that victims of family violence must be notified promptly—or at least asked whether they wish to be notified—about bail decisions concerning persons who have used family violence against them.

10.92 The Commissions also recommend that the legislation be clarified to make it clear that victims should be told promptly about the conditions attached to bail—including when the conditions are varied or revoked. This should be implied by a broad obligation to inform victims about bail decisions, but the matter could be made explicit, to avoid any doubt.

10.93 Victims should also be given or sent a copy of the bail conditions. Victims might keep their copy of the bail conditions for future reference. A copy should also be sent to any service provider, such as a domestic violence advocacy or legal service, with whom the victim is known to have regular contact.

10.94 Any such statutory obligation to inform victims of bail decisions will need to be implemented. Police codes of conduct or operating procedures and prosecutorial guidelines or policies should reflect this obligation, as should police training and education. Where there are both bail conditions and a protection order, the obligation should extend to explaining how they interact.

Recommendation 10–3
State and territory legislation should impose an obligation on police and prosecutors to inform victims of family violence promptly of:

(a) decisions to grant or refuse bail; and

(b) the conditions of release, where bail is granted.

Victims should also be given or sent a copy of the bail conditions. Where there are bail conditions and a protection order, police and prosecutors should explain how they interact.

Police codes of practice or operating procedures, prosecutorial guidelines or policies, and education and training programs should reflect these obligations. These should also note when it would be appropriate to send bail conditions to family violence legal and service providers with whom a victim is known to have regular contact.
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law

Contents

Introduction 433
Concurrent proceedings under family violence laws and the criminal law 433
  Liability and use of evidence issues 434
  Court-initiated protection orders in criminal proceedings 446
Protection order conditions and the criminal law 461
  Types of conditions 461
  Application of conditions in practice 464
  Exclusion orders 472
  Rehabilitation and counselling conditions in protection orders 489
  Rehabilitation orders pre-sentencing 490
  Rehabilitation orders on sentencing 490
Other interactions between protection orders and sentencing 503

Introduction

11.1 This chapter considers the interaction between protection orders obtained under family violence laws and the criminal law. The first section of this chapter discusses issues that arise when there are concurrent proceedings under family violence laws and the criminal law, including issues concerning liability and the use of evidence. In particular, the discussion focuses on the powers of courts to make protection orders under family violence laws in the course of criminal proceedings.

11.2 The second section of this chapter addresses the potential for conditions in protection orders to overlap with: general prohibitions or requirements imposed by the criminal law; pre-sentencing orders; and orders made on sentencing. Particular attention is given to interaction issues that may arise following the imposition of exclusion orders and rehabilitation orders.

Concurrent proceedings under family violence laws and the criminal law

11.3 The family violence legislation of most states and territories expressly recognises that there can be concurrent criminal and civil proceedings. For example,

---

1 The interaction of bail and protection orders under family violence laws is discussed in Ch 10.
2 However, the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA), for example, does not contain an express provision in this regard. The handling of concurrent civil and criminal proceedings by specialist family violence courts is discussed in Ch 32.
s 62 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) provides that an application can be made and dealt with under the Act notwithstanding that a person concerned in the application has been charged with an offence arising out of the same conduct. The counterpart provisions in the family violence legislation of WA and the ACT are broader in their scope, each recognising the power of a court to make a protection order if a person has been charged with or convicted—and in the case of the ACT found guilty—of an offence arising out of the same conduct on which the application is based.3

11.4 The family violence legislation of New South Wales (NSW) and the Northern Territory (NT) each allows protection orders to be made even if criminal proceedings are commenced against an accused arising out of the same conduct relied on to make the protection order application.4 The Victorian family violence legislation expressly provides that a protection order can be made at any time before or after the commencement of proceedings for the offence.5

Liability and use of evidence issues

11.5 Most state and territory family violence legislation—while recognising the potential for concurrent civil and criminal proceedings—does not address the relationship between the two proceedings; nor does the legislation address the issue of what use can be made in the criminal proceedings of matters raised in civil protection order proceedings. There are a few exceptions to this. The first concerns provisions in the family violence legislation of Western Australia (WA) and the NT which deal with liability issues; the second is the provision in the Queensland family violence legislation which deals with references in criminal proceedings to matters arising from proceedings under family violence legislation. Each of these is addressed below.

11.6 The NT family violence legislation provides that the making of a protection order does not affect the civil or criminal liability of the person against whom it is made in relation to the family violence to which the order relates.6 The Western Australian family violence legislation provides that, except as provided by that Act, neither making nor varying a protection order affects the civil or criminal liability of a person bound by the order in respect of the conduct out of which the application for the protection order arose.7

11.7 In Queensland, certain evidence about protection orders and protection order proceedings is rendered inadmissible in criminal proceedings where a person is charged with an offence arising out of conduct on which an application for a protection order is based and:

---

3 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 63C(1); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 113.
4 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 81; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 86.
5 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 155.
6 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 87.
7 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 63C(2).
• a court has made, varied or revoked a protection order, or refused any such applications; or

• proceedings under family violence legislation are current at the time a person is charged with an offence arising out of conduct on which an application is based.8

11.8 In such circumstances:

(3) A reference to—

(a) the making, or refusal to make, the order, or a revocation or variation; or

(b) the existence of current proceedings … or

(c) the fact that evidence of a particular nature or content was given in—

(i) the proceedings in which the order, revocation or variation was made or refused; or

(ii) the current proceedings; is inadmissible in the trial of the person for an offence arising out of conduct on which the application for the order, revocation, or variation, or relevant to the current proceedings, is based.

11.9 This is reinforced by the following provisions in s 62(4), (5):

(4) To allay any doubt, it is declared that, subject to this section, an application, proceeding or order under this Act in relation to the conduct of the person does not affect any proceeding for an offence against the person arising out of the same conduct.

(5) A person may be punished for the offence mentioned in subsection (4) despite any order against him or her under this Act.9

11.10 If a criminal charge relating to family violence is proved, then the standard of proof needed for the evidence for the protection order application is exceeded.10 In any case, in such circumstances a protection order will be mandatory in some jurisdictions for certain offences.11 While it is potentially problematic to use evidence relating to protection order proceedings in criminal proceedings, the same difficulties do not arise when evidence related to criminal proceedings is used in protection order proceedings.

Submissions and consultations

Liability

11.11 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should be amended to ensure that the making, variation or revocation of a protection order, or the refusal to make, vary or revoke such an order,

8 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 62.
9 Ibid.
10 As noted in Ch 8, the standard of proof for protection order proceedings is on the balance of probabilities; the standard of proof for criminal proceedings is beyond reasonable doubt.
11 See discussion below.
does not affect the civil or criminal liability of a person bound by the order in respect of the family violence the subject of the order.\textsuperscript{12}

11.12 This proposal was broadly supported by the majority of stakeholders,\textsuperscript{13} with some emphasising the need for greater legislative clarity.\textsuperscript{14} National Legal Aid, in supporting the proposal, submitted that where there are charges and protection orders arising out of the same alleged conduct, the criminal charges should be dealt with first, and an interim protection order should be made and then finalised, if necessary, after the criminal proceedings.\textsuperscript{15}

11.13 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) noted that, as a matter of practice, criminal proceedings are generally dealt with before civil matters, where there are concurrent proceedings, which ‘avoids difficulty about findings of fact/liability because of issues of standard of proof’. The Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission noted that, in most cases, orders are made without admissions, or interim orders are made and kept on foot pending the resolution of the associated criminal charges.\textsuperscript{16}

11.14 Other stakeholders also noted in consultation that, in some jurisdictions, until criminal proceedings are resolved, magistrates tend to prefer to make only interim protection orders,\textsuperscript{17} or to adjourn the hearing of any protection order application.\textsuperscript{18}

11.15 The Victorian Government stated that the need for clarification in respect of civil liability had not, to date, been identified, but said the issue ‘could be considered as part of any future legislative review’.\textsuperscript{19}

\textsuperscript{14} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

\textsuperscript{15} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{16} Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{17} Legal Aid Commissions, Consultation, Sydney, 10 September 2009.

\textsuperscript{18} G Zdenkowski, Consultation, Sydney, 6 November 2009.
11.16 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) expressed some concerns about possible unintended effects of this proposal, and submitted that it was important that if a matter proceeds to a fully-contested hearing, the facts found by the Magistrate are available in other jurisdictions—for example, Child Protection or Family Law.\(^\text{20}\)

Use of evidence

Cross-examination of victims

11.17 As noted in the Consultation Paper, one stakeholder in Adelaide told the Commissions that sometimes an affidavit in support of a protection order may contain less detail than the statement in criminal proceedings.\(^\text{21}\) Some detail may be omitted because the victim was distressed at the time of taking the affidavit or because of time pressures on police at the time of taking the affidavit. The Commissions also heard that a victim may be subjected to cross-examination on the fact that certain material was not included in the affidavit in support of the protection order and that this may impact adversely on the victim.

11.18 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether it was common for victims in criminal proceedings to be cross-examined about evidence that they have given in support of an application for a protection order under family violence legislation, when the conduct the subject of the criminal proceedings and the protection order is substantially the same.\(^\text{22}\)

11.19 A number of stakeholders submitted that it was common.\(^\text{23}\) National Legal Aid, without commenting on the frequency of such occurrence, noted that a victim in criminal proceedings may be cross-examined on inconsistent evidence given by him or her in protection order proceedings relating to the same issue. This is ‘part of the basic entitlement to cross-examine on the basis of prior inconsistent statements’.\(^\text{24}\)

11.20 The Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission observed that the cross-examination of a victim in such circumstances ‘can occur and occasionally does so’ where a victim has made a prior inconsistent statement in an affidavit in support of an application for a family violence protection order.\(^\text{25}\)

11.21 Some NSW stakeholders, however, stated that the need to cross-examine a witness in such circumstances is largely overcome in practice. This is because courts

---

\(^{20}\) Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

\(^{22}\) Consultation Paper, Question 6–1.

hear the criminal matter first, and then automatically issue a protection order on a finding of guilt.26 Where the order is automatically issued, this removes the need for a second hearing.27 Other stakeholders also noted that the making of interim protection orders pending the resolution of criminal proceedings also avoids the potential for such cross-examination of victims.28

11.22 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria submitted that the practice of respondents consenting to protection orders but denying liability ‘limits the protection order material upon which a victim can be cross-examined’.29

11.23 Other stakeholders also said that it was not common for victims to be cross-examined in the circumstances identified in the proposal.30 Women’s Legal Services NSW said in practice, victims rarely give evidence in support of an interim protection order where there are also criminal charges.31 Women’s Legal Service Queensland submitted that it understood that the two matters are ‘considered quite separately with very little cross-reference’.32

11.24 The Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia) submitted that there should be legal prohibitions on inappropriate questions during cross-examination.33

Operation of provision in Queensland family violence legislation re use of evidence

11.25 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how s 62 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld)—which renders inadmissible in criminal proceedings certain evidence about protection orders where those proceedings arise out of conduct upon which a protection order is based—is working in practice. In particular, the Commissions asked, how it is interacting in practice with s 18 of the Evidence Act 1977 (Qld), which states that ‘proof may be given’ of a previous inconsistent statement,34 and whether it provides a model for other states and territories to adopt in their family violence legislation.35

11.26 Some Queensland stakeholders could not comment on how s 62 is operating in practice or how it is interacting with s 18 of the Evidence Act,36 although the Queensland Law Society agreed that it provides a model for other states and territories

---

26  Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission
    FF 205, 30 June 2010.
27  Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission
    FF 205, 30 June 2010.
28  Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission
    FF 122, 16 June 2010.
30  Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.
33  Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
34  Consultation Paper, Question 6–2.
36  Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society,
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law

11.27 However, National Legal Aid submitted that s 62 is operating effectively in practice. It said that it is desirable that, in criminal proceedings arising from the same incident that led to the family violence proceedings, a complainant can be cross-examined about a prior inconsistent statement, such as one in an affidavit accompanying an application for a protection order. However, this can be done without offending s 62 by avoiding mention of the proceedings themselves.

The way that this is raised in practice is that the question would be phrased ‘you provided an affidavit on another occasion’ or ‘you gave evidence on another occasion’.

11.28 The Commissions also asked whether there is a need for s 62 of the Queensland family violence legislation to make an express exception for bail, sentencing and breach of protection order proceedings. Two stakeholders said that express exception should be made. However, the Queensland Law Society submitted that such exceptions were not necessary. In particular, it noted that the key phrase in s 62 is that evidence is inadmissible in the trial of the person ‘for an offence arising out of conduct on which the application for the order, revocation or variation or relevant to the current proceedings is based’. It stated that bail proceedings are not ‘for an offence’ but in relation to bail relating to that offence and that:

Section 62 does not apply to breach of protection order proceedings except if there are further proceedings or a protection order or variation or revocation of a protection order as a result of that further conduct.

Need for clarity re use of evidence

11.29 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should be amended to clarify whether, in the trial of an accused for an offence arising out of conduct which is the same or substantially similar to that upon which a protection order is based, references can be made to:

(a) the making, variation, and revocation of protection orders in proceedings under family violence legislation;

(b) the refusal of a court to make, vary or revoke a protection order in proceedings under family violence legislation;

40 Consultation Paper, Question 6–2.
11.30 Such provisions, the Commissions proposed, would need to address separately the conduct which constitutes a breach of a protection order under family violence legislation.43

11.31 The Commissions’ proposal was directed to the need for clarification—it did not state how the law was to be clarified. Some stakeholders offered a view on the need for clarification and, as discussed below, others also offered varying views about whether references to the matters the subject of the proposal should be allowed in the trial of an accused.

11.32 A number of stakeholders supported the proposal.44 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria said that legislative clarification should address separately ‘conduct which constitutes a breach of a protection order under family violence legislation’.45

11.33 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others submitted that references should be able to be made in the trial of an accused to relevant protection order proceedings and matters:

> It is important that where relevant, criminal and civil charges and proceedings not be quarantined in separate silos which can act to the detriment of victims.46

11.34 However, some stakeholders expressed the view that references to certain of the matters identified in the proposal should not be allowed in the trial of an accused, principally on the grounds of affording fairness to an accused. For example, National Legal Aid and the Law Society of NSW submitted that evidence about protection orders is not relevant to a criminal charge and could be prejudicial to the accused.47 They noted that the subject of the order may not have responded to the protection order

---

43 Consultation Paper, Proposal 6–2.
47 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010. See also Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law application, or may have consented to the application without admissions.\(^{48}\) Similarly, Legal Aid NSW submitted that:

There are risks in allowing reference in a trial to information that has not been subject to the criminal standard of proof. It could be particularly prejudicial to make reference to an order that was made by consent, without admission. Similarly, reference to current, incomplete proceedings could be unfairly prejudicial. There may be less of a concern about reference to evidence given in family violence proceedings, as long as the weight that is given to that evidence in the criminal proceedings is appropriate, taking into account the type of evidence and degree of scrutiny to which it has been subjected in the criminal proceedings.\(^{49}\)

11.35 National Legal Aid and the Law Society of NSW also emphasised the prejudice that could result from the consideration of evidence determined according to a different standard of proof. National Legal Aid submitted that:

It would be misleading and unhelpful to present evidence of the making of the restraining or protection order in a later criminal proceeding and has the potential to result in a miscarriage of justice.\(^ {50}\)

11.36 The Queensland Law Society also expressed concern about ensuring that the civil liberties of an accused are adequately protected.\(^ {51}\)

11.37 One stakeholder noted that allowing references in a criminal trial to a court’s refusal to make a protection order could be prejudicial to a victim, and should not be seen as evidence of innocence.\(^ {52}\)

Commissions’ views

Liability

11.38 The Commissions maintain their view expressed in the Consultation Paper, that there should be greater legislative clarity about how the making, variation, revocation or refusal to vary or revoke a protection order affects the civil or criminal liability of a person for the conduct that gave rise to the protection order, noting substantial stakeholder support for this position. State and territory family violence legislation should make it expressly clear that such actions concerning protection orders do not affect the civil or criminal liability of a person subject to the order.

11.39 The Commissions’ intention in extending the ambit of the recommendation to civil liability is to cover, for example, instances where a person using family violence may be sued for torts against the person, namely the torts of battery, assault and false imprisonment.\(^ {53}\)

---

49 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. The same view was expressed in National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

53 Professors Francis Trindade and Peter Cane define the torts as follows: ‘A battery is a direct act of the defendant which has the effect of causing contact with the body of the plaintiff without the latter’s 11.40 Western Australian family violence legislation is an instructive model, in that it expressly provides that the making or the varying of a protection order does not affect the civil or criminal liability of a person bound by the order in respect of the same conduct the subject of the application for the protection order. However, the Commissions consider that such provisions should also extend to the revocation and refusal to vary or revoke a protection order.

Use of evidence

Need for clarity

11.41 The Commissions are of the view that there should be legislative clarity about whether, in the trial of an accused for an offence arising out of conduct which is the same or substantially similar to that upon which a protection order is based, references can be made to the following:

- the making, variation or revocation of a protection order or the refusal to take any of those actions;
- the existence of current proceedings for a protection order against the person the subject of the criminal proceedings; and
- evidence given in proceedings under family violence legislation.

Making, variation or revocation of a protection order or refusal to take any such action

11.42 In seeking to achieve clarity, the question then arises as to what limits, if any, should be placed on the making of such references in the trial of an accused for a family-violence related offence. There are competing considerations to consider in this regard. On the one hand, there are compelling considerations of fairness—both to accused persons and victims—which weigh in favour of disallowing references in the trial of an accused to the making, variation or revocation of a protection order, or the refusal of a court to take any of those actions, where the offence arises out of conduct which is the same or substantially similar to that upon which a protection order is based.

11.43 To allow references to be made to facts that have not been subject to the criminal standard of proof may be prejudicial to an accused, affecting his or her rights to a fair trial. The risk of prejudice is significantly increased in circumstances where an accused has agreed to a protection order without admission of liability.

11.44 Evidence about whether protection orders were made, varied or revoked, or whether applications for such orders were rejected, could improperly influence juries in their deliberations. Where the evidence is about the making of a protection order, or a variation to increase the protection provided by such an order, adverse inferences might

---

"An assault is any direct threat by the defendant that places the plaintiff in reasonable apprehension of an imminent contact with the plaintiff’s person either by the defendant or by some person or thing within the defendant’s control. ‘A false imprisonment is a wrongful total restraint on the liberty of the plaintiff that is directly brought about by the defendant’": F Trindade and P Cane, The Law of Torts in Australia (3rd ed, 1999), 27, 42, 50 respectively.
be drawn by jurors, which operate unfairly with respect to an accused. Conversely, where the evidence is about the revocation of a protection order, a variation of a protection order which decreases the level of protection afforded by the order, or evidence about a court’s refusal to make a protection order, this can operate unfairly against a victim of a family violence offence, perhaps creating the impression to jurors that the conduct the subject of the offence was not serious.

11.45 On the other hand, the fact that a protection order was made or that the court refused to vary or revoke an order could, for example, be relevant to tendency or coincidence\(^{54}\) or motive. For example, it may be relevant to a defendant’s motive that the court refused to revoke a protection order and he or she was angry and sought revenge against the victim. In cases where, for example, there is evidence that a defendant has acted violently towards a victim on each occasion, or on previous occasions, when a protection order was made, or an application to revoke a protection order has been rejected, this could be relevant to tendency.

11.46 Accordingly, the Commissions are hesitant to recommend unequivocally that such references should always be inadmissible. Rather, the Commissions consider that references to the making, variation and revocation of protection orders and the refusal of a court to take such action, should not be allowed in a trial of an accused for a family-violence related offence arising out of conduct which is the same or similar to that upon which a protection order is based, unless the court grants leave. Clearly, in order for such evidence to be admissible, it would need to be established that it is relevant to an issue in the proceedings.

11.47 The court, under general evidentiary rules, has discretion to limit the use to be made of evidence if there is a danger that its particular use might be unfairly prejudicial to a party or will be misleading or confusing.\(^{55}\) In addition, in deciding whether to admit such evidence in the first instance, the court would be bound by the rule of evidence that requires courts to exclude evidence adduced by the prosecutor where its probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused,\(^ {56}\) as well as by rules of evidence which confer on courts a discretion to refuse to admit evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger that the evidence might be misleading or confusing, or cause or result in undue waste of time.\(^ {57}\)

11.48 Furthermore, in the case of tendency and coincidence evidence, the test for admissibility under the Uniform Evidence Acts is whether the tendency or coincidence has significant probative value which substantially outweighs any prejudicial effect it may have on the defendant.\(^ {58}\)

---

54 Tendency and coincidence evidence is discussed in Ch 27.
55 See, eg, Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 136; Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 136.
56 See, eg, Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 137; Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 137.
57 See, eg, Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 135, Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 135.
58 Uniform Evidence Acts, ss 97, 98, 101. The test for admissibility in jurisdictions that do not apply the Uniform Evidence Acts, is governed by the common law, as modified by statute in some jurisdictions. See Pfennig v The Queen (1995) 182 CLR 461 and Ch 27.
11.49 Requiring a party to seek the leave of the court to lead evidence of such matters acts as an important safeguard in ensuring that an accused is given a fair trial. Where evidence about the making, variation or revocation of protection orders or a court’s refusal to make any such order is admitted, it will be incumbent on a trial judge to explain to a jury the weight to give such evidence.

11.50 Evidence about the making of a protection order is relevant to proceedings for breach of a protection order, because the making of the order is a relevant fact to be established.\(^5\) Similarly, evidence about the variation or revocation of a protection order may also be relevant to proceedings for breach of a protection order. In such cases, the court’s leave to adduce such evidence need not be sought.

Current protection order proceedings

11.51 The Commissions also consider that references in the trial of an accused for a family violence offence to current incomplete proceedings for a protection order against him or her could also be unfairly prejudicial. This would be particularly so in circumstances where he or she had not had an opportunity to respond to the allegations or evidence in those proceedings. Accordingly, the Commissions recommend that references to such proceedings should not be allowed unless the leave of the court has been sought, and relevance established.

Evidence given in family violence proceedings

11.52 There are a number of factors at play in considering whether evidence given in family violence proceedings concerning protection orders should be able to be used in criminal proceedings. These include balancing the desirability of a victim not being cross-examined about prior evidence—which is a factor weighing against the use of such evidence in criminal proceedings—with the desirability of a victim not having to give evidence in more than one proceeding, which may be a factor supporting the use of such evidence in criminal proceedings. The need to avoid prejudicing criminal proceedings is also an important factor, consistent with obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) in relation to fair trials.\(^6\)

11.53 The Commissions agree with the views expressed by legal aid bodies that, compared with references to the making, variation and revocation of protection orders or the refusal of a court to undertake any of these actions, there may be fewer concerns about allowing references in a trial of an accused for an offence arising out of conduct, which is the same or substantially similar to that upon which a protection order is based, to evidence in family violence proceedings—provided that the weight given to such evidence is appropriate in the criminal law proceedings.

\(^5\) Clearly, judicial officers deciding bail conditions and imposing sentence should be aware of protection orders made under family violence legislation and the restrictions which they place on accused persons and offenders before them. Bail is discussed in Ch 10, and the consideration of protection orders in sentencing is discussed below.

11.54 Accordingly, the Commissions consider that such evidence may be admissible either by consent or by leave of the court, provided that, in either case, the court is to give such evidence the weight that it thinks fit, in accordance with general rules of evidence—including those mentioned above which require or allow the court to exclude evidence where its probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused.

11.55 The Commissions’ recommended approach recognises that there may be situations where there is no dispute about the evidence and time can be saved by allowing the earlier evidence to be admitted without having to duplicate it. However, even if the evidence is in dispute, the court may take the view that it is assisted by contextual information that is not unduly prejudicial and may consider that the victim should not be put to the trauma of having to give evidence again in certain specific circumstances.

11.56 The approach recommended by the Commissions would not displace general rules of evidence which allow witnesses to be cross-examined on prior inconsistent statements—both in jurisdictions in which the Uniform Evidence Acts apply as well as jurisdictions, such as Queensland, which have their own evidence legislation.

Recommendation 11–1 State and territory family violence legislation should make it clear that the making, variation or revocation of a protection order, or the refusal to make, vary or revoke such an order, does not affect the civil or criminal liability of a person bound by the order in respect of the family violence the subject of the order.

Recommendation 11–2 State and territory legislation should clarify that in the trial of an accused for an offence arising out of conduct that is the same or substantially similar to that on which a protection order is based, references cannot be made, without the leave of the court, to:

(a) the making, variation and revocation of protection orders in proceedings under family violence legislation—unless the offence the subject of the trial is breach of a protection order, in which case leave of the court is not necessary;

(b) the refusal of a court to make, vary or revoke a protection order in proceedings under family violence legislation; and

(c) the existence of current proceedings for a protection order under family violence legislation against the person the subject of the criminal proceedings.

---

61 Uniform Evidence Acts, s 43.

62 See, eg, Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 18.
Evidence given in proceedings under family violence legislation may be admissible by consent of the parties or by leave of the court.

Court-initiated protection orders in criminal proceedings

11.57 Some provisions in family violence or sentencing legislation expressly permit a court, on its own initiative, to make protection orders when a person pleads guilty, is found guilty after a contested hearing, or is convicted of an offence that involves family violence.63 The NT provision also permits such an order to be made on the application of the prosecution.64

11.58 Similarly, a provision in the Queensland criminal legislation allows the prosecution, or an interested person, to apply to the court to constitute itself to consider whether a ‘restraining order’ should be made against a person on a hearing of a charge against that person for unlawful stalking.65 The court may also act on its own initiative in this regard.66

11.59 These important provisions may circumvent the need for a victim to make a separate application for a protection order. Three issues arise in relation to these types of provisions. First, whether they confer on the court a discretion to make such an order, or compel it to do so; secondly, the point in time in the criminal proceedings when these orders can be made; and thirdly, whether a court in a criminal proceeding is specifically empowered to vary an existing protection order. Each of these issues is addressed below.

Discretionary versus mandatory

11.60 There is a significant difference in the level of discretion conferred on courts to make protection orders under family violence legislation in criminal proceedings. Some provisions give courts discretion to make such orders, while others mandate that 63 See, eg, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) ss 16, 30 (power to make order triggered by guilty plea or finding of guilt); Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 19A (power to make order triggered by finding of guilt or on sentencing for an offence); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 45 (power to make order triggered by guilty plea or finding of guilt).

64 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 45.
65 Criminal Code Act 1899 (Qld) sch 1 s 359F. The Commissions understand that, in practice, prosecutors in Queensland make applications for orders under this section: Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Qld), Consultation, Brisbane, 30 September 2009.
66 The extent to which directors of public prosecution are involved in protection order proceedings varies across the states and territories. Director of Public Prosecutions Act 1986 (NSW) s 20A expressly empowers the NSW Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) to institute and conduct, on behalf of an applicant, an application for a protection order in the local court, children’s court or district court, and any related appeals on behalf of a victim. See also Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines, App E, [3.2]. The Office of the NSW DPP informed the Inquiry that this power is being used, for example, where a protection order is related to criminal charges being prosecuted by it: Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010. Other stakeholders submitted that it was rare in Queensland and Victoria for the DPP to play a role in proceedings for protection orders: Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law

the court do so—particularly in matters involving serious offences. For example, the Queensland provisions are discretionary, providing that if a person is before a Magistrates Court, the Children’s Court, the District Court or the Supreme Court, for an offence involving family violence, the court must make a protection order if the person pleads guilty to, or is found guilty of, that offence.67

11.61 In contrast, the NSW provision is framed in mandatory terms, requiring a court to make a protection order if a person pleads guilty to, or is found guilty of, certain offences, irrespective of whether an application for such an order has been made. However, the provision also stipulates that the court need not make an order where satisfied that it is not required, for example because there is an existing order in place.68 As noted below, another NSW provision mandates the court to make interim protection orders when a person is charged with a serious offence.

11.62 The Western Australian family violence legislation mandates the court to make protection orders to protect victims when specified violent personal offences—such as attempt to murder, grievous bodily harm and sexual penetration without consent—are committed.69 The exception to this requirement is if the victim, for whose benefit the court proposes to make the order, objects to the order being made.70 In other cases, the Western Australian family violence legislation confers discretion on the court to make protection orders during other proceedings. In particular, when considering a bail application, the court may make a protection order against the person charged or any other person who gives evidence in relation to the charge.71

11.63 In 1999, the Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group advocated conferring discretion on courts to make protection orders when persons are found guilty of an offence. It expressed concern that mandating courts to make protection orders could increase the likelihood of ‘inappropriate or unnecessary orders’ being issued.72

Timing of order

11.64 In some jurisdictions courts are only empowered to make protection orders in criminal proceedings when a person has been convicted, found guilty or has pleaded 67 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) ss 16, 30. See also Criminal Code Act 1899 (Qld) sch 1, s 359F (on the hearing of a charge for unlawful stalking, a judicial officer may constitute the court to consider whether a restraining order should be made against the person). The South Australian provision also confers a discretion on courts to make protection orders on a finding of guilt, or on sentencing: Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 19A.

68 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 39.
69 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 63A.
70 Ibid s 63A. See also Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 40 (quasi-mandatory language in relation to interim protection orders for serious offences).
71 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 63. This section also allows a court hearing proceedings under the Family Court Act 1997 (WA), Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), or protection proceedings under the Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) to make a protection order against a party to the proceedings or any other person who gives evidence in the proceedings.
guilty. In other jurisdictions courts are empowered to make protection orders in criminal proceedings before a person has been convicted or found guilty. For example, NSW family violence legislation requires courts to make interim protection orders on the charging of serious offences, which is defined to include a ‘domestic violence offence’ other than murder or manslaughter. In the Second Reading Speech of the NSW family violence legislation, Tony Kelly MLC stated:

Under the reforms victims will automatically be protected by an apprehended violence order if their alleged attacker is charged with certain serious personal violence offences. The automatic apprehended violence orders will be extended to all victims in these types of cases, irrespective of whether they are involved in a relationship with the person. The defendant will not be entitled to contest the order in court until the concurrent criminal charges have been finalised. This will spare victims of violence the trauma of being cross-examined at the hearing for the apprehended violence order as well as at the hearing of the criminal charges.

11.65 Western Australian family violence legislation allows a judicial officer, on request or on the court’s own initiative, to make a protection order when considering a case for bail. Tasmanian family violence legislation allows a court to make protection orders in ‘proceedings for a family violence offence’. The language is not precise, but the reference to proceedings appears to suggest that an order could be made while a trial was on foot—that is, prior to a verdict.

11.66 The Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group did not support provisions enabling courts to make protection orders of their own volition when criminal proceedings against them were continuing. It expressed the view that the making of orders on the basis of ‘untried facts’ would amount to a ‘denial of justice’.

Variation

11.67 Some family violence legislation expressly provides that a court may vary an existing protection order of its own initiative on a plea or finding of guilt in relation to an offence involving family violence. In NSW a court is empowered to vary a final or interim order of its own volition where a person pleads guilty to, or is found guilty of, an offence of stalking or intimidation with intent to cause physical or mental harm, or of a ‘domestic violence offence’. The court may make such a variation for the purpose of providing greater protection for the person against whom the offence was committed—irrespective of whether or not an application has been made to vary the order.\footnote{Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 75.}

11.68 In Queensland and the NT, a court before which a person pleads guilty to, or is found guilty of, an offence that involves family violence must, if a protection order is already in force, consider the order and whether in the circumstances it needs to be varied, including for example, by varying the date the order ends.\footnote{Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 30(2); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 45(3).} In WA, a court convicting a person of a violent personal offence—including attempted murder, aggravated sexual penetration without consent and aggravated sexual coercion—must, where a ‘violence restraining order is in force for the protection of a victim of the offence’, vary that order by extending its duration.\footnote{Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 63A(1)(b).}

Submissions and consultations

Whether courts are exercising their powers to make protection orders in criminal proceedings

11.69 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked to what extent, in practice, courts are exercising their powers to make protection orders in criminal proceedings on their own initiative, where a discretion to do so is conferred on them.\footnote{Consultation Paper, Question 6–3.}

11.70 Stakeholders submitted that the use of the powers varies among jurisdictions. In Tasmania, the power is exercised,\footnote{Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.} though it is unclear how often.\footnote{Ibid.} Generally the prosecution will apply for an order when it presents a charge, if an order is not already in place.\footnote{Ibid; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.} If the conduct is denied, an interim order is made, until the charge is determined.\footnote{Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.} The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that:

> an interim order is not considered to prejudice the outcome of the hearing. Generally, final orders where the offender is involved are made ‘without admission’ and therefore could not prejudice the criminal hearing.\footnote{Ibid.}

11.71 In WA, National Legal Aid submitted that it is unusual for magistrates to issue protection orders in criminal proceedings on their own initiative, but orders are sometimes made in the superior courts pursuant to the Prosecutions Victim Support Policy.\footnote{Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.}

11.72 In South Australia (SA), protection orders can be made upon a finding of guilt or a guilty plea, but in practice they are only made if the prosecutor applies for the order. Sometimes prosecutors only apply if the victim asks for them to do so, or as it was put: ‘If victims are not proactive they miss out’.

11.73 In NSW, it was submitted, courts do exercise their power to make protection orders when criminal proceedings are on foot. For example, courts must generally make protection orders where the accused has been charged with a ‘serious offence’. Women’s Legal Services NSW said that in practice, ‘interim orders are usually made when the matter also involves criminal charges’. The Local Court of NSW submitted that it is uncommon for the Court to decline to make an order, ‘except where a protection order has already been made’.

11.74 In Queensland, ‘knowledge about this is very limited,’ the Queensland Law Society submitted, but ‘by the time the matter comes before the court the aggrieved [party] has already obtained a temporary protection order (or police have applied)’. Women’s Legal Service Queensland submitted that courts, particularly higher courts, ‘rarely if ever make such an order without a request by or on behalf of the victim’.

11.75 In SA, an approach could be adopted similar to the one recently introduced (but not yet operative) for sexual offences, suggested the Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (SA). Section 19A of the Criminal Law (Sentencing Act) 1988 will be amended to provide that a court must, on finding a person guilty of a sexual offence or on sentencing a person for a sexual offence, consider whether a restraining order should be issued. The Commissioner submitted:

Although the onus is on the prosecutor to apply for the order, it seems to me that a court respectful of the victim’s right to personal safety would inquire during the sentencing stage of proceedings.

11.76 In the NT, courts do not need to make these orders in criminal proceedings, the Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission stated, because police almost invariably make [domestic violence orders under the Northern Territory family violence legislation] which are continued as interim orders at the first mention of the associated criminal matters, and then continued until the criminal matters are disposed of, at which point they are confirmed (or not, as the case may be).

11.77 A legal service provider from the NT was ‘not aware of this occurring’ within its service area. A women’s legal service submitted that sometimes courts are not... making protection orders despite an explicit power to do so and requests by lawyers that this power be exercised. "It is a very useful provision but it is not being utilised".101

Mandatory protection orders

11.78 There was some support in consultation for provisions mandating that judicial officers make protection orders on the charging of a person with a family-violencerelated offence.102

11.79 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether current provisions in family violence legislation that mandate that courts make either interim or final protection orders—on charging, on a finding or plea of guilt, or in the case of serious offences—are working in practice.103 The Commissions also asked whether such provisions have resulted in the issuing of unnecessary or inappropriate orders; and what types of circumstances, in practice, satisfy judicial officers in NSW that such orders are not required.104

11.80 The general theme which arose in submissions was that the provisions in NSW, which require the making of a protection order on the finding that an offence is proven or following a plea of guilty, are working,105 and have not resulted in the issuing of unnecessary orders because magistrates usually provide victims with an opportunity to indicate whether they want a protection order.106 Stakeholders observed that ‘judicial officers in NSW do not require orders where the victim indicates under oath they are not in fear and do not want an order’.107 Moreover, Women’s Legal Services NSW submitted that ‘most orders made in this context are appropriate to the needs of the person needing protection’.108

11.81 A few stakeholders submitted that a ‘mandatory protection order upon conviction adds weight to the serious nature of the order and results in the victim not being required to make that decision’.109

11.82 Both Legal Aid NSW and the Law Society of NSW said the discretion not to impose an order is only exercised rarely and in exceptional cases:

  for example a charge is proven but the court decides to dismiss the charge unconditionally and without recording a conviction, it is a first offence and the victim advises the court that s/he does not require the protection of an order.110

---

103 Consultation Paper, Question 6–4.
104 Ibid, Question 6–4.
105 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010;
106 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010. Both these submissions noted that courts also consider ‘the seriousness of the offence, whether there are children involved, and the ongoing safety of the victim’.
107 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
109 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
11.83 National Legal Aid submitted that the discretion under the NSW family violence legislation for a court not to make a protection order should be retained, noting that there will be circumstances where such an order is not in the interests of either party.\textsuperscript{111}

11.84 Deputy Chief Magistrate Andrew Cannon stated that he was not aware of any issuing of inappropriate orders in South Australian courts.\textsuperscript{112}

\textbf{Exception to the making of protection orders for when victims object}

11.85 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether it is appropriate for legislation that mandates that courts make protection orders to contain exceptions for situations when a victim objects to the making of the order.\textsuperscript{113}

11.86 Stakeholder opinions on this issue were divided. Those who were in favour of the retention of such an exception emphasised the need for judicial discretion to deal with a victim’s objections in the circumstances of a particular case, as well as the potential negative impacts on a victim caused by ignoring her or his wishes.

11.87 Several stakeholders submitted that there should be an exception for where a victim objects to the making of the order.\textsuperscript{114} A partner violence counsellor submitted that an exception should be made, ‘provided there is some supporting documentation from a counselling professional indicating that the victim is not being coerced, manipulated or misguided’.\textsuperscript{115} Other stakeholders expressed similar concerns about courts obtaining an accurate indication of a victim’s wishes:

\begin{quote}
Courts should ... be mindful of the power and control dynamics that exist and questions of this nature should be worded carefully and discussed away from the perpetrator of such violence. Victims should also be assured that they can claim to have no say in this process as this can be an effective tool to avoid violence or abuse following the awarding of a protection order.\textsuperscript{116}
\end{quote}

11.88 One stakeholder submitted that victims might object to an order—because they fear further violence if the order is granted, or for cultural reasons, or because the victim wishes to continue the relationship—and concluded:

\begin{footnotesize}
\footnotesize
\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{110} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{111} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. See also Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{112} A Cannon, Submission FV 137, 23 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{113} Consultation Paper, Question 6–5.
\item \textsuperscript{114} T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 78, 2 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{115} T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010. Another stakeholder also expressed the view that there is a need for some assessment of whether a victim objects to an order due to coercion or fear: Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{116} Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010. See also The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010, which stated that ‘caution and informed expertise must be exercised in ascertaining the wishes of a victim, particularly in open court’.
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
Mandating orders could work to protect the victim or alter his/her life in a negative way, perhaps an exemption is the best solution with the court resolving the matter on the basis of the evidence before it.\footnote{Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010.}

11.89 A legal service provider from the NT submitted that, though it had limited practical experience concerning this particular issue, removing a victim’s power to object to the making of a court-mandated protection order can, in theory, have a complex impact:

> Removing the agency of victims to make choices about their own lives should only be done if it does not result in additional feelings of disempowerment for women who have already been disempowered by their partners.\footnote{Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.}

11.90 The Law Society of NSW submitted that police charging offenders and courts imposing ‘an order following conviction or plea in all but the most exceptional of circumstances’, is ‘designed to reflect the seriousness with which the Government views domestic violence in all its forms’.\footnote{Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.} However, there is danger in removing discretion from police and courts:

> sometimes a person seeks some intervention to resolve a situation involving domestic violence which is not a feature of their relationship. The incident may have arisen in exceptional circumstances. If by calling the police victims lose all control over the outcome of the process, there may be a disincentive to involve police at all. In summary, balance and discretion should be maintained. Public attitudes can still be shifted without applying the sledgehammer to every domestic violence situation.\footnote{Ibid.}

11.91 While some stakeholders submitted that victims should be consulted and their views taken into account in relation to the conditions of the order,\footnote{National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.} several stakeholders expressed the view that an exception should not be made where a victim objects to the making of an order if there are reasonable grounds to think the victim’s safety might be compromised.\footnote{Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.} For example, the Queensland Law Society submitted that ‘if it is necessary for State intervention to ensure the safety of a victim then the ability to have a mandatory protection order should remain’.\footnote{Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.} An exception was not appropriate, however, ‘unless there are cogent reasons for the victim’s objection’.\footnote{Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 6 July 2010.}

11.92 A key theme arising from submissions opposing an exception based on a victim’s consent, was that a mandatory order relieves a victim of any pressure—including pressure from an aggressor—not to apply for an order.\footnote{National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 6 July 2010.} As mentioned in one submission ‘most times when the victim objects it is not because they want to, it is because they know the person who hurt them will be upset at them for getting the order’.

11.93 The impact of pressure was identified by Women’s Legal Services NSW which recalled that, before s 16(2) of the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) was introduced, pressure was often brought to bear on persons in need of protection to say that they had no fears of the defendant and magistrates had no option but to dismiss the application.

11.94 Women’s Legal Services Australia also noted the risk of pressure being brought to bear on victims and submitted that such an exception ‘could potentially be a step backwards’.

11.95 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria submitted that magistrates should only be mandated to make protection orders on an interim basis.

11.96 Where there are children of a violent relationship, there is a further issue to be considered—namely the concerns of child protection agencies. The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that, ultimately, if a person with children in their care remains in a violent relationship:

it must be a matter for the Department of Health and Human Services whether that child is at such a risk that intervention is necessary, either to remove the child or (preferably) to educate and support especially the victim, but also the offender.

Applications by prosecutors

11.97 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked to what extent prosecutors in the NT are making applications for protection orders where a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence that involves family violence. The Commissions also asked whether legislation should give this power to prosecutors in other states and territories.

11.98 The Commissions heard mixed responses about the practice of prosecutors in the NT. A legal service provider said it was ‘not aware of a single instance’ of this

---

126 Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010.
127 This provides that, in some circumstances, when making a protection order, it is not necessary for the court to be satisfied that the person for whose protection the order would be made in fact fears a relevant offence will be committed, or that relevant conduct will be engaged in.
129 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
131 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
132 Consultation Paper, Question 6–6.
power being used. Similarly, National Legal Aid submitted that the power is not generally utilised by prosecutors in the NT. It provided the following case study:

There had been serious assault, statements taken, the defendant was in custody and pleaded guilty on the day the protection order expired. The prosecution made no application and the victim had to attend the Legal Aid Commission to assist her to apply for a new protection order.

11.99 The Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission submitted that because interim protection orders will commonly already have been made, and because these orders are commonly confirmed at sentencing, ‘the need to use this power does not in practice arise’.

11.100 However, an Indigenous women’s council said that in its experience, NT prosecutors are in fact making these applications in many cases, and another legal service provider submitted that the prosecutors do so as a matter of course where findings of guilt are made by a court for a family violence offence. The legislation is a useful and practical tool and does not take away any discretion of the court.

11.101 National Legal Aid expressed the view that victims would benefit if prosecutors applied for protection orders, because:

currently in circumstances where criminal charges have been laid women have to apply for protection orders or extension of such orders. The victim has to provide another statement for the court, and appear in protection order proceedings separate to the criminal charges. This is traumatic, stressful and time consuming for them.

11.102 Stakeholders that addressed the matter submitted that prosecutors in other states and territories should be empowered to apply for protection orders. For example, the Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria submitted that:

Arguably, the Director of Public Prosecutions could play a greater role in seeking the protection of an intervention order for crimes arising from family violence after a finding of guilt consistent with the recommendations of the Sentencing Advisory Council’s 2009 report on contraventions of intervention orders.

133 The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010.
134 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. This stakeholder also noted that there have been occasions where magistrates have refused to entertain applications because the police domestic violence unit has not been present or did not have a view on the application.
135 Ibid.
136 Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.
139 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
141 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Court powers to make protection orders on own initiative

11.103 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should include an express provision conferring on courts a power to make a protection order on their own initiative at any stage of a criminal proceeding—including prior to a plea or finding of guilt. This proposal received overwhelming support, from nearly all stakeholders that addressed it. 142 Improved victim safety and protection were among the reasons advanced in support. For example, one stakeholder stated that the proposal ‘allows protection for victims while an accused is on bail or during a trial for acts of [family violence] which have given rise to criminal proceedings’. The Queensland Government considered that the proposal could ‘potentially improve the safety of victims in circumstances where the police officers undertaking the criminal investigation have not applied for an order’. 143

11.104 Similarly, the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) stated that:

In relation to whether the court should make protective orders of its own volition, ultimately if a court is dealing with a family violence matter, that court is responsible for making decisions which will keep the victim and any affected children safe. 144

11.105 National Legal Aid also submitted that courts should have the power to make a protection order to ‘ensure the safety of the children of the relationship between the alleged offender and the victim’. It provided a case study in which a magistrate granted a protection order for the mother but refused to grant a protection order for a child, and instead referred the mother to the Family Court.

The mother was very fearful that the father would seriously harm or kill the child if he was to spend any time with the child. The client was extremely anxious and frightened and was advised by Legal Aid not to commence family court proceedings. 145

11.106 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) and National Legal Aid commented that courts may not routinely be considering the possibility of making

---

142 Consultation Paper, Proposal 6–3.
144 Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010.
146 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
147 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
148 Ibid.
protection orders in the course of criminal proceedings against persons who have committed family violence. They identified two situations in which the broader context of family violence may not immediately be apparent:

- where the offender attempts to involve the family violence victim in criminal activities—for example, coercing him or her to provide a false alibi for the offender, or forcing the victim to commit crimes under duress; and
- where a family violence offender commits an offence against a third person—for example, an assault—with the intention of intimidating or causing harm or distress to the victim.

11.108 Both stakeholders commented that these situations would likely warrant the making of a protection order. National Legal Aid further submitted that courts should be alert to the potential opportunities to make protection orders in these circumstances, as well as in the event that a victim of family violence is prosecuted for the commission of offences committed under duress.

11.109 Against the need to improve victim safety, the need to ensure procedural fairness for the respondent was also identified. Women’s Legal Services NSW supported the proposal, ‘provided that the defendant (and prosecution) can make submissions as to the appropriateness of the orders’.

11.110 There was some concern that magistrates should not pass interlocutory judgment on the substantive issues of a case. Two stakeholders said that an interim order is fair and appropriate, until there is a plea of guilt or the court makes its finding.

11.111 Two stakeholders opposed the proposal. One legal service provider said that if a court had concerns about a victim’s safety, it ‘could invite police or [the] prosecution to make such an application. The defendant would then have the appropriate opportunity to respond’. The Peninsula Community Legal Centre submitted that the proposal would amount to a ‘denial of justice’:

> It is irrelevant that the civil or criminal liability of the person bound by the order is not affected by the making of the order. A fundamental basis of the rule of law is the right of a party to defend any application against them, rather than having an order issued on the basis of what may constitute untried facts and an order that the affected family member may not wish to have imposed.

---

149 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
150 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010, citing the comments of the Tasmanian Legal Aid Commission.
153 Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.
Varying protection orders

11.112 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory legislation should provide that a court, before which a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence involving family violence, must consider any existing protection order obtained under family violence legislation and whether, in the circumstances, that protection order needs to be varied to provide greater protection for the person against whom the offence was committed, irrespective of whether an application has been made to vary the order.157

11.113 This proposal received overwhelming support, from nearly all stakeholders that addressed it—most without further comment.158 The Australian Government Attorney-General’s Department said this proposal was consistent with a report of its Access to Justice Taskforce because it provided ‘mechanisms for better linking of different parts of the system’.159 The Queensland Law Society also supported the proposal, and submitted that:

The problem of family violence needs to be tackled in an holistic manner. Too often the victims of violence fall through the cracks due to a lack of co-ordinated response. There should be the opportunity when an offender is sentenced for the court to ensure that the protection order is adequate.160

11.114 In contrast, one stakeholder did not support the proposal, although without providing any reasons.161

Commissions’ views

11.115 Provisions empowering courts in criminal matters to make protection orders on their own initiative at any stage of a criminal proceeding are an extremely important way of alleviating the need for a victim—already involved in criminal proceedings as a witness—to apply for a protection order, and potentially to give further evidence. A court should be able to make such orders of its own initiative where it considers it is appropriate to do so to protect a victim. The family violence legislation of each state and territory should contain an express provision empowering courts in this way. The Commissions note that the Victorian family violence legislation does not contain such a provision.

11.116 In empowering courts in this way, the Commissions consider that it is also important to address legitimate concerns expressed about denying justice to an accused in a criminal proceeding, based on the making of orders on ‘untried facts’. The Commissions acknowledge the importance of Australia’s obligations under the ICCPR, noted in Chapter 2, with respect to the entitlement of an accused to a fair trial. In the Commissions’ view, such a concern is addressed in the following ways:

- requiring any order made by a court on its own initiative prior to a plea or finding of guilt to be of an interim nature;
- allowing both the victim and the respondent to make submissions to the court as to the appropriateness of an order;
- clarifying in family violence legislation that the making of a protection order does not affect the criminal liability of a person in respect of conduct the subject of the order; and
- in particular, clarifying in state and territory legislation that, in the trial of an accused for an offence arising out of conduct that is the same or substantially similar to that upon which a protection order is based, references cannot be made to the making, variation or revocation of a protection order, or the refusal by a court to take any of those actions, in proceedings under family violence legislation, without the leave of the court.

11.117 The overall effect of the Commissions’ approach to their recommendations about the making of protection orders in criminal proceedings, and the use of evidence about the making of such orders in the trial of an accused, is to accommodate the systemic objectives of victim protection and ensuring that an accused receives a fair trial.

11.118 It is imperative that courts retain discretion as to whether to make a protection order on their own initiative. A court should be able to decide whether an order is necessary to ensure the safety of the victim, and what conditions should be imposed to secure such safety. The attitude of the victim may be one compelling factor to consider, although it may not necessarily be determinative, for example in circumstances where the court has concerns about the victim’s safety despite the victim’s objections to the order.

11.119 The Commissions consider that an appropriate complement to their recommendation that courts be empowered to make protection orders in criminal proceedings of their own initiative is a provision empowering prosecutors to seek protection orders where a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence involving family violence.

11.120 The combined effect of the Commissions’ recommendations about empowering courts to make protection orders of their own initiative, empowering prosecutors to apply for such orders where a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence, using specialised judicial officers and specialised prosecutors in specialised family violence courts, and providing training to judicial officers, prosecutors and lawyers on the dynamics and features of family violence is to:

- increase the likelihood that judicial officers and prosecutors involved in family-violence related criminal proceedings focus on the issue of victim safety and protection;
- lessen the trauma, stress and time involved in a victim having to obtain a protection order in separate civil family violence proceedings in addition to criminal proceedings for family-violence related offences; and
- increase the likelihood that judicial officers and lawyers will be alert to the need to consider whether to make or apply for a protection order, respectively, in those types of criminal proceedings identified by stakeholders where the broader context of family violence may not necessarily be apparent. These include criminal proceedings against an accused who has:
  - used family violence to coerce the victim into participating in criminal activities—such as providing a false alibi for the offender; or
  - committed an offence against a third person, for example, an assault, with the intention of intimidating the victim.

Variation

11.121 In the Commissions’ view, a court before which a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence involving family violence, should be required to consider whether any existing protection order needs to be varied to provide greater protection for the person against whom the offence was committed. Courts should be required to consider this irrespective of whether or not an application has been made to vary the order.

11.122 This approach does not require the court to vary an existing protection order. Rather, its intended impact is to focus the attention of a court exercising criminal jurisdiction on an existing protection order, to ascertain whether its conditions remain appropriate and sufficient to protect the affected victim.
Recommendation 11–3 State and territory family violence legislation should include an express provision conferring on courts a power to make a protection order on their own initiative at any stage of a criminal proceeding. Any such order made prior to a plea or finding of guilt should be interim until there is a plea or finding of guilt.

Recommendation 11–4 State and territory family violence legislation should expressly empower prosecutors to make an application for a protection order where a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence involving family violence.

Recommendation 11–5 State and territory legislation should provide that a court before which a person pleads guilty, or is found guilty of an offence involving family violence, must consider whether any existing protection order obtained under family violence legislation needs to be varied to provide greater protection for the person against whom the offence was committed.

---

Protection order conditions and the criminal law

11.123 Conditions in protection orders may overlap with:

- general prohibitions or requirements imposed by the criminal law;
- bail conditions;\(^{168}\)
- pre-sentencing orders; and
- orders made on sentencing—including non-contact and place restriction orders.

11.124 In addition, protection orders can impose conditions that restrict behaviour not otherwise prohibited by the criminal law, as well as conditions—such as orders excluding a person from his or her home—which are not typically sentencing options.\(^{169}\)

Types of conditions

11.125 Before considering issues of overlap between conditions in protection orders obtained under family violence legislation and the criminal law, and areas where conditions may operate independently of the criminal law, it is necessary to consider the types of conditions available under protection orders.

11.126 The Australian Government Solicitor (AGS) has expressed the view that family violence legislation does not appear to be substantially different across jurisdictions in respect of crucial matters such as:

---

\(^{168}\) The potential overlap between conditions in protection orders and bail conditions is discussed in Ch 10.

\(^{169}\) As noted below, a limited number of jurisdictions have in place restriction orders as a sentencing option.
the types of orders that may be made in the domestic violence context and the kinds of prohibitions, restraints and conditions that an order may impose on the person against whom it is made.

11.127 The types of conditions that are authorised by family violence legislation to be imposed typically include any that the court considers to: protect the victim and any child from family violence, encourage the person to accept responsibility for the violence committed against the victim, or change his or her behaviour.

11.128 Conditions can also prohibit (or restrict) the person against whom the protection order is made from:

- committing family violence against the victim;
- harassing, threatening or intimidating the victim;
- verbally abusing or assaulting the victim;
- entering the victim’s residence, workplace or any other specified premises—including where that person has a legal or equitable interest in the property;
- being anywhere within a specified distance of the victim or a specified place;
- approaching the victim or any specified premises—including within 12 hours of consuming intoxicating liquor or illicit drugs;
- telephoning or otherwise contacting the victim—including by email or by text message, unless in the company of a police officer or specified person; and including attempting to contact the victim at a refuge either directly or through someone else;
- interfering with or damaging the victim’s property;
- stalking the victim.

171 For example, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 35(1).
172 For example, Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 21(1)(b).
173 For example, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 81(2)(a); Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 22.
174 For example, Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12(1)(i); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 48(2)(f).
175 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 14(3)(d); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 21(1)(a).
176 For example, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 35(2)(a),(b); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 81(2)(b), 82; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12(1)(a), (5).
177 For example, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 81(2)(e); Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 22. See also Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 13(2)(c).
178 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 35(2)(a), (c).
179 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 81(2)(d). Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 13(2)(d) prohibits communicating or attempting to communicate with the victim.
180 Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 25(3)(d).
181 For example, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 35(2)(c); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12(1)(f).
182 For example, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 36.
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law

- locating or attempting to locate the victim;\textsuperscript{183}
- causing another person to engage in behaviour prohibited by the protection order;\textsuperscript{184}
- taking possession of specified personal property reasonably needed by the victim;\textsuperscript{185}
- preventing the victim from obtaining and using personal property reasonably needed by the victim;\textsuperscript{186} and
- possessing firearms, prohibited weapons,\textsuperscript{187} or a firearms licence.\textsuperscript{188}

11.129 In NSW and Queensland, protection orders include mandatory conditions. In NSW every protection order is taken to include conditions which prohibit the person from: assaulting, molesting, harassing, threatening, stalking and engaging in any intimidating conduct towards the victim or anyone with whom the victim has a domestic relationship.\textsuperscript{189} In Queensland, every protection order is taken to include a condition that the person is to be of good behaviour and not commit family violence.\textsuperscript{190}

11.130 In addition to prohibiting or restricting conduct, conditions attached to a protection order can require the person to undertake certain actions, such as: vacate premises—whether or not the person has a legal or equitable interest in the premises;\textsuperscript{191} surrender firearms and other weapons;\textsuperscript{192} return specified personal property required by the victim;\textsuperscript{193} attend an assessment to determine an appropriate form of intervention program and eligibility for such a program;\textsuperscript{194} or attend a rehabilitation program.\textsuperscript{195} Conditions can also specify the circumstances in which a person against whom a protection order is made may be on particular premises or approach or contact a particular person.\textsuperscript{196}

\textsuperscript{183} Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 25(3)(c). This section does not prohibit the person against whom the order is made from asking his or her lawyer to contact the victim: s 25(7).
\textsuperscript{184} For example, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 81(2)(f); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 13(2)(f); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12(1)(h).
\textsuperscript{185} Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12(1)(g).
\textsuperscript{186} Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 13(2)(e).
\textsuperscript{187} For example, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 35(2)(d); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 16(3)b. Other legislation frames this in terms of revoking, suspending or cancelling weapons approval or firearms authority, eg, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 81(2)(g),(h) or requiring the person to surrender specified weapons or articles that could be used to commit violence against the victim: Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12(1)(k).
\textsuperscript{188} Ibid s 14.
\textsuperscript{189} Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 14.
\textsuperscript{189} Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 36.
\textsuperscript{190} Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) ss 22, 25(1).
\textsuperscript{191} For example, Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 16(3); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 22.
\textsuperscript{192} For example, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 158; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 14.
\textsuperscript{193} For example, Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12(1)(j). Personal property directions—dealing with the return of personal property to a victim, or allowing a victim or the person against whom a protection order is made to collect personal property following the making of an exclusion order—are discussed in Ch 16.
\textsuperscript{194} Ibid s 13.
\textsuperscript{195} Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 24.
\textsuperscript{196} Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 48(2)(j).
11.131 In SA only, a court making a protection order may make a problem gambling order providing that the person be subject to a problem gambling family protection order under the Problem Gambling Family Protection Orders Act 2004 (SA) imposing specified requirements or orders of a kind that could be imposed by the Independent Gambling Authority under that Act.197 Such orders include requiring the person to attend counselling or rehabilitation; prohibiting the person from taking part in gambling activities; and prohibiting the person from contacting or intimidating a family member for the purpose of demanding or requesting money for gambling activities.198 The Commissions heard in one consultation with magistrates in Adelaide that problem gambling orders are not being imposed as part of the conditions of protection orders.

11.132 Directions not to breach the criminal law may be attached as conditions to a protection order. For example, conditions which provide that a person is not to threaten, assault or stalk another person, or damage another person’s property, essentially articulate what is, in any event, conduct typically prohibited by the criminal law. A condition to be of good behaviour is also essentially a condition to abide by the law. Other conditions, however, prohibit conduct which, but for the prohibition in the protection order, would not infringe the law. For example, persons are usually free to contact, communicate with, approach and locate family members, and free to enter and live in their own residence—conduct which can be proscribed by a protection order that includes an exclusion order.199

Application of conditions in practice

11.133 The above summary indicates the wide range of conditions potentially available to judicial officers to impose in the making of protection orders under family violence legislation. However, Professor Rosemary Hunter’s study of the handling of family violence protection order proceedings in magistrates’ courts in Victoria found that the median hearing time for protection order applications, other than contested final orders, was three minutes.200 She observed that the speed with which protection order applications were dealt with resulted in judicial officers not giving particularised attention to the conditions attached to a protection order. She concluded that conditions were not tailored to the particular allegations of each case.201

11.134 The application forms for protection orders in most jurisdictions set out the conditions that may be attached to the making of a protection order, with an option for applicants to tick the conditions which they seek.202 However, the application form for a protection order in WA does not set out the conditions which may be imposed.203

198 Problem Gambling Family Protection Orders Act 2004 (SA) s 5.
199 Exclusion orders are discussed below.
200 R Hunter, Domestic Violence Law Reform and Women’s Experience in Court: The Implementation of Feminist Reforms in Civil Proceedings (2008), 81. A great number of protection orders are made by consent, and the making of consent orders is discussed in Ch 18.
201 Ibid, 98.
202 In South Australia, this information is set out in the Magistrates Court of South Australia, Affidavit to Support Application for Domestic Violence Restraining Order <www.courts.sa.gov.au> at 8 March 2010.
11.135 The application forms for NSW and Queensland specify the mandatory conditions which attach to a protection order in those jurisdictions. The application form for a protection order in Victoria includes a note informing the applicant that if there is something that he or she wants the person who has used violence to do—or not do—which is not covered in the list, the applicant should discuss this with the Court Registrar. 204

Submissions and consultations

Tailored conditions

11.136 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether, in practice, the conditions that judicial officers attach to protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation were sufficiently tailored to the circumstances of particular cases. 205

11.137 Stakeholder responses to this question were divided. Some stakeholders stated that protection orders are generally adequately tailored, 206 but noted that this was dependent largely on: whether the parties had legal representation; the quality of legal representation; 207 whether the victim was able to obtain assistance from family violence support services or court support services; 208 and, in some cases, the varying practices of judicial officers. 209 Some submitted that judicial officers tailor orders according to what is presented to them by the victim, prosecution, or offender. 210

11.138 For example, it was submitted that:

- in the ACT, the precedent list of conditions and exceptions used by judicial officers is ‘sufficiently thorough to enable appropriate tailoring’, 211

Local courts in NSW have a pro forma bench sheet attached to the court file which allows the court to tick the relevant orders.

204 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, Information for Application for an Intervention Order (2009) <www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au> at 2 February 2010. As noted below, however, certain conditions concerning rehabilitation and counselling are not generally included on application forms.

205 Consultation Paper, Question 6–7.

206 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010. One submission stated that more research into this question was needed: Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.

210 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.

211 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
• in Tasmania, the standard conditions are broad enough to apply in most situations; 212
• in WA, some judicial officers give great consideration to appropriate terms, while others ‘adopt a more standard approach’, and problems have arisen where justices of peace, who are not legally trained, hear interim protection order applications; 213
• in Queensland, magistrates are ‘attuned to ensuring that a protection order provides for safety and proper conditions are tailored to the circumstances of each case’; 214 and
• in Victoria, if one or both parties are represented, then the conditions to be included are negotiated, and judicial officers will give active consideration to whether particular conditions should be included. 215

11.139 However, many stakeholders expressed concern that conditions were not adequately tailored to the circumstances of particular cases, 216 with time constraints being cited as a common reason. 217 For example, Professor Julie Stubbs submitted that research suggests that:

applications for orders are often poorly drafted and busy courts often have little time to establish the particular needs of the parties nor to tailor the orders to those needs. 218

11.140 In a confidential submission, a legal service provider in the NT said that ‘little attention’ is given to the conditions, ‘especially when the order is not contested’—and it reported that it had certainly never seen a magistrate take the initiative to explore orders outside the usual list. 219 National Legal Aid also noted that inappropriate protection orders have been made for persons living in remote Indigenous communities, for example ‘the order might ignore the fact that both parties will have to use the only local grocery shop’. 220

11.141 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria submitted that tailoring conditions is more difficult when police, rather than lawyers, are involved:

The standardised form results in laziness and inhibits further enquiry as to whether particular conditions are appropriate. ... Generally it takes some time to talk through a victim’s particular situation ... Police are generally time pressured and not best placed

212 Ibid.
213 Ibid.
220 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. This concern was echoed in another consultation: Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010.
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law

11.142 Several stakeholders submitted that tailoring conditions is ‘imperative’.

Properly tailored conditions ‘ensure that the victim does not need to return unnecessarily to court to vary the order and therefore leads to efficiency across the justice system’.

Similarly, a legal service from the NT submitted that, given that not all victims have access to legal representation—or to legal representation of appropriate experience and skill—it would be very helpful if the magistrates could consider specialised orders on their behalf.

11.143 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) stated that judicial officers should not draft conditions which address only the violence that has already been committed because this ‘is likely to leave victims without sufficient protection’.

With family violence behaviours, just because somebody used the telephone to carry out the harassment the first time does not mean that they will not approach in person the next time.

11.144 It also emphasised the utility of courts being able to impose orders which require respondents to refrain from doing acts which would constitute a breach of the law because it ‘actually does help them to realise that these behaviours are going to lead to consequences’.

Trying to locate the victim

11.145 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should provide expressly that one of the conditions that may be imposed by a court making a protection order is to prohibit the person against whom the order is made from locating or attempting to locate the victim of family violence.

11.146 Most stakeholders supported this proposal. In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others agreed that the condition was important for

---

222 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
223 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
225 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
226 Ibid.
227 Ibid.
228 Consultation Paper, Proposal 6–5.
those trying to sever ties with persons who have used family violence.\textsuperscript{229} One legal service provider submitted that this would give police ‘more specific scope to arrest a defendant should they breach this condition’.\textsuperscript{230}

11.147 Some stakeholders expressed qualified support for the proposal. An advocacy organisation agreed with the proposal, provided that ‘there is a priority for minimal disruption to the protected person and any children involved that assumes, where safe and possible, they remain in the home, and the perpetrator is removed’.\textsuperscript{231} The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria supported the proposal, ‘subject to [the application] of Family Law Act location provisions’.\textsuperscript{232}

11.148 National Legal Aid stressed that care would need to be taken to ensure that such orders were appropriate for individual cases, and that this could be the subject of further training and education.\textsuperscript{233} Legal Aid NSW stated that such conditions would need to be qualified to allow parties to be contacted in order to engage in family dispute resolution in appropriate circumstances.\textsuperscript{234}

11.149 Other stakeholders expressed concern that such a condition could pose ‘practical difficulties’,\textsuperscript{235} would be difficult to enforce,\textsuperscript{236} and could be open to abuse by a victim.\textsuperscript{237} For example, the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that if a condition were to set out in detail what a respondent to a protection order must not do—such as check the electoral roll or ask friends where the victim is—this may be counter-productive in actually suggesting ways to locate the victim, potentially endangering him or her.\textsuperscript{238}

11.150 Legal Aid NSW and the Law Society of NSW both expressed the view that the current prohibition on contacting a victim should be sufficient.\textsuperscript{239} The Victorian Government stated that it would consider this proposal, and noted that Victorian family

\textsuperscript{229} Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{230} Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{231} Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{232} Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{233} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{234} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. A similar point was made in relation to family court proceedings generally, in Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{235} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{236} Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010. See also Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{237} T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{238} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{239} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
violence legislation permits the court to impose any conditions that appear to the court to be necessary or desirable in the circumstances.240

11.151 Other stakeholders opposed the proposal.241 The South Australian Government said it was difficult to see how the proposal would add anything;242 and another stakeholder noted that trying to locate someone does not necessarily constitute intention to harm that person.243

Application forms

11.152 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that application forms for protection orders in each state and territory should clearly set out the full range of conditions that a court may attach to a protection order. The forms should be drafted to enable applicants to indicate the types of conditions that they would like imposed. In particular, the Commissions proposed, the application forms in WA should be amended in this regard.244

11.153 This proposal was widely supported,245 with one stakeholder noting, for example, that applicants for protection orders need guidance as to the available and appropriate conditions.246

11.154 However, a strong theme that emerged in several submissions was that, the list of conditions should be an aid but not exhaustive, allowing judicial officers discretion to impose tailored conditions where it was necessary and desirable.247 One stakeholder, while supporting the proposal, submitted that more than a ‘check-box’ approach is 242 Government of South Australia, Submission FV 227, 9 July 2010.

243 Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010.
244 Consultation Paper, Proposal 6–6.
245 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 128, 22 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010; Domestic Violence Legal Service, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010; Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
necessary, and that there is ‘also a need for on-site duty lawyers who can advise applicants of all their options’.248

11.155 Another stakeholder expressed the view that if a form were to include a complete list of possible conditions, it could become ‘unwieldy and confusing’ and that it may be more helpful for the court registry or website to have an expanded list of sample orders for applicants to consider in drafting their applications for protection orders.249

11.156 One stakeholder was concerned that ‘emotionally charged revenge seeking’ applicants might request all the conditions set out in an application form.250

11.157 A number of stakeholders also commented on the efficacy of the application forms being used in their own jurisdictions. For example, the Commissions heard that:

- the checklist of special conditions set out in the application forms in Queensland ‘appears to work well’;251
- the application forms in NSW are clear and do not need to be changed;252 and
- the application forms in the NT are ‘poor’, with stakeholder support for better forms and a standard affidavit.253

Commissions’ views

11.158 The Commissions consider that, in making protection orders, it is particularly important that judicial officers are able to impose conditions which proscribe conduct which is otherwise not criminal. All citizens are, in any event, under an obligation not to breach the criminal law. However, there is benefit in attaching conditions to protection orders that are, in essence, directions not to breach the criminal law. A breach of a protection order is a criminal offence and, as discussed in Chapter 12, it may be easier to prove a breach than the underlying offence to the requisite degree of proof. In addition, articulating conditions which reinforce duties to obey the criminal law also emphasises to a respondent that his or her offending behaviour will attract certain consequences.

11.159 In considering the conditions which courts can impose to proscribe conduct which is otherwise not criminal, the Commissions consider that a condition prohibiting a respondent to a protection order from locating or attempting to locate the victim—such as that contained in the family violence legislation of Queensland—is of particular importance in the context of victims fleeing family violence and attempting to sever ties with those who have used violence against them. All state and territory family violence legislation should include a condition to this effect—and such a condition should be specified on all state and territory application forms for protection.

250 Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010.
253 For example, Domestic Violence Legal Service, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010.
orders, thereby allowing victims the option to ask the court to consider imposing such a condition.

11.160 The imposition of such a condition will not be appropriate in all cases. Importantly, judicial officers will need to be trained as to the application of such a condition, ensuring that it is only applied in appropriate circumstances, and qualified, where necessary to allow a respondent to attempt to locate a victim only for specified legitimate reasons such as those arising from family law dispute resolution processes or family law proceedings. The use of specialised family violence courts with specialised judicial officers—as discussed in Chapter 32—will assist in ensuring the appropriate use of this condition.

11.161 Training and education of judicial officers, and the use of specialised family violence judicial officers are also key to ensuring that, to the greatest extent possible, tailored conditions are imposed in particular matters.254 For example, it is imperative that judicial officers in remote communities avoid unconditional ‘no contact’ conditions unless absolutely necessary to minimise the potential for unintentional breaches. It is also critical that protection order applications are, in fact, heard by judicial officers and not by justices of the peace who are not legally trained—as the Commissions have heard is the practice in WA.

11.162 As a practical matter, it is also important that applications for protection orders clearly set out the types of conditions that a court may attach to a protection order, allowing for the possibility of tailored conditions. The forms should be drafted to enable victims to indicate the types of conditions that they seek. For example, the application for a protection order in WA should be amended to set out the types of conditions that a court may impose in making a protection order. This information will serve as a guide to applicants, and should be augmented by the provision of victim support services, including specialist legal representation—as recommended in Chapter 32.

11.163 Below the Commissions express views in relation to exclusion orders, and rehabilitation and counselling conditions.

Recommendation 11–6 State and territory family violence legislation should provide expressly that one of the conditions that may be imposed by a court making a protection order is to prohibit the person against whom the order is made from locating or attempting to locate the victim of family violence.

Recommendation 11–7 Application forms for protection orders in each state and territory should clearly set out the types of conditions that a court may attach to a protection order, allowing for the possibility of tailored conditions. The forms should be drafted to enable applicants to indicate the types of conditions that they seek to be imposed.

---

254 See Chs 31, 32.
Exclusion orders

11.164 Family violence legislation makes provision for protection order conditions which allow a court to prohibit a person who has used violence from entering and remaining in a residence shared with the victim, including, in some cases, the power to terminate an existing tenancy agreement and replace it with one for the benefit of the victim. In other words, a court can impose a condition requiring the person against whom the protection order is made to vacate premises, notwithstanding any ownership rights in relation to such premises.\(^{255}\)

11.165 As stated in Chapter 7, courts have been reluctant to make exclusion orders as they have the potential to cause great hardship—ultimately homelessness—for the person against whom it is made.\(^{256}\) The making of an exclusion order may be relevant to the sentencing for a family-violence related offence of the person against whom the order was made.

11.166 As noted by the AGS, there is significant variation in:

- the factors that a court has to take into account in making exclusion orders;
- whether the safety and accommodation needs of the victim are prioritised;
- whether there is a statutory presumption in favour of exclusion; and
- the impact of an exclusion order on a residential tenancy.\(^{257}\)

Some of these differences are considered below.

Factors a court has to take into account in making an exclusion order

11.167 A Victorian court that makes a protection order is required to consider whether to make an exclusion order.\(^{258}\) In some jurisdictions, including Victoria, Queensland, and NSW, courts are directed to consider specific requirements before making an exclusion order and these requirements are in addition to those to be considered in making a protection order. These requirements include:

- the desirability of minimising disruption to the victim and any child living with the victim and the importance of maintaining social networks and support;\(^{259}\)

---

\(^{255}\) See, eg, Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 16(3).

\(^{256}\) As noted below, for a court to not make an exclusion order can also have negative repercussions for a victim and children.

\(^{258}\) Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 82(1).

\(^{259}\) Ibid s 82(2). Special considerations apply where an exclusion order is to be made against a child: s 83.
the desirability of continuity and stability in the care of any child living with the victim; \(^ {260}\)

- the desirability of allowing any childcare arrangements, education, training or employment of the victim, or any child living with the victim, to continue without interruption or disturbance; \(^ {261}\)

- the effects and consequences on the safety and protection of the victim and any children living or ordinarily living at the residence if an exclusion order is not made; \(^ {262}\) and

- whether there is a need for a condition allowing the person against whom the exclusion order is made to remain at or return to the premises to recover personal property. \(^ {263}\)

11.168 In other jurisdictions the factors that a court is bound to consider in making a protection order are the same, regardless of whether the protection order includes an exclusion order. \(^ {264}\) For example, in making a protection order, South Australian courts must consider the desirability of: minimising disruptions to victims and any children living with victims; maintaining social networks and support for victims; ensuring continuity and stability in the care of children living with victims; and allowing childcare arrangements, education, training and employment of victims or any children living with victims to continue uninterrupted. \(^ {265}\)

11.169 As stated above, some jurisdictions—such as Victoria and NSW—require courts to have specific regard to the needs of the victim and any child of the victim in deciding whether to make an exclusion order. \(^ {266}\) In Victoria, a court is only required to consider the accommodation needs of a person against whom an exclusion order is made if that person is a child. \(^ {267}\) Moreover, there are additional considerations where the person excluded is an Indigenous child. These considerations are the priority for that child to live with his or her extended Indigenous family and relatives, and the need for the child to keep the child’s culture and identity through contact with the child’s community. \(^ {268}\)

11.170 Other jurisdictions take a similar approach in deciding whether to make a protection order. For example, in the NT a court is directed expressly to consider the

---

\(^ {260}\) Ibid s 82(2).

\(^ {261}\) Ibid.

\(^ {262}\) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 17(2)(a).

\(^ {263}\) Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 25A(3). Personal property directions are discussed in more detail in Ch 16.

\(^ {264}\) Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), 146.

\(^ {265}\) Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10.

\(^ {266}\) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 17(2)(c) requires the court to have regard to the ‘accommodation needs of all relevant parties, in particular the protected person and any children’. The court is also required to give reasons for not making an exclusion order in circumstances where one is sought: s 17(4).

\(^ {267}\) Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 83(3). In such cases the court must be satisfied that the child has appropriate alternative accommodation, care and supervision.

\(^ {268}\) Ibid s 83(4).
accommodation needs of the victim in making a protection order, but not those of the person against whom the order is made.\(^{269}\)

11.171 Other jurisdictions take a less victim-focused approach in the making of protection orders—including exclusion orders—by either allowing or directing the court to take into account the needs or interests of the person against whom the order is to be made. For example, the Queensland family violence legislation provides that the court may impose any condition it considers necessary or desirable in the interests of the victim, any named person, and the person against whom the protection order is made.\(^{270}\)

11.172 The ACT family violence legislation requires that the court must, in making a final protection order, consider the accommodation needs of the victim and any relevant children, as well as any hardship that may be caused to the person against whom the order is made.\(^{271}\) Similarly, the Western Australian legislation requires a court making a protection order to consider the accommodation needs of the person against whom the order is made, as well as the victim, and any hardship that may be caused to the person against whom the order is made.\(^{272}\)

11.173 If police in Victoria issue a family violence safety notice that includes an exclusion order, they are required to consider the accommodation needs of the person against whom the order is made and any dependent children of that person. The police are required to take reasonable steps to secure for such persons access to temporary accommodation.\(^{273}\)

Presumption in favour of exclusion

11.174 Only the NT family violence legislation contains an express presumption that where a victim, a person who has used family violence against the victim, and a child reside together, the protection of the victim and the child are best achieved by their living in the home. The presumption does not act to prevent a protection order including a condition allowing the person against whom the protection order is made to visit the child at the home.\(^{274}\) Such a presumption acts to implement a central objective of the legislation referred to in the Second Reading Speech of the Domestic and Family Violence Bill 2007 (NT), namely ‘to ensure minimal disruption to the lives of families affected by violence’.\(^{275}\)

11.175 Significantly, the presumption only operates where there is a child involved. It has no application in the case of family violence between partners living in the same residence without a child.

\(^{269}\) Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 19(2)(b).
\(^{270}\) Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 25(2).
\(^{271}\) Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 47(1)(c), (d).
\(^{272}\) Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 12(1)(d), (e).
\(^{273}\) Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 36.
\(^{274}\) Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 20.
\(^{275}\) Northern Territory, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 17 October 2007, 4846 (S Stirling—Attorney-General), 4848.
Submissions and consultations

Duty to consider making of exclusion order

11.176 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should require judicial officers considering the making of protection orders to consider whether or not to make an exclusion order—that is, an order excluding a person against whom a protection order is made from premises shared with the victim, even if the person has a legal or equitable interest in such premises.276

11.177 This proposal received overwhelming support,277 on the basis, for example, that:

• the safety of victims is of paramount importance;278

• it might mean that fewer women and children become homeless as a result of family violence;279

• it may help ‘address the particular vulnerabilities of, and additional barriers to leaving family violence for, people with disability’;280 and

• it is onerous and difficult for victims to pursue an exclusion order—especially if they fear it will ‘open up the flood gates’ to further abuse.281 But if the Courts were required to consider making the order, the onus will be removed from the victim and it will be less likely that the victim will be blamed.282

278 Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
282 Ibid.
A number of stakeholders emphasised that this issue should also be addressed by education and training as it is ‘a core responsibility’ of the police prosecutor or solicitor representing the victim to raise this issue, and the responsibility of a judicial officer to give it consideration.\(^{283}\)

The Victorian Government supported the proposal, suggesting that Victoria’s family violence legislation should be a model, and submitted that police and registrars:

> need to advise victims in the first instance about exclusion conditions ... This is particularly important due to the number of victims who may go direct to court without having had any support from a family violence agency.\(^{284}\)

One stakeholder expressed qualified support for the proposal on the basis that care is taken to ensure this does not hold up the process of awarding interim protection orders, or that by making this explicit we see more respondents objecting to the interim protection order.\(^{285}\)

Other stakeholders expressed concerns about the proposal, including:

- ‘it will not be appropriate in all cases and may come to be a disincentive for some victims to seek legal assistance if it is to be raised in all circumstances’;\(^{286}\)
- evicting an ‘emotionally charged’ person, who might be suffering from a mental disorder, will aggravate matters and may cause more violence.\(^{287}\)

A partner violence counsellor submitted that judicial officers should not consider exclusion automatically, but only at the request of the police or victim, and they should provide sufficient grounds for the exclusion.\(^{288}\)

Relevant factors

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should specify the factors that a court is to consider in making an exclusion order. The Commissions also proposed that judicial officers should be required to consider the effect that making or declining to make an exclusion order will have on the accommodation needs of the parties to the proceedings and on any children.\(^{289}\)

A significant number of stakeholders supported this proposal.\(^{290}\) A legal service provider said this was particularly relevant in the NT.
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law where there is significant housing pressure and, not only is it hard to find affordable accommodation, it can be hard, at times, to find accommodation at all.\(^{291}\)

11.185 Many stakeholders expressly supported consideration being given to the needs of the victim and any children in making an exclusion order,\(^{292}\) with one noting that it may decrease the number of victims and children who are faced with homelessness as a result of family violence.\(^{293}\) However, several submissions expressed a concern that the accommodation needs of the respondent be treated as a secondary consideration to the need to ensure the safety of a victim and any children.\(^{294}\)

11.186 For example, the Disability Services Commission (WA) agreed that highlighting factors for consideration is important, and submitted that the factors a court should consider are complex and may, in some cases, be conflicting.\(^{295}\) It submitted that some factors should be ‘higher order considerations’, such as minimal disruption to the lives of victims. The accommodation needs of the parties, it submitted, could be a secondary consideration.

11.187 However, the Victorian Government opposed the court having to consider the accommodation needs of the respondent at all, noting that, in Victoria, courts are not required to do so unless the subject of the order is a child. It submitted that this ‘position was arrived at after extensive consultation with stakeholders and it is considered an appropriate balance’ and that emergency accommodation options are provided as part of Victoria’s integrated system.\(^{296}\) Some stakeholders suggested that the Victorian legislation should provide a model.\(^{297}\)
11.188 Another stakeholder stated that it assumed each state and territory has emergency accommodation services to assist men who are made homeless following the making of an exclusion order:

   Given this, we can see no reason why courts or police should hesitate to apply an exclusion order to a male user of family violence on the basis that the man would need to use emergency accommodation.298

11.189 Another stakeholder suggested that the specified factors should not be considered exhaustive, but rather as ‘an indication of the kinds of factors to be considered, so that individual circumstances can be taken into account’.299

11.190 The Disability Services Commission also submitted that a further secondary consideration that should be considered by the court is the impact of a person’s disability, including that of victims, perpetrators and children. An exclusion order may result in undue hardship for a perpetrator with disability. Similarly, not making an exclusion order may result in undue hardship for a victim with disability or any children with disability.300

11.191 The Disability Services Commission (WA) submitted that courts may need to consider, among other things:

   • any aids, equipment, care and support necessary for daily life;
   • whether alternative support and accessible accommodation are available;
   • the person’s ability to contact and access the support and accommodation; and
   • the time required to organise this support and accommodation.301

Inclination of judicial officers to make exclusion orders

11.192 Although it was not a question raised in the Consultation Paper, some stakeholders commented on the inclination of judicial officers to make exclusion orders. For example, the Queensland Law Society submitted, that ‘ouster’ orders are ‘less cumbersome, quicker and cheaper to obtain than sole use orders under the Family Law Act’—but at times there are ‘remarkably different approaches from different magistrates’:

   Anecdotal evidence is that some magistrates are inclined to make these orders quite readily, including on an ex parte basis, whereas other magistrates regularly decline to make them, particularly if they are concerned that they are being used as an inappropriate stalking horse for property settlement proceedings.302

---

300 Disability Services Commission (WA), Submission FV 138, 23 June 2010.
301 Ibid.
11.193 Another stakeholder submitted that ouster orders are difficult to obtain in Queensland, particularly where the respondent has a legal connection to the premises—and even where the victim is named jointly on the title or lease.\textsuperscript{303} It was also suggested that respondents are also less likely to be evicted if they say they have no other accommodation.\textsuperscript{304}

11.194 The NSW Women’s Refuge Movement Working Party Inc said that experiences reported by its member refuges indicate that ‘many judicial officers are often not inclined to make exclusion orders’ and one refuge recently said ‘one magistrate didn’t even know what an exclusion order was’.\textsuperscript{305} Legislative direction and education of judicial officers would therefore also be useful.\textsuperscript{306}

Police role in securing accommodation for excluded person

11.195 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked, where state or territory family violence legislation empowers police to make orders excluding persons who have used family violence from their homes, whether they should be required to take reasonable steps to secure temporary accommodation for the excluded persons.\textsuperscript{307}

11.196 Stakeholder views on this issue were divided. Some stakeholders expressed concerns about police making exclusions orders at all,\textsuperscript{308} or making them in situations which were not urgent or in cases where it was not possible for a court to hear the matter.\textsuperscript{309}

11.197 Many stakeholders submitted that where police have the power to exclude persons, they should be required to take reasonable steps to secure temporary accommodation,\textsuperscript{310} including on the basis that:

- Exclusion orders are more likely to work when excluded persons are helped to find alternative accommodation.\textsuperscript{311} Without accommodation, the respondent will

\textsuperscript{303} Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{304} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{306} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{307} Consultation Paper, Question 6–8.
\textsuperscript{308} Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{309} J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010. The issue of whether police should be able to issue protection orders, and in what circumstances, is discussed in Ch 9.
\textsuperscript{310} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, Submission FV 136, 22 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010. The Victorian Government supported the police having to make reasonable enquiries about temporary accommodation for the excluded person: Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{311} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
often breach the orders—being not only more likely to return to the family home, but doing so at the invitation of a concerned and sympathetic victim.

- It would increase the safety—and sense of safety—of victims, and reduce the risk of further or escalated violence, especially given that excluded men ‘often need specialised support’ finding themselves ‘in particularly volatile states of mind soon after the intervention’.
- It is necessary to ensure that there are systems in place to address any homelessness that may ensue as a result of an exclusion order.

11.198 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria submitted that although police are already subject to this obligation under the Victorian legislation, police ‘lack knowledge of the procedure’.

11.199 Some stakeholders stated that, if the government is serious about reducing family violence, it needs to address the availability of suitable accommodation as a priority. National Legal Aid, for example, noted that in Tasmania ‘a fund for perpetrator housing was created, but has not been used to anywhere near the extent that was anticipated’. Berry Street Inc submitted that there are ‘under-utilised’ but ‘very useful’ resources for excluded men in Victoria to be provided with a few nights accommodation with support and police are aware of this resource.

11.200 Other stakeholders expressed the view that police should not have to take reasonable steps to secure accommodation, including because this is an onerous requirement; not core police work; could dissuade police from applying for an exclusion order; and would not be of any practical benefit due to the lack of

312 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
313 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, Submission FV 136, 22 June 2010. See also Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
314 Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010. Another stakeholder also expressed the view that victims should not be ‘left in an unsafe situation because the perpetrator has no alternative accommodation’: Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010.
318 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
322 N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010.
323 Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010. See also Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010. Another stakeholder also expressed the view that preferably a non-government organisation or program should be engaged to secure alternative accommodation: Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010.
available accommodation.\textsuperscript{325} However, some favoured that the police be trained to take some form of action, such as:

\begin{itemize}
  \item enquire of the respondent about the availability of alternative accommodation;\textsuperscript{326}
  \item and/or
  \item refer the respondent to a housing or homeless service, support service such as the Salvation Army or other assistance.\textsuperscript{327}
\end{itemize}

\textit{Providing reasons for not excluding}

11.201 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should require a court to give reasons for declining to make an exclusion order—that is, an order excluding the person against whom a protection order is made from premises in which he or she has a legal or equitable interest—where such order has been sought.\textsuperscript{328}

11.202 The great majority of stakeholders supported this proposal\textsuperscript{329} with one legal service provider opposing it without providing further comment.\textsuperscript{330} Reasons for support included that:

\begin{itemize}
  \item reasons are essential in case there are grounds to appeal;\textsuperscript{331}
\end{itemize}

\textsuperscript{325} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{326} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{327} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010. See also T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010. The need for police to receive training in dealing was also emphasised by National Legal Aid: National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{328} Consultation Paper, Proposal 6–9.
\textsuperscript{330} Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{331} Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010.
• it enhanced ‘consideration of the safety of victims’ and of the ‘social context of family violence embedded in the legislation via principles and definitions’; 332
• victims have a right to have the court outcome explained to them; 333
• courts should be held to account when they choose not to make an exclusion order; 334 and
• magistrates in making or refusing to make an order in any case should provide reasons. 335

11.203 Stubbs agreed that reasons should be given in those cases where an exclusion order has been sought. 336 Women’s Legal Services Australia also submitted that police should have to give their reasons, if they have the power to make such an order. 337

11.204 Legal Aid NSW stated that it was its experience that courts ‘do not often give considered reasons in these situations’. 338

Northern Territory presumption

11.205 In the NT family violence legislation, there is a presumption that where a victim, a person who uses family violence, and child reside together, the protection of the victim and child is best achieved by their remaining in the home. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how this presumption is working in practice. In particular, the Commissions asked if it has resulted in the making of more exclusion orders. 339

11.206 Stakeholders addressed the application of the presumption both by police and the courts. National Legal Aid submitted that this presumption is regularly used by the police when they issue protection orders in urgent circumstances. 340 However, one legal service provider said it was ‘still rare’ to have an exclusion order granted:

Police do not utilise it in a remote setting and instead still tend to favour the emergency evacuation of a victim regardless of whether she has children. 341

11.207 National Legal Aid stated that courts have made exclusion orders where victims have requested them, ‘because of the existence of the presumption’. However, it said that magistrates ‘take these applications seriously’, do not grant them ‘as a matter of course’, and an initial fear that the presumption would be abused by people

333 Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
334 Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
337 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
338 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
339 Consultation Paper, Question 6–9.
340 ‘The police often require the alleged perpetrator to vacate the home and defendants are unable to return until the order is changed later at court’; ‘National Legal Aid, Submission FV 212, 15 July 2010.
seeking to gain control of property to circumvent the family law jurisdiction had not been realised.342

11.208 Stakeholders expressed mixed views about the practical effect of the presumption on victims. It was recognised that, in some circumstances, the presumption is benefiting victims, while in others it is not—principally because many women do not want to stay home because they do not feel safe there or are advised not to stay home because of the risk of the respondent returning.343

11.209 A NT legal service provider strongly supported the provision, which it said:

prioritises victims’ safety, permits children to continue an established routine, encourages an alleged offender to accept responsibility for [his or her] conduct, and responds to the existing reality of nil/very limited bed space at women’s shelters which results in victims being unhoused and in very unsafe circumstances.344

Whether there should be a presumption that victims remain in the home

11.210 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether state and territory family violence legislation should include an express presumption that the protection of victims is best served by their remaining in the home in circumstances where they share a residence with the persons who have used violence against them.345

11.211 Many stakeholders submitted that there should be such an express presumption.346 However, several of these stakeholders also expressed the view that judicial officers must have sufficient discretion to assess individual circumstances and that victims should decide whether they want to remain in the home, acknowledging that it may not always be the safest option for a victim to remain in the home—or the fairest option to exclude the respondent.347

---

342 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. In consultation, the Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission also expressed the view that the presumption is not being abused and that magistrates generally will not entertain applications for exclusion in the absence of solid evidence: Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010.

345 Consultation Paper, Question 6–10.

11.212 Reasons given in favour of such a presumption included that:

- it ‘favours the alleged victim and that is fair’; 348
- it ‘acts as a prompt to judicial officers to seriously consider an exclusion order’; 349
- it may assist judicial officers to recognise that it is often easier, less disruptive and less expensive for a single person to find accommodation than for a mother and children, particularly considering that ‘often victims of family violence are forced to flee the family home with meagre belongings’; 350 and
- a person who uses family violence forfeits the right to stay in his or her home. 351

11.213 However, many stakeholders expressed concerns about the practical application of such a presumption. The impracticality of applying such a presumption in particular Indigenous settings was raised as a particular issue. One legal service provider noted that often an Indigenous victim may reside in the home of the aggressor’s family with members of that family, such as a mother-in-law. ‘Such a presumption in these circumstances is invalid’. 352

11.214 In addition, stakeholders noted the potential for the presumption to result in ‘unintended consequences’. 353 For example, both National Legal Aid and the Victorian Government expressed the view that the presumption could be problematic, operating against genuine victims where an aggressor ‘seeks to get in first’ by applying for an order or making a cross-application to manipulate the system to enable him or herself to remain in the family home. 354

11.215 Several stakeholders opposed the proposal on the basis that it could compromise the safety of victims and children. 355 In particular, stakeholders stressed that victims will not always be safe in the home—and that the safest option might sometimes be for the victim to leave, particularly given that the aggressor knows where she or he lives, knows the premises well, and might still have a key. 356

---

348 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
350 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
356 Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010. The Victorian Government also expressed the view that ‘there are instances where it is not appropriate for victims to remain at an address known’ to the aggressor: Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
For example, the No to Violence Male Prevention Association stated that excluding a man from his home is no guarantee that he won’t attempt to return to the family home, and in some situations the risk of such might be associated with significant safety risks for affected family members.\textsuperscript{357}

Some stakeholders noted that for victims the idea of remaining in the home might be ‘daunting and scary’\textsuperscript{358} and remind the victim of the trauma that occurred in the house\textsuperscript{359}—and this emphasised the importance of giving the victim a choice of whether to leave or to stay.\textsuperscript{360} For example, one stakeholder said that ‘women are often the best judges of the risk of further violence towards themselves and their children’.\textsuperscript{361}

The NSW Women’s Refuge Movement Working Party cautioned that a ‘blanket’ presumption is ‘ill conceived’ because there are many factors which need to be considered before determining whether exclusion is the best option, including the ongoing safety risks to the victim and what safety strategies can minimise these risks.\textsuperscript{362}

Many stakeholders emphasised the importance of safety strategies beyond the mere making of an exclusion order. In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others stated that ‘safety can only be assured when other systems responses are in place that support the exclusion condition’.\textsuperscript{363} Another stakeholder said such a presumption ‘should not detract from the need for safe houses and emergency evacuation funds’.\textsuperscript{364} Stakeholders also suggested that victims should be helped with all safety precautions—including locks being changed, security cameras, sensor lights security doors etc;\textsuperscript{365} and that ‘appropriate safety planning involving the police’ and ‘arrangements including the use of personalised duress alarms’ would also be of assistance.\textsuperscript{366}

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

\textbf{Duty to consider making exclusion orders}

Courts issuing protection orders should be required to consider whether to make an exclusion order—as is the case in Victoria. This proposed legislative duty does not require a judicial officer to make an exclusion order—but to consider actively whether the circumstances of a particular case warrant such an order being made in the interests of ensuring victim safety. Implementation of this recommendation may go

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{357} No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, \textit{Submission FV 136}, 22 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{358} Confidential, \textit{Submission FV 184}, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{359} Confidential, \textit{Submission FV 183}, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{360} Ibid.
\item \textsuperscript{361} No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, \textit{Submission FV 136}, 22 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{363} Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, \textit{Submission FV 146}, 24 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{364} Confidential, \textit{Submission FV 198}, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{365} Confidential, \textit{Submission FV 77}, 2 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{366} National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV 232}, 15 July 2010.
\end{itemize}
some way to increasing the likelihood of judicial officers making exclusion orders in appropriate circumstances, and to addressing the apparent ‘judicial unease’ in making such orders.\footnote{367}

11.221 The legislative duty to consider the making of an order should be complemented by educating and training police prosecutors and lawyers involved in family violence matters to raise this issue in appropriate circumstances.

\textit{Relevant factors}

11.222 State and territory family violence legislation should address separately the factors which courts are required to take into consideration in making or declining to make an exclusion order—over and above the factors that are to be considered in making a protection order generally. The Victorian and NSW family violence legislation are instructive models in this regard. As stated by the AGS, ‘the advantage of specifying particular considerations is that it should ensure courts focus on matters considered especially important by the legislature and that the parties are aware of the particular significance of those matters’.\footnote{368}

11.223 In identifying relevant factors, it is important that the legislation distinguishes between the paramount consideration of ensuring the safety of a victim and her or his children, and other secondary factors. An exclusion order should only be made when it is necessary to secure the safety of a victim or affected child. Relevant to the issue of a victim’s safety and that of any affected children are their vulnerability, having regard to their physical, emotional and psychological needs as well as any disability. Secondary factors that a court should consider are the accommodation needs of, and options available to, the parties,\footnote{369} particularly in light of any disability that they may have—and the length of time required for any party to secure alternative accommodation. These factors are not intended to be exhaustive. There are others in the Victorian legislation—including those concerning the desirability of minimising disruption to the victim and child, which may also be instructive.

11.224 Identifying such factors necessarily acknowledges that decisions about whether or not to make an exclusion order involve competing rights. The making of an exclusion order in appropriate circumstances can have a significant positive impact on the safety and lives of victims and children—potentially avoiding their becoming homeless, and infusing a measure of stability at a time of emotional upheaval. Not making an exclusion order in appropriate cases can cause severe hardship—those subjected to severe violence may need to flee the home.

11.225 However, the making of such an order may also have a number of adverse consequences—not least rendering the excluded person homeless or in severely reduced circumstances, potentially fuelling an escalation of violence borne of resentment and bitterness, which can further threaten victim safety or indeed the safety of others. It is unsatisfactory to say that persons who use family violence have brought this situation upon themselves and should suffer the consequences. Nor is it realistic to consider that laws alone can address and resolve complex social problems.

\footnote{367}{See Ch 7.}
\footnote{368}{Australian Government Solicitor, \textit{Domestic Violence Laws in Australia} (2009), 147.}
\footnote{369}{This approach is consistent with Australian Law Reform Commission, \textit{Domestic Violence}, Report 30 (1986), [100], Rec 14.}

Need for an integrated response

11.226 Addressing potential homelessness following a decision to make—or not to make—an exclusion order requires solutions beyond the scope of legal frameworks. A serious governmental response to family violence requires funding for emergency accommodation. If a person is excluded from his or her home, there needs to be an integrated response which involves providing necessary support and assistance to that person—not only in the interests of his or her welfare, but also in the interests of reducing risks to victim safety. Critically, this entails the provision of emergency housing, links to support networks, access to relevant medication and aids necessary for a person’s daily life, as well as access to work tools and personal property.

11.227 Similarly, victims and children need support to stay safe where an exclusion order is made. This could include, for example, police supervision of the eviction to ensure that an aggressor does not cause damage or commit further family violence; funding for the changing of locks, as well as the installation of security cameras, security doors and sensor lights. Equally, in circumstances where it is safer for a victim and her or his children to flee the family home, it is imperative that there be appropriate emergency and other accommodation and links to victim support and counselling services.

11.228 The Commissions do not make a specific recommendation about any legislative obligation on police to take reasonable steps to secure accommodation for a person in cases where they are empowered to make exclusion orders, principally because the Commissions’ approach in Chapter 9 is to limit the circumstances in which police can issue protection orders. Family violence protection orders—and therefore exclusion orders—should, wherever possible, be made or authorised by a judicial officer.

11.229 However if, in the limited circumstances identified in Recommendation 9–1, police are empowered to make a protection order and therefore an exclusion order, the Commissions consider that police should take certain steps to assist the excluded person—including making enquiries of him or her about accommodation options, and referring that person to relevant housing and support services. The Commissions consider that this can properly be accommodated by police training and education, and the establishment of collaborative relationships between police and support services as part of an integrated response to family violence, rather than being imposed as a legislative duty.

---

370 Integrated responses are discussed in Ch 29.
371 Personal property directions are discussed in Ch 16.
372 In Ch 29, the Commissions recommend that governments prioritise the provision of, and access to, culturally appropriate victim support services for victims of family violence: Rec 29–3.
No presumption that victim remains in home

11.230 The inclusion of a legislative presumption that victims should remain in the home when they reside with persons who use family violence, may result in problematic consequences in application. Significantly, it may compromise the safety of victims and children, by failing to recognise adequately that sometimes the safest options for victims is to leave the home. Victims should be able to make the choice about whether it is safest for them to remain in the home or to flee. Well-intentioned judicial officers in respecting such a presumption may inadvertently risk the safety of victims.

11.231 In addition, the application of such a presumption will be of little import where victims, including Indigenous victims, reside in the home of the aggressor with the family of the aggressor.

11.232 The reasons for which the Commissions refrain from making a recommendation about such a legislative presumption are consistent with the reasons discussed in Chapter 7 for not recommending that a core purpose of family violence legislation should be to ensure minimal disruption. Inevitably, on occasion, taking appropriate steps to ensure the safety of victims may require action which leads to significant disruption and upheaval—which is the case in those circumstances where it is safer for a victim to flee the home than to stay at an address known to the aggressor.

Providing reasons for not excluding 11.233 In the interests of promoting transparency and accountability in decision making judicial officers should be required to give reasons for not making an exclusion order where such an order has been sought. The family violence legislation of NSW provides an instructive model in this regard. This approach respects victims’ rights to have a court outcome explained to them.

Recommendation 11–8  State and territory family violence legislation should require judicial officers making protection orders to consider whether or not to make an exclusion order—that is, an order excluding a person against whom a protection order is made from premises shared with the victim, even if the person has a legal or equitable interest in such premises.

Recommendation 11–9  State and territory family violence legislation should provide that a court should only make an exclusion order when it is necessary to ensure the safety of a victim or affected child. Primary factors relevant to the paramount consideration of safety include the vulnerability of the victim and any affected child having regard to their physical, emotional and psychological needs, and any disability. Secondary factors to be considered include the accommodation needs and options available to the parties, particularly in light of any disability that they may have, and the length of time required for any party to secure alternative accommodation.
Recommendation 11–10  State and territory family violence legislation should require a court to give reasons for declining to make an exclusion order where such order has been sought.

Rehabilitation and counselling conditions in protection orders

11.234 The AGS noted that there are significant differences across the jurisdictions concerning the making of orders directing a person who has used family violence and who has had a protection order issued against him or her to attend counselling or rehabilitation programs or to refer that person to such programs.373

11.235 Five jurisdictions address the power of courts to attach conditions to protection orders involving either rehabilitation or counselling. Key differences between them include: whether such orders are mandatory or voluntary; whether they are available only on sentencing; and their effects.

11.236 The family violence legislation of the ACT and WA provides for voluntary counselling orders. The ACT Magistrates Court may recommend that the person against whom the protection order is made, or the victim, take part in a ‘program of counselling, training, mediation, rehabilitation or assessment’.374 In WA, a court or the police, in making a protection order, must explain to the parties that counselling and support services may be of assistance and, where appropriate, refer them to specific services.375

11.237 By comparison, the family violence legislation of Victoria provides that the Family Violence Court Division, upon the making of a final protection order against a person, must order that the person be assessed for counselling, where there is approved counselling reasonably available and where it is appropriate to do so.376 If the person is assessed as eligible to attend counselling, the Family Violence Court Division must order the person to attend counselling. It is an offence for the person to fail to attend counselling, without reasonable excuse.377

11.238 In the NT, a court may make an order requiring a person against whom a protection order is made to attend a rehabilitation program, but only if the person consents, the court is satisfied that the person is suitable to take part in the program and there is place in such program.378 Similarly, under South Australian family violence legislation, a court may require a person against whom a protection order is made to undergo eligibility assessment for an intervention program, and if the person is eligible and the services are available, order the person to undertake such a program.379

374 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 89.
375 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) ss 8(1)(o), 30E(3).
376 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 129.
377 Ibid s 130.
378 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 24.
11.239 The Queensland and Tasmania, family violence legislation allows courts to impose any conditions that the court considers necessary and desirable, which could include counselling or rehabilitation orders.\(^{380}\)

11.240 In NSW, a court may impose ‘such prohibitions or restrictions on the behaviour of the defendant as appear necessary or desirable.’ \(^{381}\) Requiring someone to attend counselling or rehabilitation may go further than prohibiting or restricting that person’s behaviour. Therefore, the NSW legislation could be interpreted as not giving courts the power to make counselling or rehabilitation orders.

11.241 Application forms for protection orders, in those jurisdictions where there are legislative provisions concerning the imposition of conditions relating to rehabilitation or counselling, do not generally set out conditions relating to rehabilitation or counselling. One exception is the application form for a protection order in Victoria, which allows an applicant to indicate that she or he would like the court to encourage the person against whom the order is sought to contact the Men’s Referral Service.\(^{382}\)

Rehabilitation orders pre-sentencing

11.242 In certain jurisdictions, rehabilitation orders may be made as part of the criminal process in the pre-sentencing phase. In NSW and SA, for example, courts may defer sentencing for up to 12 months on the date of a finding of guilt, for the purpose of:

- assessing an offender’s capacity and prospects for rehabilitation or for participation in an intervention program;\(^{383}\)
- allowing an offender to demonstrate that rehabilitation has taken place; and
- allowing the offender to participate in an intervention program.\(^{384}\)

11.243 Such orders may overlap with protection order conditions requiring attendance at a rehabilitation or intervention program.

Rehabilitation orders on sentencing

11.244 In some jurisdictions rehabilitation orders can be made on sentencing. Tasmanian legislation empowers a court sentencing for a family violence offence to make a ‘rehabilitation program order’, either with or without recording a conviction.\(^{385}\)

---

\(^{380}\) Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 25; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 16(2).

\(^{381}\) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 35.

\(^{383}\) In South Australia ‘intervention program’ means a program that provides supervised: treatment, rehabilitation, behaviour management, access to support services; or a combination of the above: Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 3.

\(^{384}\) Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 11; Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) s 19B (the latter Act allows the court discretion to adjourn proceedings for a period exceeding the usual maximum of 12 months).

\(^{385}\) Sentencing Act 1997 (Tas) s 7(ea). ‘Rehabilitation program order’ means an order to attend and participate in a rehabilitation program and in doing so comply with the reasonable directions of a person employed or engaged to conduct such a program: s 4.
In determining the sentence for a family violence offence, the court is required to take into account the results of any rehabilitation program assessment undertaken by the offender.

11.245 In the NT, a court that finds a person guilty of an offence may order the person to participate in an 'approved project', which means a rehabilitation program or work, or both, approved by a community work advisory committee under the Prisons (Correctional Services) Act (NT). This means that in the NT, a person against whom a protection order is made can be required to attend a rehabilitation program—as noted above—and, if that person is found guilty of an offence related to family violence, may also be ordered to participate in a rehabilitation program.

11.246 In the ACT, if an offender is convicted or found guilty of an offence, the court in sentencing may make a good behaviour order, which may include a rehabilitation program condition; as well as any other condition that the court considers appropriate, as long as it is not inconsistent with sentencing and sentencing administration legislation. An example of such a condition provided by the legislation is ‘that the offender attend educational, vocational, psychological, psychiatric or other programs for counselling’. This means that in the ACT, a person against whom a protection order is made under family violence legislation may be subject to a rehabilitation or counselling order, and if that same person is found guilty of a family-violence related offence, he or she may also be subject to a good behaviour bond containing a rehabilitation or counselling order.

11.247 Under South Australian sentencing legislation, a court may impose—as a condition of a good behaviour bond—a condition that the offender undertake an intervention program. If an offender has participated in an intervention program, the court has a discretion to treat the offender’s participation and achievements in the program as relevant to sentence. However, the fact that an offender has not participated in, or had the opportunity to participate in, or performed badly in such a program is not relevant to sentence.

11.248 In NSW, a court may impose a good behaviour bond on sentencing, which may contain a condition requiring the offender to participate in an intervention program, or to participate in any program for treatment or rehabilitation that is not an intervention program.

---

386 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 13(b).
387 Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) ss 3, 34.
389 Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 13(3)(c). See also pt 6.2.
390 Ibid s 13(3)(g).
391 Ibid s 13(3).
393 Ibid s 10.
394 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 95A. Intervention programs are defined in the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 346.
395 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) ss 95(c), 95A.
11.249 The Sentencing Advisory Council in Victoria considered the making of rehabilitation orders on sentencing in its 2009 report on sentencing practices for breach of protection orders. Its consultations revealed that ‘the perceptions of the efficacy of these programs are mixed’. The Council recommended that:

the government should consider funding the development and delivery of a statewide men’s behavioural change program specifically designed for offenders found guilty of offences in the family violence context.

11.250 It also recommended that until this program is implemented, courts should develop procedures to monitor whether offenders are attending these programs where they have been ordered to do so as part of an adjourned undertaking. The Victorian Government is considering these recommendations ‘in the context of the broader family violence reform agenda’.

Submissions and consultations

11.251 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should be amended, where necessary, to allow expressly for courts making protection orders to impose conditions on persons against whom protection orders are made requiring them to attend rehabilitation or counselling programs, where they are suitable and eligible to participate in such programs.

11.252 This proposal was supported by a significant number of submissions. For example, the Queensland Law Society noted the value of such programs in preventing future violence:

properly run and resourced perpetrator programs that are run for a sufficient length of time and most importantly are linked in with services that are assisting the victims of 397 Ibid, 75.

398 Ibid, Rec 1.1.
399 Ibid, Rec 1.2.
violence can be an effective tool in preventing further acts of domestic violence and inter-generational transmission of domestic violence.\textsuperscript{403}

11.253 Similarly, the Local Court of NSW expressed support in principle for mandatory assessment for counselling and rehabilitation ‘as a step in the right direction in helping to break the cycle of violence’.\textsuperscript{404}

11.254 While not expressing a view on the imposition of rehabilitation and counselling programs as part of protection order proceedings, one stakeholder expressed ‘wholehearted’ support for ‘any initiative that may serve as an alternative to incarcerating Indigenous men and boys’.\textsuperscript{405} Similarly, the North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency submitted that:

if we are serious about addressing the issues which lead to family violence, and if we are to genuinely run a criminal justice system where imprisonment is the sentence of last resort, we must as a matter of urgency put in place culturally appropriate domestic violence counselling, anger management counselling, [and] psychological counselling services in all parts of the Northern Territory.\textsuperscript{406}

\textbf{Limited evidence of efficacy}

11.255 However, there were a number of reservations expressed in relation to counselling and rehabilitation programs—including from stakeholders who supported the proposal. One concern is that there is limited evidence showing that such programs actually work.\textsuperscript{407} This was one reason why some stakeholders did not support the proposal.\textsuperscript{408} One stakeholder expressed the view that the programs are unlikely to work because ‘violence is successful behaviour that gives them what they want’.\textsuperscript{409} The programs were even less likely to work—to change aggressive behaviour—when participants were forced to attend.\textsuperscript{410} For these and other reasons, submissions stressed that programs need to be properly evaluated and that further research is required to \begin{footnotes}

\item[404] Local Court of NSW, \textit{Submission FV 101}, 4 June 2010.
\item[410] National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV 232}, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, \textit{Submission FV 219}, 1 July 2010; Confidential, \textit{Submission FV 164}, 25 June 2010. See also Local Court of NSW, \textit{Submission FV 101}, 4 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, \textit{Submission FV 46}, 24 May 2010. Though one legal service provider submitted that in the Northern Territory such orders can be made only with the consent of the ‘defendant’, and this consent is rarely obtained and so ‘an opportunity for behavioural change, reduced offending and reduced imprisonment is forgone’: The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, \textit{Submission FV 149}, 25 June 2010.
\end{footnotes}
examine whether, over time, such programs are effective in changing behaviour,\(^{411}\) and to inform future development of the programs.\(^{412}\)

11.256 The No to Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association, however, noted that there can be benefits to these programs even where they do not result in sustained behavioural changes:

Some men, for example, might reduce their use of some forms of violence while in the program due to the scrutiny associated with their participation, which might provide their partners with some ‘breathing space’ through which to make decisions concerning safety, the relationship, etc, and to begin the process of healing. Men’s Behaviour Change Programs can also play a vital role in undertaking ongoing risk assessments by virtue of working regularly with the man and contacting his (former) partner to gauge the realities of his behaviour, and if there is any discernible short-term change.\(^{413}\)

\textit{Akin to a sentencing option}

11.257 In addition, some stakeholders were concerned that an order requiring someone to attend rehabilitation or counselling might seem like a sanction—‘akin to a sentence’.\(^{414}\) Both Legal Aid NSW and the Law Society of NSW noted that the making of a protection order does not mean that an offence has been committed, and expressed the view that ‘the State needs to be cautious about the extent to which it seeks to compel people to do things not associated with the commission of a criminal offence’.\(^{415}\)

11.258 Stubbs expressed concern about whether it was appropriate to attach such conditions to an order ‘made on the balance of probabilities and potentially without any admissions being made’:

Does this mean that the failure to attend counselling or rehabilitation in breach of an order could be criminalised? That would be an unwelcome outcome and arguably an over-reach of the criminal law.\(^{416}\)

11.259 However it may be useful, Stubbs submitted, for information about these programs to be offered to persons against whom protection orders are sought.\(^{417}\)

\textit{Enforcement}

11.260 Enforcing orders to attend counselling or rehabilitation programs also raised concerns. One stakeholder, a counsellor, submitted that legally requiring individuals to attend rehabilitation and counselling programs is inappropriate, as it is likely to set

\begin{footnotes}
\item[411] National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV} 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, \textit{Submission FV} 219, 1 July 2010.
\item[413] No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, \textit{Submission FV} 136, 22 June 2010.
\item[414] National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV} 232, 15 July 2010.
\item[415] Legal Aid NSW, \textit{Submission FV} 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, \textit{Submission FV} 205, 30 June 2010.
\item[417] Ibid.
\end{footnotes}
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law

them up for failure, and that it would be preferable to ‘encourage or support’ individuals to attend.\textsuperscript{418} Other stakeholders, however, expressed the view that there should be criminal penalties for non-compliance, and that these penalties should be enforced.\textsuperscript{419}

11.261 The Local Court of NSW submitted that an ‘appropriate penalty regime’ would need to be developed; however, this would require careful consideration so as not to impact adversely on victims.\textsuperscript{420} The Court noted that penalties, such as fines, imposed for breaches of protection orders, sometimes harm victims indirectly.\textsuperscript{421} The Court also emphasised the need for effective oversight of participation. In the Court’s view, without effective mechanisms in place to report breaches and enforce orders, the orders will be less effective and judicial officers will be less willing to make them.\textsuperscript{422}

\textit{Access to programs}

11.262 Some supported the idea ‘in theory’, but were concerned about how it would work in practice.\textsuperscript{423} A number of stakeholders noted, for example, that such programs are not readily available in many regional and remote areas.\textsuperscript{424} The Local Court of NSW stated that the regions with the highest number of protection orders ‘have consistently been those located outside the Sydney metropolitan area’,\textsuperscript{425} while another stakeholder noted that currently such programs may not even be available in metropolitan areas.\textsuperscript{426}

11.263 Other stakeholders expressed the view that, overall, there is a ‘dire shortage’ of services,\textsuperscript{427} and that programs are not available at all for women who use family violence.\textsuperscript{428} One counsellor concluded that attendance ‘at a private practice where the clinician does not qualify [for the Medicare rebate], and where the offending person will have to pay for the service, may be the only option’.\textsuperscript{429} Other submissions stressed that greater resources and funding would clearly be necessary if this proposal were to be properly implemented.\textsuperscript{430}

\textsuperscript{418} T McLean, \textit{Submission FV 204}, 28 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{419} Hunter Women’s Centre, \textit{Submission FV 79}, 1 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{420} Local Court of NSW, \textit{Submission FV 101}, 4 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{421} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{422} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{425} Local Court of NSW, \textit{Submission FV 101}, 4 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{429} T McLean, \textit{Submission FV 204}, 28 June 2010.
The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) said the programs would need to be ‘family violence specific, available, properly resourced, evidence based, quality-assured and monitored’.431

_Programs should be targeted and effective_

Submissions also stressed that programs need to be appropriate and effective.432 For example, the Queensland Law Society submitted that it was essential that the programs be run for an adequate period of time, noting that ‘overseas research indicates that programs should be run for a minimum of 26 to 52 weeks’.433 The Hunter Women’s Centre expressed the view that generic rehabilitation programs and counselling sessions were not effective; programs must be structured and targeted specifically for persons who have used family violence.434

The North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency stated that there was a need to target alcohol and other drug dependencies, which were said to be ‘an important contributing factor to family violence’.435 Another stakeholder submitted that the programs ‘must be facilitated by specialist men’s workers in conjunction with women’s services’ and must be centred around the perpetrator becoming responsible and acknowledging [his or her] the abuse … Ordinary counselling services do not do this. The courses must be recognised as being knowledgeable around the dynamics of domestic abuse and violence, such as the use of power and control tactics.436

_Programs should be culturally appropriate_

Programs should also be culturally appropriate.437 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria stated that there should be ‘ATSI specific programs’.438 Another stakeholder noted the need for services targeted at men from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.439 Programs should also be available for ‘adolescent or adult children who are using violence towards their parents or other elders’.440

_Programs should not be relied on to ensure victim safety_

Another key concern about this proposal was that counselling orders might be relied on to justify the imposition of a lighter set of other conditions,441 or as a

431 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
432 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
434 Hunter Women’s Centre, Submission FV 79, 1 June 2010. See also Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
436 Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.
440 Ibid.
substitute for providing for the protection of victims.\(^{442}\) The No to Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association noted that:

> Attending a men’s behaviour change program is by no means a guarantee that a man will change his behaviour and therefore lessen the risk of harm to his (former) partner and children.\(^{443}\)

11.269 It was suggested that counselling and rehabilitation orders should be “additional conditions to be attached to protection orders”\(^{444}\) or should be made as separate orders.\(^{445}\) This approach would help to ensure that protection orders are not diluted or revoked, and that participation in a program would be “less likely to be seen as a safety condition related to the victim’s protection”.\(^{446}\)

11.270 Stakeholders also noted that counselling orders can give victims ‘a false sense of security or encouragement’,\(^{447}\) and this can mean they remain in unsafe situations.

Application forms for protection orders

11.271 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions also proposed that application forms for protection orders should specify conditions relating to rehabilitation or counselling or allow a victim to indicate whether she or he wishes the court to encourage the person who has used violence to contact an appropriate referral service.\(^{448}\)

11.272 A significant number of submissions supported this proposal.\(^{450}\) One stakeholder submitted that the person who needs protection will often have “the best knowledge of other measures which might promote his or her safety”.\(^{451}\)

\(^{446}\) Ibid.

\(^{449}\) Consultation Paper, Proposal 6–11.

Some stakeholders, however, expressed some concern about placing the onus on the victim to indicate that the person who has used violence should be referred to an appropriate program. For example, the No to Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association submitted that application forms should not be the primary mechanism initiating referral to counselling and rehabilitation programs. The Association supported a response that was ‘systems based, rather than the onus being on affected family members to take the initiative’. The Association suggested that police, magistrates and other relevant court personnel should also have a role in encouraging ‘men identified as respondents to participate in a men’s behaviour change program’.

Women’s Legal Services NSW opposed the proposal on the basis that it:

risks placing considerable pressure on victims of family violence to provide solutions for conduct of the offender which is best dealt with seriously and appropriately as family violence (with associated legislated protections and criminal justice responses).

Imposed without express power

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether judicial officers in jurisdictions, such as NSW and Queensland, in which family violence legislation does not specify expressly rehabilitation or counselling programs as potential conditions attaching to a protection order, in fact, impose such conditions as part of their general power to impose any orders that they consider to be necessary or desirable.

Under the NSW family violence legislation, it was submitted, there is no power to impose rehabilitation or counselling conditions on the making of an order. A court may impose ‘prohibitions or restrictions’ on a person’s behaviour, but not a positive obligation to do something, such as attend a program. One legal service provider said that the imposition of such conditions in NSW ‘does not happen very often at all’; and another noted that a ‘now retired Magistrate at a suburban Sydney Court made such orders on a few occasions—which provided the victim with great comfort and trust that the Court was “listening” to her’.

452 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, Submission FV 136, 22 June 2010.
454 Ibid.
456 Consultation Paper, Question 6–11.
457 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010. See also National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
458 Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.
11. Protection Orders and the Criminal Law

11.277 In Queensland, it was submitted, magistrates do not generally impose these conditions—except ‘from time to time’ on the Gold Coast. However, courts may sometimes suggest that someone attend a program or counselling. Women’s Legal Service Queensland submitted that it had not seen such conditions ‘requested, granted or refused’ nor even suggested by the magistrate. National Legal Aid submitted that ‘issues of what would happen if the person did not comply with the conditions would arise as there is no framework or process for monitoring’ compliance.

11.278 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that such orders are not imposed in Tasmania as part of protection order conditions, although participation in counselling or some other form of program may be required ‘before the court will agree that there has been a change of circumstances justifying the variation of an order’.

Conflicting obligations

11.279 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether overlapping or conflicting obligations are placed on persons as a result of conditions imposed by protection orders under family violence legislation requiring attendance at rehabilitation or counselling programs and any orders to attend such programs either pre-sentencing or as part of the sentencing process.

11.280 Only a few submissions addressed this question. One stakeholder said that in its experience this does not happen; another said it happens sometimes.

11.281 Other stakeholders addressed how such an issue is or could be addressed if it arises. National Legal Aid submitted that ‘access by respective courts to information held by the other should address this problem to the extent that it occurs’. A legal service provider submitted that the problem ‘can easily be avoided if a defendant has a competent lawyer’.

Commissions’ views

Availability of rehabilitation and counselling conditions

11.282 While the imposition of rehabilitation and counselling conditions as part of a protection order raises some challenging issues in application, the Commissions

---

464 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. This submission also noted that such conditions can be imposed as part of sentencing.
465 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
466 Consultation Paper, Question 6–12.
467 Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
469 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
470 Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010. It was submitted that Aboriginal Legal Aid should be given more funding.
consider that these challenges ought to be met as part of a broad integrated response to family violence. It is important for family violence legislation to allow expressly for courts making protection orders to impose conditions requiring persons to attend rehabilitation or counselling programs in appropriate circumstances—the details of which are set out below.

11.283 As stated in Chapter 7, common purposes of family violence legislation should be to prevent or reduce family violence and to ensure that persons who use family violence are made accountable for their conduct. One important way of achieving these objectives is to endeavour to rehabilitate the offender in order to stop the cycle, and intergenerational transmission, of violence.

11.284 Rehabilitation programs are an essential measure for treating the causes rather than the symptoms of family violence. While protection order conditions prohibiting or restricting a respondent’s contact with the victim may assist in reducing or preventing violence against that victim in the short term, successful participation by a respondent in appropriate and relevant rehabilitation and counselling programs has the advantage of targeting the long-term reduction or prevention of family violence—including as against persons other than the victim the subject of the protection order.

11.285 The Commissions note that there is a lack of consensus about the effectiveness of general or specific counselling and rehabilitation programs currently operating in Australia. A key feature of an integrated response is ongoing data collection and evaluation, with a view to system review and process improvements, and the Commissions consider that rehabilitation and counselling programs for persons who use family violence should be the subject of continuing monitoring and evaluation.

11.286 In the Commissions’ view, because some persons who use violence can benefit from rehabilitation or counselling programs, courts should be empowered to order a person against whom a protection order is made to attend such programs, where the person is suitable and eligible to participate. The fact that imposition of a rehabilitation or counselling order may be an option on sentencing should not preclude the availability of such options when a protection order is imposed. This is important for two reasons. First, not all conduct which gives rise to a protection order is criminal. Secondly, even if the offending conduct that gives rise to a protection order is criminal and is prosecuted, if the prosecution fails, protection order conditions aimed at rehabilitation could still be imposed.

---

473 Discussed in Ch 31.
Appropriate circumstances for imposition of such conditions

11.287 A court should have discretion as to whether to impose conditions requiring persons to attend rehabilitation or counselling programs, and as to whether to impose such orders on the making of an interim or final protection order.

11.288 In each case, the court should not make such an order without being satisfied that the person is a suitable person to participate, is eligible to participate, and the program is accessible to the person. The assessment for eligibility and suitability should be undertaken by an independent professional required to report to the court on this issue. Relevant considerations in assessing eligibility and suitability—which could be contained in regulations—should include whether the respondent consents to the order; the availability of transport; and the respondent’s work and educational commitments, cultural background and any disability. In general terms, the Commissions agree that consent is a necessary prerequisite to suitability to participate in such programs pursuant to the making of a protection order condition. Coercively-imposed rehabilitation programs are less likely to be effective.

11.289 Where such a condition is imposed on the making of an interim protection order, the completion of the program should be a factor in the court’s determination as to whether a final order is appropriate, the conditions in the final order and its duration.

Meeting practical challenges in implementation

11.290 Obviously, requiring a person to attend a rehabilitation or counselling program—whether as part of a protection order condition or as a sentencing option—assumes that such programs are available. As one District Court judge in WA commented:

> It is a tragedy of the criminal justice system in Western Australia that alcohol treatment programs and family violence counselling programs are not available in the more remote parts of the State. Judges involved in sentencing family violence offenders in the Kimberley, for example, realise that there is almost nothing in the community to support an offender who may be trying to heal the relationship and avoid alcohol.\(^{475}\)

11.291 It is essential that rehabilitation and counselling programs are: available and accessible, including in remote and regional areas; culturally appropriate; gender appropriate; relevant and targeted to the causes of offending behaviour. Achieving this aspiration will require funding, and the deployment of significant and appropriate resources to develop and conduct such programs, including the training of specialised personnel. A serious long-term integrated response to family violence demands no less a commitment.\(^{476}\)

Enforcement

11.292 In order for such orders to be effective, there need to be sanctions for failure to comply. There is, however, an understandable concern about criminalising breach of a

---

\(^{475}\) M Yeats, Correspondence, 23 December 2009.

\(^{476}\) Integrated responses are discussed in Ch 29.
condition to complete a rehabilitation or counselling program or to attend for assessment. As discussed in Chapter 12, breach of a protection order is a criminal offence and maximum terms of imprisonment vary across the jurisdictions from one year to five years imprisonment, and maximum fines vary from $2,400 to $44,000.

11.293 The Commissions consider that it is appropriate to restrict a court’s sentencing options for breaches of rehabilitation and counselling orders. The failure to attend such programs should not lead to imprisonment. The maximum penalty should be a fine, which is set at a lower level than the maximum penalty for breaching a protection order in the jurisdiction in which the breach occurs. On breach, courts should retain the discretion to adjourn the matter to allow an opportunity for compliance, having regard, for example, to the extent to which a program has been completed and to any difficulties that a person has faced in achieving compliance, such as medical reasons. In addressing appropriate financial penalties, courts should have regard to the potential adverse impact on the victim of violence.

Provision of information about programs

11.294 The Commissions acknowledge the concerns expressed by some stakeholders that the rehabilitation and counselling of those who use family violence require systemic address, and that the onus should not be placed on victims to suggest or seek that such persons are referred to these programs. Therefore the Commissions do not recommend that application forms specify conditions relating to rehabilitation or counselling nor allow a victim to indicate whether she or he wishes the court to encourage the aggressor to contact an appropriate referral service.

11.295 In the Commissions’ view it is incumbent on courts to provide persons against whom protection orders are made with information about relevant culturally and gender-appropriate rehabilitation and counselling programs where appropriate. This will involve developing or collating appropriate information and making it available in all court registries. One way of implementing this recommendation would be for this information to be attached to protection orders served on such persons.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Recommendation 11–11</th>
<th>State and territory family violence legislation should provide that:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(a)</td>
<td>courts have an express discretion to impose conditions on persons against whom protection orders are made requiring them to attend rehabilitation or counselling programs, where such persons have been independently assessed as being suitable and eligible to participate in such programs;</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

477 This is the case, for example, in Victoria with respect to failure to attend counselling—which attracts a fine of 10 penalty units, compared with the maximum fine of 240 penalty units for breaching a protection order: Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 37, 123, 130(4).
(b) the relevant considerations in assessing eligibility and suitability to participate in such programs should include: whether the respondent consents to the order; the availability of transport; and the respondent’s work and educational commitments, cultural background and any disability; and

(c) failure to attend assessment or to complete such a program should not attract a sentence of imprisonment, and the maximum penalty should be a fine capped at a lower amount than the applicable maximum penalty for breaching a protection order.

Recommendation 11–12 Where appropriate, state and territory courts should provide persons against whom protection orders are made with information about relevant culturally and gender-appropriate rehabilitation and counselling programs.

---

Other interactions between protection orders and sentencing

11.296 The discussion below addresses interactions between non-contact and place restriction orders imposed on sentencing, with similar conditions in protection orders; as well as the issue of taking protection order conditions into account in sentencing.

Non-contact orders

11.297 The Queensland sentencing legislation allows a court, on the sentencing of an offender for a personal offence, to make a non-contact order, which prohibits the offender, for a specified period, from:

- contacting the victim against whom the offence was committed; or someone who was with the victim when the offence was committed; and/or
- going to a stated place or within a stated distance of a specified place.478

11.298 However, that legislation prohibits such an order from being made if an order can be made under s 30 of the Queensland family violence legislation. Section 30 empowers a court to make a protection order on its own initiative when a person pleads guilty to, or is found guilty of, an offence that involves family violence.479

Place restriction orders

11.299 Place restriction orders are available as a sentencing option in NSW and Tasmania.480 In Tasmania, a court may make an ‘area restriction order’ if it finds a person guilty of an offence. An ‘area restriction order’ is an order that the offender

---

478 Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) ss 43B, 43C.
479 This provision is noted above in the section on making protection orders in criminal proceedings. Non-association orders are available in NSW as a sentencing option for any offence punishable by imprisonment for six months or more: Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 17A.
480 Ibid s 17A; Sentencing Act 1997 (Tas) s 70.
must not loiter in an area or class of area specified in the order at any time or during such periods as specified in the order.

11.300 In NSW, place restriction orders are only available on sentencing for offences punishable by imprisonment for six months or more. A place restriction order prohibits the offender from frequenting or visiting a specified place or district for a specified term and can be made by the court if it is satisfied that it is reasonably necessary to make such an order to ensure that the offender does not commit any further offences.481

11.301 Place restriction or area restriction orders imposed on sentencing for a family-violence related offence have the potential to overlap or conflict with conditions attached to a protection order prohibiting or restricting a person’s access to certain premises.

Submissions and consultations

11.302 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether there had been cases where there has been overlap or conflict between place restriction or area restriction orders imposed on sentencing and protection order conditions which prohibit or restrict the same person’s access to certain premises.482

11.303 Only a few submissions addressed this question. One stakeholder said that it had not seen this happen.483 The Queensland Law Society said many magistrates avoid distance or area restriction orders because they can be particularly difficult to enforce.484

11.304 A few stakeholders, however, submitted that there had been cases of such overlap or conflict.485 The Local Court of NSW submitted that this may arise ‘where a protection order is made at a different time to the sentencing for a criminal matter’, but that this was rare because in NSW the matters are dealt with together.486 Inconsistencies were more common, the Court submitted, ‘where police bail is granted when an existing protection order is in place’.487

11.305 National Legal Aid submitted that the risk of overlap or conflict should be minimised by ‘coordinated and appropriate information sharing processes between relevant agencies/courts’.488

Commissions’ views

11.306 As this issue does not appear to be a significant problem in practice, the Commissions make no specific recommendation in this regard. However, in any event, 481 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 17A(2).

482 Consultation Paper, Question 6–14.
485 Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
486 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010. See also Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
487 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
the Commissions consider that the potential for conflicting non-contact and place restriction conditions to be imposed is likely to be minimised if the recommendations made by the Commissions in Chapter 32, concerning specialised practices, are implemented. Of particular relevance are the recommendations about the use of specialised family violence courts with specialised judicial officers to deal with both protection order proceedings and criminal offences arising in a family violence context—as well as the mainstreaming of such specialist practices in other state and territory courts.

11.307 In addition, access to information on the proposed national protection order database may also go some way to avoiding the imposition of conditions on sentence which conflict with conditions contained in a protection order.\footnote{See Ch 30.}

Taking protection order conditions into account in sentencing

11.308 Another issue which arises on the sentencing of an offender for a family-violence related offence is the extent to which courts take into account the conditions that have been imposed by a protection order under family violence legislation. A related issue is whether courts should take protection order conditions into account in sentencing. The views of stakeholders on these two issues are canvassed below.

Whether protection order conditions are taken into account in practice

11.309 Prior to the release of the Consultation Paper, the Commissions heard in consultation that, in NSW, protection orders are regularly taken into account in sentencing. It is relevant for the court imposing sentence to know the length of the protection order and the extent of the prohibitions placed on the offender to be sentenced. If an order is very restrictive and lasts for an extended time it may influence the penalties to be imposed on sentencing. In addition, it is relevant for the court to know whether any rehabilitation was ordered as part of the protection order—in those jurisdictions where this is permissible—because if not, a condition to this effect may be appropriate in a good behaviour bond.\footnote{G Zdenkowski, Consultation, Sydney, 6 November 2009.}

11.310 The Commissions also heard that District Court judges who sentence offenders for family-violence related offences in WA have available to them a pre-sentence report, and that offenders are invariably represented by counsel. Therefore any existing protection orders are brought to the attention of the sentencing judge.\footnote{M Yeats, Correspondence, 23 December 2009.}

11.311 Some stakeholders expressed concern about attendance at rehabilitation programs or willingness to attend such programs being relied upon as mitigating factors in sentencing, in the absence of longitudinal evidence that such programs, in fact, reduce violence.\footnote{Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse, Consultation, Sydney, 27 January 2010.}

11.312 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether, in practice, courts sentencing offenders for family violence related offences are made aware of, and take... into account, any protection order conditions to which the offender to be sentenced is or has been subject. 493

11.313 Some submitted that courts are made aware of these conditions 494 and take them into account, 495 though one stakeholder questioned the weight courts give to the orders and related family violence convictions. 496 They are taken into account in NSW, it was submitted, because the matters are dealt with concurrently. 497

11.314 Others submitted that prosecutors 498 and ‘competent’ lawyers 499 will direct the court to these conditions. National Legal Aid submitted that prosecutors should inform the court of ‘all relevant facts surrounding charges arising from domestic violence incidents and restraining order breaches’. 500

11.315 Other stakeholders submitted that courts are not made aware of these conditions 501—or only where the charge relates to the breach of a protection order. 502 Both Legal Aid NSW and an advocacy service said police prosecutors will ordinarily give the magistrate a copy of a criminal record, but may not indicate whether a protection order is in place or has been in place. 503

11.316 National Legal Aid submitted that in imposing sentence, courts already have significant regard to the factor that offences have occurred in a domestic relationship and have particular concern when a restraining or protection order has been breached. 504

Whether protection order conditions should be taken into account in sentencing

11.317 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory legislation should provide that a court sentencing an offender for a family-violence related offence should take into account, in sentencing the offender:

(a) any protection order conditions to which the person being sentenced is subject, where those conditions arise out of the same or substantially the same conduct giving rise to the prosecution for the offence; and

(b) the duration of any protection order to which the offender is subject. 505

---

493 Consultation Paper, Question 6–13.
494 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
495 Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010;
Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
496 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
498 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
500 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
501 Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
503 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service
504 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
505 Consultation Paper, Proposal 6–12.
11.318 A significant number of stakeholders supported this proposal, and one submitted that the court should also be informed how to take the orders into account, because the orders ‘ought not be regarded as a mitigating factor’.

11.319 Two stakeholders noted that if the sentence is for a longer duration than the protection order, victims may wish to have protection orders extended so that the orders have the same duration as the sentence.

11.320 However, two stakeholders submitted that there appeared to be no need for the proposal, either because courts take these matters into account anyway or because it was covered in current sentencing legislation. The Local Court of NSW submitted that the current legislative provisions are operating well in practice.

Commissions’ views

11.321 Courts should consider any protection order conditions to which an offender to be sentenced for a family violence offence is subject, where those conditions arise out of the same or substantially the same conduct giving rise to the prosecution for the offence. It is particularly relevant for courts to take into account those conditions which may have caused significant hardship—such as exclusion orders. This approach is consistent with the ALRC recommendation, made in the ALRC’s 2006 report on the sentencing of federal offenders, that relevant sentencing factors include any detriment sanctioned by law to which the offender has been or will be subject.

11.322 To avoid making overlapping orders concerning rehabilitation or counselling programs, a court sentencing an offender must know whether the person has or is attending such a program pursuant to a protection order condition. It is also relevant, in this regard, for the court sentencing an offender for a family-violence related offence to take into account the duration of any protection order to which the offender is subject.

---

507 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

508 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

510 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.

11.323 A court’s legislative obligation to take such matters into account should be complemented by guidance in the proposed national bench book on family violence. \(^{512}\)

As recommended in Chapter 13, the national bench book should contain a section that addresses sentencing in family violence matters.

11.324 The Commissions note that some stakeholders have expressed the view that attendance at rehabilitation programs should not be a mitigating factor in sentencing. \(^{513}\)

In the Commissions’ view, whether or not attendance at a rehabilitation program can be treated as mitigating depends on a variety of factors—including whether the offender completed the program, whether there is evidence that the offender has changed his or her behaviour since the completion of the program, and the type and duration of the program. Completion of an intensive 12 month program may be more compelling than completion of a program that ran for one or two weeks. The Commissions consider that this is properly a matter for judicial discretion. Moreover, retaining judicial discretion in this way also serves to provide some incentive for those who commit family violence to participate in rehabilitation programs, thereby increasing the prospect of reducing family violence in the long term.

Recommendation 11–13 State and territory legislation should provide that a court sentencing an offender for a family-violence related offence should take into account:

(a) any protection order conditions to which the person being sentenced is subject, where those conditions arise out of the same or substantially the same conduct giving rise to the prosecution for the offence; and

(b) the duration of any protection order to which the offender is subject.

---

\(^{512}\) See Rec 31–2.

\(^{513}\) The Commissions discuss their views on aggravating and mitigating factors in Ch 13.
12. Breach of Protection Orders

Contents

Introduction 509
Aid and abet provisions 509
Public justice offences 520
Consent to breaches 526
Charging for breach of protection order rather than underlying offence 533
Penalties and sentencing for breach of protection orders 543

Introduction

12.1 In each state and territory jurisdiction a breach of a protection order is a criminal offence and, as such, can result in the parties to protection order proceedings entering into the criminal justice system—either as accused persons or witnesses.

12.2 This chapter discusses a number of issues relevant to breach of protection orders including aiding and abetting breaches, consent to breaches, charging practices, maximum penalties for breach, and sentencing practices.

Aid and abet provisions

12.3 An issue for this Inquiry is the extent to which police may threaten to or actually charge a victim with aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring a breach of a protection order where they believe the victim consented to the breach.

12.4 The Commissions have heard that victims in some jurisdictions, including Western Australia (WA), South Australia (SA) and Tasmania and are being charged with aiding and abetting breaches of protection orders or instigating such breaches. The WA review of family violence legislation found that police were sometimes charging victims, who had obtained protection orders and were deemed complicit in a breach of a protection order, with aiding and abetting the breach.

1 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
3 Magistrates Court, Consultation, Hobart, 13 May 2010.
In 2006, Professor David Brown and other criminal law academics commented that:

Until fairly recently, the long established common law position was that a person could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the commission of an offence of which he or she was the victim. In Tyrell [1894] 1 QB 710, the defendant, a girl under the age of 16, was charged with aiding and abetting the principal to have unlawful sexual intercourse with her. The court found that the defendant could not be guilty of aiding and abetting a crime aimed at protecting girls of her age from sexual intercourse. However, in a number of recent cases, the party for whose benefit an apprehended violence order ... was made has been convicted of aiding and abetting the criminal offence of breaching a domestic violence order.5

In Keane v Police, the Supreme Court of SA upheld the conviction of Keane for aiding and abetting the breach of a protection order. The order, protecting Keane, prohibited her partner Smith from being at premises where she resided and from communicating with her in any way. One year after the order was made, Keane telephoned her partner and requested him to look after their children the following day. Arrangements were made for her partner to collect the children from the residence of a third party. However, the partner arrived at Keane’s place, wanting to talk. Keane allowed him in. Her partner became abusive when Keane rejected his attempts at reconciliation. The police attended and both parties were charged—one with breach; the other with aiding and abetting the breach by contacting him and allowing him to enter her home. King AJ stated:

I cannot discern any provision or consideration of policy in the Domestic Violence Act giving rise to an implication excluding ordinary accessorl liability. There are reasons of justice and convenience why the ordinary principles should apply. Where an order is made for a person’s benefit, it would seem unjust that the person should be able to encourage or facilitate a breach of an order thereby causing another to commit an offence, but escape any liability. Moreover, on policy grounds, it is important that curial and police resources should not be wasted in obtaining and enforcing restraining orders, the breach of which the persons for whose benefit they are made, are willing to condone. In the present case, the appellant’s actions, in addition to causing distress to the children, resulted in the police having to come to the house to remove the offender.6

In a study of the policing of protection orders from the perspective of Indigenous women, Loretta Kelly nominates aiding and abetting charges as one manifestation of a bias against women who were known to have reconciled with their partners after a report of violence.7 She cites the following example:

Thelma was charged with aiding and abetting the defendant’s breach of the AVO against him. When she asked why she was being charged, the police responded: ‘we’re sick of this … you call the police but you’re having him back. Thelma corrected the police: ‘he doesn’t live with me, he just comes back here thinking he

---

6  Keane v Police (1997) 69 SASR 481, 484.
12. Breach of Protection Orders

12.8 One submission to the Victorian Law Reform Commission’s (VLRC) review of family violence laws pointed out:

The threat of being charged with breaching one’s own intervention order is a technique used by perpetrators of family violence to stop the protected person from reporting the breach of the order.\(^8\)

12.9 Both the New South Wales (NSW) Law Reform Commission and the VLRC have recommended against charging victims for whose benefit a protection order has been obtained for aiding and abetting a breach of such an order.\(^9\) The VLRC recommended that if the police believe that a victim has consented to a breach, they should explain the procedure for varying or revoking an order. If necessary, police should apply for a variation or revocation on behalf of the victim with his or her consent.\(^10\) The WA review recommended an amendment to the Criminal Code (WA) to preclude victims for whose benefit a protection order has been made from being charged with aiding and abetting a breach of the order.\(^11\) It also recommended that the court should be given power to grant leave to proceed in an application to vary or cancel a protection order, of its own motion, at the hearing of an allegation of a breach, where there is evidence of the person protected being complicit.\(^12\)

12.10 NSW family violence legislation provides that a victim for whose benefit a protection order is obtained cannot be charged with aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the breach of a protection order.\(^13\) The Victorian family violence legislation provides that a ‘protected person’ does not aid, abet, counsel or procure a breach because the protected person ‘encourages, permits or authorises conduct by the respondent’ that contravenes a protection order.\(^14\) That Act provides, for example, that a protected person is not guilty of aiding or abetting a breach because she or he ‘invited the respondent to have access to the residence’ or ‘allowed the respondent to spend time with the protected person’ in breach of a protection order. The Victorian Act also contains a note stating that, if a victim is dissatisfied with the terms of a protection order, the victim or the police may apply to have the order varied or revoked.\(^15\)

---

8 Ibid, 5.
14 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 14(7).
15 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 125.
16 Ibid note to s 125.
12.11 The family violence legislation of SA provides that a victim for whose benefit a protection order has been made cannot be guilty of aiding and abetting a breach of the order if the conduct constituting contravention of the intervention order did not constitute contravention of the order in respect of another person protected by the order or of any other intervention order (of which the person was or ought reasonably to have been aware) in force against the defendant and protecting another person.¹⁷

Submissions and consultations

Aid and abet provisions

12.12 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory legislation should be amended, where necessary, to provide that a person protected by a protection order under family violence legislation cannot be charged with or be found guilty of an offence of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the breach of a protection order.¹⁸

12.13 This proposal was broadly supported by the majority of stakeholders,¹⁹ although as set out below some stakeholders expressed dissent.

12.14 In addition to agreeing with the reasons set out in the Consultation Paper,²⁰ stakeholders advanced the following reasons for their support:

• It is the responsibility of the person against whom an order is made to adhere to its conditions. It is not the responsibility of the victim to ensure that it is not breached.²¹

¹⁷ Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 31(3).
²¹ Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
• Any evidence that a victim has played a role in the breach of a protection order is more appropriately taken into account in proceedings against the person who breached the order, rather than forming the basis for proceedings against the victim.22

12.15 The North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency (NAAJA) expressed the view that charging victims will not achieve anything, nor address the issues that parties are having, and emphasised the counter-productive consequences of excessive recourse to punitive criminal sanctions. It also stated:

Our concern with charging a party with aiding and abetting is that it oversimplifies a situation and does not take account of all of the factors that may lead a person to aid or abet a breach, such as that the victim (just as with the respondent) does not fully understand the exact terms of a domestic violence order. These factors are especially pressing in the cases of parties who speak English as a second, third or fourth language or who lack the functional English literacy skills to understand the complex English used in domestic violence orders. There are also instances where a victim may aid or abet a breach due to psychological manipulations. As there are instances when the order has been taken out not so much at the victim’s request, but at the instigation of a third party (such as police).23

We would be concerned that a policy of charging people with aiding and abetting in any of these circumstances would result in unjust prosecutions.24

12.16 One legal service provider also supported the proposal on the basis that charging victims for breach of a protection order would have particularly negative ramifications for Indigenous women in remote communities, due to a number of factors including that many Indigenous women:

• have an order imposed by police application and may not have consented to its issue;

• have difficulty in understanding the legal process, including the consequences of a protection order, given that English may not be their first language, and there is a lack of access to persons to explain legal processes as magistrates may only be available once per month in remote community courts; and

• have significant pressure put on them from their extended family and community ‘not to get Indigenous men in trouble with the law’ and so ‘may not be in a position to tell the defendant to go away even with the [protection order] in place’.25

22 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010. A magistrate also expressed the view that a court should be able to take the conduct of the victim into account on sentencing for breach of an order: A Cannon, Submission FV 137, 23 June 2010.

23 The concern about the impact of such a provision on victims when they may not have had a say in an order being issued was echoed in another consultation: Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Consultation, Darwin, 26 May 2010.

12.17 One Tasmanian magistrate expressed concern that charging victims for instigating breach of protection orders could deter them from reporting family violence in the future—a concern echoed by NAAJA.

12.18 The Queensland Law Society, which supported the proposal, noted that anecdotally, clients have reported threats of these prosecutions have arisen in cases of no contact clauses where the victim has spoken to the perpetrator.

12.19 In contrast, a number of stakeholders opposed the proposal. National Legal Aid opposed the proposal although it stated that a number of women have been charged in WA with being parties to breach of a protection order in cases where it was apparent that the woman was a genuine victim of family violence and the threat or reality of charges only served to undermine their confidence in the legal/justice system.

12.20 National Legal Aid provided the following case study to illustrate this point:

An Aboriginal woman living in the Pilbara had been in a long-term violent relationship. After being physically assaulted again, she obtained an interim violence restraining order against her partner on the advice of the police. Some weeks later after pressure from extended family and her children she allowed her partner to attend her house to see the children. Her partner again assaulted her and the police were called to the house. The police charged her partner with assault and breach of the restraining order. The woman was also charged with breach of restraining order as a party to the offence. She pleaded guilty and was given a fine. She remarked to the refuge that she would never seek a protection order again.

12.21 National Legal Aid identified a further problem with protected persons being charged with breaches—they are potentially liable ‘to receive a record for a violent offence with all the potential consequences. Any criminal record is unlikely to specify that the person is a protected person charged as being party to a breach’.

12.22 Despite these concerns, National Legal Aid expressed the views of the Legal Aid Commission Tasmania in opposing the proposal—views which were substantially echoed by the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas). In summary, both submissions noted that the benefits of the system in place in Tasmania under the Safe at Home program which allows, in appropriate cases, victims who invite or encourage a respondent to breach a protection order to be charged with ‘Commit Simple Offence’. The penalties are, legislatively and in practice, less than those imposed for the actual breach. Most often no conviction is imposed on an undertaking not to commit a

---

26 Magistrates Court, Consultation, Hobart, 13 May 2010.
29 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010; One in Three Campaign, Submission FV 35, 12 May 2010.
30 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
31 Ibid.
32 Ibid.
12. Breach of Protection Orders similar offence for 6 or 12 months. This reflects, and provides an opportunity to explain to the protected person, the importance of a number of points, …

• orders have the effect of limiting someone’s freedom, to a greater or lesser degree. … If you have the benefit of a protection order that limits someone else’s freedom, you have the responsibility not to do anything that invites or encourages a breach of that order; …

• orders can usually be changed to allow the protected person to do what needs to be done. It is, however, a process, and takes time. There may need to be a good, objective reason to think that things have changed before the order can be changed;

• when there are children in the household … the order is in place not just to protect the protected person, but also to protect children from witnessing or being caught up in any more incidents of family violence and suffering harm. By undermining the effectiveness of the order, a victim may be seen to be exposing the children to risk of harm.33

12.23 The Law Society of New South Wales submitted that police should have the option to charge in exceptional circumstances.34

12.24 Toni Maclean, a partner violence counsellor opposed the proposal, submitting that:

This is a situation which I encountered repeatedly as a case manager for NSW Community Offender Services. Female victims of partner violence, for a range of reasons, were frequently observed to encourage the offending partner in actions which put the offender in breach of the protection order.35

12.25 The One in Three Campaign submitted that the proposal appears to ignore the serious issue of malicious aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring of the breach of a protection order. We have heard many reports of persons who have breached a protection order after the person protected by such an order maliciously aided and abetted its breach with the intent of harming the other person.36

Variation or revocation of protection order in proceedings for breach

12.26 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory family violence legislation should empower a court hearing an allegation of breach of a protection order to grant leave to proceed in an application to vary or cancel the protection order of its own motion where: (a) there is evidence that the victim for whose benefit the protection order was made gave free and voluntary consent to the breach; and (b) the court is satisfied that the victim wants to vary or revoke the protection order.37

33  Ibid. See also Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
34  Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
35  T McLean, Submission FV 204, 28 June 2010.
36  One in Three Campaign, Submission FV 35, 12 May 2010.
12.27 Stakeholder views on this proposal were divided. Many stakeholders—including a number of legal service providers that made confidential submissions—expressed support. Others expressed qualified support including on the basis that the same tests for varying or revoking a protection order are applied, the court is satisfied that the victim has not been coerced, intimidated or otherwise manipulated, and has indeed explicitly consented.

12.28 For example, National Legal Aid submitted that it would support the proposal on the basis that there is an appropriate process to ensure that the consent of the victim is truly consent and the court could still make orders that are necessary and desirable to protect the victim and any affected children from further violence.

12.29 One confidential submission stated:

The idea of free and voluntary consent when we are discussing victims of domestic and family violence is not entirely accurate and courts should not cancel protection orders without first taking into account the dynamic of power and control that exists within these relationships. Cancelling or amending a protection order should be done with care and consideration and support should be provided to the protected person to ensure that her voice is heard away from the perpetrator of such violence.

12.30 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria submitted that ‘there should be an obligation to refer the victim for independent legal advice’ to allow the Court to satisfy itself that there is no duress involved. Berry Street Inc, in expressing reservations about the proposal due to the possibility of victim coercion, stated that ‘a more cautious approach would be to counsel and support a victim to apply for a variation or to revoke the protection order if that is their preferred course of action’.

12.31 A few stakeholders opposed the proposal. Legal Aid NSW submitted:

If the defendant is found guilty of breaching a protection order, the fact that the victim may have consented to the breach or wishes to vary the order does not modify the fact

---

38 J Stubbs, Submission FV 186, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010. This submission pointed out, for example, that Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 36, significantly, only allows a court to revoke a protection order if the court considers the safety of the aggrieved or a named person would not be compromised by the revocation.

41 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. A similar view was expressed in Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

42 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.

that the defendant is guilty and should take responsibility for those actions. If the victim wants to vary or revoke the order they can make a separate application to do so and it is not appropriate to consider varying or revoking the order whilst hearing an allegation regarding a breach of that order.46

12.32 Women’s Legal Services NSW expressed concern that providing the court with this power would place a victim at risk of being pressured, in the midst of a hearing to agree to changes in a protection order that are not in their best interests.47

12.33 The Victorian Government queried that part of the proposal regarding ‘consent of a victim to a breach’ as the order is between the court and the respondent.48

12.34 While not specifically addressing the proposal, NAAJA highlighted difficulties that arise, especially in remote communities, with regard to the variation and revocation of protection orders:

Parties often reconcile and resume their relationship without amending or seeking the revocation of an order that prohibits contact. Parties often lack the knowledge of what steps they need to take to seek a variation or revocation of the order. They have no culturally-appropriate legal services that they can seek advice or assistance from. Or they are so alienated and disenfranchised from the conventional court process that they would rather run the risk of breaching an order than voluntarily attend court to bring an application to vary or revoke an order.

An additional issue contributing to this problem is the infrequency with which courts sit in remote communities. A bush court may sit on a monthly, bi-monthly or three monthly basis. This means that it is simply [impossible] for remote residents to seek variations of orders in a timely manner. This again leaves defendants open to breaching orders.49

Commissions’ views

Aid and abet provisions

12.35 On balance, the Commissions remain of the view that relevant state and territory legislation—whether family violence legislation or criminal legislation—should be amended to provide that a person protected by a protection order under family violence legislation cannot be charged with, be or found guilty of, an offence of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the breach of such an order.

12.36 The capacity to charge victims of family violence for breach of a protection order undermines the policy intent of family violence legislation.50 As stated by Brown and other criminal law academics:

While the frustration and concern for ‘wasted resources’ on the part of police can be appreciated, it is questionable whether the practice of laying breach charges against the person for whose benefit the order has been made is likely to advance the

---

46 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
50 The purposes of family violence legislation are discussed in Ch 4.
12.37 Charging victims of family violence for aiding and abetting breaches of orders exposes them to further traumatisation, potentially imposing a further form of abuse and undermining their confidence in the legal system. It may deter victims from reporting future occurrences of family violence, and may also have particular deleterious outcomes for Indigenous victims of family violence.

12.38 Moreover, it is inappropriate to charge a victim with aiding and abetting breaches of protection orders because it overshadows the fact that a protection order is made against a person who uses family violence—not the victim.

12.39 In coming to this view the Commissions have considered the concerns expressed by the One in Three Campaign about instances of victims maliciously inducing a breach of a protection order. Empirically, the Commissions are unaware of the frequency with which victims do so. On one view, whether such occurrences are exceptional or more frequent does not detract from the position that there should be some form of recourse within the law to deal with such situations.

12.40 One option to address this concern would be to create an offence of maliciously inducing a breach of a protection order. The offence would need to be tightly defined to cover situations where the victim intentionally sought to induce a breach of a protection order accompanied by malice or an intention to subvert the order of the court. Its creation would not be intended to cover ambiguous situations where a victim may have initiated or acquiesced to contact for non-malicious reasons, such as attempting reconciliation or bowing to pressure from extended family or friends to give the person the subject of the order another chance, or through lack of understanding of the legal process. Rather, the intention of creating such an offence would be to preserve the option of charging victims in those exceptional situations where victims seek to abuse the criminal justice system.

12.41 However, the Commissions have reservations about the creation of such an offence at this time. First and foremost, they are concerned that the creation of such an offence may create a significant risk that, in practice, victims will be charged in inappropriate cases. In expressing this concern, the Commissions note the comments of National Legal Aid about the inappropriate laying of charges of accessorial liability on genuine victims of family violence in WA.

12.42 Second, the Commissions are not presently convinced that the creation of such an offence is necessary, in light of the fact that there are existing criminal offences directed at the abuse of the criminal justice system, such as public justice offences concerning perverting the course of justice—for example, committing acts or omissions with intent in any way whatever to obstruct, prevent, pervert, or defeat the due course of justice or the administration of the law—52—which may be utilised in situations, for example, where a victim maliciously induces a breach of a protection order with the specific intention of having the person subject to the conditions of the order charged with its breach. There are also offences such as making false accusations, 53 conspiring to bring false accusations, 54 fabricating evidence, 55 or giving false evidence or making a false statement, 56 which may also have a role to play in cases of malicious behaviour.

---

12.43 It may be appropriate, however, for a charge of aiding and abetting a breach to be laid against persons other than the victim for whose benefit a protection order is made. For example, the SA family violence legislation provides that if a protection order prohibits a ‘defendant from being on rented premises at which a protected person resides’ and the landlord had been notified of the prohibition, the landlord is guilty of an offence if he or she assists the defendant to access those premises. 57

Variation or revocation of protection order in proceedings for breach

12.44 The Commissions acknowledge the concerns expressed by stakeholders about empowering a court to vary or revoke a protection order when hearing an allegation of breach of a protection order in circumstances where there is evidence that the victim has given free and voluntary consent to the conduct constituting breach, and the court is satisfied that the victim would like to vary or revoke the order.

12.45 The Commissions agree that applications to vary or revoke protection orders should be considered separately from hearings concerning breach of protection orders, and that conflating the two issues may risk victims being pressured to agree to variations or revocations which are not in their best interests. Accordingly, the Commissions do not make a recommendation in this regard.

12.46 However, the Commissions emphasise that, in appropriate circumstances, family violence advocates and services should support and counsel victims to apply for variations or revocations where: that course of action represents the outcome that they genuinely wish for; is in their best interests; and is uninfluenced by coercion or control on the part of persons against whom protection orders were made.

Recommendation 12–1
State and territory legislation should provide that a person protected by a protection order under family violence legislation cannot be charged with or found guilty of an offence of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the breach of a protection order.
Public justice offences

12.47 Public justice offences can be broadly described as including offences targeting interference with: the administration of justice, judicial officers, jurors and witnesses; as well as perjury and the making of false statements. A corollary to charging victims of family violence with aiding and abetting the breach of a protection order is charging such victims with public justice offences—such as conspiracy to pervert the course of justice for conduct engaged in by them to reduce the culpability of the offender—such as withdrawing their statements.

12.48 The crime of conspiracy is committed where two or more people agree to commit a crime or other unlawful act. 58 On a charge of conspiracy the prosecution must prove the fact of the agreement. 59 Conspiracy originated as an offence to punish persons who entered into agreements to abuse the criminal process by bringing false criminal charges against other people. 60 Conspiracy is a common law offence, and the penalty is within the judicial officer’s discretion. However, statutes set out some particular conspiracies with specific penalties. 61

12.49 While conspiracy may be unrelated to issues arising from the breach of a protection order, it is convenient to deal with it here because of the potential similarities in the policy issues applicable to aiding and abetting the breach of a protection order.

12.50 Below is a case study concerning a victim of severe family violence who was prosecuted for conspiracy. The case study is based on a transcript of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation’s 7.30 Report 62 and comments made on the ALRC’s Family Violence Online Forum. 63 At the time of writing the remarks on sentencing were unavailable.

---

59 Ibid, 1092.
60 Ibid, 1088.
61 For example the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 321C sets out various penalties for conspiracy to commit an offence, depending on the offence.
63 Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.
Case study

In March 2010 a victim of family violence, Deanne Bridgland, was found guilty of conspiracy and attempting to pervert the course of justice, following a five week trial. She was sentenced in the County Court of Victoria to a two year suspended sentence.

Ms Bridgland had been subjected to severe family violence—described by one psychologist as some of the worst that she had ever come into contact with. Her partner—Nicholas Pasinas—had repeatedly bashed her and, on two occasions, snapped her arms. He had also repeatedly raped her and locked her in the garage with her mouth taped shut. Mr Pasinas was remanded in custody for serious assault charges, and despite a protection order being made against him, he called Ms Bridgland up to 12 times a day, and arranged to have her followed.

The police recorded his phone calls to her in which he persuaded her to withdraw her statement against him. While in prison he arranged for a friend of his—Paul Coralis—to pick her up and take her to the police station where she provided police with a statement of ‘non-complaint’ against him, pursuant to his instructions. Evidence was led that she had no choice but to give the statement. She also provided a letter supporting his release on bail. A psychologist commented that Ms Bridgland did what she did ‘in order to survive’. The police officer who laid the charges reportedly testified that she thought Ms Bridgland would be killed if she did not escape the relationship. Ms Bridgland was known to be suffering from battered woman syndrome and learned helplessness.

Ms Bridgland was essentially charged with agreeing with her partner to aid him in either having him released from prison or in reducing his culpability. Her lawyers requested the prosecution not to proceed with the charges on the basis that there was no public interest in prosecuting her. The prosecution refused. Mr Pasinas pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge and helped the prosecution in its case against Ms Bridgland, for which he received a discount on sentence—his sentence was cut in half to two and a half years imprisonment with a 15 month non-parole period.

12.51 In a submission to this Inquiry, National Legal Aid stated that, in WA it was very common for victims of family violence to resile from or change earlier statements against their partners ‘due to the nature of family violence and the dynamics of the relationships between victims and abusers’. National Legal Aid expressed a concern that ‘police sometimes charge women where it seems that the change in their statements arises from factors such as fear and misplaced loyalty’. It suggested that such concern be met by educating police and prosecutors about the dynamics of family violence.\(^{65}\)

Submissions and consultations

12.52 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory criminal legislation should be amended to ensure that victims of family violence cannot be charged with, or be found guilty of, offences, such as conspiracy or attempting to pervert the course of justice—where the conduct alleged to constitute such offences is essentially engaged in by victims to reduce or mitigate the culpability of the offender. The Commissions also proposed that legislative reform in this area should be reinforced by appropriate directions in police codes of practice, or operating procedures and prosecutorial guidelines or policies.\(^{66}\)

12.53 This proposal was supported by the majority of stakeholders who addressed it.\(^{67}\) For example, in a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others stated that:

> We strongly support this proposal for the reasons given in the Consultation Paper … As [we and others] are advocating currently in our joint response to the issues raised by the Deanne Bridgland case, the associated non-legislative changes must include enhanced linkages and cooperation between the police, prosecutors, the courts, corrections and service providers, so that all these agencies are engaged to the fullest extent possible in the integrated response to family violence and so that they remain informed about, and participate in, family violence reform initiatives.\(^{68}\)

12.54 In a confidential submission, one legal service provider, which supported the proposal stated:

> Victims need active support, not threats, to maintain their proceedings against perpetrators. It is understandable that police, trying to achieve justice and protection, may want to use such a blunt approach—making victims more frightened of the police than their ex-partner can seem logical on a level. The problems with this are clear, as \(^{65}\) Ibid. A similar concern about the charging of victims with giving false testimony and perverting the course of justice when they withdraw complaints of family violence was also raised in Roundtable, Consultation, Hobart, 13 May 2010.

12. Breach of Protection Orders

the Commissions point out. However, it is not enough just to remove this threat. These women need active support. We have observed the police prosecutor in criminal law proceedings speaking to the women in a way that appears to be discouraging them from pursuing charges, or at least encouraging them to agree to some kind of plea bargain where the evidence is overwhelmingly in her favour.69

12.55 However, a number of stakeholders opposed the proposal 70 or otherwise expressed concern about its ‘wide-ranging nature’ and indicated a preference for appropriate police codes of practice or operating procedures and prosecutorial guidelines. 71 For example, the NSW Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW ODPP) did not support for the proposal for two reasons:

First it would have the effect of creating a class of witnesses who, as they cannot be prosecuted for perjury, would (in all likelihood) be subjected to cross-examination to that effect which could undermine their credibility. Secondly, there will be cases where it would be appropriate to prosecute for perjury, if not to do so would otherwise bring the criminal justice system into disrepute.

It is not the ODPP’s practice, as a rule, to prosecute victims of family violence for conduct that may reduce or mitigate the culpability of the offender. In our view current ODPP Prosecution Guidelines adequately address this situation. 72

12.56 The Law Society of New South Wales also opposed the proposal.

The threat of criminal prosecution can work towards ensuring the integrity of the judicial process, and be an incentive for a witness to tell the truth. The making of an apprehended violence order has implications and may lead to criminal sanctions including imprisonment if breached.

It is acknowledged that the prospect of a genuine victim of domestic violence being prosecuted and facing criminal sanction for minimising the role of the perpetrator is to be avoided. This is a matter for the courts to determine in the circumstances of each case. It is more dangerous for the Government to legislate away this incentive to tell the truth. It undermines the judicial process to do so. 73

Commissions’ views

12.57 The Commissions have grave concerns about the practice of charging and prosecuting victims of family violence for conspiracy or attempting to pervert the course of justice in relation to conduct engaged in by them to mitigate the culpability of family violence offenders when their conduct can be attributed to the dynamics of duress and coercion exercised over them by such offenders.

70 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010.
72 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010. The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines contains Appendix E—a protocol for reviewing domestic violence offences. This covers, for example, the reasons why a victim of family violence may request that a prosecution is discontinued, the circumstances which a prosecutor must consider in determining the basis for a victim’s wish not to proceed, and the factors a prosecutor must consider in assessing the circumstances of a case which a victim wishes to discontinue.
73 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
12.58 The charging and prosecution of victims of family violence for conduct seemingly undertaken by them to mitigate the culpability of offenders ignores the nature of family violence—particularly the features of coercion and control, the damaging psychological impact that this has on victims, as well as the fear which it instils. It also overlooks the cyclical and complicated nature of family violence relationships, ‘which often lead victims to withdraw charges or understate the harm of particular conduct during periods of calm in their relationship’.

12.59 The legal system—including police, prosecutors and courts—should not be used to re-traumatise victims of family violence. The focus of the criminal justice response to family violence should be to make offenders accountable. It is difficult to conceive what public interest is served by the prosecution of victims of family violence for offences arising out of their conduct in seemingly agreeing to mitigate the culpability of offenders, when the nature of such ‘agreement’ in a family violence context is clouded by issues concerning duress, coercion, and learned helplessness.

12.60 However, the Commissions acknowledge the concerns expressed by some stakeholders that the retention of such offences in the family violence context may be appropriate for exceptional cases—and that to remove the application of such offences to a particular class of persons may undermine the judicial process and bring the criminal justice system into disrepute. Accordingly, the Commissions do not make any recommendations for legislative reform in this area.

12.61 In coming to this view, the Commissions are also mindful of their recommendation that state and territory legislation should provide that a person protected by a protection order cannot be charged with or be found guilty of an offence of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the breach of a protection order. As discussed above, the Commissions consider that for those exceptional cases where a victim may have acted maliciously in inciting a breach of a protection order it may be appropriate for prosecutors or police to consider the application of general public justice offences.

12.62 While the Commissions do not make any recommendations for legislative reform, they do, however, emphasise the critical importance of education, training and cultural change in this area. A scenario such as that which unfolded in the Deanne Bridgland case is a striking example in point. It is imperative that police and prosecutors receive training in the dynamics of family violence to enable them to assess properly the contextual background in which a victim may be seen to be acting in a way to reduce or mitigate the culpability of an offender. In particular, police and prosecutors need to be trained in how the dynamics of family violence might affect the decisions of victims of family violence to negate the existence of such violence or to withdraw previous allegations of violence.

75 In Ch 31, the Commissions make a general recommendation that covers training police and prosecutors in the dynamics of family violence.
12.63 Such training should be reinforced by appropriate directions and guidance in police codes of practice or operating procedures, and in prosecutorial guidelines or policies. For example, it appears to the Commissions that any decisions to charge or prosecute victims with public justice offences—such as conspiracy or attempts to pervert the course of justice, where the conduct alleged to constitute such offences is essentially conduct engaged in by a victim to reduce or mitigate the culpability of an offender—should only be approved at the highest levels within state or territory police services and by directors of public prosecution. Requiring scrutiny of such decisions by senior persons should reduce the likelihood of charges being laid and prosecutions launched in inappropriate cases which do not serve the public interest.

12.64 Further, police should be trained about the appropriate content of ‘statements of no complaint’. Such statements are often obtained by police attesting to the fact that a victim does not wish to pursue criminal charges—for a variety of legitimate reasons. For example, the Commissions have heard about the tension in Indigenous communities arising from the need to keep women safe but also keeping young Indigenous men out of prison, particularly in light of their being over-represented in the prison system—a factor which renders some victims reluctant to pursue criminal action. In particular, police should not encourage victims to attest that no family violence occurred when the evidence clearly points to the contrary. Including such assertions in ‘statements of no complaint’—in the absence of a sophisticated and informed understanding of why a victim of family violence may wish to negate that violence occurred or to withdraw previous statements made—sets victims up for perjury charges.

Recommendation 12–2 Federal, state and territory police, and directors of public prosecution should train or ensure that police and prosecutors respectively receive training on how the dynamics of family violence might affect the decisions of victims to negate the existence of family violence or to withdraw previous allegations of violence.

Recommendation 12–3 Police codes of practice or operating guidelines, and prosecutorial policies should ensure that any decisions to charge or prosecute victims of family violence with public justice offences—such as conspiracy or attempts to pervert the course of justice, where the conduct alleged to constitute such offences is essentially conduct engaged in by a victim to reduce or mitigate the culpability of an offender—should only be approved at the highest levels within state or territory police services, and by directors of public prosecution, respectively.

76 Confidential, Consultation, Darwin, 27 May 2010.
Recommendation 12–4  Police should be trained about the appropriate content of ‘statements of no complaint’ in which victims attest to the fact that they do not wish to pursue criminal action. In particular, police should not encourage victims to attest that no family violence occurred when the evidence clearly points to the contrary.

Consent to breaches

12.65 There is no defence of consent to breach of a protection order in any Australian state or territory. In 1999, the Domestic Violence Legislation Working Group noted in its Report on Model Domestic Violence Laws that stakeholders expressed concern that ‘consent’ to a breach may often have been a response to fear or a threat.77 The WA family violence legislation was amended in 2004 to remove the defence of consent to a breach. It was thought that the removal would reduce the potential for parties to abuse the restraining order process by giving, and then withdrawing consent, or by asserting consent as a reason for breach of the order.78

12.66 Removal of consent as a defence also sought to signal to the community that a protection order is an order of the court and not an agreement between the parties.79

12.67 A related issue that arises on breach of a protection order is whether it is inappropriate to allow a person who has used violence to rely on the consent of the victim to the breach of the order as a mitigating factor in sentencing. The WA review of family violence legislation found that although consent could no longer be relied upon as a defence to a breach, consent was still being raised by way of a plea of mitigation and accepted by courts.

Police prosecutors have reported that part of the problem is that on a plea of guilty to breach of a restraining order the respondent can plead in mitigation that the protected person invited the breach. The prosecutor, in the context of a busy court list, has no notation to that effect on his brief and, rather than set it down for a defended hearing, may feel pressured to allow sentencing to proceed on that basis. This is compounded when many magistrates take a very dim view of the respondent being charged at all in the circumstances and have demanded to know of the police whether the person protected by the restraining order has been charged.80

12.68 The WA review recommended that consent be removed as a mitigating factor in sentencing on conviction for breach of a protection order.81

78  Explanatory Memorandum, Acts Amendment (Domestic Violence) Bill 2004 (WA), cl 41.
81  Ibid, Rec 4.
Submissions and consultations

How consent is dealt with in practice

12.69 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether in practice: (a) persons who breach protection orders raise consent of the victim to the breach as a mitigating factor in sentencing; and (b) courts are treating such consent as a mitigating factor in sentencing.\(^\text{82}\)

12.70 The majority of submissions which addressed these questions stated that, in practice, persons who breach protection orders raise consent of the victim to the breach as a mitigating factor in sentencing, and that courts treat such consent as mitigating.\(^\text{83}\)

For example, National Legal Aid submitted that:

There is concern that in some jurisdictions Magistrates are treating consent of the victim as a mitigating factor in sentencing, even when it is apparent that the consent is not genuine.\(^\text{84}\)

12.71 Both Legal Aid NSW and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network submitted that:

[In our experience] defendants who breach protection orders are arguing that the consent of the victim should be a mitigating factor in sentencing. They are effectively arguing that the victim is responsible for the breach as they invited the defendant to engage in the breaching behaviour. It is our understanding that NSW Local Courts are treating consent of the victim as a mitigating factor in sentencing.\(^\text{85}\)

12.72 The Local Court of NSW submitted:

It is not unknown for persons charged with breaching a protection order in NSW to raise the consent of the victim as a mitigating factor in sentencing, and it is taken into account by the Court as such. A fact scenario that frequently arises in cases involving a breach of a protection order is where the protected person has initiated a breach by making contact with the defendant or inviting the defendant to the protected person’s home.\(^\text{86}\)

\(^{82}\) Consultation Paper, Question 6–15.

\(^{83}\) Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010. The Commissions also heard in consultation that courts take into account the victim’s consent to a breach as a mitigating factor in sentencing: Roundtable, Consultation, Hobart, 13 May 2010.

\(^{84}\) National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

\(^{85}\) Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

\(^{86}\) Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
12.73 Women’s Legal Service Queensland also noted that, in its experience, consent of the victim to the breach of the protection order ‘is often raised by the police’.87

12.74 One legal service provider submitted that courts treated consent as a mitigating factor in sentencing only ‘in some cases’,88 and another legal service provider submitted that consent of the victim was not treated as the primary consideration in sentencing.

The fact that it is a breach of a court order and what the actual breach was constituted by are far more important in practice.89

12.75 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others suggested that ‘there may be a need for a separate research study or consultation in this area’.90

How consent should be treated

12.76 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether state and territory family violence legislation or sentencing legislation should prohibit a court from considering the consent of a victim to breach of a protection order as a mitigating factor in sentencing.91

12.77 Stakeholder opinions on this issue were divided. Many stakeholders did not agree that a court should be prohibited from considering the consent of a victim to a breach of a protection order as a mitigating factor in sentencing.92 The reasons advanced by stakeholders in this regard focused on considerations of fairness and the preservation of court discretion. For example, both Legal Aid NSW and the Law Society of New South Wales submitted that:

As a matter of fairness this should be available to be put in mitigation. If such consent is obtained through intimidation it will carry little weight. If however, it is genuinely given, it obviously mitigates the seriousness of the offence.93

87 Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010. A similar view was expressed in Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.
88 Confidential, Submission FV 77, 2 June 2010.
91 Consultation Paper, Question 6–16.
92 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010; A Lamb, Submission FV 121, 16 June 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Magistrates Court, Consultation, Hobart, 13 May 2010.
93 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
12.78 One legal service provider stated in a confidential submission that:

It is our view that courts should take the time to consider the range of circumstances applying to situations where the perpetrator asserts there was consent. It is a fact that individuals, do at times, abuse the system of [domestic violence orders] and obtain them when they are not actually afraid of the ‘perpetrator’ and use them for vengeful purposes. This is rare and should not be considered a likely scenario in the average contested breach. However, for the perpetrator to be not allowed to raise the initiating contact etc would seem unjust.94

12.79 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that it was justified for courts to take consent into account:

Generally speaking, the fact of agreement (unless the situation deteriorates into another violent/abusive incident) means that the breach is not as distressing for the victim as it would be if it was not agreed. The degree of distress/harm cause must be relevant to sentencing (but not guilt).95

12.80 A number of stakeholders emphasised that judicial discretion should not be limited by such a prohibition,96 and that judicial officers should have the ‘utmost flexibility’ in sentencing such matters.97 For example, the Law Society of New South Wales submitted that ‘the danger … is that in enacting such a provision the legislators would be taking away from the courts the ability to determine each case on its merits’.98 Stubbs suggested that ‘it would be better for judicial officers to be adequately trained as to how to take account of this matter in sentencing rather than to limit their discretion in this way’.99

12.81 Similarly, the Local Court of NSW cautioned against the removal of such discretion:

Due to the complex and diverse nature of family relationships, in the Court’s submission it would be ill-advised to prevent the courts from taking into account the conduct of the victim that contributes to an offence in the course of sentencing.100

12.82 Other stakeholders submitted that a court should be able to take the conduct101 or the consent of a victim into account as a matter relevant to sentencing, without expressly stating that such conduct or consent should always be treated as a mitigating factor in sentencing.102 For example, National Legal Aid submitted that a court should be able to take into account the full range of circumstances relating to the offence,

---

95 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
97 A Lamb, Submission FV 121, 16 June 2010.
98 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
100 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
102 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
including any genuine consent of the victim to a breach of the protection order. The issue then becomes one of weight to be given to the matter, as noted by the Local Court of NSW:

In taking into account the consent of the victim, it is, of course a matter for the Court’s discretion in determining what weight to attribute to the fact on sentencing. For instance, in the event of a protected person inviting the offender to her or his home in contravention of a condition not to approach the protected person, and the offender subsequently committing an act of physical violence against the protected person one might expect that the victim’s initiation of the original breach might carry limited, if any, weight, as a mitigating factor.

12.83 Two stakeholders expressed qualified support for the proposition that a court should be able to take into account on sentencing the consent of a victim to a breach of a protection order. Support was expressed on the express proviso that the court is satisfied that the victim’s consent was given willingly and without coercion.

12.84 Other stakeholders submitted that courts should be prohibited from considering the consent of a victim to breach. Reasons advanced for this position included that:

- it is the responsibility of a defendant to abide by an order;
- the victim’s consent is ‘irrelevant’;
- ‘any consideration of whether conduct is a breach of that order should focus only on the behaviour of the person subject to that order’.

12.85 The Victorian Government noted that the order is between the court and the respondent, and submitted that:

Making the victim accountable for actions of the respondent may undermine the respondent’s accountability and re-victimise the victim and considering the consent of a victim as a mitigating factor may prevent the victim from reporting to police.

Commissions’ views

12.86 Under ordinary sentencing principles courts are usually required to take into account the nature and circumstances of an offence, and the impact of an offence on... a victim.\footnote{For example, \textit{Sentencing Act 1991} (Vic) s 5(2)(d)(a); \textit{Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005} (ACT) s 33(1)(f).} On balance, the Commissions consider that for legislation to prohibit a court from considering all of the circumstances of an offence of breaching a protection order would represent an inappropriate fetter on judicial discretion, and an unjustified departure from ordinary sentencing principles. A relevant—although not necessarily mitigating—consideration in assessing all of the circumstances of an offence involving breach of a condition prohibiting contact with a victim is whether the victim initiated contact or gave free and voluntary consent to such contact. The fact that a victim’s consent may have been coerced is likely to be a relevant consideration in assessing all of the circumstances of an offence. Indeed, the fact that an offender coerced consent should disqualify consent in such circumstances from being considered as mitigating—and, depending on the seriousness of the offence—may entitle a judicial officer, on the facts of a particular matter, to treat such coercion as aggravating.

12.87 The Commissions agree with the view expressed by the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), that the issue of whether a victim genuinely agreed to prohibited contact has a direct bearing on his or her level of distress caused by the contact, and therefore on the impact of the breach. On this analysis too, a victim’s consent to prohibited contact is, at least, a relevant factor in sentencing.

12.88 Therefore, the Commissions are of the view that courts should be able to take the fact of a victim’s consent to contact in breach of a protection order into account in sentencing, and to determine what weight to give that fact in the circumstances of a particular case. The Commissions’ approach is consistent with that taken in guidelines for sentencing for breach of protection orders developed by the Sentencing Advisory Council in Victoria:

\begin{quote}
It may be relevant that the conditions of the order were contravened following contact initiated by the victim. However, in assessing the degree to which this may mitigate the seriousness of the offence it is important to consider the history of the relationship between the parties, the nature of the contact and the victim’s motivation in making contact (and in particular whether the victim was acting under any pressure or coercion). This may require some consideration of the dynamics of the relationship between the victim and the offender.\footnote{Sentencing Advisory Council, \textit{Sentencing Practices for Breach of Family Violence Intervention Orders: Final Report} (2009), App 1 [2.9]. The Victorian Government advised the Commissions that these guidelines have been endorsed by the Victorian Chief Magistrate: Victorian Government, \textit{Submission FV 120}, 15 June 2010.}
\end{quote}

12.89 However, clearly while a victim may initiate contact prohibited by a protection order, or give free and voluntary consent to such contact, he or she can never be taken to consent to any family violence committed in breach of a protection order—and nor should any court entertain such an argument.

12.90 The Commissions do not agree that allowing a court to take into account all of the circumstances of a breach of protection order amounts to making a victim accountable for a respondent’s breach of a protection order. The responsibility for obeying a court order remains on the respondent to the order. A victim’s free and voluntary consent to contact prohibited by a protection order is not relevant to the guilt of the respondent in breaching the order—but it is relevant in determining the objective seriousness of the particular offence and therefore the sentence that ought to be imposed by the court. To disallow unequivocally the consideration of such factors in sentencing would be unfair to those being sentenced for breach of protection orders.

12.91 In expressing these views the Commissions acknowledge the concerns voiced, for example, by National Legal Aid that in some jurisdictions magistrates are treating consent of the victim as a mitigating factor in sentencing when it is apparent that such consent is not genuine. The Commissions consider that proper education and training in this area is critical. The Commissions endorse the recommendation of the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children for the production of a national bench book on family violence, in consultation with all jurisdictions, and as part of a national professional development program for judicial officers on family violence.

In Chapter 13, the Commissions express the view that a national bench book on family violence could play a significant role in guiding judicial officers in sentencing in family violence matters, and they recommend that such a bench book address sentencing in family violence matters.

The Commissions consider that the bench book should specifically address sentencing offenders for breach of protection orders, and address the following issues in determining the relevance of a victim’s consent to contact prohibited by a protection order:

- it is the responsibility of the person bound by the order to abide by it—not the victim;
- because of the power dynamics in family violence relationships, and how such dynamics might vitiate the victim’s initiation of, or agreement to, contact prohibited by a protection order, courts should satisfy themselves that any such initiation or agreement was freely and voluntarily made or given by the victim before contemplating whether to consider such a factor as mitigating;
- it will depend on the circumstances of each case what weight the court is to give to the fact that a victim initiated or agreed to contact prohibited by a protection order. For example, where genuine consent was given but the respondent commits family violence against the victim in breach of the protection order it would be expected that little, if any, weight would be given to the initial agreement to contact; and
- while a victim may have genuinely consented to contact with the respondent of a protection order, such consent can never be taken to extend to physical or non-physical violence or abuse committed in breach of the order.

114 National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Time for Action: The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021 (2009), 121. In Chapter 31 the Commissions recommend that the Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate with the relevant stakeholders to develop and maintain a national bench book on family violence.

115 Rec 13–1.
12. Breach of Protection Orders

Recommendation 12–5  The national family violence bench book—the subject of Rec 13–1 and Rec 31–2—should contain a section on the sentencing of offenders for breach of protection orders. This section should provide guidance to judicial officers on how to treat the consent of a victim to contact with a respondent that is prohibited by a protection order. In particular, this section should address the following issues:

(a)  that it is the responsibility of the respondent to a protection order to obey its conditions;

(b)  the dynamics of power and control in family violence relationships and how such dynamics might vitiate a victim’s initiation of, or consent to, contact prohibited by a protection order;

(c)  that the weight the court is to give to the fact that a victim initiated or agreed to contact prohibited by a protection order, will depend on the circumstances of each case; and

(d)  while a victim of family violence may have genuinely consented to contact with the respondent to a protection order, a victim can never be taken to have consented to any violence committed in breach of a protection order.

Charging for breach of protection order rather than underlying offence

12.92 There will be cases where a person breaches a protection order and the only charge available to police is breach of that order because no underlying offence has been committed—for example, if a person breaches a condition of an order not to contact the victim within a certain period of time of being intoxicated. However, where the breach of a protection order also amounts to a criminal offence, one issue for this Inquiry is the extent to which police are charging persons with breach of a protection order—an offence under family violence legislation—as opposed to any potential offence under state or territory criminal law—such as assault.

12.93 Dr Heather Douglas asserts that where family violence matters are charged, ‘it is overwhelmingly’ as a charge of breaching a protection order rather than one of the established criminal offences such as assault.116 Based on her study of 645 court files related to prosecutions for breach of protection orders under family violence legislation and held at three Magistrates Courts in Queensland, she concluded that:

It is likely that many of the matters charged as breaches of protection orders examined in this study could have been charged as crimes of criminal assault or criminal damage among other matters … Although the criminal charge of breach of a

Family Violence — A National Legal Response

A protection order was initially developed to provide an alternative offence for those situations where it may be difficult to identify the elements and satisfy the burden of proof in relation to a more serious criminal offence, it would appear from the data in this study that the breach charge is the standard response to matters arising in the domestic violence context when an order is in place.\(^\text{117}\)

12.94 As Douglas states, various ideological and practical ramifications are associated with charging a person for breach of a protection order as opposed to an underlying criminal offence. These include that:

- such a preference may be interpreted as trivialising or minimising the offending conduct;
- penalties for breach of a protection order are typically less than those associated with criminal offences such as assault, stalking or criminal damage;\(^\text{118}\)
- the charge for breach may often fail to reflect the seriousness of the offending conduct; and
- there may be less particularisation in an accused’s criminal record resulting from the recording of an offence for breach as compared with another criminal offence, such as assault.\(^\text{119}\)

12.95 It is difficult to determine from published court statistics whether there is a trend for offences for breach of protection orders to be typically prosecuted more often than applicable substantive underlying offences. To the extent that courts have published statistics in their annual reports of the number of proven offences or criminal matters lodged:

- no distinction is made as to whether such offences or matters occurred in a family violence context or not; and
- there is no indication of whether the alleged or proven criminal offence occurred in the context of a breach of an existing protection order.

12.96 For example, the Tasmanian Magistrates Court Annual Report of 2006–2007 indicates that there were 778 matters lodged concerning ‘breach of domestic violence’ orders in 2006–2007.\(^\text{120}\) That report also indicates, for example, that there were 2,780 matters lodged concerning ‘acts intended to cause injury’ and 188 matters concerning ‘sexual assault and related offences’ in that period but it is unclear how many of these matters—if any—arose in a family-violence context.\(^\text{121}\)

\(^{117}\) Ibid, 448.

\(^{118}\) Although, as noted below, in some jurisdictions, including NSW, there is a presumption of imprisonment for breach of protection orders involving violence: Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 14.

\(^{120}\) Magistrates Court of Tasmania, Annual Report 2006–07, 37.

\(^{121}\) Ibid, 37.
12.97 The Tasmanian Magistrates Court Annual Report of 2008–2009 does not contain separate statistics of the number of cases involving breach of protection orders—although there are statistics for offences against justice procedures such as breaches of suspended sentences, bails and bond.122 That report also indicates that there were 2,519 matters lodged concerning ‘acts intended to cause injury’ and 106 matters concerning ‘sexual assault and related offences’ in that period but it is unclear how many of these matters—if any—arose in a family-violence context.123

12.98 Similarly, the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria Annual Report for 2008–2009 indicates that there were 3,097 proven offences for ‘breach intervention order’ in this period. That report also indicates that there were 4,234 proven offences for ‘unlawful assault’ for example, but it is not clear how many of these assault matters arose in a family-violence context.124

12.99 Where a person is charged and convicted for both breach of a protection order and any underlying offence, the Commissions have heard that any custodial sentences imposed are often concurrent—or partially concurrent—rather than consecutive. The Commissions also heard that where two offences are charged—such as breach of the protection order and the underlying offence—the court has flexibility to set different types of sentencing options tailored to meet the circumstances of the case.125

Submissions and consultations

Practical trends concerning charges

12.100 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked in practice, where breach of a protection order also amounts to another criminal offence, the extent to which police in each state and territory are charging persons with breach of a protection order, as opposed to any applicable offence under state or territory criminal law.126

12.101 Responses to this question varied. Some stakeholders stated that practices vary, particularly according to the nature and extent of a breach.127 For example, the Queensland Law Society stated that:

Sometimes police charge only with breach of a protection order which can, at times, minimise the effect of the offender’s behaviour. On other occasions, police charge the offender with the whole gamut of offences.128

References:

125 G Zdenkowski, Consultation, Sydney, 6 November 2009.
126 Consultation Paper, Question 6–17.
Similarly, Women’s Legal Services NSW stated that:

In our experience it depends on the extent of the breach. Police in NSW vary in their practice across and within local area commands, however it is not uncommon for criminal charges for offences other than a breach of a protection order to also be laid.129

Other stakeholders submitted that police generally charge the breach of a protection order in addition to any other criminal offence ‘that has different elements but relates to the one incident’.130 For example, the Victorian Government submitted that:

Victoria Police charges for any offences arising from breaches of intervention orders separately from the breach of the intervention order. This trend has increased since the introduction of the Code of Practice in 2004. In 2008–2009 there were 7790 breach offences recorded and nearly 4000 co-occurring offences linked to the breaches of family violence intervention orders. There has been a 22 per cent increase in offences arising from breaches of intervention orders since the introduction of the Code of Practice in August 2004 …

It is Victoria’s Police experience that it is often easier to prove a breach when police have found the offender breaching the order, but it has been more difficult in proving an assault beyond reasonable doubt as the police do not often witness the assault.131

Other stakeholders, however, submitted that police tended to lay charges for breach of a protection order as opposed to any applicable state or territory criminal offence.132 The Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission submitted that this happened in the Northern Territory (NT) ‘to an excessive extent’.133 Other legal service providers based in the NT also commented that their observations were that ‘police, particularly in Indigenous communities, were not always pressing assault charges in addition to breach charges’134 and that prosecutors in the NT ‘tend not to proceed with both the assault charge and the breach’ as they are regarded as duplicating one another.135

Similarly, Women’s Legal Service, Queensland stated:

It is our experience (as reported in Heather Douglas’ research) that, unless [there is] very serious harm or damage, the police would usually just charge for the breach of the protection order, rather than the substantive charge.136

---

130 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010. Similar views were expressed in Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010.
133 Northern Territory Legal Aid Commission, Submission FV 122, 16 June 2010.
135 Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010.
12. Breach of Protection Orders

12.106 Stubbs observed that while she had no basis for answering this question, ‘research suggests that police too often fail to take any action on a breach’. An Indigenous women’s family violence service also stated that it had observed ‘a tendency to not pursue a criminal charge where there is no serious harm to a victim, for example, where the victim did not need to seek medical attention’.

Addressing concerns regarding practical trends in charging

12.107 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how best to address any identified practice of police preferring to lay charges for breach of a protection order, as opposed to any applicable underlying criminal offence, to ensure that victims’ experiences of family violence are not underrated.

12.108 Most stakeholders suggested that any such practice could be addressed appropriately through non-legislative measures such as:

- the education and training of police, including on the dynamics of family violence, and cultural awareness;\(^{139}\)
- increased resourcing for policing to hold those who breach protection orders accountable;\(^{140}\)
- directions to police to charge with both offences\(^{141}\) or ‘reinforcing the need to consider both’\(^{142}\) or making it clear that charges for breach or an underlying offence ‘should not be withdrawn on the basis of duplicity’;\(^{143}\)
- greater systemic support for the collection of evidence such as digital photographing, support for victims to make statements—‘given that charging is related to police perception of strength of evidence’;\(^{144}\)
- police guidelines that ‘require a superior officer to sign off that the offence was just a breach and not a criminal offence’;\(^{145}\)

---

\(^{139}\) Consultation Paper, Question 6–18.

\(^{141}\) Migrant Women’s Emergency Support Service trading as Immigrant Women’s Support Service, Submission FV 61, 1 June 2010.

\(^{143}\) Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

\(^{144}\) Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010.

\(^{145}\) Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010.

Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- ‘building in performance indicators for the police that deal with such issues’ as the fact is it is less work to bring an application for breach than to do the investigative work required for a substantive charge;\(^{147}\)
- requiring police to document why they have not pressed relevant criminal charges that were otherwise applicable;\(^{148}\)
- considering including in the criminal record of a conviction for breach of a protection order some detail about the breach;\(^{149}\) and
- better information recording and data capture.\(^{150}\) For example, Women’s Legal Services Australia submitted that:

> One of the ways that the issue of police preferring to lay charges for breach of a protection order as opposed to any applicable underlying criminal offences can be remedied is through the use of accurate record keeping. There are currently no desegregated data available as to the trend for offences for breach of protection orders—no distinction is made as to whether such offences occurred in a family violence context or not; and there is no indication of whether the alleged or proven criminal offences occurred in the context of a breach of an existing protection order. There should also be a system for obtaining desegregated data on domestic violence offences on the basis of gender, race etc.\(^{151}\)

12.109 However, one stakeholder emphasised the need for police discretion:

> The police do what they do for valid reasons. They are the investigating officers and at the scene.\(^{152}\)

Better data capture

12.110 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory courts, in recording and maintaining statistics about criminal matters lodged, or criminal offences proven, in their jurisdiction should ensure that such statistics capture separately criminal matters or offences that occur in a family-violence related context.\(^{153}\)

---

149 Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010. Centacare Safer Family Support Services suggested that breaches of protection orders which feature physical violence, wilful damage, controlling behaviour or threats should be called aggravated breaches so that they can be recorded in this way on a criminal history and taken into account in sentencing: Centacare Safer Families Support Service, Submission FV 118, 15 June 2010.
153 Consultation Paper, Proposal 6–16.
12.111 This proposal was overwhelmingly supported. For example, the Queensland Law Society supported it as ‘part of the desire to have meaningful and open statistics’, and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network stated that the separate capture of such statistics would allow those relating to domestic violence to ‘be easily identified’.

12.112 One NT legal service provider gave the following justification for supporting the proposal:

In recent times women’s networks have been keen to draw to the public’s attention just how high the death rates from domestic violence are here in the Northern Territory, but deaths are not recorded in a way that provides a reliable statistical connection between domestic violence and death.

12.113 Both National Legal Aid and Legal Aid NSW—in supporting the case for the separate capture of statistics on family-violence related offences—noted the provision in s 12(2) of the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW). This section requires a court to direct that an offence be recorded on a person’s criminal record as a domestic violence offence if the court is satisfied that an offence in respect of which a person has pleaded or is found guilty, is a domestic violence offence.

12.114 However, one individual opposed the proposal without explanation, and the Queensland Government noted that:

This information is not currently recorded on the court database in Queensland. The resourcing implications for the Queensland Government would need to be assessed before determining whether the Queensland Government is in position to implement this proposal.

Commissions’ views

12.115 There may be valid reasons why police only lay charges for breach of protection orders in circumstances where an underlying criminal offence may also have been committed—principally, but not exclusively, linked to an assessment of the adequacy of the evidence to support such a charge. Clearly, police cannot be directed to lay both types of charges in all cases. As one stakeholder emphasised, there needs to be some room to accommodate the proper exercise of police discretion.

158 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010, Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.

12.116 However, the Commissions acknowledge the force of stakeholder concerns about the lack of police enforcement of protection orders, and the tendency—particularly in certain jurisdictions such as Queensland and the NT—for police to prefer to lay charges for breach of a protection order to the exclusion of other appropriate and available criminal charges. Such practices or tendencies undermine the efficacy of protection orders and potentially trivialise the criminal justice response to family violence. Accordingly, the Commissions consider that there is a compelling need for a range of measures to address these practices and tendencies.

12.117 First, the Commissions note stakeholder observations that police are sometimes not laying both charges for breach of a protection order and the underlying criminal offence, on the basis that they consider that the laying of both charges involves duplication. The Commissions consider that this issue should be addressed in police guidelines or codes of practice. Police should be given guidance that concerns about duplication should not be a reason for not charging an offender with both types of offences, and that courts in sentencing for both offences would apply the totality principle in assessing the appropriate sentences to be imposed. The totality principle has been described as a ‘limitation on excess’.161 It ensures that an offender who is sentenced for multiple offences receives an appropriate sentence overall and not one that is ‘crushing’.162 In particular, courts would consider whether sentences for breach of a protection order and for an offence underlying the breach should be served concurrently—that is at the same time; cumulatively—that is, one after another; or partly concurrently and cumulatively in order to reflect the total criminality of the conduct charged.

12.118 Police guidelines should also address the disadvantages of choosing to charge for breach as opposed to, or in addition to, an underlying criminal offence—including that there may be less particularisation in an accused’s criminal record resulting from the recording of an offence for breach as compared with another criminal offence, such as assault.

12.119 Further, the Commissions consider that the utilisation of specialised police trained in family violence is a critical measure necessary to address inappropriate police responses to family violence. In Chapter 32, the Commissions recommend that, as a minimum, each state and territory police force should ensure that: all police receive appropriate education and training consistent with the Australasian Policing Strategy on the Prevention and Reduction of Family Violence; foster specialised police units; victims have access to a primary contact person trained in family violence; and specially trained police have responsibility for supervising, monitoring or assuring the quality of police responses to family violence. The implementation of this recommendation should go a considerable way to addressing concerns about inappropriate police responses to breach of protection orders. In particular, having specially trained police responsible for assuring the quality of police responses to family violence will encompass responsibility for ensuring that breaches of protection orders are taken seriously and, that where appropriate, charges for underlying criminal conduct constituting the breach are also laid.

12.120 In addition, ensuring accountability for police decision making in family violence matters is also addressed in the recommendation the Commissions make in Chapter 9 about the need for either family violence legislation and/or police codes of practice to impose a duty on police to investigate family violence where it has been committed, to record when they decide not to take further action, and their reasons for not taking further action. The implementation of this recommendation will require police to investigate breaches of protection orders, and to record when they decide not to take further action, and their reasons for doing so.

12.121 Finally, the Commissions consider that victim support has a critical role to play in ensuring that victims feel comfortable about initially giving evidence and not later withdrawing evidence that corroborates the pressing and prosecution of charges concerning protection orders, as well as underlying offences, such as assault, that may have constituted such breaches. In Chapters 29 and 32, the Commissions make a number of recommendations about integrated responses to family violence and the development of specialised family violence courts, which incorporate elements of victim support, as well as mainstreaming victim support into courts that deal with family violence. The implementation of these recommendations—combined with those concerning appropriate police guidelines; police specialisation, training and education; and measures to increase police accountability in decision-making—should ensure, to the maximum extent possible, that police bring appropriate charges where there is a breach of a protection order, and that victims are supported in giving evidence to support the laying and prosecution of such charges.

Recommendation 12–6 State and territory police guidelines or codes of practice should provide guidance to police about charging an offender with breach of a protection order and any underlying criminal offence constituting the breach. In particular, such guidance should address the issue of perceived duplication of charges and how that issue is properly addressed by a court in sentencing an offender for multiple offences based on the totality principle and principles relating to concurrent and cumulative sentences.
Better data capture

12.122 Proper data capture is essential to the formulation and development of policy. This complements the key strategy of building the evidence base recommended in Time for Action.\(^{167}\) As stated by the Commissions in Chapter 31, a commitment to quality data collection and evaluation is crucial to ensuring systemic change and improvement.

12.123 The Commissions reiterate their views expressed in the Consultation Paper, that it would be beneficial for state and territory courts to capture separately statistical data about criminal matters lodged or criminal offences proven in their jurisdictions that arise in a family-violence related context.

12.124 However, the Commissions acknowledge that not all state and territory courts maintain statistics about criminal matters lodged or proven in their jurisdictions in the first instance. The key outcome which the Commissions wish to achieve is the capture of separate data about criminal matters or offences that occur in a family-violence related context. Acknowledging, for example, the role that such statistics can play in highlighting the number of deaths that occur as a result of family violence. The agency upon which the responsibility for such data capture should be placed is a secondary issue. Each state and territory government may need to decide the body or agency within their respective jurisdictions to which these responsibilities should be delegated.

12.125 Therefore, the Commissions recommend that, to the extent that state and territory courts do record and maintain such statistics, they should ensure that those statistics capture separately criminal matters or offences that occur in a family-violence related context. In all other cases, state and territory governments should ensure the separate capture of statistics about criminal matters or offences in a family-violence related context within their jurisdictions.

---

Recommendation 12–7 To the extent that state and territory courts record and maintain statistics about criminal matters lodged or criminal offences proven in their jurisdiction, they should ensure that such statistics capture separately criminal matters or offences that occur in a family-violence related context. In every other case, state and territory governments should ensure the separate capture of statistics of criminal matters and offences in their jurisdictions that occur in a family-violence related context.

---

\(^{167}\) National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Time for Action: The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021 (2009), [1.5], [2.4], [3.4], [4.5], [5.4], [6.3].
Penalties and sentencing for breach of protection orders

12.126 The maximum penalties for breach of a protection order vary significantly across state and territory jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{168} The table below sets out the maximum penalties in each jurisdiction.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Jurisdiction</th>
<th>Maximum Penalty</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>NSW</td>
<td>Imprisonment for two years or 50 penalty units ($5,500) or both (s 14 of NSW Act)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victoria</td>
<td>Imprisonment for two years or 240 penalty units ($27,220.80) or both (ss 123 and 27 of Victorian Act)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Queensland</td>
<td>Imprisonment for one year or 40 penalty units ($40,000) for first offence, and imprisonment for two years for third and subsequent offences within a period of three years (s 80 of Qld Act)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WA</td>
<td>Imprisonment for two years and fine of $6,000 or both (s 61 WA Act)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SA</td>
<td>Imprisonment for two years—but if breach of ‘intervention order’ under s 13 (order to undertake intervention program)—maximum penalty is $1,250 (s 31 of SA Act)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tasmania</td>
<td>Tiered penalties: imprisonment for one year or fine of 20 penalty units ($2,400) for first offence to imprisonment for five years for fourth or subsequent offence (s 35 of Tas Act)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ACT</td>
<td>Imprisonment for 5 years or 500 penalty units ($50,000) or both (s 90 of ACT Act)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NT</td>
<td>Imprisonment for 2 years or 400 penalty units ($44,000) or both (ss 121, 122 of NT Act)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

12.127 As stated by the Australian Government Solicitor there are, however, some difficulties in making straightforward comparisons concerning the different maximum penalties because of reasons including the following:

—while the applicable fine in one jurisdiction may be lower than in others, the maximum term of imprisonment in that jurisdiction may be higher than in some others; …

\textsuperscript{168} The Australian Government Solicitor highlighted maximum penalties on breach of a protection order as one of the areas of family violence legislation in respect of which there is significant variation across the jurisdictions: Australian Government Solicitor, \textit{Domestic Violence Laws in Australia} (2009), 14.
—some, but not all, jurisdictions have a tiered penalty system for first and subsequent breaches.\(^{169}\)

12.128 Under the Model Domestic Violence Laws, breach of a protection order is a summary offence which attracts a maximum penalty of:

- $24,000 or imprisonment for one year for a first offence; and
- imprisonment for two years for a second offence.\(^{170}\)

12.129 In 2008 the Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria) recommended that imprisonment for two years should be the maximum penalty for a breach of protection orders—as well as breach of police-issued family violence safety notices and stalking intervention orders.\(^{171}\)

12.130 Whatever the maximum penalty for breach of protection orders, a key issue is how such breaches are treated in sentencing. For example, the WA review of family violence legislation noted a concern that breaches of protection orders are being treated leniently.\(^{172}\) It noted that despite legislative amendments to increase penalties for breaches, in some cases actual penalties imposed are low and do not reflect the gravity of the breach and its consequences:

> Offenders are being charged more by the Police however court sentencing is very lenient with offenders usually given small fines as can be seen by our tracking and monitoring of court outcomes at our local court.

> Some of the penalties given to respondents for breaching were so insignificant that they did not act as a deterrent and made women feel like the order or the seriousness of the situation had been trivialised. ie. $100 fine—‘a speeding ticket costs more than that’.\(^{173}\)

12.131 Similarly, in respect of sentencing for breach of protection orders in Queensland, Douglas has stated that ‘penalties are often inappropriate and generally very low for breach matters’.\(^{174}\)

In 40 per cent of cases no conviction was recorded. … The study showed that 42 per cent of matters resulted in fines. In most of the matters where fines were ordered, the fines were less than $500. … Fines are inappropriate in the context of breach matters as there are potential problems associated with this form of penalty in the context of domestic violence. Considering the frequently ongoing connections between the victim and the defendant in the domestic violence context there is a risk that it will actually be the victim of the breach who will pay the fine from the family income. Alternatively, there is a risk that the fine will be paid from money that should be paid as child support.\(^{175}\)

---

\(^{169}\) Ibid, 28.

\(^{171}\) Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria), Breaching Intervention Orders Report (2008), Rec 1.

\(^{173}\) Ibid, 26 (citations omitted).

\(^{175}\) Ibid, 464 (citations omitted).
12.132 The Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria) produced a report in 2009 on sentencing practices for breach of protection orders, which made the following observations:

All of the stakeholders consulted considered breach of a family violence intervention order to be a serious criminal offence; however, few were of the opinion that current sanctions reflect this seriousness. There is significant frustration amongst some stakeholder groups at what they perceive to be leniency in sentencing these matters.

The Council’s data analysis confirms stakeholder perceptions that there is a predominance of lower-end orders (particularly fines and adjourned undertakings) for breach offences. For example, the most common sentence imposed on people sentenced for breaching an intervention order between July 2004 and June 2007 was a fine (37.2 per cent), and the second most common sentence was an adjourned undertaking (18.5 per cent). The most common fine was between $500 and $1000.

Courts also imposed these lower-end orders relatively frequently on repeat offenders.176

12.133 The Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria) developed guiding principles for sentencing breaches of protection orders to promote appropriate and consistent sentencing practices.177 As stated by the Victorian Government in a submission to this Inquiry:

The guidelines are designed to help magistrates place appropriate weight on the sentencing considerations that are most relevant to the offence. [There is] a section examining the different sentencing orders and some relevant considerations for the court when sentencing for particular types of breaches. The guidelines were developed in consultation with a number of stakeholders, including magistrates, and are not intended to displace judicial discretion. The Victorian Chief Magistrate has endorsed the guidelines.178

12.134 The NSW family violence legislation provides that a person who breaches a protection order must be sentenced to a term of imprisonment if the act constituting the offence was an act of violence against a person, unless the court orders otherwise.179 Where the court determines not to impose a sentence of imprisonment it must give its reasons for doing so.180

12.135 The NT family violence legislation contains a number of provisions regulating the sentencing of protection orders which are said to apply despite the Sentencing Act 1995 (NT).181 Those provisions include that where an adult breaches a protection order the court must record a conviction and sentence the person to imprisonment for at least seven days if the person has previously been found guilty of contravening a protection order. However, this requirement does not apply if:

177 Ibid, App 1.
179 This directive does not apply if the person convicted was under 18 years of age at the time of the alleged offence.
181 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 121.
• the offence does not result in harm being caused to a protected person; and
• the court is satisfied it is not appropriate to record a conviction and sentence the person under the subsection in the particular circumstances of the offence.

12.136 The NT family violence legislation also provides that if the person sentenced to serve a term of imprisonment for breaching a protection order is already serving another term of imprisonment for another offence, the court must direct the term of imprisonment to start from the end of the other term of imprisonment.\textsuperscript{182}

12.137 The Victorian sentencing legislation makes it clear that the sentencing option of home detention is not available where an offender has breached a protection order—whether that order was made in Victoria or in another state or territory.\textsuperscript{183}

Submissions and consultations

Consistency of maximum penalties

12.138 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether there should be consistency of maximum penalties for breach of protection orders across the jurisdictions and, if so, why and what the maximum penalty should be.\textsuperscript{184}

12.139 Stakeholder views on these issues were divided. Some stakeholders expressed concern about consistency of maximum penalties on the basis that: it might reduce maximum penalties in some jurisdictions;\textsuperscript{185} might ‘not translate into consistent sentences’,\textsuperscript{186} and it was more important that a court consider the circumstances of breach on a case by case basis.\textsuperscript{187}

12.140 Better Care for Children expressed the view that ‘raising the bar on penalty is irrelevant to the outcome.’\textsuperscript{188} A legal service provider also expressed the view that it is not the maximum penalties which are the issue because ‘they are never applied. It is the minimum penalties [in the NT] that are most often drawn on’.\textsuperscript{189} Another service provider echoed this, stating that in its experience ‘offenders breaching protection orders are not given the maximum penalties’.\textsuperscript{190}

12.141 There was, however, considerable support for national consistency in the level of maximum penalty.\textsuperscript{191} For example, in a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others supported consistency,

\textsuperscript{182} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{183} Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 18ZV.
\textsuperscript{184} Consultation Paper, Question 6–19.
\textsuperscript{185} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{186} Ibid; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
\textsuperscript{187} Better Care of Children, Submission FV 72, 24 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{188} Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{189} Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{190} Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal provided that orders, their conditions and the interpretative framework in each family violence statute are broadly consistent across all jurisdictions. Consistency of maximum penalties is also important in the context of planned mutual recognition and national registration of domestic/family violence protection orders.\(^{192}\)

12.142 Berry Street Inc supported consistency because it makes a clear statement about the gravity of the issue and the right of victims to be protected equally regardless of the jurisdiction they fall within.\(^{193}\)

12.143 One service provider made no comment regarding maximum penalties but submitted that ‘consistency of sentence is an important factor in ensuring fairness across the country’.\(^{194}\)

12.144 Of those stakeholders that supported consistent maximum penalties, they expressed divergent views about what the maximum penalty should be. Stakeholders variously expressed support for maximum penalties of imprisonment for two, three,\(^{195}\) and five years,\(^{196}\) with one supporting escalating penalties for subsequent breaches with a maximum of two years for recidivist offenders.\(^{197}\)

12.145 The Victorian Government, for example, noted that the maximum penalty in Victoria for breach of two years and/or 240 penalty units is the level advised as appropriate by the Sentencing Advisory Council. It submitted that this penalty ‘is specific to the Victorian context and has been developed on the basis of research and consultation’.\(^{198}\)

12.146 Stubbs noted that the ‘question of the maximum penalty for a breach becomes more significant if police are failing to charge for criminal offences that might make up the breach’.\(^{200}\) Another stakeholder also emphasised the need for police to take breaches of protection orders seriously.\(^{201}\)
Sentences imposed for breach

12.147 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked in practice, what issues or concerns arise about the sentences actually imposed on offenders for breach of protection orders.\textsuperscript{202}

12.148 While stakeholders acknowledged that there is ‘diverse variation in the practices of different jurisdictions and even within the one jurisdiction’,\textsuperscript{203} a constant theme that arose in submissions was either that no sentences are being imposed or that those that are imposed for breach of protection orders are often low.\textsuperscript{204} For example, Women’s Legal Services Australia submitted that:

> WLSA … is concerned by situations where relatively lenient sentences are imposed on offenders for breaches of protection orders that involve violence, and in particular the use of violence with instruments such as wheel braces or other metal instruments. One of the women’s legal services has witnessed $11.00 good behaviour bonds being given out for breaches … even on subsequent violations of good behaviour bonds. Such penalties trivialise the seriousness of family violence and send out a message of tolerance of family violence to the community.\textsuperscript{205}

12.149 An advocacy organisation in WA expressed a similar view:

> Sentences imposed for breaches of violence restraining orders in WA are minimal to say the least. Most sentences impose a fine of around $200 and sentences do not appear to increase on a second or third breach. Breaches … need to be taken seriously and dealt with as serious criminal offences. Without harsher penalties, violence restraining orders are seen ‘as not worth the paper they are written on’ … particularly in rural and remote areas.\textsuperscript{206}

12.150 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others, affirmed the concerns identified in the Sentencing Advisory Council Report: Sentencing Practices for Breach of Family Violence Intervention Orders concerning leniency in the sentencing of offenders and repeat offenders in Victoria who breach protection orders.\textsuperscript{207} The Victorian Government also referred to this report, and stated that ‘it is currently considering [its] recommendations’.\textsuperscript{208}

12.151 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that:

> Multiple breaches are dealt with together and this can result in a lesser sentence than would be awarded had they been dealt with separately. Magistrates are also refusing \textsuperscript{202} Consultation Paper, Question 6–20.

\textsuperscript{204} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{205} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{206} Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{207} Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{208} Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010.
to record a conviction for breach of an order thereby avoiding the possible imposition of a period of imprisonment.\footnote{Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission \textit{FV 236}, 20 July 2010.}

12.152 Some expressed concerns about lack of police enforcement as well as leniency in sentencing.\footnote{Queensland Law Society, Submission \textit{FV 178}, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission \textit{FV 146}, 24 June 2010. One confidential submission noted that police often do not enforce breaches involving the sending of text messages on the basis that such messages ‘could have been sent by anyone’: Confidential, Submission \textit{FV 96}, 2 June 2010.} For example, the Queensland Law Society stated:

Too often there is no sentence actually imposed or a minimal fine. Too often offenders continue to commit acts of domestic violence including breaches of protection orders for which they are not prosecuted by police, confident in their belief that they will only receive a minimal penalty, if they are prosecuted at all.\footnote{Queensland Law Society, Submission \textit{FV 179}, 25 June 2010.}

12.153 Some stakeholders stated that the effect of lenient sentencing is to undermine victims’ confidence and respect in the legal system;\footnote{Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission \textit{FV 185}, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission \textit{FV 173}, 25 June 2010.} stop victims from reporting offences because their experiences have not ‘been validated by the court’;\footnote{Ibid. See also C Pragnell, Submission \textit{FV 70}, 2 June 2010.} and fail to act as a deterrent to future family violence.\footnote{Confidential, Submission \textit{FV 89}, 3 June 2010.} One stakeholder also noted that lenient sentencing can have fatal repercussions for victims, and suggested consideration be given to ‘stronger monitoring [of offenders] after release’.\footnote{Confidential, Submission \textit{FV 164}, 25 June 2010.}

12.154 However, some stakeholders noted concerns countervailing those expressed about leniency in sentencing. One legal service provider in the NT noted that there is a tension in that jurisdiction between keeping Indigenous men out of prison and keeping Indigenous women safe. It stated ‘currently we have mandatory sentencing provisions for breaches. We do not know what the answer is’.\footnote{Confidential, Submission \textit{FV 164}, 25 June 2010.}

12.155 Similarly, the Local Court of NSW identified further complicating factors in sentencing, including that:

the punishment of an offender may well have an adverse impact upon the victim or any children of a relationship, particularly in circumstances where there is an ongoing relationship. This might include financial hardship due to the imposition of a fine, emotional, relational and financial hardship due to the imposition of a custodial sentence, or more generally the risk of reprisal against a victim by an offender who regards the punishment as being the ‘fault’ of the victim. …

This is of particular concern because in NSW, the imprisonment of offenders for breach of a protection order is not an infrequent occurrence … The available sentencing statistics indicate that, in NSW, an offender is almost twice as likely to be sentenced to a period of imprisonment for breaching [a family violence protection order] than for breach of a personal violence order and is likely to receive a more serious sentence ... in general.217

12.156 Other general concerns expressed about current sentencing practices for breach include that: there is inconsistency in sentencing,218 the courts' treatment of mitigating factors—such as victim's consent to mitigate sentence;219 and the tendency for courts to minimise breaches concerning conditions about access in relation to children. Three stakeholders stated that magistrates often perceive these kinds of breaches to be related more to the existence of inappropriate family law orders.220

Legislative direction to courts regarding sentencing for breach of protection orders

12.157 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether state and territory family violence legislation should contain provisions which direct courts to adopt a particular approach on sentencing for breach of a protection order—for example, a provision such as that in s 14(4) of the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW), which requires courts to sentence offenders to imprisonment for breach of protection orders involving violence, unless they otherwise order and give their reasons for doing so.221

12.158 Stakeholder views on this issue were divided. Many stakeholders supported such an approach.222 For example, Legal Aid NSW and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Network Service expressed the view that breaches with violence should automatically result in a custodial sentence.223

12.159 The Queensland Law Society submitted that those who commit violence ‘need to get the message loud and clear to stop committing acts of domestic violence and to start complying with orders’.224 Women’s Legal Services NSW, in supporting

---

217 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
218 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010. An Indigenous family violence service noted very different outcomes in terms of severity of sentencing across the Northern Territory, Western Australia and South Australia: Ngaanyatjarra Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Women’s Council Domestic and Family Violence Service, Submission FV 117, 15 June 2010.
219 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
220 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
221 Consultation Paper, Question 6–21.
223 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
the approach, noted that the requirement to give reasons for not ordering imprisonment is an important safeguard in the NSW legislation.225

12.160 The Department of Premier and Cabinet, Tasmania expressed qualified support on the basis that ‘there are directions given for the sort of circumstances in which a lesser penalty is appropriate and still some discretion for mitigating circumstances’.226

12.161 However, many stakeholders expressed concern about providing legislative direction to courts on how to sentence for breach of a protection order,227 or opposed it outright.228

12.162 A key theme which emerged in the submissions was an opposition to mandatory sentencing or to presumptions of imprisonment. For example, National Legal Aid stated that ‘it was not generally supportive of mandatory penalties’,229 and SA Deputy Chief Magistrate Andrew Cannon and the Victorian Government expressed opposition to mandatory sentencing or to presumptions of imprisonment for criminal offences.230 Concerns were expressed about mandatory sentencing, for example, on the basis that it undermines judicial discretion,231 and acts as a deterrent for victims to report violence and breaches232—including in the NT where there is an identified tension between keeping victims safe and striving to reduce the incarceration of Indigenous men.233 The Local Court of NSW also observed that some of its members had noted that:

It appears Indigenous individuals, especially those in country areas with high rates of unemployment, are particularly reluctant to report breach of protection order, due to a perception that the perpetrator who is also the family income-earner will most likely be imprisoned.234

12.163 The Queensland Government also expressed caution about how such legislative directions might affect vulnerable groups—including Indigenous peoples—and stated that this issue is to be considered in the review of Queensland’s family violence legislation.235

226 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
229 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
234 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
12.164 In addition, mandatory imprisonment was said not to always represent the best solution to the problem. For example, Cannon stated that he was unconvinced that immediate imprisonment in most cases will remedy [the] problem. Early police intervention, victim support and offender programs, including dealing with issues of substance abuse, will be more productive in most cases than imprisonment.

12.165 Stubbs also highlighted the drawbacks of imprisonment:

The use of imprisonment is costly in both financial and human terms, including for families. It may be an important means for providing some period of safety for victims, at least in the interim while the offender is in custody, as well as serving other traditional sentencing objectives, but it can be damaging. The alleged benefits of incarceration should not be overstated. Offenders may not necessarily receive access to appropriate treatment or other programs while in custody. The negative effects of prison may further undermine the offender’s capacity to live a socially productive life. Imprisonment should be used sparingly and when justified by the facts.

12.166 As an alternative to mandatory sentencing or presumptions of imprisonment, the Victorian Government said that ‘a better approach would be to support judicial officers to ensure that they have all of the information they need to make sentencing decisions’. In this regard, it referred to the guiding principles for sentencing breaches of protection orders developed by the Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria), and endorsed by the Victorian Chief Magistrate. The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria also preferred guidance for judicial officers to mandatory sentencing.

12.167 While ‘philosophically opposed to any form of mandatory sentencing’, Women’s Legal Service Queensland submitted that ‘there needs to be some way of directing the courts to take these offences seriously’:

Alternate sentencing options are worth investigating (eg being more innovative and creative in the crafting of continuing orders and also having severely escalating penalties for repeat offenders).

Sentencing for non-violent breaches

12.168 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked what types of non-financial sanctions are appropriate to be imposed for breach of protection orders where the breach does not involve violence or involves relatively low levels of violence.

12.169 Responses in submissions to this question fell into two broad categories. The first group expressed concerns about the notion of ‘low levels of violence’. The second group offered suggestions about appropriate sanctions.

---

237 Ibid.
242 Consultation Paper, Question 6–22.
12. Breach of Protection Orders

12.170 Some stakeholders stressed that the issue is not whether a breach involves no violence or ‘low-levels’ of violence but its impact on the victim—in particular, whether it causes fear or damages a victim’s sense of security. National Legal Aid said this is particularly relevant ‘when breaches are not considered within the historical context of the violence but are treated as single incidents’. Legal Aid NSW stated that ‘where a breach involves violence the breach should be considered seriously and an appropriate sanction imposed, financial or otherwise’.

12.171 Women’s Legal Services Australia expressed some concern about defining ‘low level violence’ and considering offences that involved no element of physical violence to be low level.

12.172 Some stakeholders stated that, in some circumstances, financial sanctions in the form of compensation for financial abuse or property damage—such as the cost of changing locks—might be appropriate sanctions. The overwhelming majority of stakeholders that addressed this issue were in favour of sanctions that could help to change the behaviour of those who commit violence. Therefore, there was support for ‘perpetrator programs’ such as violence and drug and alcohol rehabilitation programs; probation with special conditions, such as attending ‘perpetrators’ courses or counselling’; men’s behaviour programs; psychiatric assessment and treatment; anger management programs; and educational programs on family violence with ‘therapeutic interventions’.

---

243 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; The Central Australian Aboriginal Family Legal Unit Aboriginal Corporation, Submission FV 149, 25 June 2010; Victorian Government, Submission FV 120, 15 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010.
244 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
245 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
246 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
247 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), Submission FV 111, 9 June 2010.
248 For example, No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, Submission FV 136, 22 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.
252 C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010.
254 Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010.
12.173 There was also broad support for community service orders,\textsuperscript{255} with some stakeholders stressing the need for such work to be ‘meaningful’,\textsuperscript{256} ‘constructive and rehabilitative’.\textsuperscript{257}

12.174 One stakeholder supported the idea of good behaviour bonds or adjournments with a requirement to report back to the court, incorporating ‘active review’ by the court of the offender’s conduct.\textsuperscript{258} Women’s Legal Services NSW also expressed support for good behaviour bonds for low level breaches because of the element of accountability built into them in the event of breach.\textsuperscript{259}

12.175 The Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia) also submitted that victim impact statements should be utilised more widely and that victims should be allowed to give an indication of the type or nature of sentence they would like the court to consider.\textsuperscript{260}

\textit{Commissions’ views}

\textbf{Consistency of maximum penalties}

12.176 The Commissions do not make any recommendations about consistency of maximum penalties for breach of protection orders for a number of reasons. First, in the Commissions’ view, the issue of the level of maximum penalties does not appear to be the key issue of concern identified by stakeholders. Rather, issues of more pressing concern are the lack of enforcement of breaches and, where they are enforced, their lenient treatment on sentencing. Increasing maximum penalties will not necessarily lead to the imposition of sentences with higher maximum penalties—particularly in light of statistical data and stakeholder observations which support the proposition that courts do not, generally, tend to impose the maximum penalty for breach of a protection order.

12.177 Further, the Commissions note the wide disparity of views about an appropriate maximum penalty, and do not consider that they have an appropriate empirical basis for supporting one level of maximum penalty over another. For example, the Commissions acknowledge the comments made by the Victorian Government that the maximum penalty in Victoria is the level advised by the Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria), developed on the basis of research and consultation with Victorian stakeholders—and accept that such maximum penalty appears to be appropriate in the Victorian context. However, further detailed consideration and consultation would need to be undertaken to assess whether such a \textsuperscript{257} Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), \textit{Submission FV 111}, 9 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{259} Women’s Legal Services NSW, \textit{Submission FV 182}, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{260} Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), \textit{Submission FV 111}, 9 June 2010.
maximum penalty was appropriate in other jurisdictions, for example, in light of their different sentencing legislation.

12.178 In addition, the Commissions consider that consistency in sentencing—as opposed to consistency of maximum penalties—is the more pertinent issue in practice, and that there are many ways of achieving this, including through a national bench book, guidelines—such as those developed by the Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria)—education and training, and the use of sentencing databases which are intended to assist a court in deciding whether a proposed sentence ‘is in any way inside or outside the normal range of penalties imposed for similar offences in past cases’. The use of guidance in a national bench book on family violence is addressed below.

Guidance for sentencing for breaches of protection orders

12.179 The Commissions note the significant concerns expressed by stakeholders about leniency in sentencing for breach of protection orders, as well as concerns about inconsistency in sentences. The Commissions maintain their preliminary views expressed in the Consultation Paper that a national bench book on family violence could play a significant and valuable role in guiding judicial officers in sentencing in family violence matters. In particular, courts should be given guidance on how to sentence for breaches of protection orders.

12.180 The Commissions have considered the Guiding Principles for Sentencing Contraventions of Family Violence Intervention Orders prepared by the Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria) and consider that these guidelines provide an instructive model for guiding judicial discretion in the sentencing for breach of protection order offences. In particular, some of the content of these guidelines could form the basis of material to be included in a national bench book, with adjustments made to accommodate jurisdictional differences in maximum penalty levels for breaches, and in sentencing options.

12.181 Some of the key matters addressed by the Victorian guidelines, which the Commissions consider worthy of consideration in guidelines in a section on sentencing for breach of protection orders in a national bench book on family violence include:

- The purposes of sentencing an offender for breach of a protection order. The Sentencing Advisory Council stated that the primary purpose ‘is to achieve compliance with the [protection] order or future orders to ensure the safety and protection of the victim’, and that other purposes are denunciation, deterrence and punishment. The Council stated that ‘caution should be exercised that these [other] purposes do not conflict with considerations of community protection, particularly as regards the victim’, noting that immediate incarceration may provide short term protection but that the long-term protection of a victim is also an important consideration.264

---

262 See Recs 13–1 and 31–2.

- The potential impact of particular sentencing options on a victim of family violence, including the possible deleterious repercussions of imposing fines on offenders for family-violence related offences. In this regard, the Council’s guidelines note that ‘measures intended to protect the victim can place them at increased risk, and sentences designed to punish the offender may indirectly punish the victim’.265 The guidelines further state:

  there will be occasions where a sentence with coercive rehabilitation requirements (such as mandatory attendance at a behavioural change course) as well as a punitive element (such as community work or a financial condition) strikes a better balance between the purposes of sentencing than a sentence such as a fine.266

- The identification of sentencing factors relevant to the victim267—including the nature of the contravention and its impact on the victim; abuse of power; the presence of children; the contribution of the victim;268 and the vulnerability of the victim.269

- The identification of sentencing factors relating to the offender—including the culpability of the offender which entails a consideration of whether the offence was committed intentionally, recklessly or negligently and the offender’s level of understanding of the order; findings of guilt about other family violence offences; and the timing of the breach. On the latter issue, the guidelines provide, ‘where an order is contravened only a short time after [its making] or there has been an earlier contravention, this should be an aggravating factor’.270

- Factors relevant to determining the severity of sentencing range and the appropriateness of particular sanctions for levels of severity of breach. In this respect, the guidelines usefully set out factors and sanctions appropriate for breaches of varying degrees of seriousness—categorised as low, medium and high.

12.182 In addition, the Commissions consider that the guidance to be provided in the national bench book should address the benefits of sentencing options that aim to change the behaviour of the offender. Sentencing options with a rehabilitative aspect have an important role to play in long term strategies to break the cycle of violence.
12.183 The Commissions agree the level of seriousness of a breach may not necessarily be linked to the level of violence used by an offender in breaching the order, or to whether the violence was physical, and that a key factor is the impact a breach has on a victim’s sense of security. That is why they consider guidance in sentencing should address specifically the impact of an offence on a victim. In addition, the Commissions consider that the guidance in the bench book should also make the point—as is made in the Council’s guidelines—that ‘breaches not involving physical violence can have a significant impact on the victim and should not necessarily be treated as less serious than those breaches involving physical violence’.

12.184 Because of the significance of the impact on the victim of a breach of a protection order, the Commissions further consider that police operational guidelines—reinforced by training—should require police when preparing witness statements to ask victims about the impact on them of the breach, and advise them that they may wish to make a victim impact statement—which is one way of informing a court about the harm and injury suffered by a victim as result of a breach. Police should also be required to explain what use can be made of victim impact statements.

12.185 However, while the Commissions consider that victims should be encouraged and supported in the making of victim impact statements which explain the impact a breach has had on them, they do not agree that victims should be allowed to indicate the type or nature of sentences that they would like the court to consider. A victim’s desire for retribution, for example, should not be a legitimate consideration in sentencing. The Commissions endorse the view expressed in ALRC Report 103, Same Crime, Same Time: Sentencing of Federal Offenders, that victims should be precluded from expressing an opinion about the sentence that should be imposed on a federal offender. However, that is not to say, that a victim should be precluded from informing the court about the impact which he or she thinks a particular sentencing option will have on the victim.

Recommendation 12–8 The national family violence bench book (see Recs 13–1 and 31–2) should contain a section guiding courts on how to sentence offenders for breach of protection orders, addressing, for example:

(a) the purposes of sentencing an offender for breach of a protection order;

---

271 Ibid, App 1, [2.2].
273 Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) s 25(2) prohibits a victim impact statement from addressing the way in which or the extent to which an offender ought to be sentenced. Compare Sentencing Act 1995 (NT) s 106B(5A) which provides that a victim impact statement may contain a statement as to the victim’s wishes in respect of the sentencing order to be made by the court.
(b) the potential impact of particular sentencing options, especially fines, on a victim of family violence;
(c) sentencing factors relating to the victim, including the impact of the offence on the victim;
(d) sentencing factors relating to the offender, including the timing of the breach;
(e) factors relevant to determining the severity of sentencing range and the appropriateness of particular sanctions for different levels of severity of breach;
(f) that breaches not involving physical violence can have a significant impact on a victim and should not necessarily be treated as less serious than breaches involving physical violence; and
(g) the benefits of sentencing options that aim to change the behaviour of those who commit violence.

Recommendation 12–9 Police operational guidelines—reinforced by training—should require police, when preparing witness statements in relation to breach of protection order proceedings, to ask victims about the impact of the breach, and advise them that they may wish to make a victim impact statement and about the use that can be made of such a statement.

Repeal of mandatory sentencing and mandatory imprisonment provisions

12.186 In the Commissions’ view, the preservation of judicial discretion in sentencing is essential to enable individualised justice to be done on a case-by-case basis. The Commissions do not support the inclusion in state and territory family violence legislation of provisions directing courts to adopt a particular approach on sentencing for breach of a protection order where such legislative direction removes the exercise of judicial discretion.

12.187 In particular, the Commissions oppose mandatory sentencing for breach of protection orders—including specification of mandatory minimum penalties, or directions to impose imprisonment in particular circumstances. In this regard, the Commissions acknowledge the concerns expressed by stakeholders that such provisions can have an adverse impact on vulnerable offenders, particularly Indigenous offenders; act as a deterrent for victims to report violence and breaches; and that imprisonment may not necessarily represent the best outcome in any particular case. Sometimes imprisonment will be an appropriate sentencing option for breaches of protection orders involving violence. However, as a general principle, the Commissions consider that imprisonment should be regarded as a sentencing option of last resort.275

12.188 As noted in ALRC Report 103, mandatory sentencing has been the subject of considerable criticism by commentators, and by government bodies and committees that have examined the issue. Criticisms of mandatory sentencing include: that such schemes escalate sentence severity; are unable to take account of the particular circumstances of the case; redistribute discretion so that decisions by the police and prosecuting authorities become increasingly important; and contravene a number of accepted sentencing principles—including proportionality, parsimony and individualised justice—and international human rights standards.276

12.189 The maintenance of individualised justice and broad judicial discretion are essential attributes of our criminal justice system, outweighing any potential deterrent effect that mandatory sentencing might have. The Commissions thus recommend that state and territory family violence should not impose mandatory minimum penalties or mandatory imprisonment for the breach of a protection order.

12.190 The Commissions consider that the provision of guidance to judicial officers in a national bench book on family violence on how to sentence for breach of protection orders is preferable to mandatory sentencing provisions.

Recommendation 12–10 State and territory family violence legislation should not impose mandatory minimum penalties or mandatory imprisonment for the offence of breaching a protection order.

---

275 This endorses the view expressed in Ibid, [7.64].
276 See, Ibid [21.59]–[21.61]. The principle of proportionality requires courts to impose sentences that bear a reasonable or proportionate, relationship to the criminal conduct in question. The principle of parsimony operates to prevent the imposition of a sentence that is more severe than is necessary to achieve the purpose or purposes of the sentence. The principle of individualised justice requires the court to impose a sentence that is just and appropriate in all the circumstances of the particular case: see Ibid Ch 5.
13. Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing

Contents

Introduction 561
Recognising family violence in criminal offences 563
Criticisms of the incident-focused nature of criminal offences 563
Current approaches to recognising family violence in criminal offences 565
An umbrella offence of family violence 565
Aggravated offences 567
Designated family violence offences not attracting higher maximum penalty 572
Offences of economic and emotional abuse 573
Leading evidence of an accused person’s history of family violence 574
Federal offences relevant in the family violence context 576
Options for reform 577
Submissions and consultations 578
Commissions’ views 587
Recognising family violence in sentencing 594
Recognising courses of family-violence related conduct in sentencing 594
Circumstances of aggravation and mitigation 597
Sentencing guidance 600
Submissions and consultations 602
Commissions’ views 613

Introduction

13.1 This and the following chapter consider whether there should be an expanded role for the criminal law in recognising family violence. This chapter considers the recognition of family violence in criminal offences and sentencing. Chapter 14 considers the recognition of family violence in defences to homicide where a victim of family violence kills the person who was violent towards him or her. It also considers the recognition of categories of family relationships for the purposes of criminal laws—that is, for example where a family relationship between the offender and the victim is prescribed as an element of a criminal offence or defence, or as a sentencing factor.

1 Chapter 7 considers the categories of family relationships recognised for the purposes of identifying persons in need of protection under state and territory family violence legislation.
13.2 The underlying issue in Chapters 13 and 14 is the way in which the criminal law accounts for the nature and dynamics of family violence. Criminal laws are traditionally perceived as ‘incident-based’, in that they are focused upon discrete acts forming the basis of individual offences. As identified in Chapter 5, family violence is characterised by patterns of controlling, coercive or dominating behaviour and may include both physical and non-physical violence.

13.3 The Commissions consider these issues in light of the direction in the Terms of Reference to consider what, if any, improvements can be made to the current criminal law framework to protect victims of family violence, and in particular, women and children. This Inquiry presents the Commissions with a unique opportunity to explore ways in which legal frameworks can be improved in order to better protect victims of family violence—even where no issues arise from the practical interaction of family violence laws with the criminal law. In the Commissions’ view, a broad interpretation of the Terms of Reference calls for an assessment of how well the criminal justice system deals with family violence. A key consideration in undertaking this assessment is the Commissions’ guiding principle of fairness. That is, ensuring that legal responses to family violence are fair and just—holding those who use family violence accountable for their actions, providing protection to victims and ensuring that accused persons are treated in accordance with Australia’s human rights obligations.

13.4 Criminal law responses are not, however, a stand-alone solution to family violence. The Commissions acknowledge that there is a more general issue about whether escalating a penal response to family violence is the best or only way for society to mark its condemnation of what is clearly abhorrent behaviour. The Commissions have heard that, in some cases, a blunt penal response can escalate violent behaviour and fail to address its causes. Such an approach can also have particularly adverse impacts upon Indigenous peoples. Consistent with the Commissions’ guiding principle of seamlessness, the measures considered in this chapter and Chapter 14 are intended to form part of an integrated response to family violence, which focuses on prevention as well as punishment.

13.5 The Commissions recognise that several state and territory governments have given considerable attention to some of the issues addressed in this and the following chapter. Some matters have been the subject of dedicated reviews and consequent legislative reforms. In some cases, jurisdictions have taken divergent approaches to certain issues. Some differences appear to reflect jurisdiction-specific policy positions on matters extending beyond family violence. In acknowledging these matters, the Commissions have approached this chapter and Chapter 14 from the perspective of facilitating the continuous improvement of criminal law responses to family violence.

---

2 However, as noted below, there is precedent in some offence provisions for the recognition of courses of conduct in respect of certain criminal behaviour.
4 See, eg, Australian Law Reform Commission, Same Crime, Same Time: Sentencing of Federal Offenders, Report 103 (2006), [29.40]–[29.73].
5 For example, numerous reports and reviews in the last few decades have considered the issue of defences to homicide in cases involving family violence. These are considered in Ch 14.
Recognising family violence in criminal offences

Criticisms of the incident-focused nature of criminal offences

Case study

‘Some of the women I have assisted have experienced years of violence, including rapes, which have been reduced to one charge of common assault. There is no way a just sentence for her suffering and trauma, and the harm done to society by his actions, can be applied to a single charge of common assault no matter how sensitive and insightful the magistrate is.’

One woman experienced a year of social isolation, food deprivation, constant sexual assault and severe physical violence. The police pressed one charge of common assault and one charge of actual bodily harm in respect of injuries they were able to photograph. At court the police prosecutor accepted a plea bargain and dropped one of the charges without consulting the woman who was present in court ready to appear and give evidence. The offender admitted to a third party that he had been assaulting his wife but the evidence was not used because it did not relate to a specific incident of assault. The offender received a good behaviour bond.6

13.6 The above case study echoes the criticisms advanced by some commentators about the way in which the dynamics of family violence are viewed in criminal offences. Some have argued that the predominantly incident-focused nature of most criminal offences fails to take account of the ‘patterns of power and control’ in family violence cases and, consequently, ‘the full measure of injury that these patterns inflict’.7 Where offences are framed in terms of discrete incidents—for example, an assault occurring in the context of family violence8—the investigation and prosecution will focus on conduct relevant to establishing each element of the offence. A broader history of abuse may be perceived as irrelevant to the immediate offence charged.9

13.7 During the Inquiry, lawyers representing victims of family violence informed the Commissions that persons who have committed family violence over a period of time are often prosecuted for only a small number of incidents.10 It may be difficult to

6 Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.
8 For a recent summary of offences commonly charged in the family violence context in NSW see C Ringland and J Fitzgerald, Factors which Influence the Sentencing of Domestic Violence Offenders, New South Wales Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research Issues Paper 48 (July 2010).
9 However, evidence of broader histories of abuse may be admissible in the prosecution of individual offences where relevant to a fact in issue and subject to exclusionary rules. This point is discussed below.
10 Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.
prove specific incidents in the course of ongoing violence to the requisite standard because:

- victims may be unable to recall the dates or times of particular incidents;
- victims may not have reported incidents at the time, which may be due to reasons including: fear; unawareness of the criminal nature of the violent behaviour; a desire to protect the person committing the violence from criminal sanctions; unawareness or inaccessibility of services; or lack of confidence in the legal response;
- victims may have explained away their injuries to third parties, for the above reasons;
- evidence of the victim’s disclosures to third parties, such as friends or counsellors, may be inadmissible as hearsay evidence;
- corroborating evidence may be of limited probative value—for example, the evidence of neighbours who heard incidents through a wall, or that of young children present in the home; and
- there may be no evidence of injuries or harm suffered at the time a complaint is made, particularly where non-physical abuse is alleged.11

13.8 Some commentators have argued that the incident-based focus of the criminal law has several adverse consequences in a family violence context. Where a course of violent behaviour is reduced to a small number of charges, it is said that the criminal law fails to punish adequately the harm done to the victim, and does not publicly recognise and condemn the seriousness of family violence.12

13.9 Others have suggested that isolating specific incidents from a victim’s broader history of violence can damage the credibility of his or her evidence in respect of the offences prosecuted. It is said that a break in the ‘natural sequence of narrative evidence’, can render the victim’s account of specific incidents ‘incoherent’ and ‘unpersuasive’.13 A narrow recognition of family violence in criminal offences can have a flow-on effect to other legal frameworks that depend on the criminal law—such as victims’ compensation— with the result that family violence victims are under-compensated.14

11 Ibid.
13. Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing

Current approaches to recognising family violence in criminal offences

13.10 Notwithstanding the traditionally incident-focused nature of criminal law, family violence has received varying degrees of recognition in criminal offences in Australian and overseas jurisdictions. Forms of recognition—separately addressed below—have included:

• a specific offence of family violence, based upon a course of conduct;
• course of conduct-based offences, covering certain family violence related conduct—for example, offences in the nature of the persistent sexual abuse of children;
• aggravated forms of existing offences where they are committed against persons in a defined family relationship with the offender—which attract higher maximum penalties;
• the designation of certain offences as ‘family violence offences’ which do not attract higher maximum penalties;
• specific offences of economic and emotional abuse;
• in the prosecution of offences under general criminal laws, the admission of evidence of the relationship between the accused person and the victim—including previous violence—where it is relevant to the facts in issue; and
• in federal jurisdictions in which primary responsibility for criminal law is vested in state and territory governments—federal offences relevant to the family violence context.

An umbrella offence of family violence

13.11 Family violence is not a specific offence in most common law jurisdictions, including Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States. In 2003, the United Kingdom government rejected an umbrella offence of family violence on the basis that a separate offence would reduce the range of available charging options from among existing offences, and thereby ‘diminish the offence’.15

13.12 In the United States, the Maine legislature considered the introduction of a discrete family violence offence in 2007.16 However, it ultimately enacted a series of individual ‘domestic violence crimes’ based upon existing offences committed against persons defined as ‘family or household members’.17 The Joint Standing Committee on 16 A Bill to Protect Families and Enhance Public Safety by Making Domestic Violence a Crime 2007 SP 571 LD 1627, 123rd session (Maine).

Criminal Justice and Public Safety recommended the use of specific offence provisions rather than an umbrella offence in order to conform to technical drafting standards.\(^1\)

13.13 Several European jurisdictions have recognised a specific offence of family violence. A Council of Europe Report indicates that the following countries have specific offences: Andorra, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Iceland, Montenegro, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, and Sweden.\(^1\) Sweden explained the introduction of its specific offence as follows:

> Its purpose is to deal with repeated male violence towards women with whom they have a close relationship. The introduction of the new offence will make it possible for the courts to substantially increase the penal value for the acts committed against the woman, when the acts are part of a process which constitutes a violation of integrity. Thus it will be possible, in a much better way than with existing legislation, to take the entire situation of the abused woman into account. The new crime does not exclude that the perpetrator at the same time can be prosecuted, for instance, for rape or other gross crimes.\(^2\)

13.14 The Indian Penal Code includes an offence of cruelty to women.\(^2\) In 2005, a study conducted on the operation of this section concluded that, of 30 cases it had studied, no prosecution had succeeded under that section. Although many in the legal system were of the view that the section was being misused, the study concluded that victims thought the section required strengthening and non-governmental organisations considered it the only effective mechanism of redress for victims of family violence.\(^2\)

13.15 A potential umbrella offence has received limited consideration in Australian jurisdictions. For example, in 2000, the Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code (Qld) recommended that the Queensland Government investigate the creation of a ‘specific offence of domestic or family violence’, in order to ‘specifically name the behaviour and encourage the prosecution of it’.\(^2\) The Taskforce recommended that an investigation should ‘canvass the creation of a course-of-conduct offence’, in similar terms to the offence of torture in s 320A of the Criminal Code (Qld).\(^2\)

\(^{21}\) Indian Penal Code 1860 s 498A, introduced by Criminal Law (Second Amendment) Act 1983 (India). This provision prohibits husbands, or relatives of husbands, from subjecting a woman to ‘cruelty’, with a maximum sentence of three years. ‘Cruelty’ is defined to include any wilful conduct likely to drive the woman to commit suicide, or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) of the woman; or harassment of the woman, with a view to coercing her or a related person to meet unlawful demands for property or security, or as a consequence of a failure to meet such a demand.

\(^{24}\) Ibid, 81.
13. Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing

13.16 While there is academic support for a specific course of conduct-based offence,\(^{25}\) there is no consensus on its precise formulation. For example, Professor Deborah Tuerkheimer advocates legislation that would require proof of ‘a course of conduct’ that the defendant ‘knows or reasonably should know ... is likely to result in substantial power or control over the victim’.\(^{26}\) Professor Alafair Burke has suggested that the offence should instead require that the defendant engaged in a pattern of family violence with the intention of gaining power or control over the victim.\(^{27}\)

13.17 There is precedent for course of conduct-based offences in Australian criminal laws. For example, all states and territories have introduced offences in the nature of the persistent sexual abuse of children.\(^{28}\) These offences are considered in detail in Chapter 25. In short, they were enacted to recognise the difficulties of particularising incidents of repetitive conduct.\(^{29}\) They generally capture a number of unlawful sexual acts, and in some cases expressly provide that it is not necessary to prove the dates or exact circumstances of individual incidents.

13.18 Where available, offences in the nature of torture—namely, those covering the intentional infliction of severe pain or suffering on the victim over a period of time—may also be relevant in the family violence context.\(^{30}\) In 2000, the Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code (Qld) recommended that the offence of torture in s 320A of the Criminal Code (Qld) be amended to include an example of how the offence could be used for offences involving domestic and family violence.\(^{31}\)

Aggravated offences

13.19 The criminal legislation of South Australia and Western Australia makes provision for aggravated offences that are committed in a family violence context. In South Australia, the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) creates an aggravated offence where the offender committed an offence knowing that the victim was:

---

\(^{28}\) See, eg, Model Criminal Code Officers Committee of the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), cl 5.2.14.

\(^{29}\) See, eg, Model Criminal Code Officers Committee of the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General, Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Sexual Offences Against the Person (1999), 133–137. See also, S v The Queen (1989) 168 CLR 266.

\(^{30}\) See, eg, Criminal Code (Qld) s 320A; Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 36.

• a spouse, former spouse, domestic partner or former domestic partner of the offender; or
• a child in the custody of, or who normally resides with: the offender, a spouse, former spouse, domestic partner or former domestic partner of the offender.\(^ {32}\)

13.20 The section also creates aggravated offences where the offender abused a position of trust or authority in committing the offence, and where the offender committed the offence in the course of deliberately and systematically inflicting severe pain on the victim.\(^ {33}\) These factors appear to be based upon the provisions in the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) Model Criminal Code.\(^ {34}\)

13.21 In respect of sentencing, the Act appears to modify the operation of the common law principle articulated in R v De Simoni,\(^ {35}\) whereby an accused person who is convicted of a basic offence cannot be sentenced on the basis of circumstances of aggravation which would have warranted a conviction for a more serious offence. Section 5AA(6) provides that the section does not prevent a court from taking into account, in the usual way, the circumstances of and surrounding the commission of an offence for the purpose of determining sentence. The section applies notwithstanding the fact that the relevant circumstances would have justified an aggravated form of the charge and sets out the following example to illustrate this point:

A person is charged with a basic offence and the court finds that the offence was committed in circumstances that would have justified a charge of the offence in its aggravated form. In this case, the court may, in sentencing, take into account the circumstances of the aggravation for the purpose of determining penalty but must (of course) fix a penalty within the limits appropriate to the basic offence.

13.22 In Western Australia, offences against the person are treated as aggravated if, among other things, the offender is in a ‘family and domestic relationship with the victim’,\(^ {36}\) a child was present at the time of the offence, or the conduct of the offender constituted a breach of a protection order.\(^ {37}\) The criminal legislation sets out higher penalties for a number of offences, including assault and causing grievous bodily harm where those offences are committed in aggravating circumstances.\(^ {38}\)

13.23 In both jurisdictions the existence of a family relationship between the victim and offender is expressed as a circumstance of aggravation.\(^ {39}\) There is limited precedent for aggravated offences in a family violence context in European countries. In some cases, jurisdictions with mandatory minimum sentencing schemes provide for \(^{32}\) Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1925 (SA) s 5AA(1)(g).

\(^{33}\) Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1925 (SA) ss 5AA(1)(a), 5AA(1)(i).

\(^{34}\) Model Criminal Code (1st ed, 2009), cl 5.1.41.

\(^{35}\) R v De Simoni (1981) 147 CLR 383.

\(^{36}\) ‘Family and domestic relationship’ in s 221 has the same meaning that it has in the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 4: Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 221(2).

\(^{37}\) Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 221.

\(^{38}\) The Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 297, sets out a maximum penalty of imprisonment for 10 years for grievous bodily harm, and imprisonment for 14 years where grievous bodily harm is committed in circumstances of aggravation.

\(^{39}\) The recognition of family relationships in criminal laws is considered further in Ch 14.
a higher minimum sentence in their aggravated family-violence related offences. For example, art 172 of the Criminal Code of Bosnia and Herzegovina provides that:

Aggravated Bodily Injury

(1) Whoever inflicts a serious bodily injury upon another person or severely impairs his health, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term between six months and five years.

(2) Whoever perpetrates the criminal offence referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article against his spouse, common-law partner, or to the parent of his child with whom he does not share a household, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term between one and five years.40

13.24 In the United States, several states recognise aggravated forms of assault or battery in respect of offences committed against persons with whom the offender is in a defined family relationship. Most criminal family-violence related provisions incorporate existing offences by reference—or are based upon the elements of existing offences—with an additional requirement of a specified relationship between the victim and defendant.41 Offences against persons in defined family relationships typically carry higher penalties than basic offences. For example, in Georgia, a simple assault committed against a spouse, parent, child, sibling, co-habitant or other protected person is punishable ‘for a misdemeanour of a high and aggravated nature’, whereas a simple assault in the absence of a family relationship is punishable as a misdemeanour only.42

The relationship between aggravated offences and sentencing factors

13.25 Another issue is the relationship between aggravated offences and sentencing factors—in particular, aggravating sentencing factors, that is, those that increase the penalty to be imposed within the prescribed maximum for the offence. One relevant issue is when a particular circumstance ought to be specified as an element of an aggravated offence, or left to general sentencing discretion in respect of basic offences—or prescribed as an aggravating factor in sentencing legislation. In practical terms, key differences between these alternatives include the following:

- an aggravated offence attracts a higher maximum penalty than the basic offence—whereas an aggravating sentencing factor justifies a higher penalty

---

41 See, eg Alabama Code §§ 13A–6–130 (domestic violence offences based against family members); Mississippi Code § 97–3–7(3)(4) (domestic violence offences based upon assaults committed against family members); Missouri Annotated Statutes § 565.072–074 (domestic violence offences based upon various offences against the person, including attempted murder and causing physical injury); Montana Code § 45–5–206(3) (partner or family member assault); Nevada Revised Statutes § 200.485(1) (battery which constitutes domestic violence); and Ohio Revised Code § 2919.25(D) (domestic violence offence based upon causing or threatening to cause physical harm to a family member).
42 Georgia Code § 16–5–20(d).
within the existing maximum for the basic offence,\(^{43}\) and a non-mitigating sentencing factor will neither increase nor decrease culpability;\(^{44}\)

- in respect of aggravated offences, it is generally accepted that the relevant circumstance of aggravation should be specified in the charge,\(^{45}\) and

- aggravated offences require proof of the circumstances of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt—whereas the applicable standard of proof in sentencing is determined by reference to whether the factor is adverse or favourable to the interests of the accused person.\(^{46}\)

13.26 The Commissions have not identified any existing guidelines delineating when a factor should be prescribed as an element of an aggravated offence and when it should be treated as a circumstance of aggravation in sentencing. The former Standing Committee of Attorneys-General Model Criminal Code Officers Committee (MCCOC)—now the Model Criminal Law Officers Committee (MCLOC)—considered this issue in its 1998 Report on the Model Criminal Code—Chapter 5: Non-Fatal Offences Against the Person. The Committee observed that ‘there are no generally articulated or agreed guidelines in existence on the question whether and when it is desirable, as a matter of principle, to make a matter one for trial or sentence’. The Committee took the view that a principal guiding criterion should be ‘whether the legislature desires that the aggravating criterion should be the subject of decision by a jury for the purposes of guilt or innocence, and whether it is sensible to ask the jury to make such a decision’.\(^{47}\)

13.27 The Committee proposed a series of factors of aggravation for non-fatal offences against the person, including:

- in the case of the model offence of intentionally causing serious harm, the commission of the offence during torture (defined as the deliberate and systemic infliction of pain on the victim over a period of time);

- the commission of an offence by the use or threatened use of an offensive weapon;

- the commission of an offence against a child under the age of 10 years;

- the commission of an offence against a person in abuse of a position of trust; and

---

\(^{43}\) Subject to the principle in \textit{R v De Simoni} (1981) 147 CLR 383, discussed further below.

\(^{44}\) The use of non-mitigating sentencing factors in the family violence context is discussed below in relation to sentencing.

\(^{46}\) Matters adverse to the interests of an accused person must be established beyond reasonable doubt, whereas matters favourable to his or her interests need only be established on the balance of probabilities: \textit{R v Olbrich} (1999) 199 CLR 270, 281. The labelling of factors as aggravating or mitigating is not necessarily determinative of their characterisation as adverse or favourable: \textit{R v Storey} [1998] 1 VR, 371.

13. Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing

• the commission of an offence against a person in abuse of a position of authority.\textsuperscript{48}

13.28 The Committee considered the inclusion of breach of a court order—for example, a protection order—directed against the kind of conduct involved in the offence. The Committee commented that this factor ‘generalised a factor of aggravation common to a number of stalking laws’.\textsuperscript{49} However, the Committee concluded that this factor was ‘not in the same order’ as the other factors, and could be dealt with by way of sentencing discretion. It therefore raised the model maximum penalty for stalking from three years to five years.\textsuperscript{50}

13.29 However, the Model Criminal Code provisions have not been implemented consistently in state and territory legislation. For example, the NSW sentencing legislation includes some of the model provisions on aggravated offences—or broadly similar circumstances of aggravation—as aggravating factors in sentencing.\textsuperscript{51} As identified above, the family-violence related aggravated offences in the South Australian criminal legislation include, but are not limited to, the Model Criminal Code provisions.\textsuperscript{52}

13.30 A further issue relevant to the relationship between any new aggravated family-violence related offences and circumstances of aggravation in sentencing is the principle articulated in \textit{R v De Simoni} as noted above. It provides that:

\begin{quote}
\begin{itemize}
\item a judge, in imposing sentence, is entitled to consider all of the conduct of the accused—including that which would aggravate the offence—but cannot take into account circumstances of aggravation which would have warranted a conviction for a more serious offence.\textsuperscript{53}
\end{itemize}
\end{quote}

13.31 Consequences of this principle include the following:

• where an accused person is convicted of a basic offence—the facts of which involve a particular circumstance that may constitute both the elements of an uncharged, aggravated form of that offence, and an aggravating factor in sentencing the basic offence—a court may not treat that circumstance as an aggravating factor in sentencing the basic offence;\textsuperscript{54} and

• where a sentencing court is considering an aggravating factor in the sentencing of an offence—but that factor could have formed the basis of a charge for a different offence—it is necessary to determine whether that other offence would \textsuperscript{48} Ibid, cl 5.1.38, 111–117. These provisions appear in the consolidated \textit{Model Criminal Code (1\textsuperscript{st} ed, 2009)} as cl 5.41.

\textsuperscript{49} Ibid, 115.
\textsuperscript{50} Ibid, 115.
\textsuperscript{51} See, eg, \textit{Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999} (NSW) ss 21A(2)(a),(c), (ea), (k).
\textsuperscript{52} See, eg, \textit{Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935} (SA) ss 5AA (a)-(d), 5AA(i). See also s 5AA(1)(e), which adopts the Model Criminal Code provision for the commission of an offence against a child but specifies different age ranges.
\textsuperscript{53} \textit{R v De Simoni} (1981) 147 CLR 383, 389.
have made the offender liable to a ‘more serious’ penalty. If so, the factor cannot be treated as an aggravating factor in sentencing the first-mentioned offence.55

13.32 Further, issues of double punishment may arise where a person is convicted of an aggravated offence, and the relevant circumstance of aggravation is also an aggravating factor in sentencing. The Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) makes provision for this contingency. Section 21A(2) provides that the court is not to have additional regard to an enumerated aggravating sentencing factor if it is an element of the offence. This provision has been interpreted as prohibiting the ‘double counting’ of circumstances of aggravation in both the elements of an offence and in sentencing.56 However, the phrase ‘additional regard’ contemplates that a sentencing court may have some regard to the aggravated elements of an offence. The extent to which a court may do so is a question of degree—for example, a circumstance of aggravation may be relevant to a sentencing court’s consideration of the nature and seriousness of the facts of the offence.57

13.33 The NSW Court of Criminal Appeal has held that, where a circumstance of aggravation in the offence is particularly heinous, in that it ‘transcends that which would be regarded as an inherent characteristic of the offence’, it may be regarded as an aggravating factor in sentencing.58 The Court has further identified the necessity of adopting a purposive approach to the comparison of circumstances of aggravation in offences and aggravating factors in sentencing.59

13.34 The introduction of any aggravated family-violence related offences would therefore require consideration of their relationship to existing circumstances of aggravation in sentencing legislation. For example—in addition to the prohibition on ‘double counting’ discussed above—the NSW sentencing legislation preserves the De Simoni principle. Section 21(4) provides that the Court is not to have regard to any legislatively prescribed aggravating or mitigating factors in sentencing if it would be contrary to any Act or rule of law to do so. As mentioned earlier, South Australia appears to have taken a different approach, enabling the court to take into account circumstances that would have justified a charge for an aggravated offence in sentencing a basic offence, provided that the sentence is within the prescribed limit for the basic offence.60

Designated family violence offences not attracting higher maximum penalty

13.35 As discussed in Chapter 5, the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) designates as ‘domestic violence offences’ certain offences committed against persons with whom the offender is in a defined family relationship.61

---

58 Elyard v R [2006] NSWCCA, [43].
59 Ibid, [9]–[10].
60 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 5AA(6).
61 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 12.
Convictions for domestic violence offences are specifically identified on offenders’ criminal records. This enables the court to build a progressive record of family-violence related criminal conduct, which may be taken into account in the trial of subsequent offences. For example, the Bail Act 1978 (NSW) excludes the presumption in favour of bail in respect of domestic violence offences where the accused person has ‘a history of violence’. The latter term is defined as including a guilty finding within the last 10 years of a ‘personal violence offence’. The Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) provides that a record of previous convictions is an aggravating factor in sentencing.

13.36 While the ACT family violence legislation recognises ‘domestic violence offences’ for the purpose of defining domestic violence, it does not make express provision for a scheme for the recording and subsequent consideration of convictions for domestic violence offences. However, previous convictions for domestic violence offences—or those not specifically designated but nevertheless committed in circumstances of family violence—may be relevant to the general exercise of discretion in relation to bail applications and in sentencing.

Offences of economic and emotional abuse

13.37 Tasmania is the only Australian jurisdiction with specific offences in respect of economic and emotional abuse in the context of family violence. In respect of economic abuse, the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) requires the offender to have an intention to unreasonably control or intimidate his or her spouse or partner (the victim), or cause mental harm, apprehension or fear in committing certain acts of economic abuse. These acts include:

- coercing the victim to relinquish control over assets or income;
- disposing of relevant property without the consent of the victim or affected child;
- preventing the victim from accessing joint assets to meet normal household expenditure; and
- withholding financial support reasonably necessary for the maintenance of the victim and any affected child.

---

62 In addition, the recording of a domestic violence offence enables the prosecution to make an application to the court requesting that previous convictions are similarly recorded as domestic violence offences: Ibid s 12(3)-(6).
63 Bail Act 1978 (NSW) s 9(1A)(1). The Bail Act also displaces the presumption in favour of bail where the accused person has been violent to the other person in the past, whether or not the accused person has been convicted of an offence in respect of the violence: s 9A (1A)(b).
64 Bail Act 1978 (NSW) s 9(1A)(2). Bail is discussed in Ch 10.
66 Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 13, sch 1. But see Bail Act 1992 (ACT) s 9F.
67 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 8.
In respect of emotional abuse, the Family Violence Act prohibits a person from pursuing ‘a course of conduct that he or she knows, or ought to know, is likely to have the effect of unreasonably controlling or intimidating, or causing mental harm, apprehension or fear in, his or her spouse or partner’. 68

The Tasmanian Attorney-General explained the rationale for the economic and emotional abuse offences as recognising the non-physical dimensions of family violence, addressing the tendency of such abuse to undermine victims’ capacity to take action, and acknowledging the need to take a more holistic view of family violence. 69

The Commissions are not aware of any prosecutions under the Family Violence Act for either economic or emotional abuse. 70

Leading evidence of an accused person’s history of family violence

Where a person is charged with an offence alleged to have been committed as part of a broader course of family violence, family-violence related evidence—including evidence of uncharged acts of prior violence and the nature of the relationship between the parties—may be admissible, provided that it is relevant to a fact in issue. 71

For example, certain family-violence related evidence has been admitted to:

- prove motive or to establish the intent of the accused, or to negative a defence of accident, self-defence or provocation; 72
- assist the trier of fact to understand evidence that may otherwise be disjointed or implausible 73—for example, evidence demonstrating the accused person’s or victim’s state of mind; 74 and
- establish a tendency on the part of an accused person to resort to violence in specific circumstances, in support of a contention he did not act in self-defence. 75

---

68 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 9. ‘Course of conduct’ is defined to include limiting the freedom of movement of a person’s spouse or partner by means of threats or intimidation.

70 The 2008 review of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) commented that stakeholders were awaiting the first case based on the offence of economic abuse. While no charge had been brought for emotional abuse and intimidation, that ground has been used in support of applications for protection orders: Urbis, Review of the Family Violence Act 2004 (2008), prepared for the Department of Justice (Tas), 11–12.

71 Wilson v R (1970) 123 CLR 334, 339. Such evidence may also be excluded where its prejudicial value outweighs its probative value.

72 R v Anderson (2000) 1 VR 1, 12. For example, evidence of a victim’s fear of her partner has been admitted to support an inference that she did not provoke him to murder her: R v Gajanovic (2002) 130 A Crim R 179. See also R v Parsons (2000) 1 VR 161.

75 R v Middendorp [2010] VSC. The accused was found guilty of the defensive homicide of his partner: see R v Middendorp [2010] VSC.
13. Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing

Legislative guidance on family-violence related evidence

13.42 Victoria and Queensland have legislatively confirmed the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence in respect of certain criminal defences. These provisions are discussed in detail in the discussion of homicide defences in Chapter 14. In general terms, in Victoria, s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) provides that where circumstances of family violence are alleged in murder, defensive homicide or manslaughter cases, evidence of family violence may be relevant to establishing self-defence or duress. The section provides guidance about particular facts in issue to which evidence of family violence may be relevant, and the types of evidence that may be relevant.

13.43 The Queensland provision is framed in more general terms. Section 132B(2) of the Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) provides that ‘relevant evidence of the history of the domestic relationship between the defendant and the person against whom the offence was committed’ is admissible in criminal proceedings against a person for certain offences against the person, including homicide offences, offences endangering life or health and assaults.\(^76\) However, the provision has been judicially criticised as redundant because relevant evidence is, by definition, generally admissible.\(^77\) In 2000, the Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code (Qld) recommended that s 132B be repealed and replaced with:

\begin{quote}
a new scheme detailing the admissibility of evidence of the domestic relationship between the accused and the complainant/victim, and including the use of expert and lay testimony, the use to which the evidence can be put, and to which offences or defences it applies.\(^78\)
\end{quote}

Judicial guidance on family-violence related evidence

13.44 Judicial bench books in some states and territories also provide some guidance about the admissibility of family-violence related evidence.\(^79\) Notwithstanding these resources, some commentators have expressed concern about inconsistent judicial approaches to the admissibility of such evidence.\(^80\)

---

79 See, eg, Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Criminal Charge Book (updated 12 July 2010), 4.16, which refers to family-violence related case law; Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2005), 14.4.2.
Federal offences relevant in the family violence context

Australian federal offences

13.45 Federal criminal laws have limited relevance in the family violence context because they are confined to subject matters within Commonwealth legislative power. Chapter 5 identifies relevant federal offences including:

- the use of carriage or postal services to make threats, or menace, harass or cause offence; and
- conduct constituting economic abuse—for example, offences against social security legislation in respect of coercing a family member to claim a social security payment.

13.46 Chapter 5 also identifies potentially relevant federal offences, including:

- the use of carriage services for child abuse or child pornography material; and
- sexual servitude offences where the person committing the offence is in a defined family relationship with the victim.

United States federal offences

13.47 In the United States, the Violence Against Women Act created federal offences in respect of acts of family violence committed across state boundaries, including:

- travelling interstate with the intent to kill, injure, harass or intimidate a spouse, intimate partner, or dating partner and—in the course, or as a result, of such travel—committing or attempting to commit a crime of violence against that person, or placing that person in reasonable fear of death or serious bodily injury or causing substantial emotional distress to that person or a family member;
- travelling interstate with the intention to violate a protection order, and subsequently engaging in such conduct in violation of the order;
- causing another person to travel interstate by force, coercion, duress or fraud—and in the course, or as a result, of such conduct—violating a protection order, or attempting to commit a crime of violence against that person; and
- using mail, an interactive computer service or any facility of interstate or foreign commerce with the intent to kill, injure, harass or cause substantial emotional distress to another person.82

---

81 The Australian Constitution does not give the Australian Parliament a general power to make criminal laws. States and territories have primary constitutional responsibility for criminal law as part of their plenary powers to legislate for the peace, order and good government of their jurisdictions. The Commonwealth derives its constitutional authority primarily from specific heads of power in the Australian Constitution—for example, the enumerated legislative powers in s 51 and the executive power in s 61. See further Australian Law Reform Commission, Same Crime, Same Time: Sentencing of Federal Offenders, Report 103 (2006), [1.40]–[1.48].

13.48 The Gun Control Act similarly creates federal offences in relation to the possession and use of firearms and ammunition by persons who are the subject of protection orders, and those who are convicted of a ‘misdemeanour crime of domestic violence’. A ‘misdemeanour crime of domestic violence’ is defined as an offence under federal or state law which involves an element of the use or attempted use of physical force or threatened use of a deadly weapon, and is committed against an individual with whom the offender maintains a domestic relationship.\(^{83}\)

13.49 Maximum penalties for offences against the Violence Against Women Act are gradated according to the extent of bodily injury to the victim—ranging from life imprisonment if death of the victim results, to 5, 10 or 20 years imprisonment depending on the severity of bodily injury or the use of a dangerous weapon.\(^{84}\) Offences against the Gun Control Act carry a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment.\(^{85}\)

Canadian federal offences

13.50 As criminal law is generally a federal responsibility in Canada, its federal offences provide limited insights for comparative purposes. Family violence is prosecuted pursuant to federal offences of general application—for example: offences against the person;\(^{86}\) stalking, intimidation and harassment-based offences;\(^{87}\) child abuse and abduction offences;\(^{88}\) and breaching protection orders.\(^{89}\) Some aggravated offences of general application are relevant to the family violence context—for example, the Criminal Code recognises murder committed in the course of stalking as first-degree murder, where the offender intended to instil fear in the victim for his or her safety, or that of anyone known to him or her.\(^{90}\)

Options for reform

13.51 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views on the following non-exclusive options for the recognition of family violence in state and territory criminal law offences:

- an umbrella offence of family violence, capturing courses of conduct committed by an offender who is in a family relationship with the victim, where such behaviour is part of a pattern of power and control over the victim;\(^{91}\)

---

\(^{83}\) Gun Control Act of 1968 18 USC (US) § 922(d), (g).

\(^{84}\) Violence Against Women Act of 1994 18 USC (US) §§ 2261(b), 2262(b).

\(^{85}\) Gun Control Act of 1968 18 USC (US)§ 924(2).

\(^{87}\) Ibid ss 264, 264.1, 372, 423, 430.

\(^{89}\) Ibid ss 127, 145(3), 733.1, 811.

\(^{90}\) Ibid s 231(6).

an aggravated offence in respect of offences committed against victims with whom the offender is in a family relationship, and where the offence committed formed part of a pattern of controlling, coercive or dominating behaviour;92
• sub-categories of existing offences committed by an offender who is in a family relationship with the victim but which do not attract higher maximum penalties;93 and
• offences of economic and emotional abuse committed in a family violence context.94

13.52 The Commissions also considered the recognition of family violence in federal criminal offences. In particular, the Commissions sought stakeholder views about the possibility of aggravated federal offences, or sub-categories of existing federal offences committed in the context of family violence.95

Submissions and consultations

13.53 While many submissions supported improvements to the criminal justice response to family violence, there was considerable division of opinion on the preferable form of response.

An umbrella offence of family violence

13.54 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views about the necessity and feasibility of creating a specific offence of family violence, and how such an offence might be conceptualised. On the latter issue, the Commissions asked whether it would be feasible to create a two-tiered offence that captured both coercive conduct and physical violence committed in a family violence context.96 There was a relatively even division of views among the limited number of submissions responding to this question.

In support of an umbrella offence

13.55 A common theme in those submissions and consultations supporting an umbrella offence was an identified need to recognise the pattern-based nature of family violence and its full impact upon victims.97 For example, one legal service provider stated that existing offences and other measures—such as the use of representative charges in sentencing—do not ‘fully paint the picture of the ongoing humiliation, terror

92 Ibid, Questions 7–2(a), 7–3, 7–4.
93 Ibid, Question 7–2(b).
94 Ibid, Question 5–5.
95 Ibid, Question 7–4.
96 Ibid, Question 7–1.
97 Confidential, Submission FV 190, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010. A small number of submissions from individuals supported a discrete offence without providing reasons: Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 125, 20 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 109, 8 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; M Condon, Submission FV 45, 18 May 2010. See also Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010, which commented that ‘the sector is generally supportive’ of a discrete offence.
and suffering’ experienced by victims of family violence. It suggested that ‘a specific offence of family violence may allow for all of this evidence to be put to a court through establishing a pattern of behaviour’.98

13.56 Other submissions argued that it would be preferable to recognise the dynamics of family violence through means other than sentencing—including by way of an umbrella offence. For example, in supporting a discrete offence, Professor Patricia Eastal argued that judicial sentencing discretion in intra-familial sexual assault cases can be affected by ‘mythology that characterises assault as perpetrated by strangers in unfamiliar places ... and involving physical injury’.99 Eastal referred to a body of research on the trial and sentencing of sexual assaults committed in the family violence context, which found that sentences did not consistently recognise the degree of suffering experienced by victims—in particular that associated with a breach of trust. She commented that:

this research suggests that although judges today generally reject the view that a prior relationship is a mitigating factor in sentencing, they do not appear to focus on breach of trust as an aggravating variable as they do in cases of parenting-type relationships ... Despite breach of trust being stressed more in intra-family cases, sentences in those cases remained lower than where the offender was unknown to the victim and where the rape included violence rather than merely coercion.100

13.57 While not expressing a view on a discrete offence, the NSW Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW ODPP) commented that—in light of problems associated with the admissibility of uncharged conduct in sentencing—the best way to ensure that a pattern of violent behaviour is placed before the court is by the use of an offence incorporating a course of conduct.101

13.58 Some family violence service providers and individuals suggested that a discrete offence would perform an educative function. In particular, it would convey the seriousness and pattern-based nature of family violence to the community, offenders, and other participants in the criminal justice system—including judicial officers and legal representatives.102

Against an umbrella offence

13.59 Stakeholders opposing a discrete offence of family violence raised two common issues. First, some stakeholders endorsed the Commissions’ preliminary views on the 98 Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010. See also C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010, who suggested that a discrete offence was necessary to recognise that family violence includes elements of violence that are not usually present in violence committed against persons unrelated to the offender.

99 P Eastal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
102 Confidential, Submission FV 190, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010.
difficulties associated with conceptualising and particularising the offence. For example, the Local Court of NSW commented that it would be difficult to conceptualise the elements of the offence, ‘given the spectrum of criminality of conduct that may amount to family violence’. The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria commented that a discrete offence may introduce unnecessary complexity in the criminal justice process.

13.60 The Deputy Chief Magistrate of South Australia, Dr Andrew Cannon, commented that a discrete offence may raise constitutional issues. A failure to identify conduct captured by the offence with sufficient precision may ‘give the police and the courts ... a legislative function in defining criminal conduct unknown to the existing law’. The No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association commented that the broad parameters of an umbrella offence may result in police reluctance to lay such a charge.

13.61 A second common issue in submissions and consultations was a preference for other approaches to recognising family violence in the criminal law. Several stakeholders suggested that conduct constituting family violence is adequately recognised in existing criminal offences. In addition, some agencies and organisations supported the NSW model of designating certain offences as ‘family violence offences’ where they are committed against persons in a defined relationship with the offender. As noted above, this creates a history of family-violence related conduct that is relevant in future proceedings—for example, in relation to bail, sentencing and protection orders. National Legal Aid, Legal Aid NSW and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network argued that this was a preferable means of providing the courts with offenders’ histories of family violence.

13.62 Other submissions argued that sentencing laws and practices were more appropriate forms of recognition than a new offence. For example, the Local Court of NSW referred to s 21A(2) of the Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW), which provides for specific aggravating factors in sentencing. The Court noted that some factors were included specifically to address offences committed in the family violence context. The Court considered that this provision—together with ‘the

---

104 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
105 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
107 Ibid.
110 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
111 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
consistent approach of the courts in NSW ... to reinforce the need for general deterrence and denunciation”—was preferable to an umbrella offence. The Law Society of NSW made a general comment that the options for reform appeared to assume that family violence ‘is not sufficiently taken into account in the sentencing process’. It emphasised the importance of sentencing discretion to take account of the ‘varied and dynamic’ situations of family violence that attract criminal sanctions.

13.63 Some submissions argued that a more effective response would be to improve the practical application of existing laws. The Queensland Law Society identified the ‘real issue’ as ‘the desire, ability and resources of police’ to prosecute family-violence related offences, and ‘the granting of appropriate penalties by courts in sentencing’. It supported a coordinated community response and the deployment of specialist police to family justice centres.

Women’s Legal Service Queensland argued that a new offence would not address the ‘existing problems of a lack of understanding of the dynamics of violence’ on the part of lawyers, judicial officers and police.

13.64 Other arguments against the introduction of a new offence were that the consolidation of existing offences into a single category would not necessarily improve outcomes, and the desirability of maintaining parity of criminal law responses to all types of violence. Two stakeholders suggested that a separate offence should be the subject of further inquiry.

Conceptualising an umbrella offence

13.65 The majority of submissions did not make any specific proposals about how an umbrella offence could be conceptualised. Easteal supported the illustrative example in the Consultation Paper of a two-tiered offence incorporating coercive conduct and physical violence. Easteal recommended the inclusion of sexual violence as an element of the offence and emphasised the need to clearly define the types of coercion and control captured by the offence. The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s

---

112 Ibid.
113 Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010.
114 Ibid. See also North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency, Submission FV 194, 25 June 2010, which expressed similar views on sentencing discretion in family violence cases generally. Sentencing is considered further below.
117 Ibid.
118 Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
120 Confidential, Submission FV 198, 25 June 2010.
121 Inner City Legal Centre and The Safe Relationships Project, Submission FV 192, 25 June 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. See also Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010 which acknowledged the need to recognise the nature and dynamics of family violence and discussed the merits and drawbacks of various options, but expressed uncertainty as to how best to proceed.
122 P Easteal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
123 Ibid.
Court of Victoria commented on the potential difficulty of conceptualising a two-tiered approach.\textsuperscript{124}

\underline{Aggravated offences occurring in a family violence context}

13.66 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views as to whether state and territory criminal legislation should provide that offences are aggravated where the offender is in a family relationship with the victim, and where the offence formed part of a pattern of controlling, coercive or dominating behaviour.\textsuperscript{125} The Commissions asked whether a similar approach should be taken in respect of federal offences, and sought stakeholder views on relevant federal offences.\textsuperscript{126}

13.67 The Commissions also sought stakeholder views on the family relationships that should be recognised for the purposes of aggravated offences.\textsuperscript{127} As the recognition of categories of family relationships in criminal laws is relevant to offences, defences and sentencing, it is considered separately in Chapter 14.

13.68 There was no identifiable consensus among stakeholders on the desirability of an aggravated offence. Submissions were divided between recognising family violence as an aggravated offence or as an aggravating factor in sentencing basic offences.\textsuperscript{128} Of those submissions supporting an aggravated offence, there were differences of opinion about the appropriate basis for aggravation.\textsuperscript{129}

\underline{Submissions and consultations supporting an aggravated offence}

13.69 The majority of stakeholders supporting an aggravated offence did not advance reasons for their positions.\textsuperscript{130} However, some stakeholders considered that an aggravated offence—and the associated higher maximum penalties—would appropriately recognise the seriousness and unacceptability of family violence.\textsuperscript{131} One legal service provider suggested that an aggravated offence was preferable to an umbrella offence because it was based on existing criminal offences.\textsuperscript{132} Another

\begin{footnotes}
\textsuperscript{124} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{125} Consultation Paper, Question 7–2.
\textsuperscript{127} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{128} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{129} Aggravating and mitigating factors in sentencing are considered below.
\textsuperscript{130} As outlined below.
\textsuperscript{132} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, Submission FV 136, 22 June 2010; National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010.\end{footnotes} recommended that an aggravated offence should also attract higher minimum penalties, on the basis that minimum penalties are more commonly applied.\textsuperscript{133}

The basis of aggravation

13.70 The majority of submissions supporting an aggravated offence concurred with the Commissions’ preliminary view that a family relationship alone was an insufficient basis for aggravation.\textsuperscript{134} However, one legal service provider argued that a family relationship should be recognised as a circumstance of aggravation of itself, because it may be difficult to prove, in addition, a pattern of behaviour.\textsuperscript{135} Conversely, Professor Julie Stubbs submitted that a pattern of behaviour should be the sole basis for aggravation rather than a family relationship per se. Stubbs argued that proceeding on the basis of a family relationship would undeniably import an assessment of ‘the importance of family versus strangers’.\textsuperscript{136}

Submissions and consultations opposing an aggravated offence

13.71 Several stakeholders argued that aggravating circumstances associated with family-violence related conduct are more appropriately addressed in sentencing,\textsuperscript{137} or that patterns of behaviour are matters for judicial education and training.\textsuperscript{138} Some NSW-based agencies favoured the legislative designation of aggravating circumstances in sentencing, suggesting that existing provisions in s 21A of the Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) already address most family-violence related offences in an adequate manner.\textsuperscript{139}

13.72 Others emphasised the importance of judicial sentencing discretion.\textsuperscript{140} The North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency (NAAJA) recommended that ‘courts should retain unfettered discretion to sentence a defendant according to the seriousness of a particular case’.\textsuperscript{141} It argued that:

aggravated factors, of themselves, are of little utility and can result in unjust sentencing outcomes. For example, a court may consider itself compelled to sentence

\textsuperscript{133} Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{138} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.

more harshly on the basis of a so-called aggravating factor where the circumstances of the case would not otherwise warrant it to sentence in that manner.\textsuperscript{142}

13.73 NAAJA considered that the concept of ‘controlling, coercive or dominating’ behaviour is ambiguous and may capture non-criminal behaviour—for example, parental discipline of children.\textsuperscript{143} National Legal Aid expressed concerns that reliance on a pattern of controlling, coercive or dominating behaviour as an aggravating factor may risk taking into account uncharged conduct. It considered that the significance of the family relationship is a matter appropriate for education and training.\textsuperscript{144}

\textbf{Sub-categories of existing offences—no higher maximum penalty}

13.74 In the alternative to umbrella or aggravated offences of family violence, in the Consultation Paper the Commissions sought stakeholder views on the creation of specific offences committed by an offender who is in a family relationship with the victim, but which do not attract a higher maximum penalty.\textsuperscript{145}

13.75 Few stakeholders commented on this issue. One stakeholder expressly supported this option without explanation;\textsuperscript{146} another opposed it without explanation.\textsuperscript{147} The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria and No To Violence acknowledged the potential educative function of separate offences but ultimately supported an aggravated offence.\textsuperscript{148} The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria also suggested that this approach would not unnecessarily clutter state and territory criminal laws due to the existence of other legislation addressing the relationship between the offender and the victim.\textsuperscript{149}

13.76 The National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence opposed this option on the basis that it ‘maintains the false dichotomy that sexual assaults on family members are not sexual assaults or a crime in the same way other sexual assaults are’.\textsuperscript{150}

\textbf{Federal offences}

13.77 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views about the recognition of family violence in federal criminal offences. They asked whether federal \begin{footnotes}

\item [142] Ibid.
\item [143] Ibid. NAAJA also referred to circumstances of aggravation in relation to assault offences in the Northern Territory Criminal Code that it considered inappropriately removed judicial sentencing discretion—for example, where the victim is female and the defendant is male, or where the victim is a child under the age of 16 years and the defendant is an adult. NAAJA submitted that it is not always just or appropriate to mandate these circumstances as aggravating.
\item [144] National Legal Aid, \textit{Submission FV} 232, 15 July 2010. See also Law Society of New South Wales, \textit{Submission FV} 205, 30 June 2010, which expressed the general view that, as a matter of fairness, an offender should not be sentenced on the basis of uncharged conduct.
\item [145] Consultation Paper, Question 7–2(b).
\item [146] P Easteal, \textit{Submission FV} 38, 13 May 2010.
\item [148] Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV} 220, 1 July 2010; No To \item [149] Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV} 220, 1 July 2010.
\end{footnotes}
criminal legislation should be amended to include specific offences committed by an offender who is in a family relationship with the victim, and whether such offences should attract a higher maximum penalty. The Commissions sought stakeholder views on specific federal offences suitable for recognition in the family violence context. 151

13.78 Several stakeholders supported a consistent approach among federal, state and territory laws to the designation of aggravated or separate family-violence related offences. 152 However no submissions identified specific, existing federal offences suitable for such an approach. 153 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria commented on the desirability of federal legislation governing the contravention of protection orders occurring across state or territory borders. The courts stated that ‘it is very difficult to enforce ... orders that are breached by threats, intimidation or harassment when the offender is in one state and the victim in another’. 154

Economic and emotional abuse

13.79 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views about the necessity and desirability of creating specific criminal offences for economic and emotional abuse committed in a family violence context. 155 Responses to this question were divided.

Submissions supporting new offences

13.80 Some stakeholders supported the criminalisation of both economic and emotional abuse, primarily on the basis that these forms of abuse are often core components of family violence. 156 The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) submitted that the economic and emotional abuse offences in the Tasmanian criminal legislation are necessary and desirable because they can improve understanding of the severity and unacceptable nature of such conduct. 157 The Department identified several beneficial flow-on effects, including: strengthening the basis for making protection orders in cases of economic and emotional abuse; acting as a general deterrent; and enlivening victims’ compensation entitlements in the event of a successful prosecution. 158

---

151 Consultation Paper, Question 7–4.
153 However one legal service provider expressed a general view that federal offences pertaining to sexual assault should be included in any such approach: Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010.
154 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
155 Consultation Paper, Question 5–5.
157 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
158 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010. National Legal Aid also commented upon these particular effects, without expressing a view on the desirability of creating discrete offences: National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
13.81 The Department submitted that the absence of prosecutions for these offences to date suggests that they are not being utilised in inappropriate circumstances. It noted that economic abuse is difficult to prove—in particular where some instances of conduct are merely frugal or greedy, while others are coercive or controlling.\(^\text{159}\) The Department submitted that ‘generally, the kinds of examples of economic abuse which could be prosecuted occur in cases where there is long-term and extremely violent conduct occurring’.\(^\text{160}\)

13.82 Some organisations and individuals expressed particular support for an offence of emotional abuse.\(^\text{161}\) For example, the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse argued:

> Emotional abuse which causes harm which undermines community safety and the public interest ought to be addressed under criminal laws. There are many anecdotes from within our sector of emotional abuse of women and children which would have the requisite seriousness and severity to suggest applicability of criminal laws.\(^\text{162}\)

Submissions opposing new offences

13.83 Many submissions opposed new offences for similar reasons to those applying to an umbrella offence. Stakeholders identified difficulties in defining, proving, administering and enforcing the offences.\(^\text{163}\) For example, the Victorian Government argued that emotional abuse would be ‘very difficult to define with the degree of specificity necessary to constitute a criminal offence’.\(^\text{164}\) While neither supporting nor opposing new offences, National Legal Aid cited the difficulty in distinguishing between merely frugal or greedy and coercive and controlling conduct as a potential problem in defining an economic abuse offence, rather than as a protection against inappropriate use.\(^\text{165}\)

13.84 Some stakeholders considered that economic and emotional abuse are adequately addressed by existing offences such as fraud, blackmail and fraudulently inducing a person to invest.\(^\text{166}\) NAAJA expressed ‘grave concerns’ that criminalising

---

\(^{159}\) Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FY 236, 20 July 2010. See also, the submission of National Legal Aid, which cited these factors as potential impediments to the creation and appropriate use of an economic abuse offence: National Legal Aid, Submission FY 232, 15 July 2010.

\(^{160}\) Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FY 236, 20 July 2010.

\(^{165}\) National Legal Aid, Submission FY 232, 15 July 2010, cf the views of the Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas): Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FY 236, 20 July 2010.

\(^{166}\) Victorian Government, Submission FY 120, 15 June 2010. See also Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FY 220, 1 July 2010. economic and emotional abuse ‘would result in more Aboriginal people being incarcerated with little or no idea why’.167

Commissions’ views

Overall approach to new criminal offences

13.85 Overall, the Commissions take the view that it would be premature to recommend any new forms of family-violence related criminal offences at the present time. In taking this position, the Commissions are guided by a number of factors, including:

- the necessarily high-level analysis of criminal offences in this Inquiry, having regard to the breadth of the Commissions’ Terms of Reference;
- the substantial difficulties associated with conceptualising and defining effective and enforceable new offences;
- the identified scope for improvements to existing criminal justice responses to family violence—including in the enforcement of existing offences;
- the absence of detailed evidence about the operation of recent reforms in some jurisdictions—for example, aggravated offences in Western Australia and South Australia, and economic and emotional abuse offences in Tasmania; and
- the significant divisions of stakeholder opinions on the preferable form of any new offence provisions.

13.86 The Commissions regard the third factor as particularly determinative. Most submissions supporting new criminal offences did so on the basis that existing criminal law responses—in particular, sentencing discretion—failed to recognise adequately the nature and dynamics of family violence. A key theme was that new offence provisions would provide direction and guidance. While new offences may be one means of achieving this outcome, the Commissions consider that new offences are justified only where it can be established that the mischief sought to be addressed cannot be adequately dealt with under the existing legislative framework. To this end, the Commissions make recommendations for practical reforms aimed at improving the understanding of the dynamics of family violence in criminal justice responses. These include recommendations directed at the sentencing of family-violence related offences168 and the development of specialised family violence courts and police units.169 The Commissions consider that these measures should be implemented and given an opportunity to take effect as a precondition to any future consideration of creating new criminal offences. The Commissions reiterate their view that improvements in the criminal justice response are only part of an integrated response to family violence.

---

168 See Recs 13–1(b) and 13–3 below.
169 See Ch 32.
13.87 In taking this position, the Commissions do not categorically oppose the development of new offences in the future. Rather, they emphasise the importance of an incremental and evidence-based approach to the recognition of family violence in criminal laws. In the Commissions’ view, a preferable approach would be for jurisdictions to focus on improving their existing practices, undertaking ongoing evaluations of current measures—particularly recent reforms—and remaining open to considering new offences in the longer term, on a needs basis.

An umbrella offence of family violence

13.88 The Commissions do not support the creation of an umbrella offence of family violence at this time. The Commissions maintain their preliminary view expressed in the Consultation Paper that there are significant difficulties in conceptualising the exact parameters of an umbrella offence, and in particular whether such an offence should be framed to include conduct that is not generally recognised under existing criminal laws—for example, economic and emotional abuse. This raises a fundamental issue concerning the proper delineation of civil and criminal redress. As discussed below, the Commissions are not satisfied that it is necessary or appropriate to criminalise such conduct.

13.89 The Commissions agree with those submissions identifying practical difficulties in particularising the conduct captured by an umbrella offence. In addition to potential constitutional impediments and prosecutorial reluctance to lay charges, an umbrella offence may present difficulties in providing accused persons with adequate particulars of the conduct constituting the charge. The Commissions acknowledge that these difficulties are not necessarily insurmountable—as demonstrated by the existence of course of conduct-based offences in Australian criminal laws in relation to persistent child sexual abuse. However, these offences have received limited use, and have been the subject of legal challenges necessitating amendments in some jurisdictions. In the Commissions’ view, this suggests a need to accumulate and evaluate experience in using course of conduct-based offences before they are replicated in other areas.\(^{170}\)

13.90 The Commissions acknowledge, however, that an umbrella offence may potentially recognise and facilitate understanding of the dynamics of family violence in the criminal justice system. The significant anecdotal evidence presented by stakeholders suggests that there is currently an inconsistent understanding of the dynamics of family violence on the part of system participants—including police, lawyers and judicial officers. However, the Commissions consider that there is insufficient evidence to conclude that improvements cannot be realised within existing frameworks, or that an umbrella offence would necessarily achieve the desired outcomes.

13.91 The Commissions agree with stakeholder suggestions that a preferable approach would be for state and territory governments to examine the operation of—and consider making improvements to—existing responses before contemplating an umbrella offence. To this end, the Commissions make recommendations in respect of recognising courses of conduct in sentencing,\footnote{171}{Recommendations 13–1, 13–2 and 13–3 below.} integrated responses and best practice,\footnote{172}{Ch 29.} and specialised prosecution and policing measures.\footnote{173}{Ch 32.}

\(^{170}\) The specific offences pertaining to persistent child sexual abuse are considered in Ch 25.

13.92 The Commissions further acknowledge the importance of education and training measures to improve understanding of the dynamics of family violence within the system. This includes the relevance of family violence-related evidence in the prosecution of existing criminal offences. The Commissions endorse the recommendation of the National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children for the production of a national bench book on family violence, in consultation with jurisdictions, and as part of a national professional development program for judicial officers on family violence. The Commissions consider that such a bench book should, among other things, specifically address the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence in respect of offences committed in the family violence context. This matter is the subject of Recommendation 13–1(a) below.

Aggravated offences with a higher maximum penalty

13.93 Similarly, the Commissions do not recommend the development of aggravated offences committed in the family violence context at this time. Aggravated offences may potentially serve educational or denunciatory functions, and may be a more feasible option than an umbrella offence in that they are based on existing criminal offences. However, the Commissions consider that there is insufficient evidence on which to make a recommendation for the creation of such offences.

13.94 The division of stakeholder preferences between aggravated offences and aggravating factors in sentencing make necessary further analysis of these alternatives before the enactment of aggravated offences can be considered. In particular, it would be necessary to examine the sufficiency and appropriateness of the range of existing basic and aggravated offences relevant to the family violence context and their application in practice, including:

- the sufficiency of existing maximum penalties in punishing basic and aggravated offences committed in the family violence context;
- the exercise of sentencing discretion in these cases;\footnote{174}{For example, the extent to which circumstances of family violence are recognised as aggravating factors in appropriate cases. See, eg, \textit{R v MFP} [2001] VSCA.} and
- in respect of existing basic offences—the substance and application of any relevant statutory sentencing factors in the family violence context.

13.95 Given the Commissions’ preference for incremental reform that first addresses matters of operation and implementation, they do not make any recommendations in relation to potential aggravated offences at this time. However, the matters listed above would be appropriate for detailed research and analysis by state and territory... governments contemplating the introduction of aggravated family-violence related offences in the future.

13.96 As a general proposition, the Commissions consider that national consistency of criminal laws is a desirable objective. To that end, they recognise the benefit of considering aggravated family-violence related offences in a national forum such as the SCAG MCLOC. The considerable work undertaken on the Model Criminal Code—in particular the aggravated non-fatal offence provisions in Chapter 5—should inform any future consideration of aggravated offences in the family violence context.

13.97 The Commissions note, however, that the Model Criminal Code provisions have been implemented inconsistently across jurisdictions. National consideration of aggravated offences in the family violence context may provide an opportunity to identify the reasons the aggravated offence provisions do not appear to have received uniform support. It may also facilitate consensus about the conceptual basis for the designation of aggravated offences, as distinct from allowing for aggravating circumstances to be taken into account in sentencing.

13.98 If jurisdictions elect to consider enacting aggravated family-violence related offences, the Commissions make four observations about the substance of such provisions. First, the Commissions caution against the prescription of minimum penalties as suggested in one submission. In the context of discussing sentencing options in relation to federal offenders in the report Same Crime, Same Time: Sentencing of Federal Offenders (Report ALRC 103) the ALRC expressed the view that mandatory terms of imprisonment are generally incompatible with sound practice and principle. The ALRC emphasised the importance of sentencing discretion to enable justice to be done in individual cases, and concluded that the legislature should not prejudge the appropriate minimum penalty in legislation without regard to the facts of individual cases. The Commissions endorse this view, which is consistent with the guiding principle of fairness identified in Chapter 3.

13.99 Secondly, the Commissions maintain their views expressed in the Consultation Paper that a defined family relationship between the victim and offender should not be the sole basis for aggravating an offence. In the Commissions’ view, this elevates, by definition, the status of offences committed against family members over those committed against strangers, without principled justification. It further creates an unacceptable risk that persons may be charged with aggravated offences in circumstances where it may not always be just and appropriate to do so—for example, where an alleged offender has a mental illness, is a child with substance abuse issues, or is a victim of family violence who uses defensive force to protect themselves or another family member. While prosecutorial discretion may reduce the likelihood of

---

175 Model Criminal Code (1st edn, 2009) cl 5.1.41.
178 The Commissions emphasise, however, that this point is distinct from the recognition, where appropriate, of a family relationship between the offender and the victim as an aggravating factor in sentencing, as a matter of sentencing discretion: see R v MFP [2001] VSCA, discussed below.
prosecutions for aggravated offences in such circumstances, the Commissions consider that it is undesirable to leave open this possibility, given the gravity of the potential consequences for accused persons in these circumstances.

13.100 The Commissions acknowledge that factors additional or alternative to the existence of a family relationship may be more difficult to prove. However, the Commissions consider that the concept of family violence itself necessitates some form of proof of the underlying dynamics of power and control in the relationship. The mere existence of a family relationship between parties is inconclusive of this matter. Requiring proof of such matters is also proportionate to the increased gravity of the consequences for persons convicted of aggravated offences.

13.101 Thirdly, the Commissions take the view that the relevant factors of aggravation for offences should be the subject of further examination by those state and territory governments that elect to pursue aggravated family-violence related offences. This includes the question of whether aggravated offences should be created specifically in relation to family violence, or whether they should encompass offences committed in the context of relationships of power and control more generally. The Commissions tend towards the latter option because it would avoid the potential problems of elevating the status of violence committed against a family member over similar violence committed against a stranger. The Commissions also reiterate their comments about the desirability of national consistency.

13.102 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions cited the commission of an offence within a pattern of coercive, controlling or dominating behaviour as an example of a potential circumstance warranting a charge for an aggravated offence. The Commissions agree with stakeholder contentions that this exact formulation may be problematic. In particular, it may capture non-criminal conduct or take into account uncharged conduct. The Commissions consider that the circumstances of aggravation contained in the Model Criminal Code pertaining to the commission of offences during torture or in the abuse of a relationship of trust or authority may provide an instructive basis for further consideration. In particular, the Commissions note that such offences are capable of application to all forms of violence without distinction on the basis of the relationship between the accused person and the victim.

13.103 Finally, the Commissions suggest that jurisdictions considering the introduction of aggravated family-violence related offences should clearly address the relationship between these offences and existing circumstances of aggravation in sentencing legislation. For example, where an accused person is charged with a basic offence in respect of conduct that could have sustained a charge under an aggravated offence, the sentencing legislation should make express provision as to the relevance, if any, that the aggravating circumstances may have in sentencing. The Commissions also emphasise the importance of prosecutorial guidelines, education and training addressing the appropriate use of any aggravated family-violence related offences.
Sub-categories of existing offences committed in a family violence context, without a higher maximum penalty

13.104 The Commissions do not make any recommendations in respect of separate offences—which do not attract higher maximum penalties—where they are committed against persons who are in a defined family relationship with the offender. The Commissions acknowledge that such offences could play a potential educative function, and that they may not necessarily ‘clutter’ existing criminal laws. However, the Commissions consider that the creation of new offences for educative purposes should be undertaken only where there is a demonstrated need for this particular form of response. The Commissions are not convinced that the options for implementing educative measures within existing frameworks have been exhausted.\(^{179}\)

Federal offences

13.105 The Commissions do not make any recommendations in respect of the creation of new federal family-violence related offences. The Commissions consider that the absence of adequate statistics on the types of existing federal offences committed against family members\(^{180}\) precludes the making of further recommendations about the creation of new offences and the nature of penalties. This matter would be appropriate for further consideration once such baseline evidence is available.

13.106 The Commissions acknowledge the concerns expressed by stakeholders about the enforcement of breaches of protection orders that are committed by offenders located in other states. However, the Commissions are unconvinced that a new scheme of federal offences—such as the United States Violence Against Women Act—is an appropriate response at this time. In Chapter 30, the Commissions endorse the recommendation of the National Council for the development of a national protection orders database, as part of the Australian Government’s commitment to the implementation of a system for the registration and recognition of protection orders. The Commissions consider that these measures will facilitate the enforcement of protection orders across state and territory boundaries, however they emphasise the importance of undertaking ongoing monitoring and evaluation of outcomes. The Commissions further observe that any future consideration of new federal offences in the nature of the United States Violence Against Women Act would require identification of an appropriate head of Commonwealth constitutional power.

Economic and emotional abuse offences

13.107 The Commissions do not make any recommendations in respect of economic or emotional abuse offences. Overall, stakeholder views confirmed the Commissions’ preliminary concerns about the feasibility of criminalising economic and emotional abuse, and the absence of evidence to justify the creation of new offences. In particular,

---

\(^{179}\) In Ch 5, the Commissions express their views on the separate issue of linking the definitions of family violence in family violence legislation to the criminal law, through the designation of specific ‘family violence offences’.

\(^{180}\) See Ch 5.
the Commissions note the difficulties in defining the conduct captured by these offences with sufficient particularity. They also note the potential difficulties in enforcing and proving these offences beyond reasonable doubt. The Commissions further note that there have been no prosecutions for such offences in Tasmania—the only jurisdiction to have embraced this approach. Accordingly, there is no evidence base to allow adequate consideration of this issue at this stage.

13.108 In addition, a discrete offence for economic abuse appears to be unnecessary given the existence of other criminal offences such as: obtaining a financial advantage or causing financial disadvantage;\(^\text{181}\) obtaining property belonging to another;\(^\text{182}\) fraud;\(^\text{183}\) and failure to provide the necessities of life.\(^\text{184}\) As noted above, coercing a family member to claim a social security payment is recognised as economic abuse amounting to family violence in some jurisdictions.\(^\text{185}\) Such behaviour could conceivably also fall within the ambit of offences under social security legislation or the Criminal Code (Cth) relating to fraudulent conduct.

13.109 Evidence of economic and emotional abuse may also have broader relevance to existing criminal offences and defences where patterns of family-violence related behaviour are relevant to the facts in issue. For example, evidence of patterns of past abuse may be relevant to defences where victims of family violence commit crimes under duress or in self-defence.

13.110 In addition, as identified in Chapter 5, economic and emotional abuse may be the subject of a civil family violence protection order. Breach of a protection order is a criminal offence in all Australian states and territories. Existing civil laws may also provide remedies for some instances of economic abuse. For example, contracts review legislation\(^\text{186}\) or common law or equitable remedies may be used to set aside or vary unjust financial contracts—such as where a family violence victim is coerced to sign a document transferring property. The Commissions note that there may arguably be a material inequality in the bargaining power of a victim of family violence and an aggressor, such that it may not be reasonably practicable for a victim of family violence to negotiate a contract with or for the benefit of the aggressor.

13.111 The Commissions make no recommendations in respect of the existing offences in the Tasmanian family violence legislation, in the absence of evidence about their operation. However, the Commissions emphasise the importance of the ongoing monitoring and evaluation of these provisions, with a view to ensuring that they are enforceable in practice.

---

181 See, eg, Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 192D.
182 See, eg, Ibid s 192C.
183 See, eg, Ibid s 192E.
184 These offences are discussed in the context of child protection in Ch 20.
Recognising family violence in sentencing

13.112 The dynamics of family violence can also be recognised to some extent in the sentencing of offenders who are found guilty of crimes committed in circumstances of family violence. This includes by way of the following forms of recognition:

- the fact that the offence being sentenced was committed as part of a broader course of family-violence related conduct; and
- the presence of any jurisdiction-specific aggravating or non-mitigating circumstances relevant to the family violence context—for example, the existence of a family relationship between the offender and victim, or the commission of the offence in abuse of a position of trust or authority in relation to the victim, or in breach of a protection order.

13.113 These matters are the focus of this section. In addition, the Commissions consider practical strategies to promote the consistent recognition and treatment of family-violence related factors in sentencing, in line with the Commissions’ guiding principle of fairness. 187

Recognising courses of family-violence related conduct in sentencing

13.114 One stakeholder commented that:

Perhaps there is space for evidence of a pattern of domestic violence to be a factor in sentencing. By this I mean that the standard assault charges be laid, but when it comes to sentencing, evidence that establishes a pattern of domestic violence would result in a premium being added to whatever sentence is assigned to the proved assault. This way there is no diminishing of the seriousness of the assault charge by putting it in a special category of ‘domestic violence’ but the fact that it is not a simple one-off assault is also taken into account. 188

13.115 This raises the following issues—which are examined below:

- the available legal mechanisms for taking a course of conduct into account in sentencing specific offences;
- the particulars of these mechanisms, including: the stage at which such a course of conduct is proved; the manner of proof and the standard of proof; and whether the course of conduct is limited to proven acts of a criminal nature—as opposed to unproven criminal acts, or acts which are not generally criminal such as economic or emotional abuse; and
- the extent to which these mechanisms are currently used in respect of offences committed in circumstances of family violence.

13.116 The emphasis of this chapter is upon courses of conduct comprising uncharged conduct, or a combination of uncharged conduct and a small number of charges. As mentioned earlier in this chapter, the Commissions have heard concerns

187 See Ch 3.
188 Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.
from stakeholders that persons who have committed family violence over a period of time are often prosecuted for only a small number of incidents, due to difficulties in proving specific incidents in the course of ongoing violence. Accordingly, the Commissions have not given consideration to the sentencing of multiple offences in circumstances where most or all incidents forming part of a course of conduct are the subject of individual charges. In particular, the Commissions have not addressed issues relating to the imposition of concurrent or cumulative sentences in respect of multiple offences that form part of a course of conduct.189

Sentencing legislation

13.117 Most state and territory sentencing legislation does not expressly refer to a course of conduct as a sentencing factor. One exception is the sentencing legislation of the ACT, which provides that a court sentencing an offender must take into account, where relevant and known:

if the offence forms part of a course of conduct consisting of a series of criminal acts of the same or a similar character—the course of conduct. 190

13.118 There is also reference to a course of conduct in the sentencing legislation of South Australia. Under that legislation, in order to assist a court to determine the sentence for an offence, a prosecutor is required to furnish the court with particulars of injury, loss or damage resulting from a course of conduct consisting of a series of criminal acts of the same or a similar character of which the offence for which sentence is to be imposed forms part.191

13.119 The absence of express recognition of a course of conduct in sentencing legislation may be attributable to legal uncertainty about whether a sentencing court can take into account conduct in respect of which an offender has not been charged.

13.120 The ACT provision is expressed in the same terms as the federal sentencing legislation—s 16A(2)(c) of the Crimes Act 1914 (Cth).192 There has been case law in respect of the federal provision which reveals judicial disagreement about its meaning and ambit. In Weininger v The Queen, Kirby J stated that s 16A(2)(c) did not allow ‘uncharged criminal acts’ to be taken into account in sentencing and expressed the view that the section was an attempt to express the totality principle.193 Callinan J, however, expressed the view that the section allowed a court to consider relevant conduct.

189 The term ‘concurrent’ refers to sentences for multiple offences to be served at the same time. The term ‘cumulative’ refers to sentences for multiple offences to be served one after the other.
190 Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 33.
192 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 16A sets out factors a court must take into account in the sentencing of federal offenders.
193 Weininger v The Queen (2003) 212 CLR 629, 647. The totality principle is relevant to the sentencing of offenders for multiple offences. It ensures that an offender who is sentenced for multiple offences receives an appropriate sentence overall and not a ‘crushing sentence’. See Australian Law Reform Commission, Same Crime, Same Time: Sentencing of Federal Offenders, Report 103 (2006), [5.12]–[5.15].
albeit that it might involve criminal acts which in turn might not have resulted in charged and established (by verdict or plea) facts constituting other offences.

13.121 Submissions and consultations in the course of the ALRC’s inquiry into the sentencing of federal offenders reflected confusion about the meaning and operation of s 16A(2)(c), and the ALRC recommended that the section be redrafted to provide greater clarity. 195

Representative charges

13.122 A provision allowing a course of conduct to be taken into account is also relevant where representative charges are used—that is, where a court sentences an offender for a limited or representative number of offences on the basis that those offences are part of a wider course of conduct. Representative charges have been used in sexual assault cases, those involving the apprehension of ‘serial offenders’ and corporate criminal and fraud matters. 196 The uncharged offences cannot be used to increase the maximum penalties available for the offences charged, but may provide a basis for refusing to extend any leniency that may otherwise have been extended if the charged offences were isolated incidents.197

13.123 However, there are diverging judicial views as to whether multiple admitted or proven offences may also be viewed as a course of conduct for the purposes of placing each individual offence in a higher range of objective seriousness than would otherwise be the case. The Victorian Court of Criminal Appeal has determined the issue in the affirmative, holding that:

As recent decisions of this Court have made clear, the fact that a count is a representative count has a twofold relevance to sentencing. First, it is to be understood as the absence of a mitigating factor, in the sense that a plea of guilty to a representative count prevents the defendant from claiming ‘any leniency that might have been permitted on the basis that the offence was an isolated event’. Secondly, the sentencing court must look at the conduct represented by the count in order to judge the offending in its full context, ‘which is likely to bear upon such matters as the extent of culpability, need for specific deterrence and prospects of rehabilitation’. 198

196 See, eg, N Cowdery, ‘Negotiating with the DPP’ (Paper presented at Legal Aid Commission of NSW Criminal Law Conference, Sydney, 3 August 2006).
197 R v D (1997) 69 SASR 413, 419. This approach has also been adopted by the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal. See, eg, R v JCW (2000) 112 A Crim R 466, [67]–[68]. However, the Queensland Court of Appeal has rejected this approach. See R v D [1996] 1 Qd R, but cf R v Bettridge (Unreported, Queensland Court of Appeal, 27 May 1998). This matter is discussed below.
13. Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing

The Supreme Court of South Australia has limited the relevance of representative charges to the first ground in the above quotation. The NSW Court of Criminal Appeal, however, is divided on this issue.

In addition, the Queensland Court of Appeal has held that uncharged conduct which may amount to a separate offence cannot be considered for any purpose at all in sentencing—including to deny leniency. However, the court has subsequently recognised that it may be necessary to revisit this position, 'some points of which are arguably inconsistent with other authorities both in this court and in other jurisdictions'.

Circumstances of aggravation and mitigation

Another means of recognising family violence in sentencing is either to treat the fact that a crime was committed in the context of a family relationship as an aggravating factor in sentencing, or prevent it from being considered a mitigating factor in sentencing.

Aggravating factors increase the culpability of an offender and act to increase the penalty to be imposed on sentencing—but never beyond the maximum penalty for an offence. Mitigating factors decrease the culpability of an offender and act to decrease the extent to which the offender should be punished.

Not all sentencing legislation of the states and territories sets out aggravating or mitigating factors. Some sentencing legislation states that a court must have regard to the presence of any mitigating or aggravating factor concerning the offender, or must have regard to any mitigating or aggravating factor in determining the seriousness of an offence without listing examples of such factors. In addition, the sentencing legislation of some states and territories identifies certain factors that must be treated as non-mitigating in all cases.

The sentencing legislation of NSW, by comparison, sets out a list of aggravating and mitigating factors that a court must take into account. In NSW, it is not an aggravating factor that the victim of an offence is a spouse, intimate partner or related to the offender. However, the sentencing legislation of NSW specifies some aggravating factors that may be relevant to the sentencing of offenders who are found guilty of crimes committed in circumstances of family violence. These include that:

---

199 R v Bukvic [2010] SASC 195, [48].
200 Giles v Director of Public Prosecutions [2009] NSWCCA, [67]–[68] (Basten JA), [85]–[86] (Hulme JA), [102]–[104] (Johnson JA).
201 R v D [1996] 1 Qd R.
202 R v Bettridge (Unreported, Queensland Court of Appeal, 27 May 1998).
203 For example, Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 5(2)(g); Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) s 9(2)(g).
204 Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) s 62(2)(c), (d).
205 Although the Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) s 8 provides that a plea of guilty, and facilitation by the offender of criminal property confiscation in certain cases are mitigating factors.
207 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) s 21A.
crime was committed in the home of the victim or any other person; in the presence of a child; the offender had a record of previous convictions, particularly those for serious personal violence offences as defined in the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW); or the offender abused a position of trust or authority in relation to the victim.208

13.130 Case law in NSW supports the proposition that the fact that an offence is committed in the context of a family relationship is not a mitigating factor. In Raczkowski v The Queen, for example, the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal stated:

The Court was invited to consider that the offences occurred in the context of a (broken down) domestic relationship … That a violent and pre-planned attack occurred in what might be classified as a domestic setting is not a matter of mitigation.209

13.131 Case law in NSW also indicates that the fact that an offence is committed while an offender is subject to the conditions of a protection order to protect the victim of the offence, may be treated as an aggravating factor.210

13.132 The Tasmanian family violence legislation specifies some aggravating factors that may be relevant to the sentencing of offenders who are found guilty of crimes committed in circumstances of family violence, in addition to circumstances not involving family violence. These include the fact that the offender knew or was reckless as to whether a child was present at the time of the offence or knew that the affected person was pregnant.211 The latter factor has particular relevance in family violence circumstances because studies have shown that pregnancy increases a woman’s vulnerability to family violence.212

13.133 The South Australian sentencing legislation specifies the following as a relevant factor, without classifying it as an aggravating (or mitigating) factor:

if the offence was committed by an adult in circumstances where the offending conduct was seen or heard by a child (other than the victim (if any) of the offence or another offender)—those circumstances.213

13.134 In other jurisdictions, case law indicates that a family relationship between the offender and the victim may, in certain cases, be treated as an aggravating factor, as a matter of sentencing discretion. For example, in R v MFP the Victorian Court of Criminal Appeal stated, with respect to the offence being committed in a ‘domestic’ context:

Moreover, I think it can be seen to be aggravating both as to its potential consequences and also inasmuch as a husband (or a wife) is in a privileged position in relation to a spouse. They each know the everyday movements, the habits, the likes 208 Ibid s 21A(2)(d), (ea), (eb), (k).

209 Raczkowski v The Queen [2008] NSWCCA , [46].
210 Kennedy v The Queen (2008) 181 A Crim R 185, [8].
211 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 13(a).
the fears and pleasures of their spouse, which might enable them not only to effect an attack more easily on their victim but also to devise the kinds of attack which could more seriously affect their spouse, not merely physically, but so as to cause mental anguish ... The matter need not be examined any further, for in truth the advantages that he had, including that of surprise, justified the judge in holding that it was proper to view more seriously this attack occurring in the domestic context of this family.\footnote{214}

13.135 The sentencing legislation of some overseas jurisdictions provides that the commission of a crime in the context of a family relationship is an aggravating factor in sentencing. In Canada, the \textit{Criminal Code} was amended in 1996 to provide that it is an aggravating factor if there is evidence that the offender, in committing the offence, abused the offender’s spouse or common-law partner.\footnote{215} On 3 April 2006, the Parliament of Iceland passed an amendment to art 70 of the General Penal Code with regard to family violence, as follows:

\begin{quote}
In the event that an infraction was directed against a man, woman or child closely related to the perpetrator and their family connection is believed to have aggravated the violence of the act, this should generally be taken into account to increase the severity of the punishment.
\end{quote}

13.136 The New Zealand sentencing legislation lists as an aggravating factor the fact that the case involved violence against, or neglect of, a child under the age of 14 years.\footnote{216}

\textbf{The ALRC’s previous consideration of aggravating factors}

13.137 In the context of discussing the range of sentencing factors relevant to the sentencing of federal offenders, ALRC Report 103 expressed the view that federal sentencing legislation should not distinguish between sentencing factors that aggravate a sentence, and those that mitigate a sentence.

13.138 The relationship between mitigating and aggravating factors is complicated by the fact that the opposite of a mitigating factor is not necessarily an aggravating factor, and vice versa. For example, a plea of guilty could be a mitigating factor, but it is improper to treat a plea of not guilty as an aggravating factor. Similarly, while youth or old age may be a mitigating factor, the fact that an offender’s age does not fall into either extreme is not an aggravating factor. Some factors may be either aggravating or mitigating depending on the circumstances. Other factors may serve neither to increase nor to decrease the severity of a sentence, but may guide the court in selecting an appropriate sentencing option or in specifying certain conditions tailored to the needs and circumstances of the offender. Factors that could fall into this category include the cultural background, age, and physical and mental condition of an offender.

\footnotesize
\begin{flushright}
214 \textit{R v MFP} [2001] VSCA , [20].
215 \textit{Criminal Code} 1985 RSC c C–46 (Canada) s 718.2(a)(ii). It is also an aggravating factor if the person abused a position of trust or authority in relation to the victim: s 718.2(a)(iii).
216 \textit{Sentencing Act 2002} (NZ) s 9A. Section 9 lists general aggravating factors, some of which may be relevant to family violence, such as an abuse of power or authority.
\end{flushright}
Rather than distinguishing between aggravating and mitigating factors, ALRC Report 103 took the approach of recommending factors that should not be treated as either aggravating or mitigating. For example, it stated that because an offender’s consent is integral to effective participation in a restorative justice process or initiative, it would be improper to treat the absence of consent to participate as an aggravating factor.

Sentencing guidance

Another means of recognising the dynamics of family violence in sentencing offences is the use of specific sentencing guidance. For example, the Sentencing Guidelines Council in the UK has published a guideline on sentencing in the context of family violence. This guideline must be considered by courts pursuant to s 172 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 (UK) and makes clear that offences committed in a domestic context should be regarded as being no less serious than offences committed in a non-domestic context. Indeed, because an offence has been committed in a domestic context, there are likely to be aggravating factors present that make it more serious.

These aggravating factors include: an abuse of trust and power; the particular vulnerability of the victim; exposure of children to violence; where contact arrangements are exploited in order to commit an offence; a proven history of violence or threats by an offender in a domestic setting; a history of disobedience to court orders; and if the victim is forced to leave home.

The guideline also provides guidance on the application of mitigating and other factors in the family violence context. For example, it provides that the offender’s ‘good character in relation to conduct outside the home’ should generally be ‘of no relevance where there is a proven pattern of behaviour’.

The guideline also cautions against taking the expressed wishes of the victim into account in sentencing in the context of family violence. Reasons for this include:

- it is undesirable that a victim should feel responsibility for the sentence imposed;
- there is a risk that the plea for mercy made by a victim will be induced by threats made by, or by a fear of, the offender; and
- the risk of such threats will be increased if it is generally believed that the severity of the sentence may be affected by the wishes of the victim.

Guidance on sentencing is provided in a number of ways in Australian states and territories. For example, the Judicial Commission of NSW and the Judicial College... of Victoria each produce sentencing bench books. A bench book outlines what judicial officers ‘may need to know, understand and do on a day-to-day basis’, in the form of a practice manual. Bench books are not intended to lay down or develop the law. Bench books have an important role to play as part of a national judicial education and support program.

13.145 The National Council recommended the production of a model bench book, in consultation with jurisdictions, and as part of a national professional development program for judicial officers on family violence. The National Council commented that such a bench book would ‘provide a social context analysis and case law to complement existing resources and enhance the application of the law’.

13.146 Another form of guidance is through the use of ‘guideline judgments’ by criminal courts of appeal, as provided for in NSW, Victoria, Western Australia and South Australia. As the ALRC stated in ALRC Report 103, guideline judgments are generally delivered by an appellate court in the context of a particular case, but go further than the points raised on appeal to suggest a sentencing scale for the category of crime before the court. They may indicate how particular aggravating or mitigating factors should be reflected in a sentence or suggest how sentences are to be determined for a category of offences or type of offender.

13.147 The advantages of guideline judgments are said to be that they foster consistency while retaining judicial discretion; accommodate special or exceptional cases while serving the aims of rehabilitation, denunciation and deterrence; allow a judge to respond to all the circumstances of a case; result in fewer appeals by the prosecution; and lower pressure on the executive arm of government to respond to media attention. On the other hand, the potential disadvantages of guideline judgments include erosion of judicial discretion, and the possibility of greater use of imprisonment due to a new emphasis on establishing exceptional circumstances to justify departure from a guideline.

225 R v Forbes (2005) 160 A Crim R 1, [72]–[76].

226 Judicial education and use of bench books is further discussed in Ch 31.

228 Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW), Pt 3 Div 4; Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic); Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) ss 143, 143A; Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA) ss 29A–29C.

13.148 Regardless of the merits of guideline judgments, it is clear that in federal criminal matters a court cannot give a guideline judgment in the nature of an advisory opinion.232 In Wong v The Queen,233 the High Court appears to have cast doubt on the constitutional validity of guideline judgments at the federal level in some other circumstances. Wong has created a climate of uncertainty around guideline judgments—at least in the federal sphere—which does not provide a firm foundation for law reform in this area.234

13.149 While guideline judgements at the federal level are constitutionally problematic, they remain an option at the state and territory level. Such judgements do not have to specify penalty levels. However, guideline judgements do not appear to have been used outside of NSW,235 and no such judgment has been made in relation to family violence in NSW.236 Research suggests that guideline judgments are now less frequently used in NSW because of the introduction of standard minimum sentencing.237

Submissions and consultations

Recognising courses of conduct

13.150 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views about the extent to which courses of conduct are currently recognised in the sentencing of family-violence related offences. This included: the use of representative charges by prosecutors; whether offenders pleading guilty to family-violence related charges acknowledge that the offences charged form part of a broader course of conduct including uncharged offences; and judicial recognition of courses of conduct in sentencing.238 Most submissions and consultations indicated that:

• representative charges are not commonly used in the prosecution of family-violence related offences;239 and

---

232 Huddart, Parker & Co Pty Ltd v Moorehead (1909) 8 CLR 330, 357.
233 Wong v The Queen (2001) 207 CLR 584.
235 The Full Court of the South Australian Supreme Court has considered, and rejected, one application for such a judgment: R v Payne (2004) 89 SASR 49. The Western Australian Supreme Court has also rejected applications for such a judgment: Yates v Western Australia [2008] WASCA ; Herbert v The Queen (2003) 27 WAR 330; Jones v The Queen [1998] WASCA .
238 Consultation Paper, Questions 7–5, 7–6, 7–7.
• offenders pleading guilty to family-violence related charges rarely acknowledge that the charges are representative of broader criminality additionally comprising uncharged conduct.240

13.151 However, stakeholders were divided about:
• the extent to which courts currently consider courses of conduct in sentencing family-violence related offences;241 and
• the preferable extent to which courses of conduct should be taken into account in sentencing family-violence related offences, including the appropriate use of representative charges.242

Current practices in using representative charges

13.152 Most submissions addressing current practices were based upon anecdotal evidence of stakeholders’ experiences. Some legal service providers commented that, in their experience, representative charges are rarely used in family violence cases.243 The Local Court of NSW suggested that the limited use of representative charges in the Local Court is reflective of their limited use in NSW more generally. The Court observed that the practice appears to be used more frequently in sexual assault cases in higher courts.244 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria commented that representative charges do not appear to be considered as an option in most cases.245 Two stakeholders suggested a need for further research into the use of representative charges in the family violence context.246

13.153 In contrast, the NSW ODPP expressed the view that representative charges are not being under-utilised in NSW, notwithstanding the complexities associated with sentencing for uncharged conduct.247 While not commenting specifically on the frequency with which representative charges are utilised in the family violence context, the Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions stated that it uses representative charges where they are the most appropriate charges given the evidence available, in

240 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010.
241 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010. cf Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
242 Consultation Paper, Proposal 7–1.
244 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
245 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
accordance with the Prosecution Policy of the Commonwealth. The Prosecution Policy relevantly refers to the ‘criminality principle’—namely, that the charges laid should adequately reflect the nature and extent of the criminal conduct disclosed by the evidence and provide the court with an appropriate basis for sentence.

Current practices in relation to guilty pleas

13.154 Similarly, some stakeholders observed that, in their experience, guilty pleas are not usually accompanied by an acknowledgement by the offender that the offences charged are representative of broader criminality, including uncharged conduct. However, the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria commented that such acknowledgement appears to occur more regularly in the Victorian Koori Court. It noted that Aboriginal elders assisting the court have questioned offenders about their previous conduct, in some cases because they have personal knowledge of their behaviour.

Current practices in recognising courses of conduct in sentencing

13.155 The majority of stakeholders commenting on current practices observed that, in their experience, courses of conduct are rarely taken into account in sentencing. National Legal Aid observed that, in some cases, a number of individual charges are laid, or the offender is charged with a course of conduct-based offence. It identified a practice in Western Australia whereby multiple breaches of protection orders are charged individually and, ‘where there are a number of breaches constituting stalking behaviour, the offender is charged with stalking’. However, some stakeholders suggested that courses of conduct are routinely taken into account in sentencing family-violence related charges. The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria stated that, in practice, courts do take into account offending forming part of a course of conduct of family violence. NSW Legal Aid and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Assistance Service suggested that the NSW model of designated ‘domestic violence offences’ enables the court to accumulate progressively histories of family violence and take them into consideration in sentencing.

---

249 Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Cth), Prosecution Policy for the Commonwealth: Guidelines for the Making of Decisions in the Prosecution Process, [2.19]. See also [2.20]—circumstances in which a less serious charge may be favoured.
254 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010. The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) also indicated, without further elaboration, that courts in Tasmania are taking courses of conduct into account in sentencing family-violence related offences: Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
13.156 Stakeholders did not generally distinguish between judicial consideration of uncharged criminal conduct, and abusive or violent conduct that does not amount to an offence. However, the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria stated that courts are unlikely to take into account uncharged criminal conduct or non-criminal family violence, but—as discussed below—suggested that there may be scope to do so.256 As further discussed below, other submissions expressed general reservations about taking uncharged conduct into account in sentencing.257

The appropriate use of representative charges and course of conduct evidence in sentencing family-violence related offences

13.157 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views about three issues. First, the Commissions proposed that police and prosecutors should be encouraged—by way of prosecutorial guidelines, education and training—to pursue, to the maximum extent possible, the option of representative charges as a way of presenting a course of conduct to the court.258

13.158 Secondly, the Commissions asked whether the court should also consider the following matters in sentencing, for the purpose of rejecting any claim to mitigation:

- whether the offence forms part of a series of proved or admitted criminal offences of the same or similar character;
- whether an offender has pleaded guilty to charges and has acknowledged that they are representative of criminality that also comprises uncharged conduct; and
- whether the offence forms part of a broader pattern or proved or admitted family violence, which may include violence of a non-physical nature against the victim—such as economic or emotional abuse—which is typically not, of itself, criminal.259

13.159 Thirdly, the Commissions asked stakeholders whether the sentencing legislation of states and territories should expressly provide for a course of conduct to be taken into account in sentencing, to the extent that it does not already do so.260

13.160 A common theme emerging from submissions on these matters was the need to balance multiple public interests, including that:

- sentences accurately reflect the nature and extent of criminal conduct;

256 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
257 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
258 Consultation Paper, Proposal 7–1.
260 Ibid, Question 7–8.
606
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- offenders are not punished for crimes for which they have not been convicted; and
- trials are conducted as efficiently as possible.

13.161  While several stakeholders expressed in-principle support for the use of guidelines and training in the use of representative charges, without specific comments as to detail,\(^{261}\) some did so in qualified terms, on the basis of the second and third points identified above. For example, National Legal Aid and the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria supported the use of prosecutorial guidelines, education and training on the use of representative charges where appropriate, but noted the importance of limiting their use to charged and proven or admitted conduct.\(^{262}\) National Legal Aid further commented that representative charges and course of conduct evidence may ‘complicate proceedings and lead to evidentiary disputes and delay in the early resolution of cases’.\(^{263}\) Other submissions expressed similar cautions about the use of representative charges—in particular, reliance upon uncharged conduct—without taking a firm view on the proposal.\(^{264}\)

13.162  The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria commented that it may be desirable for sentencing courts to consider both uncharged criminal conduct and acts of non-criminal family violence in order to put evidence of the offending in a social context. The courts suggested that greater specialisation and training in family violence may facilitate this practice.\(^{265}\)

13.163  The National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence similarly supported the use of representative charges to place a ‘more realistic picture’ of the offending before the court. It commented, in the context of intimate partner sexual assaults and child sexual abuse, that:

> Where there are many incidents, but sufficient evidence for only one or two to meet the threshold of ‘beyond reasonable doubt’, the other incidents just evaporate as if they never occurred.\(^{266}\)

13.164  Conversely, the Local Court of NSW did not support the proposal that representative charges should be encouraged in the family violence context on three

---

261  Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; M Payne, Submission FV 193, 28 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; National Association of Services Against Sexual Violence, Submission FV 195, 25 June 2010.

263  National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010, which cited the same reason as ground of opposition to the increased use of representative charges.

265  Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

13. Recognising Family Violence in Offences and Sentencing

First, it cited the unsettled issue of whether multiple offences admitted or proven as a course of conduct can be used to place each individual offence at a higher level of objective seriousness. The court noted that the question remains open in NSW following the division of opinion among members of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Giles v Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW).268

Secondly, the court noted the practical necessity of maintaining the safeguards associated with the current use of representative charges—namely that a court must be satisfied that the conduct relied upon by the prosecution is:

- identified with a degree of precision; and
- either proved or admitted by the offender.

The court expressed concern that the proposal may compromise the first-mentioned safeguard, and thus undermine the entitlement of an accused person ‘to be made aware with precision of the alleged facts giving rise to charges against him or her’.

Thirdly, the court expressed concern that the practice of representative charging may ‘unintentionally have the effect of hindering or protracting the prosecution of family-violence related offences’. The court referred to practice notes directed towards ensuring that guilty pleas are entered at the first available opportunity, and that not guilty pleas proceed expeditiously to hearing. Directions include prescribed dates for the service of the main parts of the prosecution brief, the entry of a plea, the listing of hearing dates and the service of the remainder of the prosecution brief. The court stated that these procedures stemmed from an observation that the longer it takes to finalise a family-violence related charge, the more prone the matter becomes to a ‘cooling off’ of the victim’s complaint, with the victim becoming reluctant or unwilling to maintain her or his original statement.

The court further expressed concern about:

- the impact that complicating the factual scenarios and charges underlying prosecutions for family violence offences through the use of representative charging might have upon the numbers of defendants prepared to plead guilty to a charge, the extent to which statements of facts are agreed between the prosecution and the defence, and/or the willingness of victims to make or continue to maintain a complaint.269

Some submissions suggested that courses of conduct should be recognised in the substantive elements of offences rather than in sentencing. The NSW ODPP commented that—given the problems arising from the admissibility of uncharged conduct—the best way of ensuring that a course of conduct is placed before the courts is by way of a course of conduct-based offence, such as the persistent sexual abuse of a child.270 Women’s Legal Service Queensland suggested that potential problems

---

267 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
268 Giles v Director of Public Prosecutions [2009] NSWCCA.
269 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
associated with the use of uncharged conduct in sentencing are best addressed by way of substantive offences—including encouraging police to ‘charge all charges’, and recognising the dynamics of family violence in new, aggravated offences.271

13.170 Most stakeholders supported the express recognition of courses of conduct as a sentencing factor in sentencing legislation, without explanation or any comments as to the detail of such provisions.272 However, two legal service providers expressed qualified support, to the extent that legislative provisions address only conduct which has been charged and proved or admitted by the offender.273

Aggravating and mitigating circumstances

13.171 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that state and territory sentencing legislation should provide that the fact that an offence was committed in the context of a family relationship should not be treated as a non-mitigating factor in sentencing.274

13.172 The Commissions also asked stakeholders whether:

- the commission of an offence in the context of a family relationship should be prescribed in state and territory sentencing legislation as an aggravating factor;
- if so, whether making a specific link between a family relationship and the escalation of violence would be an appropriate model; and
- which family relationships should be taken into account for the purposes of prescribing a family relationship as either a non-mitigating or an aggravating sentencing factor.275

A family relationship as an aggravating factor in sentencing

13.173 Several stakeholders supported the treatment of a family relationship between the offender and the victim as an aggravating factor in sentencing, however no consistent rationale was advanced for this position.276 Some stakeholders suggested that such an approach would ensure the recognition of the serious nature of family violence and, in doing so, perform an educative function. Others suggested that it would recognise the exploitation of a relationship of trust between the offender and the victim. Eastal supported an aggravated sentencing factor in the form of repeated sexual assaults committed in the family violence context. While expressing reservations about ‘gradating’ violence, Eastal supported a linkage between a family relationship and the escalation of violence over time as a basis for aggravation.

---

274 Consultation Paper, Proposal 7–2.

13.174 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (AFVPLS) favoured the use of a non-mitigating sentencing factor and an aggravated offence, but suggested that an aggravating factor in sentencing would be appropriate in cases where there is no charge or conviction on an aggravated offence.

13.175 Other stakeholders opposed the designation of a family relationship as an aggravated sentencing factor for various reasons. The NSW ODPP considered the range of aggravating factors currently available under NSW sentencing legislation to be sufficient. It suggested that an additional requirement of a family relationship may duplicate existing sentencing factors, and would introduce the additional complexity of defining a family relationship.

13.176 Other submissions suggested that the mere existence of a family relationship should not constitute an aggravating factor. Stubbs commented that this approach would involve weighing the seriousness of offences committed against family members with those committed against strangers exclusively on the basis of the relationship. Stubbs suggested that a preferable basis for aggravation would be a course of conduct or the escalation of violence.

13.177 The Queensland Law Society supported the enactment of an aggravated offence in the family violence context. NAAJA emphasised the importance of judicial sentencing discretion based solely upon the objective seriousness of the particular case, rather than pre-defined circumstances of aggravation.
A family relationship as a non-mitigating factor in sentencing.

13.178 Almost all submissions supporting the existence of a family relationship as an aggravating sentencing factor also supported its designation as a non-mitigating factor, without commenting expressly on issues of interaction between the two approaches.285 Several other stakeholders supported a non-mitigating factor only.286 In a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others supported the use of a non-mitigating sentencing factor in conjunction with an aggravated offence that is based upon a relationship of coercion and control between the offender and the victim.287

13.179 Notwithstanding this division of views on the appropriate interactions between reform options, two broad themes emerged from those submissions supporting the recognition of family relationships as a non-mitigating factor in sentencing: that the mere existence of a family relationship should not, of itself, diminish the seriousness of an offence;288 and the concern that the severity of family-violence related offences—in particular sexual assaults—may be minimised if left entirely to judicial discretion.289 Several other submissions supporting this proposal did so without explanation.290

13.180 Two stakeholders opposed the proposal on the basis that it may have unintended consequences for victims of family violence who are charged with offences—for example, social security fraud committed under duress, or offences against the person committed in the course of defending themselves against family violence.291

---

285 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010; P Eastal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.

288 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

289 P Eastal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010. See also Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010, which commented on the use of judicial discretion in relation to aggravating factors in sentencing. AVPLS stated that, in its experience in Victoria, the recognition of family violence as an aggravating factor depends largely on the sensibilities of individual judicial officers.

Sentencing guidance

13.181 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that the Australian Government—in conjunction with state and territory governments, the National Judicial College of Australia, the Judicial Commission of NSW and the Judicial College of Victoria—develop and maintain the currency of a national model bench book on family violence, incorporating a section on sentencing family-violence related offences. This proposal received widespread support from stakeholders. Some submissions commented on the importance of community consultation—in particular with Indigenous Australians—in the development of this resource. Several submissions suggested that the Canadian resource, Violence and Family Law in Canada: a Handbook for Judges, would provide an instructive model for the development of similar tools in an Australian context. Others supported the production of a model bench book as part of a national professional development program for judicial officers on family violence.

13.182 Few stakeholders commented specifically on the appropriate body or bodies to develop and maintain the currency of a bench book—or whether it should be a ‘model’ resource for individual jurisdictions to adapt for their own use, or a single, national product to complement existing jurisdiction-specific resources. The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria expressed the view that:

We do not see this as a ‘model’ bench book, but rather a joint state/Commonwealth bench book addressing family violence, sexual assault and family law in all states and 295 The Canadian bench book is considered in further detail in Ch 31.

the Commonwealth. The bench book would require government funding but should be developed by a judicial college or commission.298

13.183 While supporting a bench book, Stubbs commented that the pursuit of a national approach may be time-consuming and should not preclude the updating of existing resources in individual jurisdictions.299

Summary of the key themes arising from submissions and consultations

13.184 The key theme emerging from submissions and consultations is that—while there is a broad consensus among stakeholders that there is scope to improve the recognition of the features and dynamics of family violence in sentencing—there is significant division about the appropriate form that such recognition should take. In particular, there is division about:

- whether there is a need to reform either substantive sentencing laws,300 practices301 or both; and
- the nature of any potential reforms—in particular, the content of any prosecutorial guidelines or training about the appropriate use of representative charges in the family violence context, and the substance of any statutory sentencing factors.302

13.185 In addition, the fact that many stakeholders supported a combination of options, without commenting on the relationship between them, requires further consideration of the issues of interaction considered below.

Interactions between sentencing reform options

13.186 Several submissions supported, without explanation, the recognition of a family relationship between the offender and victim as both an aggravating and non-mitigating factor in sentencing.303 This raises questions about the legal possibility—and practical desirability—of such an approach.

Interactions between sentencing reform options and those on offences

13.187 Some submissions supported both the creation of aggravated offences committed in the context of family violence, and aggravating factors in sentencing

---

298 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
300 For example, statutory sentencing factors.
301 For example, the use of representative charges, and measures directed towards the application of existing sentencing laws and principles such as sentencing guidance.
302 That is, whether a family relationship between the offender and victim—or some other circumstance—should constitute an aggravating or non-mitigating sentencing factor; and whether sentencing legislation should expressly recognise courses of conduct as a sentencing factor, and if so how—for example, how uncharged or non-criminal acts of family violence should be treated.
303 See, eg: National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 38, 13 May 2010.
basic offences—based upon the same circumstances of aggravation.\textsuperscript{304} Another stakeholder suggested that courses of conduct should be recognised in substantive offences rather than in sentencing.\textsuperscript{305} This raises questions of procedural fairness in sentencing, and policy questions about the appropriate means of recognising courses of conduct in the criminal law.

\textit{Interactions between sentencing reform options, existing sentencing laws and principles, and existing offences}

13.188 Given the divergent approaches taken in state and territory sentencing legislation to both sentencing factors and aggravated offences, any uniform sentencing reforms will inevitably raise jurisdiction-specific issues. For example, as one submission suggested, the recognition of new family-violence related sentencing factors may duplicate, or create inconsistencies with, existing sentencing factors in some jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{306}

13.189 Similarly, in those jurisdictions with aggravated offences relevant to the family violence context, the imposition of new sentencing factors may duplicate the elements of aggravated offences.

\textbf{Commissions’ views}

\textit{Recognising courses of conduct in sentencing}

\textbf{Representative charges}

13.190 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that—to the maximum extent possible in criminal matters involving a course of family-violence related conduct—police and prosecutors should be encouraged to pursue the option of using representative charges as a way of presenting a course of conduct to the court.

13.191 Two issues emerge from this proposal. First, the reference to the use of representative charges to the ‘maximum extent possible’ raises the policy question of the circumstances in which it is appropriate to use representative charges in the prosecution of family-violence related offences. The second issue is the implementation of any such policy position by way of prosecutorial guidelines, education and training.

13.192 The Commissions do not make any recommendations in respect of the policy underlying the use of representative charges in the prosecution of family-violence related offences. Representative charging is properly a matter for prosecutorial discretion in individual cases, based upon an assessment of the evidence and the public interest. The Commissions agree that the matters of concern identified by stakeholders—including the efficient conduct of trials and the maintenance of procedural fairness towards accused persons—are relevant to the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Any presumptive policy position favouring the use or non-use of representative charges in the family violence context would undermine such discretion, and may produce outcomes that are contrary to the public interest. Similarly, the Commissions consider that decisions to pursue alternatives to representative charges—such as ‘charging all charges’ or relying upon course of conduct-based offences where available—must be made on a case-by-case basis.

\textsuperscript{304} See, eg, Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{305} Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions NSW, Submission FV 158, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{306} Ibid.

13.193 The Commissions’ reference to the use of representative charges ‘to the maximum extent possible’ is directed towards encouraging the routine consideration of representative charges in the prosecution of family-violence related offences within the existing decision-making framework, to ensure that they are used wherever appropriate. Prosecutorial guidelines, education and training on the use of representative charges in the family violence context are an appropriate means of developing expertise and promoting consistency in prosecutorial decision-making in this context. The Commissions acknowledge that charge negotiations and negotiations relating to statements of agreed facts are integral to the use of representative charges. These are appropriately the subject of prosecutorial guidelines, education and training in the family violence context. Recommendation 13–2 below reflects these matters. Similarly, the Commissions acknowledge the importance of professional education and training for criminal defence lawyers in conducting charge negotiations and negotiations as to agreed statements of facts in the family violence context. 307

13.194 The Commissions do not make any recommendations as to whether an admitted or proven course of conduct should be taken into account to place the individual offences charged in a higher range of objective seriousness. While such an approach may be beneficial in enabling sentencing courts to consider family-violence related offending in its full context, the Commissions acknowledge that such an approach will have ramifications beyond the parameters of family violence.

Statutory sentencing factors.

13.195 The Commissions do not make any recommendations about the statutory recognition of a course of conduct as a sentencing factor. While acknowledging the substantial support from stakeholders for this measure, the Commissions consider that it would be premature for two reasons. First, it would be necessary to address the uncertainty identified in ALRC Report 103 about the application of such a provision to uncharged conduct. Secondly, as the provision would be one of general application, it would be necessary to consider its operation beyond the family violence context.

A family relationship as an aggravating or non-mitigating sentencing factor 13.196 The Commissions maintain their views expressed in the Consultation Paper that the existence of a family relationship between an offender and a victim should be prescribed as a non-mitigating factor in sentencing, rather than an aggravating factor.

307 Issues of training and education are considered in Ch 31. Further issues of relevance to the prosecution of family-violence related offences are considered in Ch 32 on specialisation.
A family relationship should not be an aggravating factor in sentencing

13.197 The Commissions recommend that a family relationship between the offender and the victim should not be prescribed as an aggravating sentencing factor per se for three reasons. First, while acknowledging the potential educative and denunciatory function of an aggravating sentencing factor, the Commissions have reservations about introducing a legislative requirement that would remove judicial sentencing discretion. Consistent with the Commissions’ position on aggravated offences, the universal treatment of a family relationship as an aggravating factor could mandate higher penalties in circumstances where they are not just and appropriate—for example, in the sentencing of child offenders or persons with a mental illness.

13.198 Secondly, the Commissions agree that the designation of a family relationship as an aggravating factor in sentencing is too blunt an instrument to recognise the nature and dynamics of family violence. Such a provision would capture criminal conduct committed outside the family violence context—that is, where the relevant behaviour does not involve elements of coercion or control. Such an approach would also elevate the gravity of violence committed against a family member solely on the basis of the relationship. The Commissions consider that such an approach would undesirably require a value judgment about the relative severity of offences committed against family members, as opposed to those committed against strangers, notwithstanding that the relevant conduct may be identical.

13.199 Thirdly, the Commissions agree that the prescription of a family relationship as an aggravated sentencing factor may involve the duplication of existing sentencing factors—for example, the commission of an offence in the home of another person, in the presence of a child or in the abuse of a relationship of trust or authority. The Commissions agree that such factors already ‘address the evil of the offending in the sense that the perpetrator is someone known and trusted and the victim is not safe within their home’.

A family relationship as a non-mitigating factor in sentencing

13.200 The Commissions consider that it would be appropriate for sentencing legislation to provide expressly that the commission of an offence in the context of a family or domestic relationship should not be treated as a mitigating factor. The Commissions agree that the mere existence of a family relationship should not, of itself, diminish the seriousness of an offence. To treat such factors as mitigating would undesirably appear to trivialise family violence.

13.201 The Commissions acknowledge concerns expressed by stakeholders that this approach may preclude the recognition of a family relationship as a mitigating factor in some circumstances in which mitigation may be appropriate. This could include, for example, family violence victims who commit crimes under duress or in the course of self-defence. However, the Commissions consider that the existence of a family relationship is not the relevant mitigating factor in such cases, but rather the circumstances of duress or self defence. The recognition of a family relationship as a non-mitigating factor would not displace existing sentencing discretion. In addition, the commission of an offence under duress or in self-defence would ordinarily form the basis of a defence, and may inform prosecutorial decisions not to lay charges or prosecute such offences.

13.202 Accordingly, the Commissions endorse the ALRC’s view in ALRC Report 103 that sentencing legislation should not distinguish between aggravating and mitigating factors, but rather prescribe factors that should not be treated as either aggravating or mitigating.

13.203 However, the Commissions acknowledge that such an approach is contrary to the approaches taken in some state and territory sentencing legislation. If jurisdictions continue the practice of prescribing aggravating and mitigating sentencing factors, the Commissions consider that such factors must target the dynamics of family violence with greater precision than the mere existence of a family relationship. These factors may include, for example, the abuse of a relationship of trust or authority between the offender or the victim, the commission of an offence in a person’s home, or the commission of an offence as part of a course of conduct—provided that the application or otherwise of such a provision to uncharged conduct is made clear.

13.204 The Commissions do not make any formal recommendations about specific aggravating factors that may apply in the family violence context, should jurisdictions continue the practice of expressly designating aggravating and mitigating factors. In part, this is because it would be necessary to consider the potential application of such factors beyond the family violence context. In addition, a uniform or nationally consistent approach would be a complex exercise requiring significantly further consideration, given the divergent approaches taken by individual jurisdictions to aggravating sentencing factors and aggravated offences.

13.205 In particular, consideration of a uniform or consistent approach would require a review of the aggravated offences and sentencing factors in individual jurisdictions, in order to identify and avoid potential duplication. This would be necessary to:

- prevent ‘double counting’ where a particular circumstance constitutes both an element of an aggravated offence and an aggravated sentencing factor;
- avoid infringing the De Simoni principle, which would operate to prevent a sentencing court from taking into account aggravating sentencing factors that also comprise the elements of a more serious offence; and
- ensure that any new aggravating sentencing factors do not duplicate or contradict existing provisions.

13.206 Given the jurisdiction-specific nature of these reviews, the Commissions consider that they are matters for further consideration by state and territory governments, under the auspices of a national coordinating body such as SCAG.
13.207 The Commissions consider, however, that if jurisdictions continue the practice of designating certain sentencing factors as aggravating, it would be preferable for such factors to be capable of applying equally to family and non-familial violence, for example, the commission of an offence in abuse of a relationship of trust or authority.

The relationship between aggravating and non-mitigating sentencing factors

13.208 The Commissions note that several submissions favoured the recognition of a family relationship between the offender and victim as both an aggravating and non-mitigating sentencing factor. However, the Commissions consider that it is not possible to mandate the same circumstance as both aggravating and non-mitigating. The designation of an aggravating factor would operate to increase an offender’s culpability and justify a higher maximum penalty in all cases. The same factor cannot simultaneously be treated as a basis for neither increasing nor decreasing culpability. However, it may be possible for a family relationship to be recognised as a non-mitigating factor and another family-violence related circumstance, for example, abuse of trust, to be considered an aggravating factor.

The relationship between sentencing factors and offences

13.209 Some stakeholders proposed various combinations of new sentencing factors and aggravated offences. As identified in the discussion of submissions and consultations above, these included:

- the creation of an aggravating sentencing factor and aggravated offences based upon the same circumstance of aggravation—namely, a family relationship—with the intention that the aggravating sentencing factor would operate only in those cases where there is no charge or conviction upon an aggravated offence.

- the creation of a non-mitigating sentencing factor, and the creation of aggravated offences, both of which are based upon the same circumstance—namely a family relationship;

- the creation of aggravated offences based upon a relationship of coercion and control between the victim and the offender, and the designation of a family relationship as a non-mitigating sentencing factor.

13.210 The Commissions emphasise the importance of recognising potential interaction issues arising from the De Simoni principle and the avoidance of double counting. In particular, the Commissions make the following observations on proposed combinations:

---

310 Ibid.
the De Simoni principle would preclude the creation of an aggravated sentencing factor that operates in those cases where there is no charge or conviction upon an aggravated family-violence related offence that is based upon the same circumstance of aggravation. In such cases, the offender should be charged with the aggravated offence;\(^{312}\)

the De Simoni principle would, however, technically permit a non-mitigating sentencing factor also to form the basis of an aggravated offence,\(^ {313}\) however the Commissions question the utility of this approach. Where an offender is charged with an aggravated offence, the circumstance of aggravation self-evidently cannot be taken into account as a mitigating factor in sentencing. The Commissions reiterate their reservations about the prescription of a family relationship as a circumstance of aggravation in either offences or sentencing;

it would be possible for an aggravated offence to operate in conjunction with an aggravating sentencing factor, where the respective circumstances of aggravation are purposively distinct;\(^ {314}\) and it would not be possible, however, for an aggravated offence to operate in conjunction with an aggravated sentencing factor where the circumstances of aggravation are identical, or purposively the same. This would result in the double counting of the circumstances of aggravation of the offence.

Sentencing guidance

13.211 The Commissions’ view remains that a national bench book on family violence could play a significant and valuable role in guiding judicial officers in sentencing in family violence matters. Such a resource could draw attention to the particular features and dynamics of family violence of which judicial officers should be aware in sentencing. It would also consolidate the guidance contained in existing case law and research and present it in an accessible format. Such guidance would promote both national consistency and consistency within individual states and territories. This matter is the subject of Recommendation 13–1(b) below.

13.212 In particular, as noted in Chapter 12, there is merit in providing courts with guidance about particular issues arising in sentencing for breaches of protection orders. The Commissions consider there would be merit in providing courts with guidance about the particular repercussions on victims of imposing fines on offenders for family-violence related offences. The Commissions further consider that a national bench book could improve consistency in the identification and consideration of relevant sentencing factors in the family violence context.

\(^{312}\) As proposed in Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010.

\(^{313}\) As proposed in Ibid.

\(^{314}\) As proposed in Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010.
13.213 The Commissions agree with those stakeholders who emphasised the importance of a participatory and consultative approach to the development of a national bench book—including with Indigenous Australians. As discussed in Chapter 31, the Commissions acknowledge the importance of recognising the particular impacts of family violence upon persons identifying with specific cultural, linguistic and social groups.

13.214 The Commissions also concur that the judicious use of existing international resources would assist in identifying best practice and applying it in the Australian context. In this respect, the Canadian bench book, Violence and Family Law in Canada: a Handbook for Judges, may provide a useful starting point for the development of an Australian resource.\(^{315}\)

13.215 The Commissions agree with the submission of the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria that there is merit in a single, national resource consolidating all relevant state, territory and Commonwealth laws.\(^{316}\) This approach would promote consistency and the sharing of experience to a greater extent than would be possible using jurisdiction-specific resources. The Commissions acknowledge, however, that such an initiative may be time and resource intensive. The development of a national bench book should not preclude the ongoing updating of existing resources in individual jurisdictions. Rather, it should be an additional, complementary resource. The Commissions further consider that it would be desirable for existing state and territory judicial resources to cross-refer to the national bench book to promote awareness of this resource.

Recommendation 13–1  The national family violence bench book (see Rec 31–2) should include a section that:

(a) provides guidance about the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence to criminal offences and defences—for example, evidence of a pre-existing relationship between the parties, including evidence of previous violence; and

(b) addresses sentencing in family violence matters.

Recommendation 13–2 Federal, state and territory police, and Commonwealth, state and territory directors of public prosecution respectively, should ensure that police and prosecutors are encouraged by prosecutorial guidelines, and training and education programs, to use representative charges wherever appropriate in family-violence related criminal matters, where the charged conduct forms part of a course of conduct. Relevant prosecutorial guidelines, training and education programs should also address matters of charge negotiation and negotiation as to agreed statements of facts in the prosecution of family-violence related matters.

\(^{315}\) See also Ch 31.

\(^{316}\) Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
Recommendation 13–3  State and territory sentencing legislation should provide that the fact that an offence was committed in the context of a family relationship should not be considered a mitigating factor in sentencing.
14. Homicide Defences and Family Relationships in Criminal Laws

Contents

Introduction 621
Recognising family violence in homicide defences 621
  Self-defence and excessive self-defence 622
  Provocation 632
  A separate partial defence of family violence 638
  Summary of jurisdictional approaches 642
  Submissions and consultations 643
  Commissions’ views 648
Recognising family relationships in criminal law responses to family violence 654
  Current approaches to recognising family relationships in criminal laws 655
  Submissions and consultations 658
  Commissions’ views 660

Introduction

14.1 This chapter is concerned with the extent to which the criminal law should recognise family violence as relevant to a defence to homicide, in circumstances where a victim of family violence kills the family member who was violent towards him or her. This raises the related issue of whether current defences to homicide for victims in family relationships are adequate. This chapter also considers the categories of relationships that should be recognised where a family relationship between the offender and the victim is prescribed as an element of a criminal offence or defence, or as a sentencing factor.

Recognising family violence in homicide defences

14.2 In Chapter 6, the Commissions recommend that, where a state or territory’s criminal legislation expressly refers to the term ‘family violence’—including in the context of homicide defences—the term should be defined consistently with the civil law definition in Recommendation 5–1.1 In the Commissions’ view, the different policy objectives of the criminal law and family violence legislation are not compromised by the adoption of a common understanding of what constitutes family violence in the context of recognising family violence as relevant to a defence to homicide.

---

1 Rec 6–1.

14.3 Each state and territory has different laws in relation to the offences of murder and manslaughter and different defences to those offences. The most relevant defences to homicides committed in a family violence context are provocation, self-defence, and excessive self-defence. Provocation and excessive self-defence are partial defences to murder, reducing it from an offence of murder to manslaughter. Self-defence is a complete defence to criminal liability.

14.4 Several states and territories have given substantial consideration to recognising family violence in the context of defences to homicide. A number of important statutory reforms have resulted from this, with a view to accommodating the experiences of family violence victims who kill. These reforms are considered below.

Self-defence and excessive self-defence

Common law

14.5 Self-defence. The common law has long recognised that a person is justified in using some force in legitimate self-defence. It is lawful to act in self-defence, and therefore it acts as a complete defence to criminal liability, with the onus on the prosecution to negate self-defence. The common law doctrine of self-defence limits the use of force to situations where it is necessary for the accused to use force, and the degree of force is not excessive in the circumstances. The test, as articulated by the High Court in Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic), imports both a subjective and an objective element:

The question to be asked in the end is quite simple. It is whether the accused believed on reasonable grounds that it was necessary in self-defence to do what he [or she] did. If he [or she] had the belief and there were reasonable grounds for it, or if the jury is left in reasonable doubt as to the matter, then he [or she] is entitled to an acquittal.

---

2 Sentencing options for persons convicted of murder or manslaughter also differ across states and territories. Most jurisdictions have abolished mandatory life sentences for murder convictions but they remain in place in Queensland, South Australia and the Northern Territory: Criminal Code (Qld) s 315; Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 11; Criminal Code (NT) ss 157, 161.

5 Ibid.

6 Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic) (1987) 162 CLR 645, 661.
14.6 The common law test, therefore, imports two elements—that the accused person genuinely believed that it was necessary to do what he or she did, and that he or she had reasonable grounds for that belief. Reasonableness is assessed according to the ‘belief of the accused, based upon the circumstances as he [or she] perceived them to be’, rather than ‘the belief of the hypothetical person in his [or her] position’.7

14.7 Accordingly, in determining whether an accused person’s belief was based upon reasonable grounds, a jury may consider, in broad terms, evidence of the surrounding circumstances, all facts within the accused’s knowledge, the personal characteristics of the accused, and the prior conduct of the victim.8

14.8 The common law test does not import a requirement of an ‘imminent threat’ or a ‘proportionate response’ to the threat. Such considerations are, however, relevant to an assessment of the existence and reasonableness of the accused person’s belief that his or her actions were necessary for self-preservation.9

14.9 In the family violence context, some commentators have observed that the common law of self-defence is, at least theoretically, capable of requiring the fact-finder to ‘walk in the shoes of the battered woman in assessing her claim to self-defence’.10 Evidence of the nature and history of the accused’s relationship with the deceased may include:

- evidence of prior violence against the accused, including: patterns of ongoing abuse; the escalation of violence over time; evidence of how the relevant threat was the same or different from previous threats; and the cumulative effects of violence upon the accused;
- relevant physical and psychological characteristics of the accused, as well as his or her cultural background and personal circumstances, such as social support structures, financial means and other social or cultural barriers to reporting or escaping from violence; and
- the means available to the accused to respond to the threat, and his or her efforts to resist or minimise it—for example, previous attempts to defend him or herself, flee or seek assistance, and reasons for returning to the relationship.11

14.10 Such evidence may take the form of one of more of the following:

- evidence of the accused person;
- evidence of other persons such as family members, neighbours, friends or professionals who witnessed violence or observed injuries, or who were told about it by the accused or the deceased;

---

the testimony of expert witnesses about the nature and dynamics of family violence, both generally and specifically in relation to the accused’s circumstances. Expert witnesses may give evidence about a range of matters including: why people remain in abusive relationships; barriers to reporting or fleeing violence; the accused’s ability to perceive danger; relevant cultural factors; and explanations of other aspects of the accused’s conduct, such as why he or she might have acted in self-defence despite planning the attack; and

- documentary evidence, including protection orders or criminal family-violence related proceedings.\(^\text{12}\)

14.11 Notwithstanding that the legal concept of self-defence is, at least theoretically, capable of accommodating the nature and dynamics of family violence, its interpretation and application in practice have been criticised as having largely ‘excluded the experience of battered women, and undermined their claims to reasonableness’.\(^\text{13}\) The Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) identified the following impediments in its 2004 report on defences to homicide:

- the traditional association of self-defence as a ‘one-off’ spontaneous encounter, such as a pub brawl scenario, between two people (usually men) of relatively equal strength—whereas killings in the family violence context are typically in response to an ongoing threat rather than an attack; and

- the fact that men are often physically stronger than their female partners means that women who are victims of family violence more often kill their abusive partners in non-confrontational circumstances—such as when they are asleep or have their guard down—use a weapon, or enlist the assistance of others.\(^\text{14}\)

14.12 The VLRC commented that these factors may adversely influence a jury’s assessment of self-defence. It noted that juries may find that the accused either lacked a genuine belief as to the necessity of his or her actions, or that such a belief was not reasonable because the:

- threat lacked immediacy—for example, where the accused has waited until the deceased was asleep;

- threat lacked seriousness—for example, where the accused has responded to what may appear to be a relatively minor threat; or

- accused person had avenues available to them to escape or seek help.\(^\text{15}\)

14.13 Other commentators have observed that outcomes are largely dependent upon an understanding of the relevance of family-violence related evidence on the part of \(^\text{12}\) Ibid [4.5], citing Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code (Qld), Report of the Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code (2000), 120.

\(^\text{15}\) Ibid, [3.12].
judges, jurors and legal representatives. This includes an understanding of the relevance of evidence of the accused person’s history of abuse and evidence of the general dynamics or ‘social framework’ of family violence. In particular, commentators have suggested that misunderstandings about the relevance of such evidence may arise in those cases in which the accused person does not seek to attribute his or her actions to a psychological syndrome or an abnormality of the mind, but argues rather that the killing was a rational and reasonable response—as informed by all of the circumstances in which the accused found him or herself.

14.14 Excessive self defence. Excessive self-defence can, in certain circumstances, operate as a partial defence at common law. The common law position on excessive self-defence, stated by the High Court in Viro v The Queen is that self-defence which was necessary but involved the use of excessive force involving death, should lead to a verdict of either manslaughter or murder—depending on whether the accused believed that the force the accused used was reasonably proportionate to the danger which the accused believed he or she faced.

Model Criminal Code

14.15 In 1992, the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) Model Criminal Code Officers Committee (MCCOC)—now the Model Criminal Law Officers Committee (MCLOC)—published the Model Criminal Code—Chapter 2, General Principles of Criminal Responsibility Report. That report recommended the following legislative definition of self-defence:

313. Self-defence

A person is not criminally responsible for an offence if the conduct constituting the offence was carried out by him or her in self-defence.

313.1 Conduct is carried out by a person in self-defence if

- the person believed that the conduct was necessary
- to defend himself or herself or another person; or
- to prevent or terminate the unlawful imprisonment of himself or herself or another person; or
- to protect property from unlawful appropriation, destruction, damage or interference; or
- to prevent criminal trespass to any land or premises; or

---

18 Viro v The Queen (1978) 141 CLR 88, 146–147. to remove from any land or premises a person who is committing criminal trespass; and his or her conduct was a reasonable response in the circumstances as perceived by him or her.

313.2 This section does not apply if force involving the intentional infliction of death or really serious injury is used in protection of property or in the prevention of criminal trespass or in the removal of such a trespasser.

313.3 This section does not apply if the conduct to which the person responded was lawful and that person knew that it was lawful.

313.3.1 Conduct is not lawful for the purposes of section 313.3 merely because the person carrying it out is not criminally responsible for it.19

14.16 The MCCOC indicated that the definition of self-defence retains the subjective and objective elements of Zecevic, but is designed to simplify the law:

The test as to necessity is subjective, but the test as to proportion is objective. It requires the response of the accused to be objectively proportionate to the situation which the accused subjectively believed she or he faced (the words ‘as perceived by him or her’ were added to make this clear).20 14.17 The MCCOC also discussed excessive self-defence in its 1998 discussion paper on fatal offences against the person and recommended that a partial defence of this nature not be re-introduced:

On balance, the Committee is not in favour of re-introducing excessive self-defence, particularly in the context of abolishing provocation. As a concept, excessive self-defence is inherently vague. This aspect has to date resulted in no satisfactory test being promulgated.21

State and territory legislation

14.18 Legislative provisions govern self-defence in NSW,22 Victoria,23 Queensland,24 Western Australia,25 South Australia,26 Tasmania,27 ACT,28 and the Northern

20 Ibid, 71.
22 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 418.
23 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) ss 9AC, 9AE. See also s 9AH.
24 Criminal Code Act 1899 (Qld) ss 271, 272.
26 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 15(1).
27 Criminal Code Act 1924 (Tas) s 46.
28 Criminal Code (ACT) s 42.
While the wording of specific provisions differs, all statutes—with the exception of the Queensland Criminal Code—expressly recognise the context-specific nature of the reasonableness requirement. The Commissions consider recent reforms to and other notable aspects of these defences below.

New South Wales

14.19 In 2002, NSW introduced new laws in relation to self-defence and reintroduced the defence of excessive self-defence. The Attorney General stated in the Second Reading Speech of the Crimes Amendment (Self-Defence) Bill 2001 (NSW), that:

> The Bill follows the general concept of self-defence laid down by the Model Criminal Code, so that a defendant who actually believed it was necessary to do what he did to repel an attack, even if he was wrong about that perception, may seek to rely on self-defence, so long as it was a reasonable response in the circumstances as perceived by the defendant. However, the bill contains two departures from the Model Criminal Code. The first departure is the re-introduction of the law of excessive self-defence. This was the common law position as previously stated by the High Court in Viro … … The second difference to the Model Criminal Code relates to self-defence in the context of defence of property and criminal trespass by not permitting death or really serious harm to be occasioned.

> This limit has been modified under the Bill. Obviously, it is not desirable to encourage persons to defend their property with excessive force. The Model Criminal Code emphasised the need to consider the value of human life by indicating that really serious injury or death could never enliven a self-defence issue in defence of property or to prevent criminal trespass. …

> There can be no circumstances where it is appropriate to intentionally or recklessly take a human life in the protection of property or to prevent criminal trespass, although it may be permissible to do serious bodily harm in certain circumstances if necessary and reasonable.

Victoria

14.20 The Victorian Crimes (Homicide) Act came into effect in 2005. The Act implemented a series of recommendations of the 2004 VLRC report on defences to homicide. Key reforms included:

- the abolition of provocation as a partial defence to murder;
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

• defining the law of self-defence in respect of homicide offences;\(^{34}\)
• recognising excessive self-defence through the creation of a new offence of defensive homicide;\(^{35}\) and
• providing legislative guidance on the admissibility of evidence of family violence in the context of homicide defences.\(^{36}\)

14.21 The new offence of defensive homicide is contained in the Crimes Act 1958
(Vic) s 9AD. It applies where an accused kills, believing the conduct to be necessary to defend himself or herself or another from the infliction of death or serious injury, but where he or she did not have reasonable grounds for that belief.

14.22 The VLRC further recommended that the Victorian Department of Justice review the operation of s 9AD after it had been in force for five years, with a view to identifying how the defence is being used, in what circumstances, and with what outcome.\(^{37}\) This review is in progress.\(^{38}\)

Queensland

14.23 The Queensland formulation of self-defence is distinct from that of other jurisdictions in that it does not expressly recognise the contextual nature of reasonableness, and requires acts of self-defence to be undertaken in response to an unlawful assault.\(^{39}\) Section 271 relevantly provides that:

1. When a person is unlawfully assaulted, and has not provoked the assault, it is lawful for the person to use such force to the assailant as is reasonably necessary to make effectual defence against the assault, if the force used is not intended, and is not such as is likely, to cause death or grievous bodily harm.

2. If the nature of the assault is such as to cause reasonable apprehension of death or grievous bodily harm, and the person using force by way of defence believes, on reasonable grounds, that the person can not otherwise preserve the person defended from death or grievous bodily harm, it is lawful for the

---

\(^{34}\) The statutory definition of self-defence applies to murder and manslaughter only. The common law test as outlined in Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic) (1987) 162 CLR 645, 661 continues to apply to all other offences where self-defence is applicable: P Priest, Defences to Homicide (2005)
However, the Victorian Supreme Court has held that—as the statutory definitions of self-defence in the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) ss 9AC (murder) and 9AE (manslaughter) do not expressly abrogate the common law—as a matter of fairness juries should be directed on both common law and statutory self-defence:
Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic) v Samson Rimoni (Ruling No 1) [2010] VSC 26, [26]–[33]. This matter is under consideration by the Victorian Government: Department of Justice (Vic), *Defensive \(^{35}\) Discussed below.

\(^{36}\) Discussed below.

\(^{38}\) Victorian Government, Submission FY 120, 15 June 2010. See also Department of Justice, Victoria

\(^{39}\) The Queensland self-defence provisions have been the subject of judicial criticism for lacking clarity and person to use any such force to the assailant as is necessary for defence, even though such force may cause death or grievous bodily harm.40

14.24 The requirement for defensive action to be taken in response to an assault means that evidence of family violence is relevant in the more limited context of assessing the accused person’s reaction to a particular assault that precipitated the killing. That is—a particular assault must have caused the accused to reasonably apprehend death or grievous bodily harm, and reasonably believe that there was no other means of preserving him or herself.

14.25 This requirement has been criticised as fundamentally inconsistent with the dynamics of family violence—in particular that killings in response to family violence usually stem from ongoing patterns of abuse, and often occur in non-confrontational circumstances. It has been argued that—by effectively viewing the reasonableness requirement through the prism of a response to an assault—the Queensland formulation of self-defence reduces the likelihood that victims of family violence who kill their abusers will be able to meet the conditions of self-defence.41

14.26 Some commentators have criticised the sentencing regime of mandatory life imprisonment for murder in Queensland.42 It has been argued that the lack of sentencing discretion has rendered self-defence an ‘all-or-nothing’ defence for victims of family violence who kill. Such persons are either acquitted or are convicted of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment.43

14.27 These factors led to the introduction of the separate, partial defence of killing in an abusive relationship into the Criminal Code (Qld) in February 2010,44 in response to the recommendations of an independent review commissioned by the Queensland Government.45 This provision is discussed separately below.

Western Australia

14.28 In introducing amendments to self-defence in Western Australia, Suzanne Ellery, the Minister for Child Protection stated in the Second Reading Speech of the Criminal Law Amendment (Homicide) Bill 2008 that:

> Another important change contained in this bill is that the harmful act that the person believes it is necessary to act against in self-defence will not have to be imminent. By providing that the threat need not be imminent, the defence will more readily apply to 40 See also Criminal Code (Qld) s 272 in respect of provoked assault.

---

41 G Mackenzie and E Colvin, Homicide in Abusive Relationships: A Report on Defences (2009), prepared for the Attorney-General and Minister for Industrial Relations (Qld), 26; A Hopkins and P Easteal, ‘Walking in Her Shoes: Battered Women who Kill in Victoria, Western Australia and Queensland’ (2010 - in press) 35(3) Alternative Law Journal; Queensland Government Office for Women, Report of the Taskforce on Women and the Criminal Code (2000), Ch 6. While identifying limitations in the self-defence provisions, the Taskforce reported that its members were divided on the need for legislative reform and, therefore, did not make any recommendations in this respect.
42 Criminal Code (Qld) s 305.
44 Criminal Code (Qld) s 304B.
45 G Mackenzie and E Colvin, Homicide in Abusive Relationships: A Report on Defences (2009), prepared for the Attorney-General and Minister for Industrial Relations (Qld).
women who are the victims of domestic violence in the so called ‘battered spouse’ situation. It will still be necessary for persons to show that there are reasonable grounds for the person’s belief that the act of self-defence was necessary and that the force used must be objectively reasonable in the circumstances the person believed to exist. It is not expected that this provision will apply to situations in which it would be reasonable for the person to take other steps, such as going to the police or escaping from the harmful situation.

South Australia

14.29 In South Australia, it is also a partial defence to a charge for murder—thereby reducing the offence to manslaughter—if the accused genuinely believed the conduct to which the charge relates to be necessary and reasonable for a defensive purpose; but the conduct was not reasonably proportionate to the threat the accused genuinely believed to exist.

As noted above, a provision to similar effect is contained in the crimes legislation of NSW as well as that of Western Australia.

Leading evidence of family violence in the context of self-defence

14.30 As identified in Chapter 13 in relation to offences, evidence of family violence is generally admissible where it is relevant to a fact in issue. In the context of self-defence, such evidence may be probative of both the existence of an accused person’s belief that his or her actions were necessary to preserve himself or herself, and the reasonableness of that belief.

14.31 The Victorian and Queensland parliaments have provided legislative guidance on the potential relevance of evidence of family violence in the context of homicide defences, including self-defence.

Victoria

14.32 As noted in Chapter 13, where family violence is alleged, s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) provides that evidence of family violence may be relevant to defences to murder, defensive homicide and manslaughter. This provision does not operate as a separate defence, but confirms the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence to self-defence. Under s 9AH, where family violence is alleged, self-defence is available even if an accused person is responding to harm that is not immediate; or his or her response uses disproportionate force.

47 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 15(2).
48 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 421.
49 Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 248(3). The partial defence of excessive self-defence was introduced by the Criminal Law Amendment (Homicide) Act 2008 (WA).
50 Ch 6 discusses the definition of family violence used in Crimes Act 1958 (Vic), as compared with that used in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).
51 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 9AC.
52 Ibid s 9AD.
53 Ibid s 9AE.
14.33 Types of evidence that can be adduced include:

- evidence about the history of the relationship between the accused person and a family member;
- the general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence;
- the cumulative effects, including psychological effects, on the person or a family member of family violence; and
- social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence.

14.34 In introducing the amendments, the Victorian Attorney-General, Rob Hulls, stated that the section ‘highlights the types of relationship and social context evidence that may be relevant in such cases’. The Explanatory Memorandum to the Crimes (Homicide) Bill 2005 (Vic) indicates that the word ‘may’ is used in the sense of possibility, rather than to denote the conferral or exercise of a discretionary power.

14.35 The Victorian model has, however, been criticised by one lawyer as a ‘breathtaking extension’ of the law of self-defence:

Taken to their logical (or, perhaps, illogical) conclusion, these new provisions suggest that a number of acts of trivial ‘harassment’ (whatever that term might embrace) by a family member, which do not involve actual or threatened abuse, might permit a person to use disproportionate force to kill that family member even where ‘harm’ is not ‘immediate’.

14.36 The first case in which s 9AH was applied was DPP v Anthony Sherna. In that case, Sherna—the accused—strangled his de facto wife and led evidence of family violence, including economic and psychological abuse, inflicted upon him over a period of 18 years. Justice Beach rejected an application by the prosecution to take the issue of self-defence and defence of another away from the jury, even if such pleas may have been ‘weak’ and ‘tenuous’. Sherna was found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced to 14 years imprisonment with a non-parole period of 10 years.

Queensland

14.37 As identified in Chapter 13, the Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 132B provides that ‘relevant evidence of the history of the domestic relationship between the defendant and the person against whom the offence was committed’ is admissible in criminal proceedings against a person for offences defined in Chapters 28 to 30 of the Criminal

---

54 Victoria, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 6 October 2005, 1349 (R Hulls—Attorney-General), 1350.
55 Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes (Homicide) Bill 2005 (Vic), 4.
57 Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic) v Sherna [2009] VSC.
58 A forensic psychologist testified that Sherna showed signs of ‘battered woman syndrome’ including chronic depression, low and decreasing self-esteem and learnt helplessness: I Munro, ‘Anthony Sherna Jailed for Strangling Abusive Partner’, The Age (Melbourne), 20 November 2009.
59 Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic) v Sherna [2009] VSC.
However, the provision has been criticised as redundant because relevant evidence is, by definition, generally admissible.61

14.38 In their 2009 report to the Queensland Attorney-General, Homicide in Abusive Domestic Relationships: a Report on Defences, Professors Geraldine Mackenzie and Eric Colvin recommended that an evidentiary provision—based on the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 9AH—be attached to their recommended partial defence.62 This recommendation was not implemented in the new defence of killing in an abusive domestic relationship in s 304B of the Criminal Code (Qld).

Provocation

Model Criminal Code

14.39 In 1998, the MCCOC recommended that the partial defence of provocation should be abolished, and that:

> Those considerations which currently provide a basis for the partial defence should be considered for their relevance to the determination of an appropriate sentence after conviction.63

14.40 In considering whether or not provocation should be abolished, the MCCOC noted that:

> The balance of opinion sees provocation to operate in practice in a gender biased fashion. Although the courts have tinkered with the legal principles, formulations of the doctrine which reduce the suddenness requirement are artificial and contrary to its historical foundation. The theory underlying battered woman syndrome does not comfortably co-exist with that of provocation.

> The real issue in deciding whether the partial defence of provocation should be retained is one of culpability—whether the defendant should be culpable for murder, or for the lesser crime of manslaughter ... While provocation in its modern setting is designed to afford a middle ground to better reflect criminal culpability, it falls significantly short of that goal by reason of its limited focus which inescapably gears the partial defence towards male patterns of aggression and loss of self-control (its origin) at the expense of the sanctity of human life.64

---

60 These relevantly include homicide offences, offences endangering life or health—for example, grievous bodily harm, torture, wounding and dangerous operation of a vehicle—and assaults.

64 Ibid, 103.
State and territory legislation

Abolition of defence

14.41 Provocation has been abolished in Western Australia,65 Victoria,66 and Tasmania.67

14.42 The Law Reform Commission of Western Australia recommended that the defence be abolished, but only if the mandatory penalty of life imprisonment for murder was replaced with a presumptive sentence of life imprisonment.68 It expressed the view that there was no clear justification for retaining the defence of provocation except the continued existence of mandatory life imprisonment for murder.69

14.43 The Tasmanian Attorney-General in the Second Reading Speech of the Criminal Code Amendment (Abolition of Defence of Provocation) Bill 2003 also stated that provocation was an anachronism 'now that the death penalty and mandatory life imprisonment have been removed'.70 A similar statement was made by the Victorian Attorney-General in the Second Reading Speech of the Crimes (Homicide) Bill 2005:

The courts developed the partial defence of provocation at a time when murder carried a mandatory death penalty. The partial defence is outdated now that provocation can simply be taken into account, if relevant, alongside a range of other factors in the sentencing process.71

14.44 A number of other reasons were advanced for the abolition of the defence by the Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, the VLRC and the Tasmanian Attorney-General.72 These included the following:

- The jury must take into account the personal characteristics and background of the accused when assessing the gravity of the provocation, but then the jury is expected to disregard these factors for the second stage of the test in assessing the power of self-control of an ordinary person.73 The 'correct balance between subjective and objective factors is difficult to strike'.74

---

65 Criminal Law Amendment (Homicide) Act 2008 (WA) s 12.
66 Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 (Vic).
69 In Western Australia, a person who is guilty of murder must be sentenced to life imprisonment unless that sentence would be clearly unjust given the circumstances of the offence and the person; and the person is unlikely to be a threat to the safety of the community when released from imprisonment in which case the person is liable to imprisonment for 20 years: Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 279(4).
70 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 20 March 2003, 60 (J Jackson—Attorney General and Minister for Justice and Industrial Relations).
71 Victoria, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 6 October 2005, 1349 (R Hulls—Attorney-General).
72 See also Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Tas), Annual Report 2000–01, 6 in which the DPP also raised concerns about the defence of provocation.
74 Ibid, 209.
The defence of provocation creates two categories of intentional killing when the distinction ought to be between intentional killing and unintentional killing.75

The moral basis of provocation is incompatible with contemporary community values and views on what is excusable behaviour:
The continued existence of provocation as a separate partial defence to murder partly legitimates killings committed in anger. It suggests there are circumstances in which we, as a community, do not expect a person to control their impulses to kill or to seriously injure a person. This is of particular concern when this behaviour is in response to a person who is exercising his or her personal rights, for instance to leave a relationship or to start a new relationship with another person.76

Retaining a partial defence of provocation also sends a message that the homicide victim must bear some of the blame for his or her own death. This can be deeply distressing for friends and family of homicide victims.77

Provocation is and can be adequately considered as a factor during sentencing.78

The defence of provocation is gender biased and unjust. The defence fails to recognise that men kill women in very different circumstances from those where women kill men. Men are motivated to kill their partners out of jealousy, and a need for control based on threats to leave and issues of infidelity whilst women kill their partners because of a history of family violence.79 Further:
The ‘suddenness’ element of the defence is more reflective of male patterns of aggressive behaviour. The defence was not designed for women and it is argued that it is not an appropriate defence for those who fall into the ‘battered women syndrome.’80

The defence of provocation can be subject to abuse.81

Retention of defence

14.45 Provocation remains a defence in NSW, Queensland, the ACT and the Northern Territory.

14.46 In NSW, provocation is available as a partial defence to murder.82 In 1997, the NSW Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC) recommended that the defence of

---

75 Ibid, 218.
77 Ibid.
78 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 20 March 2003, 60 (J Jackson—Attorney General and Minister for Justice and Industrial Relations).
80 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 20 March 2003, 60 (J Jackson—Attorney General and Minister for Justice and Industrial Relations). See also Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, Review of the Law of Homicide, Project 94 (2007), 214, 216 which refers to provocation being based on male behaviour and the gender inequality in the application of the defence to women who kill long-term abusive partners.
81 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 20 March 2003, 60 (J Jackson—Attorney General and Minister for Justice and Industrial Relations).
82 Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 23.
provocation be retained. It expressed the view that there are circumstances in which a person’s mental state is impaired by a loss of self control, thereby reducing the culpability of a person who kills; and not warranting that person being labelled a ‘murderer’:

A conviction of manslaughter ensures a greater likelihood that the community will understand and accept a reduced sentence which reflects a lesser degree of culpability.

14.47 The NSWLRC considered the application of the defence of provocation in family violence circumstances. It acknowledged that concern is sometimes expressed that the defence of provocation is used inappropriately to excuse offenders who kill their partners because of sexual jealousy or possessiveness:

There may be a risk that a particular accused will seek to rely on the defence of provocation to excuse an act of violence which was in fact premeditated and was committed in the context of a history of violence and domestic abuse. However, that risk hardly justifies abolishing the defence. To do so would exclude other, deserving cases from the reduction of murder to manslaughter by way of the defence of provocation and, in effect, would be to throw the baby out with the bathwater.

14.48 The NSWLRC made a number of recommendations to reform the defence of provocation, none of which has been adopted. In particular, it recommended the abolition of the ‘ordinary person’ test with the result that:

women whose power to exercise self-control has been impaired by reason of a long history of abuse are not excluded from the defence through the imposition of some objective standard which does not take that factor into account in determining ‘ordinary’ powers of self-control. Under our reformulation, all factors which may affect a woman’s power of self-control, including a long history of being abused, are to be considered by the jury in arriving at their verdict.

14.49 The NSWLRC also recommended that legislative amendments make it clear that the defence of provocation may apply to provocative conduct occurring outside the accused’s presence. It noted that this approach ensures that the defence of provocation is not automatically excluded from cases where a woman kills her partner following incidents of abuse by that partner which are not witnessed personally by the woman, such as sexual and physical assaults on her children.

14.50 In Queensland, the partial defence of provocation to murder is limited to circumstances in which the accused kills ‘in the heat of passion caused by sudden provocation, and before there is time for the person’s passion to cool’. In 2008, the Queensland Law Reform Commission (QLRC) recommended that the partial defence should remain, given the ‘constraint of the [Queensland] Government’s stated intention to make no change to the existing penalty of mandatory life imprisonment for murder’. However, the QLRC recommended the following amendments to the defence:

- other than in circumstances of an ‘extreme and exceptional character’, the partial defence should not be based upon ‘words alone, or conduct consisting substantially of words’, or upon ‘the deceased’s choice about a relationship’; and
- the defendant should bear the onus of proof of the partial defence, on the balance of probabilities.

14.51 On 12 September 2010, the Queensland Attorney-General, Cameron Dick, stated that the Queensland Government intends to introduce a Bill into Parliament in 2010 containing these amendments to the Criminal Code (Qld).

14.52 Provocation is a partial defence in the ACT and the Northern Territory; and in each case the conduct of the deceased provoking the offender may have occurred immediately before the act or omission causing death or at any previous time.

14.53 In 2000, the Law Reform Committee of the Northern Territory recommended that the defence of provocation should be amended to abolish the requirement for the accused to have ‘acted on the sudden and before there was time for his passion to cool’. In 2006, the Northern Territory introduced a new provision dealing with the defence of provocation. The revised provision, currently in force, imposes an objective test as to whether the provocation was sufficient to have induced an ordinary person to have so far lost self control as to have formed an intent to kill or cause serious harm to the deceased. A person’s gender, cultural background or ethnicity is not relevant when applying this test of assessing the power of self control of a person.

---

90 Queensland Law Reform Commission, A Review of the Excuse of Accident and the Defence of Provocation, Report 64 (2008), Rec 21–1. The QLRC expressed the view that, unless the penalty of mandatory life imprisonment for murder was replaced with that of presumptive life imprisonment—which would enable circumstances of provocation to be taken into account in sentencing—the partial defence of provocation should remain: Ibid. [21.177]
91 Ibid, Recs 21–2; 21–3; 21–5. As discussed below, the QLRC further recommended consideration of a separate defence for ‘battered persons’ in ‘seriously abusive’ relationships who kill the person who was violent towards him or her: Ibid, Rec 21–4.
92 C Dick (Queensland Attorney-General and Minister for Industrial Relations), ‘State Government to Amend Laws Relating to Accident, Provocation’ (Media Release, 12 September 2010).
93 Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 13. In the ACT, a person who is guilty of committing murder is liable to imprisonment for life but a court may impose a sentence for a stated term: Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) s 32(1). Crimes Act 1900 (ACT) s 12.
94 Criminal Code (NT) s 158. In the Northern Territory, a person who is guilty of murder is liable to a mandatory term of imprisonment for life: s 157. A person who is guilty of manslaughter is liable to imprisonment for life but this penalty is not mandatory: s 161.
96 Criminal Reform Amendment Act (No 2) 2006 (NT) ss 8, 17.
97 Criminal Code (NT) s 158(2).
the Attorney-General noted that the revised defence would address family violence issues:

The revised provision also removes the requirement for the defendant to have acted ‘on the sudden and before there was a time for his passion to cool’. This requirement has to date made the defence unavailable in cases where there has been a history of serious abuse inflicted on the defendant, which ultimately leads them into attacking their abuser. This is the situation in what is commonly referred to as ‘battered women’ cases.

The bill also clarifies that the defence is available in circumstances where the provocation is directed at someone other than the accused, for example towards children of the defendant. The government considers that this revised provision will reflect the best law on this defence.98

Overseas

14.54 On 8 December 2009 the defence of provocation was repealed in New Zealand. This followed two reports by the New Zealand Law Commission (NZLC) which recommended abolition of the partial defence—one published in 2001,99 and the other published in 2007.100 In the latter report, the NZLC specifically considered the effect of the defence of provocation on battered defendants. It concluded that:

For the majority of battered defendants, self defence will tactically offer a preferable alternative to provocation, because it results in an acquittal. … [P]rovocation is not benefiting battered defendants sufficiently to warrant its retention, and our review of case law confirms this.101

14.55 In contrast, the defence of provocation is available in England and Wales.102 In 2006, the United Kingdom Law Commission reviewed the defence of provocation and recommended that there be legislative reform to include circumstances in which the defendant acted in response to ‘fear of serious violence towards the defendant or another’.103 The Law Commission considered that this reform would be sufficient to meet the criticisms that the defence of provocation ‘makes no provision for fear of serious violence to reduce murder to manslaughter’104 and that it permits the reduction of the offence from murder to manslaughter in cases ‘where the provoked murder may have been little more than a reflection of the continuing cultural acceptability of men’s use of violence in anger’.105

100 New Zealand Law Commission, The Partial Defence of Provocation, Report 98 (2007). This report identified a number of fundamental flaws with the defence of provocation including that it was a defence biased in favour of heterosexual men: 48–49.
101 Ibid, 58.
102 Homicide Act 1957 (UK) s 3.
104 Ibid, 91.
105 Ibid. The defence of provocation is also available in Ireland, and in 2009, the Law Reform Commission of Ireland accepted that the defence was unsatisfactory and made a number of recommendations concerning its reform: Law Reform Commission (Ireland), Defences in Criminal Law (2009), [7.23]–[7.35].
A separate partial defence of family violence

Queensland

14.56 The Criminal Code (Abusive Domestic Relationship Defence and Another Matter) Amendment Act 2010 (Qld) amended the Criminal Code (Qld) by inserting a new s 304B, which introduced a new partial defence to murder of ‘killing in an abusive domestic relationship’. Section 304B provides that murder will be reduced to manslaughter if:

- the accused unlawfully killed the deceased in circumstances that would constitute murder;
- the deceased has committed ‘serious acts of domestic violence’ against the accused in the course of an ‘abusive domestic relationship’;
- the accused believes that it is necessary to do the act or make the omission causing death, in order to preserve him or herself from death or grievous bodily harm; and
- the accused has reasonable grounds for that belief, having regard to the abusive domestic relationship and all the circumstances of the case.\(^{106}\)

14.57 The terms ‘domestic violence’ and ‘domestic relationship’ are defined by reference to the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld).\(^{107}\) The word ‘serious’ has been left deliberately undefined as a matter for the jury to determine in the circumstances of individual cases. The Queensland Attorney-General, Cameron Dick, stated in the Second Reading Speech that:

> The use of the term ‘serious’ within the provision in relation to the level of domestic violence is used as a matter of emphasis to place the nature of the domestic violence in the Supreme Court murder trial in context. ... All domestic violence must be condemned not only by government but in all our communities and in our homes. However, the use of the term ‘serious’ in the bill acts to create an appropriate threshold for the application of this partial defence to a charge of murder.\(^{108}\)

14.58 Sections 304(4)–(7) confirm the relevance of the full circumstances of the relationship between the accused and the deceased. They provide that:

- a history of acts of serious domestic violence may include acts that appear minor or trivial when considered in isolation;
- the partial defence is available even if the killing was in response to a particular act of domestic violence committed by the deceased that would not—if the history of acts of serious domestic violence were disregarded—warrant the response;

---

106 Criminal Code (Qld) s 304B(1).
107 Ibid s 304B(2).
the partial defence is available even if the accused has sometimes committed acts of domestic violence in the relationship; and in assessing the reasonableness of the accused’s belief that his or her actions were necessary for self-preservation, regard may be had to circumstances including acts of the deceased that were not acts of domestic violence.

14.59 This partial defence only applies to murder, and the victim of family violence. Unlike self-defence, it is not available to persons acting in the defence of third persons who are family violence victims.109 In further contrast to self-defence, s 304B does not require the killing to occur in response to an assault by the deceased.

14.60 The Explanatory Notes to the Criminal Code (Abusive Domestic Relationship Defence and Another Matter) Amendment Bill 2009 (Qld) indicate that the provision is intended to be additional rather than an alternative to other defences or excuses:

A victim of abuse charged with the murder of their abuser may wish to raise the complete defence of self-defence for the purposes of an acquittal, the partial defence of diminished responsibility or provocation to reduce a charge of murder to manslaughter, as well as the new partial defence depending on the circumstances of the case. It will then be a matter for the jury having regard to all the defences/excuses left to them to determine criminal responsibility.110

14.61 The Explanatory Notes express an intention to achieve ‘a balance between necessarily punishing those who would otherwise be guilty of murder, and providing some legal protections for victims of serious abuse’.111 The Explanatory Notes indicate that the provision is designed to respond to two key problems, namely:

• a lack of sentencing discretion in respect of victims of family violence who are convicted of murder, due to the sentencing regime of mandatory life imprisonment; and

• the limited effectiveness of existing defences for family violence victims who kill, due to the way in which it has been identified that they kill—for example, in non-confrontational circumstances, in response to an ongoing threat rather than a ‘one-off’ attack.112

14.62 Section 304B was enacted following an independent report commissioned by the Queensland Government,113 after a recommendation made by the QLRC that:

Consideration should be given, as a matter of priority, to the development of a separate defence for battered persons which reflects the best current knowledge about 109 As noted above, in Queensland, a mandatory life sentence applies if a person is convicted of murder, unlike in several other jurisdictions where there is discretion in sentencing for murder.

110 Ibid, 4.
111 Ibid, 3.
112 Ibid, 1–2.
113 G Mackenzie and E Colvin, Homicide in Abusive Relationships: A Report on Defences (2009), prepared for the Attorney-General and Minister for Industrial Relations (Qld), which recommended that the defence should be framed as a separate defence, applicable only where homicide occurs in the context of an abusive relationship, rather than as general amendment to the law of self-defence: [1.3.2.4].
the effects of a seriously abusive relationship on a battered person, ensuring that the defence is available to an adult or a child and is not gender-specific.114

14.63 The independent report, written by Mackenzie and Colvin, recommended against a new, complete defence for family violence victims who kill, or the amendment of existing self-defence provisions. The authors referred to stakeholders’ arguments that these approaches would risk protecting unmeritorious defendants, and that self-defence is adequate as a complete defence because it has led to acquittals in family violence cases. Mackenzie and Colvin concluded that:

In light of the diverse views expressed, we cannot recommend the reform of the general law of self-defence in this Report. While there may be deficiencies in the existing law and lessons to be learned from the experiences of other jurisdictions, a broader inquiry should be conducted before reform is initiated.

We have considered whether it would be appropriate to recommend the introduction of a separate version of self-defence, restricted to the victims of seriously abusive relationships. On balance, however, we have concluded that, at this time, there is insufficient support within the legal community for any complete defence outside the conditions of the existing defence of self-defence. We suggest that options be reconsidered when sufficient time has passed to permit assessment of the impact of the developments in other jurisdictions.115

14.64 Some recommendations of the independent report were not adopted in s 304B.
These included recommendations that:

• the partial defence should be available to the victims of seriously abusive relationships and family members of the victim who are or have been parties to the domestic relationship in which the abuse has occurred and who act in defence of the victim;116

• the person claiming the partial defence need only believe that the killing was necessary for self-defence generally rather than specifically to preserve his or her life;117 and

• as mentioned above, the inclusion of an evidentiary provision, based on the Victorian model, providing guidance about the potential relevance of evidence of family violence.118

14.65 At the time of writing, s 304B had not been utilised. In the murder trial of R v Falls, the jury was directed on the section, however the accused was acquitted of murder on the basis of self-defence.119

114 Queensland Law Reform Commission, A Review of the Excuse of Accident and the Defence of 115 G Mackenzie and E Colvin, Homicide in Abusive Relationships: A Report on Defences (2009), prepared for the Attorney-General and Minister for Industrial Relations (Qld), [3.32]–[3.33].
116 Ibid, [4.29].
117 Ibid, [4.3]. Compare Explanatory Notes, Criminal Code (Abusive Domestic Relationship Defence and Another Matter) Amendment Bill (Qld) 2009, 10.
118 G Mackenzie and E Colvin, Homicide in Abusive Relationships: A Report on Defences (2009), prepared for the Attorney-General and Minister for Industrial Relations (Qld), [5.30].
119 R v Falls (Unreported, Supreme Court of Queensland, Applegarth J, 2–3 June 2010).
14.66 Some commentators have criticised the Queensland approach. For example, Anthony Hopkins and Professor Patricia Eastal described the reform as ‘a compromised outcome, leaving battered women who kill in Queensland in an invidious position as compared to their interstate counterparts’. They argue that, while the section may reduce the number of murder convictions for persons who kill in response to serious family violence, it will not increase the prospect of acquittal for such persons, and may potentially undermine their claims to self-defence.

14.67 The authors commented on the partial nature of the defence in the following terms:

In echo of the standard common law formulation of self-defence, s 304B requires that the defendant believed his or her act was necessary in self-preservation from death or grievous bodily harm. And, that the defendant had ‘reasonable grounds for the belief having regard to the abusive domestic relationship and all of the circumstances of the case’.

Under the common law, and the formulations of the test of self-defence in Victoria and Western Australia, the existence of such a belief warrants acquittal. This result is almost a self-evident consequence of the finding that the use of lethal force was reasonable and rational. By contrast, s 304B operates as a partial defence, reducing murder to manslaughter. Thus, despite the existence of reasonable grounds for a belief that it was necessary to use lethal force in self-defence, the killer remains subject to punishment—a clear though contradictory indication that their actions were neither reasonable nor rational.

The enactment of s 304B leaves untouched the test of self-defence in Queensland—the last remaining in Australia to require defensive action is taken in response to an assault. Where a battered woman seeks an acquittal, the reform does nothing to ensure that the reasonableness of her actions are assessed by reference to all of the situational and psychological circumstances in which she finds herself.

14.68 Hopkins and Eastal also express concern that s 304B ‘substantially duplicates’ existing self-defence provisions in ss 271 and 272 of the Queensland Criminal Code. They comment that such duplication may create confusion in the minds of jurors about the relevance of family-violence related evidence where they are directed to consider both self-defence and s 304B:

Where a woman kills her batterer in circumstances where she is subject to a threat of serious violence, such as to constitute an assault, she may seek to rely upon both defences. In such a case, the same essential elements must be considered by the jury. That is, did she honestly believe that it was necessary to do as she did to preserve her life or protect herself from grievous bodily harm? And, did she have reasonable grounds for that belief?

Given the level of conformity, judicial directions may focus on the fact that s 304B expressly requires consideration of [an] ‘abusive relationship and all of the circumstances of the case’, whereas s 271 and s 272 do not. Whilst this distinction

---

121 Ibid.
122 Ibid.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

may be insignificant as a matter of law, it may be a matter of great practical importance. Where a choice must be made, jurors may incline towards the view that a battered woman’s actions were only reasonable taking into account the violent antecedents. The result: a manslaughter verdict where otherwise a battered woman would have been entitled to an acquittal. Disturbingly, such an outcome would run counter to the overall objective of the reform, intended as it was to ensure that the Criminal Code (Qld) further embrace the experiences of those who kill after suffering prolonged abuse.123

Consideration of separate defences in other jurisdictions

Victoria

14.69 The VLRC, in its 2004 report on defences to homicide, recommended against the introduction of a separate defence for persons who kill in response to family violence. It concluded that reforms should focus on ‘ensuring that self-defence properly accommodates women’s experiences, rather than on creating a special defence for women who kill in response to family violence’. The Commission considered that clarification of self-defence and evidence law could ‘take adequate account of women’s experiences of violence’.124

Western Australia

14.70 Similarly, the Law Reform Commission of Western Australia in its 2007 Report, Review of the Law of Homicide, concluded that, rather than introduce a separate defence for victims of family violence, ‘it is preferable to amend the law so that it better accommodates the experiences of victims of domestic violence who kill’.125

New Zealand

14.71 The NZLC, in its 2001 report, Some Criminal Defences with Particular Reference to Battered Defendants, did not support the introduction of a specific defence for victims of family violence who kill or assault their abusers, because it was of the view that the availability of self-defence was adequate. The NZLC recognised that there may be some difficulties for battered persons demonstrating that their conduct was in self-defence, but was of the view that these could be addressed by reforming the provisions relating to self-defence.126

Summary of jurisdictional approaches

14.72 In summary, several jurisdictions have given substantial consideration to recognising family violence in the context of defences to homicide. A number of important statutory reforms have resulted from this, including:

- reforms to the defence of self-defence—including removal of the requirement for the threat to be imminent (Western Australia);

123 Ibid.
14. Homicide Defences and Family Relationships in Criminal Laws

- reforms to the defence of provocation—including the removal for the requirement for the defendant to have ‘acted on the sudden and before there was a time for his passion to cool’ (Northern Territory), and removal of the requirement for the provocative conduct of the deceased to have occurred immediately prior to the act or omission causing death (for example, NSW);
- abolition of the defence of provocation in part because of its unsuitability for female victims of family violence (Victoria, Western Australia, Tasmania);
- expanding self-defence to take family violence into account, including express provision for the leading of evidence about family violence (Victoria); and
- creating a new defence of family violence (Queensland).

14.73 With the exception of the Queensland legislation, most reforms have not introduced a separate defence to accommodate victims of family violence.

Submissions and consultations

14.74 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions proposed that state and territory criminal legislation should:

- provide defences to homicide which accommodate the experiences of family violence victims who kill, recognising the dynamics and features of family violence;¹²７ and
- expressly allow defendants to lead evidence about family violence in the context of a defence to homicide. The Commissions noted that s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) is an instructive model in this regard.¹²⁸

14.75 More generally, the Commissions sought stakeholder views on the adequacy of current homicide defences in the family violence context, and on the preferable means of recognising family violence as a defence to homicide.¹²⁹

14.76 The majority of stakeholders responding to these issues strongly supported the principle of recognition—namely, that the nature and dynamics of family violence should be recognised in homicide defences and supporting evidentiary provisions. However, stakeholders were divided about the appropriate form of recognition.

Recognising the nature and dynamics of family violence in homicide defences

‘In-principle’ recognition of family violence in homicide defences

14.77 Submissions responding to the proposal that jurisdictions should provide defences to homicide, which accommodate the experiences of family violence victims

¹²⁸  Ibid, Proposal 7–5. See also G Mackenzie and E Colvin, Homicide in Abusive Relationships: A Report on Defences (2009), prepared for the Attorney-General and Minister for Industrial Relations (Qld), [5.30].
¹²⁹  Consultation Paper, Questions 7–10, 7–11.
who kill, strongly supported the principle of recognition of the dynamics of family violence.\textsuperscript{130} The majority of submissions did not advance reasons for their positions or provide further comments as to detail. Two submissions, however, emphasised the importance of a nationally consistent approach to recognition.\textsuperscript{131} One legal service provider commented that any form of recognition should not result in the differential treatment of killings in response to family violence, and those in response to other forms of violence.\textsuperscript{132}

14.78 Professor Julie Stubbs submitted that homicide defences should not be treated in isolation, and any forms of recognition should also include evidentiary rules and sentencing law and policy. Stubbs further submitted that any consideration of defences should include an examination of their use or potential use by family violence offenders who are charged with homicide offences.\textsuperscript{133}

\textit{Adequacy of current homicide defences}

14.79 Submissions and consultations indicated that, on balance, stakeholders considered that current approaches to homicide defences are inadequate.\textsuperscript{134} Stakeholders expressed various concerns about individual jurisdictional approaches and issues of general application including:

- the absence of national consistency in approaches to defences,\textsuperscript{135}
14. Homicide Defences and Family Relationships in Criminal Laws

- ‘unintended consequences’ associated with the use of defensive homicide provisions in Victoria—in particular their use by persons who have committed family violence against the deceased;\textsuperscript{136}

- aspects of Queensland laws and sentencing policy, including—the existence of mandatory life sentencing for murder; the partial nature of the defence in the \textit{Criminal Code} s 304B; the risk that s 304B may be misapplied by juries because it ‘substantially duplicates’ the existing self-defence provisions in the \textit{Criminal Code} ss 271–272; and the requirement in ss 271–272 that actions taken in self-defence must be in response to an assault;\textsuperscript{137}

- the Western Australian reforms to self-defence have primarily focused on the doctrinal content of the law and, in doing so, have not directly addressed issues of application;\textsuperscript{138} and

- the continued existence of provocation defences in some jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{139}

\textbf{Forms of recognition.}

14.80 There was divergence in stakeholder views about the preferable form of recognition of the dynamics of family violence in homicide defences.

14.81 The majority of stakeholders commenting on this issue supported self-defence as the basis for recognition,\textsuperscript{140} however there was division as to whether such recognition should occur within existing self-defence provisions of general application, or whether a specific family-violence related form of self-defence is necessary. Three stakeholders supported a generally applicable formulation of self-defence that encapsulates the social context of homicides, including circumstances of family violence.\textsuperscript{141} The

\begin{itemize}
  \item\textsuperscript{136} Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, \textit{Submission FV} 173, 25 June 2010. See also Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, \textit{Submission FV} 220, 1 July 2010 which referred to concerns about recent Victorian cases on this issue, including \textit{R v Middendorp [2010] VSC} 202.
  \item\textsuperscript{139} Commissioner for Victims’ Rights (South Australia), \textit{Submission FV} 111, 9 June 2010. See also A Cannon, \textit{Submission FV} 137, 23 June 2010, who commented generally that a reform of homicide laws and defences was necessary in South Australia.
predominant basis for this view was equality in the treatment of family violence victims charged with homicide—namely, that ‘family violence victims should not be seen in an atypical context’. Hopkins and Easteal further commented that self-defence appropriately recognises that killings are ‘rational or reasonable’ responses to serious threats, rather than products of ‘the extraordinary psychology of battered women’.

14.82 In their comparison of the legislative reforms to self-defence in Victoria, Queensland and Western Australia, Hopkins and Easteal concluded that the Victorian reforms have gone furthest to ensure engagement with the experience of battered women. Despite retaining the common law formulation of self-defence, those amendments put beyond doubt that reasonableness must be considered by reference to [the victim’s] full situational and psychological predicament.

14.83 Other stakeholders expressly supported the Victorian reforms as a basis for recognition.

14.84 The NSW Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW ODPP) favoured recognition of family violence within existing self-defence provisions of general application, or as a family-violence specific partial defence in the nature of provocation, without expressing a firm view on the preferred option:

Because family violence is such an insidious and often long experienced phenomenon, and the effects of it can make it very difficult for the victim to speak freely about it, there is a good argument for developing specific rules for it to be available either as a full defence (within the self-defence part of the Crimes Act) or partial defence to murder (like provocation). Provocation in our experience is very difficult to explain to a jury because of the subjective/ordinary person test, and for this reason we submit it could be accommodated separately from the general partial defence of provocation, but having the same sort of rationale.

14.85 Several stakeholders supported a holistic approach to homicide defences in the family violence context—incorporating revisions of defences, sentencing and evidence laws, and ongoing judicial and legal professional education about the dynamics of family violence. The No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association further expressed a preference for a nationally consistent approach to defences. Some stakeholders submitted that it was too early to assess the impact of recent reforms—in particular the partial defence of killing in an abusive domestic relationship in the Queensland Criminal Code—s 304B—and identified a need for ongoing monitoring and future reviews of their operation in practice.

---

144 P Eastal and A Hopkins, Submission FV 36, 12 May 2010.

Leading evidence of family violence for the purposes of homicide defences

Stakeholders unanimously supported the Commissions’ proposal for the enactment of legislative guidance about the potential admissibility of family-violence related evidence in the context of homicide defences. The majority of submissions supported provisions along the lines of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 9AH without elaboration. Hopkins and Easteal commented that such a provision would assist juries to comprehend “what it must really be like to live in a situation of ongoing violence” and why her ultimate response was truly reasonable.

149 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Victims of Crime Assistance League Inc NSW, Submission FV 23, 23 February 2010.
153 P Easteal and A Hopkins, Submission FV 36, 12 May 2010 citing the submission of Dr Rebecca Bradfield to the VLRC Inquiry into Defences To Homicide: Victorian Law Reform Commission, Defences to Homicide: Final Report (2004), [4.18].
14.88 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria suggested that jurisdictions considering enacting provisions in the nature of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 9AH should consider concerns raised in Victoria in relation to the use of the provision by defendants who have committed family violence against the deceased and who seek to rely upon defensive homicide.

Commissions’ views

14.89 The Commissions have taken a high-level approach to the issues raised in this part, and have focused on the identification of relevant considerations and guiding principles for recognising the dynamics of family violence in homicide defences. The Commissions do not make recommendations about specific forms of defences or individual provisions in state and territory criminal legislation. In taking this approach, the Commissions acknowledge that:

- state and territory governments and law reform agencies have given substantial consideration to homicide defences in the family violence context;
- jurisdictions have taken divergent approaches to accommodating the dynamics of family violence in their respective homicide defences;
- in some cases, variations reflect different approaches to broader matters of criminal justice policy extending beyond the Commissions’ Terms of Reference—for example, mandatory sentencing regimes;
- there is an insufficient evidence base upon which to evaluate the operation of recent reforms in some jurisdictions because they have not yet been utilised or utilised only to a limited extent; and
- individual jurisdictions are best placed to review the operation of specific provisions, within the broader context of their respective criminal justice policies.

14.90 However, the Commissions identify several matters that should be taken into account in ensuring that the dynamics of family violence are accommodated in homicide defences. These matters—which are discussed below—are directed towards:

- ensuring that homicide defences promote substantive equality in the treatment of persons who kill in response to family violence and those who kill in response to other forms of violence;
- addressing technical limitations within existing homicide defences to recognise the full range of situational and psychological circumstances associated with family violence; and
- ensuring that relevant homicide defences are applied consistently in individual cases involving persons who kill in response to family violence.

---

Recognising the nature and dynamics of family violence in homicide defences

14.91 The Commissions’ view is that jurisdictions should ensure that their defences to homicide accommodate the experiences of family violence victims who kill. A common theme throughout this Inquiry has been that legal frameworks should recognise the nature and dynamics of family violence—including its impact upon victims. In the Commissions’ view, such recognition must include victims’ responses to violence. The Commissions concur that defences must recognise that:

Contemporary research on the actions of victims of abuse who kill their abusers … demonstrates they are usually motivated by fear, desperation and a belief that there is no other viable way of escaping the danger. The option of leaving the relationship is often seen as an unrealistic option; research indicates that persons who suffer violence may perceive a lack of alternatives. The history of abuse in the relationship can allow a person who has suffered violence to read cues and note changes in the abuser’s behaviour which signal the onset of escalating violence.

Decisive action for self-preservation can then be taken before the abuser is in a position to physically overpower them; that action carried out with no loss of self-control and without a deficiency in cognitive processes.

The use of violence against the abuser may be reasonable under the circumstances as the person who has suffered prolonged abuse perceives them to be, but to an ordinary person may be judged as unnecessary or excessive. Even though there may be a history of extensive abuse, because the immediate threat may be modest (viewed in isolation) the hyper-vigilance typical of a battered person may result in a killing that is not proportionate to the threat.155

14.92 For the reasons identified above, the Commissions do not recommend a particular approach as to how each jurisdiction should ensure the recognition of family violence as a defence to homicide. However, the following considerations should be taken into account in the framing of any defences.

Relevant considerations in framing defences

Equality of legal responses to family violence and non-familial violence

14.93 The Commissions consider that criminal defences should not recognise the circumstances of family violence victims in an ‘atypical context’, or typecast the reactions of family violence victims who kill as the product of ‘extraordinary psychology’.156 There is substantial force in stakeholders’ arguments that separate, family-violence specific defences may result in the differential treatment of persons who have killed in response to family violence, compared with those who have killed in response to non-familial violence. To this end, it is preferable for family-violence related circumstances to be integrated into existing defences of general application. In the Commissions’ view, existing defences—in particular self-defence—are doctrinally capable of accommodating the diverse situational and psychological circumstances of family violence victims.

---

155  Explanatory Notes, Criminal Code (Abusive Domestic Relationship Defence and Another Matter) Amendment Bill (Qld) 2009, 2.

14.94 Consistent with the Commissions views on the creation of specific family violence offences, the Commissions have reservations about creating discrete defences to address problems associated with the practical application of general defences, and recommend a cautious approach. The Commissions consider that it is preferable to focus on improving the application and effectiveness of existing defences in the family violence context through legislative clarification and guidance where necessary, and judicial and legal professional education and training. These matters are discussed further below.

14.95 In the Commissions’ view, the circumstances of family violence ought to be recognised in both complete and partial defences, given the different purposes served by each form of defence. In recognising circumstances of family violence for the purposes of an acquittal, complete defences are intended to remove all criminal liability associated with fatal responses to family violence. However, partial defences recognise the circumstances of family violence only for the purposes of avoiding a murder conviction. An exclusive focus on partial defences falls short of accommodating the circumstances of family violence because it ‘leaves untouched’ limitations in complete defences.157

Addressing technical limitations in existing defences

14.96 Given the disparate and jurisdiction-specific nature of existing approaches to homicide defences, the Commissions recommend that individual jurisdictions review their existing defences with a view to assessing the extent to which they accommodate the experiences of family violence victims who kill. Such reviews should encompass:

- defences specific to family violence victims, as well as those of general application that may apply to victims of family violence; and
- both complete and partial defences, recognising the discrete purposes that each form of defence is intended to serve.

14.97 The Commissions recommend that reviews should consider:

- how the relevant defences are being used—including in charge negotiations—by whom and with what results; and
- the impact of rules of evidence and sentencing law and policy on the operation of defences.

To accommodate recent reforms in some jurisdictions, the Commissions recommend that reviews are conducted after relevant provisions have been in force for five years.\footnote{This recommendation is framed in similar terms to that of the VLRC in respect of excessive self-defence/defensive homicide: Victorian Law Reform Commission, Defences to Homicide: Final Report (2004), Rec 10. The Commissions agree with the VLRC’s statement that the five-year period is intended as a guide and ‘may need to be reconsidered in light of the number of [relevant] cases … over this period’, [3.112].} These matters are the subject of Recommendation 14–2 below.

The consistent application of defences

The Commissions acknowledge that a focus on the doctrinal content of defences is insufficient to ensure that the experiences of family violence victims who kill are accommodated in practice. Continuing legal professional and judicial education is essential to ensuring that judges and lawyers practising in criminal law understand the nature and dynamics of family violence, and how evidence of family violence may be relevant to criminal defences.

In Chapter 31, the Commissions endorse the recommendation of the National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children for the production of a national family violence bench book, in consultation with states and territories, and as part of a national professional development program for judicial officers on family violence.\footnote{Rec 31–2.} In addition to their recommendation about the inclusion of guidance on sentencing in the family violence context, and the admission of family-violence related evidence,\footnote{Rec 35.} such a bench book should specifically address the application of defences to homicide where victims of family violence are charged with homicide offences. This is the subject of Recommendation 14–3 below.

The Commissions further endorse the recommendations of the VLRC in its 2004 report on defences to homicide, that bodies offering continuing professional development should include sessions on family violence in the criminal law.\footnote{Victorian Law Reform Commission, Defences to Homicide: Final Report (2004), Rec 35.} In Chapter 31, the Commissions recommend a national audit of family violence training conducted by government and non-government agencies. Such an audit should cover criminal law training, including in relation to homicide defences and criminal defences more generally.

The Commissions note that matters of legal professional education in relation to family violence in Victoria are currently under consideration in the Victorian Government review of defensive homicide.\footnote{Department of Justice, Victoria Review of the Offence of Defensive Homicide Discussion Paper, August 2010, [318]–[343].} The outcomes of this review may contribute to the recommended national audit.

National consistency

The Commissions support the development of a consistent or harmonious approach by the states and territories to the recognition of family violence in defences.
to homicide. The Commissions consider that there is no principled justification for the differential treatment of victims of family violence solely on the basis of jurisdiction. While acknowledging that states and territories have taken different approaches to homicide defences in their respective jurisdictions, the Commissions consider that there is merit in national collaboration to identify strategies to improve inter-jurisdictional consistency. National consideration of this matter may also facilitate the sharing of information, experiences and expertise between jurisdictions about approaches to defences.

14.104 The Commissions consider that the SCAG MCLOC would be a suitable body to undertake such a task, in light of its substantial work on homicide defences in the Model Criminal Code. Consideration of this matter through the MCLOC would further provide an opportunity to identify approaches or model provisions that do not appear to have uniform support based upon jurisdictions’ implementation responses, and which may require reconsideration. This may include, for example, further discussion of the abolition of provocation and excessive self-defence, and the appropriate elements of self-defence. The issue of national consistency in homicide defences in the family violence context is addressed in Recommendation 14–4 below.

Leading evidence of family violence in homicide defences

14.105 The Commissions maintain their view expressed in the Consultation Paper that state and territory criminal legislation should provide express guidance about the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence in the context of homicide defences, in similar terms to s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic). This is the subject of Recommendation 14–5 below.

14.106 The Commissions consider that there is considerable merit in focusing attention on the potential relevance of such evidence in homicide defences, given its importance in these circumstances. The Commissions endorse the views of the VLRC that such a provision would assist in avoiding ‘unnecessary arguments concerning ... relevance and ensure the range of factors which may be necessary to represent the reality of the accused’s situation are readily identified’.163

14.107 The Commissions acknowledge the concerns identified by some stakeholders that a provision in the nature of s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) may be relied upon by accused persons who have committed acts of family violence against the deceased and who are raising self-defence or defensive homicide. However, the Commissions note that the provision does not extend or otherwise alter the general rules concerning the admissibility of family-violence related evidence. In the Commissions’ view, the relevance of family-violence related evidence in these circumstances is appropriately determined by the court in individual cases. Similarly, the weight afforded to such evidence is a matter for the trier of fact in individual cases.

---

Leading evidence of family violence in defences to non-fatal offences against the person

14.108 The Commissions have focused on defences to homicide due to the gravity of the consequences for family violence victims whose situational and psychological circumstances are not adequately taken into account. The Commissions acknowledge, however, that family violence victims may not always respond to violence using fatal means, or may commit offences under duress or in circumstances that may attract a defence based upon an altered state of mind as a consequence of family violence.

14.109 This raises the question of whether legislative guidance about the potential admissibility of family-violence related evidence is necessary in the context of other defences, including defences to non-fatal offences against the person, attempted fatal offences and non-violent offences committed as a consequence of family violence. The Commissions consider that state and territory governments should review whether criminal legislation should expressly allow defendants to lead evidence about family violence in the context of defences to non-fatal offences against the person.

Recommendation 14–1 State and territory criminal legislation should ensure that defences to homicide accommodate the experiences of family violence victims who kill, recognising the dynamics and features of family violence.

Recommendation 14–2 State and territory governments should review their defences to homicide relevant to family violence victims who kill. Such reviews should:

- cover defences specific to victims of family violence as well as those of general application that may apply to victims of family violence;
- cover both complete and partial defences;
- be conducted as soon as practicable after the relevant provisions have been in force for five years;
- include investigations of the following matters:
  - how the relevant defences are being used—including in charge negotiations—by whom, and with what results; and
  - the impact of rules of evidence and sentencing laws and policies on the operation of defences; and
- report publicly on their findings.

Recommendation 14–3 The national family violence bench book (see Rec 31–2) should include a section that provides guidance on the operation of defences to homicide where a victim of family violence kills the person who was violent towards him or her.
Recommendation 14–4 The Model Criminal Law Officers’ Committee of the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General—or another appropriate national body—should investigate strategies to improve the consistency of approaches to recognising the dynamics of family violence in homicide defences in state and territory criminal laws.

Recommendation 14–5 State and territory criminal legislation should provide guidance about the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence in the context of a defence to homicide. Section 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) is an instructive model in this regard.

Recognising family relationships in criminal law responses to family violence

14.110 In Chapter 7, the Commissions consider the categories of relationships covered by state and territory family violence legislation. A further issue is how—if at all—a family relationship should be defined where it is prescribed as an element of an offence, defence or as a sentencing factor in the family violence context. In particular, this raises the following matters:

- whether it is necessary or appropriate to define a family relationship between the offender and the victim for the purposes of criminal law responses to family violence;
- if so—the categories of relationships that should be recognised in any criminal law definitions; and
- whether it is necessary or feasible to align the categories of relationships recognised in criminal law definitions with those recognised in family violence legislation.

14.111 As noted in Chapter 13, the Commissions consider this issue in the Consultation Paper in the context of potential family-violence related offences. However, the Commissions consider that it is necessary to consider the issue in a broader context, given that state and territory criminal laws have variously prescribed a family relationship between the offender and the victim as an element of aggravated offences, and an element of some defences. At common law, sentencing courts have also recognised a family relationship between the offender and the victim as an aggravating factor in appropriate cases.

---

164 Rec 7–6.
165 Consultation Paper, Question 7–2.
166 Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA); Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 5AA(1)(g).
167 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 9AD and Criminal Code (Qld) s 304B.
14.112 In considering this issue, however, the Commissions reiterate views expressed in Chapter 13 that the existence of a family relationship between the offender and the victim should not form the sole basis of aggravation in relation to offences or sentencing, or the sole basis for any family-violence specific criminal defences. Rather, the Commissions tend to the view that criminal laws must target the underlying dynamics of family violence.\(^{169}\)

Current approaches to recognising family relationships in criminal laws

State and territory criminal laws

14.113 This part of the chapter considers the categories of family relationships currently incorporated in defences, aggravated offences and sentencing factors in state and territory criminal laws.

Homicide defences

14.114 The Victorian Crimes Act 1958 defines a ‘family member’ of the accused person for the purposes of defences to murder, defensive homicide or manslaughter in circumstances of family violence. Section 9AH defines a ‘family member’ as including:

- a person who is or has been married to the accused person, or who has had an intimate personal relationship with the accused person;
- a person who has been the father, mother, step-father or step-mother of the accused person;
- a child who normally or regularly resides with the accused person;
- a guardian of the accused person; or
- another person who is or has ordinarily been a household member with the accused person.\(^{170}\)

14.115 A key difference between the above criminal law definition and the definition of the same term in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 8 is that the criminal law definition is drafted in inclusive terms—whereas the definition in the family violence legislation is exhaustive. In addition—and potentially as a consequence of its exhaustive nature—the definition in the Family Violence Protection Act makes express reference to spouses, domestic partners and relatives, which are defined terms in the Act.\(^{171}\) The Family Violence Protection Act definition also includes a functional element, encompassing any other person whom the relevant person reasonably regards as being ‘like a family member’, having regard to nine enumerated factors.\(^{172}\)

14.116 In Queensland, a ‘domestic relationship’ is an element of the defence of killing in an abusive domestic relationship in Criminal Code s 304B. The term

---

169 See Ch 13.
170 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 9AH(4).
171 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 8(1), 9, 10.
172 Ibid s 8(3).
‘domestic relationship’ is defined by reference to the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 11A.¹⁷³ The latter section defines a ‘domestic relationship’ as comprising a spousal relationship, intimate personal relationship, family relationship or an informal care relationship—as defined in the Act. Accordingly, the definition in both civil and criminal laws is exhaustive in nature.

14.117 The term ‘domestic relationship’ is referred to but not defined in the Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) s 132B, which confirms the admissibility of evidence of a domestic relationship between the offender and the victim, where such evidence is relevant to defending certain charges of offences against a person.¹⁷⁴

Aggravated offences

14.118 The criminal legislation of South Australia and Western Australia makes reference to certain family relationships between the offender and the victim as elements of aggravated offences. The relevant family relationships are defined exhaustively in both jurisdictions. In South Australia, the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 5AA(1)(g) lists the following relationships between the offender and the victim as circumstances of aggravation:

- spouses—defined as persons who are legally married;¹⁷⁵
- domestic partners—defined by reference to the Family Relationships Act 1975 (SA);¹⁷⁶ and
- a child of whom the offender or his or her present or former spouse or domestic partner has custody as a parent or guardian, or who regularly resides with the aforementioned persons.¹⁷⁷

14.119 The Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) deems that two persons will be in a relationship for the purposes of identifying ‘domestic abuse’ in a broader range of circumstances than the criminal legislation. These include marriage, domestic partners, children, relatives, Indigenous kinship relationships or other culturally recognised family groups and unpaid care relationships.¹⁷⁸

14.120 The Western Australian criminal legislation provides for aggravated offences against the person where the offender is in a ‘family and domestic relationship’ with the victim.¹⁷⁹ The term ‘family and domestic relationship’ is defined by reference to the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 4. The latter provision defines the term as a ¹⁷³ Criminal Code (Qld) s 304B(2).

¹⁷⁴ See Chapters 28 to 30 of the Criminal Code (Qld) which include offences relating to homicide, endangerment of life or health and assaults.
¹⁷⁵ Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 5AA.
¹⁷⁶ The Family Relationships Act 1975 (SA) s 11A defines ‘domestic partners’ as persons living together in a close personal relationship—as defined in the Act—for a prescribed period, or who have had a child together.
¹⁷⁷ A ‘child’ is defined in the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) s 5AA as a person under the age of 18 years. The terms ‘parent’ and ‘guardian’ are not defined in the Act.
¹⁷⁸ Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 8(8).
¹⁷⁹ Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 221.
relationship between two persons who are or were in marital, de facto, intimate personal or other personal relationships; persons who are related to each other; and children who reside or stay with, or who are under the parental care or guardianship, of the other.

Sentencing factors

14.121 As noted in Chapter 13, the sentencing legislation of states and territories does not expressly prescribe a family relationship between the offender and the victim as a sentencing factor. However, at common law, the existence of a family or domestic relationship between the offender and victim is relevant to an assessment of the gravity of an offence.¹⁸⁰ In particular, in some jurisdictions the commission of an offence in a domestic context cannot be a mitigating factor,¹⁸¹ and may be an aggravating factor in appropriate cases. For example, as noted in Chapter 13, in R v MFP, the Victorian Court of Appeal upheld the finding of the trial judge that the commission of an offence against a marital partner in ‘a domestic context’ was an aggravating circumstance.¹⁸² Sentencing courts have made similar findings in respect of offences committed against de facto or former de facto partners,¹⁸³ children¹⁸⁴ and step-children¹⁸⁵—particularly in circumstances involving a breach of trust.¹⁸⁶ However, the boundaries of the concept of a family relationship or the ‘domestic context’ for the purposes of common law sentencing factors do not appear to have been comprehensively delineated.

Criminal law provisions referring to the dynamics of family violence

14.122 As canvassed in Chapter 13, other provisions in state and territory criminal laws refer exclusively to the dynamics of the relationship between the accused person and the victim, without express reference to familial connection. In particular, these include aggravated offences¹⁸⁷ and aggravating sentencing factors¹⁸⁸ in respect of offences committed in abuse of a relationship of trust or authority between the offender and the victim.

United States

14.123 By way of comparison, as noted in Chapter 13, several US states recognise aggravated forms of offences against the person where they are committed against persons with whom the offender is in a defined family or domestic relationship. Most provisions define family or domestic relationships in exclusive terms, by reference to categories of relationships. For example, common categories of relationships recognised in the six illustrative US jurisdictions identified in Chapter 13 include:¹⁸⁹

---

¹⁸⁰ See, eg, R v Kibble [2002] VSC 52, [57], [64]–[66].
¹⁸¹ See, eg, Raczkowski v The Queen [2008] NSWCCA.
¹⁸² R v MFP [2001] VSCA, [20].
¹⁸⁶ Ibid, 699.
¹⁸⁷ Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA), ss 5AA(1)(a) and (i).
¹⁸⁹ These jurisdictions are: Georgia, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio.
Family Violence — A National Legal Response

- spouses and former spouses;¹⁹⁰
- adults who have a child in common irrespective of whether they have been married or have resided together;¹⁹¹
- romantic, dating or intimate personal relationships;¹⁹²
- parents, children and siblings—including relationships created by adoption or marriage;¹⁹³
- persons related by blood or consanguinity, marriage or affinity to the offender;¹⁹⁴ and
- household members or persons residing together or who have resided together.¹⁹⁵

14.124 There is a substantial degree of alignment between criminal and civil definitions in the abovementioned illustrative jurisdictions.¹⁹⁶ In addition, the federal offences in the Violence Against Women Act apply to offences committed against spousal, intimate or dating partners as defined in the Act, and—in respect of offences involving the crossing of state boundaries to breach protection orders—persons who are the subject of protection orders under the relevant state or tribal legislation.¹⁹⁷

Submissions and consultations

14.125 In the Consultation Paper the Commissions sought stakeholder views on the types of family relationships that ought to be recognised for the purposes of any potential aggravated offences, or discrete categories of family-violence related offences that do not attract higher maximum penalties, if such measures were to be implemented.¹⁹⁸ On balance, stakeholders expressed a preference for the inclusion of a broad range of family relationships, in similar terms to family violence legislation.¹⁹⁹

¹⁹⁰ Georgia Code § 16-5-20(d); Mississippi Code § 97-3-7(3),(4); Missouri Annotated Statutes § 455.101(5); Montana Code § 45-5-206(2); Nevada Revised Statutes § 33.018; Ohio Revised Code § 2919.25(F).
¹⁹¹ Georgia Code § 16-5-20(d); Mississippi Code § 97-3-7(3),(4); Missouri Annotated Statutes § 455.101(5); Montana Code § 45-5-206(2).
¹⁹² Mississippi Code § 97-3-7(3),(4); Missouri Annotated Statutes § 455.101(5); Montana Code § 45-5-206(2); Nevada Code § 33.018.
¹⁹³ Georgia Code § 16-5-20(d) (excluding siblings); Mississippi Code § 97-3-7(3),(4); Missouri Annotated Statutes § 455.101(5); Montana Code § 45-5-206(2); Nevada Revised Statutes § 33.018; Ohio Revised Code § 2919.25(F).
¹⁹⁴ Mississippi Code § 97-3-7(3),(4); Nevada Revised Statutes § 33.018; Ohio Revised Code § 2919.25(F).
¹⁹⁵ Missouri Annotated Statutes § 455.101(5); Montana Code § 45-5-206(2); Nevada Revised Statutes § 33.018.
¹⁹⁶ See, eg, Georgia Code § 19-13-10; Mississippi Code § 93-21-3(a); Missouri Annotated Statutes § 455.010.
¹⁹⁷ Violence Against Women Act of 1994 18 USC (US) §§ 2266 (7), (10).
¹⁹⁸ Consultation Paper, Question 7–3.
¹⁹⁹ Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Inner City Legal Centre and The Safe Relationships Project, Submission FV 192, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission small number of stakeholders responding to this issue expressly considered whether there is a need for criminal law responses to family violence to define or otherwise incorporate family relationships, and the issue of alignment between civil and criminal laws. These views are addressed below.

Is there a need for criminal laws to define or incorporate family relationships?

14.126 Two stakeholders cautioned against prescribing a family relationship between the offender and the victim as an element of any potential family-violence specific criminal offences. As noted in Chapter 13, Professor Julie Stubbs commented that such an approach would require the criminal law to ‘weigh the importance of the family versus strangers’, and that a preferable basis for a criminal law response to family violence is the existence of ‘a pattern of controlling, coercive or dominating behaviour’ on the part of the accused towards the victim.

14.127 The NSW ODPP commented that a criminal law definition of a family relationship would duplicate existing provisions incorporating the dynamics of family violence—for example, sentencing factors directed towards offences committed in the home, in the presence of a child or in abuse of a relationship of trust or authority. The ODPP commented that any definition of ‘family relationship’ would be ‘problematic in determining the precise extent of the family’.

Categories of family relationships and alignment with civil law definitions

Categories of family relationships

14.128 The majority of stakeholders supporting a criminal law definition of a family ‘relationship’ in the context of offences expressed a preference for the broadest possible definition, recognising, for example, past or current relationships including: dating, cohabiting and spousal relationships; family members; relatives; children of an intimate partner; those who fall within Indigenous concepts of family; and those who fall within culturally recognised groups. These categories of relationships are consistent with the Commissions’ approach in Recommendation 7–6.

14.129 While few stakeholders advanced reasons for their positions, some legal service providers emphasised the importance of recognising same-sex, transgender and intersex relationships, Indigenous kinship relationships, and other culturally recognised familial relationships. Two stakeholders expressly supported the recognition of care relationships.

---

Alignment of relationships recognised in criminal and civil laws

14.130 A small number of stakeholders commented on the alignment of the relationships recognised in family-violence related criminal laws with those contained in family violence legislation. The majority of these respondents supported alignment—in particular with the Victorian family violence legislation—without explanation. One legal service provider suggested that the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should provide the basis for alignment.

Commissions’ views

14.131 The Commissions do not make any recommendations in respect of defining or recognising family relationships for the purposes of criminal law responses to family violence. However, the Commissions advance four broad views on the approach which ought to be taken to such recognition.

A family relationship should not be the sole or predominant element of criminal law responses to family violence

14.132 As a general proposition, the Commissions consider that a family relationship between the offender and the victim should not be the sole or predominant element of any form of criminal law response to family violence. As stated in Chapter 13, the Commissions consider that the criminal law must target the underlying nature and dynamics of family violence with greater precision, and should avoid discriminating between violence committed by family members and that committed by strangers.

In limited circumstances, it may be necessary to prescribe a family relationship as an element of certain criminal law responses to family violence

14.133 The Commissions acknowledge, however, that in some limited circumstances it may be necessary for criminal laws responding to family violence to make specific reference to a family relationship between the offender and victim. The Commissions consider that this approach will be necessary in two categories of case.

---

14.134 First, reference to a family relationship may be necessary in respect of provisions that are directed towards promoting substantive equality between legal responses to family violence and non-familial violence. In particular, this category includes laws that are designed to rectify or avoid inequalities arising from the interpretation and application of general provisions in the family violence context—for example, the designation of a family relationship between the offender and the victim as a non-mitigating factor in sentencing, and the provision of legislative guidance about the potential relevance of family-violence related evidence. Reference to a family relationship between the offender and the victim may also be necessary where state and territory criminal laws have established separate defences specific to family violence victims who commit offences. As noted above and in Chapter 13, however, the Commissions favour criminal laws—including defences—of general application.

14.135 Secondly, it may be necessary to expressly incorporate a family relationship between the offender and the victim as an element of those offences in which the nature of the wrongdoing sought to be addressed is the exploitation of the family relationship itself—as distinct from the underlying dynamics of that relationship. The Commissions contemplate that offences in this category would be those imposing strict liability on the basis of a family relationship between the victim and the offender. For example, offences in the nature of incest may require a discrete definitional approach. Beyond making this observation, however, the Commissions do not comment specifically on the approach to be taken to identifying family relationships recognised in this category. This matter is appropriately determined in the context of drafting individual offences.

14.136 Given the confined nature of these categories, the Commissions consider that expressly recognising categories of family relationships in these circumstances would not duplicate existing criminal laws that address the dynamics of family violence but do not specifically refer to a family relationship between the offender and the victim. For example, the designation of a family relationship as a non-mitigating factor in sentencing would not displace existing aggravating sentencing factors of general application or matters of sentencing discretion that may be relevant to the family violence context.

14.137 The Commissions consider that it would not be unduly complex to define family relationships for these purposes. The Commissions note existing statutory definitions of categories of family relationships in various civil and criminal laws, and the recognition at common law that the commission of an offence in ‘the domestic context’ may be an aggravating sentencing factor in appropriate circumstances.
Where it is necessary to prescribe a family relationship as an element of criminal law responses to family violence, an inclusive definition is generally preferable

14.138 The Commissions consider that—in the limited circumstances in which it is necessary to refer specifically to a family relationship between the offender and the victim for the purposes of the first category of case identified above—an inclusive approach to recognising categories of relationships is preferable.

14.139 The Commissions consider that criminal law definitions of family relationships for these purposes should be expressed as including the same categories of relationships identified in Recommendation 7–6—namely:

- past or current intimate relationships, including dating, cohabiting and spousal relationships irrespective of the gender of the parties and whether the relationship is of a sexual nature;
- family members;
- relatives;
- children of an intimate partner;
- those who fall within Indigenous concepts of family; and
- those who fall within culturally recognised family groups.

14.140 A significant advantage of an inclusive—as opposed to an exhaustive—approach is that it maintains scope for judicial discretion in individual cases. This includes discretion in the application of categories of relationships in the inclusive list, and the identification of analogous categories in individual cases. An inclusive approach based upon the relationships identified in Recommendation 7–6 would further avoid the possibility that the categories of family relationships covered by the criminal law may be broader than those recognised under family violence legislation. This minimises the likelihood that circumstances of family violence may be relevant in proving and sentencing an offence, but the victim could not obtain a protection order in respect of the same conduct because he or she is incapable of being identified as a ‘person in need of protection’.

Alignment of the relationships recognised in criminal and family violence legislation should be considered on a case-by-case basis

14.141 Beyond the categories of relationships listed in Recommendation 7–6, however, the Commissions do not recommend the automatic alignment of relationships recognised under criminal and family violence laws. As identified in Chapter 7, the list of relationships in Recommendation 7–6 is intended as a minimum standard. Individual jurisdictions may recognise additional categories of relationships in their respective family violence legislation—for example, care relationships, housemates who are not in an intimate personal relationship, or persons who reasonably consider themselves to be family members having regard to a range of prescribed factors. Where family violence legislation recognises relationships exceeding the minimum stipulated categories in Recommendation 7–6, the question arises as to whether it is appropriate to extend the boundaries of criminal redress to such relationships. The Commissions consider that this matter is appropriately one for jurisdictions to consider on a case-by-case basis, in light of the purposes served by the particular legislation in question.

14.142 Further, where jurisdictions have currently aligned the categories of relationships recognised under criminal and family violence laws,\(^{212}\) it may be necessary to reconsider the appropriateness of ongoing alignment following potential implementation of Recommendation 7–6. Reconsideration will be particularly important where the relationships recognised in criminal laws are incorporated by reference to family violence legislation, and Recommendation 7–6 would expand the categories of relationships currently recognised in the relevant family violence legislation.

\(^{212}\) See, eg, Criminal Code Act Compilation 1913 (WA) s 221; Criminal Code (Qld) s 304B.
Contents

Volume 2

Part D – Family Violence and Family Law

15. Family Law Interactions: An Introduction 673
   - Introduction 673
   - Family violence in family law matters 674
   - Family courts 676
   - State and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation 683
   - Key interaction issues 689
   - Corresponding jurisdictions 694

16. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction and Practice of State and Territory Courts 695
   - Introduction 695
   - Current jurisdiction of state and territory magistrates courts 696
   - Section 68R of the Family Law Act 698
   - Obligations on state and territory courts making protection orders 725
   - Improving practice 734
   - Personal property directions in protection orders 738

17. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction and Practice of Federal Family Courts 757
   - Introduction 757
   - Consideration of protection orders and family violence 758
   - Injunctions for personal protection 796
   - Hague Convention 824

18. Evidence of Family Violence 831
   - Introduction 831
   - Difficulties in giving evidence 832
   - Common risk assessment framework 838
   - Improving evidence in protection order proceedings 843
   - Outcomes of protection order proceedings 864

Part E – Child Protection

19. The Intersection of Child Protection and Family Laws 891
   - Introduction 891
   - Interconnectedness of family violence and child abuse 892
   - Legal intervention in child protection 896
The relationship between family law and child protection law 903
Family courts and their relationship with child protection agencies 905
The power of children’s courts to make parenting orders 917
Families in both courts—duplication of proceedings 928

20. Family Violence, Child Protection and the Criminal Law 933
Introduction 933
Criminal offences relating to child protection 935
Information sharing between child protection agencies and the police 944
Protection orders and children—the current legal framework 960
Child protection and juvenile justice 973

Part F – Alternative Dispute Resolution 981

21. Family Dispute Resolution 983
Introduction 983
Family Dispute Resolution 985
FDR in family law legislation 987
FDR in cases involving family violence 990
Screening and risk assessment practices 998
FDR practitioners and lawyers 1008
Culturally responsive FDR 1013

22. Confidentiality and Admissibility 1019
Introduction 1019
FDR and family counselling confidentiality 1022
Admissibility of FDR and family counselling communications 1034
Section 60I Certificates: information about family violence 1045

23. Intersections and Inconsistencies 1055
Introduction 1055
ADR in family violence legislation 1056
Interaction between FDR and protection orders 1063
Dispute resolution in child protection—law and practice 1073
Family law, child protection and family violence intersections in ADR 1085
Restorative justice 1092

Part G – Sexual Assault 1095

24. Sexual Assault and Family Violence 1097
Introduction 1097
The prevalence of sexual violence 1100
Sexual assault in the family violence context 1106
History of activism and legal change 1111
Law reform 1119
The implementation gap 1125
Contents

25. Sexual Offences
- Introduction 1129
- Overview of sexual offences 1129
- ‘Rape’: the penetrative sexual offence 1130
- Sexual offences against children and young people 1136
- Persistent sexual abuse of a child 1142
- Sexual offences against people with cognitive impairment 1146
- Consent 1147
- Jury directions about consent 1170
- Guiding principles and objects clauses 1176

26. Reporting, Prosecution and Pre-trial Processes 1183
- Introduction 1183
- Decision points 1184
- Attrition in sexual assault cases 1187
- Recognising and reporting sexual assault 1193
- The prosecution phase 1196
- Giving evidence at committals 1214
- Joint or separate trial 1218
- Pre-recorded evidence 1225

27. Evidence in Sexual Assault Proceedings 1235
- Introduction 1235
- Evidence issues 1236
- Sexual reputation and experience 1237
- Sexual assault communications privilege 1257
- Expert opinion evidence and children 1266
- Tendency and coincidence evidence 1274
- Relevance and consent 1291
- Relationship evidence 1294
- Evidence of recent and delayed complaint 1299

28. Other Trial Processes 1309
- Introduction 1309
- Jury warnings 1309
- Warnings about unreliable evidence and corroboration 1311
  - Murray warning 1313
- Warnings about delay in complaint 1316
  - Longman warning 1317
  - Crofts warning 1324
- Cross-examination 1334
- Other aspects of giving evidence 1343
- Evidence on re-trial or appeal 1344
Part H – Overarching Issues

29. Integrated Responses
   Introduction
   Integrated responses in the context of family violence
   Integrated responses in the context of child protection
   Essential elements of integrated responses

30. Information Sharing
   Introduction
   Benefits of and impediments to information sharing
   Information flow to the family law system
   Information flow to the family violence system
   Information sharing between agencies
   Strategies to improve information sharing

31. Education and Data Collection
   Introduction
   Education and training
   Key focus areas for education and training
   Ensuring quality and best practice
   National approach to education and training
   Data collection

32. Specialisation
   Introduction
   Advantages and challenges of specialisation
   Specialised family violence courts
   Existing specialised family violence courts in Australia
   Expanding specialised family violence courts in Australia
   Mainstreaming specialised practices
   Specialised police

Appendix 1. List of Submissions
Appendix 2. List of Agencies, Organisations and Individuals Consulted Appendix 3. List of Abbreviations
Table of Legislation
Part D
Family Violence
and Family Law
15. Family Law Interactions: An Introduction

Contents

Introduction 673
Family violence in family law matters 674
Prevalence of family violence in family law matters 674
The effect of family violence on parenting arrangements 675
Family courts 676
Powers 677
Procedures 679
State and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation 683
Powers 683
Procedures 685
Key interaction issues 689
Inconsistent orders 690
Culture and practice of state and territory courts 691
Culture and practice of federal family courts 692
Unclear pathways 693
Corresponding jurisdictions 694

Introduction

15.1 Matters that raise issues of family violence form a significant part of the work of federal family courts and state and territory courts. Dealing with family violence has been described as ‘core business’ of the federal family courts, with more than half of the parenting cases that come to the family courts involving allegations of family violence. Proceedings for family violence protection orders also form a substantial part of the work of state and territory magistrates courts.

15.2 Family law and state and territory family violence legislation both deal with families at a time of crisis and change. Both laws seek to address family violence, but in different ways. Protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation are aimed at providing immediate and future personal protection from family violence. Family law resolves disputes about separation—such as issues about parental responsibility and financial matters—which may arise in circumstances where family violence has arisen in the past and where a person fears family violence in the future.

---

15.3 As a consequence of this overlap, family law orders and protection orders may both regulate contact between family members. In some circumstances, family law and protection orders may also both deal with property of the parties. This means that there is potential for inconsistency and conflict between a protection order made by a state or territory court and orders made by a federal family court in relation to the same family.

15.4 For example, a protection order may specify that a person is not to communicate with, or come within a certain distance of, the person protected by the order. However, a parenting order made by a federal family court may require contact between separated parents for the purposes of facilitating arrangements for each parent to spend time with the children. Gaps in the protection of victims of family violence may arise because of the operation of the laws about which orders—state or federal—prevail, and uncertainty about the interoperation of the orders by those who must follow and enforce them.

15.5 Part D of this Report considers the interaction in practice of state and territory family violence laws with the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). This chapter provides an overview of the powers and procedures of state and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under state and territory family violence legislation as well as the powers and procedures of federal family courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act.

15.6 In addition, this chapter sets out the key issues experienced by people affected by family violence who seek orders under state and territory family violence legislation and the Family Law Act. These issues—and options for reform to address them—are discussed in detail in the following chapters.

Family violence in family law matters

Prevalence of family violence in family law matters

15.7 Family law deals with disputes about parenting arrangements for children and the division of property that arise when parties to a marriage or de facto relationship separate. Past and continuing family violence has an effect on all these matters, but is particularly relevant to parenting arrangements for children.

15.8 In January 2010, the Australian Institute of Family Studies (AIFS) released its Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms. As part of the evaluation, AIFS conducted a longitudinal study of separated parents. It found that about two-thirds of separated mothers and just over half of separated fathers indicated that their partner had emotionally abused them before or during separation. One in four mothers and around one in six fathers said that their partners had hurt them physically prior to separation, and, of this group, most indicated that their children had seen or heard some of the abuse or violence.³

---

15.9 Where no family violence had been reported, post-separation relationships were likely to be friendly or cooperative. However, where parents reported having experienced physical or emotional violence, 25% developed distant relationships with their former partners; and 40% developed highly conflicted or fearful relationships with their former partners.\(^4\) The evaluation suggested that ‘the experience of a past or present abusive dynamic is a very common characteristic of high-conflict family law clients’\(^5\).

15.10 The evaluation also examined the pathways taken by separating parents to sort out parenting arrangements. The data showed that a matter that involves family violence is more likely to proceed to the court, rather than be sorted out between the parents.\(^6\)

The effect of family violence on parenting arrangements

15.11 Family violence is a significant factor when determining post-separation parenting arrangements. Dr Tom Altobelli has summarised a number of different ways in which family violence can affect parenting.\(^7\) The factors, drawn from empirical research, include:

- Spousal abuse may not end with separation—in particular, abusive controlling violence may escalate after separation.
- People who use family violence may be deficient or even abusive parents and poor role models for their children. They may also undermine their victims’ parenting role.
- Victims of family violence may find parenting difficult, as a result of abuse, poor self esteem and the stress of separation and court proceedings. Time, protection and support may be required to re-establish their parenting role. A victim’s behaviour under the stress of an abusive relationship or separation should not prejudice parenting decisions.

15.12 As noted in Chapter 5, violence between partners and within families can take a variety of forms. Altobelli emphasises that not all factors will arise in every case of family violence, and that there is therefore a need to differentiate among families experiencing family violence.\(^8\)

15.13 Where there has been family violence, a parent may also have concerns about the safety of his or her children when in contact with the other parent. The AIFS Evaluation found that around one in five parents reported safety concerns associated with ongoing contact between the child and the other parent. Safety concerns were

\(^{4}\) Ibid, 34.
\(^{5}\) Ibid, 34.
\(^{6}\) Ibid, 77–78.
\(^{8}\) Ibid, 200.
strongly associated with a history of abuse—90% of fathers and 95% of mothers with concerns for the safety of their children also reported that they had been either physically hurt or emotionally abused by their partner. The evaluation notes, however, that:

Around one in five mothers and just over one in ten fathers who did not hold safety concerns also indicated that they had been physically hurt prior to separation. For some of these parents, separation may have relieved them of such concerns.9

15.14 Other studies have shown that there is an increased risk of family violence in the period following separation. This risk is heightened when parents meet to facilitate children spending time with each parent, for example during handover arrangements.10

15.15 It is therefore important that protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation and family law orders that allow children to spend time and communicate with parents operate together to ensure the safety of all parties.

Family courts

15.16 Two federal courts deal with matters under the Family Law Act—the Family Court of Australia (Family Court) and the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia (FMC). The FMC deals with the majority of family law matters.11

15.17 The two courts operate from a single registry, where parties may file documents for proceedings in either court. While parties can select which court they wish to use, the protocol for the division of work between the two courts provides that where there are serious allegations of child sexual or physical abuse or ‘serious controlling family violence’, proceedings should be filed in the Family Court, rather than the FMC.12

15.18 The Australian Government has introduced legislation to restructure the federal family courts. The restructure would create two divisions in the Family Court. The Appellate and Superior Division, comprising Family Court judges, would hear complex family law matters and appeals. The General Division, comprising Federal Magistrates who currently undertake family law work and accept a new commission, would hear most family law matters.13

15.19 In addition to the federal family courts, the Family Court of Western Australia has jurisdiction under the federal Family Law Act.14 It also exercises jurisdiction under Western Australian legislation, and may make care and protection orders under the Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA). Unlike the federal family courts, it

---

13 Access to Justice (Family Court Restructure and Other Measures) Bill 2010 (Cth).
14 ‘Federal family courts’ is used to refer to the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates Court. ‘Family courts’ also includes the Family Court of Western Australia.
may make care or protection orders in relation to children. The Family Court of Western Australia consists of both judges and magistrates, and some procedures in that court may differ from those in the federal family courts.

Powers

15.20 The Family Law Act sets out the rules and procedures that federal family courts follow when determining family law disputes on separation, including parental responsibility for children and financial matters arising from separation.

Parenting orders

15.21 A parenting order can deal with any aspect of parental responsibility for a child. Parenting orders may be made in favour of a parent or another person, such as a grandparent or other relative of the child. A parenting order may specify who has parental responsibility for a child, with whom a child lives, the time a child spends with his or her parents or other persons, and other aspects of the child’s care, welfare or development.

15.22 The paramount consideration when making a parenting order is the ‘best interests of the child’. In determining a child’s best interests, the court must consider two ‘primary’ and 13 ‘additional’ considerations. The primary considerations are:

(a) the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both of the child’s parents; and

(b) the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence.

15.23 ‘Additional considerations’ include:

- any views expressed by the child;
- the nature of the relationship between relevant persons and the child;
- the maturity, sex, lifestyle and background of the child and his or her parents;
- the willingness and ability of each of the child’s parents to facilitate and encourage a close and continuing relationship between the child and the other parent;
- the practical difficulty and expense of a child spending time or communicating with a parent;
- any family violence involving the child or a member of his or her family;

---

15 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 64C.
16 Ibid s 64B(2).
17 Ibid s 60CA.
18 Ibid s 60CC(2).
• the capacity of the child’s parents and any other person (such as a grandparent or other relative) to provide for the needs of the child, including emotional and intellectual needs; and

• if the child is Indigenous, the child’s right to enjoy his or her Indigenous culture.\(^{19}\)

15.24 When making a parenting order, a court must also ensure that the order does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence and is consistent with any protection order made under state and territory family violence legislation.\(^{20}\)

15.25 The Family Law Act contains a presumption that it is in the best interests of a child for his or her parents to have equal shared parental responsibility for the child.\(^{21}\) Shared parental responsibility means that decisions about ‘major long term issues’ must be made jointly by the parents.\(^{22}\)

15.26 The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility does not apply if the court believes, on reasonable grounds, that a parent has engaged in child abuse or family violence.\(^{23}\) The presumption may be rebutted by evidence that it would not be in the best interests of the child for the parents to have equal shared parental responsibility.\(^{24}\)

15.27 Where the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility applies, the court must consider whether the child spending equal, or substantial and significant, time with each parent would be reasonably practicable and in the best interests of the child.\(^{25}\)

15.28 The Family Court has developed Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (Best Practice Principles) to give guidance to judicial officers on how to approach parenting proceedings where there are allegations of family violence or child abuse.\(^{26}\) However, as noted in some consultations and in the Family Courts Violence Review undertaken by Professor Richard Chisholm, the Best Practice Principles are not regularly applied by all judicial officers.\(^{27}\)

---

19 Ibid s 60CC(3).
20 Ibid s 60CG.
21 Ibid s 61DA(1). As noted in Ch 1 and discussed below, this provision has been the subject of criticism.
22 Ibid s 65DAC.
23 Ibid s 61DA(2).
24 Ibid s 61DA(4).
25 Ibid s 65DAA.
26 Family Court of Australia, Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (2009).
27 R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009). The Chisholm Review recommended that the family law courts review the extent to which judicial officers in the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates Court use and benefit from the Best Practice Principles and consider any measures that might lead to the Principles becoming more influential: Rec 4.8.
15. Family Law Interactions: An Introduction

Relocation proceedings

15.29 Relocation disputes are a type of parenting dispute that may arise when one parent with whom a child lives wants to move to another location, which may limit the other parent’s opportunity to spend time with the child. Relocation disputes are determined in accordance with the provisions in the Family Law Act for assessing the best interests of the child. Relocation may be of particular significance in cases involving family violence as the victim may wish to relocate in order to escape from the violence.

Recovery proceedings

15.30 The removal of a child to a location within Australia may give rise to recovery proceedings. Pursuant to s 67U of the Family Law Act, federal family courts are empowered to make orders requiring the return of a child, typically to a parent. Recovery orders authorise or direct a person—generally the Australian Federal Police—to find, recover and deliver the child. In deciding whether to make a recovery order, federal family courts must have regard to the best interests of the child as the paramount consideration.

15.31 The abduction or removal of a child to a location overseas may lead to proceedings under the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention) as implemented by the Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations 1986 (Cth). The Hague Convention is a multilateral treaty which provides a procedure for the prompt return of children who have been removed from their country of habitual residence.

Property proceedings

15.32 Part VIII of the Family Law Act deals with disputes about property and spousal maintenance, providing a mechanism for parties to alter property rights that would otherwise apply under common law and equity. Under s 78 of the Family Law Act, a federal family court may make a declaration of the title or rights that each party to a marriage has with respect to property. Section 79 allows the court to alter property rights to effect a just distribution between the parties. In practice, most parties seek orders under s 79 because it confers a wider discretion on the court. The case of In the Marriage of Kennon held that family violence, in some limited circumstances, may be a relevant factor in determining property disputes.

Procedures

15.33 The Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) set out the procedures that apply in the Family Court. Proceedings in the FMC are governed by the Federal Magistrates Court Rules 2001 (Cth), which adopt some of the Family Law Rules. The FMC also has discretion to apply the Family Law Rules to fill any gap that might be left in the Consequently, the court rules and procedures in each court differ in some respects.

15.34 Additional procedural requirements are imposed on parties seeking parenting orders, as opposed to other family law orders. The following section outlines some key procedural events.

Initiating application

15.35 A person commences proceedings in a family court by filing an ‘Initiating Application (Family Law)’ form. The form is the same for the Family Court, the FMC and the Family Court of Western Australia. In the form, the applicant provides details about the parties and any children, and sets out the orders sought. The form also includes a place to provide information about ‘any existing orders, agreements, parenting plans or undertakings to this or any other court’ about ‘family law, child support, family violence or child welfare issues’ concerning any of the parties or children.

15.36 After an initiating application is filed, the other party (the respondent) files a ‘Response to an Initiating Application (Family Law)’ form. In this form, the respondent sets out any disagreement with the facts or information contained in the initiating application, and the alternative orders sought.

Compulsory family dispute resolution

15.37 Both the Family Court and the FMC require parties seeking parenting orders to participate in family dispute resolution (FDR) before commencing court proceedings. In FDR, an independent FDR practitioner assists the parties to resolve parenting disputes, through mediation, conciliation or other means. Parties who participate in FDR obtain a s 60I certificate, which must be attached to the initiating application. Information disclosed in FDR is admissible in court proceedings only in very limited circumstances.

15.38 There are five different types of s 60I certificate, two of which have particular relevance to family violence. A certificate under s 60I(8)(aa) is issued where the FDR practitioner considers that FDR would not be appropriate, bearing in mind the matters set out in the Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008. These matters include violence, the safety of the parties, inequalities of bargaining power and the risk of child abuse. Because it may not always be apparent that there are risk factors until FDR is under way, s 60I(8)(d) provides for a certificate to be 32 Ibid r 1.05(2).

---

33 A detailed overview of the practices and procedures of the Family Court and FMC in parenting cases raising issues of family violence appears in R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), apps 3, 4.
35 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60I(7). FDR is discussed in Part F.
36 Admissibility of information disclosed in FDR is discussed in Ch 22.
37 Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) reg 25.
issued where a person begins FDR but the practitioner considers that it is inappropriate to continue.

15.39 It is possible for parties to bypass FDR by arguing one of the exceptions to obtaining a s 60I certificate, including where there are reasonable grounds to believe there has been, or there is a risk of, child abuse or family violence.38 Parties that rely on this exception must satisfy the court that they have received information from a counsellor or FDR practitioner about services and options available in cases of abuse and violence.39 In both courts, a registrar will usually determine if the requirements for an exception have been met.

Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence (Form 4)

15.40 A party who alleges that a child has been abused or is at risk of abuse must file and serve a Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence (Form 4).40 The Family Law Rules also require that a Form 4 be filed if there are allegations that there has been, or there is a risk of, family violence involving a child, or a member of the child’s family.41 In the form, parties can provide details about the family violence or child abuse, or the risk of such violence or abuse.

15.41 Under the Family Law Act, once a Form 4 is filed, the court must consider making orders to enable the parties to obtain appropriate evidence, and to protect the child or any party to the proceedings.42

Affidavits and other documents

15.42 An affidavit setting out the facts of the case can form part of the evidence before the court. In the Family Court, parties are only to file affidavits if they seek interim or procedural orders.43 A different rule applies in the FMC, where the initiating application and response must be accompanied by affidavits.44

15.43 Parties to parenting proceedings in either court are required to file copies of any protection orders made under state or territory family violence legislation that affect the child or a member of the child’s family.45 This is usually done by attaching a copy of any orders to the initiating application.

Procedural hearings

15.44 In the Family Court, the first hearing is usually before a registrar and deals with procedural matters. In parenting proceedings, the registrar can refer the parties to the Child Responsive Program.46 The program involves meetings between the parties and a 38 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60I(9)(b).

39 Ibid s 60J.
40 Ibid s 67Z.
41 Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 2.04B.
42 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60K(2).
43 Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 5.02.
44 Federal Magistrates Court Rules 2001 (Cth) r 4.05.
45 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CF; Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 2.05, which also applies in the FMC: Federal Magistrates Court Rules 2001 (Cth) sch 3.
46 Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 12.03(5).
family consultant assigned to the case. The family consultant may also meet with any children, if appropriate. The objective of the program is to encourage parents to focus on the needs of their children when determining parenting arrangements, and to reach agreement about the parenting arrangements that support the best outcomes for the children.47

15.45 The family consultant also screens for family violence. Where there are concerns about family violence, the family consultant may take protective action, including notifying relevant child protection authorities. The family consultant provides the parties, their legal representatives and the court with a written report of the main issues affecting the family.48 The Child Responsive Program differs from FDR in that the information gathered in meetings in the program is admissible in court.

15.46 If settlement is not reached, the registrar may conduct further procedural hearings to prepare the matter for hearing before a judicial officer. In addition to case management directions, at least 28 days before the final hearing, parties to parenting proceedings must complete a parenting questionnaire, which includes questions about family violence and child abuse, alcohol and drug use, and the details of the parties’ current living and parenting arrangements. This information can be admitted as evidence before the court.49

15.47 In the FMC, the first hearing is usually before the Federal Magistrate assigned to the case. The Federal Magistrate can make a variety of orders about the conduct of the proceedings, including referring the parties to other forms of dispute resolution50 or a conciliation conference.51 While there is no Child Responsive Program in the FMC, the court can order parties to meet with a court-appointed family consultant at a Child Dispute Conference.

15.48 An independent children’s lawyer may be appointed to represent the best interests of a child in the proceedings on the application of any of the parties or an organisation concerned with the child’s welfare, or on the initiative of the court.52

Trial

15.49 Both the Family Court and the FMC adopt a ‘less adversarial’ approach when conducting child-related proceedings.53 This means that the proceedings are conducted with as little formality as possible, and the judicial officer actively directs the conduct of the proceedings.54 In addition, at any point in the trial, either court may refer parties to FDR or counselling.

---

48 Ibid, 224–226.
49 Ibid, 229
50 Federal Magistrates Court Rules 2001 (Cth) r 10.01.
52 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68L.
53 Ibid s 69ZN.
54 Ibid s 69ZN.
15.50 Either court may order that a court-appointed family consultant prepare a family report if the care, welfare or development of a child is relevant to the proceedings. The court may also appoint an expert witness to prepare a report on the family. In determining whether to order a family report, the FMC may take into account allegations of family violence or child abuse. In the Family Court, the Best Practice Principles suggest a number of matters that the court may direct the family report writer or expert witness to address in cases where family violence or child abuse is alleged, including:

- the impact of the family violence or abuse;
- the harm, or risk of harm, to the children;
- any benefits if the child spends time with the parent against whom the allegations are made; and/or
- whether the safety of the child and the parent alleging the family violence or abuse can be secured if there is contact with the person against whom allegations have been made.

Interim hearings

15.51 Both the Family Court and the FMC can make orders on an interim basis pending final orders. In some circumstances, interim orders can be made without notice to the other parties to the proceedings, including where there are family violence and child abuse concerns.

Consent orders

15.52 Consent orders are orders agreed to by the parties about parenting arrangements or other issues in dispute. The orders must be put before the court, which will consider making formal orders that bind the parties. Parties may apply for consent orders at any stage of proceedings in the Family Court and the FMC.

State and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation

Powers

15.53 While the role of the family courts is to resolve disputes that arise between separating spouses or de facto couples, the focus of state and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation is the prevention of family violence and the protection of persons who experience or who are at risk of family violence.

55 Ibid s 62G.
56 Ibid s 69ZX(1)(d).
57 Federal Magistrates Court Rules 2001 (Cth) r 23.01A(2).
58 Family Court of Australia, Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (2009), 5–6.
59 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 9(1); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 1; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 3A(1); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 5; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 3; Domestic Violence and 15.54 The primary way in which state and territory courts achieve this objective is by making protection orders. The purpose of family violence protection orders is to protect people from future family violence. This is usually done by prohibiting a person who has used, or threatened to use, family violence from engaging in certain conduct. Family violence legislation generally allows courts to impose any restriction on a person who has used or threatened to use family violence that it thinks necessary or desirable for the protection of the person at risk.\(^60\) For example, a protection order may prohibit a person from: behaving in an intimidating, offensive or abusive manner towards the person protected; communicating with the protected person; or approaching or entering particular premises where the protected person lives or works.\(^61\)

15.55 Family violence legislation in each state and territory confers power to make protection orders on courts of summary jurisdiction in the relevant jurisdiction—that is, local or magistrates courts (collectively referred to in this chapter as ‘magistrates courts’).\(^62\) Courts of summary jurisdiction also have limited jurisdiction under the Family Law Act, discussed in more detail in Chapter 16.

15.56 State and territory magistrates courts also hear minor offences, conduct preliminary hearings for serious offences and deal with civil proceedings for amounts under a certain monetary threshold. Magistrates may also sit on specialist children’s courts which deal with child protection matters and juvenile offenders. In some jurisdictions, children’s courts can also deal with protection order matters—for example, where a child seeks a protection order or a protection order is sought against a child.\(^63\)

---

\(^60\) See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 35(1); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 81(1); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 25(1); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 13(1); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 5; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 16(2); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 48(1); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 21(1)(a).

\(^61\) See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) ss 35–36; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 81(2); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) ss 22, 25(3); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) ss 13(2); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 16(3); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 48(2); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) ss 22, 23. See Ch 11 for a discussion on the kinds of conditions that may be included in protection orders.

\(^62\) See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 91; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 4; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 38; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) ss 25(3); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 3; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 5(1); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 46; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 4.

\(^63\) See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 91; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 146–147; Children and Young People Act 2008 (ACT) s 459; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 25(3)(a); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 31(8), (9).
15.57 Some kinds of protection orders may be made by authorities other than judicial officers. In some jurisdictions, registrars of the court may make interim protection orders. In addition, police officers in some states and territories can make temporary protection orders for the immediate protection of a victim of family violence. The following outline focuses on the procedures involved where a court makes a protection order. The processes associated with police-issued protection orders are discussed in Chapter 9.

Procedures

15.58 The court procedures involved in making a protection order vary across the states and territories. There may also be some variation between courts in the same state or territory, depending on where the court is located—for example, whether it is in an urban, regional or remote area—and how the court operates—for example, whether the court has a specialist family violence list. The following section provides a general outline of the court procedures common to most jurisdictions.

Applying for a protection order

15.59 The first step for a person seeking a protection order is to make an application to the court. Generally, an application for a protection order may be made by:

- the person seeking protection;
- a police officer; or
- another person acting for the person for whose protection the order would be made, such as a child’s parent or guardian.

15.60 A person seeking a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation (the applicant) applies for an order by completing an application form. In the application form, the applicant sets out the reasons why he or she seeks a protection order.

---

64 For example, in NSW a registrar may make interim orders by consent: Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 23.
65 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 24; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 30A; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 18; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 14; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 41. Police powers to issue protection orders are discussed in Ch 9.
66 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 48(2); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 45; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 14; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 25; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 20; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 15(2); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 18; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 28.
order, recent incidents of family violence, the history of the relationship and the particular orders sought.

15.61 The application process differs between jurisdictions. In Victoria, for example, a person seeking a protection order fills out an information form, and the Court Registry uses this information to lodge a formal application for an order on the person’s behalf. In other jurisdictions, it is up to the applicant or his or her legal representative to complete and file the application form.

15.62 Family violence legislation in each state and territory allows police officers to apply for protection orders on behalf of victims of family violence. The prevalence of applications by police on behalf of victims varies across jurisdictions. For example, in Victoria, the majority of applications for protection orders are now made by the police.

Interim orders

15.63 Interim protection orders are temporary orders made pending another court hearing, such as for final protection orders, or criminal proceedings. Often, an applicant will ask the court for interim orders so that the person has protection immediately after the first court hearing.

15.64 In South Australia, an application for a protection order is presumed to be an application for an interim order. The court conducts a preliminary hearing without notice to the person against whom the protection order is sought (the respondent). At this hearing, the court may make an interim protection order or otherwise deal with the matter. In other jurisdictions, if interim orders are sought, the application will be listed before a magistrate as soon as possible after the application is filed, usually on the same day.

15.65 In all jurisdictions, a hearing for an interim protection order can occur in the absence of the respondent and without notifying the respondent. In the hearing, the court will consider the application and any written or oral evidence provided by the applicant and decide whether or not to make an interim protection order.

15.66 All jurisdictions also make provision for protection orders to be made urgently in the absence of the respondent where the circumstances require it. In some jurisdictions, courts or other authorities may make urgent orders after hours by telephone, fax or email. Generally, only police may apply for such orders.\(^{74}\)

15.67 Interim orders are usually of short duration, pending a court hearing at which a court can hear from the respondent and make a final order.

Notifying the respondent

15.68 The respondent needs to be notified of the proceedings for the protection order. In most jurisdictions a court clerk or registrar will notify the respondent of the application and the time and place for the court hearing.\(^{75}\)

Court hearings

15.69 When the respondent is notified of the application or the interim order, he or she will also be told when both the applicant and respondent will need to appear at a preliminary court hearing or ‘mention’. The main purpose of the mention is to determine whether the respondent will oppose or agree to the application for the protection order.

15.70 Because many magistrates courts deal with a high volume of applications for protection orders, mentions may be quite short. Dr Jane Wangmann, in her study of protection order proceedings in NSW Magistrates Courts, estimated that most mentions were dealt with in less than three minutes.\(^{76}\) This however, is not necessarily reflective of practices across Australia.

15.71 There can be several different outcomes of a mention. A large number of protection orders are made by consent, when the applicant and respondent agree on the content of the order, which is then made by the court.\(^{77}\) In such cases, the court is not required to make any findings as to whether the grounds for making the order are

---

73 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 26; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 44; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 54; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 19; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 70.

74 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 25(1); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 44; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 54; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 18; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 68.

75 See, eg, Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 48; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 47; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 63; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 31.

76 J Wangmann, “She Said …” “He said …”: Cross Applications in NSW Apprehended Domestic Violence Order Proceedings’, Thesis, University of Sydney, 2009, 104. Wangmann notes that Hunter, in her research on protection order proceedings in the Victorian Magistrates’ Court, also found that most uncontested matters were considered within three minutes.

77 Generally, only a court may make a final protection order by consent. An exception is s 38 of the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT), which allows a court or clerk to make a final order. satisfied. The court may also make an order by ‘consent without admissions’, where the respondent does not admit or agree to the allegations made in the application.

15.72 If the applicant and respondent do not agree about the orders, the court will set a date for a contested hearing. The court may make an interim order for the person’s protection until the next court date, or continue an existing interim order. At the contested hearing, the court makes a decision whether or not to make a protection order based on evidence provided by the applicant and respondent, such as oral testimony from the parties and witnesses, police reports, medical reports, telephone records and photographs. Because protection order proceedings are civil proceedings, the magistrate will need to be satisfied of the facts ‘on the balance of probabilities’, not the higher criminal standard of ‘beyond reasonable doubt’.

15.73 If the respondent has been served or notified of the orders and proceedings but does not attend the mention or final hearing, the court may decide to hear the evidence and, if appropriate, make a protection order in his or her absence.

15.74 In Western Australia and the ACT, a different procedure applies. In those jurisdictions, the respondent must return a signed copy of the interim order to the court, indicating whether he or she objects to the order. If the respondent does not object, or fails to return the order, the interim order becomes a final order. If the respondent does object, the registrar of the court will set a date for a contested hearing.

Final orders

15.75 By making a final order, the court will replace any interim orders. Final orders must also be served on the respondent. The order takes effect when it is made—or when the order is served on the respondent—if the respondent was not present at the hearing. It is essential that the respondent knows

78 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 78(1); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 78; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 43; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 23; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 43(2)(b); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 38.

79 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 78(2); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 78; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 43; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 23(3); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 22(2); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 43(2)(c); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 38.

80 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 57; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 61(2)(b); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 49; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 42(2); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 23(2); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 31(7); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 32.

81 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 31; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 36.

82 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 32; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 36.

83 Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 33; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 36.

84 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 77; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 201; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 58; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 44; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 23(5); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 25(1)(b); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 64; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) ss 36, 40.

85 See, eg, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 34; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 16; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 23(4), (5); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 25.
that an order has been made because breach of a protection order by the respondent is a criminal offence in all jurisdictions. Final orders may be in force for a period set out in the order, for a specified default period, for a specified maximum period or until the order is revoked.

Variation and revocation

15.76 State and territory family violence legislation permits a court to vary or revoke a protection order. Procedures to vary or revoke protection orders differ across jurisdictions. Legislation in some jurisdictions requires the respondent to seek leave of the court before making an application to vary or revoke a protection order, to ensure that applications to vary or revoke are not made for the purposes of harassing the victim of family violence.

Key interaction issues

15.77 Interaction issues will not arise in all cases involving family violence. Family violence is not an issue in all cases before federal family courts. Similarly, not all people who seek family violence protection orders are involved in proceedings in the family courts. This may be because separation and parenting matters are not an issue in every case, or may be resolved without the involvement of a family court. It may also be because some people have difficulty accessing family courts—for example because the costs of legal proceedings or geographic remoteness make access to courts impractical. In particular, several stakeholders noted that statistics show that the number of Indigenous people accessing family courts is low.

15.78 However, for those people that do need to seek orders from a state or territory court to ensure their personal protection and also resolve family law matters, it is important that the legal system supports and facilitates this as seamlessly and effectively as possible. It is also important to ensure that recommendations for reform to address the problems caused by the interaction between state and territory family violence legislation and the Family Law Act do not interfere unduly with the effective operation of the protection order system in cases where interaction issues do not arise.

---

86 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 14; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 123; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 80; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 31; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 61; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 35; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 90; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 120.

87 See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 79; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 97, 99; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 34A; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 16(5); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 11; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 19; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 55; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 27.

88 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 72; Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 100; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) ss35–36; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 45; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 26; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 20; Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) ss 58, 62; Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 51.

89 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 109; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 46; Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 20(2); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 48.
15.79 Submissions and consultations in this Inquiry highlighted how the interaction between protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation and parenting orders made under the Family Law Act can lead to a range of ‘gaps’ in the protection of victims of family violence.

Inconsistent orders

15.80 Protection orders and parenting orders may contain inconsistent conditions. Sometimes orders will be directly inconsistent. For example, a protection order may prohibit a person from coming within a specified distance of the other parent’s home, while a parenting order allows the parent to collect and return the children at the home. At other times, orders will be inconsistent in practice—while they are not directly contradictory, it is difficult or impossible to comply fully with both. For example, a parenting order may allow a parent to spend time with a child, while a protection order prohibits that parent from communicating with the person with whom the child lives, making it difficult to comply with the parenting order. 90

15.81 The Family Law Act provides that a protection order made under state or territory family violence legislation that is inconsistent with a Family Law Act order which provides for, requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child, is invalid to the extent of the inconsistency. 91 This means that conditions in a parenting order made under the Family Law Act will override any inconsistent requirements in a protection order, which, in itself can lead to a gap in protection.

15.82 A number of submissions to this Inquiry noted that the fact that a parenting order overrides a protection order can lead to gaps in the protection of victims of family violence, particularly when the terms of the parenting order do not include arrangements for the safety of all parties. 92 Dr Lucy Healey, a Research Fellow in a family violence reform research team, led by Professor Cathy Humphreys at the University of Melbourne, included the following example in her submission:

One woman reported that a Family Court judge made comments such as; “I don’t know why you’re here”, “Are you trying to stop the father seeing the children?” and “I don’t see why you can’t just change over at McDonald’s like other couples”. Her ex-partner had stalked her, tailgated her and tried to run her off the road when driving the children to meet their father but these did not appear to be seriously considered in court. (This woman had left her husband after a 13 year marriage when he threatened to kill their children and himself. She had a disability that was not readily obvious and both of her children were autistic.) In her view, the fact that Family Court Orders over-ride Intervention Orders with exclusion conditions made the latter a ‘waste of time’. 93

---

90  See Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [6.2.2].
91  Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68Q(1).
92  See, eg, Michelle O, Submission FV 153, 24 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; L Healey, Submission FV 64, 1 June 2010.
93  L Healey, Submission FV 64, 1 June 2010.
Culture and practice of state and territory courts

Standard exceptions for contact

15.83 In practice, inconsistency is often avoided by state and territory courts making exceptions for contact or communication authorised or required by a family law order from the conduct prohibited in the protection order.\(^\text{94}\) Contact authorised by ‘order of any court’ is a standard exception to prohibitions on communication or contact in a protection order.

15.84 In effect, this means that responsibility for deciding how contact should take place, when there are children involved, is left to a decision by a federal family court or agreement between the parties. Even though state and territory magistrates courts have limited jurisdiction under the Family Law Act, as discussed in Chapter 16 the Commissions have heard in this Inquiry that this jurisdiction is rarely exercised by courts making protection orders under family violence legislation. A reluctance to exercise family law jurisdiction, and a preference to leave such matters for federal family courts, has several consequences.

Some magistrates are reluctant to exercise family law jurisdiction

15.85 Some stakeholders have reported difficulties seeking a protection order from a state or territory court when proceedings have been commenced in the family court. For example, in their study on family violence and parenting arrangements, Miranda Kaye and colleagues reported the experience of a study participant who applied for a protection order for herself and her children:

> The Local Court decided not to deal with the matter because [the victim’s] ex-partner had started proceedings in the Family Court. The magistrate commented that the ‘Family Court was looking into it now’ and that her interim Family Court orders for supervised contact ‘covered the situation’. … The magistrate went on to comment that, in any event, he ‘couldn’t overrule the Family Court’.

15.86 There are also concerns that some magistrates are reluctant to deal with family law matters even where formal family law proceedings have not been commenced. For example, a confidential submission noted that:

> When in the process of considering domestic violence orders, state based courts will frequently ‘shy away’ from making any decisions that are relevant, or might impact or be construed to be, jurisdiction of the family court...

> We often hear magistrates at [family violence] courts say ‘you have to take that issue to that court, it’s not this court’s business or an issue for today’. Courts don’t seem willing to take on the work that another court has done, or needs to do. In these cases, when the issue is one of child or adult safety at contact or handover, the overriding message is that the violence is not as important as the accuracy of the family court orders and/or child contact arrangements.96

---

15.87 This is not, however, true of all magistrates courts—education and training and specialised practices in some family violence courts have increased the willingness and capacity of magistrates courts to deal with family law issues where relevant to the protection of a victim of family violence.

Culture and practice of federal family courts

15.88 The Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Act 2006 (Cth) introduced the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility into the Family Law Act and the requirement that courts consider whether a child spending equal time with both parents is reasonably practical and in the best interests of the child. In addition, the ‘best interests of the child’ test in s 60CC of the Family Law Act was amended to make the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both parents and protection from physical and psychological harm the primary considerations when deciding the best interests of the child.

15.89 The effect of these amendments on victims of family violence has been strongly criticised—both in submissions to this Inquiry and in other reports, including those set out in Chapter 1. In particular, there is a concern that, where there are issues of family violence, the child’s interest in having contact with both parents has come to outweigh the protection of victims of family violence.97

15.90 For example, Women’s Legal Service Victoria provided a case study in which a father, ‘Peter’, who had been extremely violent towards his partner ‘Kirsty’ in front of their child:

In this matter, the Independent Children’s Lawyer [ICL] was of the opinion that, despite Peter’s extraordinarily violent behaviour, [the child] should have contact, albeit limited, with Peter. The final orders were made based on the ICL’s Minutes of Proposed Orders. It reinforces a view that contact, albeit with a frighteningly violent parent, is preferable to no contact for the sake of protection.

This runs contrary to [the approach under] the Victorian Family Violence Protection Act 2008 which mandates a Magistrate to order ‘no contact’ if contact ‘may’ jeopardise the child’s or potentially the parent’s safety.

96 Confidential, Submission FV 190, 25 June 2010.
The inconsistency in approach between the Magistrates Court and the Family Court led to different orders and approaches to the extensive family violence Kirsty and [her child] had experienced.\textsuperscript{98}

15.91 Women’s Legal Service Victoria submitted that:

This case study demonstrates that the lack of integration between the Family and Magistrates Courts means that vulnerable parties are not adequately protected from violence and abuse. It also shows the very high test for violence a victim has to satisfy before a no contact order can be made by the Family Court. This is probably as a result of the tension in the current Family Law Act between protection from abuse and the need for children to have a meaningful relationship with both parents.\textsuperscript{99}

15.92 Other submissions were critical that insufficient weight is being given in family law proceedings to findings of family violence. For example, the Murray Mallee Community Legal Service noted that while the Family Law Act places a responsibility on the federal family courts to ensure people’s safety from family violence ... it appears that in practice the Family Law Act does not take family violence against women and children seriously. Those of our family law clients who experience family violence do not find that the Family Law Act protects them or their children. For example, in several clients’ cases parenting orders have been made providing that children spend substantial amounts of unsupervised time with the other parent, despite the Family Court acknowledging that that parent was violent and abusive.\textsuperscript{100}

Unclear pathways

15.93 Several submissions to this Inquiry characterised victims’ experiences of negotiating the various legal systems as a form of further abuse and victimisation,\textsuperscript{101} in which victims are often required to retell their story to different courts, lawyers and counsellors working across different jurisdictions. In addition, victims who feel that they have successfully obtained protection from family violence by obtaining a protection order find that the protection order can be overruled by a family court order.

15.94 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court Victoria noted the impact on victims caused by the silos that currently exist between the protection order and family law jurisdictions:

Currently the pathways to resolution of parenting arrangements following intervention order proceedings can be unclear and ad hoc. Despite family violence being a cross jurisdictional issue, the state/territory family violence jurisdictions and the federal family law jurisdictions often operate in silos. This results in duplication as parties attend multiple court dates in different courts, get advice from different lawyers (family violence duty lawyers and then family lawyers) and re-litigate the same issues in different forums. This system is not effective or efficient and it does not maximise \textsuperscript{98} Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{99} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{101} NSW Women’s Refuge Movement Working Party Inc, Submission FV 188, 25 June 2010; C Stoney, Submission FV 134, 22 June 2010; K Hall, Submission FV 113, 8 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 86, 2 June 2010.
safety. Such a system creates opportunities for the process itself to become a tool of further abuse. It creates the potential for inconsistent orders. There is a concern that family violence can get minimised along the way.102

15.95 State and territory magistrates courts are often the first point of contact with the legal system for separating families affected by family violence. In many cases, protection order proceedings are commenced to secure the immediate protection of a victim of family violence, while family law matters take longer to resolve. However, unresolved parenting issues, which can heighten the risk of family violence, may be present at this first point of contact.

15.96 In light of this, the Victorian Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court submitted that it is ‘crucial that a clear pathway is provided to deal with cross-jurisdictional issues of family violence and parenting orders’.103

Corresponding jurisdictions

15.97 In Chapter 3, the Commissions set out a framework for reform of the jurisdictions of courts that deal with issues of family violence. In that chapter, the Commissions consider that the effective protection of people affected by family violence is compromised by gaps arising as a result of the interaction between four legal systems: state and territory family violence legislation; criminal law; child protection laws; and federal family law. For the reasons discussed in Chapter 3, the Commissions do not favour a recommendation that one court should be established with jurisdiction to deal with all legal issues resulting from family violence. Rather, the Commissions consider that the most effective way to integrate these systems is to develop corresponding jurisdictions, where the jurisdictions of courts dealing with family violence overlap to an appropriate degree.

15.98 Using this framework, Chapters 16 and 17 consider how the jurisdiction of state and territory magistrates courts under family violence legislation and the jurisdiction of federal family courts to make orders with respect to parenting can correspond. Chapter 16 considers reforms to the jurisdiction of state and territory courts to deal with family law matters, while Chapter 17 considers reforms to the jurisdiction of federal family courts to make protective orders for victims of family violence.

15.99 In addition, these chapters consider the operation of laws governing how federal family courts and state and territory courts deal with inconsistencies between orders. The emphasis throughout is the need to ensure that the interaction between the two legal systems does not expose victims of family violence to the risk of further harm.

---

102 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
103 Ibid.
16. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction and Practice of State and Territory Courts

Contents

Introduction 695
Current jurisdiction of state and territory magistrates courts 696
Section 68R of the Family Law Act 698
  Current use of s 68R 699
  Fostering the use of s 68R 703
  Enabling state and territory courts to make parenting orders 708
  Relevant considerations when making or varying a parenting order 712
  Duration of parenting orders amended in protection order proceedings 719
Obligations on state and territory courts making protection orders 725
  Relevant considerations when making a protection order 725
  Exceptions for court-ordered contact with a child 729
Improving practice 734
  Specialised practice 735
  Training and education 735
Personal property directions in protection orders 738
  Overview 738
  Types of property subject to personal property directions 740
  Interaction with federal family court proceedings 741
  Strategies to prevent inconsistencies between orders 750
  Impact on future federal family court proceedings 753

Introduction

16.1 This chapter examines the way in which state and territory courts exercise jurisdiction under family violence legislation and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). In doing so, the chapter focuses on three issues arising from the interaction of family violence legislation and the Family Law Act identified in Chapter 9:

- inconsistencies between family law orders and protection orders;
- a culture in state and territory magistrates courts of deferring to family courts rather than exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act; and
- difficulties in negotiating the pathways between the state and territory family violence regimes and federal family law, leading to duplication and inconsistencies.
16.2 In Chapter 3, the Commissions set out a framework for the reform of the jurisdiction of courts that deal with issues of family violence. This framework is informed by the principle that victims of family violence should, as far as possible, be able to have as many of the legal issues relating to the violence resolved by the same court. As discussed in Chapter 3, the Commissions consider that an effective way to do this is to enhance the ability of the courts that currently deal with family violence matters to address matters outside their core jurisdiction.

16.3 Often, the first point of contact that victims of family violence have with the legal system is at a state or territory magistrates court, when the victim, or a police officer acting on the victim’s behalf, seeks a protection order. This chapter focuses on how to enhance the way that state and territory courts exercise jurisdiction under family violence legislation so that they may also deal with related family law matters more effectively.

16.4 This chapter begins by setting out the jurisdiction under the Family Law Act that is currently conferred on state and territory courts. The chapter then examines the provisions of the Family Law Act that allow a state or territory court, when making a protection order, also to revive, vary, suspend or discharge a parenting order. The chapter goes on to discuss the matters courts should take into account when making a protection order in circumstances where Family Law Act orders exist or are pending. Finally, the chapter examines the provisions for the recovery of personal property in state and territory family violence legislation, in the context of protection order proceedings.

16.5 The Commissions acknowledge that amending legislation to expand the jurisdiction of courts is not, in itself, sufficient to address the interaction issues identified above. The chapter therefore includes a discussion of how specialised practice and training, education and resources for people involved in protection order proceedings are necessary to improve the way that courts consider and address issues of family violence.

Current jurisdiction of state and territory magistrates courts

16.6 Part VII of the Family Law Act relates to children, and includes provisions relating to parental responsibility, parenting plans, parenting orders and child maintenance orders. Jurisdiction under pt VII is vested in the courts of summary jurisdiction in each state and territory.¹

16.7 Proceedings for a parenting order can be instituted in a state or territory court of summary jurisdiction. However, s 69N of the Family Law Act places some limitations on the circumstances in which state and territory courts can hear and determine parenting proceedings. If a party seeks orders different from those sought in the application, the state or territory court must seek the consent of all parties to the determination of the application by the court. If the parties do not consent, the state or territory court must transfer the proceedings to a federal family court.

¹ Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 69J. The Local Court of New South Wales and the Magistrates Courts of Victoria, Queensland, Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania, the Australian Capital Territory and the Northern Territory are all courts of summary jurisdiction. For ease of reference, these courts are referred to as ‘magistrates courts’ in this chapter.

16.8 The effect of s 69N is that a state or territory court may only make parenting orders where both parties agree on the content of the order, or where both parties agree that the court hear and determine the matter.

16.9 The state or territory court may also make any orders it considers necessary pending the federal family court dealing with the matter. For example, a state or territory court may make interim orders, such as an ex parte order for the recovery of a child, or order that parties attend a family conference or counselling.

16.10 In addition to this jurisdiction, the Family Law Act allows state and territory courts, when making or varying a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation, to vary a parenting order. Section 68R of the Family Law Act permits a state or territory court with jurisdiction under pt VII to ‘revive, vary, discharge or suspend’:

- a parenting or recovery order;
- an injunction granted under ss 68B or 114 of the Family Law Act;
- an undertaking given to a court exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act;
- a registered parenting plan; or
- a recognisance entered into under an order under the Family Law Act.

16.11 This chapter focuses on the use of s 68R to amend a parenting order, on the basis that it is the most common point of interaction. However, the principles developed in this chapter could also be applied to other Family Law Act orders.

16.12 A state or territory court may only revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order to the extent that it relates to a person spending time with a child. In addition, the court may only exercise its power under s 68R when it has material that was not before the court that made the original parenting order.

Footnotes:
2 Ibid s 69N.
3 This restriction does not apply to proceedings for child maintenance orders, or to proceedings commenced in the Magistrates Court of Western Australia: Ibid s 69N(1)(a).
4 Ibid s 69N(2).
5 While not directly relevant to this Inquiry, the Family Law Act permits state and territory courts of summary jurisdiction to hear proceedings for ‘matrimonial causes’ other than proceedings for divorce or decree of nullity or a declaration as to the validity of a marriage, divorce or annulment: s 39(6)(a). State and territory courts can also hear defended proceedings in relation to property with a total value of up to $20,000 without restriction, and with a higher value with the consent of all parties: s 46. If the parties do not consent to the state or territory court hearing the matter, the proceedings must be transferred to a federal family court: s 46(1)(a).
6 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68R(1).
7 Ibid s 68R(3).
16.13 The effect of a decision to amend a parenting order differs depending on whether it is amended during proceedings for an interim protection order or for a final protection order. Magistrates courts are not permitted to discharge a parenting order during proceedings for an interim protection order.8 In addition, if a magistrates court revives, varies or suspends a family law order during proceedings for an interim protection order, the variation only has effect for 21 days.9

16.14 The jurisdiction of courts of summary jurisdiction in Western Australia to amend a parenting order differs depending on whether the order was made under the Family Law Act or the Family Court Act 1997 (WA). Arrangements in Western Australia have led to some uncertainty about the jurisdiction of Western Australian courts of summary jurisdiction under the Family Law Act.10

16.15 The power to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order under s 68R differs from the jurisdiction conferred by s 69N of the Family Law Act in that s 68R may be exercised by a magistrate on his or her own initiative. Section 68R does not require that the parties prepare and lodge a formal application for parenting orders with the court11 or have attended family counselling.12

Section 68R of the Family Law Act

16.16 Section 68R is in pt VII div 11 of the Family Law Act, which deals with inconsistency between protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation and Family Law Act orders that provide, require or authorise a person to spend time with a child.13 The purpose of this division is:

- to resolve inconsistencies between orders;
- to ensure that such orders do not expose people to family violence; and
- to achieve the objects and principles in s 60B of the Family Law Act, which relate to meeting the child’s best interests.14

16.17 Section 68R addresses the situation where a victim of family violence seeks a protection order after a parenting order has been made and is seeking conditions in that protection order that would be inconsistent with the existing parenting order. Because conditions in a parenting order made under the Family Law Act will override any inconsistent conditions in a protection order,15 a protection order that is inconsistent

---

8 Ibid s 68R(4).
9 Ibid s 68T(1).
11 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68R(2).
12 Ibid s 68S(1)(b).
13 Ibid s 4 defines an order made under state or territory family violence legislation as ‘an order (including an interim order) made under a prescribed law of a State or Territory to protect a person from family violence’. Laws prescribed under the Family Law Regulations 1984 (Cth) reg 12BB and sch 8 correspond to those state and territory laws defined as ‘family violence laws’ for the purpose of this Inquiry.
14 Ibid s 68N.
15 Ibid s 68Q(1).
with a parenting order may not provide effective protection for a victim of family violence, as the inconsistent conditions in the protection order are not binding and cannot be enforced. Section 68R provides a mechanism for state and territory courts to amend the parenting order to remove the inconsistency and ensure that the person is protected from violence.

16.18 Section 68R, and other provisions of div 11, were the subject of two previous reviews—one by Kearney McKenzie and Associates in 1998 (the Kearney McKenzie Report) and another by the Family Law Council in 2004 (the 2004 Family Law Council advice). The Kearney McKenzie Report commented on the importance of s 68R:

In the circumstances where [s 68R] is likely to be used, where contact or contact handover is an occasion of violence by one parent against another, it can be used to provide a circuit breaker in the violence. It gives the victim a breathing space from the violence. It does not have to be used to deny contact altogether; in appropriate cases, the variation might be new pick up and delivery arrangements.16

Current use of s 68R

16.19 Previous reports and articles have commented on how rarely state and territory courts exercise their power to vary or suspend a parenting order under the Family Law Act to complement a protection order made in family violence proceedings.17 In this Inquiry, the Commissions sought views on whether state and territory courts, and legal practitioners working in these courts, remain hesitant to consider, or raise matters relevant to s 68R and, if so, the factors that contribute to the provision’s underuse.18

Submissions and consultations

16.20 Many stakeholders considered that s 68R was an important provision and should be used more frequently to ensure that inconsistent orders do not place victims of family violence at risk of further violence during contact authorised by a parenting order.19 For example, the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse submitted that s 68R provides enormous and underutilized potential for addressing many of the difficulties arising from the overlap of family violence laws and family laws, including access to evidence, inconsistent orders, exposure of children to danger/harm and its centrality to assessment of their ‘best interests’ [and] definitions of violence.20 16.21 Submissions and consultations indicated that, while practice varies across jurisdictions, many state and territory magistrates courts remain reluctant to use s 68R of the Family Law Act. Stakeholders suggested several reasons for this.

---

16.22 The Local Court of New South Wales submitted that s 68R addresses a relatively uncommon situation, as it is rare for parties seeking a protection order also to be involved in prior or concurrent family law proceedings.21 Generally, an application for a protection order is made first, and family law proceedings may follow later.

16.23 In those matters where an application to make or vary a protection order is made when there is a parenting order in place, a number of stakeholders suggested that some magistrates and lawyers consider that parenting orders are a matter for a federal family court.22 As Women’s Legal Services Australia noted, ‘parenting orders are commonly treated as a fixed backdrop rather than something that could be changed to ensure the safety of the protected person’.23

16.24 The Local Court of New South Wales and the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria suggested that a reason for the underuse of s 68R is that some magistrates may assume that they do not have the power to vary an order of a court of superior jurisdiction.24 The Law Society of NSW noted that, in NSW, magistrates and court staff do not specialise in family law, do not have access to services such as child dispute services or independent children’s lawyers and may not have the ‘time or resources’ to determine parenting matters.25 Women’s Legal Centre ACT agreed with this view, and considered that a parenting order which exposed a person to a risk of family violence should go back to a federal family court for consideration.26

16.25 Other stakeholders expressed concerns about the practicality and fairness of using s 68R to amend a parenting order at the same time as making a protection order. Some submissions noted that magistrates may require more information or evidence (such as a copy of the parenting orders or a written application) and that notice should be given to the other party, and this may not be possible if a variation of a parenting order is sought ‘on the run’ in a busy court list.27

20 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.
21 Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
22 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
23 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.
24 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Local Court of NSW, Submission FV 101, 4 June 2010.
26 Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
16.26 Some submissions described situations in which applicants seeking a condition in a protection order in relation to children were required by the judicial officer to negotiate family law matters during an adjournment of the protection order proceedings. In addition, some stakeholders noted that courts have directed a police prosecutor to assist the applicant to negotiate parenting orders, which, in their view, was inappropriate. 28 A number of legal service providers expressed the view that it may not be appropriate to ask people to negotiate parenting issues at the same time that they seek a protection order. 29 In such cases there is often limited opportunity for parties to seek legal advice about family law matters on the same day that they apply for a protection order. 30 Access to legal advice is complicated by the fact that some parties may have legal assistance to apply for a protection order, but may not have sought, or qualified for, legal aid in relation to a family law matter. 31 Further, requiring parties to consider parenting matters on the day can put additional pressure on victims of family violence who are in court to seek protection from violence.

16.27 Some stakeholders noted that some applicants who seek to vary a parenting order fear that, by doing so, they will be perceived as ‘unfriendly parents’ or as misusing the legal system to frustrate children spending time with the other parent. 32

16.28 The Law Society of NSW expressed concerns about the possibility that a party who is dissatisfied with the outcome of federal family law proceedings will seek to use s 68R to revisit those orders. 33

16.29 Finally, many stakeholders agreed that a lack of experience and knowledge about s 68R and general family law on the part of magistrates courts, legal practitioners involved in protection order proceedings and police prosecutors contributed to the underuse of s 68R. 34

---

28 Confidential, Submission FV 235, 16 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
29 Confidential, Submission FV 235, 16 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission FV 174, 25 June 2010.
34 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission
Commissions’ views

16.30 The reasons for the underuse of s 68R of the Family Law Act identified by stakeholders in this Inquiry reflect the reasons suggested in previous reports. In summary, the provision is rarely used to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order because:

- judicial officers, lawyers, police and others involved in protection order proceedings may not be sufficiently aware of the existence, or understand the nature, of s 68R;
- some judicial officers, lawyers and police appear to consider that issues in relation to parenting orders should be a matter for federal family courts;
- judicial officers may not have the information or evidence necessary to amend a parenting order; and
- parties to proceedings may not have access to appropriate legal advice and other support before seeking to amend a parenting order.

16.31 The Commissions are of the view that increasing and improving the use of s 68R in state and territory magistrates courts is necessary to fill a gap in the protection of victims of family violence caused by the interaction between family law and state and territory family violence legislation. In particular, s 68R is necessary to protect victims of family violence where violence arises or escalates after parenting orders have been made—for example, during handover arrangements. In such cases, if s 68R is not used to amend the parenting order, a victim of violence may need to go to a federal family court to seek an amendment to the parenting order as well as a state or territory magistrates court to seek a protection order. In this way, state and territory family violence legislation and the Family Law Act are designed to be complementary, but do not appear to be operating in this way in practice.

16.32 Fostering the use of s 68R, improving understanding about the intersections between state and territory family violence legislation and the Family Law Act, and, as discussed below, allowing magistrates courts to make parenting orders when making or varying a protection order until further order, will allow one court to deal with a range of personal protection and family law matters that may arise when a victim of family violence seeks a protection order.

16.33 The Commissions note the concerns expressed by some stakeholders about whether state and territory magistrates courts are the appropriate forum for the consideration and amendment of family law orders. In order to close the gaps in... protection and make court process as seamless as possible from the point of view of victims of family violence, the Commissions consider that fostering the exercise of family law jurisdiction by state and territory magistrates courts needs to be accompanied by a specialised family violence practice that transcends the current silos between protection orders and family law matters. Specialisation is discussed further below and in Chapter 32.

Fostering the use of s 68R

16.34 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed three measures to foster the use of s 68R by state and territory magistrates courts:

- amending state and territory family violence legislation to refer expressly to s 68R;\(^{37}\)
- including a question about parenting orders in application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation;\(^{38}\) and
- training and education of judicial officers.\(^{39}\)

16.35 Because training and education is integral to many of the recommendations made in this chapter, it is discussed separately later in this chapter.

Express reference to s 68R in state and territory legislation

16.36 Family violence legislation in Victoria and South Australia expressly refers to the court’s ability to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order when making or varying a protection order. Section 16(1) of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) states:

> An intervention order is invalid to the extent of any inconsistency with a Family Law Act order of a kind referred to in section 68R of the Family Law Act 1975 of the Commonwealth (but the Court may resolve the inconsistency by exercising its power to revive, vary, discharge or suspend the Family Law Act order under that section).

16.37 Section 90 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) goes further, and requires, where a protection order will be inconsistent with an existing Family Law Act order:

> The court must, to the extent of its powers under section 68R of the Family Law Act, revive, vary, discharge or suspend the Family Law Act order to the extent that it is inconsistent with the family violence intervention order.

16.38 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that family violence legislation in each state and territory should refer to the powers under s 68R of the Family Law Act to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order to give effect to a family violence protection order. The Commissions expressed a preliminary view that the approach adopted in the South Australian legislation—which refers to the

---

37 Consultation Paper, Proposal 8–8.
powers under s 68R of the Family Law Act—would be sufficient to increase the visibility and awareness of s 68R. However, the Commissions also asked whether courts should be required to use s 68R to revive, vary, discharge or suspend an inconsistent Family Law Act order, as is the case in Victoria.40

Submissions and consultations

16.39 Most submissions received in response to this proposal agreed that state and territory family violence legislation should expressly refer to s 68R. However, views differed about the form such a provision should take.

16.40 Most stakeholders preferred the Victorian model.41 Some did so on the basis that the requirement to act would be more effective in raising awareness and facilitating the use of s 68R.42 For example, Women’s Legal Services NSW preferred this option as it places a stronger obligation on the courts, requiring them to exercise their powers, than the wording of section 68R in which courts ‘may’ amend existing orders. In circumstances where a protection order has been made creating a conflict with an existing parenting order, it is essential that magistrates turn their minds to whether or not there needs to be a change to the parenting orders.43

16.41 Other stakeholders submitted that state and territory legislation should refer to the powers under s 68R of the Family Law Act, but not mandate its use.44 For example, the Queensland Law Society submitted that a magistrate ought to be required to consider whether s 68R of the Family Law Act applies as part of a ‘checklist’ before making a protection order.\(^\text{45}\) Other submissions expressed concerns about requiring a magistrates court to exercise its powers under s 68R whenever there is an inconsistency. In particular, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate commented that:

---

> A court making a family violence order may not have sufficient information to be confident about dealing with the parenting order and the matter should therefore remain discretionary.\(^\text{46}\)

16.42 The Law Society of NSW submitted that, in its view, requiring state courts to use s 68R would be inappropriate in cases where the protection order proceedings are brought because one party is dissatisfied with the family law orders. It preferred an approach where the use of s 68R was left to the discretion of the judicial officer based on the circumstances of each case:

> State Courts may not have the time or resources to determine issues regarding the variation or suspension of parenting orders, particularly in cases where the Federal Family Law Courts have made a determination, following hearing of evidence in the matter which may include a Family Report and where the Federal Family Law Courts may have had the benefit of an Independent Children’s Lawyer who was appointed to the case to represent the interests of the children separately.\(^\text{47}\)

Commissions’ views

16.43 The Commissions are of the view that an express reference to the powers under s 68R in the family violence legislation in each state and territory will increase awareness of the provision among judicial officers, police prosecutors and legal practitioners involved in protection order proceedings.

16.44 The Commissions recommend that state and territory family violence legislation should require a judicial officer to consider whether s 68R should be used to ensure that an existing parenting order that is inconsistent with new conditions in a protection order does not compromise the protection of a victim of family violence. The requirement to consider the use of s 68R will mean that a judicial officer retains the discretion to resolve inconsistencies in a way that is appropriate in each case.

16.45 While the Commissions note the concerns of some stakeholders about the potential misuse of s 68R by a party dissatisfied with the outcome of family law proceedings, there is little evidence to support that this is in fact the case. The Commissions consider that s 68R and state and territory family violence legislation contain sufficient safeguards to allow courts to deal with unmeritorious applications. A judicial officer making or varying a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation must be satisfied on the evidence that the order is necessary or desirable to protect the person from family violence. Further, s 68R requires that a judicial officer may only revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order if the court has before it material that was not before the court that made the original order.\footnote{Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68R(3).}

Recommendation 16–1 Family violence legislation in each state and territory should require judicial officers making or varying a protection order to consider, under s 68R of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), reviving, varying, discharging or suspending an inconsistent parenting order.

Application forms

16.46 Another practical way to increase the awareness and use of s 68R of the Family Law Act is to include a question regarding current parenting orders in application forms for protection orders in each state and territory. For example, the Information for Application for an Intervention Order form, used in Victoria, asks applicants to check a box if they would like a Family Law Act order to be revived, varied or suspended.\footnote{Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, Information for Application for an Intervention Order (2009)<www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au> at 2 February 2010, 10.}

16.47 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed that application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should include a clear option for an applicant to request the court to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order.\footnote{Consultation Paper, Proposal 8–9.}

Submissions and consultations

16.48 The majority of stakeholders who responded to this proposal supported it.\footnote{Women’s Legal Services NSW commented that:}

---

this would be a simple amendment that could provide protection order applicants with a clear opportunity to raise the necessity of change to a current parenting order, which they would otherwise have thought was not possible. 52

16.49 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse submitted that clear options on forms would facilitate awareness amongst police, lawyers and judicial officers as well as clients. 53 The Queensland Commission for Children submitted that this would be a ‘helpful prompt for parties and the court in protection order matters to consider the safety implications for existing parenting orders’. 54

16.50 The Magistrates’ Court Victoria agreed with the proposal, but noted that, in its experience in Victoria, the option on the form does not appear to be used regularly. The Court suggested that this may be because applicants do not understand what it means in the absence of legal advice. 55 In this regard, the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria supported the proposal, but submitted that the form could also include a brief explanation to assist applicants. 56

16.51 Women’s Legal Service NSW drew attention to the fact that many protection order proceedings are initiated by police. It recommended that police be directed to obtain information from the protected person about whether to seek a variation to a current parenting order. 57

16.52 Two submissions did not support this proposal. The Law Society of NSW considered that including such an option on an application form was not appropriate, as a variation could be sought when the matter was before the court. The Women’s Legal Centre ACT submitted that, in the ACT, it would be more appropriate for an inconsistent parenting order to be referred to a federal family court. 58

Commissions’ views

16.53 In Chapter 30, the Commissions recommend that application forms for protection orders in all states and territories should clearly seek information about existing parenting orders or pending proceedings for such orders. 59 Further, the Commissions also recommend that state and territory courts dealing with family violence matters and child protection matters should have access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal used by federal family courts to ensure that they have reliable and timely access to information about existing parenting orders and pending proceedings for such orders. 60

53 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010. See also, Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.
55 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
57 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
58 Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
59 Rec 30–7.
60 Rec 30–8.
16.54 In addition, the Commissions consider that application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should include an option for applicants to request the court to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order. Later in this chapter, the Commissions recommend that state and territory courts, when making or varying a family violence protection order, should be able to make a parenting order. This option should also be noted in the application forms. Expressly including this option in application forms would go some way to increasing awareness and use of s 68R by bringing the issue to the attention of the court, lawyers and parties.

16.55 The Commissions note the comments from the Victorian Magistrates Court that this option in the application form in Victoria is not often used, and also the concerns discussed in Chapter 30 about over-reliance on self-disclosure by applicants for protection orders. Application forms for protection orders are often completed urgently and at a time of great stress. Applicants may also not have the benefit of legal advice or assistance. As such, applicants may not understand why parenting orders are relevant to their application for a protection order, or may be confused about whether a parenting order needs to be amended in addition to seeking a protection order. State and territory courts could also develop plain language information pamphlets or other resources to support awareness and use of this option.

16.56 In Chapter 30, the Commissions recommend placing an obligation on judicial officers making protection orders to inquire about the existence of other orders, including family law orders. In these circumstances, while applicants, including police, should be encouraged to consider whether a s 68R variation is necessary, the obligation should be on the court to inquire about the terms of any parenting order. This is consistent with s 68R(2), which permits the court to amend a parenting order either by application or on a court’s own motion.

Recommendation 16–2 Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should include an option for an applicant to request the court to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order.

Enabling state and territory courts to make parenting orders

16.57 Before 2006, s 68R of the Family Law Act permitted state and territory courts, when making or varying a protection order, to make a parenting order, in addition to their ability to revive, vary, suspend or discharge a parenting order. This aspect of s 68R was repealed by the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parenting) Act 2006 (Cth).

16.58 The removal of the power to make parenting orders when making or varying a protection order was recommended in the 1998 Kearney McKenzie Report and the 2004 Family Law Council advice. The Kearney McKenzie Report argued that the focus of s 68R should be limited to resolving inconsistencies between protection orders and existing parenting orders:

16. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction & Practice of State and Territory Courts

If there is no contact order there is no inconsistency and there is no need to do anything. Depending on its terms, a family violence order may have the effect of denying contact for a time. If so, the violent parent can apply to the Family Court. It should not be possible for either party to use family violence proceedings to get a contact order.62

16.59 In addition, the Kearney McKenzie Report considered that state and territory magistrates courts, at that time, did not have the time or resources to make parenting orders:

In family violence proceedings the focus should be on protecting the woman and her children ... The focus of s [68R] should be on resolving inconsistencies between family violence orders and existing [family law] orders. In cases where there is family violence making an appropriate contact order is always going to be difficult and magistrates have neither the time or resources to do so.63

16.60 The Family Law Council agreed with these arguments and also recommended that there should be no power for a state or territory court to make a parenting order as part of protection order proceedings.64

16.61 The Consultation Paper noted that some stakeholders expressed the view that the power to make parenting orders during protection order proceedings should be reinstated, on the basis that it enables state and territory courts to deal comprehensively with protection order proceedings involving children. The Commissions asked whether s 68R of the Family Law Act should be amended to allow state and territory courts to make parenting orders, in addition to their ability to revive, vary, discharge or suspend such orders.65

Submissions and consultations

16.62 There was some support for reinstating the power for state and territory magistrates courts to make parenting orders during protection order proceedings. Some stakeholders considered that this would allow victims of family violence who have children to resolve their family violence protection orders and parenting

---

62 Kearney McKenzie & Associates, Review of Division 11 (1998), 23–24. This report was written prior to amendments to the Family Law Act which removed the terminology of ‘contact’.
63 Ibid, 24.
65 Consultation Paper, Question 8–10.
66 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; C Humphreys, Submission FV 131, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.
arrangements in one court. National Legal Aid expressed the view that while it is preferable for a specialist family court to make parenting orders, state and territory courts should have the power to make parenting orders in those circumstances in which they can revive, vary, discharge or suspend such orders, where there are situations of urgency and so the matters of people living in regional and remote areas can be readily addressed. The power should be in relation to interim orders only. These powers should be supported by specialist training in family law for state and territory judicial officers. This specialist training is essential. The situation should be monitored and appropriate resourcing allocated.68

16.63 The Magistrates’ Court Victoria noted that, prior to the amendments in 2006, it was more common for magistrates to make a new parenting order, than to discharge, vary or suspend an existing parenting order, because applications for protection orders are often made before family law proceedings are commenced.69

16.64 Women’s Legal Services NSW submitted that the current operation of s 68R leads to inconsistency in the options available to parties, depending on whether or not they have a parenting order in place:

We note that the provisions in section 68R are expressed widely enough that the local courts can entirely discharge the existing orders replacing them with wholly new orders if considered necessary. This means that there is a clear inconsistency between people with current parenting orders who could have new orders made by the local court during the course of proceedings for protection orders, while people without existing orders must use the family law courts (unless both parties consent).70

16.65 Some stakeholders who supported an amendment to allow magistrates courts to make parenting orders in protection order proceedings noted that magistrates would require appropriate training in making parenting orders as well as additional funding and resources.71

16.66 A number of stakeholders opposed extending s 68R to allow state and territory magistrates courts to make parenting orders. Some agreed with the recommendations of the Kearney Mackenzie Report and the 2004 Family Law Council advice and submitted that magistrates courts were not the appropriate forum for making parenting orders.72 Others considered that some magistrates courts do not have the time, resources or expertise to make parenting orders.73 The Department of Premier and

67  Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
68  National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
69  Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
70  Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
73  See, eg, Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; D Bryant, Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia and J Pascoe, Chief Federal Magistrate of the Federal Magistrates Court of Australia, Submission FV 168, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres
Cabinet (Tas) submitted that this meant that a re-introduced power for state courts to make parenting orders is unlikely to be used in Tasmania.74

Commissions’ views

16.67 As state and territory magistrates courts are often the first point of contact with the legal system for separating families who have experienced family violence, the Commissions consider that it is important that state and territory magistrates courts can deal with as many issues relating to the protection of victims of family violence as possible.

16.68 In Chapter 3, the Commissions set out a framework for reform of the jurisdiction of courts that deal with issues of family violence. The Commissions consider that, while the prospect of a single specialist court to deal with all legal matters relating to family violence is not practicable, an effective way to achieve the benefits of ‘one court’ is to develop corresponding jurisdictions, in which the jurisdictions of courts dealing with family violence correspond to an appropriate degree.

16.69 The Commissions consider that state and territory courts, when making or varying a protection order, should also be able to make parenting orders ‘until further order’—a reinstatement of the jurisdiction under the Family Law Act that was removed from state and territory courts in 2006. Making an interim parenting order at this time may take the heat out of the situation by regulating how separating parents spend time and communicate with their children. For example, while a protection order may include conditions to protect a person from violence or harassment, a parenting order may prescribe handover arrangements to minimise contact between the parents.

16.70 The Commissions recommend that a parenting order made in these circumstances should last ‘until further order’. This means that a party who disagrees with the order may seek amendments from a federal family court, or from a state or territory court with jurisdiction under the Family Law Act by using s 69N. Once this kind of application is made, the provisions of the Family Law Act that require parties to attend counselling would take effect. In appropriate cases, a judicial officer making a parenting order during protection order proceedings could also make orders to facilitate transfer to a family court, for example by making orders about family counselling or appointing an independent children’s lawyer.

16.71 One reason for the recommendations in the Kearney McKenzie Report and the 2004 Family Law Council advice to repeal the power of state and territory courts to make parenting orders was the view that magistrates courts, at the time of those reports, had limited time and resources to perform this role. The Commissions acknowledge the force of the practical concerns reflected in submissions to this Inquiry. The recommendations made in this Report are put forward as part of a package, and the goal of ensuring that legal systems that deal with issues of family violence are as accessible and seamless as possible, requires changes to the jurisdiction as well as the practices of state and territory courts to be implemented together. In particular, the Commissions consider that developing and extending specialised practices in family violence in state and territory courts is an important way to foster the expertise and focus the resources of courts, judicial officers and legal practitioners. The importance of specialisation in the exercise of family law jurisdiction by state and territory magistrates courts is discussed below, while the benefits of specialised practice are set out in Chapter 32.

---

74 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

16.72 The Commissions also acknowledge concerns expressed about the need to ensure that parties have access to timely and appropriate legal advice, including about family law, before a state or territory court amends a parenting order. While specialised practices such as a dedicated family violence list, may provide a better opportunity for qualified lawyers to be present when protection orders and parenting orders are dealt with by the court, the broader issue of increasing access to legal aid is outside the terms of reference for this Inquiry.75

Recommendation 16–3 The Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to allow state and territory courts, when making or varying a protection order, to make a parenting order until further order.

Relevant considerations when making or varying a parenting order

Different considerations in different contexts

16.73 When reviving, varying, discharging or suspending a parenting order using s 68R of the Family Law Act, the state or territory court must:

- have regard to the purposes of the division (which are set out above and include resolving inconsistencies between orders, ensuring that orders do not expose people to family violence and achieving the objects and principles in s 60B of the Family Law Act, which relate to meeting the child’s best interests);
- consider whether contact with both parents is in the best interests of the child; and
- if varying, discharging or suspending a parenting order that, when made, was inconsistent with a protection order, be satisfied that it is appropriate to do so because a person has been exposed, or is likely to be exposed, to family violence as a result of the operation of that order.76

16.74 Section 60CA of the Family Law Act requires a court making a parenting order under div 10 of pt VII to have regard to the best interests of the child as the paramount

---

75  The Commissions note the announcement by the Australian Government Attorney-General, the Hon Robert McClelland MP, of a National Partnership Agreement on Legal Assistance Services, which included greater access to Commonwealth funding for child protection and family violence matters where there is a related family law matter: R McClelland (Attorney-General), ‘National Partnership Agreement on Legal Assistance Services’ (Press Release, 2 July 2010).

76  Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68R(5).
16. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction & Practice of State and Territory Courts

consideration. However, when using s 68R to revive, vary, suspend or discharge a parenting order, the Family Law Act states that any provisions such as s 60CA that would otherwise make the best interests of the child the paramount consideration do not apply.

16.75 As the Family Law Council, in its 2004 advice, explained,

Division 11 deals with situations in which contact orders are being considered in circumstances in which family violence orders are in existence or are about to be made. Section [68S] makes it clear that, in such situations, while the court must have regard to the best interests of a child, such interests are not the paramount consideration. The case for not applying the paramountcy principle in such cases is that a child’s best interests must give way to the right of other family members to be protected from violence or the threat of violence.

16.76 As noted by the Family Law Council, this means that there is an inconsistency between parenting orders made using div 10 in which the best interests of the child are the paramount consideration, and parenting orders varied using s 68R, in which the child’s best interests are not the paramount consideration. Where a parenting order is made using div 10, s 60CG(1) of the Family Law Act requires the court to ensure that a parenting order is consistent with a protection order and does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence, but only ‘to the extent that it is possible to do so consistently with the child’s best interests being the paramount consideration’. In order to ensure that a parenting order does not expose a person to a risk of family violence, the court can include any safeguards that it considers necessary for the safety of persons affected by the order.

Lack of clarity

16.77 In addition to this inconsistency, the provisions of the Family Law Act seem unclear about the principles that apply when a state or territory court varies a parenting order using s 68R. In particular, there is uncertainty about whether the protection of family members from family violence should take priority over a child’s interest in spending time with both parents.

16.78 In 2004, the Family Law Council recommended that the Family Law Act should clarify the considerations relevant to a decision to vary a parenting order according to s 68R so that:

In exercising its powers under this section, a court must have regard to the need to protect all family members from family violence and the threat of family violence and, subject to that, to the child’s right to contact with both parents, provided such contact is not contrary to the best interests of the child.

16.79 This recommendation has not been implemented.

---

77 Ibid s 60CA.
78 Ibid s 68S(1).
79 Family Law Council, Review of Division 11—Family Violence (2004), [29] (emphasis in original). The sections cited in this quotation have been amended to reflect the current section numbering of the Family Law Act.
80 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CG(2).
The broader issue: how to determine what is in a child’s best interests?

16.80 The issue of which considerations are relevant when deciding what parenting orders to make, and the weight to be given to each consideration, has been the subject of several other reviews and reports.

16.81 Miranda Kaye and colleagues suggested that the Family Law Act could be amended to include a presumption that, once the court has made a finding of violence, it should not make an order giving residence or unsupervised contact to a party who has used violence against a child or other family member unless it is satisfied that the child will be safe.82 This is the approach taken in New Zealand.83

16.82 The Family Courts Violence Review, undertaken by Professor Richard Chisholm (the Chisholm Review),84 considered the legislative provisions that govern how a family court determines what parenting arrangements are in a child’s best interests. The Review considered that the current test for determining the best interests of a child was problematic.

16.83 First, the Chisholm Review considered that the stipulation of two inherently juxtaposed primary considerations, in which parental involvement is balanced with protection from violence and abuse is ‘not an ideal guide to children’s best interests’.85 While violence and abuse are serious matters, they are not the only issues that need to be considered in parenting cases.

16.84 Secondly, the Chisholm Review outlined the problems with any legislative approach to the best interests of the child that singles out a particular outcome for special mention—such as each parent spending equal time with the child, or no contact with the child in cases of violence. Instead, the Review emphasised that the court should consider the arrangements which would be best for the child in each case, rather than starting with an assumption that a particular outcome is likely to be best in a particular category of case.86

16.85 The Chisholm Review recommended that the Family Law Act should list the factors that a court must take into account when considering what parenting orders to make. The factors recommended in the review do not expressly include family violence. Rather, they would require a court to consider a child’s ‘safety, welfare and wellbeing’, which would encompass family violence as well as other matters that might threaten a child’s safety, welfare or wellbeing, such as a parent’s mental illness or history of substance abuse.

83 Care of Children Act 2004 (NZ) s 60.
84 Chapter 1 sets out the background to the Chisholm Review.
16. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction & Practice of State and Territory Courts

Submissions and consultations

16.86 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions noted the recommendation in the 2004 Family Law Council advice and asked whether the Family Law Act should be amended to direct state and territory courts varying parenting orders to give priority to the protection of family members against violence and the threat of family violence over a child’s interest in having contact with both parents. 87

16.87 Many submissions supported this proposal on the basis that it would clarify that the protection of family members from the threat of violence has priority over the interests of the child in spending time with both parents. 88

16.88 A number of stakeholders also considered that this priority should apply to all parenting orders, not just those made under s 68R. 89 A confidential submission commented that the Family Law Act needs to prioritise the safety of people, particularly children, over relationships with the violent parent. Where a relationship is sought, and research suggests that it is sensible to create these relationships with both parents, such relationships should only be encouraged where it can be guaranteed that the child will be safe and protected. The court should not make orders based on the concept of a right to know a parent, prioritised over the right to be safe. 90

---

87 Consultation Paper, Question 8–9.
90 Confidential, Submission FV 190, 25 June 2010.
16.89 A number of stakeholders commented that the issue about relevant considerations when varying a parenting order under s 68R is just one aspect of a larger issue about the relationship between the two ‘primary considerations’ for determining a child’s best interests, that is:

- the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both parents; and
- the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence.\(^91\)

16.90 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse noted that:

> Conflict between these two considerations in determining ‘best interests’ is at the heart of most difficulties that arise in relation to the application of the Family Law Act to situations of domestic violence. Notwithstanding the recent investigations of this issue by Professor Chisholm and the Family Law Council, it is the view of the Clearinghouse that a false dichotomy has arisen. The Clearinghouse would argue that there is strong evidence documenting the harms which children exposed to violence endure. This suggests that contact with a perpetrator of violence can never be in their ‘best interests’, and in particular, that shared time of any sort in a relationship where abuse and control characterise the dynamics of one party to another is not possible without the exposure of children to the additional harm of ongoing stress and damage.\(^92\)

16.91 Similarly, in a joint submission, Domestic Violence Victoria and others drew attention to the primary considerations for determining a child’s best interests and expressed concern that:

> the Act, in its enthusiasm for shared parenting, often leads to contact orders which are inconsistent with expert knowledge about child development, and where family violence is present, put children’s rights to safety second. In effect, the Act now emphasizes the first principle of meaningful involvement at the expense of children’s and women’s right to safety. The framing of these criteria takes the focus away from the best interests of the child, and places the emphasis on parental rights.\(^93\)

16.92 Women’s Legal Service NSW submitted that in parenting proceedings involving family violence there is a direct conflict between the question of division of time and the risk of harm, and expressed serious concerns that, in its experience, current court practice is to resolve the conflict in favour of prioritising time over considerations relating to risk of harm.\(^94\)

---

\(^91\) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC(2).

Other submissions expressed the view that the Family Law Act should not be amended to direct state and territory courts varying parenting orders to give priority to the protection of family members from violence over a child’s interest in having contact with both parents. The Queensland Law Society and Law Council of Australia suggested that this consideration was more appropriate when making protection orders, not parenting orders.95

In their submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate considered that the best interests of the child should be the paramount consideration when making parenting orders. They submitted that the proposed amendment would ‘result in a bifurcated process with violence issues being separated out from every other issue otherwise required to be considered in determining the best interests of the child’ and emphasised the importance of providing a nuanced response to all of the relevant issues and factors in a child’s life. The Commissioner for Children Tasmania agreed that courts making parenting orders should consider a range of interests and options.96

National Legal Aid submitted that a legislative amendment of this kind was unnecessary as ‘appropriate education [and] training to people working in the family law, family violence, and child protection systems should overcome the concern that this proposed amendment is intended to address’.97

The Family Law Act provides that, when deciding whether to make a particular parenting order, a court must regard the best interests of the child as the paramount consideration.98 However, the Family Law Act specifies two different tests for making or varying a parenting order where there is a risk of family violence. When a state or territory court uses s 68R to vary a parenting order, the best interests of the child are not the paramount consideration—rather, the safety of the person and any children from family violence is paramount. When a federal family court makes or varies a parenting order using div 10 of the Family Law Act, the court must ensure that an order does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence, but only to the extent that it is possible to do so consistently with the child’s best interests being the paramount consideration.

The Commissions are of the view that the considerations relevant to making or varying a parenting order should be the same, regardless of whether the parenting order is made or varied using the provisions of s 68R of the Family Law Act or the provisions in div 10 of the Family Law Act. Identical factual circumstances—in which parenting orders place a person at risk of family violence—should not lead potentially to different outcomes depending on the forum used to make or amend the parenting orders to resolve that issue. Having consistent tests would also allay the concern, expressed in some submissions, that parties who are dissatisfied with parenting orders made by a federal family court, can use s 68R to seek a different outcome.

16.98 Where the person at risk of family violence is a child, the parenting orders should properly take the child’s best interests as the paramount consideration. The court making a parenting order must consider, as a primary consideration, the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm and from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence.99 Depending on the risk of family violence, a court may order ‘no contact’—that the parent who has used family violence is not to spend time or communicate with the child—or order that the parent be supervised while spending time with the child. A court may consider that a ‘no contact’ order is in a child’s best interests where the child has been exposed to family violence directed at other family members.

16.99 However, where a court determines, having regard to all the relevant considerations, that it is in the best interests of the child to spend time or to communicate with a parent who has used, or threatened to use, family violence against a family member other than the child, the paramountcy of the best interests of the child may become problematic. In such cases, the ‘paramount’ consideration of the best interests of the child can be applied to displace, or outrank, the safety of other family members from family violence. Where a parenting order, made in the best interests of the child, has the potential to expose another person to the risk of family violence, the best interests of the child are arguably met at the expense of the safety of other family members.

16.100 In such cases, a court has a number of options, including making orders that handover occur at a safe place or be supervised.100 While making orders to ensure another person’s safety may also be in the best interests of the child, the Commissions consider that a court should make such orders on the basis of the need to protect the person from family violence and not only where this coincides with the child’s bests interests. The safety of other family members from family violence should be a consideration in its own right.

16.101 The Commissions are of the view that parenting orders should not operate to place a person at risk of family violence. To make orders of this kind is to privilege the best interests of the child over a parent’s protection from family violence. The Commissions consider that the Family Law Act should recognise the interest of all parties to be protected from family violence.

16.102 In taking this approach, the Commissions do not recommend amendments to the mandatory considerations for determining what orders are in the child’s best interests. The Commissions share the concerns outlined in the Chisholm Review about

99 Ibid s 60CC(2).
100 The Best Practice Principles developed by the Family Court to provide guidance to decision makers dealing with matters in which family violence is alleged, list a number of other matters that may be considered when ordering that a child spend time with a parent who has used family violence: Family Court of Australia, Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (2009), 11.
the dangers of prescribing in legislation particular outcomes that are presumed to be in the best interests of the child. The Commissions agree with the Chisholm Review that a court making a parenting order should consider the arrangements which would be best for the child, in the context of each particular case.

16.103 When applying s 60CG of the Family Law Act the court should ensure that parenting orders do not operate to place a person at risk of family violence and make such amendments to the order as are necessary to ensure that the person is protected from an unacceptable risk of family violence. When considering these amendments, the court should consider what is necessary for the safety of those affected by the order and the best interests of the child should not be the paramount consideration.

16.104 This test should be the same, regardless of whether the parenting order is made using the provisions of div 10 of the Family Law Act; revived, varied, suspended or discharged by a state or territory court under s 68R; or made during proceedings to make or vary a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation in circumstances set out in Recommendation 16–3.

Recommendation 16–4 Section 60CG of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)—which requires a court to ensure that a parenting order does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence and permits the court to include in the order any safeguards that it considers necessary for the safety of a person affected by the order—should be amended to provide that the court should give primary consideration to the protection of that person over the other factors that are relevant to determining the best interests of the child.

Duration of parenting orders amended in protection order proceedings

16.105 Section 68R operates differently depending on whether a parenting order is amended by a state or territory court during proceedings for an interim protection order or for a final protection order. When a parenting order is revived, varied or suspended under s 68R in proceedings to make or vary an interim protection order, s 68T provides that the parenting order only has effect for the period of the interim protection order or 21 days from the date of the order, whichever is earlier.101 No appeal lies in relation to the revival, variation or suspension of a parenting order in proceedings for interim protection orders.102 In contrast, the Family Law Act does not place a time limit on parenting orders revived, varied, discharged or suspended in proceedings to make or vary a final protection order.

16.106 In all states and territories, a hearing for an interim protection order often occurs in the absence of the respondent and without notifying the respondent.103 In

---

102 Ibid s 68T(2).
103 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 22(3); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 54; Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 39D; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 27; Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 21; Family Violence Act 2004
such cases, each party will have the opportunity to be heard before the court makes a final protection order. The purpose of s 68T, outlined in the Explanatory Memorandum to the Family Law Amendment (Shared Parenting) Bill 2005, is to provide immediate protection for a victim of family violence, but also to ensure that “any changes to family law orders are dealt with in a short period and with due process”. The Explanatory Memorandum stated that the 21 day period would provide parties with an opportunity to make an application to amend the family law orders.

16.107 Previous reviews have identified that the 21 day period to seek orders from a court exercising family law jurisdiction is not practical and does not take account of the workload of federal family courts and delays in listing parenting matters for hearing.105

16.108 The Kearney McKenzie Report considered that a magistrate should have power to make the variation for a period that is long enough to enable the parties to go to a federal family court, and recommended the legislation specify a period of 90 days. The Report acknowledged that this was a long time to bind a person to an order that could not be appealed.106 The Family Law Council did not agree with this recommendation, on the basis that 90 days was too long a period to bind a person to orders which could not be appealed, and which could potentially prevent a parent from spending time with his or her child.107

16.109 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked whether there were practical difficulties associated with obtaining new orders from a court exercising family law jurisdiction within 21 days, and if so, what would be an appropriate time in which such orders could be obtained.108

16.110 The Consultation Paper also noted a comment by the Family Law Council that it would be unlikely that a court would judge a person to be in breach of a parenting order because the parent withheld contact beyond the 21 day period while an application to vary or discharge was awaiting hearing.109 The Commissions asked whether this policy should be reflected in the legislation by amending the Family Law Act to include a defence to a breach of a parenting order in such circumstances.110

Submissions and consultations

16.111 Nearly all stakeholders who responded to these questions agreed that 21 days was an insufficient time to obtain new orders from a federal family court. A number of

---

104 Explanatory Memorandum, Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Bill 2005 (Cth), [60].
107 Family Law Council, Review of Division 11—Family Violence (2004), [41]–[44].
108 Consultation Paper, Question 8–11.
109 Consultation Paper, Question 8–12.
reasons were given, including the time needed to arrange legal aid or other legal advice and the time required to organise evidence and make and serve an application.\textsuperscript{111}

16.112 A number of submissions noted that the time between making an application and the date for a court hearing in the Family Court or Federal Magistrates Court varied depending on the registry and the availability of a judicial officer.\textsuperscript{112} For this reason, stakeholders did not agree on what would be a realistic timeframe to obtain new orders from a federal family court. Some stakeholders considered that the 90 day period recommended in the Kearney McKenzie Report would be realistic.\textsuperscript{113} Others suggested that 40 or 45 days may be appropriate.\textsuperscript{114} NSW Legal Aid suggested that 16 weeks (120 days) reflected the reality of court availability.\textsuperscript{115}

16.113 One effect of this disjunction between the terms of s 68T and the realities of legal practice is the potential to expose a victim of family violence to a threat of further violence. The joint submission from Domestic Violence Victoria and others noted that:

\begin{quote}
Delays in the family court system beyond the control of the client should not in any circumstances lead to further victimisation of that client, and importantly, should never allow a child to be placed in danger because of that delay.\textsuperscript{116}
\end{quote}

16.114 Some stakeholders identified the 21 day limit on the operation of parenting orders varied or suspended during proceedings for interim protection orders as one factor contributing to reluctance to use s 68R.\textsuperscript{117}

16.115 Stakeholders expressed differing views on how best to resolve this issue. Some stakeholders agreed with the Kearney McKenzie Report that the period of time in s 68T should be extended to 90 days.\textsuperscript{118} Others submitted that, rather than extend the time period, courts exercising family law jurisdiction should be adequately resourced \textsuperscript{111} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{113} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{115} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{116} Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010. See also, K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{117} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{118} National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.
to consider the matter within the 21 days currently stipulated. For example, Women’s Legal Service NSW submitted that:

the current timeframe is an appropriate limit on how long a matter involving domestic violence should wait before receiving a first court date, and submit that the family courts should be sufficiently resourced to allow the timeframe to be met.

Other stakeholders supported the idea that there should be a defence to a breach of a parenting order where a parent withholds contact beyond 21 days due to family violence concerns while a variation or suspension of a parenting order made by a state or territory court is awaiting hearing in a federal family court.

However, a number of stakeholders drew attention to s 70NAE(5) of the Family Law Act, which provides that a person has a reasonable excuse for contravening a parenting order if they believed, on reasonable grounds, that not allowing the child to spend time with the other parent was necessary to protect the health or safety of a person.

The Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate submitted that this defence works well because it can be adapted to different circumstances:

If a more specific defence was introduced, a situation might arise in which, for various reasons, a long delay occurs between the making of the protection order and the hearing of an application for variation of a parenting order. The specific defence would mean there would be no consequences for failing to make the child available, regardless of whether or not it was reasonably necessary to protect the health or safety of a person. If the withholding was genuinely necessary to protect the health or safety for person there will be no breach found.

---

120 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.

121 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 179, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 160, 24 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 82, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 48, 14 May 2010.

16.119 Some stakeholders considered that this defence was adequate and should be retained without amendment. The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) noted that, in practice, the 21 day limit is rarely a problem, perhaps because ‘it is recognised that it is reasonable for a person to fail to comply with orders if to comply with them would be putting the person at risk’. Others thought that there may be merit in particularising the situation arising under s 68T as part of the defence. The Magistrates’ Court Victoria expressed concerns about ‘a legislative approach that sanctions a breach of a court’s own order’.

16.120 Finally, the Magistrates’ Court Victoria identified a further limitation to the effectiveness of s 68T of the Family Law Act:

> In Victoria, interim orders are made until further order of the court. This means that a section 68R order is made once at the interim stage and cannot be made again because there is no mechanism for remaking it.

16.121 While there is no barrier to a magistrates court extending the period for a further 21 days when making another interim protection order (providing the other conditions of s 68R are met), if a magistrates court makes an interim order ‘until further order’ it does not need to periodically make new interim orders.

Commissions’ views

16.122 In the Commissions’ view, the policy objective of s 68T is to ensure that parenting orders revived, varied or suspended in proceedings when an interim protection order is made, have effect for a short period of time so that parties have an opportunity to apply to amend the orders, provide further evidence and be heard before a final parenting order is made. However, the Commissions consider that s 68T, by setting an arbitrary and impracticable time limit on the duration of the parenting orders, does not facilitate this policy objective and is at odds with the policy objectives underpinning the Commissions’ recommendations in this Report. Rather than ensuring that parties have an opportunity to be heard, the 21 day time limit means that the amended parenting order expires before the matter is listed before a court.

16.123 Further, the 21 day time limit on parenting orders varied during proceedings for an interim protection order has the potential to expose a victim of family violence to the risk of further violence as the time limit expires and the parenting order reverts to the conditions that placed the victim at risk 21 days earlier. The provision also means that victims of violence are required to engage with two different courts in order to obtain effective protection from family violence.

---

125 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.

127 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

128 Ibid.

129 See Ch 1.
16.124 Earlier in this chapter, the Commissions recommend that the Family Law Act should be amended to allow state and territory courts, when making or varying a family violence protection order, to also make a parenting order. The Commissions recommend that parenting orders made in these circumstances would operate ‘until further order’.

16.125 In relation to s 68T, the Commissions also consider that parenting orders revived, varied or suspended during proceedings for an interim protection order should have effect until a date specified by the court, until the interim protection order expires or ‘until further order’. This means that the judicial officer can manage the case by setting timeframes on both interim protection orders and parenting orders, by notifying the respondent of the order and relisting matters so that parties have an opportunity to obtain legal advice. If necessary, the respondent can challenge the terms of the new parenting order at the next or later hearing of the protection order proceeding.

16.126 Alternatively, the respondent may choose to challenge the new parenting order in a federal family court or make a family law application in the state or territory magistrates court. If the parenting order has been made until further order, the order will operate until the federal family court amends or makes a new parenting order to take account of the changed circumstances. In addition to improved information sharing between state and territory courts and federal family courts, to avoid duplication and inconsistency, the Commissions consider that it would be beneficial if matters in which a parenting order has been made, revived, varied or suspended during proceedings for an interim protection order are given priority in federal family courts. In such cases, family violence is clearly an issue in the proceedings and should be resolved urgently.

16.127 The Commissions consider that, if s 68T is amended to allow parenting orders amended in proceedings for an interim protection order to operate until further order, there is no need for a defence to a breach of a parenting order where a parent withholds contact beyond the 21 day period while an application to vary or discharge is awaiting hearing. The Commissions are of the view that legislation should not sanction a breach of a court’s order—rather the order should be made in such terms that it is possible to comply with. Section 70NAE(5) of the Family Law Act, which provides that a person has a reasonable excuse for contravening a parenting order if they believed, on reasonable grounds that not allowing the child to spend time with the other parent was necessary to protect the health or safety of a person, is a sufficient safeguard.
Recommendation 16–5

Section 68T of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) should be amended to provide that, where a state or territory court, in proceedings to make an interim protection order under state or territory family violence legislation, revives, varies or suspends a parenting order under s 68R, or makes a parenting order in the circumstances set out in Rec 16–3, that parenting order has effect until:

(a) the date specified in the order;
(b) the interim protection order expires; or
(c) further order of the court.

Obligations on state and territory courts making protection orders

16.128 The previous section of this chapter focused on the ability of state and territory magistrates courts to make or amend parenting orders. This section examines the obligations on magistrates when making protection orders, and the extent to which they must take account of current or pending family law orders.

Relevant considerations when making a protection order

16.129 The family violence legislation in all jurisdictions requires courts to consider relevant parenting orders or arrangements when making or varying final or interim protection orders. Some family violence legislation requires the court to consider whether contact between the person protected by the order, or the person against whom an order is made, and a child, is relevant to the making or variation of the order. Other provisions require a court to consider any relevant family law order.

16.130 The Kearney McKenzie Report noted some concerns that such provisions, by requiring a magistrate to consider a parenting order, may lead a court to use the existence of a parenting order to justify not making a protection order. The report stated that:

---

130 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 42(3); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 46C; Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 12(1)(f); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(2); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 18(1); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) ss 31(1), 47(1)(f), 71(1); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 19(2)(a).

131 See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 42(3)(a); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 46(1); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 18(1)(b); Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) ss 31(1), 47(1)(f), 71(1).

132 See, eg, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 42(3)(b); Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 46C(2); Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 12(1)(f); Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(2); Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) s 18(1)(c); Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 19(2)(a).
it is important to remember that State and Territory family violence proceedings are not about ensuring children have contact with both parents; they are about protecting women and children who are at risk of violence at the hands of the respondent.\footnote{Kearney McKenzie & Associates, \textit{Review of Division 11} (1998), [2.15].}

16.131 The Victorian legislation takes a more prescriptive approach than the legislation in other jurisdictions. The \textit{Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic)} requires the court to decide whether or not it will jeopardise the safety of the child or the protected person for the child to spend time or communicate with the respondent to the protection order.\footnote{\textit{Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic)} s 91.} If there is no family law order in place, and the court decides there is no risk to safety, then the court must include conditions in the protection order that arrangements for the child to live with, spend time or communicate with the respondent are to be negotiated and put in writing.\footnote{\textit{Ibid} s 92.} If there is a risk to the safety of the child or the protected person the court must include a condition in the protection order prohibiting the respondent from living with, spending time or communicating with the child.\footnote{\textit{Ibid} s 93.}

16.132 As noted above, the Victorian legislation also requires the court to exercise its powers under s 68R of the \textit{Family Law Act} to revive, vary, discharge or suspend inconsistent parenting orders.\footnote{\textit{Ibid} s 90.} The Commissions note that the majority of protection order proceedings are heard by a magistrates court when there are no family law orders in place, so the circumstances in which a magistrates court would be asked to vary a current parenting order are not common.

16.133 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the view that, while state and territory judicial officers should be aware of, and consider, any parenting orders in order to ensure the orders are consistent, judicial officers should not feel obliged to defer to pre-existing parenting orders where they have the potential to jeopardise the safety of victims of family violence. Where necessary, judicial officers should consider exercising powers under s 68R of the \textit{Family Law Act} to make, revive, vary, discharge or suspend an inconsistent parenting order.

16.134 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the view that there should be a clear policy that state and territory courts hearing protection order proceedings should not significantly lower the standard of protection afforded by a protection order for the purpose of facilitating consistency with a current parenting order. The Commissions asked whether this should be put in legislation or as guidance in relevant court bench books.\footnote{Consultation Paper, Proposal 8–7.}

\textit{Submissions and consultations}

16.135 All stakeholders who commented on this proposal agreed that state and territory courts hearing protection order proceedings should not significantly lower the standard of protection afforded by a protection order for the purpose of facilitating consistency with a current parenting order.139

16.136 Some stakeholders submitted that a legislative provision of this kind is necessary to ensure that state and territory courts make the orders that are necessary and appropriate for the protection of victims of family violence.140 For example, the Queensland Commissioner for Children submitted that:

protection order proceedings need to maintain a protective focus to prevent confusion. Clarity of legislative focus is important to prevent state or territory courts feeling pressured to lower the standard of protection required in an attempt to achieve consistency with a parenting order or to avoid having to vary it.141

16.137 The Law Council of Australia agreed conditionally with the proposal, noting that the court should allow an applicant to request that the protection order does not affect certain matters relating to parenting. In addition, the Law Council submitted that ‘state and territory courts should also be entitled to infer that courts issuing parenting orders have adequately dealt with issues of family violence when making those orders’.142

---

16.138 Some stakeholders considered that this principle should be included in legislation,143 because a legislative provision is a stronger requirement than guidance in bench books.144 While other stakeholders preferred that the principle be included as guidance in court bench books.145 A number of stakeholders submitted that it would be beneficial if the principle was included both in legislation and as guidance in bench books.146 Women’s Legal Services NSW supported both approaches and submitted that while guidance alone was unlikely to be sufficient, guidance would be quicker and easier to implement.147 Some stakeholders considered that training and support for judicial officers and legal practitioners was also important in changing the culture in state and territory courts.148

16.139 A number of submissions noted that, in order for a provision of this kind to be effective, it is also necessary to improve the exercise of the power under s 68R by state and territory courts to amend parenting orders.149

Commissions’ views

16.140 In the Commissions’ view, magistrates courts should consider existing parenting orders to identify any inconsistencies between them and protection orders they propose to make. However, the consideration of parenting order conditions should not cause a state or territory court to lower the standard of protection afforded by the protection order for the purpose of facilitating consistency with the parenting order. Instead, courts faced with making a protection order that is inconsistent with a parenting order should consider whether to make, revive, vary, discharge or suspend the parenting order in accordance with s 68R of the Family Law Act, amended as recommended in this chapter.

143 The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 105, 6 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010.

144 The Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission FV 224, 2 July 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.

147 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.

Accordingly, the Commissions recommend that state and territory family violence legislation should provide that courts should not significantly diminish the standard of protection afforded by a protection order for the purpose of facilitating consistency with a parenting order.

The Commissions acknowledge that, while the practices of state and territory magistrates courts vary, there is a widespread view in the community that some state and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation regularly defer to family law orders. Later in this chapter, the Commissions discuss the importance of providing training and education to judicial officers and the development of materials for inclusion in a bench book to assist judicial officers dealing with matters that raise issues of family violence. As recommended below, bench books should include guidance about the relevant considerations and options available when making protection orders that are inconsistent with current family law orders.

Recommendation 16–6 State and territory family violence legislation should provide that courts not significantly diminish the standard of protection afforded by a protection order for the purpose of facilitating consistency with a parenting order.

Exceptions for court-ordered contact with a child

Some protection orders prohibit a person from communicating with the person protected by the order or approaching or entering particular premises where the person protected lives or works. Protection orders of this kind often include an exception for contact required or authorised by an order made under the Family Law Act. Sometimes, protection orders are made with an exception for ‘child contact’, which encompasses contact with a child where there are no formal arrangements for how contact is to occur between a violent parent and a child. Including an exception of this kind has the potential to compromise the safety of victims of family violence and children, because a person who has used violence may contact and harass the victim on the pretext of spending time with the child.\(^{150}\)

Including an exception for court-ordered contact has the potential to compromise the safety of victims of family violence and their children, particularly when family violence has arisen after family law orders have been made, or when the family court has made interim orders and not yet fully considered allegations of family violence.

In addition, by including an exception for court-ordered contact in a protection order, formal inconsistency between a protection order and a family law order will never arise. In these circumstances, the provisions that require a federal family court to specify and address the inconsistency do not apply.\textsuperscript{151} The Kearney McKenzie Report noted that:

if the Family Court is satisfied that whatever order it makes is not going to be inconsistent with the family violence order and does not consider the violence issue, the outcome may well be that woman and children are left unprotected. This is particularly so at the interim stage because the Court does not have a lot of information. It is not enough merely to eliminate inconsistency; contact orders must not expose people to violence.\textsuperscript{152}

\textbf{16.146} One way to minimise the potential for exceptions in protection orders to lead to a gap in the protection of victims of family violence is for courts exercising family law jurisdiction to consider the issue of family violence, not just issues of inconsistency, as required by the \textit{Family Law Act}.\textsuperscript{153} This issue is discussed in Chapter 17.

\textbf{16.147} However, there is also a concern that state and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation automatically include an exception for court-ordered contact whenever there are family law orders relating to children, or where such orders are pending. In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions discussed some reforms to encourage courts to apply an exception for court-ordered contact only where appropriate.

\textbf{16.148} One option is to ensure that application forms include an option for applicants to indicate their preference that there should be no exception in the protection order for contact required or authorised by a parenting order.\textsuperscript{154}

\textbf{16.149} All application forms for protection orders include an option for applicants to indicate that they seek the protection order to prohibit a person from contacting them. In most jurisdictions, the application forms allow the applicant to select an exception to this prohibition. For example, the Tasmanian application form allows the applicant to select from a range of conditions that the person ‘not approach [the applicant] directly or indirectly including by telephone, email, facsimile or letter’. Applicants can then choose whether to seek an exception ‘for the purpose of contact with the children named above as agreed or as ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction’.\textsuperscript{155} Most other jurisdictions take a similar approach.

\textbf{16.150} In Victoria, the Information for an Application for an Intervention Order form takes a different approach, and asks whether the applicant does or does not believe that the applicant’s own safety, or that of the children will be jeopardised by the children living with, spending time with or communicating with the respondent.\[156\]

\textsuperscript{151} The \textit{Family Law Act} imposes certain requirements on courts when making a parenting order that is inconsistent with a protection order. These requirements are discussed in Ch 17.

\textsuperscript{154} Consultation Paper, Proposal 8–12.

16.151 In contrast, in the Northern Territory, application forms only allow an applicant to select a prohibition on contact that includes, as a matter of course, exceptions for contact in accordance with a parenting plan or family law order.\[157\]

16.152 The second option considered in the Consultation Paper was to remove contact required or authorised by a parenting order from the standard exceptions to prohibited conduct under state and territory protection orders.\[158\]

Submissions and consultations

16.153 Many submissions supported the proposal that application forms should allow applicants to indicate whether they wish to seek an exception to permit contact required or authorised by another court.\[159\] For example, the Queensland Commissioner for Children considered that this would be a ‘helpful prompt for parties and the court in protection order matters to consider the safety implications for existing parenting orders’.\[160\]

16.154 Similarly, a confidential submission noted that:

> It is important that those applying for protection orders are made aware and have the option of expressing their preference that there be no such exception as currently victims of violence are often unaware of the consequences of such an exception or feel compelled to agree to such an exception. Courts should always examine the potential risks associated with making exemptions within protection orders.\[161\]

16.155 However a number of stakeholders cautioned that a court should not overly rely on what is expressed in application forms. One stakeholder noted that too many options on application forms may be confusing for some parties,\[162\] while others stated

\[158\] Consultation Paper, Question 8–13.

\[159\] National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 23 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Justice for Children, Submission FV 148, 24 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 130, 21 June 2010; N Ross, Submission FV 129, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 89, 3 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.

\[161\] Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010.

\[162\] Confidential, Submission FV 183, 25 June 2010.
that it is important for applicants to state why they wish to seek an exception for court ordered contact so the court can make an informed decision.163

16.156 A number of stakeholders emphasised that it is primarily the role of the court to consider the risks of making an exception in a protection order in each particular case.164 Professor Julie Stubbs cautioned that, while allowing applicants to indicate a preference for an exception for contact may be useful, ‘one unintended consequence may be that where no application is made that judicial officers do not consider this issue adequately or at all’.165

16.157 Stubbs also drew attention to the need for any conditions about contact to be clearly set out in the order:

The preferred option is one in which the timing and conditions of any contact that is permitted needs to be specified clearly otherwise police indicate that they cannot determine when a breach occurs. In cases where contact is unsafe, the order should specify that clearly, together with any requirements that contact must occur through a third party or at a supervised contact centre, or that there should be no contact.166

16.158 Some stakeholders considered that contact required or authorised by a parenting order should be removed from the standard exceptions to prohibited contact under state and territory protection orders.167 For example, a confidential submission stated that the presumption, that an exception for court-ordered contact is always appropriate, has become entrenched with the danger that situations where it is not appropriate will be missed. Where the violence is such that contact between children and a violent parent would place the parent or children at risk, inclusion of the exception clause actually indicates the opposite—it that it is envisaged and appropriate that such orders be made. Whether orders are appropriate at a given point in time will be up to the Family Courts if and when an application by the violent parent is made.168

16.159 Other stakeholders opposed removing court-ordered contact from the standard exceptions in a protection order. In particular, a number of stakeholders expressed the view that it was important for the court to consider whether an order

163 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010;
164 National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; J Stubbs, Submission
FV 186, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010; National Council of Single Mothers and their Children Inc, Submission FV 144, 24 June 2010.
166 Ibid.
167 Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 171, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FV 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 162, 25 June 2010; Domestic Violence Victoria, Federation of Community Legal Centres Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre
Victoria, Victorian Women with Disabilities Network, Submission FV 146, 24 June 2010; K Johnstone, Submission FV 107, 7 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission
FV 70, 2 June 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.
prohibiting all contact, or contact with certain exceptions, was appropriate in each particular case.\textsuperscript{169}

16.160 Legal Aid NSW submitted that each case needs to be considered in its particular circumstances and that:

in many cases, the condition provides necessary boundaries and protection for victims whilst facilitating the children having a relationship with the defendant in situations where the victim does not have concerns about the safety of the children spending time with the defendant. This is especially the case if the two sets of orders are made with the other set of orders in mind.\textsuperscript{170}

16.161 Legal Aid NSW noted that, in its experience, an exception for contact as authorised by a parenting order would not be included where there have been serious assaults. It noted that in other cases, such as where there is verbal abuse at changeover, the harm caused by such conduct could be addressed by using another mechanism, such as changeover via a third person or at a contact centre.\textsuperscript{171}

16.162 Women’s Legal Centre ACT also submitted that the matter should be considered on the facts of the case and commented that it is aware of clients who do need to have arrangements for the children in place. Having the exception worded as it is mandates some formal action around arrangements for the children which can provide certainty to both parties whilst still taking into account safety of the victim.

Arguably the prospect of having no arrangements for the children heightens tension and increases the safety risk for women. Simply removing this exception does not address the problem. The issue is having the appropriate parenting orders that properly reflect all safety concerns of women and children.\textsuperscript{172}

16.163 Similarly, Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre noted that:

We speak to some Aboriginal women who say that they want the father/defendant to maintain a relationship with, and have contact with, the children of the relationship. However, these women tell us that they want this to be done in a safe and controlled way.\textsuperscript{173}

\textsuperscript{169} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FV 180, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010; Commissioner for Children (Tas), Submission FV 62, 1 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{170} Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{171} Ibid. See also Law Society of New South Wales, Submission FV 205, 30 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 164, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{172} Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.

\textsuperscript{173} Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010. See also Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010.
Commissions’ views

16.164 The Commissions note the concerns expressed by stakeholders that an exception for contact authorised or required by a family law order is often automatically included in protection orders where children are involved.

16.165 The Commissions are of the view that the exception for court-ordered contact should be retained as an exception that can be included in protection orders but should not be automatically included in all cases. The concern is not that such an exception exists, but that the exception is included without due consideration of the evidence and the safety of all parties. As noted above, state and territory courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation should make orders necessary for the safety of victims of family violence. This includes, where appropriate, making orders that a parent not have contact with a child. In such cases, a state or territory court may also amend a current parenting order using s 68R of the Family Law Act, or make an interim parenting order as recommended in Recommendation 16–3.

16.166 The Commissions consider that application forms that ask the applicant whether he or she wishes the court to make an exception for court-ordered contact with a child in the protection order would encourage the applicant, and the court, to consider the implications of making such an exception or ordering no contact, as the case may be. The Commissions note that the application forms in a number of jurisdictions already ask the applicant if they would like to opt-in to an exception for court-ordered contact in the protection order.

16.167 The Commissions emphasise that amending application forms will not, in itself, change the practices of people involved in family violence proceedings in state and territory magistrates courts. In particular, the Commissions acknowledge that applicants for protection orders may not have received legal advice, are often stressed and may not be able to consider the parenting issues carefully at the time of making an order. Magistrates, court staff and practitioners need to be provided with education, training and resources to consider family violence and family law issues in a way that ensures families are safe from violence. Ways to improve this practice are discussed in the following section of this chapter.

Recommendation 16–7 Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should include an option for applicants to indicate their preference that there should be no exception in the protection order for contact required or authorised by a parenting order made under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

Improving practice

16.168 State and territory magistrates courts, as the first point of contact that most victims of family violence have with the legal system, are in a position to deal with the range of legal issues faced by victims of family violence in an integrated and responsive way. The recommendations made in this chapter are directed towards ensuring that state and territory magistrates courts exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation can also address related family law issues that arise in such proceedings. While the Commissions recommend that the jurisdiction of state and territory courts should be extended so that magistrates may make interim parenting orders in certain circumstances, the majority of the recommendations focus on ways to encourage and facilitate magistrates courts exercising the family law jurisdiction that they already have.

16.169 The Commissions acknowledge that family law is not currently a large practice in many state and territory magistrates courts. As such, the judicial officers, legal practitioners, police prosecutors and others involved in family violence proceedings will require regular training, resources and other support in order to exercise family law jurisdiction in a way that ensures the protection of victims of family violence.

16.170 The Commissions also acknowledge that the capacity of state and territory courts to exercise federal jurisdiction is, to a large degree, governed by funding arrangements. As such, the federal government must play an important role in funding and supporting the exercise of federal family law jurisdiction by state and territory courts. The Commissions consider that while this will have resource implications, it will lead to savings in the long term because people can resolve more of their legal issues in the one court, reducing duplication and further litigation.

Specialised practice

16.171 By expanding the jurisdiction of state and territory magistrates courts to make family law orders in certain circumstances and fostering the use of current family law jurisdiction, the Commissions envisage that state and territory courts will develop or expand specialised practice in family violence. Specialised practice in state and territory magistrates courts will be particularly beneficial to victims of violence, as they are often the first point of contact that separating families with issues of family violence have with the legal system.

16.172 Chapter 32 discusses a number of benefits of specialised courts, or specialised lists within courts including greater understanding and sensitivity about the context of family violence, improved victim support and the development of best practice to address the needs of all participants in the system. In addition, specialised lists can also build cohorts of legal practitioners with specialisation in family violence—rather than a siloed approach in which lawyers specialise in criminal law or family law.

Training and education

16.173 It is clear from submissions and consultations that one of the greatest barriers to state and territory magistrates courts exercising their current jurisdiction under the Family Law Act is a lack of knowledge and experience in family law on the part of judicial officers, legal representatives, police prosecutors and others involved in protection order proceedings.
The importance of training and education has been emphasised in a number of inquiries.\textsuperscript{174} In particular, the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children (National Council) recommended the development of a national education and professional development framework for all people involved in the legal systems that deal with family violence.\textsuperscript{175}

As part of training for judicial officers, the National Council recommended the development of a model bench book that would provide information on the social context and case law relating to family violence and sexual assault.\textsuperscript{176}

In the specific context of the exercise of family law jurisdiction by state and territory courts, the Commissions proposed that the Australian Government—in conjunction with state and territory governments, the National Judicial College of Australia, the Judicial Commission of NSW and the Judicial College of Victoria—should provide ongoing training and development for judicial officers in state and territory courts who hear proceedings for protection orders on the exercise of their powers under the Family Law Act.\textsuperscript{177}

Submissions and consultations

Stakeholders generally supported the need for training and education for judicial officers on the exercise of their family law jurisdiction.\textsuperscript{178} However, some submissions noted that other participants in the legal systems dealing with family violence would also benefit from training. In particular, ensuring that legal practitioners involved in protection order proceedings and police prosecutors had...

\textsuperscript{175} National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Time for Action: The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021 (2009), Rec 4.4.1. Further detail on the recommendations made by the National Council in relation to training and education are discussed in Ch 31.

\textsuperscript{176} Ibid, Rec 4.4.2. This is also discussed in Ch 31.

\textsuperscript{177} Consultation Paper, Proposal 8–13.

knowledge of family law would mean that they are better able to assist the court in the exercise of its family law jurisdiction.\textsuperscript{179}

16.178 In addition to training about relevant family law provisions, some stakeholders submitted that judicial officers and other participants in protection order proceedings should be supported with education about the nature and effect of family violence. For example, Legal Aid NSW and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network submitted that:

judicial officers need to undertake significant domestic violence training to ensure that they understand the complex nature of this violence. This will also ensure consistency across the various jurisdictions and courts. To enable judicial officers to make educated and informed decisions they need to understand the dynamics of domestic violence and the impact of this violence on victims and their children.\textsuperscript{180}

16.179 The Magistrates’ Court Victoria did not consider that the government should provide training and education for judicial officers, and submitted that judicial education should be provided by the courts themselves or educational authorities set up for that purpose.\textsuperscript{181} The Court noted that these colleges provide judicial education on a broad range of jurisdictions and areas of law, and submitted that judicial education in family violence and family law should be supported with ‘national standardised education packages based on sophisticated data and up to date research’.\textsuperscript{182}

16.180 The Magistrates’ Court Victoria and the joint submission from Domestic Violence Victoria and others commented that, in addition to training, judicial officers would benefit from access to a common bench book that included resources and research about the social context of family violence to support effective decision making.\textsuperscript{183}

Commissions’ views

16.181 Training and education of all people involved in family violence matters is essential to efforts to promote the use of the state and territory courts’ family law jurisdiction to improve the safety of victims of family violence.

16.182 The Commissions consider that regular training about the operation of s 68R and any new provisions of the Family Law Act that confer powers on state and territory courts would be particularly useful for judicial officers, legal practitioners and police prosecutors. Such training should also cover the considerations relevant when making protection orders and making or amending a parenting order. Training of this kind would raise awareness of the provisions and build confidence in legal practitioners and judicial officers to use these provisions to seek and make amendments to parenting orders in appropriate circumstances.

---

\textsuperscript{181} Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{182} Ibid.

16.183 The Commissions also consider that judicial officers, court staff, legal practitioners, police and other professionals involved in family violence proceedings should also receive education about the prevalence, nature and effects of family violence. In particular, education programs should focus on the impact of family violence on children and the risk of family violence during contact and handover arrangements, as well as practical safeguards that can be used to ensure that these arrangements do not expose parents and children to family violence.

16.184 Bench books to assist judicial officers are an important part of training and education for judicial officers. Elsewhere in this Report, the Commissions have endorsed the recommendation of the National Council that a model bench book should be produced which would provide information on the social context and case law relating to family violence and sexual assault. Information in bench books could also include guidance for state and territory judicial officers on exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act to ensure that parenting orders and protection orders are consistent and do not compromise the protection of victims of family violence.185

Recommendation 16–8 Australian courts and judicial education bodies should provide education and training, and prepare material in bench books, to assist judicial officers in state and territory courts better to understand and exercise their jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). This material should include guidance on resolving inconsistencies between orders under the Family Law Act and protection orders to ensure the safety of victims of family violence.

Recommendation 16–9 Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate to provide training to practitioners involved in protection order proceedings on state and territory courts’ jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

Personal property directions in protection orders

Overview

16.185 Most state and territory family violence legislation provides for the recovery of personal property. This is usually achieved by giving a court the discretion to include specific conditions in the protection order to deal with property recovery. Similarly, NSW family violence legislation provides that a court may make an ancillary property order when issuing a protection order.186 For the purpose of the

---

184 Recommendation 31–2.
185 See Ch 31.
186 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 37.
following discussion, conditions or orders made to enable a person to recover property in protection order proceedings will be referred to as ‘personal property directions’.

16.186 Personal property directions may be of particular relevance where courts make exclusion orders. As discussed in Chapter 11, exclusion orders are protection orders which include a condition prohibiting a person from entering or approaching the protected person’s residence. State and territory family violence legislation in all jurisdictions except the ACT expressly specifies that exclusion orders may cover a property in which the person against whom the order was made has a legal or equitable interest.

16.187 Most family violence laws provide for a court to make personal property directions permitting an excluded person to gain access to the premises for the purpose of taking personal possessions, often setting out the manner in which property may be recovered or providing for it to occur in the company of police. In Queensland, for example, a court that imposes an exclusion order must consider including another condition allowing the excluded person to recover ‘stated property’.187 In the Northern Territory a right of recovery automatically applies where a court makes an exclusion order in respect of property on which the personal property of an excluded person is located.188

16.188 In NSW and Western Australia, courts may make personal property directions when issuing protection orders that do not include exclusion conditions to enable persons who have used family violence to recover personal property. For example, NSW family violence legislation permits a court that has issued a protection order to make personal property directions to enable a person who has used family violence to remove personal property that has been left at premises occupied by the victim.189

16.189 Most state and territory family violence legislation provides for a court making a protection order to make personal property directions enabling victims to recover property—irrespective of whether the protection orders contain exclusion conditions.190 For example, s 12 of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) provides that a protection order may require a person who has used family violence to ‘return specified personal property to a protected person’, or to ‘allow a protected person to recover or have access to or make use of specified personal property’.

187 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 1989 (Qld) s 25A(3). See also Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 86.
188 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 85.
189 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) s 37. Similarly see Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 13(5).
190 The Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) contains a section dealing with retrieval of an excluded person’s property only. However, return of personal property to a victim or a person who has used family violence is provided as an example of an order that can be made where it is just or desirable. Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) ss 21(1)(c), 85. The Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) provides for the making of personal property directions for the benefit of victims in the context of exclusion orders, but is silent on this issue in relation to protection orders generally. Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 48(3).
The Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) does not expressly cover the recovery of property by either a victim or an excluded person. However, the Justices Act 1959 (Tas) provides for a court to make a personal property direction so that a victim or a person restrained by the order may recover their property.\footnote{Justices Act 1959 (Tas) s 106B(5A).}

In South Australia and the ACT, legislative provisions address the retrieval of property by a victim of violence, not the recovery of property by an excluded person. However, the Australian Government Solicitor has noted that:

\begin{quote}
if the legislation in a particular jurisdiction does not deal expressly with retrieval of personal property, this does not mean that a court would be unable to attach appropriate conditions to an exclusion order—for example, stipulating that a person is excluded from premises but may return at a certain time to collect specified items.\footnote{Australian Government Solicitor, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (2009), [3.2.14].}
\end{quote}

Generally, as state and territory family violence legislation makes clear that judicial officers issuing protection orders are not limited to imposing the standard conditions, judicial officers may make personal property directions not specified by legislation when issuing a protection order—although the Commissions are not aware of whether this occurs in practice.\footnote{Protection order conditions are discussed in Ch 11.}

Types of property subject to personal property directions

Family violence laws in Western Australia and the Northern Territory provide additional details about the type of property which may be taken. A person may recover ‘prescribed property’ pursuant to an order made under the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) including: property used to earn income; personal property of a child of the person; property that is wholly or partly the property of the excluded person that is used by or for his or her child; and property that the victim has agreed that the person can take.\footnote{Restraining Orders Regulations 1997 (WA) reg 13.} Under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT), an excluded person may retrieve personal property including ‘clothes, tools of trade, personal documents and other items of personal effect’.\footnote{Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) s 85(5).}

In some states and territories, family violence laws provide for conditions which may be imposed specifying property that cannot be taken—or must be returned—by an excluded person, or a person who has used family violence. In Victoria, a court may prevent an excluded person from taking ‘the furniture or appliances in the residence that enable the normal running of the home’.\footnote{Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 86(b)(i).} In making a protection order—not necessarily an exclusion order—a Victorian court may direct a person who has used family violence to return not only personal property of the victim and his or her family members, but also personal property belonging to both parties, where that will enable the everyday life of the victim ‘to continue with as little disruption as practicable in the circumstances’.\footnote{Ibid s 86(a).} The Explanatory Memorandum indicated that this provision may apply to ‘basic personal property such as clothes, cooking equipment, a car’.\textsuperscript{198}

16.195 In several jurisdictions, protection orders may impose conditions relating to personal property which is reasonably needed by a victim of family violence. In Western Australia, a court may restrain a person who has used family violence from preventing the victim obtaining and using property reasonably needed by the victim, even if the person who has used family violence is the owner, or has the right to possess the property.\textsuperscript{199} Similarly, ACT legislation provides that an excluded person may be prohibited from taking possession of, or be required to give a victim, personal property that is ‘reasonably needed’ by the victim or a child of the victim.\textsuperscript{200} South Australian family violence legislation also contains such a provision in relation to property reasonably needed by the victim.\textsuperscript{201}

Interaction with federal family court proceedings

16.196 Personal property directions can interact with property proceedings pursuant to the Family Law Act\textsuperscript{202} where they:

- influence future property proceedings under pt VIII of the Family Law Act—for example, where a party gains possession of property pursuant to a personal property direction and no longer needs or wants to contest ownership in the family courts;

- are directly inconsistent with existing property orders made under the Family Law Act; and

- are used as an indication of possessory or ownership rights by a federal family court and thereby have an impact on the outcome of future property proceedings under the Family Law Act.

16.197 Depending on the property that a person who used family violence or a victim obtains through a personal property direction, he or she may not have the need or desire to commence property proceedings in the federal family courts. The likelihood of this occurrence will depend to some extent on the type of property to which access is gained and the ownership or possessory rights. The scope for this to occur will depend on the breadth of personal property directions which may be issued by a state or territory court in exercising jurisdiction under family violence legislation.

16.198 In its report, Apprehended Violence Orders, the NSWLRC recommended that a court could decline to make a personal property direction if it was satisfied that title to the property is genuinely in dispute; or other more appropriate means are \textsuperscript{198} Explanatory Memorandum, Family Violence Protection Bill 2008 (Vic).

\textsuperscript{199} Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) s 13(2)(e).
\textsuperscript{200} Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT) s 48(3).
\textsuperscript{201} Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 12(g). This provision applies where a protection order is made generally—not only where an order contains an exclusion condition.
\textsuperscript{202} Provisions in family violence legislation may also interact with residential tenancy laws. The interaction between such laws is outside the Terms of Reference for this Inquiry.
available for the issue to be addressed. This could include, for example, ongoing property proceedings in a federal family court. No provision to this effect is included in the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW).

Submissions and consultations

Interaction with federal family court proceedings

16.199 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how often persons who have been the subject of exclusion conditions in protection orders or victims of family violence take possession of property which they do not own or have a right to possess, or deny the other person access to property. The Commissions also asked what impact this has on property proceedings or orders relating to property under the Family Law Act.

16.200 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria stated ‘some magistrates have commented they hear about this situation in evidence in contested family violence matters’. However the Law Council of Australia stated that in the experience of members of their Family Law Section, “the improper removal or retention of personal property by a person against whom a personal protection order is made is not a significant problem”.

16.201 A number of stakeholders submitted that the more common problem is the difficulties faced by victims in retrieving their personal property after they have left their home. For example, two women’s legal services commented that victims who have been forced to flee their homes “tell us that they are regularly denied access to or possession of their property”. Stakeholders commented that when victims leave home, they may only take with them limited personal property. The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) stated that this is particularly the case “for victims who flee first, especially in secret, prior to seeking assistance”.

16.202 Victims may have difficulty retrieving ‘identification cards, bank cards, passports’, as well as personal belongings such as clothes and children’s items.

---

204 Consultation Paper, Question 9–6.
205 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
210 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
number of stakeholders commented that persons who use family violence may destroy or dispose of property, or threaten to do so.\textsuperscript{212} In particular, items of sentimental value and clothing may be destroyed.\textsuperscript{213} The Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas) stated that this has a huge impact—in the case of the clothes, the financial impact is enormous because of the cost of replacing new-for-old. This applies also to having to re-furnish and re-equip a house from scratch—it simply does cost much more money to get everything again than the ‘valuation’ of the items.\textsuperscript{214}

16.203 Several stakeholders submitted that victims are cautious not to provoke the person who has used family violence in relation to this issue.\textsuperscript{215} For example, Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW commented that:

\begin{quote}
our clients often state that it is not worth the hassle and opt to ‘keep the peace’ rather than find a way to get the property back.\textsuperscript{216}
\end{quote}

16.204 Women’s Legal Services NSW also stated that once victims leave the home for a safe place away from the person who has used violence, they may no longer be eligible for a protection order where they are not at risk of further violence. Consequently, these victims are unable to obtain personal property directions from state and territory courts.\textsuperscript{217}

16.205 The Queensland Government commented on the consequences of an exclusion order on the person who has used family violence. It stated that feedback received in their consultations for the 2010 review of the Queensland family violence legislation noted that it can be difficult for an excluded person to recover property, particularly where property proceedings are on foot or pending in federal family courts. It stated that ‘a lack of clarity on the entitlement of the parties to remove or retain property can be a source of further conflict’.\textsuperscript{218}

16.206 Another stakeholder expressed concern about excluded persons being deprived of their personal property:

\begin{quote}
where a family violence order is issued without property settlement and the defendant is removed then the defendant suffers serious financial loss.\textsuperscript{219}
\end{quote}

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{212} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{213} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{214} Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{215} Ibid; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{216} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{217} Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{218} Queensland Government, Submission FV 229, 14 July 2010.
\item \textsuperscript{219} A Lamb, Submission FV 121, 16 June 2010.
\end{itemize}
16.207 In relation to the question about the impact that denying a person possession or access to their personal property may have on federal family court proceedings, Women’s Legal Services Australia stated that the inability to gain access to personal belongings can have some practical impact on the ability of family violence victims to achieve a just settlement under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) because they are unable to obtain access to important documents that will assist them in negotiating a fairer property settlement.\textsuperscript{220}

16.208 One stakeholder considered that a victim in these circumstances should be able to resolve their legal matters in the same court, arguing:

  a victim of abuse should NOT be forced to lose all or nearly all of their assets through legal fees just to try and gain what was rightfully theirs in the first place.\textsuperscript{221}

16.209 Some stakeholders also expressed concern that federal family courts are inaccessible to victims of family violence with property matters, particularly when the pool of assets is small, and in some cases ‘may even be just about transferring responsibility for a debt’.\textsuperscript{222} Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW commented that legal aid is generally unavailable for these matters, and lawyers’ costs are ‘prohibitive and disproportionate’.\textsuperscript{223} National Legal Aid and Legal Aid NSW commented that this issue particularly affects their clients from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, who may be unable to represent themselves in property proceedings in federal family courts.\textsuperscript{224}

16.210 Several stakeholders provided case studies which illustrated the lack of practical avenues available for victims to obtain personal property,\textsuperscript{225} such as the following from National Legal Aid:

  The parties were from Iraq. Following family violence the mother and children went to a refuge. When the mother returned to the former matrimonial home (rented accommodation) the father had removed nearly all of their property including the children’s bedding, clothes and toys. The mother had no practical legal remedy.\textsuperscript{226}

\textbf{Types of property subject to personal property directions}

16.211 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions proposed reform to personal property directions to limit their potential effect on proceedings in federal family courts. To this end, the Commissions considered that the types of property subject to personal property directions should be limited. The Commissions proposed that provisions in state and territory legislation dealing with exclusion orders should \textsuperscript{220} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010.

\textsuperscript{221} Confidential, Submission FV 96, 2 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{222} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010. See also National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{223} Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010. See also National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{224} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
\textsuperscript{225} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Centre (ACT & Region) Inc, Submission FV 175, 25 June 2010.
\textsuperscript{226} National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010.
(a) limit the types of property which a court may order an excluded person to recover to clothes, tools of trade, personal documents and other personal effects, and any other items specified by the court; and

(b) provide that in order to recover property should not include items

(i) which are reasonably needed by a victim or a child of the victim; or

(ii) in which the title is genuinely in dispute; and

(c) provide that an order to recover property should not be made where other more appropriate means are available for the issue to be addressed in a timely manner.227

16.212 The Commissions asked if there are other types of property which should, or should not, be subject to recovery by an excluded person—for example, if an excluded person should be able to recover property of his or her child.228

16.213 Most stakeholders who commented agreed with the proposal.229 One community organisation stated that, anecdotally, more property is taken than specified in the proposal, and ‘once gone it can be very difficult to recover’.230 Several stakeholders confirmed that their support—presumably with respect to the limitations proposed—related specifically to circumstances where the person who has used family violence seeks to recover property.231 Women’s Legal Services Queensland—while agreeing with the proposal—commented that there may not be other means to retrieve belongings.232

16.214 The Queensland Law Society provided an alternative view. It submitted that in Queensland, the type of property that may be recovered is necessarily limited by the role of police in personal property directions. It stated that as police are typically very busy,

228 Ibid, Question 9–7.
231 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network, Submission FV 46, 24 May 2010.
the items are only of the kind and nature identified in the Commissions’ proposal. Police do not have the time to ensure that bulky furniture is removed. Similarly, police are insistent that items are available for a child (or retained for the child). Similarly police certainly do not allow for the removal of items where the title is in dispute.233

16.215 The Queensland Law Society argued that personal property directions should be left to judicial discretion, and submitted that:

magistrates do not make orders for the recovery of property if there are other more available and appropriate means for the issue to be addressed in a timely manner.234

16.216 Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW also argued that courts should retain discretion as to the types of property which may be subject to personal property directions. They considered it may be useful for items such as furniture to be subject to personal property directions, if this could finalise property matters between the parties.235

16.217 Several stakeholders supported the provisions in the Victorian family violence legislation.236 The types of property which may be included or excluded in personal property directions in Victoria are discussed above. The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria stated that these provisions in relation to exclusion orders work well.237 The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention Legal Service Victoria commented:

The Victorian legislation specifies what the defendant can’t remove and what must be returned rather than what the defendant can remove which leaves greater discretion to the Court.238

16.218 In relation to the question of whether other property should be included or prohibited from recovery by an excluded person, stakeholders’ responses focused on the property of the child. One legal centre submitted that the excluded person should not be able to recover children’s property when the children were living with the victim.239 Several stakeholders considered that a child’s personal property should be with the person who has care of the child.240 For example, the Law Council of Australia considered that including property of the child in personal property directions for the benefit of an excluded person ‘would have merit in circumstances where the 233 Queensland Law Society, Submission FV 178, 25 June 2010. Women’s Legal Service Qld also commented that Queensland police only permit recovery of property which is not in dispute, when officers accompany a person to collect items—although this may vary with different officers. Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.

235 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
236 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 184, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 173, 25 June 2010.
237 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
240 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FV 185, 25 June 2010.
excluded person has the primary care of that child and the property is necessary for the day to day care of that child’.241

16.219 Legal Aid NSW specified that such recoverable property of the child should include property necessary for a child’s education—such as a computer. It considered that—arguably—a car may also be an example:

A protected person with children may require a motor vehicle to transport children and it may be one of the only assets available.242

16.220 National Legal Aid and the Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy Service Network submitted that an excluded person should not be able to obtain orders to recover pets, where the child is not in their care.243 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Service Inc submitted that—apart from children’s property and the property specified in the proposal—protection order proceedings ‘are not the appropriate forum’ to deal with property disputes.244

16.221 Women’s Legal Services NSW did not express support for such a restriction on property recoverable by an excluded person—reiterating that this is ‘is not a major problem reported by our clients’.245

Commissions’ views

Personal property disputes

16.222 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed preliminary concerns regarding the operation of personal property directions. In particular, the Commissions were concerned that parties, particularly excluded persons, may take advantage of personal property directions to gain possession of property which they do not own, or wrongfully deny the other party access to property—and that this may have an impact on federal family court proceedings. However, stakeholder responses indicate that, in practice, these are not significant problems.

16.223 A related issue which attracted far more stakeholder concern and comment is the absence of practical legal remedies for victims of family violence in resolving disputes regarding personal property. Federal family courts are inaccessible to many persons due to the expense of lawyers, lack of availability of legal aid, and the difficulties of self-representation. Further, initiating proceedings in a federal family court may be a disproportionate measure in the context of a small pool of assets, which may not amount to more than ‘personal property’. For many victims of family violence, personal property directions are the only practical means available of resolving such property disputes.

242 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
243 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Domestic Violence Court Advocacy
244 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
Personal property disputes can escalate tensions between parties following family violence and relationship breakdown—potentially putting victims at further risk. Proceedings provide an accessible and safe forum for victims of family violence to resolve personal property disputes. By addressing ongoing conflict and providing safe procedures around the recovery of personal property, personal property directions may operate to improve the safety of victims of family violence—the key objective of this Inquiry.

Limitations on property subject to personal property directions

For the above reasons, the Commissions consider that restricting the scope of personal property directions may be counterproductive in those cases where parties are unable or unwilling to pursue property matters in federal family courts. The Commissions therefore do not make a recommendation limiting the types of personal property that may be subject to personal property directions to the items proposed, namely: clothes, tools of trade, personal documents and other personal effects. The Commissions note that in some jurisdictions—such as Victoria—the types of property which may be deemed ‘personal property’ is significantly broader, and includes furniture, household appliances and even cars.

The Commissions also proposed to limit recoverable property to ‘items specified by the court’. This is not a limitation on the scope of the property which may be subject to personal property directions—rather, it ensures that a person with a personal property direction may only recover specific items. The Commissions consider that clear and specific personal property directions prevent uncertainty, minimising the potential for conflict between parties and further intimidation of the victim. The Commissions therefore consider that personal property directions made by state and territory courts should be as specific as possible regarding the property that may be recovered.

Family violence legislation already empowers state and territory courts to make personal property directions in specific terms. The Commissions do not consider it necessary to include in family violence legislation provisions limiting property recoverable under a personal property direction to items specified by the court. It is sufficient and appropriate to encourage the making of specific property directions through training and education of judicial officers. Training relating to personal property directions is discussed below.

Property reasonably needed by the victim and property for which title is in dispute

The Commissions consider that in many cases, it will be appropriate for a state or territory court to make personal property directions to ensure that a victim has possession of items they reasonably need—including items belonging to a child of the victim. However, as stakeholders have indicated, it is the lack of means to resolve property disputes that causes practical problems for victims of violence—rather than the content of personal property directions where they are issued. Generally, the Commissions do not have strong views as to whether family violence legislation should specify that certain types of property should, or should not, be subject to recovery by an excluded person under a personal property direction.
The Commissions are of the view that items of property for which title is genuinely in dispute should not be excluded from the scope of personal property directions. As discussed above, the Commissions consider that providing a forum for victims of family violence to resolve disputes about personal property—including disputes about property title—improves the safety of victims, thus facilitating the protective objectives of family violence legislation.

For the above reasons, the Commissions have decided not to recommend that family violence legislation should include provisions providing that personal property directions should exclude items reasonably needed by a victim or a child of the victim, or items in which title is genuinely in dispute.

Personal property directions should not take the place of Family Law Act orders

Where parties have access to federal family courts, property disputes should be resolved in accordance with the dedicated and comprehensive processes pursuant to pt VIII of the Family Law Act, and the specialist expertise of family court judicial officers. The Commissions consider that personal property directions should not generally be made where other more appropriate means are available for the issue to be addressed in a timely manner. Rather, personal property directions should be available to the extent necessary to address the gap in protection for victims of violence who do not have access—or ready access—to other forums.

Again, the Commissions do not consider it necessary to reflect this principle in family violence legislation. The Commissions note the comments of the Queensland Law Society that courts are unlikely to make personal property directions in circumstances where more appropriate forums are available to parties. Further, this issue may be adequately dealt with in judicial education and training. An important benefit of this approach is that it allows room for judicial discretion. For example, in a case where federal family court proceedings are pending, a judicial officer applying family violence legislation may still consider it necessary to make a personal property direction to facilitate a prompt and safe recovery of personal items such as identification and bank cards. State and territory magistrates applying family violence legislation have experience in responding to the immediate safety concerns that underpin their family violence jurisdiction.

To ensure that state and territory courts only make personal property directions where appropriate, courts must have knowledge of orders made in other forums, as well as current and pending proceedings. Strategies to provide state and territory courts with this information are discussed below.

Training

Training of judicial officers and other professionals in relation to improving practice is discussed earlier in this Chapter. The Commissions consider that training should address the making of personal property directions to give effect to the protective objectives of family violence legislation. Training may address the role of personal property directions in resolving ongoing conflict between parties, ensuring property recovery occurs safely—with the involvement of police where necessary, and minimising opportunities for further abuse of the victim through destruction or disposal of personal property.\textsuperscript{246}

Strategies to prevent inconsistencies between orders

16.235 Personal property directions under state and territory family violence legislation may be inconsistent with ownership or possessory rights declared under Family Law Act property proceedings. In accordance with s 109 of the Australian Constitution, when a law of a state is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth which is intended to cover the field, the latter shall prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

16.236 South Australian family violence legislation contains provisions to minimise the occurrence of inconsistencies between federal family court orders and personal property directions. The Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) expressly requires courts issuing personal property directions to take into account any agreement or order for the division of property under the Family Law Act of which it has been informed.\textsuperscript{247}

16.237 Under s 20 of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA), an applicant for a protection order must inform the court of any agreement or order for the division of property under the Family Law Act, or any pending application for such an order.\textsuperscript{248} However, there is no specific question in relation to property orders on the application form for a protection order in the Magistrates Court of South Australia.\textsuperscript{249}

16.238 No other state or territory family violence legislation expressly requires an applicant for a protection order to inform the court about any property order under pt VIII of the Family Law Act, or pending proceedings for such an order, nor do any application forms expressly seek this information.

Submissions and consultations

16.239 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions set out two proposals to assist state and territory courts making protection orders to obtain information about, and consider, property orders made under the Family Law Act—thus avoiding inconsistencies between orders. These proposals were as follows:

- state and territory family violence legislation should require applicants for protection orders to inform the courts about and courts to consider, any \textsuperscript{246} Damage to property as a form of family violence is discussed at Ch 5.

\textsuperscript{247} Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) s 10(2)(c). This section also requires courts to take into account agreement or orders for the division of property under the Domestic Partners Property Act 1996 (SA).

\textsuperscript{248} Section 20 of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) also requires applicants to inform the court of any agreement or orders for the division of property under the Domestic Partners Property Act 1996 (SA).

agreement or order for the division of property under the Family Law Act, or any pending application for such an order; and

- application forms for protection orders in family violence proceedings should clearly seek information about any agreement or order for the division of property under the Family Law Act or any pending application for such an order.

16.240 Stakeholders who commented on these proposals overwhelmingly expressed their support. For example, the Queensland Law Society stated that:

> there should be as much openness as possible for those who come to court seeking orders and in the court being aware of such orders so as to minimise conflict between protection orders and property settlement orders under the Family Law Act.

16.241 Women’s Legal Service Queensland submitted that the kinds of disclosure required by state and territory legislation of applicants, and prompted on forms, should be limited to relevant property, specifically, ‘personal items and chattels rather than the whole property settlement, unless that is relevant’. Similarly, National Legal Aid and Legal Aid NSW supported the proposed legislative requirement of applicants only where an agreement or order for division of property is relevant to the protection order.

16.242 Several women’s legal services, while supporting the proposals, expressed some concerns about their operation. Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Service Inc pointed out that ‘some applicants may not be aware of the progress of their family law matter’. Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW stated that they are

---

255 National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.

256 Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, Submission FV 212, 28 June 2010.
concerned that awareness of potential or actual property proceedings under the Family Law Act might result in state or territory courts electing to refrain from making ancillary property orders. It is important to ensure that property will still be recovered with police assistance when required.257

16.243 With respect to the proposed changes to application forms, Women’s Legal Services NSW considered that adding more questions may make the forms ‘more long and complex, particularly for many of our clients who are from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds’.258

16.244 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria did not consider the proposed reforms necessary. It commented that while information sharing is important, ‘such information may be of limited assistance to decision making in relation to family violence protection issues’.259

Commissions’ views

16.245 Personal property directions made under state and territory family violence legislation may conflict with existing orders of a federal family court made under pt VIII of the Family Law Act. This is likely where a court is not informed about the existence of such orders. Inconsistencies between orders may cause uncertainty and increase tensions between parties. Accordingly, there should be strategies in place for courts making protection orders to obtain information about, and consider, property orders made under the Family Law Act, and pending proceedings for such orders.

16.246 The Commissions consider that application forms for protection orders should clearly ask about the existence of orders for the division of property under the Family Law Act, or pending applications for such orders. However, the Commissions do not recommend imposing a legal obligation on applicants to inform courts about Family Law Act property orders and proceedings. The Commissions note the concerns of Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc that some applicants may be unaware of the details of their federal family court matter. Imposing a legal obligation to provide information may disadvantage persons from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, persons with a disability, and unrepresented applicants. The Commissions consider it sufficient—and more effective—to clearly prompt disclosure of Family Law Act property orders and proceedings in application forms.

16.247 The Commissions consider that another effective strategy to ensure courts are aware of federal family court orders and proceedings regarding property is to place an obligation on state and territory courts to request this information when making a personal property direction. Additionally, the Commissions recommend elsewhere in this Report that state and territory courts should be given access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal.260 This will enable state and territory courts issuing personal property

---

257 Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.
259 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
260 Rec 30–8.
directions to obtain accurate information about property orders under the Family Law Act, as well as pending proceedings.

16.248 The above strategies ensure that state and territory courts applying family violence legislation can make informed determinations in relation to personal property directions, thereby avoiding the potential for inconsistency between personal property directions and federal family court orders. Further, these strategies parallel those recommended by the Commissions in relation to the interaction of parenting orders and protection orders in Chapter 30.261 If both sets of reforms are implemented, this will provide a consistent and effective approach for state and territory courts to obtain information about relevant federal family court proceedings relating to both property and parenting matters when making decisions under family violence legislation aimed to improve safety of victims and their children.

16.249 The Commissions note the concerns of two women’s legal services that state and territory courts may decline to issue personal property directions where they are made aware of pending or concurrent property proceedings in federal family courts. As discussed above, the Commissions consider that, while personal property disputes should generally be resolved in federal family courts where this option is available, judicial officers should retain discretion to make personal property directions where necessary to address a gap in protection. The Commissions consider that the issues raised by the women’s legal services may be addressed in judicial education and training.

Impact on future federal family court proceedings

16.250 The reforms discussed above create strategies to avoid inconsistencies between personal property directions made under family violence laws and existing Family Law Act orders. Sections 87 and 88 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) address the potential repercussions of personal property directions on any future Family Law Act proceedings—including the effect of inconsistency between orders. Section 87 provides:

1. The power … to include a condition relating to personal property in a family violence intervention order is subject to any order to the contrary made by the Family Court, or another court or a Tribunal with relevant jurisdiction to adjudicate in property disputes.

2. To the extent of any inconsistency between a condition relating to personal property in a family violence intervention order and an order made by the Family Court, another relevant court or a relevant Tribunal the order of the Family Court, other relevant court or relevant Tribunal prevails.

261 Recs 30–6 and 30–7.
The Explanatory Memorandum advises that the purpose of s 87 is to:

ensure that property disputes can be resolved in the appropriate jurisdiction and any condition imposed by a family violence intervention order applies in the absence of, or prior to, any determination of the property rights of the parties.262

Section 88 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) specifies that a condition relating to personal property in a protection order does not affect any rights the protected person or excluded person may have in relation to the ownership of the property. The Explanatory Memorandum notes that this could be an issue, for example, if the court orders that an excluded person’s refrigerator is to remain in the residence under an exclusion condition. In accordance with the section, the excluded person will still own the refrigerator and a federal family court will be able to take this into account in a division of property in association with divorce proceedings.263

Similarly, the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) provides that a personal property direction does not confer a right to take property that a person does not own or have a legal right to possess.264 The Justices Act 1959 (Tas) provides that a protection order that affects possession of, or access to, premises or property does not affect any legal or equitable interest that any person holds in the premises or property.265

Submissions and consultations

In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions made two proposals in relation to the interaction of personal property directions and future federal family court property proceedings:

- state and territory family violence legislation should provide that personal property directions made in protection order proceedings are subject to orders made by a federal family court or another court responsible for determining property disputes;266 and
- state and territory family violence legislation should provide that personal property directions do not affect ownership rights.267

The Commissions proposed that the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) should be referred to as a model, pursuant to ss 87 and 88 respectively.

Both proposals received widespread support from those stakeholders who commented.268 The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court of Victoria considered 262 Explanatory Memorandum, Family Violence Protection Bill 2008 (Vic).

263 Ibid.
264 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) a 67(4).
265 Justices Act 1959 (Tas) s 106B(5B).
268 The following stakeholders supported both proposals: Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FV 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FV 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FV 225, 6 July 2010; Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; Wirringa Baiya Aboriginal Women’s Legal Centre Inc, that these provisions work well in Victoria. 269 The Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian—in support of the proposals—stated that ‘protection order proceedings should only deal with property issues to the extent necessary to give effect to the protective objectives of family violence legislation’. 270

Commissions’ views

16.257 Issues of ownership may be somewhat uncertain in the context of acquisition of personal property following relationship breakdown. The recommended approach leaves the resolution of such matters open where necessary, while providing immediate solutions regarding access to designated property in response to the safety concerns of victims.

16.258 Personal property directions may have repercussions for subsequent property proceedings in a federal family court. For example, where an order provides for furniture belonging to an excluded person to remain with the victim, there is scope for this to be put forward as a victim’s ‘property’ for the purpose of a declaration under s 78 of the Family Law Act. As discussed, where parties have access to federal family courts for the purpose of resolving property disputes, it is not appropriate for protection order proceedings to take the place of the dedicated processes set out in pt VIII of the Family Law Act.

16.259 Accordingly, the Commissions recommend a clear legislative statement in the family violence laws of each state and territory that a condition relating to personal property in a protection order does not affect any rights the victim or person who has used violence may have in relation to the ownership of the property. Section 88 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) should be referred to as a model in this regard.

16.260 The Commissions further consider that even though the overriding effect of federal family court property orders is a clear consequence of s 109 of the Australian Constitution, family violence legislation should articulate the effect of inconsistent orders. Provisions in family violence legislation which mirror the constitutional principle play an important educative role. Such provisions clarify that personal property directions apply ‘in the absence of, or prior to, any determination of the property rights of the parties’, as stated in the Explanatory Memorandum for the Victorian family violence bill. The Commissions therefore recommend that family violence legislation should include provisions to the effect that a personal property direction in a protection order is subject to any order to the contrary made by a federal family court. Section 87 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) provides an instructive model.

---

269 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.

Recommendation 16–10 Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should clearly seek information about property orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) or any pending application for such orders.

Recommendation 16–11 State and family violence legislation should require courts, when considering whether to make personal property directions in protection order proceedings, to inquire about and consider any property orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), or pending application for such orders.

Recommendation 16–12 State and territory family violence legislation should provide that personal property directions made in protection order proceedings are subject to orders made by a federal family court or other court responsible for determining property disputes.

Recommendation 16–13 State and territory family violence legislation should provide that personal property directions do not affect ownership rights.
17. Family Law Interactions: Jurisdiction and Practice of Federal Family Courts

Contents

Introduction 757
Consideration of protection orders and family violence 758
  The best interests of the child 758
  Ensuring orders do not expose a person to a risk of family violence 768
  Parenting orders made by consent 774
  Parenting orders made in interim proceedings 777
  Relocation and recovery orders 779
  Property proceedings 791
Injunctions for personal protection 796
  Protection orders and injunctive relief 796
  Injunctions available under the Family Law Act 796
  Use of Family Law Act injunctions in practice 799
  Increasing the effectiveness of injunctions for personal protection 802
  Interaction between Family Law Act injunctions and protection orders 813
  Inconsistencies between Family Law Act injunctions and protection orders 816
  Injunctions to relieve a party to a marriage from rendering conjugal rights 822
Hague Convention 824
  Principle of prompt return 824
  Exceptions 825
  Conditions on orders 825

Introduction

17.1 In Chapter 16, the Commissions examine the way in which state and territory courts, when making protection orders under family violence legislation, consider parenting orders made under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). This chapter focuses on how federal family courts consider and address issues of family violence when making various kinds of orders under the Family Law Act.

17.2 The Commissions note that the Family Courts Violence Review, undertaken by Professor Richard Chisholm (the Chisholm Review), examined how federal family courts identify and respond to issues of family violence in family law proceedings. As the Terms of Reference for this Inquiry direct the Commissions not to duplicate this work, this chapter limits the discussion of the Chisholm Review to matters concerning the interaction in practice between state and territory family violence laws and the Family Law Act.

---

1 R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009). Chapter 1 sets out the background to the Chisholm Review.

17.3 The first part of this chapter examines how federal family courts respond to protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation when determining what is in a child’s best interests, and when ensuring that parenting orders, including relocation and recovery orders, do not expose a parent or child to an unacceptable risk of family violence. This section also briefly discusses the consideration of family violence when making orders under the Family Law Act for the distribution of property.

17.4 The second part of this chapter considers ways in which federal family courts can make orders for the personal protection of victims of family violence in family law proceedings. The final part of the chapter considers the interaction between protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation and recovery orders under div VII of the Family Law Act or the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention), as implemented by the Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations 1987 (Cth).

Consideration of protection orders and family violence

17.5 The Family Law Act provides that protection orders made under state and territory legislation are relevant to two aspects of decision making about parenting orders:

- when determining what orders are in the child’s best interests pursuant to s 60CC; and
- when ensuring that a parenting order is consistent with a protection order and does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence pursuant to s 60CG.

The best interests of the child

17.6 Section 60CC of the Family Law Act sets out ‘primary’ and ‘additional’ considerations that a court must have regard to when determining what is in a child’s best interests. The two ‘primary considerations’ are the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both parents, and the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm from being subjected or exposed to abuse, neglect or family violence.2

---

2 See Ch 1.
4 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC(2).
17.7 Two of the ‘additional considerations’ also refer to family violence. The court must consider:

(a) any family violence involving the child or a member of the child’s family;
(b) any family violence order that applies to the child or a member of the family, if:
   (i) the order is a final order; or
   (ii) the making of the order was contested by a person.

17.8 Prior to amendment in 2006, s 68F of the Family Law Act—the former equivalent to s 60CC—directed the court to consider any protection order that applied to the child or a member of the child’s family. Section 60CC(3)(k) now specifies the kinds of protection orders a federal family court can consider when determining what is in a child’s best interests. A court can consider any final protection order—including final orders made by consent, with or without admissions, or uncontested—or any order made after a contested hearing, including both final and interim orders. These amendments were intended to ‘ensure that the court does not take account of uncontested or interim family violence orders’ in order to ‘address a perception that violence allegations are taken into account without proven foundation in some family law proceedings’.5

Concerns about the practical effect of s 60CC(3)(k)

17.9 There are three key practical issues with the operation of s 60CC(3)(k)—first, the weight to be given to protection orders of themselves when determining what is in a child’s best interests; secondly, how the provision affects practices of litigants in protection order proceedings in state and territory courts; and thirdly, how these issues are considered and managed by family lawyers.

17.10 There are different views about the role of protection orders in the assessment of the risk of family violence in determining a child’s best interests in the context of parenting orders. The Chisholm Review described this issue as follows:

By including [protection] orders in this list of matters relevant to the assessment of children’s interests, it might be taken as suggesting that the order itself is a factor that should be taken into account. It then partly retreats from that suggestion by excluding interim and non-contested orders. The rationale is, obviously, that it may be wrong to infer from the making of such orders that there is a risk of violence. But is the implication that the court should infer that there is a risk of violence from the making of final and contested orders?6

17.11 Chisholm was concerned about the weight to be given to the orders of themselves in the particular context of parenting orders.

17.12 Some stakeholders expressed the view that courts, when determining the best interests of a child, should give greater weight to the fact that one of the parties has a

---

5 Explanatory Memorandum, Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Bill 2005 (Cth), [67].
6 R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), 139.
protection order. For example, Women’s Legal Services Australia, in a submission to the Chisholm Review, stated that:

In combination with the affidavit evidence of the nature and extent of the violence, judges should also be encouraged to consider [protection orders] as good evidence of the existence of domestic violence. It is unacceptable that orders granted by a jurisdiction to protect the lives of people who have experienced violence not be taken into account in a jurisdiction that, on the balance of probabilities, is charged with the responsibility to determine what parenting arrangements are in the best interests of children.

17.13 A study by Professor Patrick Parkinson and others (the Parkinson Study), released after the Chisholm Review, on the use of protection orders during post-separation conflict, raised questions about the connection between the fact a person has a protection order and the risk of family violence. The study found that:

[w]hile applicants reported a valid legal basis for applying for family violence orders, orders were also sought for ‘collateral purposes’ such as determining the occupancy of the home on separation or maintaining boundaries between newly separated parents. In certain cases they were used as well for purposes connected with the family law dispute, on legal advice.

17.14 However, other studies show that victims of family violence only apply for protection orders as a last resort. The risk of family violence increases at the time of separation, and this risk is heightened when parents meet to facilitate children spending time with each parent, for example during handover arrangements. In a 2003 study, Kaye and colleagues found that most women who have experienced family violence still want their children to have some contact with the other parent, but seek arrangements which ensure the safety of both themselves and their children.

17.15 There are concerns that s 60CC(3)(k) of the Family Law Act affects the practices of litigants in state and territory courts. In particular, there is a view—note in the Parkinson Study and in some consultations and submissions to this Inquiry—that some applicants seek protection orders in order to gain a strategic advantage in family law matters; and some respondents consent without admissions to the protection order as a tactic to exclude consideration of the protection order in pending family law matters. As noted in a submission by the Peninsula Community Legal Centre, ‘this practice is concerning as it has the potential to reduce the potency of family violence protection orders and devalue their impact before the federal family courts’.

---

7 Comment on ALRC Family Violence Online Forum: Women’s Legal Service Providers.

Options for reform

17.16 The Parkinson study suggested that consideration should be given to removing the references to protection orders in s 60CC(3)(k) of the Family Law Act. Given that the list of considerations in s 60CC already refers twice to family violence, the authors considered that the additional reference in s 60CC(3)(k) to protection orders was ‘superfluous’. Instead, ‘[w]hat the court will really be concerned with is the substance of the matters with which the [protection order] sought to deal’.

17.17 The Chisholm Review also emphasised that the court must consider the actual risk of family violence:

> the law should do everything possible to enable the court to know about current family violence orders, so it can avoid making orders that inadvertently clash with them. Otherwise what is important is that the court should learn about the factual circumstances that might suggest a risk to the child or other person, regardless of what was the basis of a previous family violence order. As one legal submission pointed out, ‘It is the underlying allegations that are far more important to the Court in determining the case than the existence or otherwise of an order’.

17.18 The Chisholm Review concluded that the law should ‘avoid creating an impression that the Family Court will draw adverse inferences from the [protection] order itself, rather than on the evidence put before the Family Court’.

17.19 As discussed in Chapter 16, the Chisholm Review made several recommendations aimed at improving the way in which federal family courts consider allegations of family violence. In particular, the Chisholm Review recommended that the Family Law Act should list a range of factors that a court must take into account when considering the making of parenting orders. Rather than expressly listing family violence, courts would be required to consider, among other things, the child’s ‘safety, welfare and wellbeing’ when making parenting orders. Parents, advisers and courts would then be encouraged to consider the arrangements that are best for the child in each particular case. The Chisholm Review concluded that, if such reforms were adopted, there would be no need for s 60CC(3)(k) of the Family Law Act.

17.20 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions expressed the view that the distinction made in s 60CC(3)(k) between considering final or contested protection

---

17 Ibid, 140.
19 Ibid, 140, Rec 3.4.
orders on the one hand, and interim or uncontested orders on the other, should be removed. The Commissions proposed two options for reform, both of which would remove express reference to protection orders per se and instead focus on the fact of family violence.

17.21 The first option is to remove consideration of protection orders from s 60CC altogether and, instead, rely on a general consideration of family violence when determining what is in a child’s best interests.20 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions noted that, when considering family violence, a family court would be permitted—but not required—to consider any protection order, along with other evidence of family violence on a case-by-case basis. The Commissions noted, however, that a potential disadvantage of this approach may be to decrease the visibility of family violence as a factor in making parenting orders.

17.22 The second option is to include a reference to protection order proceedings, in recognition that many victims of family violence have sought protection orders prior to commencing family law proceedings. This option would require courts to consider any family violence when determining what is in the best interests of a child, but also direct the court to consider any evidence of family violence given in protection order proceedings.21 While the policy approach is similar to the first option, the Commissions expressed the preliminary view that framing the consideration in this way may highlight more clearly the weight that courts making parenting orders can give to evidence of violence given in protection order proceedings.

Submissions and consultations

17.23 Most stakeholders who commented on this proposal supported the second option, that is, amending s 60CC(3)(k) to provide that any family violence, including evidence of such violence given in any protection order proceeding, is an additional consideration when determining the best interests of a child.22

---

21 Consultation Paper, Proposal 8–5(b).
17.24 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse preferred this option because ‘it highlights and validates the outcomes of protection order applications’. 23 Other stakeholders noted that removing the express reference to protection orders from s 60CC may decrease the visibility of family violence. 24 For example, Women’s Legal Services NSW submitted that:

> Directing judicial officers to consider protection orders as one of the best interest factors avoids the potential situation where a judicial officer does not give any weight at all to the existence of a protection order. Clients have reported ... that some judicial officers see protection orders as easy to obtain or as a tactical move for family law proceedings. In combination with the affidavit evidence of the nature and extent of the violence, judicial officers should be encouraged to consider protection orders as good evidence of the existence of family violence. 25

17.25 There was also support for removing the distinctions currently made between interim and final protection orders and between contested orders and orders by consent. 26 The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse noted that removing this distinction would enable > the introduction of other evidence from victims who have been issued with orders arising from cross-applications, as well as other evidence from health care providers, counsellors, refuge workers etc which should be similarly weighted in adducing the factual basis of domestic violence allegations. 27

17.26 Similarly, the Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian supported removing the exclusion of interim and uncontested orders on the basis that courts should be free to explore any allegations of family violence in order to properly assess if there is a risk to the child. 28

17.27 A number of stakeholders expressed support for the proposal’s focus on the evidence of family violence that lies behind the protection order, regardless of the type of protection order that has been made. 29 A confidential submission noted that a federal family court > needs to inform itself fully of any acts of violence, particularly where they are occurring as part of a context of power and campaign of controlling behaviour. Where Confidential, Submission FV 81, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 71, 1 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FV 70, 2 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FV 69, 2 June 2010; Queensland Commission for Children and Young People and Child Guardian, Submission FV 63, 1 June 2010; P Easteal, Submission FV 40, 14 May 2010.

23 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Submission FV 216, 30 June 2010.

17.28 However, Women’s Legal Services NSW submitted that, when a protection order is made by consent, evidence of the family violence may be limited to the order itself:

many protection orders are consented to because there is little chance the defendant would succeed if the application proceeded to hearing due to the police being able to obtain sufficient evidence of the violence. This means that many of the most serious cases of family violence would involve protection orders made by consent. Unfortunately, as a result of the defendant consenting to the protection order, the police may not investigate further so evidence from witnesses is not obtained. This means that the protection order itself will often be the main contemporaneous evidence available to the judicial officer when determining subsequent parenting proceedings.31

17.29 The Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria supported the second option, but proposed that it be amended to ensure that findings by a state or territory court hearing an application for a protection order that there has been family violence, as well as evidence given during such proceedings, are taken into account by a court when considering the child’s best interests:

For example, where a court of summary jurisdiction has found, after a contested hearing, that the test for a protection order has been met (that is that the respondent has committed family violence against the affected family member and is likely to do so again) then the court exercising family law jurisdiction should be able to give this due consideration. It is particularly important that if family violence matters have been litigated that they are not re-litigated in another proceeding. Where family violence is at play such re-litigation can be a tactic of further abuse.32

17.30 Legal Aid NSW also supported the second option but proposed that the amendment make clear that the provision covers any family violence involving the child or a member of the child’s family.33

17.31 Some stakeholders noted that protection orders and evidence of family violence given in protection order proceedings may already be considered by a federal family court when determining a child’s best interests. In their submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate noted that s 60CC(3)(m) of the Family Law Act allows courts to consider ‘any other fact or circumstance’ when deciding what parenting arrangements would be in the best interests of a child, and this could include evidence that an interim or uncontested family violence order was made.34 In addition, the Shared Parenting Council of Australia noted that s 60CC(3)(j) permits a court to take account of any family violence involving the child or a member of the child’s family, which ‘seems to imply that affidavit evidence and any other

32 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010.
33 Legal Aid NSW, Submission FV 219, 1 July 2010.
available evidence could be put forward, even where, for example, the family violence order is only an interim order made ex parte or by consent.35

17.32 In their joint submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate stated that they would not support any proposal to amend the Family Law Act to include a requirement that family courts take family violence orders into account as evidence of continuing risk, without any independent judicial consideration of the existence, degree or magnitude of that risk.36

17.33 Rather, they expressed a preference for the recommendation made in the Chisholm Review to omit any specific reference to protection orders in s 60CC(3) and instead refer to a child’s safety and wellbeing, on the basis that this appropriately directs the court consider the factual circumstances that might suggest a risk to the child (including risk to a parent), rather than to the fact that a family violence order was in place at some point in time.37

17.34 Although expressing this preference, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate considered that it was a ‘logical approach’ to remove the reference to final and contested protection orders in s 60CC(3)(k). They noted that this would be consistent with div 12A of the Family Law Act and the principles for conducting child-related proceedings, whereby all evidence is conditionally admitted and given the weight considered by the court to be appropriate in the circumstances, having regard to the entirety of the evidence before the court.38

17.35 A number of stakeholders expressed concerns about the potential implications of this proposal on the operation of state and territory protection order regimes. A confidential submission cautioned that there are risks in using protection orders for too many collateral purposes, submitting that:

The purpose for which family violence orders ought to be available is to protect people from violence and intimidation. Care must be taken as far as possible, to remove incentives for them to become weapons in a wider conflict between parents following an unhappy breakup.39

17.36 Concerns were also expressed that such an amendment may reduce the number of protection orders made by consent.40 For example, Women’s Legal Services NSW noted that:

Presently, defendants are advised of the implications of s 60CC(3)(k) and WLS NSW understands that some defendants choose not to contest the protection order on the basis of this advice. Accordingly, there is a risk that by amending this section to 37 Ibid.

38 Ibid.
include all protection orders, there may be an increase in the number of orders being contested.41

17.37 The Law Council of Australia did not support this proposal, citing concerns about the effect on protection order proceedings:

Protection orders, especially interim protection orders, should be readily obtainable without serious investigations into the truth or otherwise of the allegation. Interim protection orders do nothing more than provide a conservative, protective approach to domestic violence allegations. Protection orders generally should not be determinative of parenting orders unless evidence is led in parenting proceedings detailing the domestic violence alleged. Creating situations by which parenting order litigants can manipulate the process by bringing spurious protection order applications will result in a dramatic increase in spurious protection order cross-applications.42

Commissions’ views

17.38 The distinction made between interim or uncontested orders on the one hand, and final or contested orders on the other, of itself does not reflect the many reasons interim orders do not progress to a final hearing, or the fact that protection orders may be made by consent. An interim protection order may be made for a number of reasons that do not reflect the level of risk, or evidence, of family violence. For example, judicial officers may make interim protection orders until related criminal proceedings are resolved. Similarly, a protection order may be made by consent without admissions so as not to prejudice current or pending criminal proceedings. The Commissions therefore consider that there is no principled basis to exclude these kinds of protection orders, merely because of their form, from consideration by federal family courts determining issues of family violence.

17.39 A state or territory court may make a protection order on the basis of findings that there has been, or there is a risk of, family violence. A court may also make a protection order without making any findings where both parties consent to the order. As such, the Commissions consider that protection orders should not be included as a separate factor to be considered by a court when determining the best interests of the child. Rather, a protection order should act as a flag to parties, their representatives and the court that there may be issues of family violence that should be considered by the court when determining the best interests of the child.

17.40 As noted by a number of stakeholders, when determining what is in the best interests of a child, a court must consider all evidence of family violence and give appropriate weight to that evidence. The legislative guidance in s 60CC(3)(k) of the Family Law Act—which suggests that some, but not all, protection orders are relevant to determining a child’s best interests—is misleading, in that it suggests that courts give more or less consideration to various kinds of protection orders, rather than looking behind those orders to consider all the evidence regarding the nature, impact and risk of past or future family violence. The fact that a victim of family violence has a protection order may be one element in the evidence that a party provides to a family court to support allegations of family violence in the context of consideration of parenting orders. Other evidence could include, for example, affidavit or oral evidence from the victim, statements from police or other witnesses, doctors’ reports or information provided by a child protection agency, and transcripts of magistrates court proceedings, where available.

41 Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FV 182, 25 June 2010.

17.41 The Commissions note the recommendations of the Chisholm Review which would effectively remove any specific reference to protection orders or family violence from the list of matters that a court must consider when determining what is in a child’s best interests. However, given the prevalence of family law matters that raise issues of family violence, and in the light of the consultations and submissions made in the course of this Inquiry, the Commissions are of the view that the considerations for determining what is in a child’s best interests should expressly refer to any family violence involving the child or a member of the child’s family. The Commissions therefore go further than the Chisholm Review in this regard.

17.42 The Commissions also consider that it is important to recognise that, in many cases in which family violence is an issue, a victim of family violence will often have sought a protection order from a state or territory magistrates court. The court making the protection order, will, in many cases, have considered evidence provided by the parties in support or opposition to the order, such as affidavits or oral testimony. Directing a court to consider that evidence—in addition to any other evidence of family violence given in the family law proceeding—will minimise the duplication of evidence and the need for victims of family violence to retell their stories in different courts.

17.43 In some cases, a state or territory magistrates court may also have made findings after a contested hearing that there has been family violence and there is a risk of further family violence. While it is up to the court to determine what weight to give to such evidence, the Commissions consider that such findings should be given due consideration by a family court determining what is in the best interests of the child when making a parenting order. This also avoids the prospect of the issue of family violence being re-litigated where a court has already made findings of violence.

17.44 While they overlap and interact in varying ways, protection orders and parenting orders fulfil two distinct purposes—and the issues are often considered at different times, possibly at considerable remove from each other. The focus of protection order proceedings must be the protection of persons who are at risk of family violence. State and territory magistrates courts only make family violence protection orders when satisfied, on the evidence, that the grounds for making the protection order are met. As part of this process, such courts assess the person’s risk of family violence and make appropriate orders. If an application for a protection order does not meet these grounds, the court dismisses the application. Family law proceedings for parenting orders must focus on the parenting arrangements that are in the best interests of the child—and at the time that such matters are being considered, which may be much later than any proceedings for protection orders in the magistrates courts.
The Commissions are of the view that the Family Law Act should be amended to direct courts, when determining the best interests of a child, to consider any family violence involving the child or a member of the child’s family—including evidence given, or findings made, in any protection order proceeding. This amendment may also go some way to address the perception that the mere fact that a person has a protection order is, of itself, critical to the outcome of parenting matters.

Recommendation 17–1 The ‘additional consideration’ in s 60CC(3)(k) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), which directs courts to consider only final or contested protection orders when determining the best interests of a child, should be amended to provide that a court, when determining the best interests of the child, must consider evidence of family violence given, or findings made, in relevant family violence protection order proceedings.

Ensuring orders do not expose a person to a risk of family violence

Inconsistency between parenting orders and protection orders may occur, for example, if a protection order prohibits one parent from coming within a specified distance of the other parent’s home, while a parenting order allows the parent to collect and return the children at the home. The Family Law Act has a number of provisions that address issues of possible inconsistency of parenting orders with protection orders:

- s 60CG—ensuring parenting orders are consistent as possible with protection orders;
- s 68P—where an inconsistent parenting order is made, requiring a detailed explanation of how the contact specified in the order is to occur; and
- s 68Q—allowing for a declaration that a protection order is inconsistent with a parenting order.

Section 60CG of the Family Law Act

In addition to considering any family violence or risk of family violence when determining what parenting orders are in a child’s best interests, s 60CG of the Family Law Act expressly requires that federal family courts must also ensure that a parenting order is consistent with a protection order and does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence, ‘to the extent that it is possible to do so consistently with the child’s best interests being the paramount consideration’. The provision also allows the court to include in the order any safeguards that it considers necessary for the safety of those affected by the order.

---

43 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CG(1).
44 Ibid s 60CG(2).
17.48 While it may be unlikely in practice, it is possible for a federal family court to make a parenting order that is inconsistent with a protection order when it is not made aware of the existence of a protection order made under state or territory family violence legislation. In Chapter 30, the Commissions make a number of recommendations to improve information sharing between courts, and in particular to ensure that federal family courts are made aware of existing protection orders. The Commissions consider that by improving courts’ awareness of relevant orders made in other courts, they will be less likely to inadvertently make inconsistent orders.

17.49 In some circumstances, while the federal family court may be aware of the terms of the protection order it may, nonetheless, decide to make an inconsistent parenting order because it has come to a different view of the risk of violence on the evidence before it, or considers that it is in the child’s best interests to spend time and communicate with both parents notwithstanding the protection order. The focus of this section is on the rules and principles that apply when a federal family court deliberately makes a parenting order that is inconsistent with an existing protection order.

17.50 Chapter 16 discusses the reverse situation of how state and territory magistrates courts, when making or varying a protection order, can address inconsistencies between the protection order and an existing parenting order to ensure that the parenting order does not put a person at risk of family violence. Because a parenting order will override an inconsistent protection order, the obligations on federal family courts when faced with inconsistent orders differ from the obligations and powers of state and territory courts.

17.51 In Chapter 16, the Commissions discuss the problematic operation of s 60CG where a court determines, having regard to all the relevant considerations, that it is in the best interests of a child to spend time or communicate with a parent who has used, or threatened to use family violence against a family member other than the child. The Commissions express the view that a parenting order should not operate to place a person at risk of family violence, and that the best interests of a child should not be given priority over the protection of another person from family violence.

17.52 In Chapter 16, the Commissions recommend that, where there are issues of family violence, and whether or not there is a current protection order in place, courts making parenting orders should undertake a two-step process, in which, after determining what parenting orders would be in the child’s best interests, the court also considers the effect of those orders on the safety of other family members from family violence. If the parenting order operates to place a person at risk of family violence, the court should make the amendments necessary to the order to ensure that the person is protected from an unacceptable risk of family violence. When considering these amendments, the court should consider what is necessary for the safety of those affected by the order and the best interests of the child should not be the paramount consideration.

45 Ibid s 68Q(1).
17.53 A further complication is that, because a protection order is invalid to the extent that it is inconsistent with a parenting order, breach of the invalidated conditions in the protection order is technically not a criminal offence, and such conditions cannot be enforced by police. So even where a court includes safeguards in a parenting order to ensure a person other than the child is protected from family violence, if such conditions are inconsistent with a protection order, they cannot be enforced by police. Where it is necessary to protect a person from family violence, federal family courts should consider issuing an injunction for the personal protection of that person, as well as including conditions in the parenting order. In the second part of this chapter, the Commissions make recommendations relating to the ability of federal family courts to make enforceable injunctions for personal protection.

Section 68P of the Family Law Act

17.54 As set out in the Explanatory Memorandum for the amending legislation that introduced s 68P, the provision places obligations on the court to explain to the parties affected (or arrange for someone else to explain to them), the effect and consequences of the order and how it is to be complied with.

17.55 Where a court makes a parenting order that is inconsistent with an existing protection order, the order must state that it is inconsistent with an existing protection order and provide a detailed explanation of how the contact specified in the order is to occur. The court must also explain to the parties:

- the purpose, effect and consequences of the order;
- the court’s reasons for making an inconsistent order; and
- the circumstances in which a person may apply for variation or revocation of the order.

17.56 Section 68P also requires the court ‘as soon as practicable’, and no later than 14 days, after making the parenting order to provide a copy of the order to: the parties; the registrar or other appropriate officer of the court that last made or varied the protection order; the Commissioner for Police; and a child welfare officer in the relevant state or territory. Failure to comply with the requirements in s 68P does not, however, affect the validity of the parenting order.

17.57 The Family Court’s Best Practice Principles for use in Parenting Disputes when Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (Best Practice Principles) include a checklist for judicial officers, setting out the issues that need to be considered when making parenting orders in cases where family violence has been alleged. While the checklist notes that a court will generally need to consider the extent to which a parenting order

---

46 Ibid s 68Q(1).
47 Explanatory Memorandum, Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Bill 2005 (Cth), 149.
48 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68P(2)(a), (b).
49 Ibid s 68P(4).
17.58 The review of div 11 of the Family Law Act by Kearney McKenzie and Associates in 1998, noted that while it is ‘clearly desirable’ for people affected by a court order to be given the information required under s 68P, these obligations do not, however, reduce the risk that a woman who is losing the protection of her family violence order will be exposed to violence. Information about the circumstances in which she can apply to have the contact order changed or revoked may help her avoid repeated violence. The most effective requirement in [the provisions requiring federal family courts to give parties certain information] is the requirement that the judge or registrar include details of how the contact should take place. … In cases where there is violence between the parties, detailed contact orders reduce the opportunities for harassment of one party by another, for example, by constant telephone calls to make arrangements for contact.51

17.59 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions sought stakeholder views about the operation, in practice, of the requirements in s 68P of the Family Law Act, and whether any reforms are necessary to improve the operation of the provision.

Section 68Q of the Family Law Act

17.60 Section 68Q of the Family Law Act allows parties to parenting proceedings and persons subject to, or protected by, a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation, to apply to a court for a declaration that a protection order is inconsistent with a parenting order. The Explanatory Memorandum for the amending legislation that introduced s 68Q stated that it is ‘an important provision which clarifies the relationship between family law orders which provide for a child to spend time with a person and State or Territory family violence orders’.52

17.61 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how frequently s 68Q was used in practice, and whether it was working effectively.53

Submissions and consultations

17.62 A number of stakeholders commented on how rarely s 68P was used in practice.54 The Queensland Law Society suggested that this may be because protection

---

50 Family Court of Australia, Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (2009), 2.
52 Explanatory Memorandum, Family Law Amendment (Shared Parental Responsibility) Bill 2005 (Cth), 152.
53 Consultation Paper, Questions 8–4, 8–5.
orders typically have an exception for orders made under the Family Law Act, meaning that formal inconsistency between orders does not arise.55

17.63 Some stakeholders noted that, in their experience, some of the requirements of s 68P are followed where there is a final hearing. The Queensland Law Society and Legal Aid NSW both noted that where a matter is contested to final hearing, judicial officers will provide reasons why an inconsistent parenting order has been made.56 National Legal Aid and Legal Aid NSW commented that the explanation of the orders given by the court is more detailed if parties are unrepresented.57 Peninsula Community Legal Centre commented that, where family law orders are inconsistent with protection orders, parties are advised that the family law order will prevail over the protection order to the extent of the inconsistency.58

17.64 However, Women’s Legal Services Australia submitted that the situation is different in interim hearings in federal family courts, in which the ‘lack of court time and resources allocated to interim hearings mean that family violence issues cannot be assessed comprehensively’.59

17.65 Women’s Legal Services Australia and Women’s Legal Services NSW commented on the importance of s 68P, in that it ensures the family court undertakes a valuable process: first, judicial officers are directed to consider the implications of their orders and ensure that there are no unintended consequences; and second, steps are taken to make certain that affected people clearly understand the full impact of the family law orders.60

17.66 However, the Family Violence Prevention and Legal Services Victoria noted that the process under s 68P was cumbersome, and submitted that:

> It would be better if the Family Court could amend the [protection] order or send the proposed variation to the Magistrates Court to make a new order. There is a lot of to and fro-ing when orders are being varied between Courts. It is very problematic, confusing for parties involved and demanding on limited resources.61

17.67 Some stakeholders noted that ss 68P and 68Q, which require courts only to acknowledge inconsistency, do not necessarily achieve safety for victims of family violence, and submitted that the Family Law Act should prohibit courts from making orders which are inconsistent with protection orders made under state and territory family violence legislation.62 Other stakeholders commented on the need, when making parenting orders, for federal family courts to recognise and address issues of family violence. 63

17.68 While fewer stakeholders commented on the use of s 68Q of the Family Law Act, many noted that it was rarely used in practice. 64

Commisions’ views

17.69 Section 68P of the Family Law Act contains an important procedural requirement in that it requires courts to highlight and explain any inconsistency between a parenting order being made by the court and a current protection order. The Commissions consider that it is particularly important that parties are aware that, in such circumstances, the protection order is invalid to the extent that it is inconsistent with the parenting order. 65

17.70 The Commissions consider that the procedural requirements in s 68P are valuable, in that they draw the parties’ attention to the fact that orders are inconsistent. From the submissions to this Inquiry, the Commissions note that s 68P appears to be little used in practice, and suggest that one way to encourage courts to follow the requirements in s 68P when making both interim and final parenting orders that are inconsistent with a protection order would be to include a prompt about the requirements in the Family Court’s Best Practice Principles.

17.71 The Commissions note that s 68Q also appears to be used infrequently. This may be because, while a declaration of inconsistency between a protection order and a parenting order would provide clarity, it does not necessarily address the implications of any inconsistency—specifically, the risk that a person is exposed to family violence. As noted above, the Commissions have recommended an amendment to s 60CG to ensure that federal family courts separately consider and address any risk that parenting orders expose a person to family violence. In addition, later in this chapter, the Commissions recommend that federal family courts have power to issue injunctions for personal protection, breach of which is a criminal offence.

63 See, eg, Murray Mallee Community Legal Service, Submission FY 167, 25 June 2010; Berry Street Inc, Submission FY 163, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 130, 21 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 82, 2 June 2010; C Pragnell, Submission FY 70, 2 June 2010.

64 Department of Premier and Cabinet (Tas), Submission FY 236, 20 July 2010; National Legal Aid, Submission FY 232, 15 July 2010; Women’s Legal Services Australia, Submission FY 225, 6 July 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FY 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Queensland, Submission FY 185, 25 June 2010; Women’s Legal Services NSW, Submission FY 182, 25 June 2010; Law Council of Australia, Submission FY 180, 25 June 2010; Queensland Law Society, Submission FY 178, 25 June 2010; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission FY 173, 25 June 2010; Confidential, Submission FY 82, 2 June 2010.

65 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68Q(1). Section 109 of the Australian Constitution provides for Commonwealth legislation to take precedence over inconsistent legislation in a state or territory when the Commonwealth and state and territory legislation purport to cover the same field. The constitutional framework is discussed in Ch 2.
Parenting orders made by consent

17.72 Where parenting orders are made with the consent of both parties, there are concerns that issues of family violence do not come to the attention of the court, or are insufficiently considered, and so cannot be adequately addressed.

17.73 The issue of consent orders is expressly covered in the Family Court’s Best Practice Principles, which set out the matters that courts should consider when parties propose parenting orders by consent that provide for a child to spend time with a person against whom family violence allegations have been made. The considerations include an assessment of:

- the seriousness of the allegations;
- whether the child has been involved in or exposed to violence;
- whether the parent against whom violence is alleged is seeking to spend time with the child as a way of continuing to control or maintain contact with the other parent; and
- whether it is clear that the parties have agreed to the order without pressure from others.66

17.74 The Best Practice Principles suggest steps that the court may take if it has concerns about the proposed consent orders, including ordering the preparation of a family report; ordering the appointment of an independent children’s lawyer; requesting an interview by a family consultant; hearing further evidence; or referring one or both parents to an appropriate service and adjourning the proceedings.67

17.75 Where parties have commenced parenting proceedings, and allegations of child abuse have been raised, r 10.15A of the Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) requires the party, or the party’s lawyer, to advise the court of the allegations, and to explain to the court how the order attempts to deal with the allegations.

17.76 The Chisholm Review suggested that consideration should be given to applying the requirements in r 10.15A to matters in which consent orders are sought where there are allegations of family violence, and introducing a similar rule to matters heard in the Federal Magistrates Court (FMC).68 In the Consultation Paper for this Inquiry, the Commissions proposed that the Family Law Rules should be amended to implement the suggestions made in the Chisholm Review.69 There was widespread support among stakeholders for this proposal.70

---

66 Family Court of Australia, Best Practice Principles for Use in Parenting Disputes When Family Violence or Abuse is Alleged (2009), 12.
67 Ibid, pt G.
68 R Chisholm, Family Courts Violence Review (2009), 88–89. The Review did not make a specific recommendation to this effect on the basis of insufficient information.
69 Consultation Paper, Proposal 8–6.
70 Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission FV 220, 1 July 2010; WESNET—The Women’s Services Network, Submission FV 217, 30 June 2010; National Abuse Free Contact Campaign, Submission FV 196, 26 June 2010; Women’s Legal Service Victoria, Submission FV 189,
17.77 Since the time of writing the Consultation Paper, r 10.15A of the Family Law Rules has been amended so that it applies to matters in which allegations of family violence, as well as child abuse, have been made. In their submission in this Inquiry, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate noted that the Family Court and FMC Family Violence Committee has formed the view that the rule should also be adopted in the FMC, and the proposed amendment has been referred to the FMC Legal Committee.

17.78 Rule 10.15A does not apply, however, where parties apply for consent orders without commencing proceedings in the Family Court. The Application for Consent Orders form, which can be used in the Family Court and FMC, asks whether the parenting orders sought are consistent with any current protection order. In their submission, the Chief Justice of the Family Court and the Chief Federal Magistrate noted that registrars in federal family courts regularly requisition consent orders where this question is answered ‘no’, and will often determine not to approve such orders in chambers and either dismiss the application or list the matter before a judicial officer for consideration. The Application for Consent Orders Kit published by the Family Court states that if the proposed consent orders are inconsistent with an existing protection order the matter must be heard in court. The Kit also advises parties to seek legal advice in this situation.

17.79 The Federal Magistrates Court Rules 2001 (Cth) do not include a procedure for the court to make parenting orders by consent where no proceedings have been commenced. The Chisholm Review reported anecdotal evidence that, in practice, court officers at the FMC direct parties to apply to the Family Court when they seek to make consent orders without instituting parenting proceedings.
17.80 In the Consultation Paper, the Commissions asked how often federal family courts make consent orders that are inconsistent with current protection orders without requiring parties to institute parenting proceedings. The Commissions also asked whether the policy in the Application for Consent Orders Kit to require parties to institute parenting proceedings where they propose consent orders that are inconsistent with current protection orders should be reflected in the Family Law Rules.

Submissions and consultations

17.81 Stakeholders raised a number of concerns about consent orders, including the incidence of inconsistent orders made by consent, the impact of the costs of contested litigation and a concern that some parties are pressured or intimidated into consenting to parenting orders that expose them to a risk of family violence.

17.82 A number of stakeholders commented that it is difficult to judge how often parenting orders that are inconsistent with protection orders are made by consent. Women’s Legal Services Australia submitted that while it did not have statistics on the incidences of federal family courts making consent orders that are inconsistent with protection orders without requiring parties to institute parenting proceedings, anecdotal evidence obtained from women accessing our services would seem to indicate that there is a significant group of women who have parenting orders made that are inconsistent with protection orders.

17.83 Some stakeholders expressed concerns about victims of family violence consenting to parenting orders that place them at risk of further violence, either because of the costs pressures associated with court hearings and encouragement to settle matters, or because of threats and intimidation by the other parent.

17.84 There was some support for a proposal that parties be required to institute parenting proceedings where they propose consent orders that are inconsistent with current protection orders. However, some stakeholders expressed concerns that the proposal would force people into litigation which they cannot afford. Women’s Legal Services NSW noted that:

77 Consultation Paper, Question 8–2.
